THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

ART SOCIETY CLOSSES SUCCESSFUL YEAR

Star March 29, 1933.

Full Season Reported at Annual Meeting

Completing its thirty-ninth year, the Women's Art Society held its annual meeting yesterday afternoon in Stevenson Hall, when a comprehensive summing up of the past months presented by Mrs. J. C. Beswick indicated a season filled with various activities in the realm of art. These included the president's course of three lectures, interesting and instructive; the art course of four lectures, calculated to fulfil the object of the society in promoting a more general interest in art; the poetry and drama course consisting of three lectures and a play; four musical recitals of a high order; contributions by the members, a studio day exhibition, and the annual social event in the form of a tea attended by almost 400 members and guests.

During this year of stress, it was commented, in common with other organizations, the membership has decreased and now stands at 358 with 14 studio members, 4 out-of-town members, 16 life members and 5 honorary members. There have been 28 new members.

The following grants were made: $50 to the Children's Library, $15 to the Handicraft Class of the University Settlement, $10 to the Canadian Handicraft Guild, $100 to the Montreal Orchestra, and $100 to the Christmas Cheer committee of the Montreal Council of Social Agencies (an unusual grant on account of urgent need).

The treasurer, Mrs. Dakers Cameron, stated that total receipts had been $4,098.72, and expenditure $3,004.76, leaving a balance of $1,093.96.

Reporting for the soldiers' fund maintained by the society, Miss Hay Browne told of entertainments given to the patients at the Military Hospital at St. Anne de Bellevue at different times during the year, also to the unemployed veterans in Verdun and Rosemount, this last in response to a request from an official of the Department of Pensions and National Health. A total of 1,243 persons received Christmas entertainment or gifts. Total receipts were $795.67, and the balance on hand is $303.23.

Officers elected for the ensuing year are: President, Mrs. R. A. Dunton; first vice-president, Mrs. W. A. Gifford; second vice-president, Mrs. J. M. Almond; recording secretary, Mrs. P. V. Haven; corresponding secretary, Mrs. George W. Plow; treasurer, Mrs. Dakers Cameron. Conveners of committees are: Mrs. James Hutchison, Mrs. Rudolph Picard, Mrs. J. S. Rutherford, Mrs. R. Thompson, Mrs. Alexander Murray, Mrs. Maxwell Sinn, Miss Hay Browne and Miss Ethelwyn Bennett. Mrs. R. A. Dunton presided.

Gazette April 21, From Our Readers

Canadian Art Exhibitions.

To the Editor of The Gazette:
Sir,—I enclose herewith a copy of a letter which appeared recently in the Scotsman, of Edinburgh, Scotland, and which will interest Canadian artists and their friends. The writer of the letter would be glad if you would re-publish it.
R. R. THOMPSON.
Westmount, April 18, 1933.

To the Editor, The Scotsman, Edinburgh, Scotland:

Sir,—Your Canadian correspondent, Mr. R. R. Thompson, can rest satisfied that art experts and lovers over here were quite certain that the collection of Canadian pictures, recently on loan at the R. S. W. exhibition could not be fully representative of the art production of Canada.

The lament of your correspondent relative to the tendency of official bodies to fasten on what is dubbed the "new" art as the only art proper and representative of modern conditions and present-world tendencies is not confined to Canada, but flourishes very unabashed this side of the Atlantic as well.

Therefore, Mr. Thompson and his fellows in Canada can console themselves that artists in this country have a like disability to contend with.

I stand strongly for free speech in art, and would defend the best and the true in this modern or new art. But the truly artistic devilry of the thing is that this passing and fashionable form of art is a most facile and accommodating cloak under which to conceal color ignorance, artistic ineptitude, and technical incompetence, although it certainly often has a pathological interest. And the distressing thing is that so few of our art writers and art committees seem able to distinguish between the true and great works in this "new" art, and the lumber heap of rubbish that too often is forced upon the public eye. Not that this overmuch frets me, for painters can choose how they paint, of course, and after all, if an artist has to die, he may just as well pass to oblivion in a "new" art coffin as in an "old" one.

In conclusion, might I ask Mr. R. R. Thompson to convey to the artists of Canada fraternal greetings from the Scottish artists who keep the flag of the Scottish artistic genius flying unscathed by these foetid currents?

I am, etc.,

Back to the Nineties In Photography

Star 29/3/33

The times, clothes and surroundings of the grandmothers of some of us and the sisters of others are recalled by the exhibition of photographs which is just now being shown in the picture gallery of the Eaton Company. They are a selection only from a very large collection of such photographs, which has been made by Miss Therese Bonney of Paris, who has seen the historical interest, apart from the entertainment, that there is in them; photographs of this kind must have been destroyed by thousands in the newspaper offices of Europe and America. The exhibition is called "The Gay Nineties." It is hard to see why gaiety should be so persistently attributed to the nineties, any more than to the seventies or eighties or, for that matter, the naughties of the present century, and, as a matter of fact, these photographs are of many dates, from 1880 or earlier to just before the war.

Royal persons take a good deal of space in this collection, alone or in stately surroundings, in uniforms and in shooting clothes or, in the case of a very early one of King Alfonso, in nothing at all to speak of. They show the sort of loss that the world has suffered in the departure of the ornamental circumstances of royalty and, at the same time, how little some of the royal persons contributed to those ornaments in the way of personal beauty. One is struck by the fewness of the pictures of that very much photographed person, Wilhelm II. of Germany.

These pictures show us how people looked thirty to fifty years ago in all sorts of places and all sorts of clothes. One may see from them that then as now girls wore almost as much for bathing as for dancing, though much more for both purposes then than now. One may also see that while, in those days, clothes were more ample, so also were the people inside them. Those were the days when women really wore hats;—hats big enough to keep off sun and rain, though hardly very convenient for all occasions. A sisterly greeting between wearers of such hats was, as some one remarked, rather like two oysters trying to kiss each other. The photographs may serve as a reminder that absurd things have surmounted people's heads before that time,—and since; indeed they may help us to realize how ridiculous we shall look in photographs forty years from now. The places in which these people appear include London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Cowes and many others; there are some good examples of rooms of the period and even one of a royal bathroom, in which the bath, with more regard for royalty than for hygiene, seems to have been put into the corner of a state drawing room.

And among all these phenomena there are one of a Berlin nursemaid in her peasant's dress and several of Chinese ambassadors and dignitaries, just to show that there are some sensible people in the world who, having found hundreds of years ago the sort of dress that suited them best, have never changed their minds.

Star 29/3/33 "THE BLUE BOY"

PORTRAIT OF MASTER BUTTAL
by Gainsborough

This portrait of a boy dressed in blue satin is one of the most famous of Gainsborough's pictures. It is said to have been painted in defiance of a saying of Sir Joshua Reynolds that blue could not be the principal colour of a good picture, which needed a predominance of warm yellows and reds. The picture gained a further sort of celebrity some years ago when it was bought from the Duke of Westminster's collection for an enormous price,—said to have been $850,000,—and came to the United States.

The exhibition of portraits of Indians of the West by N. de Grandmaison at Scott's gallery, will remain open for another week. It will be followed by an exhibition of the work of Frank S. Panabaker, on April 8.

At the Watson gallery there is at present on view a general exhibition of work by European painters of the 19th century.

The attendance at this year's

Spring Exhibition of the Art Association has been unusually large. More than 4,000 people had visited the exhibition up to the beginning of this week and there were nearly 2,200 on the first Sunday after the opening.

The Italian Embassy in London will soon be the most richly endowed Embassy in the world. Fifty famous old masters are now on their way to London to be hung at the Embassy. These pictures formed part of the collection of the banker, Signor Gualino, famous for many years as the richest man in Italy.

The collection was taken over by the Government at the winding-up of the estate on Signor Gualino's banishment. Signor Grandi, the Italian Ambassador in London, asked Mussolini to allow some of the pictures to be sent to London, and this request is now being acceded to. It is Signor Grandi's hope that "every Italian who enters the Embassy may be made to feel proud of his country."

Signor Gualino was sentenced in 1931 to five years' banishment on the island of Lipari after being held responsible for "repeated and serious damage to the national economy." He was formerly President of the Sna Viscosa Artificial Silk Co., and in November, 1927, bought the Derby winner, Captain Cuttle, from Lord Woolavington for a sum said to be over £30,000.

This will not be the first occasion that an Ambassador's headquarters in London has housed great works of art. When Mr. Andrew Mellon went there he took with him several priceless old masters from his own collection.

Remarkably high prices were paid a few weeks ago at the auction, in Berlin, of the pictures, furniture and other works of art from the collection of Baron Albert Goldschmidt-Rothschild. The pictures included works by Romney and Sir Thomas Lawrence and all brought good prices, while about $100,000 was realized for the collection. The buyers it is said were mostly French, German and Austrian art dealers.

After fourteen years a collection of miniatures stolen from a country house in the south of England has been recovered, thanks to the sharpness of a London policeman. He happened to notice the name of the family, from whom the collection was stolen in 1918, on the back of a miniature in the possession of a man who had just been sentenced on another charge altogether. He remembered the name, made a search and found all those that had been stolen.

The pictures of birds which are being shown in the exhibition gallery of the McGill University Library, range all the way from large pictures to post-cards and school charts. In the Blacker and Emma Shearer-Wood collections the library has an exceptionally large quantity of such pictures and the present display seems to contain most of the best illustrated books dealing with birds, from early books of natural history to some of the most recent ones. Of still more interest are the many original pictures, by Van Huysum, Ehret, Edward Lear and other artists, and there is a particularly good series of water colour drawings of birds of India and Ceylon. The exhibition also contains some of the pictures made of feathers, from the collection of more than 150 given to the library a few years ago by Dr. Casey Wood. One of these shows a man, on horse-back, hunting the Dodo, and this, and another picture of a Dodo were made when stuffed specimens of the bird still existed as models—before the last of all, at Oxford, was burnt by mistake. A few photographs of birds and their nests, and some mounted birds and eggs, lent by the Redpath Museum, complete the exhibition.

The exhibition of works by Harry Britton at the Eaton Company's gallery remains open till Saturday of this week. An exhibition of pictures by Thurston Topham opened at the same gallery on Monday and will be open for two weeks.

Many Art Treasures Endangered By Flames

Historic Sherbrooke Street Mansion Houses Valuable Collection of Paintings.

Under Control

Blaze Was Discovered Early This Morning.

It was stated late this morning that approximately forty per cent of the Van Horne collection of paintings are a practical total loss.

Most of the masters were saved, it was learned "The Mad Monk", a world famous painting was destroyed, however, although many were damaged by fire and water.

Several valuable paintings of the famous Van Horne collection were destroyed, while others were damaged by smoke and water early this morning when a stubborn fire threatened the magnificent home of Lady Van Horne, on Sherbrooke street west at the corner of Stanley street. The blaze was confined to the third storey of the edifice. Miss Van Horne who was asleep at the time of the outbreak escaped uninjured. Two firemen were injured.

It was at 4.20 o'clock this morning that Captain Villeneuve, of No. 4 fire station, received a telephone call informing him of the fire. He immediately rang an alarm and rushed to the scene together with District Chief Presseau and a contingent of stations. Acting Director Carson arrived a few moments later with additional men and apparatus.

When the firemen arrived flames were issuing from the windows of the third storey. In a few moments they had spread to the roof. Servants and fire-fighters joined in the efforts to salvage the valuable paintings.

Smoke belched from the huge mansion in thick, swirling clouds. Many streams of water were poured into the heart of the outbreak. Despite the handicap of smoke, however, firemen managed to check the blaze on the floor of the third storey. Over two hours were spent nevertheless, before the fire was finally extinguished.

It was at the height of the blaze that District Chief Presseau stepped on an upturned nail. He was given first aid treatment and sent home. A few moments later Fireman Beaudin, of No. 25 station experienced the same mishap.

The Van Horne home contains by far the most valuable and representative collection of old masters and objects d'art in Canada. In fact in many respects the collection is unique. There are those who have estimated that the collection of pictures alone is worth around $2,000,000. It contains representative work of many schools of painting ranging from some remarkable primitives down to the modern Dutch masters. The most valuable picture in the collection is a full-length portrait by Velasquez, said to be his masterpiece.

The late Sir Wm. Van Horne, as became his lineage, was a great admirer of the work of Dutch artists, and one room was entirely devoted to their works.

In addition there are many pictures painted by Sir William himself—real works of art that he executed in spare time while carrying out the onerous work first as general manager and later as President of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Besides pictures, the house contains a wonderful collection of Chinese porcelain, containing many most valuable pieces from the greatest periods of Chinese art.

One collection on which the late Sir William Van Horne greatly prided himself was that of the original models of many of the great warships of European Nations during the sailing ship era. Sir William started collecting these before anyone else appears to have thought of it, with the result that he managed to secure some eighty models that museum authorities now

Famous Paintings Escape Fire in Van Horne Home

Smoke and Water Cause Heavy Losses Among Beautiful Furnishings in Old Residence

TOTAL loss of the famed "Van Horne Collection" of paintings, known to patrons of fine art throughout the world and valued at $1,250,000, was narrowly averted this morning when fire of unknown origin which broke out in the Van Horne home, 1139 Sherbrooke street west, resulted in damages estimated at several hundred thousand dollars to minor paintings and other objects d'art and generally to the house furnishings. Most of the losses were caused by smoke and water.

TWO DAMAGED.

Two paintings known to have been damaged are "The Mad Monk," by Lucas, and "Two Girls Singing," by Renoir. A painting of the Crucifixion by a Flemish artist is also believed slightly damaged.

William Van Horne, grandson of Sir William has issued the following statement:

"All I can say now is that fire broke out in the top of the house and spread through it. There was no damage to the catalogued collection. The fire damage is not as bad as might be imagined and the water loss is now being determined."

HEAVY DAMAGE.

Anyone who has even the slightest appreciation of fine furniture and fittings would be appalled at the water soaked interior. Adjusters and other officials sloshed through a quarter inch of water on the ground floor, each footstep making the costly rugs less recognizable. Firemen with long poles punched holes in the costly ceilings to let dammed-up water pour through, to alleviate further soaking on the next floor. The walls dripped like the interior of a cave or a dank cellar. Splashes of mud besmirched paintings, which if not high priced, at least had associations far beyond money.

A line of hose ran up a sodden mess that a few hours before was a deep-nap Oriental carpet. Tapestries dripped like dish towels. Books of rare value lay about in bloated heaps.

On the third floor there was ruin and desolation. The little model ships, that Sir William took such a pride in and the repair of which kept one man busy all the time, were as dejected looking as broken Christmas toys. People waded around on costly rugs, now like so many soggy door mats, amid watery walls and under dribbling ceilings, to replace a square foot of which, wall, floor or ceiling, would cost more than the average man's weekly salary. Old masters were heaped against the billiard tables like job lot bedsteads. A Franz Hals glared upside down at a fireman. A Rembrandt rested drunkenly in a corner.

FIREMEN HURT.

Miss Adelaide Van Horne, a daughter of Sir William; William Van Horne, her nephew, with Dr. George Sugden and J. A. Bradley, guests, and a number of servants, all escaped uninjured. District Chief Presseau and Fireman Beaudin of No. 25 Station were slightly injured while fighting the fire.

According to Dr. Sugden, who was the guest of Mr. Van Horne, he, J. A. Bradley and Mr. Van Horne returned home late last night.

As they were going upstairs they smelled smoke, which upon investigation, they found to be coming from the top floor in a room at the south end of the house. When Mr. Bradley went to investigate this, he was almost overcome by smoke.

Miss Van Horne and her nurse, Miss Lindsay, were immediately awakened, also the servants, and the three men took steps to call the fire department, ensure that all occupants left the house and to save the valuable paintings and other objects d'art.

RE-INFORCEMENTS CALLED

Firemen from No. 10 and 25 stations were the first to arrive on the scene, under District Chief Villeneuve and Captains Paisley and Castell. They were later reinforced by men from Stations 3, 4, 5, 6, 14 and 28, under District Chief Presseau. Acting Director Carson also came to the scene.

Captain Paisley said that he and eight firemen had a narrow escape from death when trapped by a back-draft explosion in the room in which the fire started. This, according to the report of Chief Villeneuve, was in a large sideboard or buffet, and had spread to the ceiling and through the roof when his men arrived.

With the aid of George Dreyer coachman to the Van Horne family, Mr. Van Horne and his two guests toiled through the early hours of the morning, carrying valuable paintings to safety in the billiard room on the main floor.

The first alarm had been sounded at 4.11 a.m. Four hours after this the "all clear" was rung and several companies of the salvage corps began work.

Mr. Van Horne said that it was impossible for him to state exactly what paintings had been damaged nor could he give any estimate of damages to the house. He and his two guests took up temporary quarters in the home of Hon. Marguerite Shaughnessy.

FAMOUS VAN HORNE ART COLLECTION IS SAVED FROM BLAZE

HOUSE SUSTAINS DAMAGE

Water and Smoke Play Havoc With Rugs, Tapestry and Furniture—Two Firemen Hurt

Although still impossible to estimate, the damage caused by fire to the residence and art collections of the late Sir William Van Horne, 1139 Sherbrooke street west, is not as heavy as it was first considered.

Contrary to early reports, there was apparently not a single one of the most valuable paintings damaged beyond repair, and although practically all these priceless works of art were injured by water, the work of the salvage department was so effective that a rough check-up last night showed that only one small painting, "The Cliffs of Dover," by Turner, was wrecked beyond hope. The magnificent collection of Japanese pottery was also saved from destruction, and the sailing ship models, scattered throughout the house, were nearly all removed before it was too late.

The house, on the other hand, filled with old furniture, rugs, tapestries, and valuables of various kinds, suffered heavily from fire and water and the disturbance connected with the tragic event. Here, again, however, it was impossible to state yesterday just what damage, in actual dollars had been done. The value of many of the articles themselves is hardly known, and it will be some time before it can be found how many of them can be repaired and restored and how many of them will have to be numbered among the losses sustained through the fire.

Soon after the fire had been extinguished, the work of removing all the valuables from the house was commenced. The first thoughts were for the paintings, as Sir William's collection is recognized as one of the most valuable in Canada and is valued at somewhere in the neighborhood of $2,000,000. Most of the rare works were on the lower floors, to which the fire did not penetrate; but nearly all were damaged to some extent by water. These were collected as carefully as possible and removed to the Art Gallery, a few blocks along on Sherbrooke street, and here they are being looked after by experts.

It was stated last night that only the one Turner was beyond repair, but it is still impossible to say what effects water and smoke will have on many of the others. The panel pictures, for instance, may be cracked or spoiled in other ways, but the treasures most valuable to the world of art seem to have been salvaged in fairly good condition.

TAKEN TO MORGANS.

Other valuables, including tapestries, rugs, furniture, and almost everything in the house that could be moved, were loaded in vans, and, dripping with water, taken down to Morgan's store where every effort will be made to save as much as possible.

By late afternoon the magnificent old house presented an empty and bedraggled appearance. Passers-by paused curiously outside throughout the day, but only those on definite business were allowed inside. From without, it was apparent that the fire had been serious and it was clear that the top storey had been gutted, with the lower floors suffering less damage. But not until one gained entrance to the house itself was it possible to see what a lamentable mess had been created. Water and the ravages it had effected were to be seen everywhere, and the floors, walls, ceilings and objects of furniture that could not be removed were soaked and dripping.

The members of the family, guests and servants in the house all escaped injury. Miss Adelaide Van Horne, daughter of Sir William, took refuge across the street for the time being at the home of Lord Atholstan; and William Van Horne, only grandson of Sir William, who had two guests with him at the time, Dr. George W. Sugden and J. A. Bradley, took up temporary quarters in the home of Hon. Marguerite Shaughnessy.

The preliminary work that the firemen had accomplished in removing paintings from the upper floors and other exposed rooms to places of comparative safety was followed up with despatch at the earliest possible moment, and every effort was made to handle everything with care. The most difficult tasks of all appeared to be that of the adjusters who were faced with the task of estimating the damage done. Officials of the Royal Trust Company, in charge of the estate, were unwilling last night to say anything just at this time.

The Van Horne paintings, "one of the most notable private collections in Canada," include treasures gathered over a period of years by the late Sir William Van Horne, former president of the C.P.R., and himself a painter of some merit, though he had little time to devote himself seriously to the art. "The impression left by a visit to this collection is that Sir William Van Horne must have been a superman," one authority writes.

OUTSTANDING PICTURES.

Indeed, a review of the more valuable works set up in the fine old house at the corner of Sherbrooke and Stanley streets that he built for the purpose, shows that he had acquired masterpieces that would be a credit to any gallery. A few of these might be enumerated to illustrate the scope of the collection: "Landscapes" and "A Rabbi," works of Rembrandt; "A Young Man," signed by Rembrandt, but attributed to one of his pupils, Ferdinand Ball; "Conversion of Saul," by Montecelli; "Mohammedans at Prayer," by Charles Bargue; "Salome and Herodias," by Rubens; "Portrait of Melanchton," by Holbein; "Portrait of Luther," by Cranach; "A Miniature of Washington," by Goyer; "The Holy Family," by El Greco; "Jane, Duchess of Gordon, and her son the Marquis of Huntly," by George Romney; "Philip IV," by Velasquez; "Christ on the Lake of Gennesaret," by Delacroix, and "Child Bathing in a Brook," by Honore Daumier.

These are only a few of a collection that numbers over 200 paintings. The Dutch section is particularly highly regarded, with works of such men as Frans Hals, Carel Fabritius, Jacob Ruysdael, Albert Cuyp, Van der Helst, and William van de Velde. But the Spanish division is also worthy of note; and of great personal interest are the paintings done by Sir William Van Horne himself. These include scenes from almost every province in Canada which he did at odd moments during his travels. One which he liked a great deal shows a C.P.R. train entering a station at night.

Apart from the paintings, probably the most valuable collection in the house was that of Japanese pottery, which was saved from destruction and removed for safe-keeping. This contains over 2,000 objects which he collected over a number of years and improved from time to time through exchanges and substitutions. There are works of many of the Japanese provinces, and fine specimens of Satsuma work. One cabinet containing over 100 tea jars is particularly noteworthy.

Sir William also took great pride in his collection of sailing ships, consisting of plaques and models of vessels that ruled the waves from as far back as the 14th and 15th centuries. These were hung in various parts of the house, many of them in the long corridors that sweep from end to end on each floor, and others were placed on mantelpieces and other points of vantage. Many of these being brittle and hard to handle were injured to a greater or less extent and may prove difficult to restore.

Old furniture of various periods suffered, as did tapestries, carpets and other valuable articles of an artistic and utilitarian nature.

TWO FIREMEN HURT.

The fire was first discovered at 4.11 o'clock yesterday morning and firemen were immediately summoned by telephone. By this time the flames had a good hold on the third storey of the house, where it started, and an alarm was sounded for additional men and apparatus at 4.24 o'clock.

Two firemen were injured and nine others just escaped from a smoke explosion in one of the rooms in their attempt to save the magnificent home from total destruction. Six powerful streams of water were used inside the building, but as much care as possible was exercised in order to prevent damage to the works of art. Firemen were able to salvage many of these before the fire got too great headway.

Acting District Fire Chief Villeneuve, who was in charge of the firemen, stated last night that the cause of the outbreak has not yet been determined.

The injured firemen are District Fire Chief Presseau, who suffered cuts on the left foot when he led a squad of firemen into the house to save the paintings, and Fireman Beaudin, of the Drummond street fire station, who was also slightly cut. They were treated on the scene by Dr. Charles Lafleur, departmental physician, and removed to the Western Division of the Montreal General Hospital. They were sent home after treatment and continued their work.

The nine firemen who narrowly escaped serious injury were in one of the rooms when a severe smoke explosion, caused by a back draught, occurred.

A squad of firemen worked on the ground floor of the Van Horne home covering all the valuable and famous paintings with tarpaulins. Other firemen carried some of the various paintings in rooms where there was less danger of them being damaged by the water which poured from the upper floors. The firemen were on the scene for four hours before the outbreak was extinguished. When it was feared the entire building would be destroyed, Acting Director Carson was summoned and took command of the firemen.

Famous London Art Gallery Planning To Serve Cocktails

Herald 3/4/33

London. — If the latest move to brighten London is successful, you will soon be able to sip your Martini appreciatively while gazing with wonder and awe at the many old masters hanging in the famed Tate Gallery here.

For the Tate Gallery has applied for a drink license.

The restaurant there has already acquired quite a reputation for its good food and excellent cooking so, asks its Americanized proprietress, what are rare meats without rare wines?

The ambitious proprietress at the Tate Gallery restaurant is a tall, fair-haired, good-looking woman who has a good deal of catering experience in America.

She took over the restaurant last April, and the Gallery authorities are so pleased with the way she is running it, that they have persuaded the Trustees to approve that a drink license should be applied for in the name of the Gallery.

It is not just a beer license that has been applied for but one for wines and spirits.

"One of my ideas is to keep a cask of red wine and a cask of white on draught, so as to sell wine by the glass, inexpensively," she said.

"The officials of the Gallery lunch here very often, and sometimes they bring with them distinguished foreign visitors. And how can any one enjoy a good meal without any wine?"

An official of the Gallery said:

"We think that a drink license would be a very good thing in every way, and we hope our application for one will be granted."

April 3, 1933 CANADA'S PURCHASES OF "OLD MASTERS"

HOW FAR is Canada justified in purchasing "old masters" during a period like the present?

The subject is brought to mind by the annual report of the National Gallery at Ottawa, one of the numerous offshoots of the Department of Public Works.

This report shows that $77,480.32 was spent on "accessions," which is the artistic name for purchases of an artistic nature.

Looking into the details of the amounts thus paid—details not included in the report—we find that they included a portrait by Bronzino, which cost the taxpayers $36,500; and a picture by Neri di Bicci, which cost $41,358.33. The total for these two pictures, $77,850.33, was less instalments of $19,458.33 paid in the previous year.

Other purchases last year included $3,310.02 paid for a picture by J. P. de Louthembourg; $850 paid for a bronze head of Vilhjalmur Stefansson, and $800 for a "Sleeping Woman" by R. S. Hewton. For a marble, "Passing Rain," by Eliz. Wyn Wood, $1,200 was paid; and other purchases included engravings, prints, etc., at $3,420.18.

Has the National Gallery any importance in the development of the fine arts in Canada?

We listen to the warring opinions of the artists themselves and wonder.

While money is so tight, and taxes so heavy, would it not be better to stop purchasing odd examples of ancient artists as they turn up in dealers' hands, and let the "accessions" be confined to gifts?

Quite a few of the best things in the gallery have been gifts, anyway.

A canvas by Aleksandre Berkovitch, the above gives his impression of the district in which he lives. It was made from the south side of Laurier, about two blocks east of Park avenue. Russian by birth and training, he brings to Montreal a fresh point of view and a vigorous, free technique.

14/3/33 CANADIAN ART

A Protest by 118 Painters

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST

Sir,—There is at present in Britain an exhibition of water-colours by Canadian artists, which has been sent across under the auspices of the Canadian National Gallery. This and other exhibitions of Canadian art held at the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley and other places in Britain and the U.S.A. have attracted attention because the great majority of the pictures shown were of the extreme "Modernistic" type—"School of Seven," "Cubist," and so on.

Having been collected by the Canadian National Gallery, the impression has been given that such exhibitions are a fair representation of Canadian art. The comments of newspapers in Britain indicate, with great restraint and courtesy, that Canadian artists look at things, at least, differently to other people, and that their works certainly "call to you across the room." Because of such exhibitions in the U.S.A. a similar impression is being created there.

The fact is that such exhibitions only represent a minor fraction of Canadian art. The great majority of Canadian artists produce beautiful and normal pictures, which can be understood by anyone. So keenly have the vast majority of professional Canadian artists felt this position that 118 of them, including many members of the Royal Canadian Academy, besides members of other art bodies, and the majority of the most celebrated Canadian artists alive to-day, have signed a public protest, and signified their intention of having nothing further to do with any exhibition under the auspices of the Canadian National Gallery until the situation is remedied.

These 118 artists have made it clear that their quarrel is not with other schools of painting; their quarrel is with the Canadian National Gallery, which has almost excluded the greater portion—the normal and understandable portion—of Canadian art from its exhibitions, and given the latter over very, very largely to "Cubism," &c.

The "Modernistic" artists realise this, and also the injustice of these recent exhibitions, held at Wembley, Edinburgh, and elsewhere, and to their honour some of them have actually signed this protest with the other artists.

April 12/33

The exhibition, which is now open in the gallery of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond St., gives a very much better idea of the work of Frank S. Panabaker than the few pictures which he has shown in Montreal before this. The nearly fifty pictures vary a good deal in their subjects, and, to some extent, in the manner of their painting, but all of them, in their different ways, are full of truth and good observation with, generally, happy composition. Most of them seem clearly to have been painted out of doors, on the spot, and the few which have more evidence of studio work are the least successful. They are views of land and water in many parts of eastern Canada, from Ontario to Nova Scotia.

Among the few larger pictures, "August evening Northumberland Hills" stands out with a surprising and very interesting composition produced by the curves of a road going up hill; there is very good, rather cool, yellow sunlight in the "Autumn afternoon" and in another autumn picture of "Corn and Pumpkins." Mr. Panabaker has been very successful with the color and movement of broken water in "Off Gaspé," and there is a good study of a group of geese among the larger pictures.

The smaller sketches are at least as good as these larger ones and there are among them some delightful studies of light and atmosphere, at different times and seasons. The peaceful little study of "Twilight" is one of the best of these and there are others very good of "Morning, Georgian Bay," "Breaking Sky, N.S.," "Evening, Peggy's Cove, N.S." and "Rice Lake." Several of the best of these small pictures have been painted at Bale Fine, Georgian Bay, others worth notice are a very true study of rural Ontario called "Northumberland Hills," and the ship and reflected light of "Sunrise, N.S." The scarlet of the robes in the large portrait of the Bishop of Toronto makes a good foil to the cooler colors of the surrounding landscapes.

Russian Painter's Work Is Shown

Alexander Bercovitch, a Russian painter, of whose work a small collection is now being shown at Sidney Carter's on Drummond street, is little known here, though a few of his pictures have been seen in Montreal exhibitions. A few of the pictures in the present exhibition are interesting studies of ugly streets in Montreal, but far more interesting are the pictures painted in Russian Turkestan, where Mr. Bercovitch spent some time. These are very authentic and striking sketches of the country, the buildings, the people and the camels and, above all, of the color and light of Central Asia, and they give a clear idea of Mr. Bercovitch's abilities as a painter in congenial surroundings. Some of the best of these Asiatic studies are portraits of natives, evidently true studies of the heads of fine, picturesque ruffians. There are also some Montreal portraits, which are not quite so good, but some of them have vigour and character with a certain ugliness. Mr. Bercovitch did some work on scenery and decorations for the theatre, which seems to offer at present the best opportunities for art in Russia, and some decorative designs, in which he makes use of animals treated in an oriental manner, are as interesting in their way and as well worth seeing as his pictures.

Notes of Art In Montreal

Star-26/4/33

A meeting of the Independent Art Association is to be held tomorrow, Thursday, evening at 8.30, in the Abner Kingman Memorial Hall of the Sir George Williams College (Central Y. M. C. A., Drummond street). A lecture will be given by H. Y. Gillou on "Contemporary Etchers of the 19th and 20th centuries." The lecture will cover not only European countries but North American and eastern countries as well, and will be illustrated by a large number of original etchings many of them in color, and lantern slides.

The annual exhibition of the work of students of the Department of Architecture in McGill University opened in the Learmont gallery of the Art Association of Montreal yesterday, and is to remain open till the evening of Sunday, May 7.

Some very good work is being shown and all branches of the work done in the department is represented. There are drawings from the antique and from life, and architectural designs and plans made by the students of the different years, including the diploma drawing of a group of buildings for a school of medicine, made by the students of the final year. There are also drawings of detail work and of stained glass and ironwork. Specially interesting are some measured drawings of old houses and churches in this province, additions to a considerable collection which has been made by this department in past years.

A large and important picture by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., has just come to Montreal and is being shown in the Watson Gallery at Sherbrooke street. It is one of his pictures of the French coast—a view on the shore at St. Malo. A large expanse of sand, with a number of figures fills the foreground; behind it the houses of Parame recede into the distance, under a splendid cloudy sky. It is a very fine composition which is quieter in tone than many of Morrice's later works, but full of color. This picture is one of those illustrated in Newton McTavish's book on Canadian painters.

Cornelius Krieghoff's picture, "Bringing in the Deer," one of his many admirable illustrations of early Canadian life, has been lent by its owner, Mr. Harry A. Norton, to the Art Association of Montreal for exhibition, and has been hung in the lecture room on the ground floor, with other works of Canadian painters. This picture was reproduced in The Star in March of last year.

A meeting of the Art Association of Verdun was held in the Y.M.C.A., 1000 Gordon avenue, on Tuesday evening. Papers on art subjects were read by some of the members and others submitted sketches for criticism. The date of the next meeting was set for May 2. An invitation is extended to any one who wished to join the association. Further particulars may be obtained from Charles Tulley, York 6185W.

Red Art Groups Picket Radio City

Herald May 18/33

New York, May 18.—(AP)—With a wave of placards denouncing stoppage of work on Diego Rivera's mural, left-wing political and art groups united last night in picketing Rockefeller Centre.

For two hours, 400 men and women paraded past the entrance to the centre's dominant 70-storey structure inside whose main entrance a canvas screen covers the proletarian panorama, work on which was ordered stopped by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., after Rivera refused to delete a head of Lenin.

Art Affairs In Europe.

A picture by the Ottawa painter Henri Fabien, has been accepted for exhibition in the salon of the Artist Francais in Paris; it is a picture of an Arab dancer. Mr. Fabien, whose portraits are well known in Canada, has exhibited in this Salon twice before.

Pictures, which might be of interest to Canadians, were sold at Sotheby's auction rooms in London at the end of March. There were about eighty water-color drawings, places of interest in Canada, America by L. J. Cranstone, painted between 1850 and 1860. Cranstone was a sculptor and painter who exhibited, chiefly works of sculpture in London between 1845 and 1860. Little is known of him or his work or of any visit which he made to this country.

Gazette 27/4/33 Painting Held 'Sacrilegious'

Boston, April 26.—Henri Burkhard, New York modernistic painter, came to Boston today to find out why his canvas depicting the Virgin Mary washing the wounds of Christ was removed from an exhibition at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

Burkhard engaged counsel to wait upon the trustees of the museum. The painting was one of a group hung in a special exhibition by the Society of Contemporary Art, and Burkhard's painting was removed after protests had been received alleging it was sacrilegious.

Mural Artist Fired

Diego Rivera

May 4 - 1933 Painting Society Protests.

To the Editor of The Gazette: Sir,—Your issue of April 21st includes correspondence from a Mr. R. R. Thompson, whose letter reports one written by a Scottish artist, published in the Edinburgh "Scotsman."

Some months ago, the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Color, at the request of the National Gallery, organized an exhibition of water color paintings to be sent abroad. The Water Color Society is a body of about 35 members, of various schools and opinions, among them such distinguished Canadian artists as Mr. George A. Reid, Mr. Fred Brigden and Mr. Frank Carmichael, with a host of others whose membership in the society has nothing to do with their predilections for particular styles or creeds. The major portion of the exhibition consisted of the work of these men. The remainder of the pictures were selected from a number of works submitted by invitation extended to as many other Canadian water color painters as could be found, also without regard to their artistic creeds. The Selection Committee was appointed by the Society, and its actions have in no instance been challenged either members or non-members.

Mr. Thompson, however, who all probability neither saw the exhibition, nor knew of the method of selection or of the Society which sponsored it, has taken the astonishing and unwarranted liberty of writing to the Edinburgh "Scotsman" and the "Morning Post" of London, England, denouncing the Exhibition as being "modernistic, Group of Seven, and Cubistic," and entirely unrepresentative of Canadian art. To this gratuitously offensive distortion of fact, a Scotsman, Mr. Napier, replies in sympathetic terms, Canadians and Canadian artists as a body must resent Mr. Thompson's unfounded and ill-advised disparagements to the British press. The receipt accorded the exhibition in Edinburgh has been very cordial, the sales gratifyingly large. The Mr. Thompson, who, it must be said, is entirely unknown to this Society, should have made this occasion for the public venting of his critical spleen, and the airing of an unfortunate and purely aesthetic disagreement at the scene of the exhibition abroad, is certainly to be regretted, and particularly so, when, so far as this Society is concerned at least, his assumptions are so patently erroneous.

Whatever Mr. Thompson's opinions and grievances in regard to other controversies may be, he would do this Society no less than justice by recalling his provocative statements, and refraining from embroiling in his future discussions a Society which is non-partisan and wholly devoted to the encouragement of the art of water color painting in Canada.

Montreal Art Association

The Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal will be open to the public next Monday, April 17, from 9:30 to 5 o'clock. This will be the last day of this exhibition.

An exhibition of portrait drawings, mostly of people well known in Montreal, by Oscar de Lall will be opened in the print room of the Art Association next Saturday, April 15th and will remain open till Sunday, April 30th.

The lecture on "Portraits and Portrait Painters," which was given to the members of the Art Association last Friday evening by Major C. S. Fosbery of Ottawa, touched on many matters directly or indirectly concerned with its subject. Major Fosbery, dealing with the matter historically, confined himself chiefly to works of the last 300 years and showed a long series of lantern slides of portraits, single and multiple, and figure pictures of the Italian, Flemish, Dutch and Spanish schools. Some of the most interesting parts of the lecture had to do with questions of composition and with the devices with which Rembrandt, Titian, Velasquez and other painters had secured desired balance or emphasis.

Portraits intelligents

Le cinquantième Salon annuel du Printemps organisé par l'Art Association reste ouvert jusqu'à Pâques à la Galerie des Arts, 1379, rue Sherbrooke-ouest. Nous en avons noté les principales caractéristiques dans l'analyse que nous lui avons consacrée au lendemain de l'inauguration. Nous avons signalé aussi la part des Canadiens-français. Qu'il nous suffise de rappeler qu'onques Salon du Printemps n'a réuni une pareille abondance de sujets et de si divers. Cette variété même nuit à une appréciation générale et laisse moins apercevoir les tendances nouvelles qui peuvent s'être glissées dans l'ensemble. S'il n'y a rien qui tienne du chef-d'œuvre, rien non plus qui marque d'une manière frappante des orientations neuves, on ne peut s'empêcher de remarquer, néanmoins, la forte proportion d'artistes féminins qui figurent à l'exposition, la correction un peu bourgeoise de l'ensemble et, surtout, la personnalité de certains peintres comme, par exemple, Sherrif-Scott, Hewton, Elwes, Mangold, Jongers, et quelques oeuvres sculptées de bonne venue.

Nous avons déjà consacré quelques mots à certains d'entre eux. Il convient de mentionner cette semaine de façon particulière deux portraits qui attirent l'attention pour ce qu'ils expriment d'art intelligent et sobre.

Le portrait de Mme T.-H.-P. Molson par SIMON ELWES est d'un charme radieux et distingué. La délicatesse intelligente de la physionomie est accentuée par une pose en minceur et des tons argentés d'un éclat adouci. Elwes a expédié ce portrait d'Angleterre, où il est actuellement, et son tableau est de ceux qui laissent la plus agréable impression aux visiteurs.

ALPHONSE JONGERS expose trois portraits, dont l'un, celui de Mlle Mimi Labrecque, ne manque pas d'esprit, pour vif qu'en soit le coloris, mais le portrait du Dr E.-W. Archibald est d'un naturel plus fin et mieux touché. L'auteur y a fait un usage résolu à la fois et habile d'un bleu fort.

Aux galeries Watson

Les galeries Watson ont remis à l'honneur pour quelque temps certaines oeuvres européennes et un choix des toiles de leur collection permanente. On trouve affiché, un J.-W. MORRICE dans la manière la plus caractéristique, une scène blanche d'une côte du vieux Québec; un SUZOR COTE non moins classique représentant la cabane à sucre dans le charme d'une forêt en dentelle; mais aussi des toiles de maîtres anglais, où la correction minutieuse du détail le dispute à la judicieux distribution des couleurs et des tons. Par exemple, "Le plan de campagne", de A.-D. McCORMICK, et une marine vivante où circule un bon vent, oeuvre de MONTAGU DAWSON.

Gravures françaises à Québec

Il ne sera pas sans intérêt de mentionner que la collection de gravures originales, pointes sèches et eaux-fortes exposées ces jours-ci à Québec, au PALAIS MONTCALM, sous les auspices de la Société des Arts, Sciences et Lettres, est à peu près celle-là même qui a été en montre à quelques reprises aux bureaux de M. H.-Y. Guillou, en l'édifice Old Birk's. Les Luigiini Charlet, Hugard, Lafitte, Jourdain, Haumont, P.-E. Lecomte, Van Santen, Julien Célos, Bastogy, Eug. Veder suscitent beaucoup d'intérêt dans la vieille capitale, comme ici. Et Louis Icart a des admirateurs partout. L'exposition, organisée par M. Charlotin, agent de la Gravure Française, à Québec, réunit une collection à peu près complète, où tous les genres de sujets sont représentés, marines, paysages, architecture.

Icart félicite la "Presse"

Tout n'est pas parfait, la critique non plus. Au demeurant, faut-il rappeler ici que REYNALD n'a d'autre mission que de servir de trait d'union entre le public et les studios et salles d'exposition. Il signale, analyse sans prétentions techniques, donne une opinion moyenne et sans parti-pris, heureux de s'occuper des nôtres dans la mesure du possible, mais peu soucieux de cueillir des félicitations et de jeter des fleurs à un sou. Il est agréable, cependant, d'apprendre comment Louis Icart, le plus populaire des maîtres de la gravure aujourd'hui, a su apprécier la reproduction que la "Presse" a donnée d'une de ses oeuvres et nos quelques commentaires. Il écrivait assez récemment de Paris, à M. H.-Y. Guillou, de la Gravure Française :

"Cher Monsieur : Je vous remercie chaleureusement de votre lettre et des coupures des journaux canadiens que vous avez eu l'amabilité de me faire parvenir. La reproduction de la "Marchande de Fleurs" dans la "Presse" est très bien, en considérant surtout que ce journal est un journal à grand tirage et non un magazine de luxe, où le papier se prête mieux aux subtilités des tons de la pointe sèche. Leur effort est méritoire et vous pourrez leur adresser avec mes remerciements toutes mes félicitations.

"Je suis très flatté de l'opinion des critiques d'art à l'égard de mon oeuvre. J'aime tant le Canada qu'il m'est vraiment très profondément agréable de m'y trouver des sympathies. Voulez-vous être mon intermédiaire auprès des journalistes que vous connaissez et qui ont parlé de moi, pour leur dire toute ma gratitude et toute mon émotion ?

"Mon grand désir est de venir bientôt au Canada. Si les affaires me le permettent, ce sera certainement mon premier voyage. En attendant, je ne puis que me contenter de vous envoyer mes oeuvres. Puissent-elles inspirer aux amateurs canadiens toute la joie que j'ai mise à les créer, un peu pour eux..."

Louis Icart projette pour le mois de juillet une exposition complète de ses oeuvres, peintures aussi bien que gravures, à Montréal, sous les auspices de la Gravure Française.

La collection Van Horne

L'incendie de la demeure des Van Horne, rue Sherbrooke Ouest, lundi, a jeté un moment d'émotion dans le monde artistique. Qu'était-il advenu de la fameuse collection privée évaluée à $2,000,000 au moins, l'une des plus précieuses au pays? Dans le désarroi impossible de le savoir. Un confrère ému a décidé pour son compte que 40% des tableaux avaient été détruits ou endommagés sérieusement et que les pertes atteignaient sans difficulté le million. Un autre, moins troublé, a conclu à $500,000 de pertes et à 25%. On a parlé d'incendie mystérieux. Dieu merci, la "Presse" a préféré être plus sobre. Dès le lendemain on apprenait qu'un seul petit tableau ("Cliffs at Dover" de Turner) a subi des dommages irréparables et que malgré l'eau et la fumée la superbe collection Van Horne était sauvée. Les évaluateurs estimaient l'autre jour que les pertes totales — maison, meubles, objets, etc., n'atteindraient pas $90,000.

La maison de feu sir William Van Horne, qui fut président du C. P. R., donnait au visiteur une étrange impression de musée. Partout tapis moelleux, bibelots précieux, toiles. On peut s'étonner que la superbe collection de tableaux, où figurait à l'honneur l'école hollandaise, n'ait pas été réunie dans une sorte de pavillon spécial à l'épreuve du feu, comme c'est le cas d'au moins une autre collection précieuse en ville. La collection portait des assurances pour une valeur totale de $1,275,000 et les potiches japonaises, la rare collection de gardes de sabres japonais de cérémonie, les maquettes de galions et vaisseaux anglais portaient un montant d'assurances de $50,000. Certaines maquettes et potiches ont été détruites.

Les toiles les plus remarquables sont des Franz Hall, Rubens, Léonard de Vinci, Holbein, El Greco, plusieurs Rembrandt et surtout un magnifique portrait de Philippe IV signé Velasquez. Feu sir Wm. Van Horne a peint lui-même quelques paysages et marines. Bibliothèque et ameublement étaient dignes de remarque aussi. Les tableaux ont été transportés à la Galerie des Arts et les meubles et tapis chez Morgan. Et l'Art l'a échappé belle.

Il y a exposition d'art domestique depuis dimanche dernier en la salle du Groupe Pie X de l'A.C.J.C., paroisse de l'Immaculée-Conception. Les exposants sont très nombreux et plusieurs d'entre eux présentent des oeuvres d'un réel intérêt. M. Alfred Faniel, peintre d'origine belge et artiste de bon renom, a organisé l'exposition, de concert avec les membres du cercle. On cite en particulier une bonne toile et des pastels de Faniel, des reliures d'art de Mlle Gervais, deux aquarelles du R.P. Tétrault, s.j., des marquerettes et des fers forgés. Parmi les autres exposants: MM. J. Duquette, G.-A. Beaudry, N. Larivière, R. Desormeaux, J.-B. Comeau, J. Grondin, A. Beaudry, L.-V. Cuvillier, A. Cuvillier, P.-F. Sirois, C. Piché, J.-A. Pommier, E. Roy, le R.F. Laurentius, Mmes E. Gervais, F. Chanson, Y. Paquin, C. Gervais, C. Piché, B. Béliveau, St-Mars, R. Charron, A. Vincent, E. Juneau, F. Fortin, L. Brousseau, C. Noury, E. Bouthillier, G. Alary, J. Giguère, J. Lefebvre, Charbonneau, M. Paradis, I. Perreault, R. Beauchamp, C. Bazinet.

Pour mémoire

L'exposition d'art oriental qui se tient depuis déjà une couple de mois à la bibliothèque du McGill, 3459 rue McTavish, se terminera le 15 avril. Pour n'être pas aussi caractéristique que l'exposition Kiang, qui eut lieu chez Ogilvy's, elle réunit pourtant des objets et tapisseries qui, en plus d'expliquer l'âme si tortueuse de la Chine, témoignent d'une ingéniosité subtile.

Demain soir le major Ernest Fosbery, R.C.A., d'Ottawa, donnera aux membres de l'Art Association, une conférence sur le portrait et les portraits.

Les visiteurs continuent de passer nombreux aux galeries Eaton pour se promener à travers la collection de photographies de l'époque 1900 réunies par Mlle Thérèse Bonney. C'est une véritable excursion de repos dans le charme désuet de l'atmosphère d'avant-guerre.

RARE EXAMPLES OF MSS. ART SHOWN

Gazette 9/5/33

Dr. G. R. Lomer Lectures On and Exhibits Beautiful Illuminated Manuscripts

Beautifully illuminated manuscripts in McGill University library, many of them rare examples of that art, were described and shown to members of the Special Libraries Association, Montreal branch, by Dr. Gerhard R. Lomer, McGill librarian, who spoke in the library last night on "Manuscript Treasures of the University."

With the help of lantern slides Dr. Lomer gave a general view of the condition of manuscript production in the Middle Ages, with some of the mediaeval scriptorium and a brief sketch of the development of the illuminated manuscript. After the lecture the members of the Special Libraries Association and the library museum and examined the illuminated manuscripts there.

Miss Jane Henderson, president of the Special Libraries Association and librarian of the Sun Life Assurance Company, occupied the chair.

BYRON PORTRAIT FOUND

Picture Restorer Declares It to Be Authentic

Chicago, April 10.—When Miss Gerda Ahlm wiped away the film deposited on a canvas by Father Time she brought to light a portrait of Lord Byron by George Henry Harlow, missing for more than a century, she said today.

The picture was brought to Miss Ahlm, who is engaged in the business of restoring time-dimmed paintings, by a client who bought it in an old furniture shop.

"There can be no doubt about the authenticity," she said. "My client picked it up in an obscure shop dealing in old furniture. The price, I understand, was only a few dollars, but the canvas is probably worth $2,500."

CORD MUSEUM IS LARGELY ENRICHED

Gazette April 6/33

Many Articles of Great Historic Value Donated During Winter Months

Hundreds of articles of great value and even more historic interest have been donated to the McCord National Museum at McGill University during the winter months, it was reported at a meeting of the museum's committee held yesterday. Many citizens have sent gifts of historic material of all kinds, and others have loaned possessions for exhibition in the halls of the museum.

The growing importance of the McCord Museum in the eyes of Montrealers and visitors was indicated in the attendance figures for the period since the last meeting of the committee in October. During this time 10,289 persons visited the museum, as compared with 5452 last year, according to Mrs. F. C. Warren, the curator. Increased interest was shown particularly through the classes of school children who came to study the Canadian history exhibits arranged during the winter months.

Among the important donations was a collection of 15 gold coins from James Snasdell, including one dating back to the rule of James I in England, 1603, a Spanish doubloon of 1797, and several 15th century British and French coins. There was also a collection of early Canadian stamps, given in memory of Alfred Newman, by members of his family. Some of these dated back to 1851 and there were quite a number of other interesting pre-Confederation specimens.

Material relating to the work of the late J. Colin Forbes, R.C.A., and more particularly his commission to paint the portrait of King Edward VII. and Queen Alexandra, for the Canadian Parliament, was donated by Major D. Stuart Forbes, and other articles of historical value connected with the Great War. Of note also were a map of the Isle of Orleans in 1689, given by Judge Pouliot; and a buffalo robe, used by the Indians out west, and curiously painted in designs on the inside, donated by Mrs. Louis Sutherland.

ARTICLES ON LOAN.

Among the articles on loan, now in the possession of the museum, are three old pictures of Montreal during last century, one taken from St. Helen's Island, one from Cote des Neiges, and the other a drawing of the Chateau de Ramezay. There is also a Hyder black slate totem pole, the property of S. McGivern.

Those who gave donations during the winter were: E. Z. Massicotte, A. H. Coates, I. C. Morgan, Dr. Francis McLennan, M. L. Masta, H. C. Bellew, Miss A. McD. Reid, Dr. W. D. Lighthall, Mrs. J. E. Gravel, the Norwegian Consulate, F. Cleveland Morgan, Lady Holt, Major Stuart Forbes, the Montreal Star, Mrs. Louis Sutherland, C. E. Bourne, Dr. J. Clarence Webster, E. Lionel Judah, Master R. Sheets, H. Baron, F. Mitchell, E. T. Adney, L. A. Renaud, the Bank of Nova Scotia through H. D. Burns, Judge J. C. Pouliot, Mr. MacKimmie, Dr. Maude Abbott, Mrs. E. N. Renouf, Mr. Justice E. Fabre Survever, Mrs. John Pullen, Miss M. Hannaford, Miss Blackader, James S. Snasdell, Miss Annie Hansford, Miss Jeannette Goldwater, Archibald M. Campbell, Miss A. Art Events In Europe

The Studio magazine, published in London and founded in 1893, celebrates the end of its forty years of existence with a review of the changes which have come over art in its lifetime. It is, of course, no more than a brief summary of a large amount of available material, since it must be pretty certain that so many and so striking changes in ideas and methods of art can not have taken place in any other period of forty years in the world's history. In a series of articles the Studio traces the evolution from the Victorian tastes and styles, which still flourished in 1893, through the new art, which is represented by Aubrey Beardsley and some others of his time, and primitivism, of which Gauguin's work is given as a leading example, to the abstract art practised by some living painters in Paris, London and elsewhere. The development of new ideas in architecture is also mentioned, and a separate section is given to the evolution of painting and architecture in America. There is also some mention of stage art, in which very remarkable developments have taken place.

The two greatest sources of works of art, Greece and Italy, are practising directly opposed policies with regard to the exportation of such works. The Greek Government, as it is reported, is thinking of taking advantage of the value of works of art as an international currency, and selling some of its antiquities in order to replenish the treasury. It is not very long since this Government was still suggesting that the British Government should return the Elgin marbles from the British Museum to Greece.

In Italy, on the other hand, the law against the export of works of Italian art is being more strictly enforced than ever. In one case recently, a collection which had been brought together at Naples for export to America was discovered by government inspectors. The holder of the collection had put a low valuation on it for the purpose of securing a permit to export. His permit was withdrawn and he was obliged to sell the collection to the state at the valuation which he had given to it.

The injuries which the pictures and other works of art of the Van Horne collection suffered from the fire, which took place early on Monday morning, appear to be, fortunately and perhaps surprisingly, not very serious. None of the more important pictures was injured in any permanent way; some damage was done to two pictures,—one a small oil picture by Turner of the English coast, the other by Pissarro, but neither of them seems to be beyond the possibility of skillful repair. A pastel by Renoir was wetted but it appears that the picture is not injured. Some pictures which were in rooms on the upper floors were destroyed but they were of minor interest; one, which has been mentioned, was by Eugenio Lucas, a Spanish painter of no great importance, who lived about 1800. The collection is still, as before, not only the finest private collection in Canada, but one of the best in the British Empire outside of Great Britain.

A New York institution, the College Art Association, has been taking practical steps to help artists who are suffering from the effects of financial depression. It has succeeded in creating work for some 80 artists, partly by securing for them work in painting mural decorations in churches and other suitable buildings, partly by getting new teaching positions made for them. Thirty-five of these artists, it is reported, are to work on decorative paintings and 45 will be employed in teaching and other work.

Eviction Of Artist Brings Recognition

Aleksander Berkovitch "Discovered" as Painter of Merit When He Appeals to Federation of Jewish Philanthropies For Aid — Art Dealer Opens Exhibition For Unrecognized Russian Artist Following Study of Paintings.

HERALD - FRIDAY - 7th APRIL - 33
Adventurous Career

A 10-year battle with starvation was, up to this week, the reward of Aleksander Berkovitch, painter, for fidelity to his art. His luck came when his landlord called to evict him.

Not given to publicizing his canvasses Berkovitch toiled in obscurity in his little home on Laurier street, unknown to the art public here, his craftsmanship recognized by a few discriminating fellow artists in a similar predicament to himself.

But when the landlord came to evict him, Berkovitch was no longer able, in solitary defence of his little family, to hold out. He appealed to the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, and in the process was "discovered."

Today a local art dealer opened the first exhibition of his work Montreal has had an opportunity to see.

Not Worth Selling Out Says Landlord

"If I thought all this stuff were worth 50 cents I'd seize it on you," the landlord said when he called to evict him. With a gesture he indicated the paintings that stood all about the room, stacked close to the wall. "As it is I'd rather lose the $30 you owe me than have any further expenses, so if you'll clear out immediately we'll be quits."

The Jewish Philanthropies sent Miss Shoolman, one of their social workers to investigate. She fortunately, had a tutored and discriminating eye. She looked at the "stuff" the landlord disdained, her enthusiasm growing every minutes. Here was an artist! Here was one who could paint with real vigor, who was free of hindering conventions, whose work was not done to the formula of what would sell, who understood drawing, composition, who had originality.

After an hour in the bare little studio, she hurried away to tell her friend, the art dealer, of her discovery. He listened eagerly. Such stories are common enough in bookshops and people talk about finding great artists in garrets struggling superbly without acknowledgment from the world. . . . He went out to see the collection at once.

The painter, a stalwart man of 39, who strikingly resembles the pictures of Oscar Wilde, received him with modesty and diffidence. Would this man understand his work, or would he be like others to whom he had risked showing his pictures? When his visitor took off his coat and betrayed an animated interest, talked about an exhibition in his galleries, Berkovitch forgot his troubles and became gay.

"This is good," he said, pulling a picture in a raw wood frame from behind others and standing it where his critical guest could see it best. "No, don't bother with that . . . it is a little too realistic . . ."

Born in Cherson Southern Russia

Aleksander Berkovitch was born in Cherson, a town in the south of Russia, which is famous as an art centre. His family were poor, at from the time he was seven or eight years old, he cared for nothing but painting and sketching. While still very young he secured some recognition from the painters to whom he brought his work, and when he was fifteen years old, and earning 200 roubles by making theatrical sets and designing costumes, he went to Palestine to study at the Bezalel School under Professor Schulz, whose aim it was to organize a Jewish school of painting founded on Oriental culture.

That was the beginning of his life as an artist. Manifestly talented, he was given every opportunity. Scholarships were voted to him. When the world war broke out in 1914 he was studying in Munich at the Academy, but he was obliged to return to Russia.

After the Revolution, Berkovitch became interested in stage production and the design of sets at the National Theatres for the operas of Glinka, Moussorgsky and Tchalkowsky. In 1922 he went to Leningrad where he continued to paint at the National Academy for the next two years.

Then the Industrial Exhibition of the U.S.S.R. was held in Moscow, and he found an opportunity to unfold his talent anew in helping to design the Turkestan Pavilion and painting murals. This work aroused his interest in Turkestan so much that he decided to visit the province.

Meanwhile, he had married and one child was born to his care. With his family he went into the south to live on the Persian frontier in a land where everything seemed wonderfully paintable to him. He studied Russian Oriental art, as revealed by numerous archeological discoveries of buried Asiatic cities, taught in the schools, painted better than ever, and attempted to found a school of painters who would free themselves from the

Leaves With Family For Persian Frontier

All went well in Turkestan, until about five years ago. A second child was born into the Berkovitch family, the painter was happy in the consciousness of his unfolding talent, then there came famine. Throughout the land starvation laid hold of everyone.

"It is all right for a man, a strong man," the painter explained. "But for children . . ." He shook his head. "They die."

Mrs. Berkovitch had relatives in Montreal. They contrived to move to this city from the famine-ridden mountains of Aschabad.

Here Mr. Berkovitch found his ignorance of the native languages a great handicap. With him he brought a collection of paintings made in Turkestan—his only capital. He had no idea how to find a buyer for them. Nevertheless he found work, any kind of work. "I am not a very good business man," he smilingly explained. He found an opportunity to do some theatrical design here, but not nearly enough to keep him and his family. The rest of the time he did what there was to be done, disdaining no employment, however menial and humble, which would guarantee a few more meals, another month's shelter for his wife and the two little girls.

"It is so easy for the artist to become a mere maker of pictures," he explained, "and that way he makes money too." Nearly all young artists spoil themselves this way. Bah, that is nothing, to make pictures! One must ask himself, 'What for is an artist?' One must know what he wants to get 'with his brushes—not just designs. His work must express a culture."

Says Arts Appreciated In Russia

Mr. Berkovitch complained that the popular impression here was that Russia was a land of blood and thunder where the arts could not possibly flourish, whereas the exact opposite was the truth—the exact opposite as far as the popularity of art was concerned, anyway. Russians were the first to embrace the important modern movements in painting, he declared. Cezanne, Picasso, and the rest of the post-impressionists, were first appreciated in Russia. They profoundly impressed and influenced him when he was a young man, almost before theirs were great names on the continent of Europe proper, before they were popularly accepted even in Paris.

"Have you sold any of your paintings here?" Mr. Berkovitch was asked.

"I have not known how to put them before the people who would understand them," he replied. "Only one portrait I sold. I made one portrait of a Parisian lady who paid me for it and took it back to France with her. The rest of my things are here."

He confessed, too, that since he has been in Montreal it has been difficult for him to work. The discouraging battle for a living, which has never tempted him to compromise with his ideals as a painter, has oppressed him sadly and kept him from doing his best painting.

"But now I have an exhibition," he reflected, his eyes bright with pleasure at the thought, "I feel better. This week I move into a new place. The light is good there. I am bursting with ideas that I want to work out on canvass. Ah! I shall do good work!"

In spite of the tribulations that have beset his life here, Berkovitch likes Canada and wanted to stay. "Have you taken out your citizenship papers?" he was asked. In reply he looked confused and embarrassed. "Twice I have had the five dollars it costs to apply for papers," he explained, "and I have started out to get them; but both times, on the way, I thought of my family, of the bread the money would buy, and I returned without spending it. But now someone will buy a painting at the exhibition, and the first one I sell will let me get my papers."

Glyn Philpot, R.A., Requested to Withdraw Picture

London, April 20.—Under lively discussion in art circles today is the request of the council of the Royal Academy to Glyn Philpot, R.A., to withdraw his "The Great Pan" from the summer exhibition opening May 1. The picture represents Pan with an angel springing from his breast. Water for refreshment of the Muses gushes from one hand and other symbolic figures are grouped around.

It is understood the council took the view the picture might be gravely misunderstood by some beholders. Every Royal Academician is entitled to send in six pictures, usually accepted without question.

Philpot will be represented by other works, including a portrait of the present Lord Melchett.

Until recently Philpot was the youngest academician. His exhibits last year were of a symbolic character and showed distinct departure from his earlier works.

WORKS BY MORRICE NOW ON EXHIBITION

Gazette 24/4/33

Important Paintings of French and Canadian Subjects at Watson's

Paintings by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., the Montreal painter whose art won early recognition abroad, do not often come into the market, but two exceptionally fine examples are at present on view in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. Morrice, a sensitive colorist with uncanny skill in handling subtle values, found congenial material in Canada as well as in Europe, and the paintings on exhibition show his marked ability in seizing the atmosphere of the places painted. With Paris as his studio address, he rambled about France, found that country rich in inspiration for his brush, and a procession of unforgettably lovely arrangements in tone came to this country at various times for exhibition—tree-lined quays, figures and buildings, bridges and Notre Dame under snow, glimpses of parks with figures, and groups dotting sun-lit sands.

The larger canvas being shown is "Beach at St. Malo," which was an unusually fruitful sketching ground. This example is typically Morrice in his happiest manner. There is the impression that from first stroke to signature the work went "right." Backed by buildings, the beach sweeps into the distance with a noble curve, while a sandy spit, with bathing tents, a maid and two children, cuts the composition in the foreground. Figures promenade on the beach viewing a sea of lovely blue which is deepened in richness by the distance, while overhead massive clouds move in a summer sky. The mellow sunlight glows but does not glare, and a wide range of silvery greys is present in the buildings and the clouds. This painting was reproduced in "The Fine Arts in Canada" by Dr. Newton MacTavish.

The other canvas is distinctly of this province—"First Snow, Mountain Hill, Quebec," a bit of that steep thoroughfare after an early but substantial flurry, for the trees on the right of the roadway are still in autumn leaf. Figures walk past the old buildings, while descending the hill is a sleigh.

Another important example from this brush shown recently was "The Bull Fight"—with figures ranged beneath trees in the foreground, the circling sweep of the arena which partly shadows the sun-lit ring where the temporarily inactive bull seems deliberating on which of his tormentors he should charge. This work quickly passed into the private collection of a discerning Montreal picture-lover.

Paintings Cut From Frames
With Razor-like Knife—Early Morning Discovery

REAL TREASURES INTACT

Van Horne Collection and Other Priceless Paintings in Building Elude Robber Hands

Sixteen oil paintings were missing from their frames when the staff of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, yesterday morning faced the task of removing from the walls the various works forming the Fiftieth Spring Exhibition, which closed to the public on Monday. All the works stolen had been cut, more or less neatly, from their frames by a person or persons unknown during the quiet of the night. Last night officials of the Art Association and the Detective Bureau had not yet arrived at a solution of the mystery.

The monetary loss, based on published catalogue prices, is not great, though the amount involved in the loss of the portraits — a matter of agreement between the sitter and the painter — has not been revealed.
No item of the permanent collection of the association was touched, and the pictures of the Van Horne collection, removed to the building after the fire that damaged the family residence, were intact.

Investigation yesterday pointed to the likelihood that the robber had secreted himself on the premises when the galleries closed late Monday afternoon and when everything was quiet he went to work in the central and east galleries. The pictures stolen were those without glass, and the cleanness with which the canvases were cut from the frames showed that a razor-sharp knife was used. The cutting was done with vigor, for in a few instances where the knife wavered the inner margins of some of the frames were cut through. Evidence there was, too, that the thief had one or more accomplices on the outside for, in the lower corner of the window of the women's rest room on the ground floor a hole had been cut with a diamond from the outside, the glass being found on the floor. Through this hole, which was barely large enough to admit a boy, the rolled-up canvases are believed to have been passed out.

SPOT CHOSEN IDEAL

The spot chosen for this act was ideal. The window is hidden by a small wing of the building that screened the thieves from the view of pedestrians on Sherbrooke street, and they could work unobserved, since facing them to the west is the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul.
That the knife-wielder escaped that way is not clear as, possibly fearing a burglary alarm system, he was careful not to tamper with the window latch, which was found secure. The superintendent of the building has living quarters in the basement and fronting on Sherbrooke street and an intruder wearing rubbers could not be heard there.

How the thief escaped from the building has not been determined.
Whether he followed the canvases to freedom or hid until a likely moment presented itself during the excitement of the discovery and made his exit by the front door is still unexplained.

In its long history the Art Association of Montreal has been singularly fortunate in avoiding loss. Many years ago, when the galleries were on Phillips Square, two miniatures on ivory were abstracted during an exhibition and recovered the next day—largely by guile. A newspaper item stating that the "collector" was known and swift action impended brought a breathless youngster to the gallery early the following day with the paintings. He pushed the parcel through the oval opening of the pay desk and ran out before he could be questioned.

What object the thief had in taking the paintings he did when works by world famous masters were in the building, (if gain was the object), perplexes both the gallery authorities and the police. From the point of view of easy disposal the thief was far amiss, for portraits of well known Montrealeers would be awkward things to get rid of.

According to the present understanding the Art Association of Montreal stands to lose nothing by the theft, as the entry forms signed by exhibitors clearly reads: "All entries will be received subject to artist's own risk and no insurance will be effected by the Art Association on works submitted."

THE SIXTEEN PICTURES.

The list of pictures stolen and their catalogue price follows:—
"Petite Riviere aux Renards," by G. S. Bagley, $200; "The Moorland Bridge," by Elizabeth Styring Nutt, Halifax, $450; "The Golden Fleece," by Max Schulz, Outremont, $250;
"Three Old Houses, Louisa street, Toronto," by Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A., Toronto, $300, and "The Green Boat," by the same painter, $250; "The Swimming Hole," by Henry J. Simpkins, Verdun, $275;
"At the Bird Bath," by Alberta Cleland, Montreal, $350; "A Late Fall Landscape," by Marc A. Fortin, Montreal, $75; "Arrangement in Black and Grey," by A. Sherriff
Scott, Montreal, $400.

The portraits, the value of which is a matter of private contract between sitter and painter, were the following: "Dr. A. L. Lockwood" and "John B. Laidlaw," by Kenneth K.
Forbes, A.R.C.A., Toronto; "Miss H.
Craig," by R. S. Hewton, A.R.C.A., Montreal; "Dr. E. W. Archibald" and
"Norman Dawes," by Alphonse Jongers, Montreal; "Dr. J. A. Mir-eault," by J. St. Charles, A.R.C.A., Montreal; and a portrait by Marjorie Smith, Montreal.

To get the stolen canvases from the side window to the street presented small difficulty. The dark hours were rainy and there was fog, so that figures in the ground might not be seen from Sherbrooke street. A few steps from the building to the rear a dilapidated low brick wall, bordering the gallery and the church properties, could easily be crossed and then, by way of the lane, Redpath street and travelled thoroughfares would be reached. The sixteen canvases, rolled to the size of a tubed de luxe calendar, could be successfully concealed by a person carrying an umbrella.

When the theft was discovered the Detective Bureau was notified and investigation was started. The superintendent of the building was questioned, but was unable to give the detectives any clues. He said he neither saw nor heard anyone in the building during the night, and was surprised yesterday morning when he found several pictures cut out of their frames on the second floor of the building. He at once notified the police of the St. Matthew street station and detectives.

Captain of Detectives J. A. Tourville, who is in charge of the case, stated last night that in his opinion some person or persons had remained hidden in the building when the doors were closed. The hole in the glass had apparently been made to signal someone from outside, but the police have no definite information to support their theory.
The captain stated that he did not know of any way in which the thieves can dispose of these portraits and paintings without being caught.

All art dealers in Montreal have been notified by the police to be on the lookout for persons attempting to sell any of these paintings. They were requested to communicate with detective headquarters at once.

Burglary Discovered at Seven O'Clock This Morning by Workmen.

Montreal detectives today face a puzzling mystery in the theft of sixteen paintings from the Art Gallery of Montreal, 1379 Sherbrooke street.

The paintings, most of them portraits, were hung in the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal. The fact that none of them were of great commercial value lends unusual mystery to the crime.

The canvasses stolen, included several portraits by Alphonse Jongers, Parisian artist now residing in Montreal; portraits by Ran-dolphe Hewton, well known Montreal artist; two portraits by Kenneth Forbes, of Toronto, and a landscape by Elizabeth Nutt, of Nova Scotia.

The art burglary was discovered shortly before seven o'clock this morning by workmen carrying out repairs at the gallery. The workmen found a window on the ground floor, west side, facing the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul, broken.

Investigation revealed sixteen empty frames from which the canvasses had been cut with a sharp instrument. Police from number ten station were at once called.
Later, Captain-Detective Tourville and men from Detective Headquarters took up the strange case.

It was learned that the night watchman, who resides in the building, heard no unusual sound during the night.

While the detectives reticent regarding the case, they believe that there is more to it than an ordinary burglary. Paintings are difficult loot to dispose of, without defection and those taken would scarcely bring a price which would justify the risk involved, they point out.

JESSIE DOW PRIZES

Paul Earle, A.R.C.A., and F.
D. Allison Recipients

Increased attendance over last year marked the Fiftieth Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal which closed on Monday. The total for the show was 12,339 as against 10,236 in 1932.

Awards of the Jessie Dow prizes for oil and watercolor were made to Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, for oil, and to Frank D.
Allison, of Saint John, N.B., for watercolor.

Mr. Earle's winning work was "Indian Summer"—a building in a field backed by evergreens and a massive blue hill. "Bab Djedid, Fez," was the title of Mr. Allison's crisp, luminous watercolor.

Disappearance of 16 Oil Paintings Still Mystery, Detectives Report

City detectives today admitted they were completely baffled by the disappearance of 16 oil paintings from the galleries of the Art Association, Sherbrooke street west, in the early hours of Monday or Tuesday morning.

"There is not a single clue available," detectives D'Aoust and Gib-aut, who are working on the case, reported this morning.

Officials of the Association today refused to state whether private detectives had been called in to aid the city sleuths.

The missing paintings formed part of the 50th Spring Exhibition of the Association, and were neatly cut from their frames and removed through a side window of the building.

THIEVES CARRY OFF

PORTRAIT EXHIBIT

Some time during the night a burglar or burglars entered the gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, on Sherbrooke street, and stole 16 pictures from the Spring Exhibition on show in the main gallery. The pictures taken were mainly portraits, and in every instance had been cut out of their frames.
No other damage was done, and nothing was taken from the permanent collection or from pictures stored at the galleries. The matter is now in the hands of the police,

NO CLAIM IS MADE FOR LOST PICTURES

It is understood that no claims or complaints have been received by the Art Gallery authorities in respect of the loss of pictures, nor are any expected, as both the terms of the exhibitors' contract and the long-standing custom in regard to art exhibits, call upon the exhibitor to take full responsibility for his paintings.

Investigation as to the source of the outrage is still actively in progress, it was learned at the Art Association's office today, but no new development has been reported.

Missing Pictures by Masters Valued at $35,000

NEW YORK, May 2.—(A.P.)—Art thieves stole 10 paintings valued at approximately $35,000 from the Brooklyn Museum sometime Saturday night or Sunday morning, police disclosed last night. One of the eight watchmen on duty in the building found a 60-foot length of rope in the gallery from which eight of the pictures were taken.

William H. Fox, director of the Museum, concurred with police in the belief that the thieves, probably two in number, secreted themselves in the building before the closing hour Saturday.

A description of the stolen paintings, which included works by Rubens, Van Dyck, and Van Der Weyden, was flashed to art centres throughout the world. All of the pictures had been removed expertly from their frames.

more than 50 years has permitted purchases of work of art for the

In the whole history of the Chan-

UN EXCELLENT CHOIX DE PORTRAITS

L'un des événements les plus sensationnels qui puissent jeter notre monde artistique en émoi s'est produit la nuit dernière lorsque des cam-brioleurs, — on croit pouvoir dire qu'ils étaient deux, — ont réussi à pénétrer au deuxième plancher de la Galerie des Arts, 1379, rue Sherbrookeouest, en coupant l'une des fenêtres qui donnent sur le côté ouest de l'édifice, et ont volé quelques-unes des meilleures toiles du 50e Salon du Printemps. Ils ont coupé les toiles à même les cadres et n'eût été la présence gênante de vitres sur d'autres tableaux, nous aurions sans doute à déplorer la disparition du portrait de Mrs Molson par Simon Elwes et de quelques autres oeuvres intéressantes.

On se demande ce que les cam-brioleurs peuvent faire avec de pa-reilles toiles, d'autant plus que, sûrs dans leur sélection, ils ont précisé-ment choisi parmi les 16 tableaux qu'ils ont volés les oeuvres marquantes du Salon, celles que la gnalées à l'attention. L'évaluation de toiles atteint presque $20,000.

New Portrait

I hear Kenneth K. Forbes, A.R.C.
A., well-known Canadian portrait painter, has commenced a new portrait of J. B. Laidlaw to replace the one stolen from the Art Gallery in Montreal. Although Mr. Laidlaw had only loaned the previous portrait, then his property, to the artist for exhibition purposes, he has recommissioned him to paint the new one.

THE ART ASSOCIATION

EVERYBODY who is interested in art here will learn with satisfaction that the Art Association of Montreal has been able to weather the difficult period of depression and that it has closed its accounts for the past year with only a nominal deficit. Twelve exhibitions were held during the year, and a course of highly instructive lectures was well attended. In addition to the permanent collection, the Art Galleries on Sherbrooke street now house a fine art library of some three thousand volumes, as well as a museum which is growing so rapidly that the time is fast approaching, the annual report states, when further space will be necessary to take care of its growth. Extra galleries are also needed to permit of occasional exhibitions being held without disarrangement of the permanent collection. "Apparently we must await more prosperous times for the realization of these hopes," the president says in his annual address.

It is most gratifying to note that the general public is taking a greater interest in art than it formerly did. The attendance on Sundays has more than justified the change in policy under which the opening of the Galleries on that day was made possible. Montreal has in the Art Galleries a building of architectural beauty, and in the permanent collection are to be found many fine works of art. The development of a love for culture and appreciation of beauty in manifold forms is a necessity in such a city as this, and the part that art plays in the life of the citizen is being more and more clearly realized. It is a good thing for people to be able to turn from the ugliness of much that surrounds them to a temple of beauty and to absorb the influence which the contemplation of its contents exerts upon them. The Art Association is doing an invaluable work in our midst and deserts and should receive generous public

Les tons paisibles chez F. Panabaker

Paysages et marines exposés aux galeries Scott. — La découverte d'Aleksander Bercovitch et son modernisme oriental. — M. H.-Y. Guillou à Québec. — Les derniers jours du Salon.

M. Emile Gauthier

Frank Panabaker, un jeune Ontarien de 28 ans dont on a déjà rencontré des tableaux aux Salons, tient jusqu'au 22 avril, sa première exposition-solo aux galeries Scott, rue Drummond. La cinquantaine de toiles affichées se compose pour la moitié de petits sujets, où il faut chercher le plus clair de l'inspiration de l'artiste.

Dès qu'on pénètre dans la vaste pièce on est frappé tout d'abord par l'extrême variété des sujets et la paisible fraîcheur du coloris chez Panabaker. Le talent encore jeune du peintre est multiforme; il passe des paysages verdoyants aux marines embrumées, puis au portrait solide. Et sa manière aussi est diverse. Autant il fait preuve d'un certain abandon qui ajoute au charme de ses petits tableaux, conçus en général d'un point de vue synthétique, autant il lui arrive d'analyser tout au long les scènes les plus vastes. L'ensemble respire la jeunesse artistique, mais une jeunesse bien rangée, ordonnée, déjà sûre d'elle-même. Aucun écart, pas de recherche de l'effet. Du conservatisme de bon aloi. La couleur n'est jamais absente; il l'emploie même de façon résolue et directe, mais il sait la doser, la mesurer, lui garder un sens paisible. Sa technique est solide.

On préfère la poésie vivante des petits tableaux aux compositions plus vastes, car alors il semble que la non-prétention même des thèmes fasse discrètement appel à une certaine émotion. Pourtant, telle grande scène de sous-bois ornementée par la neige fait songer à du Choultse adouci. Ses marines sont tour à tour solides et chantantes ou enveloppées dans une brume d'un réalisme bien imaginé. Le portrait d'un ministre protestant en surplis est vigoureux et parlant. Il n'est pas de sujet que Panabaker n'ait essayé, et peu de jeunes artistes canadiens donnent autant de promesses que lui.

Aleksander Bercovitch

Les légendes abondent dans le monde artistique de talents et de génies découverts par les hasards des rencontres et de la misère. Mais telle réalité vaut bien une légende, sans doute. C'est ainsi que la semaine dernière un malheureux émigré dut faire appel à la Fédération juive de charité pour s'éviter d'être jeté, lui et sa famille, sur le pavé, par un proprio réclamant son dû depuis longtemps. Or, il arriva qu'on découvrit chez ALEKSANDER BERCOVITCH, 39 ans, toute une série de toiles qui ne disaient rien qui vaille au proprio mais eurent l'heur d'intéresser des personnes averties. Elles sont maintenant exposées chez SIDNEY CARTER, rue Drummond, où elles attirent l'attention de beaucoup de gens, dont plusieurs artistes de marque.

Bercovitch a son histoire. Un roman. Issu d'une famille pauvre, il naquit à Cherson, en Russie, centre artistique. A 15 ans il peignait déjà des décors de théâtres. Il étudia ensuite en Palestine, foyer d'une école juive de peinture, puis, de bourse en bourse, se trouvait à Munich quand la guerre éclata, ce qui le contraignit de retourner en Russie. Après la révolution il s'adonna de nouveau à la décoration théâtrale puis passa deux ans à l'Académie Nationale. Il travailla comme artiste-peintre au pavillon du Turkestan, lors de l'exposition industrielle de l'U. S. S. R. et prit tellement de joie à ses recherches sur le sujet qu'il se résolut à s'établir sur la frontière persane, où il s'adonna, à cœur joie à l'étude de l'art russo-oriental, rêvant même de délivrer l'art russe des conventions européennes. Il était marié et père de deux enfants. La famine vint; Mme Bercovitch se souvint de parents fixés à Montréal. L'artiste s'en vint parmi nous il y a cinq ans, mais, faute de mieux posséder les deux langues, a végété depuis dans l'ombre, se contentant d'emplois secondaires. Il a fallu la misère extrême pour qu'on découvrit dans son modeste logis de la rue Laurier, sa collection de toiles peintes au Turkestan.

Je les ai vus l'autre jour, les tableaux de Bercovitch. Si l'on excepte quelques marines vigoureuses adoucies par le bel emploi de teintes douces, mauves et brunes, une couple de scènes montréalaises comme cette vue haute en coloris d'un coin de la rue Laurier, le reste se compose surtout de visages mongols et russes, jaunes, verts, d'une étrange et nostalgique laideur. Il y a aussi des scènes de chevauchées irréelles qui font songer à des motifs de tapisserie, des paysages décoratifs, tourmentés et invraisemblables. De l'orientalisme bien réussi.

A Québec

Pour la fin de l'exposition au Palais Montcalm à QUÉBEC, M. H.-Y. GUILLOU, de la Gravure Française, s'est rendu sur les lieux aujourd'hui avec un complément de pointes-sèches, eaux-fortes, etc., de sorte que la collection sera complète. La Société des Arts, Sciences et Lettres peut se vanter d'avoir obtenu un franc succès dans cette organisation artistique. Lors de l'inauguration, M. HECTOR FABER, secrétaire de la Société, a donné une intéressante causerie sur la gravure, ses origines et ses procédés.

"Le travail du graveur est une œuvre de longue patience, surtout lorsqu'il s'agit de gravure au burin," dit M. Faber. Un dessin bien simple en apparence peut exiger des semaines d'attention méticuleuse. L'artiste ne se sert que d'un poinçon avec lequel il rogne le métal, généralement le cuivre. Il a appris plus tard à recourir aux eaux-fortes, aux acides qu'il étend soigneusement sur le métal et qui se chargent d'attaquer le cuivre à la place du burin. L'aquafortiste utilise des vernis dont il recouvre sa planche métallique et de l'acide nitrique qu'il jette dans les régions que le trait du dessin a dégagées de la vernissure. Dans la pointe-sèche le graveur se sert d'une pointe fine qui le libère du vernis et de l'acide et lui permet un travail beaucoup plus libre que celui du burin."

En marge de la causerie très intéressante de M. Faber, M. Guillou, qui se tiendra à la disposition du public durant les derniers jours de l'exposition aujourd'hui, vendredi et samedi, pourra fournir au public

Art Gallery Theft Remains Mystery

Herald 27/4/33

Although Paintings Have Been Missing a Fortnight Detectives Have Only Theories to Work On—Sleuths Still Hold to Theory That "Job" Was Work of Amateur Thieves.

NEARLY a fortnight has elapsed since Montreal's mysterious Art Gallery robbery and it remains as mysterious as ever, with nothing save unsupported theories for the detectives to work upon.

This does not mean, however, that the sleuths have abandoned hope of solving the case. They believe that it was an amateur job and amateur burglars usually slip up somewhere, more often than not in their endeavors to dispose of the loot after the crime.

Cumbersome Loot

Such a misstep is particularly to be expected where the loot consists of paintings, both cumbersome to handle and difficult to sell. Immediately after the unusual theft Captain-Detective Alfred Tourville, who is in charge of the case under Inspector Victor Foucault, broadcast circulars giving descriptions of the sixteen stolen canvasses to the police and art dealers of all Canadian cities and a number of American centres.

A close check is being maintained on all paintings offered for sale at these points and if an attempt is made to dispose of the works stolen from the Spring Exhibition of the Montreal Art Association detection is practically certain.

But it is not at all certain that any such attempt will be made. While frankly puzzled by the crime, the investigators strongly suspect that it is not the work of professional profit-seeking thieves but that some unusual motive lies québécois de fins et utiles renseignements. Il s'y entend.

En haut, (no 2): "Guerre", masque énergique, œuvre du sculpteur A. Zoltvany-Smith exposée aussi au Salon. En bas, (no 3): le tableau curieux de Max Shulz, la seule œuvre avancée affichée au Salon du Printemps; il l'a intitulée "La toison d'or" on ne sait pourquoi, et on prête à cet assemblage de constructions crochues, perdues dans une mare invraisemblable de coloris, l'intention de symboliser la solidité de la cathédrale (vue au fond) contre les ravages du temps (!); En bas, (no 4): un coin de la rue Laurier décrit de façon sommaire et très "vraie" par le peintre Aleksander Bercovitch, qui expose actuellement chez Sidney Carter, rue Drummond. — (Clichés la "Presse").

Emile Gauthier

Le jeune artiste sourd-muet Emile Gauthier, diplômé des Beaux-Arts de Montréal, expose depuis une quinzaine de jours, à l'Institution des Sourds-Muets, une trentaine de tableaux et une série de croquis qui révèlent chez lui de la facilité d'observation et un sens délicat du coloris. La plupart des petites toiles sans prétention ont un air de confidence et de brève méditation. Si quelques sujets sont traités avec sécheresse, si les quelques portraits manquent de vie, à notre sens, il faut reconnaître, par contre, qu'il y a un judicieux emploi de tons chauds dans des scènes comme: "La vieille église du Sault-au-Récollet", son meilleur tableau, qui respire une vérité recueillie; "Maison normande", baignée dans une lumière poétique; "Sous le pont Viau", bien illuminé, où le béton armé s'éclaire d'une lueur chaleureuse; "Sous la glace", étude fluide; "Le ruisseau", traversé des lueurs rouges du crépuscule. "Montréal", une vue à vol d'oiseau, a été traitée en teintes douces. Tel "Coucher de soleil" a de jolis effets roses. La dizaine de croquis, — impressions d'un voyage aux Etats-Unis, — témoignent d'une certaine habileté à fixer en finesse des notations fugitives.

Un questionnaire

X a un travail à préparer. Il a besoin d'une prompt documentation. Il veut "jeter de la lumière" dans le domaine de la peinture. Il envoie à tous les critiques d'art un lourd questionnaire, s'engageant à "considérer grandement" les réponses, "sans en dévoiler la provenance et en toute discrétion". Il se soucie peu, du reste, d'écrire proprement et en français, ce qui eût été au moins une élégance à leur endroit. Une fois l'orthographe reconstituée, le questionnaire se lit comme suit:

"Quelles raisons avons-nous de fonder des espérances sur l'avenir de la peinture canadienne? Nos artistes canadiens tant de langue française que de langue anglaise font-ils quelque progrès dans leur art de manière à ce qu'on puisse dire qu'ils travaillent et réussissent à former une école vraiment originale et bien canadienne? Si oui quels sont ceux dont les noms émergent et dans quel sens opèrent-ils ce progrès? Est-il possible qu'un bon nombre d'entre eux puissent vivre de leur art? A combien sont cotés ordinairement les tableaux exposés par nos artistes dans les diverses parties du pays? Pour ce qui concerne nos jeunes Canadiens-français à Montréal et dans les autres (sic) de la province, à Québec en particulier, pour-vons-nous dire en les nommant qu'un bon nombre méritent (sic) notre attention? Quels seraient ceux-là? Et pour quels motifs?..." Rien que cela. Et X est "sur d'avance d'une prompt réponse". Fichtre! Je recueillerais volontiers moi-même toutes les réponses à ces questions. En attendant, tout doux, tout doucement. Enquête vient avant jugements...

Le Salon s'en va

Le cinquantième SALON DU PRINTEMPS aura bientôt vécu. Il s'achève à Pâques. Ceux qui n'ont pas encore fait leur tour à la Galerie des Arts, rue Sherbrooke ouest, feront bien de ne pas manquer à un agréable devoir envers les artistes de chez nous. Dans le domaine de la peinture et des arts plastiques le Salon du Printemps est toujours un événement; il faut être "au courant", même si l'on doit être déçu...

Une pratique peu délicate. J'ai attendu pour la signaler, afin qu'on ne m'accuse pas de faire une allusion directe. Il n'est que de faire publier sa photo ou celle de son fils dans un coin de chambre tapissé de tableaux, qui sont en réalité des modèles ou des travaux des autres et de faire écrire en rubrique: "M. X., de l'Ecole des Beaux-Arts, et quelques-uns de ses travaux". Il importe peu qu'on ne soit jamais allé aux Beaux-Arts et que les tableaux soient des autres. On peut exposer ensuite dans sa vitrine et éberluer les gogos. Mais c'est au moins peu décent comme procédé...

HARD TIMES TO PURGE ART OF ITS PARASITES

Star May 1, 1933.
Dr. Marius Barbeau Sees Revival of Culture

TORONTO, May 1.—The depression, Dr. Marius Barbeau, anthropologist of the National Museum at Ottawa, told the Heliconian Club Saturday night, has brought Canada to the "Eve of a great revival of commonsense, if not culture."

Dr. Barbeau said art had been given the guise of luxury and indulgence "under the glaring lights of modern publicity and exploitation." "Brokers and impressarios," he continued, "Boosted it to the skies in the days of inflation. So doing they amassed fortunes. But they have done little for true art when they did not actually demoralize it and ransack its sanctuaries." Dealers, he said, scooped up the works of masters and stored them away "to release them later with loud drum-beats that netted millions."

"If hard times do nothing to art but purge it of its parasites, well and good," he declared. "In this, as in other things, we must get back to bedrock."

A propos du vol au Salon du Printemps

La Presse, 20/4/33

L'Art Association n'est pas engagée vis-à-vis les artistes volés. — La garde des trésors. — Le pinacoscope au Louvre. — Portraits nostalgiques d'Oscar de Lall.

Les prix Jessie Dow

La disparition de seize des toiles exposées au Salon du Printemps a jeté le monde artistique en émoi et continue à faire les frais de multiples commentaires. La perte monétaire impliquée n'est peut-être pas très considérable; même si l'on consulte les prix de vente affichés dans le catalogue officiel on atteint à un total à situer entre quinze à vingt mille dollars. Or, comme bien l'on suppose, — ce sont là des prix maxima. Mais quelques-uns des portraits enlevés ont été payés par les personnes qui ont posé et ont ensuite aimablement consenti à laisser afficher le tableau au Salon. Et pour eux, de même que pour les artistes, le vol est d'autant plus ennuyeux que l'Art Association, lorsqu'elle organise le Salon du Printemps, a soin de prémunir les exposants dans la formule d'admission que leurs œuvres ne sont pas assurées et qu'elle ne peut s'en porter responsable.

Et pourquoi donc?

On en est encore à glosier sur le "mobile" ou le motif des cambriolages? Il leur eût été facile, ce semble, de s'en prendre à des œuvres de la collection permanente ou des collections particulières logées à la Galerie des Arts, celle des Van Horne surtout. Rien ne pouvait les empêcher de visiter le musée, la bibliothèque, voire la petite caisse. Nenni! ils s'en sont tenus au Salon du Printemps qui venait de s'achever la veille. Là encore, pourquoi n'avoir rien enlevé des œuvres sculptées, dont une couple auraient été assez faciles à manier? Puis, comme ils ne voulaient pas perdre leur temps à s'attaquer aux tableaux protégés par une vitre, ils ont coupé à même les cadres seize des autres toiles. Or, tout indique qu'il y a eu sélection, que les "vic-times" ont été désignées à l'avance, semble-t-il. Ainsi, pourquoi n'avoir pris dans la salle des dessins qu'une étude quelconque de Marjorie Smith au lieu des panneaux décoratifs de Schmidt? Les voleurs n'ont pas pris nécessairement les œuvres les plus dispendieuses, ni celles dont ils puissent disposer le plus facilement. Au contraire, la partie la plus importante de leur vol consiste en vastes portraits de personnages connus; ce sont là des sujets trop précis et d'un intérêt moins universel que n'importe quel paysage. En tout cas, les milieux artistiques ont été prévenus et sont sur le qui-vive.

Reste l'hypothèse d'une vengeance envieuse. De la part d'artistes refusés au Salon ou de personnes que le succès des autres empêche de dormir. Il semble, n'est-ce pas, que ce soit le fait de personnes assez au courant de voler précisément les tableaux généralement signalés par la critique. La plupart des seize ont été mentionnés d'une façon spéciale et reproduits dans les dernières pages d'art de la "Presse" et dans le compte-rendu élaboré publié par nous au lendemain du vernissage.

Protection insuffisante

Mais il est un point qu'on nous pardonnera de soulever. La protection est-elle suffisante à la Galerie des Arts? Sans doute faut-il tenir compte des temps durs où nous sommes et louer hautement les mérites de l'Art Association dans les circonstances. Et pourtant, — si nos renseignements sont exacts, — on peut s'étonner qu'il n'y ait de gardien pour les deux planchers de salons, le jour, que le portier et une personne chargée de faire un tour occasionnel, et, la nuit, que le conclerge de l'édifice qui couche dans le soubassement. Rien de plus facile que de faire appeler le portier à un endroit tandis qu'on opère ailleurs. Et, à la condition de ne pas faire trop de bruit, on peut piller la Galerie des Arts d'un bout à l'autre, la nuit, en passant par en arrière, où l'on est passablement caché à la vue des passants.

Dans toute sa longue existence c'est la première fois qu'il arrive une pareille aventure à l'Art Association de Montréal, si l'on excepte le vol de deux petits ivoires il y a de cela plusieurs années, lorsque la Galerie était au carré Philip. Apeuré par une petite annonce de journal où l'on disait connaître le coupable, le voleur s'en vint les remettre au contrôle le lendemain et prit la fuite.

Les toiles volées

Ainsi que la "Presse" l'a donnée en primeur mardi, voici la liste des seize toiles volées: "Petite rivière aux Renards", G.-S. Bagley, $200; "The Moorland Bridge", Elizabeth-Styring Nutt, Halifax, $450; "The Golden Fleece", Max Schulz, Outremont, $250; "Three Old Houses, Louisa Street, Toronto", Peter-C. Sheppard, Toronto, $300; "The Green Boat", P.-C. Sheppard, Toronto, $250; "The Swimming Hole", Henry-J. Simpkins, Verdun, $275; "At The Bird Bath", Alberta Cleland, Montréal, $350; "A Late Fall Landscape", Marc-Aurèle Fortin, Montréal, $75; "Arrangement in Black and Grey", A. Sherriff-Scott, Montréal $400; portraits du Dr A.-L. Lockwood et de John-B. Laidlaw, par Kenneth-K. Forbes, Toronto; de l'lie H. Craig par R.-S. Hewton, Montréal; du Dr R.-W. Archibald et de Norman Dawes par Alphonse Jongers, Montréal; du Dr J.-A. Mireault, par J. St-Charles et une étude de portrait par Marjorie Smith.

On a calculé qu'il est passé cette année 12,839 personnes au Salon du Printemps, comparativement à 10,236 en 1932.

Les prix Jessie Dow, du nom de la donatrice, ont été accordés cette année, dans la section des huiles Paul-B. Earle, A.R.C.A., de Montréal pour sa toile intitulée "Indian Summer", et dans la section des aquarelles à Frank-D. Allison, de St-Jean, N.-B., pour la scène intitulée "Bab Djeddi, Fez". Le prix consiste en un montant substantiel accordé annuellement au paysage jugé le plus intéressant au Salon du Printemps. Un même artiste ne peut le gagner plus que deux fois et encore ne faut-il pas que ce soit deux fois de suite. Plusieurs de nos paysagistes ont déjà eu les honneurs du prix Jessie Dow.

OSCAR DE LALL

Oscar de Lall expose à l'Art Association une série de portraits au fusain qui, pour n'avoir pas toute l'ardeur ramassée dans l'expression que les physionomies dessinées par Louis Muhlstok, s'y apparentent, la fois par le choix de plusieurs sujets et par la nostalgie qui s'en dégage. La plupart des têtes sont de grandeur naturelle et remarquables par le fini. En certains cas, le travail semble même avoir laissé des traces un peu laborieuses. La plupart des personnages esquissés sont bien connus, ce qui permet de juger de la forte ressemblance. A ce point qu'en entrant l'autre jour à la Galerie des Arts, nous nous retrouvâmes d'instinct, ma gentille compagne et moi, pour dire en même temps d'un gentleman à la porte du petit salon: "Tiens, celui-là fige dans la série de Lall". Il soulevait l'œil. C'était vrai. Les plus intéressants des portraits sont ceux d'un vieillard aux rides tricotées, de quelques types russo-juifs, d'une petite fille à physionomie très fraîche, de l'artiste lui-même. Le dessin est minutieux et solide.

Grâce à la générosité d'un Argentin, M. Mainini et à l'initiative de son compatriote, le Dr Fernando Petrucci, le Louvre possède depuis peu un laboratoire modèle où sont analysés, l'un après l'autre, tous les chefs-d'œuvre. Il ne sera pas sans intérêt de résumer ici en quelques notes l'article publié par un journal parisien à ce sujet:

L'audace des faussaires est inconcevable. Ils disposent des moyens les plus subtils et possèdent tous les trucs, mais les appareils de précision finissent toujours par découvrir les falsifications les plus parfaites. Les moyens radiographiques et autres permettent heureusement de reconstituer la vérité. Le tableau subit d'abord une radiographie complète puis on le fait passer sous la lumière rasante si précieuse puisqu'elle permet de faire un examen minutieux de la matière picturale. Quand on s'est efforcé de déterminer l'époque d'une œuvre on en étudie ensuite la touche. C'est ainsi que l'on découvre que chaque peintre possède un coup de pinceau qui lui est propre. L'œuvre passe ensuite à l'ultraviolet, qui permet de voir le moindre repeint et de discerner les modifications subies à travers les âges.

Le Laboratoire entend devenir un véritable "Institut Pasteur des œuvres d'art" et, par ses études et expériences, en arriver à reconstituer pour les artistes l'ancienne gamme des peintures, cette belle huile éla-lique d'autrefois qui fixe les pigments pour toujours.

La Terre-Sainte des Ganci

La Terre-Sainte des frères Ganci, exposée actuellement au rez-de-chaussée de l'édifice de la Sun Life, n'a pas qu'une simple valeur documentaire sur la topographie palestinienne et la vie du Christ. Le nombre prodigieux des morceaux que comporte cette miniature cycloramique, l'exactitude des reconstitutions, le semblant de vie prêt aux minuscules personnages par une savante combinaison de petits fils chargés d'électricité: tout cela tient de beaucoup d'ingéniosité. Surtout si l'on tient compte que cet extraordinaire amas de détails minutieux est le fruit de onze années de travail et que tout a été travaillé au seul couteau de poche.

Les paysages et marines du jeune Frank-S. Panabaker restent en montre jusqu'au 22 avril aux galeries Scott, rue Drummond.

Les sœurs Des Clayes exposent leurs œuvres actuellement à leur studio, 1158 Beaver Hall.

On a pu voir ces jours-ci en montre chez Wisintainer, rue Saint-Laurent, près Craig, un tableau à l'huile d'Edgar Contant, qui représente Son Eminence le cardinal Villeneuve revêtu de la pourpre. L'artiste a peut-être un peu vieilli son personnage, mais il a gardé à la physionomie toute la finesse des traits et son regard si spirituel. Les tons rouges ont été employés de judicieuse façon et ajoutent à la majesté du portrait.

SAYS PAINTING ORIGINAL Gazette June 4, 1933.

Critic Finds Da Vinci Technique in Picture

Chicago, June 4.—If claims made by Dr. Maurice H. Goldblatt, Chicago art critic, are accepted by others, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Edwards, Cincinnati, may see the painting for which they paid $3,000 rise in value to more than $1,000,000. The painting, "Madonna of the Yarn Winder," has been identified by Dr. Goldblatt as a Leonardo da Vinci masterpiece for which historians and biographers of the artist have been searching four centuries.

Mr. and Mrs. Edwards bought it in Paris from a Russian nobleman and since then said critics had expressed opinions that it was either a Luini or a Sodoma.

But, Dr. Goldblatt said he had discovered the technique of Da Vinci in it and that it was the original, despite a claim of Emil Moller in 1926 that he had found the original in an English collection. The painting is 24 inches high and 18½ inches wide and shows a Madonna supporting the Christ child with the four spokes of a yard winder forming a cross. It was loaned by its present owners to the Chicago Art Institute for a Century of Progress art exhibit.

EN HAUT: "At Dawn, Rising of the Gale", marine fraîche, vigoureusement brossée: elle est l'œuvre du peintre Montag Dawson et est exposée actuellement aux galeries Watson, rue Sherbrooke ouest. (Coutoio des galeries Watson). EN BAS: "Eve", aquarelle, N.-B., marine reposée, au coloris paisible, œuvre du jeune Frank-S. Panabaker, qui tient une exposition-solo aux galeries Scott, rue Drummond; A DROITE, portrait au fusain de M. T.-E. Dyonnet, professeur au McGill et personnage avantagiste d'avril à la Galerie des Arts, rue Sherbrooke. (Clichés la "Presse").

PAINTERS HOLD SHOW AT MORGAN'S
Gazette May 2, 1933

Bieler, Frost, Holt, Lyman and Roberts Have Representative Works

VARIETY IN SUBJECTS

Figures, Still Lifes, Portraits and Landscapes Make Good Exhibit—Some Drawings Included

Five painters known to Montreal-ers are holding an exhibition of their work in a gallery on the sixth floor of the store of Henry Morgan and Co., Limited, and the examples in oils, watercolors and black and white make an interesting collection. In the main, the paintings are marked by robust brushwork and fresh color. The artists exhibiting are Andre Bieler, Elizabeth Frost, George Holt, John Lyman and Goodridge Roberts. The items, which total 61, are effectively arranged and enjoy good lighting.

Variety characterizes the offerings of John Lyman, who, as ever, does not allow difficult problems to deter him from making a picture of likely materials. Slightly reminiscent of certain circus scenes he did many years ago, but more subtle in values, is "Figure Skating"—a man and woman centering the ice at the Forum, the crowd filling the tiered seats to the top of the picture and, in the foreground, near a darkened pillar, spectators silhouetted against ice below. It is a painting of good tonal qualities and happily composed. Performance of another kind is indicated in "Carmela," the Spanish dancer in blue, gesturing against a grey background with a seated man strumming a guitar.
"Souvenir of Spain" shows a nice arrangement of shawl, mantilla, fan and water jug, figures in the street below and solid buildings under a darkening sky in the background. A scarlet robe sounds the high color note in "Nu Incarnat," a young woman of robust form arranging her hair before a small hand mirror. Two reclining nudes, too, show a firm, direct treatment in brushwork. Good in arrangement and effective in color is "The Beach," with figures under shades on the sand. "The River" is a frank bit of painting—rosy mountain, distant village and white-walled building edging the bank. A cartoon for a decorative panel is "The Airplane"—three nudes on a knoll looking at the bird-like plane that points towards distant hills beyond a tree-edged lake. Of the Laurentian country is "Threshing"—a stretch of sunlit country with blue hills as seen from the shadowed interior of a barn where men are engaged in their task. The drawings shown are marked by expressive line.

Andre Bieler has painted most of his subjects in this province and finds figures about out-door bread ovens congenial. Bright color has its chance in two flower pieces which are effective in treatment. He has well suggested the moderate strength of spring-time sunlight in "Cap Rouge," with its wooden buildings, spired church and hills.
Irregular buildings dot the landscape in "Piedmont, Laurentides."
Winter labor is shown in "The Ice Cutters"—man with tongs loading a sleigh, and another working at the strip of water nearby. Figures and houses at Oka make an attractive little work.

Elizabeth Frost has a capitally handled still life in which eggs, lemons and garlic are the material ingredients. Bold in handling and true in color is "In the Lauren-tians," with its house in a wooded setting and distant hills on a sunny day. "Study of Head," a woman with blonde hair and green blouse resting her chin on her hands, is a sincere performance, as is her reclining nude. Blue mountains line the horizon in the sketch called "The Lake." Trees edge the circling beach and in the foreground is a boat near two logs.

George Holt, besides some crisply drawn nudes, has a still life,
"Apples on a Blanket," a spontaneous sketch in oils of a girl's head, a directly painted bit of landscape in "Barn, Nova Scotia," and "Lady in Black."

Goodridge Roberts has some experiments in vivid sunlight that do not quite carry the conviction of his watercolors done in the Gatineau country. There is refreshing abandon in his handling of this medium, expressively shown in "Gatineau Hills"—a stretch of country under a broken cloudy sky. "After Rain" has much the same qualities, and he touches a high point in "Gatineau Hills, Dull Day." In the last-named there is a fine suggestion of bulk in the distant mountains under a lowering sky. Rocks litter the foreground and the impression of irregular, wooded country is convincingly conveyed.

COURT STILL AT WINDSOR

Their Majesties Expected to

Oils Are Hung This

By THOMAS T. CHAMPION

(Canadian Press Cable.)

London, April 28.—London's "season" was ushered in today with a private showing of the Royal Academy's spring exhibition, minus Royal attendance and representation of Augustus John, absent for the second year. Court is still at Windsor, but Their Majesties are expected to visit the show Sunday after their return to town. The Duke of Gloucester, third son of the King, will respond to the toast of the Royal family at the academy banquet tomorrow.

International affairs cheated Augustus John of a chance to get his portrait of Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald hung. The 54-year-old portrait and decorative painter found the Premier a difficult subject in these times. He kept going away. Finally, just as the picture was almost finished, he went to Washington to confer with President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Almost 75 oils are hung this year, many of them portraits. Problem pictures and those conservatives call "freaks" are comparatively

The King and Queen Are Expected to Attend Pri-

LONDON, May 1.—(C. P. Cable).—London's "season" was ushered in today with a private showing of the Royal Academy's summer exhibition, minus Royal attendance and representation of Augustus John, absent for the second year. Court is still at Windsor, but Their Majesties are expected to visit the show Sunday after their return to town. The Duke of Gloucester, third son of the King, responded to the toast to the Royal Family at the academy banquet today.

International affairs cheated Augustus John of a chance to get his portrait of Premier Ramsay MacDonald hung. The 54-year-old portrait and decorative painter found the Premier a difficult subject in these times. He kept going away. Finally, just as the picture was almost finished, he went to Washington to confer with President Roosevelt.

Exhibition
By Members of The Atelier

The second public exhibition by members of the Atelier brings together, on the sixth floor of the Morgan Company's building, the work of five painters. They are painters of different degrees of age and experience but they all appear in this exhibition as earnest students who, with evident ideas of what they want to do, are not always sure about how to do them, and a certain experimental quality in most of the work is one of the points of interest in the exhibition. One distinction of the exhibition lies in the large proportion of figure studies, in place of the preponderance of landscapes which is usual in Montreal; another lies in the quantity of clever drawing, combined with an uncertain taste in the use of color.

The two senior exhibitors are John Lyman and Andre Bieler, each of whom shows sixteen works. Some of Mr. Lyman's drawing is as good as ever, and there are nice clean lines in a figure study and a drawing of a cat. With these are some very good figure drawings by George Holt, whose drawings are much better than his paintings. Mr.
Lyman's oil pictures are hardly of his best; there are excellent light and color in two small sketches.

color will not please everyone. A well drawn and modelled oil sketch of a woman's torso is quite the most successful of Elizabeth Frost's exhibits, and there is good work in her uncomfortable picture of a woman in a red sweater. There is clever work in Goodridge Roberts' enormous drawing of a woman's head, about four times the size of life, but, with that exception, all his pictures are landscapes. He has got a good effect of space and distance in a black and white of "Lariat Hill"; the most successful of his eight, roughly painted, water colors are three of places in the Gatineau district; they are much better in tone and color than the work that Mr. Roberts has shown in Montreal before and get their effect in spite of the white mounts on which they are shown.

"Threshing" and "The Beach," and there are a clever sketch of people skating at the Forum and a rather interesting composition of tree trunks; his three oil studies of nude figures have some sound drawing but strange color.

The best of Mr. Bieler's pictures are those which contain figures. "Un Dimanche apres midi" is a good, simple sketch of sunlight; there are form and solidity in the figures in "La femme de pain" and "Femme de Quebec," as also in two small sketches, "The ice cutters" and "La balancoire," but Mr. Bieler's taste in Sea and Ships

In Pictures by Harry Britton

The work of the Nova Scotia painter Harry Britton, A.R.C.A., has never been seen to better advantage in Montreal than in the excellent exhibition which is now open in the gallery of the Eaton Company. They are pictures in oil, pastel and water color, of places in Canada and Europe but chiefly, of course, of the sea and ships. Every one of these pictures has something of interest in it but perhaps the most striking of all are a few water colors of Atlantic waves, splendid waves with all their color and movement. Another particularly good water color is a shore scene at low tide. The ships and boats, as good as any that Mr. Britton has ever painted, are best in the oil sketches of harbors, many of them at Newlyn and other places in England, some in Canadian harbors and others at Venice, Capri and Amsterdam, seen in all sorts of conditions of light and weather. There are only a few landscapes, most of them effective studies of stormy skies, but they are not quite so successful as the best of the marine pictures.
A few pictures, in oil and pastel, of flowers by Henrietta Britton, are broadly and truly painted and full of good color and add to the interest of the exhibition.

GREEK ART BELONGS IN NATIVE SETTING
Gazette May 8, 1933.
E. Maillard of Beaux Arts Addresses Hellenic Educational Progressive Association

Works of art removed from Greece should be returned to their original setting in order to bring out their true beauty and glory, in the opinion of E. Maillard, principal of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, who delivered an address Friday night at the school, under the auspices of the Mount Royal Chapter
No. 7, American Hellenic Educational Progressive Association. The blue sky and bright sunshine of Greece, he said, gave to works of art a setting that could not be equalled in any other part of the world.

Mr. Maillard recently returned from that country, where he spent some time studying Greek art, and it is his belief that lovers and students of art and sculpture should visit Greece for higher enlightenment and appreciation. In his talk he mentioned the famous Acropolis and Parthenon. "Standing there," he said, "I felt that I was on the top of the world. I could hardly speak from the effect of the marvellous scenery surrounding me."

Speaking of modern Greece, Mr.
Maillard said that Greeks today possess the virtues of their ancestors, but continual warfare and sacrifice have prevented them from serving the world as the ancients did. However, he added, Greece today was progressing toward a glory that would equal that of the past, and he urged Greeks the world over not to forget the traditions of the past and to think with pride of the land of their birth. He was much impressed by the courtesy he received during his visit in the country.

PASTOR DEDICATES MEMORIAL SCREEN

Star 8/5/33
Memory of Sir Vincent Meredith Honored at St. Andrew's and St. Paul's

Iron stands for strength of character, and both can be forged and welded into something beautiful, as is the wrought iron screen in memory of Sir Vincent Meredith, that separates the Chapel of Youth from the nave of the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul, according to Rev. George H. Donald, D.D., V.D., when he formally dedicated the screen at Sunday morning's service.

The dedicatory service was simple but beautiful. It took place while the congregation of the Church stood and while the youth of the congregation, as represented by the Boy Scouts, the Girl Guides and the members of the Sunday School symbolically entered the chapel during the singing of a hymn and stood at attention during the ceremony.

DEDICATORY PRAYER

They remained standing erectly while Dr. Donald pronounced the dedicatory prayer and laid his hand on the elaborately wrought screen. Then they took up their flags and led by the Scouts marched out of the chapel and across the church, down to the back of it and then once more to the sanctuary, where they again left their flags.

The screen itself designed by H. L. Featherstonhaugh has wrought into it flowers, fruit, the emblems of the United Kingdom and the maple leaf of Canada. These centre about the coats of arms of the church and of the Meredith family. It is dedicated to "the glory of God and in loving memory of Sir Vincent Meredith, Bart., 1850-1929."

FRIEND OF YOUTH

Dr. Donald referred to Sir Vincent Meredith in his sermon and spoke of his philanthropy, his sincerity and his knightly valor. He pointed out that Sir Vincent could truly be called the friend of the young man, since he had aided many in the course of his life, and that hence it was a fitting thing that the memorial screen should be placed before the Chapel of Youth.

As he spoke to the children of the congregation Dr. Donald used the simile of iron and character. He referred too to the fact that the screen made a shelter of the chapel and this, he said, was like the shelter of Christ. Finally he commented on the inspiration which is found in the Latin motto of the Meredith family, a translation of which means: "In the Hope of Reward for Valor."

PAINTER IS PAID BUT WORK STOPPED

Famous Mexican Mural Artist's "Masterpiece" Unacceptable to Rockefellers

New York, May 9.—Diego Rivera, celebrated Mexican mural artist whose paintings frequently have aroused controversies, was halted tonight in his painting of a fresco in the great hall of the 70-storey office building in Rockefeller Centre.

Officials of the project told him his painting, which he regarded as his masterpiece, was no longer acceptable to the Rockefeller family. He was handed a letter enclosing a cheque for $14,000, completing the payment of $21,000 he had been promised for three murals.

A crowd of about 100 men and women sympathizers were ushered from the building before Rivera was told to leave his scaffold, and they later paraded outside the building with banners reading "Save Rivera's Art." Mounted and foot police were on duty to prevent disorder.

Rivera had been working on the paintings for about two months and had them well along toward completion.

The building officials subsequently issued a statement saying the frescoes were not in harmony with the artistic plans for the building, that Rivera had been asked to make certain changes to bring them in line, and that he had refused to do so.

The mural, covering a space 63 feet long and 17 feet high, was to have depicted "human intelligence in control of the forces of nature."

Rivera, in his broken English, declared that objection was made to a figure of Lenin joining the hands of a soldier, a worker and a negro which was to have topped the painting.

In the background were crowds of unemployed waving red flags. Rivera said objection also was made to the brilliant color of the flags.

Rivera's most recent controversy occurred in Detroit two months ago when it was charged that murals he had just completed on the walls of the Detroit Institute of Arts were blasphemous. His paintings were accepted, however, by Edsel Ford, their donor. At that time Rivera explained his attitude as follows:

"The official Communist party has expelled me from membership, and now the conservative element attacks me. However, my public is made up of the workers—the manual and intellectual workers."

Exhibition Of Sketches at The Arts Club

Star May 10, 1933

The current exhibition at the Arts Club on Victoria street shows a number of sketches and water colors by some eight members of the club. The most important part of the exhibition is a collection of small oil sketches by Guy Brock. They are mostly so small that they might almost be called thumbnail sketches, —quickly painted records of impressions of travel which cover Canada, Europe and the Southern United States. Most of them are of buildings and streets, with a few good studies of boats, and in all of them there are excellent effects of light and color, with forms merely suggested by a few brush strokes.

The water color painters are led by Paul Caron, whose works are largest and most important, —characteristic examples of his pictures of old houses and snow, horses and sleighs. The other exhibitors are less known as water color painters and might, in some of their work, be considered amateurs. Chrystie Douglas has a happy little picture of cottages in snow, Herbert Raine some views of sea shores and rocks, with good space and color, and there is sureness of handling and solidity in the pictures of J. Melville Miller. There are some simply treated views by P. T. Kaelin and interesting studies of a variety of scenes by Lincoln Morris. The exhibition, which continues till May 20, is open to the public on every day except Saturday and Sunday, from 10 till 12 and 3 till 5.

A picture of "Oxen ploughing" by a Hungarian painter, Janos Viski, has just been presented to the Art Association of Montreal by Dr. Charles Winter, Consul-General of Hungary in Montreal, and is now hung in the large central gallery, upstairs, on Sherbrooke street. It is a broadly painted study of a team of oxen, with strong sunlight and shadow, which is an example of a school of painting which was not represented in the Art Association's collection.

Janos Viski, who was born in Hungary in 1887, and studied at home, has visited many countries and has painted in Mexico and South America. Most of his pictures are of horses and other animals. He is a well-known exhibitor in Hungarian exhibitions, but is much less well-known abroad, though he has shown pictures and has won many prizes in other countries.

A remarkable proposal has lately been made by the American Fine Arts Federation, an active body in the United States, that a federal Secretary of Fine Arts should be appointed at Washington. The proposal is in general terms and does not seem to give any exact definition of the functions which this secretary might be expected to perform. Apart from the national collections at Washington, all artistic activities in the United States are controlled, so far as they are officially controlled, by state or municipal authorities, and it seems that the secretary, if he did anything at all, might be likely to stir up strife between the federal government and these authorities; which might bring questions of art into the Supreme Court for decision.

That eminently dignified and conservative body, the Royal Academy in London, has this year, for the first time, recognized the fact that its annual exhibition is a picture-dealing business and has taken steps to advertise it like any other business. In addition to other advertising, a large number of posters are being used and one of these, a view of the entrance to Burlington House from Piccadilly, has been designed by a member of the Academy, Henry Rushbury, A.A.A. The others are by painters of less standing and none of the Academicians are sharing in the work. Mr. Rushbury, while he was making a sketch for his poster in Piccadilly, was taken for a pavement artist and given money by passers-by. This year's exhibition is said to contain an unusually large quantity of good work by young and new artists.

GUARD BORDERS IN SEARCH FOR STOLEN ART

Fingerprints Only Clue to 10 Paintings Taken from B'klyn Museum.

Search for the thieves who took 10 paintings by "old masters" from the Brooklyn Museum assumed international proportions today as the police communicated with authorities in Canada and Mexico in an effort to prevent shipment of the canvasses which are valued at $35,000.

Customs officials on both the Canadian and Mexican borders have been asked to examine closely every box and package that might contain the paintings.

Meanwhile, Deputy Chief Inspector Vincent J. Sweeney, in charge of the Brooklyn Detective Bureau, announced today that 20 crack detectives, "experts of oil paintings," had been assigned to the case.

CHECK FINGERPRINTS.

They are checking the fingerprints discovered on the fourth floor window sill at the museum with those of known crooks.

Copies of the prints are being sent to Washington for checking with the Government files. A check-up on all packages brought to the water-front for shipment is being made by detectives, also, Inspector Sweeney disclosed today.

In addition, the guest lists of all hotels here are being examined for names of persons prominent in the art world.

Detective Thomas Dugan, of the E. 51st st. station, Manhattan, famous for art "sleuthing" has been loaned to Inspector Sweeney for work in this case.

WORK OF 2 MEN.

The two men who got away with the paintings belong to a gang of international thieves in the opinion of Inspector Sweeney.

This is the second theft in the history of the Brooklyn Museum. The first was in 1926 when a valuable water color was taken and returned mysteriously as soon as the theft was made public.

The delay in making this theft public was at the request of a private detective agency, according to Dr. William Fox, head of the museum, who was questioned about it today.

A conference between Dr. Fox, Inspector Sweeney and the detectives assigned to the case was scheduled this afternoon in the inspector's office in Brooklyn.

The two most valuable paintings in the list were: "Judith," by Lucas Cranach, valued at $10,000, and "Portrait of Miss Minigay," by George Romney, $7,000.

There were three $5,000 pictures: "Portrait of Senor Miosa," by Van Dyck; "The Annunciation," by Fra Angelico, and "Christ's Ascension," by Peter Paul Rubens.

Others were: "Louis XI," by Jean Fouquet, valued at $2,500; "Head of Christ," by Bernardino Luini, $1,800; "Miss Bernard," by Sir Thomas Lawrence, $1,250; "Louis de Nevers," by Francois Clouet, $1,200; and "Portrait of a Young Man," by Roger Van Derweyden, $1,000.

CANADA NEGLECTS MUSEUM MATTERS

Gazette May 13, '33
Canadian Spends Less Than Any Other Empire Citizen in This Field

COMMITTEE IS FORMED

Will Probably Meet at Ottawa in July or September to Develop Policy

The nucleus of a Canadian committee for the development of museum and art gallery educational services in Canada has been appointed and the full committee will probably meet at Ottawa in July or September to develop its policy. S. F. Markham, formerly Parliamentary secretary to Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald, of Great Britain, and honorary secretary of the British Museums Association, announced yesterday in an interview with The Gazette in the Windsor Hotel.

Mr. Markham, who with Sir Henry Myers, F.R.S., D.S.C., was invited by the Carnegie Corporation of New York, 18 months ago, to make a report on the museums and art galleries of Canada, explained that the report in question was completed early last summer and that one of its recommendations was that such educational services should be established if funds could be found for this development. The Carnegie Corporation has made a grant of $40,000, he said and arrangements are now under way for the naming of a permanent committee.

Commenting on his survey of Canadian museums and art galleries, and those in other parts of the British Empire, under the auspices of the Carnegie Corporation, Mr. Markham said:

"One point the Empire survey brings out is that Canada as a whole spends less on its museums per head of population than any other part of the Empire. It is also unfortunately true that out of Canada's 125 museums less than a score have full-time, competent curators. It can thus be seen that the problems confronting the Canadian committee, which is now being formed, are as great as those in any part of the Empire. However, I feel convinced that there is not only the knowledge, but also the will-power, to improve Canadian museums."

"What part of Canada has the best museums?" the reporter asked.

"At the moment Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Saint John and Vancouver all have excellent institutions," replied Mr. Markham. "Other points, such as London, Hamilton and Calgary, have not been so fortunate while in the smaller towns there is an incredible amount of hard work to be done."

TORONTO MUSEUM BEST.

Mr. Markham's interviewer was curious as to the location of Canada's best museum. Brushing aside the pride of a native-born Montrealer, he timidly suggested that the National Museum at Ottawa might have aspirations for this honor. The guess was wrong, for Mr. Markham said, without hesitation: "The Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto is undoubtedly the best museum in Canada."

Mr. Markham, who has just returned from a survey of the museums in New Zealand and Australia, and leaves for New York this morning on the last lap of his journey home, was prevailed upon to discuss briefly the results of the Empire survey. Great Britain's standard is higher than that of any of the Dominions, he said, but he pointed out that this was to be expected to her longer history and the periodical grants received from the Government over a long period of years. Of the British Dominions, New Zealand ranks highest from the point of view of museums, per head of population, he asserted.

Every museum and art gallery in Australia and New Zealand was examined by Mr. Markham, in cooperation with the various governments, and South Africa was also included in the unique Empire survey. The task now, he said, is to translate the findings into terms of a concrete policy. The ultimate result of the Carnegie survey may be the creation of an entirely new form of museum service throughout Canada, and in other parts of the Empire.

Speaking of the local institutions Mr. Markham stated that he noted that the Commercial and Industrial Museum on Lagache street had made several attractive improvements since his visit here six months ago. The new industrial models on display there are incomparable anywhere in Canada.

Even greater changes have been made in the Chateau de Ramezay, he added. Anyone who has not visited this museum during the last six months has a most pleasant surprise in store through the colorful re-arrangement and amplification of exhibits.

Mr. Markham thought that credit for at least some of these improvements should go to Dr. Cyril Fox who made a special survey, on behalf of McGill University, of the McGill Art Association of Montreal, and Chateau de Ramezay institutions. He ventured the opinion that the much-discussed tunnel under the Chateau de Ramezay done the historic building

RIVERA'S FRESCO HIDDEN FROM VIEW

Mural Which Aroused Ire of Rockefeller Covered with Canvas

NEW YORK, May 12.—(U.P.)—Workmen yesterday prepared to hang a permanent covering of canvas over Diego Rivera's gigantic mural painting in the R. C. A. Building of Rockefeller Centre.

The Mexican artist's fresco, including a portrait of Lenin, dead Soviet leader, will not be removed, but will be hidden from the public gaze. The Rockefeller family, financial sponsors of the painting, have forbidden Rivera to complete it.

An excited workman, who had gone to the building to remove tools and materials belonging to Rivera, brought word to the artist that workmen were boring holes through the fresco every two feet.

A reporter who visited the building was told by a superintendent in charge that "A few holes have been bored to hold up the permanent canvas covering." The reporter was forbidden to make a close examination of the mural which was almost entirely concealed by a temporary covering of tar paper and boards and scaffolding. The workmen operated under a guard of private police, who refused to allow outsiders to approach the fresco.

The Mexican painter, already in a highly excited state due to the furore excited by his discharge from the project, received another shock yesterday afternoon.

ORDER CANCELLED

A telegram arrived from Albert Kahn, Chicago architect, announcing that General Motors Corporation had cancelled its order for a huge Rivera mural in its exhibition building, at Chicago.

Kahn indicated the cancellation was the direct result of "notoriety created by the Radio City situation."

Rivera announced last night that he had decided to devote the "capitalistic" money he received from the Rockefellers to furnish frescoes for Communist and Socialist institutions in New York. His offer of his talent has been accepted, he said, by the New York Workers' School, the International Workers' School, and the Rand School of Social Research. Rivera will pay for the materials which he will use in decorating the structures.

American Art News

Star May 18, 1933

Though the exhibition at Chicago, which is to be opened on June 1st, is called a Century of Progress Exhibition, the works of art which are to be shown in connection with it will cover more than six centuries, from the XIIIth century to the present day, and all schools and countries. There is to be no art section in the exhibition grounds, but there will be a big display in the Art Institute of Chicago, for which 25 museums and some 225 private collectors are lending exhibits. The French Government is lending works from the Louvre and other museums, and one picture sent from Paris is Whistler's portrait of his mother, which is perhaps the most important picture by any American painter.

The pictures which were stolen a few weeks ago from the Brooklyn Museum include works by or attributed to many famous painters. On the list of these painters are Clouet and Fouquet, Fra Angelico, Luini, Cranach, Rubens, Van Dyck, Romney and Lawrence. The value given for these stolen pictures is $35,000, which seems strangely small for a collection of pictures by such painters as those mentioned. The thieves in this case left ropes and various other clues behind them.

The grounds of the trouble which has arisen over the mural decoration of the new Rockefeller Radio City in New York are more political than artistic. One artist, Diego Rivera, has just finished a large decoration, containing a number of figures, one of which is a portrait of Lenin, and this some members of the Rockefeller family refuse to have. As some writers in New York papers point out, the trouble is only what was to be expected. Mr. Rivera, a Mexican, who has been in New York a comparatively short time, has painted other big decorations there and in all of them has used his painting as a means to preach communism and other forbidden political principles. There seems to be a good deal of agreement that, though he is an important artist, he has been called one of the most important artists alive, he is the last man who should have been chosen to decorate a capitalistic building.

IS BRINGING ATTENTION Gazette 7/8/33 Portrait of Christ Receives Praise and Condemnation

New York, August 6.—A portrait of Christ, now on exhibition at the Chicago World's Fair, is bringing much attention to the painter, Colonel Henry S. Todd.

Thousands of letters have been received. Some praise the painting. Others attack it as unconventional. Colonel Todd, a native of St. Louis who earned his title in the Intelligence Service during the War, says his figure of Christ is a composite type.

"Man of the land, a county preacher, the man in the street, something of everybody," he said.

Impressions at the Royal Academy Gazette May 17, 1933

My first impression of the Royal Academy was that it was rather reactionary, but perhaps that was only by contrast with my memory of "les fauves" of the Paris salon, for I am told that many people consider there are a great number of very "modern" pictures. I have even heard the opinion expressed that Mr. Glyn Philpot is the greatest mystic painter since Blake. Young Lord Melchett is very pleased with the Philpot portrait of him in slacks, the whole canvas, background and all, pervaded by a bright cold blue, but most people who remember Mr. Philpot's earlier manner and the rich organic-like tapestry of his color will regret the phase through which he is now, one hopes, passing. I prefer one of his earlier portraits to a hundred of such pictures as the "Three Fates."

The scene at the A Great Private View, that is Reunion, supposed to open the London season, was brilliant as ever. Up the staircase lined with potted roses and hydrangeas passed most of the well-known people in London. It is one of the most intimate of the great reunions, because beyond a few members of the diplomatic corps, it is a typically English gathering and comparatively few passing visitors are privileged to receive cards.

It is fashionable to decry the Royal Academy and to pose as a connoisseur by sniffing at the general level of excellence, but only a very carping critic could fail to find pleasure in very many of the pictures. The catalogue was as usual a model for all other catalogues and must make Parisians long for their Exhibition directors to take it as an example.

There is no "Picture of the Year" no canvas before which a crowd gathers. The hanging committee, who in many other instances have been rather unfortunate, as if juxtaposition in certain cases was by accident rather than design, have given that well-known painter, Gerald Kelly, pride of place in the long gallery for his portrait of Miss Anna Christine Thompson. In it the artist crosses swords with Boucher by painting his sitter in a very similar blue-grey taffeta period gown to that of the famous picture of Madame de Pompadour, and its size, and dexterity attract attention, though I prefer the same artist's masterly portrait of Dr. Eleanor Lodge, Principal of Westfield College, an exquisite study of a white-haired woman with fine, ascetic features, in grey silk academic robes with a background of her library shelves.

The Royal Family. The Royal have had, I suppose, more bad portraits painted of them than any of their subjects. They come off rather worse than usual, with the notable exception of the portrait of Prince George, by Simon Elwes, the talented young artist who painted one of Montreal's loveliest brides when she was a debutante, and of a charming portrait by Arthur Nowell of Her Majesty the Queen, who has shown her appreciation by buying it. The King, the Prince of Wales and the Duchess of York are not so lucky. Mr. Elwes is also exhibiting a clever portrait of his pretty wife, who is a daughter of Lord and Lady Rennell Rodd, and a masterly picture of the Earl of Airlie standing in full Highland dress against a blue-grey landscape.

As usual I made the acquaintance of several artists new to me, among them Miss Kate Oliver, who has an original technique, something on the same lines as that of the late Beatrice How, and who knows how to group and paint children. Her study of four bright-eyed children, called "Eyes," deserved all the attention it received. Canadians will be interested in the admirably-painted picture of the Italian room in the house of Mr. J. W. McConnell, by Richard Jack, who has also sent a portrait of his wife in a purple dress and another of the King of the Belgians.

Sir Charles Holmes, the late director of the National Gallery, has now found leisure to paint two attractive landscapes. Mr. C. Cundall is another successful landscape painter with three canvases on the line. His brother, who is a member of the staff of the Waterloo Place Branch of the Bank of Montreal, tells me that since he first sent in pictures some years ago he had never had one rejected.

Major Lessore, who appears to spend his time arranging exhibitions of other men's work in his tiny but famous gallery in Bruton Place, has sent in a limewood statue of St. Pancras, Martyr, that is placed not far from the colossal figure of Britannia, designed by Sargeant Jagger for a stone group on Thames House, Milbank.

Three visits to Burlington House left me with many impressions still vague and unprecipitated. A great deal of the work seemed derivative. Miss Sylvia Gosse's picture of the dancing negro was obviously inspired by Sickert. There were none of Campbell Taylor's cool, grey-green interiors, but several pictures by his imitators. The same thing might be said of Mr. William Nicholson, for there were many studies of still life with Chinese pottery and porcelain figures that might never have been painted in just that way if Nicholson had not perpetrated his famous "The Hundred Pots" and similar studies, on view at the moment in a loan collection shown at the Beaux Arts Galleries.

Among the canvases Pleasant over which people linger with most pleasure are those of Russell Flint. He has exercised the privilege of his new academical honors by sending in six pictures—an exquisite "Pilgrimage at Midsummer Dawn, Old Castle," and two other beautiful landscapes, "Spring" and "Low Tide at St. Malo," and three pictures of Spanish dancers, perhaps the most lovely being the water-color, "Castanets," of a group dancing on the shore, the diploma work deposited on his election as an academical. This will ultimately take its place in the Diploma gallery that is open to the public, so any visitor can go and see it.

In an age when the very young are so busy impressing the world with their prowess, it is of special interest to note the amazing work of that veteran artist, Mrs. Anne L. Swynnerton. She is, I believe, an octogenarian, but her portrait of Mrs. Scott Elliott, a middle-aged woman in a wide lace hat, is one of the most noteworthy portraits in the Academy. It is hung in the same room as the striking portrait of Maurice Codner, by R. G. Eves.

Philip Connard has sent ethereal designs for panels to decorate the walls in the house of some lucky owner. Clare Atwood has painted the very modern dining room of that famous young actor, John Gielgud. Henry Lamb has only one portrait, that of Geoffrey Marks, but I prefer it to any of Sir John Lavery's five.

There is no space to mention all the things that attracted one's attention. Mr. Edward Murray has painted a portrait of the Dean of Westminster in the robes of Dean of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath, the predominating red and pink shades reminding one of a marshmallow. Harold Knight, beside some rather cold interiors, has done an admirable portrait of the Bishop of Truro. I liked George Henry's picture of Chantonsbury Ring and James Gunn's portrait of Arthur Stannard Vernay. Another of Mr. Gunn's paintings, the portrait of the Deilus, the blind musician, is one of the big successes of the year, and was sold for a good price on the opening day. Sickert has a fine portrait of Diana Forbes Robertson, and Oswald Birley an excellent one of Mr. Neville Chamberlain.

Another name new to me was John Keating, whose magnificent portrait of Bethel Solomons, Master of the Rotunda Hospital, Dublin, should not have been so badly hung. But no hanging can disguise the consummate technique of the painting of the play of light on the surgeon's white linen coat and leather gloves.

Another interesting exhibitor was Peter Scott, son of the famous explorer, who has sent two studies of birds painted in the Japanese manner.

I have no space to enlarge on Mr. Badeley's engraving, nor on the work of Dorothy Hawkesley, Clara Klinghoffer, Melton Fisher, Rex Whistler, Reginald R. Tomlinson, or the late William McTaggart, whose "Harvest Moon" has just been purchased under the terms of the Chantrey bequest.

In the water color room I found much that was attractive—not least among the pictures those of that famous French artist, Lucien Simon, one of the few foreign artists to send in work. In the architectural room it was difficult to find anything modern. The designs for the new Foundling Hospital might have been done in Wren's day. Sir Edwin Lutyens' designs for the Thomas Bridge at Hampton Court, Sir Giles Gilbert Scott's design for Waterloo Bridge, and Joseph Emberton's design for the new Exhibition Hall at Olympia, were among the most attractive.

PLEASING DISPLAY BY J. W. MORRICE

Representative Home and Foreign Scenes Depicted at W. Scott & Sons

Among the many fine pictures by distinguished artists on view at the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, 1490 Drummond street, are a number by J. W. Morrice.

"Dario," a picture of a Venetian palace, is a magnificent piece of color with its rich red roofs, the rosy glow of sinking sun on white walls and the deep green water. A quaint old bit of earlier Montreal is preserved in a painting of a former house on Redpath street from the deep snows of a good old-fashioned winter. A horse and sleigh adds a further touch of local color.

Another very effective winter scene is "Le Bac de Quebec" showing the ferry ploughing through the ice-filled waters of the lower St. Lawrence. Snow-covered hills and icy water present a wide gamut of cold blues and greens. The brilliance of the southern sun is transferred to canvas with equal skill in an unusual view of Gibraltar. The mass of the rock rises starkly in the background, the foreground being occupied with a dazzling sandy road and an effective group of Spanish figures.

A painting of a park in Cuba is reminiscent of Gauguin in its gay color and its decorative quality. Pink-sailed fishing boats, on an emerald and sapphire lake topped by purplish clouds make another striking canvas. In the lower key of the artist's earlier work is a charming picture of a maple sugar camp.

Fin de saison; un peu de tout

Esquisses et aquarelles à l'Arts Club.—
Tableau hongrois à la Galerie des Arts.
— Collection complète de gravures françaises.—Fin d'année
aux Beaux-Arts

Questions d'authenticité

L'ARTS CLUB, rue Victoria, s'achèvera samedi une petite exposition d'esquisses et d'aquarelles qui ne manque pas d'intérêt. Le public est admis à la visiter tous les jours, samedi excepté, de 10 h. à midi et de 3 à 5 h. p.m.

Les petits-pouces d'esquisses de Guy Brock sont probablement ce qui retiennent le plus l'attention. Il est très intéressant de voir comment l'artiste a su fixer à la peinture à l'huile dans des espaces restreints toute une gamme d'impressions de voyages en Europe, aux Etats-Unis et au Canada. Ce ne sont que des esquisses, de rapides suggestions, où les bâtisses et maisons paraissent avoir la place d'honneur. Mais le jeu de l'ombre et de la lumière y est habilement observé.

Au premier rang des quelques aquarellistes qui exposent à l'Arts Club on retrouve Paul Caron et ses scènes familières de vieilles maisons, de ruelles anciennes où traînent le cheval résigné et le berlot fameux. Dessin et coloris sont délicats; les teintes douces sont diffusées dans une atmosphère paisible.

On trouve d'intéressantes études d'artistes-amateurs. Chez Lincoln Morris prime la variété des sujets; chez P.-T. Kaelin, l'économie des moyens; chez Herbert Raine, le mouvement bien observé dans les marines; chez J.-Melville Miller, une certaine solidité de traitement.

Don de la Hongrie

La petite note ajoutée en marge de la critique régulière, jeudi dernier, sur le tableau de Janos Viski donné à la Galerie des Arts, a paru échapper à l'attention, pour avoir été relégué dans un coin de par les exigences de la mise en page. Il vaut de souligner le beau geste du Dr Charles Winter, consul général de Hongrie à Montréal, qui a lui-même acheté et donné à la collection permanente de l'Art Association cette toile de Viski intitulée "Boeufs au labour". Elle représente avec un vigoureux contraste de lumière et d'ombre une scène brossée avec fermeté. Le don du Dr Winter ajoute à la Galerie des Arts un spécimen bien représentatif d'une école jusqu'à maintenant non représentée dans la collection permanente. Et l'on conviendra que la toile hongroise fait excellente figure à côté des autres.

Janos Viski, né en 1887, en Hongrie, étudia dans son pays natal et visita plus tard de nombreux pays, dont le Mexique et l'Amérique du sud où il paraît avoir fixé ses prédilections. Il est bien connu chez les Hongrois et à l'étranger, surtout comme peintre animalier.

Gravures et gravures

Avec la fin des expositions tenues ailleurs dans la province, M. N.-Y. Guillou, de la Gravure Française, ch. 422, édifice Old Birk's, 1240 rue Union, est rentré en possession de centaines de gravures et pointes-sèches qu'il avait prêtées aux divers centres urbains, à Québec en particulier. Nul moment ne saurait être mieux choisi, par conséquent, pour se payer le luxe d'une heure intéressante à contempler et à se faire expliquer les oeuvres de Luigini, au coloris sommaire et saisissant, de LaFitte aux marines paisibles, de Bastog, artiste aux teintes délicates, de Brunelleschi, maître du pochoir brillant, de Grés, évocateur de pastorales, de Lambrecht, chanteur des bleus méditerranéens, de Charlet et Hugard, dont les scènes familières et vivantes font rêver, des Haumont, paysagistes qui ont découvert les secrets du soleil sur les routes lumineuses de Bretagne ou dans les jardins en fleurs. Gravures, aussi, en brun, en blanc et noir; visions de cathédrales aux mille facettes; coins de rues antiques, sous-bois pleins, et pont célèbres. Les cent charmes de Bruges, la ville flamande dont rêvent tous les artistes. Puis Icart, tout Icart. Ses héroïnes d'opéras et ses dernières créations, comme "Mémoire de cigarette", "Cocktail", "Hortensias", toute cette gamme des grâces féminines de boudoir.

Les copies sont légion

D'une lettre de John-Joseph Cusack, importateur de tableaux anciens et fin connaisseur, un passage qui, pour dater un peu, n'a rien perdu de son intérêt:

"A mon avis, il n'existe pas au Canada cinquante oeuvres des vieux Maîtres de la Renaissance. De l'école flamande il n'y en a pas plus que dix et de l'école espagnole pas plus que cinq. On nous inonde d'impressionnistes et de copistes formés aux écoles artistiques de Barbizon et de Batignolles. L'école canadienne au large subit l'influence de l'impressionnisme, qui est plus scientifique qu'artistique, — car nous manquons de réalisme et d'équilibre. En tant que coloristes, les artistes canadiens sont divers."

"De copies le monde est plein, surtout celles de l'école française. Ainsi, aux douanes de New-York, de Corots seulement il y a eu plus de 32,000 entrées enregistrées durant les dix dernières années. Paris abonde en artistes qui copient excellentement, sans recourir à la peinture Tempéra ou aux toiles refaites à la main. Ils peuvent imiter ingénieusement un Rubens, un Lebrun, un Boucher, un Watteau, et facilement un Monticelli. Je suis sûr qu'il y a au moins 200 supposés Monticelli à Montréal. Si vous poussez une pointe au Louvre, un matin clair de printemps, vous trouverez un grand nombre de peintres copiant ici et là n'importe lequel des vieux maîtres exposés et s'essayant même à la "Joconde". Quatre copies de la "Joconde" ont été vendues à New-York comme étant l'original de Léonard de Vinci!"

Soit dit en passant

La date de fin d'année à l'Ecole des Beaux-Arts de Montréal est fixée à samedi prochain, le 20 mai. L'exposition des travaux des élèves aura lieu à partir du 1er juin pour une quinzaine.

Dit M. Henri Fabien dans une lettre récente: "J'ai fait moi-même la critique des expositions de la Montréal Art Association, il y a une vingtaine d'années, pour essayer d'intéresser le public à l'art, mais comme j'analysais les oeuvres à un point de vue trop technique, je me suis mis à dos, sans le vouloir, bien des peintres et des sculpteurs."

Oui-dà! Nous nous sommes précisément défendu plusieurs fois de faire des analyses techniques. Le coin artistique n'a d'autre but que d'éveiller l'attention publique, de la diriger tout doucement, sans mettre en cause toutes les chicanes d'écoles ni les affaires du métier.

Il est étonnant de recevoir du fond de la Floride une lettre écrite de l'écriture hachée de Suzor-Côté lui-même pour nous dire qu'il suit avec plaisir, dans la "Presse", tout ce qui regarde l'art et les artistes.

L'espace nous manque pour commenter, même brièvement, l'explication mystico-philosophique que Max Shultz, d'Outremont, nous a remise sur son tableau récent au Salon du Printemps, dont nous avons avoué, il vous en souvient, n'avoir pas pénétré le sens obscur. Cela s'instituait la "Toison d'or". Mais, ayant repassé un peu de Nietzsche, nous y reviendrons à tête reposée.

Et, au fait, toujours rien à propos des seize tableaux disparus du Salon du Printemps.

La période des expositions est pratiquement close maintenant. Ce sera bientôt, pour nous le temps d'entreprendre avec nos lecteurs une visite à travers les studios, ceux des artistes canadiens-français surtout. Qu'on ne se gêne pas de nous fournir tous les renseignements possibles.

CHARACTER TELLS IN ARTIST'S WORK

Gazette June 1.
Art Is Fixing Ideals, Says
Independent Art Association Speaker

A fine character as well as an eye for beauty was a necessity in the making of a great artist, members of the Independent Art Association were told by Lieut.-Col. C. Adams, at their annual convocation and musicale. The event was held yesterday in the club rooms of the Royal Empire Society in the Sun Life Building.

Col. Adams, who was recently elected honorary president of the association, stressed particularly in the course of his address the importance of the plastic arts as a means of fixing ideals in two and three dimensions. "The ideal always comes first," he said. "Man wonders, then he thinks and then he practices." It was important also that the artist should be an individualist. "We stand or fall by our own work. It is as individuals that we add or subtract from the sum of life." In closing the speaker

Symons Paints The Apostles In Lounge Suits

Star May 31, 1933.

LONDON, May 31.—Mark Symons, whose Royal Academy paintings of religious subjects have created considerable comment during the past few years owing to the fact that the figures surrounding Christ have all been dressed in modern garb, has prepared a similar subject which he is submitting to the Academy this year.

The title of the picture is "The Last Supper." It depicts the Saviour seated at a table, on which is a modern repast, surrounded by the Twelve Apostles in up-to-date lounge suits, collars, and ties.

The Apostles are really portraits of people whom Mr. Symons has met, and include Mr. H. Yates, art master of Reading University, Dr. Tozer, medical officer of Peppard Sanatorium, near Reading and a number of students.

In the foreground are faces representing evil with a cross raised among them. There is also a steel-helmeted soldier, and a number of bayonets are also visible. Among the faces can be read the words: "We will not have this man to rule over us."

Judas is seen being offered silver; he has a halter round his neck, with which he is being dragged from the table.

Mr. Symons said: "The picture is symbolic of the war between Christ and anti-Christ. I have endeavored to bring 'The Last Supper' up to date."

"To one would expect a fisherman to attend supper in his working clothes, while the tax-gatherer would certainly be well dressed. As in all my other paintings of this nature, I have depicted people I have met in every-day life."

"For the character of Judas I took no one in particular. I wanted a bald head, so I looked in the mirror and copied the top of my own. The rest of this figure is quite imaginary."

Epstein's Latest, "Primeval Gods," Shocks London

JACOB Epstein's "Primeval Gods," the five-ton sculpture, seven feet by 6½ feet, is creating something of a sensation in London and shocking the "Philistines." The artist has been working on it intermittently since 1918. It is on view at the Leicester Galleries, where Epstein's "Genesis" drew shocked thousands at the last show.

"Primeval Gods" is a centrepiece, in two vast cemented slabs of Hopwood stone, is carved in deep relief on two sides—one with a male and two infant figures; and the other with the spread-eagled male figure known as the Sun God. It could be better judged in a park or on a building.

Epstein, master of plastic sculpture, was born in New York, of Russian-Polish parents, and is 53 years of age. He resides in London.

His record dates back to 1923 when he was 11 years old.

GRAPHIC ARTS OF BRITAIN ON SHOW

Gazette 9/6/33

Loan Exhibition of British Prints Displayed at Art Gallery

REPRESENTATIVE WORKS

Widest Variety in Style and Subject Features Collection —Lithographs Also Seen

What is probably one of the most representative collections of the graphic arts of Great Britain is to be seen at the Art Association this week. This is the loan exhibition of contemporary British prints which is being shown here through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada. The list includes practically every representative British artist who practices in this medium.

To one who views the collection hastily, it is impossible to begin to do it justice. Every exhibitor, there are more than a hundred of them, is a master and was chosen to represent his country as such. The etchings offer the widest possible variety both in style and subject. Established conservatives like Frank Brangwyn are seen with moderns like John Austin. There are woodcuts influenced by cubism and symbolism. There is the beautifully etched detail of F. L. Griggs's English churches.

The magnificent etchings of E. S. Lumsden, Oriental sea scenes, will be certain to attract the attention of the connoisseur. Lumsden is represented by two pictures, "The Burning Ghat" and "Central Ghat." Both of them have a flair for the picturesque as well as a wonderful working out of detail. Black and white as they are, they suggest color.

G. L. Brocklehurst is represented by three etchings of girls' heads. They are full of character and charm and worked out with a bold, strong hand. Russell Flint's Spanish scenes are vivid. They suggest at once the austerity and color of the national type. "Spanish Wheelwrights" has a fine sweep and is also brilliantly executed. "Clatter and Whirl, Granada" represents a group of dancing girls and musicians. The element of fantasy inherent in such a subject is admirably brought out.

VARIOUS MASTERPIECES.

Stanley Anderson's "Durer's House, Nuremberg" is notable for its balance and also for the way in which the atmosphere of the old German town is captured. Robert Austin shows himself at once a master of delicate etching and strong engraving. Edmund Blampied's satirical studies are in the manner of Daumier. Muirhead Bone makes a great showing with "Manhattan Excavation." Arthur Briscoe specializes in marines. Enid Butcher is a keen student of Breton types. Sir D. Y. Cameron has a splendidly etched landscape in "Killundine." Francis Dodd draws finely. Dame Laura Knight shows strength and imagination in "Trio Gymnastique."

Woodcuts and wood engravings include clever humor in modern style by John Austin in "The Barber of Seville." Robert Gibbings does neat work in portraying deep sea fish. Gertrude Hermes is a symbolist. Eric Dagleish's animal and bird subjects are cleverly handled. Clare Leighton does lumber scenes and does them with much force and character. In "Jonah," Pamela Nathan shows how well a crowd may be handled in the wood cut medium.

Something novel is offered in a collection of lithographs. The collection contains examples by Augustus Johns, Robert Austin and Frank Brangwyn. Other lithographers who deserve special mention are John Copley who manages to infuse a great deal of fantasy into his work, Edmund Blampied, C. R. W. Nevinson, Sir William Rothenstein whose lithograph of Robert Bridges, the poet, is an admirable character study, and Charles Shannon.

$30,300 CLAIMED FOR OIL PAINTINGS

Damage of $30,300 to six oil paintings during a fire in the premises of John Joseph Cusack are claimed by the New York Art Corporation in an action in the Superior Court against the American Home Fire Assurance Company. The paintings formed a part of a group of nine, claimed to be worth $45,000 and which Cusack had acquired from the Art Corporation for purposes of reselling them.

When the paintings were delivered to Cusack, they were insured with the defendant company against loss by fire, theft and water, it is contended. Some time later a fire occurred in Cusack's house on Bernard avenue and the six pictures were damaged, it is claimed.

Engravings At the Art Association Star June 7, 1933.

A collection of more than two hundred British prints, which includes etchings, dry-points, aquatints, woodcuts, and lithographs, open today in one of the upstairs galleries of the Art Association of Montreal.

Among the engravings, etchings and dry-points there are good specimens of the work of Muirhead Bone, Russell Flint, Sir D. Y. Cameron, E. S. Lumsden and Malcolm Osborne. Prints of buildings and streets, done with a good deal of detail and with much depth and realism of tone, have come into fashion again; good work of this kind is done by Henry Rushbury, Ian Strang and William Washington and there are prints by them here as well as by Francis Dodd, Austin Frederick, L. G. Brammer and Job Nixon.

Some of the lithographs are among the best work in the collection. Three by Brangwyn are outstanding; large prints of figure subjects, full of good composition and action. Two by John Copley are good in the same way, and there is a striking print of fishing boats at night by C. W. Nevinston. Works by Augustus John and Charles Shannon are characteristic, as is one by Sir William Rothenstein.

The woodcuts and wood engravings are on the whole the least successful part of the exhibition, in spite of some very good works by Clare Leighton, Robert Gibbings, Gwen-dolen Raverat and others not quite so good by Eric Daglish and Ethelbert White.

LAURIER'S FORMER HOME NOW MUSEUM

Historic Landmark in Arthabaska Restored to Represent Quebec Life

Sir Wilfrid Laurier's old home in Arthabaska in the Eastern Townships will soon be opened as a museum.

Mme. J. E. Perrault has been instrumental in having this historic landmark restored and so much care has been taken to make the reconstruction exact that even the original wall-papers have been repaired. Many of the pictures which hung in Sir Wilfrid's time are still in place, including a portrait of Lady Laurier by Suzor-Cote.

In Sir Wilfrid's study his writing desk and a second desk which he used for keeping papers stand as they did in his day.

Other rooms in the house will be devoted to a collection of things illustrating the life of the countryside and the rural and domestic arts of Quebec. In one room is a complete collection of Laliberte's famous statuettes. Brief descriptions will be appended to each, telling of the role played by the type depicted. In many instances the rural characters and occupations portrayed are rapidly vanishing.

It is hoped that the collection of Laurier souvenirs in the museum will be enlarged by the addition of other gifts to the many already received and anyone who has anything which they would be willing to donate is requested to write to Mme. Perrault at Arthabaska.

The house, a charming old red brick edifice, stands in a pleasant garden with a background of rolling hills.

CANADIAN ART ATTAINS CELEBRITY IN WORLD Star 5/6/33

Gordon Pfeiffer Praises Works in Quebec Speech

QUEBEC, June 6.—(C.P.)—Canadian art is rapidly becoming widely known throughout the world and is achieving a distinctive touch of its own, Gordon Pfeiffer, Quebec artist, told the members of a local service club today.

By means of a series of lantern slides procured from the National Gallery at Ottawa, Mr. Pfeiffer showed the gradual change which has taken place in Canadian painting during the past 50 years.

"Today's paintings are becoming more easily recognized as Canadian; they are strong, forceful and representative of this great country, and are becoming more and more popular in England and on the continent," the speaker said.

Modern Alarms Catch Burglars

Electrical Devices Installed by Some Banks Make Robbery
Practically Impossible

DON BLACK

THE AMAZING extent to which banks and other commercial institutions are protected against hold-ups is set forth in Popular Mechanics by Don Black.

"Suppose a robber sticks a gun into a bank cashier's face. The cashier turns pale but obeys his commands and makes no sound. The robber pockets the wad of banknotes handed over and backs away. It was all so quietly accomplished, so simple and easy he almost laughs—until he reaches the door and meets a shotgun squad from a police station.

"When the cashier handed him the money, a green light had flashed on a big switch-board several blocks away. Instantly a buzzer sounded and the bank's address was spelled out on a ticker tape. Almost before the currency changed hands a fast car was roaring toward the scene. Radio patrols of the police department likewise began bearing down in that direction. It was the way the money was handled that tipped off the robbery. Any way the bills are handled in a normal manner touches off the contact. Every time the cashier opens the drawer or picks up the money during the ordinary business day he does so in an awkward, unnatural way. When held up, he need only hand over the bills in a natural way, with no suspicious movements, to turn in an alarm.

"If the robber had demanded the key and unlocked the door of the cashier's cage, another silent alarm would have been on its way. That key has a tiny telltale point that makes electrical contact if inserted in the normal way. The cage is wired too, in case someone should try to climb it. Then there are foot buttons, triggers released by the upward thrust of a toe, coil springs, special keys on cash registers, and a dozen more ingenious contrivances.

"Bank vaults now are protected by the 'phonet-alarm,' newest of the sonic devices. It has ears so keen that a mouse gnawing on paper will switch on the telltale light at headquarters. The faintest noise, greatly amplified, is relayed to the board. While primarily a burglar alarm, it was designed also for the unfortunate cashier or clerk locked in accidentally or by a ruthless hold-up man. Such an official might be injured or gagged, but his groans over the alarm would almost certainly effect immediate release.

"Every means of entry in a building under modern protection has its electric foil. Once the mechanisms are set at night the slightest touch clicks off an alarm somewhere. There are wired walls, window glass and sill alarms, invisible light rays that a mere shadow will short-circuit, infra-red devices, the photo-electric cell and many other subtle traps.

"Every marauder knows that if a night watchman in a modern building fails to 'ring in' at scheduled times, there'll be an immediate investigation. But nowadays the watchman has a frequently changed time interval between check-ins, and to defeat a gunman who is forcing him to keep on with his rounds, he need only delay his call or ring at wrong intervals. Then there's one patrol box, looking just like the others, that he never touches on a normal round. Marching along with a gun in his ribs, however, the watchman inserts his key in this fake box and immediately a light flashes down at headquarters. Or, if surprised outside the building, he may pick a key off his ring and hand it over. It opens the door and the burglar walks in—and an alarm is given. The key is just a little different from the one usually employed, but it would need a micrometer to tell the difference."

MUSEUM TECHNIQUE June 12, 1933 Gazette Eleven Registrations for Bilingual Summer Course

Eleven registrations for the bilingual summer course in general museum technique, which is being conducted by the department of extra-mural relations of McGill University, have been received to date. It was announced yesterday by Colonel Wilfrid Bovey, director of the department. The course opens a week from Monday.

To date most of those registered are French-speaking citizens of this province and included among these is Abbe Arthur Maheux, general secretary of Laval University, Quebec City. One westerner has arranged to take the course, Mrs. Maud Bowman, of Edmonton, Alta., having registered.

The course is being offered in accordance with the recommendations of Sir Henry Miers and F. S. Markham's report on Canadian museums, and will be under the direction of E. L. Judah, technical adviser and secretary to the university museum committee. The course will be divided into nine lectures and seven museum demonstrations in the various museums of the university, and in the Chateau de Ramezay.

Through the courtesy of the Art Association of Montreal and the Chateau de Ramezay, those taking the course will be given member privileges.

PRIVATE VIEW OF R.A.

The private view, attended by Their Majesties and many members of the Royal Family and a distinguished company of guests, only members of the English daily press were admitted. On the opening day General Sir Walter and Lady Braithwaite gave a reception in the rooms of the Governor's House of Chelsea Hospital. It is always a pleasure to visit this beautiful old Wren building and cross the low colonnade through the doric portico into the reception rooms hung with the famous Kneller portraits of Charles and his lovely wife, Catharine of Braganza. Among the Canadian guests present were Mrs. Hay, of Hamilton, and her daughter, Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Burstall, Miss Rosemary Burstall, and the Hon. Mrs. Francis Erskine.

The old Chelsea pensioners are always to the fore on these occasions and their scarlet coats lend a lovely note of color in the old courtyard now gay with yellow laburnums.

"The English are a funny nation," as a learned judge remarked a few days ago when a Belgian was found to be receiving an old age pension from the Government. He might have quoted the paradox that in an age when every part of the Empire is apparently longing to be free as air and one hears ill-considered talk of "the right to secede," the idea of Empire seems to have taken deeper root than ever. Yesterday there was a perfect spate of activities in connection with the Empire. The dinner of the Royal Empire Society was a great success, the presence of Prince George ensuring a very large number of guests, among them the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, Sir Edward and Lady Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Ferguson, Lord and Lady Lloyd, Rear Admiral Arthur Bromley, Viscount and Viscountess Ellbank, Lady Goid-Adams, Sir Benjamin Robertson, Dame Meriel Talbot, Sir Stephen Tallents, Sir

VISITOR CRITICAL OF AMERICAN ART

Star 13/6/33
Norman Lear, Russian
Artist, Arrives to Paint
Laurentian Scenes

Come to establish a studio in Montreal, and with his tweed hat, bizarre cape and distinguished beard branding him as very much the artist, Norman Lear, Russian painter, posed for the cameramen this morning, walked nimbly down the Alouia gangplank, and declared he did not think much of American art.

Mr. Lear, who has just held an exhibition of his own canvasses in Spain, was a striking looking figure aboard the Cunarder when she docked this morning at eight.

He was asked what he thought of American art.

ART IS LONG

"I do not think much of it," he said. "Art takes a long time. This is a new country, a new continent. There is not the same maturity here."

"Have you ever seen any Canadian painting?"

"I have, and I am afraid I cannot regard it highly either."

If Mr. Lear was uncharitable to American and Canadian canvasses, he did not compliment his native Russia either.

"There are no great Russian painters," he said, when asked to name the greatest Russian painter. "Of course, some of the primitive art is good, but no great Russian painter as we understand it exists or has existed."

"Has Soviet Russia sponsored art at all?"

"Only posters—nothing much else. You could not say it had done much for art."

"Is there any affinity between latitude and painting?"

"Not altogether, for although it is true that most of the great painters have come from southern climates, look at the Dutch. It's cold enough in Holland, and yet they have had some great artists. I do think, however, that in the south, where there has been more leisure, and life has not been so hard, art comes more easily."

"Then art is found where the surroundings are more pleasant—more artistic."

"Undoubtedly. You must have artistic environment to have artists."

HARD ON CRITICS

Asked what he thought of art critics, Mr. Lear made a wry face. He implied they did little good.

"They talk about theory," he said. "But no artist paints by theory. He paints what he feels, what he sees. He must, to borrow an expression, paint with his bones."

The subject veered to the Mexican, Rivera, whose murals caused so much hubbub in Radio City recently. "He is a very good decorator, a very good man at murals, but not a great artist, for instance, he does not paint like Cezanne."

It appears that Mr. Lear had done sculpture, and so he was asked what he thought of Epstein.

"Epstein is just like a bad boy—a mischievous boy. It is interesting to see his work, but I do not think he is making any permanent contribution to sculpture."

Mr. Lear will establish a studio in Montreal for the summer, and hopes to paint some scenes in the Laurentians.

ART ASSOCIATION OFFERS TWO PRIZES

Makes Announcement of Competition as Trustees of William Brymner Fund
Gazette
FOR BRITISH SUBJECTS

Fund Instituted by Friends and One-time Pupils of Former Director of Association Schools

Terms of competition for the William Brymner Prizes for painting in either oil or water color were announced yesterday by the Art Association of Montreal as trustees of the fund. The fund was instituted in 1928 by friends and former pupils of William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., who for many years was director of the schools of the Art Association, numbering among his students many who have made their mark in art both here and abroad. Mr. Brymner, who was a past president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, retired from directorship of the schools due to ill health and died later in England.

The terms of the contest, issued over the signature of Miss Ethel M. Pinkerton, secretary, read as follows:

"The Art Association of Montreal as trustees of the William Brymner Fund (instituted by friends and former pupils of his in 1928) offer for competition one prize of two hundred dollars and one of one hundred dollars to be known as the William Brymner Prizes, to artists of either sex domiciled in the Dominion of Canada.

"A competitor—

"(1) Must be a British subject either by right of birth or by operation of law and have resided in Canada during at least two years prior to the date of his application.

"(2) He must be under thirty years of age on the 1st January, 1934, and satisfactory proof of age will be required.

"(3) He must submit two pictures (framed), either in oil or in water color and must have them delivered free of charge at the Art Association, 1379 Sherbrooke Street West, Montreal, on or before 15th January, 1934. The unpacking and repacking of the pictures will be done at the Art Association.

"(4) An exhibition of the works submitted for competition will be held at the Art Association of Montreal. The date will be announced later.

"(5) Pictures entered for competition which in the opinion of the jury are not of sufficient merit, may be debarred from the competition at the discretion of the jury.

"(6) The jury will be composed of four artists and the president of the Art Association as chairman. Its decisions shall be final.

"(7) Should no work appear of sufficient merit, the prizes may not be awarded.

"(8) Pictures awarded prizes shall remain the property of the artist.

"(9) Application forms can be obtained from the secretary of the Art Association, and must be returned filled in and signed, on or before the 15th January, 1934.

"(10) No picture will be entered in the competition unless an application form has been received on the above date.

"(11) All possible care will be taken of the works sent for exhibition, but the association will not be responsible for any loss, damage, or accident that may occur by fire, theft or otherwise. Artists who wish to have their works insured, must do so at their own expense."

The application form is in effect a declaration by the painters that they are British subjects by right of birth or by operation of law. It also requires details as to places of study, where their works have been exhibited and assurance that the works entered in the competition are by them. . . . both in conception and execution, and produced without assistance of any kind." The painters further warrant the truth of their statements concerning their eligibility and agree . . . that should any be found untrue, the Art Association of Montreal shall have the right to reject my application and if awarded a prize to annul and cancel the award . . .

CONTEST FOR ARTISTS

MONTREAL, June 15.—Announcement of a competition of interest to art students throughout Canada is made today by the Art Association of Montreal as trustees of the William Brymner fund. Established in memory of the late William Brymner, well-known Montreal painter, by friends and former pupils, the fund will provide two prizes, one of $200 and the other of $100 open to artists of either sex domiciled in Canada and under 30 years of age.

Short Biography of Robt. Holmes, Painter Of Wild Flowers Star 20/6/33

Water Colors of Posies Gave Impression That They Were Growing in Their Woodland Haunts

THREE years ago Robert Holmes, artist, died. Alice Wetherell writes of the painter of wild flowers in The Challenger, a religious publication: "One day in 1859 a young milliner of the Kawartha Lakes district, gave up trimming bonnets with artificial flowers, and settled down to house-keeping with her young husband in Cannington. She planted seeds and bulbs and her garden became the best in the village. Not much wonder that wee Robert imbibed love of beauty. It was therefore not so strange that when he drew pictures for the first number of the Art Students' League Calendar, he should choose as his subject the back doorway to that house, his mother inside washing dishes, and outside, directly in her line of vision, the grapevine, the tall lilies and poppies massed against the walls.

"Not even remarkable that the lad, brought up with such a background, should finally become Canada's most distinguished painter of flowers, and the greatest painter in America of wild flowers in their native setting.

"The fireweed, loose stripe orchid, Indian pipe in Holmes' water colors are never stiff posies but always seem to be growing in the woodland haunts where he found them. He alone seemed to have the power to put this subtle sense of life into what are usually regarded as 'still-life' pictures. Yet it took weeks of work to picture that spirit that made you smell the perfume and feel the breeze as he did.

"He was a student of the Toronto Art Society and of the Royal College of Art in London. He taught art in Fergus, Elora, Stratford, Hamilton and Toronto. He chose Canadian wood flowers for his designing classes as a peculiarly native Canadian motif on which to base their work. With the words 'flowers' on his lips he died, and according to his wish is buried in a little plot beside the woods where he so often wandered as a boy.

Finds Fair Too Futuristic

McGill Official Also Discovers Chicago Exhibition To Be Too Hot for Comfort

IF interested only in traditional art stay away from Chicago this summer for the World's Fair caters only to those who have an interest in the ultra-modern and the futuristic, stated E. Lionel Judah, secretary of the general museums' committee at McGill, on his return to the university after spending a few days in Chicago where he attended the annual meeting of the American Museums' Association in his capacity as chairman of the technical section.

RE-ELECTED CHAIRMAN

Mr. Judah, the only Canadian holding office in the association, was re-elected chairman of his section during the meeting. For the first time the meeting will come to Canada next year, as the annual conference is scheduled for Toronto next summer. Mr. Judah also attended the meeting of the American Federation of Art.

When Mr. Judah was walking about the grounds it was 100 degrees in the shade. It was considerably too hot for comfort; so hot, that men everywhere were shedding their coats, but even this did not avail much as the asphalt-covered roadways made the place like an oven.

Paintings of High Order, But No One Outstanding—Passengers on Liner Montrose

Returning holiday tourists and visitors from Great Britain and the Continent arrived yesterday morning in the Canadian Pacific liner Montrose from Southampton and Cherbourg. Richard Jack, R.A., A.R.C.A., the well-known painter who resides in Montreal for several months each year, returned with Mrs. Jack from England, where he attended the Royal Academy exhibition at Burlington House, three of his own canvases being hung in that famous annual showing. Mr. Jack said that there did not appear to be any "picture of the year" at the Royal Academy this summer. "The paintings were of a very high order, but no picture appeared to grip the public's imagination beyond all others, as has been the case in many exhibitions." Among Mr. Jack's own pictures at the Academy was a portrait of the King of the Belgians and his picture of the Italian room in the Montreal residence of J. W. McConnell.

Australian Artist Says Nowhere In World Can Student Get Training Paris Gives

MRS. Phillips Fox, widow of one of Australia's great painters and herself an artist of distinction, has just returned to Melbourne, Australia. During the seven years that have elapsed since her last visit, Mrs. Phillips Fox has worked in Majorca, Savoy, Nice, and Paris. One of her paintings was bought by the French Government and hung in Rouen Gallery; three others were hung this year in the Paris Salon. The diploma of honor was awarded her at the Bordeaux Exhibition for a large-size picture of Sydney, called "Manly."

"There have been many tragedies as a result of students arriving on the Continent with too little money," she said in an interview. "Yet there is nowhere else where they can get the training Paris gives. We all need to fight for a return of the old Greek spirit in art. Certainly some modern sculpture is very fine, but among our artists are those who believe one need not work hard to succeed." A pleasant feature of this year's Royal Academy, she said, was the return of the "flower" picture. There were many more such studies than had been shown last year, and most were sold. "Little" pictures were also in demand, and in these an emphasis of essentials, rather than a mass of detail, was a characteristic. Open and Connard both painted them. One thing the struggle of the new ways in art had taught us, said Mrs. Fox, was to try to get the point of view of the artist before pronouncing on his picture. It was only the exaggerated modern art that was bad; there was also much magnificent work. On the Continent, too, modern architecture was impressive.

An Impending Apology.

"From the point of view of easy disposal the thief was far wiser, for portraits of well known Montrealers would be awkward things to get rid of." - Canadian Paper.

NEED FOR MUSEUMS STRESSED BY ABBE

Government Support for Institutions Urged by St. Sulpice Director

SUMMER COURSE OPENS

General Museum Technique Dealt With in Classes

McGill Gazette 7-6-33

Montreal's need for more museums and for their support by the Government was brought out by Abbe Olivier Maurault, director, External of St. Sulpice, in a lecture on "The Future of Museums and the Nation" at the formal opening of the bilingual summer course in general museum technique which is being given at McGill University under the auspices of the department of extra-mural relations this week.

Montreal's supply of museums was pitifully small, the galleries of the Art Association, the Chateau de Ramezay and the McCord Museum being the only ones available to the public, Abbe Maurault pointed out.

From an educational standpoint museums had a magnificent contribution to make to a nation's culture, the speaker stated. "If it be true that 70 per cent. of the things we know have been seen by us, and 30 per cent. only have been heard, it is evident that museums should be established everywhere," he said.

There were, Abbe Maurault continued, four different kinds of museums that every city should have—museums of history, of natural history, industrial museums and art galleries. But in Montreal, unfortunately, there was an appalling indifference to this need. "It is," he said, "almost incredible that a city of more than 1,200,000 souls should not be able to show more than three public museums on all its territory. Look now at a guide of New York or Boston or Philadelphia and compare: You shall feel ashamed for your city and country!" Even small cities of the United States had more and better equipped museums than the metropolis of Canada. "It is time, I believe for our city councillors and for the members of our provincial Government to reflect on this cruel inferiority."

"A museum may start on a basis of private enterprise and generosity," Abbe Maurault continued, "but it cannot progress steadily and keep abreast of the times, if it is not endowed with Governmental subsidies."

NEED OF YOUNG NATION.

Museums were particularly necessary to a young nation in the making, Abbe Maurault stated. Other Canadian cities had appreciated this fact, but Montreal still lagged behind. "We very badly need public spirit in Montreal," he said. "One means of acquiring this spirit is to study history. That is why we should have in this city a large bureau of archives where students could go and work. Our nation has not sprung into existence by a sort of spontaneous generation: it has roots in the past. We have ancestors, we have customs of our own, we even have—or rather we have had—a particular and charming architecture."

Without museums illustrating these traditions, it would be impossible for the country to show the stranger what its genius really was. "We should have here, on the spot, some elegant and well-equipped building, where the serious student from the outside world could study and learn to understand our national character by studying the remnants of our beautiful past and the productions of our present days," Abbe Maurault declared.

In the opening address, Col. Bovey referred to the fact that to merit the title of museums an institution had to be more than a mere collection of things. They had to be related and their significance had to be quite clearly indicated. A bilingual course, such as this one, was, in his recollection, an innovation; and he felt sure that it not only encouraged cultural development but proved a further link between the two races.

Col. Bovey paid grateful tribute to E. L. Judah, of the university library committee, who organized the course and to Dr. Leon Lortie for his generous assistance as interpreter. He also thanked the organizations which were co-operating, La Societe d'Archeologie et Numismatique and the Montreal Art Association.

Mr. Judah extended an invitation to the members of the course to have tea with him and Mrs. Judah at their home on Friday afternoon. Over 30 students have registered for the course.

ILL AT SUMMER HOME

Was Removed From St. Andrews-by-the-Sea to Chipman Memorial Hospital at St. Stephen

George Horne Russell, R.C.A., of Montreal, well-known as a portrait painter and as an interpreter of the sea and Maritime Province coves and harbors, died yesterday morning in the Chipman Memorial Hospital at St. Stephen, N.B. A Montreal specialist arrived on Saturday, but efforts to save the painter's life were of no avail. He, with his wife and son, had been at his summer home at St. Andrews-by-the-Sea, N.B., since late in May. Interment will take place at St. Andrews on Tuesday afternoon.

George Horne Russell was born at Banff, Scotland, and in due course underwent a rigorous training for his profession as painter. Study at the Aberdeen Art School and at the South Kensington Art School, London, was followed by courses under Andrew Burnett, Professor Alphonse Legros, the talented painter-etcher, and Sir George Reid, the eminent Scottish artist. It was in 1890 that Mr. Horne Russell came to Canada and settled in Montreal where he opened a studio and identified himself with the artistic life of the city. His was the more or less common lot of the painter—years of hard work to become established, but his skill as a portrait painter duly won him recognition and very few of the annual exhibitions of the Royal Canadian Academy and the Art Association of Montreal did not contain one or more examples of his talent in this genre. Leading citizens in the city and beyond sat to him and his reputation grew.

LOVER OF THE SEA.

It was the sea, however, that gripped him most strongly, and years of painting up and down the rocky coasts of New Brunswick and Maine brought him recognition as a leading exponent in this branch. For a number of years he spent the summer months at St. Andrews, N. B., and from his studio there haunted coastline and quiet sheltered harbor for subjects. Over a long period his annual exhibitions at the Watson Art Galleries showed how thoroughly in sympathy he was to these subjects—watercraft old and new, weathered buildings and pier wharves, dories and incidental figures, or the sweep of the ocean with waves and surf, spray-hid rocks, scudding clouds and wheeling gulls. In such subjects, as the years passed, there came a breadth and confidence and a finer appreciation of the subtleties of atmosphere which gave added appeal to his paintings. From the sea, too, came pictures of men carting seaweed and driftwood, not to mention men, women and boys digging clams.

As a watercolorist, a medium he employed only occasionally, he ranked among the leaders in this country. His paintings were broad, free, "washy" virile performances. Especially successful was he in rendering effects of moonlight on moving water and wet sand. As in his oils, his drawing was always sound, his sense of values true and his color generally fresh and clean. When he felt the urge to dabble in gay hues the result was some admirable flower pieces. Further, in his earlier years, he found the yellow of fluffy ducklings in stream or on grassy bank engaging color. In 1909 he spent some time in the Rockies doing a series of paintings.

Mr. Horne Russell's abilities were officially recognized in 1909 when he was elected an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, ten years later becoming a full Academician. In 1922 he was elected president of the R.C.A., a post he held until 1926.

His works are held in many private and public collections. He is represented in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, and at the National Gallery of Art, at Ottawa, his works include "Under the Willows," "Early Spring" and "Seal Cove, Grand Manan."

Mr. Horne Russell was a member of the Pen and Pencil Club, Montreal, the Art Association of Montreal, where he was a member of the Council and also a member of the Acquisition Committee, and his interest in fostering a feeling for art found outlet in many other ways, among them constructive advice when he regularly made a point of visiting the annual exhibitions of the Women's Art Society.

Mr. Horne Russell married Elizabeth Morrison, who survives him with one son, Norman Wells Russell, and one daughter, Mrs. A. J. MacKenzie, of Detroit.

HORNE RUSSELL BURIED

Many Tributes Paid to Canadian Artist 1933

St. Andrews, N.B., June 27.—One of Canada's prominent landscape painters found his last place of rest today near the shores he had perpetuated on canvas. Interment of G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., of Montreal, was made in St. Andrews rural cemetery.

With Mrs. Russell and a son, the painter had been at his summer home here since May. Death occurred Sunday in a hospital at St. Stephen after he became ill here.

Mr. Horne Russell was particularly noted for his portrait work and views of Maritime Province shore and harbor scenes.

Numerous floral tributes were received from many parts of the United States and Canada, including Emmanuel Church, Montreal; the Royal Canadian Academy; the Art Association of Montreal; the Pen and Pencil Club, Montreal; the Women's Art Society of Montreal and the Royal Montreal Curling Club.

Many friends gathered for the funeral services at "Cedar Nook", the artist's home, and at the cemetery. Both services were conducted by the Rev. Norman Sharkey, pastor of Greenock Kirk here. Pall bearers were Wright McLaren, Henry McQuoid, James Skinner and W. J. Rollins.

CITY LACKS MUSEUMS, EDUCATIONIST CLAIMS

Summer School Opens At McGill

"It is almost incredible that a city of more than 1,200,000 souls should not be able to show more than three public museums in all its territory," said Rev. Abbe Olivier Maurault, director of the Externat of St. Sulpice yesterday, in an address to the students of the bi-lingual summer course in museum technique at McGill University, under the auspices of its department of extra-mural relations.

The Abbe indicated that the Art Gallery, the McCord Museum and the Chateau de Ramezay were the only institutions in Montreal available to the general public, leaving the city far behind the great centres of the United States and even many of its smaller cities. It was time that public interest was aroused in the matter, for the need was truly great, he claimed.

Addresses were also delivered by Lt.-Col. Wilfrid Bovey, E. L. Judah and Dr. Leon Lortie. The course is continuing throughout the week.

Mona Lisas to Order

Edmonton Journal (Ind. Cons.): No longer need there be any mystery about the "haunting, enigmatic smile" that has held thousands captive before Mona Lisa. Her secret has been solved by a compass and a touch of mathematics. At least that is the claim of an art critic in Chicago—it would have to be Chicago—who declares Leonardo produced his never-successfully-copied effect by means simple for an engineer. This gentleman explains that in drawing the face, the artist "tilted the lips on the arc of a circle the ends of which just touch the outer corners of the eyes; the arc of another circle forms the outline of the head, and the second circle is twice the diameter of the first"; this causes "the eyes to focus on the lips and make them one of the outstanding portions of the portrait." So, boys and girls, just get out your compasses and do a few Mona Lisas in your spare moments. However, do not be surprised if the one and only La Gioconda still smiles—but, perhaps, with just a trace of heightened amusement.

LE BESOIN DE MUSEES

M. Olivier Maurault, P.S.S., directeur de l'Externat classique de Saint-Sulpice, a raison de dire que Montréal ne possède pas assez de musées. Il n'est pas nécessaire d'avoir longtemps voyagé pour établir des comparaisons plutôt défavorables à la métropole. La Galerie des Arts, le Château de Ramezay, le Musée McCord, que mentionne M. Maurault, auxquels on peut ajouter le musée industriel de l'Ecole des hautes études commerciales, ouvert au public à certaines heures pendant l'année académique, voilà à peu près toute notre richesse.

Pourtant, des musées sont indispensables à une bonne organisation éducative. Par eux le professeur peut graver dans la mémoire des élèves une foule de connaissances utiles, sans qu'il soit besoin de longues explications. Il lui suffit de répondre aux questions que suggère la vue des exhibits. On peut enseigner ainsi l'histoire naturelle, la géographie, l'histoire, l'industrie avec beaucoup plus de succès que si l'on devait se borner à des leçons verbales. Les musées sont encore de puissantes attractions pour les touristes, comme en témoigne la popularité de ceux qu'on aménage maintes villes européennes et américaines.

M. Maurault exprime l'opinion que le gouvernement devrait s'occuper de créer des musées. Le temps difficile que nous traversons n'est guère propice à ces créations, la crise ayant diminué considérablement les ressources publiques tout en augmentant les charges de l'Etat. Rien n'empêche cependant de commencer là où la chose est possible, quitte à parfaire lorsque les finances provinciales et municipales seront meilleures. Une ville de l'importance de Montréal, avec ses quelque 1,200,000 habitants, doit posséder un nombre suffisant de musées.

Mais, on aurait tort de croire que l'établissement de musées ne doit pas s'accompagner d'une campagne d'éducation pour amener les gens à les visiter. Combien, par exemple, ne sont jamais entrés au Château de Ramezay ou au Musée McCord, où se trouvent des collections limitées mais très intéressantes de documents, de portraits et d'objets en rapport avec notre histoire nationale! Combien n'ont jamais mis les pieds à la Galerie des Arts et ne pourraient même pas dire où elle est située exactement! En attendant de créer de nouveaux musées, il ne serait pas mauvais de populariser ceux que nous possédons déjà. Ce serait un pas dans la bonne direction, un moyen de faire rendre leur pleine utilité aux musées actuels et aux musées que nous pourrions organiser au fur et à mesure que nos ressources nous le permettront.

Un plus vaste musée historique et d'autres spéciaux demande M. O. Maurault, p. s. s.

A MCGILL

Le besoin, la nécessité de la formation, de l'organisation de musées dans tout le Canada mais surtout dans "notre bonne ville de Montréal qui est certainement un des endroits du pays où la nation canadienne se forme le plus sûrement", ont été proclamés hier après-midi par M. Olivier Maurault, p.s.s., professeur à l'université de Montréal, qui était le premier conférencier des cours bilingues d'administration de musées, organisés à l'université McGill. Ces cours ont pour auditeurs en majeure partie les directeurs des musées des maisons d'enseignement de la province.

M. Maureault réclame un musée historique, de tableaux historiques à Montréal. "Notre château de Ramezay contient des trésors, j'en conviens, dit-il entre autres, mais il est insuffisant; il faudrait le multiplier par quatre ou le loger plus grandement. Tant que nous n'aurons pas, à Montréal, un instrument de cette qualité, doublé d'un dépôt d'archives, où l'on trouverait au moins de bonnes copies de documents, nos études historiques végèteront."

Protégeons notre patrimoine artistique

M. Maurault insiste aussi pour que, parallèlement au mouvement que l'on vient de lancer, se crée à Montréal un musée des petites industries, ainsi qu'un musée des anciennes coutumes et de l'ancienne architecture. "Le nouveau musée de Québec a fait un pas dans cette direction. Nous sommes plus riches que nous le pensions, bien qu'une grande partie de notre fortune soit déjà passée aux Etats-Unis où des "connaisseurs" ornent leurs maisons de nos dépouilles. Il est humiliant de penser que nous avons ainsi laissé dilapider notre patrimoine artistique."

Et M. Maurault passa au coeur de son sujet, en traitant des musées à Montréal. Il loua la galerie des Arts, mais insista sur le fait qu'elle ne vit que des membres de l'Art Association. "Est-ce qu'une métropole, demande-t-il, comme Montréal, n'aurait pas dû l'aider résolument et lui permettre de compléter ses bâtiments et d'enrichir ses collections?"

Le colonel Wilfrid Bovey, directeur des relations extérieures de l'université McGill, présenta M. Maurault et annonça que les autres conférenciers des cours bilingues comprendraient entre autres: M. G.-R. Lortie, directeur de la bibliothèque de McGill; le professeur Wynne Edwards, Mme F.-C. Warren, MM. Victorin, T.-H. Clark et P.-O. Tremblay.

Paris.—Some idea of the needs of the Russian treasury may be gleaned from the secret sale of three more of the finest pictures of the Hermitage collection at Leningrad. Two Rembrandts have been acquired by friends of the Riiks Museum, Amsterdam. The price paid has not been revealed, but it was undoubtedly large. The third picture, Cleopatra's Banquet, by J. B. Tiepolo, the Venetian painter, was purchased through the Co'naghi art dealing firm, London, by the trustees of the Felton Bequest for a sum of £31,250. It will be presented to the Melbourne Art Gallery, to which the Felton Bequest has already donated a Rembrandt and a Van Eyck.

The Macdonald Monument.
To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir—On Thursday, June 6, 1895, as the result of the generosity of the Citizens' Committee of the Macdonald Memorial Fund, who had collected some $20,000.00 for the purpose—there was unveiled by the Governor-General, Lord Aberdeen, in Montreal's Dominion Square, a monument by Mr. Wade to the remembrance of one of the Fathers of Confederation, Canada's Grand Old Man, and Canada's First Prime Minister.—Sir John Alexander Macdonald, G.C.B. At this ceremony Lord Aberdeen said (in part): "The noble memorial is now before you; and this silent effigy will long be eloquent in commemorating a great career and in inspiring to high aims of patriotism and public spirit." On that same occasion Mr. Arthur G. Doughty read a magnificent ode of laudation on "Macdonald" or "The Heritage of Man," the last lines of which are:

"His name with Canada's fair name entwined

Here in this mute memorial are enshrined!

What fitter monument could Love demand

To him, the kingliest Leader of our land!"

Now, thirty-eight years have passed since inauguration of this monument, and many an art critic and many a cultured layman, with the very best of intentions, has condemned its general design, form, and composition, without, of course, in any way denying its original creativeness, or the honest, serious and sincere effort put into the conception by Mr. Wade, the sculptor, and Mr. Reid, the contractor, in its details and construction. It would appear that the surmounting "roof," canopy or cupola—presumably intended to keep the snow off—is out of place,—or shall I say?—is artistic surplussage,—a surplussage whose splendid bronze decorative achievements in Canadian symbolism and carved low bas-reliefs, can hardly, if at all, be seen by the observer or pedestrian in the street for whose delectation it was sculptured. One may, with all due respect, ask, "Why and what is it away up there for?"—some seventy feet in the air.

Furthermore, the plenteous pillars—twelve mighty polished granite ones,—almost entirely surround the erect and markedly spiritualized effigy of Sir John Macdonald. One may justifiably ask: "Why hide the body of the great Chieftain and Statesman, when he, in fact, is the principal and primary object of importance and consequence? Was he not so placed there to be seen by posterity?" It is evident, therefore, I submit, that there is a deal to be said against the surfeit of embellishment, and the unnecessary obstructive pilastered masonry.

The time has arrived, may I suggest, to alter the monument by removing the summit and pillars, and expose, at last, to Canadian skies and to the vision and sight of citizens the full length, heroic figure of Sir John in his most impressive attitude. The allegorical or thematic sculptural pieces in bronze of a female figure connoting Canada and her seven children, representing the Confederated Provinces, with their additional reclining four British lions, and the two bronze bas-relief panels with their appropriate inscriptions, which appear overhead, could very effectively be used for statuary in the Dominion Square on a landscaped site nearby where passersby could notice and stop to admire it at close distance.

Those of our leading citizens who directed this noble undertaking were: Sir Donald A. Smith (Lord Strathcona), president of the General Committee, Col. F. C. Henshaw, president of the Subscribers' Committee, Mr. R. L. Gault, honorary treasurer, and Mr. Joseph H. Jacobs, honorary secretary. On the executive committee were Sir Joseph Hickson, (Chairman), Mr. R. B. Angus, Col. F. C. Henshaw, Messrs. James Ross and Hugh Graham (Lord Atholstan). Many have gone to their lasting reward in the Great Beyond, but there still survive in our midst a number of the subscribers—Conservatives and Liberals—to the Macdonald Monument Fund, and also at least one or two of the officers of the General Committee, may I be permitted, therefore, to appeal to them, and to others in our community interested in our art productions in our public squares, to carry out the suggestions contained in this letter. I firmly believe, were this to be accomplished, that it would be a splendid artistic improvement; and, what is more, it would certainly, in my humble opinion, restore the Macdonald Monument to that state in which the sculptor himself, originally, must most surely have meant it to take final shape—to be seen to the utmost and best advantage under all circumstances.

Commander J. E. Phipps Talks of Great Historic Array at Wilton House

MANY RELICS OF NELSON

Other Famous Characters and Artists of Elder Day Represented—All for Party Funds

His manner conveying that nautical readiness known for a century and a quarter as "the Nelson touch," Engineer-Lieutenant-Commander J. E. Phipps, ex-R.N., a not infrequent visitor from abroad to Montreal, last night turned an interview into a thrilling narration of facts and circumstances of the historic past, dwelt upon the recent exhibition of historical relics at Wilton House, Wiltshire, England, and finished up—surprisingly as it may seem—with a hint to modern politicians.

Most interesting historic exhibition of recent times, he said, with genuine enthusiasm, was the recent Loan Exhibition at Wilton House, one of the most beautiful of the "stately homes of England," three miles from the old cathedral city of Salisbury.

The opening of the exhibition was carried out, he explained, under the chairmanship of the Countess of Pembroke. And here comes the touch of politics and the serio-comic hint that the officer threw out to Canadian politicians. Her Ladyship announced that the principal aim of the exhibition was that of raising funds—for the British Conservative party.

Commander Phipps spoke of the exhibits at some length. He was especially interested, he said, in the first and original drawing of Nelson by Kester. Lord Nelson considered this portrait a truer likeness than any other made of him. Incidentally, it bears some writing which was the first he ever did with his left hand. Lady Hamilton had a second one done for her, which she preferred. This, too, is on view.

SPINNING WHEEL

The spinning wheel, which belonged to Lady Hamilton, is also to be seen. This is the identical machine used by Romney in his celebrated painting of her. Her fan, which reposes nearby, is one of the most attractive things of its kind. It was presented to her by five admirals, whose names are painted on it, with the dates of their particular victories.

The Book of Maxims given by Lady Hamilton to Nelson bears the date 1809 and a message of goodwill in the donor's writing. But the volume is so placed in the case that, although one can observe the book, one cannot see by whom it was compiled or evolved. From the portion of a page half-turned the maxims appear to be of a religious character.

Nelson's cane has an intriguing knob—the face of a dark-visaged, foreign-looking man. A sentimental interest attaches to a lock of Nelson's pigtail. A more homely note is struck by a flannel shirt adjacent, marked with a coronet and the letter "N."

There are links with other historic personages in the exhibition. For example, the dagger thrown on the floor of the House of Commons by Burke during his famous "dagger speech." This Burke relic makes but one of many connected with political men and history.

The army, of course, is well represented. There are many relics of the Duke of Wellington—even to his eye-glass and a piece of may-blossom plucked in his garden and pressed by him. Here, surely, if anywhere, lies a romantic story, but it is one that the beholder must weave for himself. No indication is given concerning the person who so treasured this humble piece of may-blossom, pressed by the Duke's hand, that it has passed on to posterity.

NAPOLEONIC RELICS

As one would expect, there is a representative collection of Napoleonic remains. The original cast taken after the Emperor's death at St. Helena, his writing case, and many other domestic articles, are in the collection.

The memory of the famous Tichborne trial is not yet extinct, and it has a special interest, of course, in Wiltshire, for it is in the neighboring county of Hampshire that Arthur Orton, the claimant, sought to acquire the famous estate. At Wilton House exhibition were shown the very gauntlets he wore at his trial.

Joanna Southcott, another great figure of her time, is represented by a box marked with three seals. The Isle of Wight provided a fine memorial in the coat-of-arms from Charles I's chair, in which he met the Commissioners at Newport.

Commander Phipps also spoke of the magnificent pictures which were on show in the state rooms. These were a National Gallery in miniature, and have the prestige of being part of the house. Tintoretto, Rubens, Frans Hals, Andrea del Sarto, Gorgione, Titian, Rembrandt, Holbein, Van Dyck, and many other masters are worthily represented.

It was in the largest and most beautiful of these rooms that Lord Stanley performed the opening ceremony. The Countess of Pembroke, presiding, said that political reasons led to the function—the never-ending quest for funds. Money was badly wanted to carry on the work of the Conservative party.

Napoleon's Army Gifted In Miniature to Toronto

All Ranks in All Battalions Illustrated by 900 Figurines Modelled by French War Captive

TORONTO, July 24.—(Star Special).—A complete set of models of Napoleon's soldiers—numbering 900—has been presented to the Royal Ontario Museum here by Lord Melchett. It is the only collection of its kind in the world and its value as an historical source and to publishers and writers is inestimable. The collection consists of figurines, about one foot in height, representing every rank of every battalion in the Napoleonic army, from drummer boy to colonel and from dusky Zouave to Parisian. Great attention has been paid to making each detail exactly correspond to the originals of many hard-fought campaigns even to the trim of the mustaches being arranged to match the custom of each regiment.

MUSEUM DIRECTOR COMMENTS

Dr. C. T. Currelly, director of the museum, thinks the collection also serves as an effective piece of anti-war propaganda.

"My personal feeling," he said, "is that every possible attention should be directed toward the horrors of war and the mentality that lies behind it. The getting of young fellows into uniforms and training them for slaughter ought to be opposed in every way. Just as in arms and armor the diabolical nature of the whole thing is revealed, so we will show the public how Napoleon's gay uniforms and the romance he drew around war brought entire battalions to their slaughter, seriously reduced the male population of France and for a long time reduced the physical stature of the French people."

"During the Napoleonic wars," said Dr. Currelly, explaining the history of the miniature army, "a French senior officer who had something to do with uniforms and knew them all from the drummer boy to the general, was captured by the British and held prisoner for a number of years."

MADE MODELS FOR PASTIME

"He was an artist of no mean ability and when he found himself held captive he began making models of each rank in a battalion. When that was done he made another battalion. And so on until he had made models of all ranks of every battalion in Napoleon's army."

"War was a gentleman's occupation in those days and he was allowed to do his modeling undisturbed. In fact, he must have received plenty of co-operation from his captors to obtain special trimmings."

Not only do the 900 uniforms distinguish the various regiments, but even the sculpture of the figures reveals the districts of France from which they came. There were certain regiments where all had to wear mustaches of a certain kind; some regiments came from the fair-haired northerners; others from the dark southerners—all these details are carefully observed.

Baroness von Ritschl Visits Maritime Provinces

Moncton, N.B., August 2.—An English artist visiting Canada, the Baroness von Ritschl, has been in the Maritime Provinces looking over possible farm sites with a representative of the agricultural department of the Canadian National Railways. The Baroness, under her maiden name, Lorna Burgoyne, is well known in England as a miniature painter. She is looking for a farm upon which she and the Baron, an Austrian, might settle. The Baroness divides her time between Austria and her native Devonshire. Her miniatures have been widely exhibited in England, and one was bought by Queen Mary.

Leaving for Italy, the Baroness did not say whether she had decided upon a site for a home. Before coming to the Maritime Provinces she looked over possible farms in Maryland and West Virginia. Should she come to live in Canada, she hopes to found an association of Canadian miniature painters. Her grandfather was Captain Burgoyne of the famous racing clipper Titania which brought tea to England from India. Her husband's family is one of the oldest in Austria.

BRITISH ART FUND'S GIFT TO CANADA

Star 12/9/33

NOT content with enriching the national and public galleries in Great Britain, the British National Art Collections Fund is now considering the needs of institutions in the Dominions.

Accordingly the Fund is sending to the National Gallery at Ottawa (which was founded by the efforts of the Princess Louise in 1880 when the Marquis of Lorne was Governor-General) a striking picture by Rembrandt's friend and rival Jan Lievens.

This composition of "Job in his Misery" was bought at a recent sale by Sir Robert Witt, chairman of the Fund, for $2,000, and, after the sale many foreign dealers rued that they had overlooked it.

Lievens parted company with Rembrandt in 1631, and went back to his native city of Leiden. The British National Gallery is not especially rich in his works. In 1880 the trustees of the British Museum presented a portrait of that Cologne blue-stocking, Anna Maria van Schurman, and a man's portrait was given in 1912 by the late Charles Fairfax Murray.

A reproduction of the gift to Ottawa appears above.

Royal William, Built in This Province, Involved Owners in Difficulties

CENTENARY EXHIBITION

Paintings, Photographs and Models at Chateau de Ramezay Make Interesting Display

An interesting exhibition, tracing by means of models, drawings and photographs, the development of steamships on the Atlantic and the St. Lawrence, is being held in the Chateau de Ramezay on Notre Dame street, under the joint sponsorship of the Antiquarian and Numismatic Society and the Canadian Railroad Historical Association, to commemorate the centenary of the voyage of the Royal William, the first ship to cross the Atlantic solely by use of steam.

The Royal William, designed by a young Canadian, James Goudie, was built in Black and Campbell's shipyards at Glen Cove, a mile above Quebec, and officially launched in April 1831. Originally chartered to sail to Halifax and intermediate ports, the ship, shortly after its launching, became involved in quarantine difficulties and its owners were forced to tie it up for a large part of the season, an action which resulted in heavy financial loss. The vessel was then sold to the mortgagees who, after employing her for a short time along the St. Lawrence, decided to send her to England for sale, thus sowing the seed of future fame. The ship, under the command of John McDougall, sailed from Pictou, Nova Scotia, on August 17, 1833, and, after a memorable voyage in which she encountered storms and leakage difficulties, arrived in London on September 11. Shortly after her arrival she was sold to the Spanish government in whose service she became the war steamer, Ysabel Segunda.

A splendid painting by A. Sheriff Scott of the ship's leaving from Pictou is on view at the exhibition as is also a model of the ship herself, copied from the authentic plans owned by the Quebec Historical Society and lent for display on the occasion by Dr. W. H. Atherton of the Catholic Sailors' Club.

Among other interesting exhibits to be seen are models of the French Line vessels ranging from the Washington, built in 1864, to the present Ile de France; a model of the Accommodation, the first steamship ever to be built in Canada; a collection of old time-tables of early shipping days; a number of drawings and photographs showing the development of the C.P.R. and the Cunard Lines; woodcuts borrowed from the Dominion Illustrated depicting scenes along the St. Lawrence and in the Montreal harbor; a collection of age-worn log books and bills of lading, and a fascinating model of Le Deuil, a primitive tug-boat which helped other vessels move against the rapid St. Mary's current. Casting overboard an anchor attached to a long chain wound about a windlass on the deck of the vessel, the Le Deuil would float down with the current until it came to a spot where the river ceased to flow so strongly. It would then stop by locking the revolving windlass, whose chain was attached to the anchor still gripping the bed of the river about half a mile upstream, and would cast its tow-ropes out to the vessel waiting to climb the current. When the two ships were firmly joined the Le Deuil would set the machinery of the windlass working in a reverse direction, thus rewinding the chain and, if the anchor held, pulling the two boats through the opposing current.

The exhibition, continuing until September 13, has not yet reached its full size as promises of additional exhibits have been definitely been made by outside concerns.

Sir Thomas Tait Formally Opens Independent Art Association Showing

IDEA HIGHLY PRAISED

Chance for Amateur as Well as Artist of Reputation Stressed—Varied Types on Display

Work being done by artists in parts of Canada is reflected in an exhibition of considerable interest which was formally opened in the Sun Life building on Saturday by Sir Thomas Tait.

Sir Thomas gave high praise to the Independent Art Association, under whose aegis the work of established artists and those who have not yet attained official recognition was brought together. The word "Independent" might be misinterpreted, Sir Thomas commented. In this case it meant the opportunity to exhibit independently of the decision of a jury. In this exhibition artists well known throughout the country were represented, together with those endeavoring to establish themselves. It was a valuable opportunity for the amateur to be able to show his work beside that of artists of reputation, from which he was certain to derive benefit.

Lieut.-Col. C. F. Adams, honorary president of the Independent Art Association, Incorporated, introduced Sir Thomas Tait. He also thanked T. B. Macaulay, the Sun Life Assurance Company and the Royal Empire Society for the privilege of using the premises in which the exhibition, the second, was housed.

Oil paintings are shown by Phyllis Abbott, Louis Le Barzic, Richard Baxter, Jessie Beattie, Ida Beck, Henri Bisson, Maude B. Blackford, Marion Bond, Umberto Bruno, Gertrude Burgoyne, F. O. Exhibition of Models in Chateau de Ramezay Is Now in Preparation

A cross section of Canadian history will be presented in a striking way when the Chateau de Ramezay is made to house a collection of the best examples of steamboats to be found in the country. The exhibition is to be confined mainly to models of trans-atlantic and river steamboats, with the addition of pictures of these, which will be interesting because of the wide period of transportation which they encompass. The date of the event is August 17 to September 15.

The exhibition will be under the joint auspices of the Antiquarian and Numismatic Society and the Canadian Railroad Historical Association and the object is to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the first transatlantic crossing by steam power only, accomplished by the Canadian-built and-owned steamer "Royal William".

Two public meetings will be held in the Chateau de Ramezay on the evenings of August 23 and September 13, at which interesting papers on steamboat history will be read.

The harbor commissioners, the principal steamship companies and many individuals have loaned material for this exhibition but the organizations responsible for the event have stated that more exhibits are wanted and further models and pictures of old steamboats in the possession of private persons will be welcomed by them to place on view.

PROVINCIAL MUSEUM TO GET STATUETTES

QUEBEC, Oct. 5.—(C.P.)—Within the near future, the Provincial Museum on Battledfields Park will be enriched by the arrival of a number of statuettes, the work of a talented French-Canadian sculptor, representing different phases of life in old French Canada. Paul Rainville, assistant curator of the museum, said yesterday.

They are the work of Alfred Laliberte, of Montreal, noted for his work in wood. Delicately carved, they will be staged in groups, representing such tableaux as "The Blacksmith's Shop," "Men Chopping Wood," etc.

Return Courtesy of Canada's National Gallery

OTTAWA, Oct. 5.—(C.P.)—Returning the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada in sending to the United Kingdom an exhibit of Canadian art, the Royal Scottish Society of Painters has sent to Canada a similar exhibit which will be opened here in about two weeks' time. The collection includes 116 works, executed by some of the most distinguished artists in Scotland.

Following a period in which the collection will be on exhibition in the Capital, it will be shown in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg and other centres throughout the country.

The Canadian exhibition, which opened under the auspices of the Royal Scottish Society in Edinburgh last spring, won wide praise from British critics.

Paintings to Be Returned For Quarter of Values

Canvas Cut in Half and Sent to The Star and La Presse With Offer From Thieves — Threat Also Contained of Making Works Into Jig-Saw Puzzle

THE kidnapping "racket" which has been threatening to become one of the big industries of the United States, has made its appearance in Montreal; but in a new guise. No longer does the racketeer take the tremendous risk involved in kidnapping the children of celebrities, or the most prominent business men of a big city. But if you have a work of art, an heirloom or a family treasure which is dear to your heart, beware. Some day it may cost you much money to prevent it being ruthlessly chopped up and the fragments sent you by mail. You may even have to pay excess postage on the parcel that brings you the remains.

STOLEN FROM EXHIBITION

Such at any rate is the fate that threatens the owners of 16 paintings stolen from the Art Galleries in Montreal last spring, at the close of the annual exhibition.

CUT IN HALF

One of the paintings, "Late Fall Landscape," by M. A. Fortin, of a catalogue value of $75, was cut in half by the kidnappers. Half of it was sent to The Star and other half to La Presse. The Star got a break at the start, in that this newspaper only had 10 cents extra postage to pay, whereas the French language daily was set back 14 cents, either because the kidnappers were short of money, or as a warning that it is going to cost real money to get the pictures back.

However, the market would seem to be falling somewhat. This is the second time that the kidnappers have tried to obtain a ransom. The first time, they wanted $10,000 for the return of all the pictures.

This time, each half picture was accompanied by a letter indicating that the others would be returned for a ransom of 25 per cent of their value, failing which they would be cut into jig-saw puzzles.

ASK RANSOM

The first letter asking for ransom was addressed to the Watson Art Galleries, and mailed at the Montreal General Post Office. It read:

"We wish to inform you that we have your 16 pictures in our possession, and as you know that this damp weather is going to spoil them and if you want them back it will cost you (ten thousand dollars) $10,000. Otherwise we assure you that you will never find them.

"You can answer to our proposition by writing in the art column of any local newspaper, and to prove to you that we have them we will send you one of the cheapest ones as soon as we have everything understood and settled about the money.

"If you do not want to play cards our way, you can inform your police to go and find them for you."

This was answered by an advertisement in The Star, "Personal, relative to the pictures which are liable to be affected by damp weather, communicate with box 6502 Star Office."

SECOND LETTER

This produced no results, and the next step was the receipt this morning of the half-pictures, accompanied by a letter reading as follows:

"To the City Editor,

"You have received one-half of one of the 16 pictures which were stolen from the Art Museum Galleries last spring. The other half of this picture is at the La Presse newspaper office.

"These pictures could be returned on condition that a ransom be paid for the remainder of the lot. A reasonable offer for these would be about 25 per cent of the actual value.

"If the owners of each painting does not agree to these conditions, they will each receive their pictures in jig-saw form.

"We would expect to find your answer in the lost ads. column of the New York Times or otherwise you will receive your hand painted jig-saw puzzles."

The letter was mailed at Brockville, Ont., on August 19.

LIST OF PICTURES

The following is the list of the pictures, which were stolen during the night of April 17-18 last:

Petite Riviere aux Renards, by G. S. Bagley, $200; The Moorland Bridge, by Elizabeth Styring Nutt, $450; The Golden Fleece, by Max Schultz, $250; Three Old Houses, Louisa street, Toronto, by Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A., Toronto, $300; The Green Boat, by the same, $250; The Swimming Hole, by Henry J. Simpkins, $275; At the Bird Bath, by Alberta Cleland, $350; A Late Fall Landscape, M. A. Fortin, $75; Arrangement in Black and Grey, A. Sherriff Scott, $400; portraits (no catalogue price) by K. K. Forbes, A.R.C.A., R. S. Hewton, A.R.C.A., Alphonse Jongers, J. St. Charles, A.R.C.A., and Marjorie Smith.

It is pointed out by art authorities in this connection, that by stepping into another room the thief or thieves could have obtained pictures the values of which go up to $30,000; apparently they preferred the lion entries.

PICTURE KIDNAPPERS' PROOF OF POSSESSION

"A Late Fall Landscape," by Marc Aurele Fortin, shown above, is the stolen picture which was sent back in two pieces, as proof that the men who stole the pictures from the Art Gallery, really were in possession of them.

The letter demanding the ransom accompanied the ruined art work.

Paintings Held For Ransom In United States Near Border

Herald Aug. 24, 1933.

(From Yesterday's Late Edition)

The paintings stolen from the Montreal Art Gallery last spring and now held for ransom in the United States, somewhere near the border and not far from Montreal.

Nearly two months ago detectives who have been working quietly on the art robbery under Inspector Victor Foucault since last May learned from a reliable source that the sixteen paintings had been smuggled across the line. Later it was learned that a few of them had been seen in New York City.

The investigators do not think that more than one or two of the paintings have been brought back into Canada — probably only the one which was cut up and sent in sections to two local papers, together with the amazing ransom notes.

This information was gathered at headquarters this morning, but in spector Foucault was not willing to make any definite statement as to his theories regarding the unusual crime or the line of investigation being followed. He denied having received any communications from the persons who sent notes to the newspapers and to a local art dealer, nor has he been consulted by any of the artists whose works were stolen since the demand for ransom revived public interest in the case.

While the methods followed in the crime are in the most modern American gangster tradition, those in touch with the case do not believe that the crime is the work of an international gang of art thieves as has been suggested. They believe it was executed by local thieves and there is a suggestion that some other motive than that of profit lies behind the mystery.

Meanwhile, with two of the victimized artists ready to come to terms with the thieves, practically every city detective is working on the robbery.

"Punch" July 3

An Impending Apology.

"From the point of view of easy disposal the thief was far amiss, for portraits of well-known Montrealers would be awkward things to get rid of."—Canadian Paper.

"If you want to spend a quiet half-hour," said the native to a visitor, "there's no better place than our art gallery."

"Just a minute," replied the stranger. "I've just begun reading about it in the public guidebook. It says that the visitor, on entering, is struck by a statue of Hercules. Then he is stunned by the splendor of the great staircase. A picture in the first room is full of punch, while farther on one is crushed by the overwhelming magnificence of another painting. Finally, brilliant colors run riot everywhere."

"No, sir. If I want a quiet half-hour, I'll take a boxing lesson."

ARTISTS WILLING TO PAY RANSOM ON STOLEN PAINTINGS

Gazette 23/8/33
At Least Two Have Signified Readiness to Treat With Thieves

DEMANDS ARE RECEIVED

Familiar Kidnap Racket Tactics Employed—Pictures Stolen from Montreal Art Gallery Last April

At least two Canadian artists are prepared to pay ransom for paintings stolen from the Montreal Art Gallery's spring exhibition last April. One, Kenneth K. Forbes, Toronto portrait painter, is willing to meet the thieves on their own ground, paying $250 for a portrait he values at $1,000 if it is in good condition; the other, Joseph St. Charles, of Montreal, first wants the assurance that his portrait is undamaged and would then be willing to negotiate as to the price to be paid.

Receipt of ransom notes by two local newspapers, yesterday, contained the first public word of the 16 paintings since they were stolen on April 19 last by someone who secreted himself on the premises, cut the paintings from their frames and apparently passed them out, rolled up, to an accomplice who stood outside the window of the women's rest room.

There is evidence that the thieves are in Montreal, for a similar ransom note has been received by the Watson Art Galleries, which had no direct interest in the stolen paintings. This is believed to indicate that the thieves were familiar with the local art world and took this means to reach the artists themselves. Then, too, notification to the painters who are willing to pay to advertise in The New York Times is believed to be a "blind" to conceal the presence of the thieves here. The New York Times is available in Montreal and easily accessible to the thieves.

These facts, together with the fact that one of the ransom notes was mailed from Brockville, Ont., and the other from the Montreal General Post Office, are taken to indicate a local job, and Montreal police will redouble their efforts to trace the perpetrators of the theft.

The first letter, received by the Watson Art Galleries, reads: "We wish to inform you that we have your 16 pictures in our possession, and as you know that this damp weather is going to spoil them and if you want them back it will cost you (ten thousand dollars) $10,000. Otherwise we assure you that you will never find them."

"You can answer to our proposition by writing in the art column of any local newspaper, and to prove to you that we have them we will send you one of the cheapest ones as soon as we have everything understood and settled about the money."

"If you do not want to play cards our way, you can inform your police to go and find them for you."

An answer to this was inserted in a local newspaper, as follows: "Personal, relative to the pictures which are liable to be affected by damp weather, communicate with Box 6502."

Nothing developed until yesterday, when city editors of two local papers received almost identical notes, accompanied by half of a picture painted by Marc-Aurèle Fortin, a local artist. It was his exhibition picture "A Late Fall Landscape," listed in the exhibition catalogue at $75.

The notes read: "You have received one-half of one of the 16 pictures which were stolen from the Art Museum Galleries last spring. The other half of the picture is at the (naming the office of another newspaper). These pictures could be returned on condition that a ransom be paid for the remainder of the lot. A reasonable offer for these would be about 25 per cent of the actual value."

"If the owners of each painting does not agree to these conditions they will receive their pictures in jig-saw form."

"We would expect to find your answer in the lost ads. column of the New York Times or otherwise you will receive your hand-painted jig-saw puzzles."

Further action is up to the artists. Two of them last night expressed a willingness to negotiate. Joseph St. Charles, portrait painter, whose studio is at 1306 St. Catherine street east, revealed that the portrait of his that was stolen was intended to be a gift from a grateful patient to his doctor. It was a painting of Dr. J. A. Mireault. Mr. St. Charles said last night that if he received the assurance his portrait is in good condition, he might consider paying for its return. However, he has started on another portrait of Dr. Mireault and is not much worried about it. The doctor and his friends thought the first portrait a good likeness well painted, and Mr. St. Charles would like to have it back.

MORE DEFINITE OFFER.

A more definite offer came from Kenneth K. Forbes, of Toronto. Two portraits by Mr. Forbes were among the pictures stolen, one a life-size figure of John B. Laidlaw, the other a life-size of Dr. A. L. Lockwood. "I value the Lockwood portrait at $1,000," Mr. Forbes said, "and I will gladly pay $250 for its return in an undamaged state. If the picture is cut, however, I would not pay this money, as it is a large portrait and would cost a great deal to join together again. I could paint another one for myself for the ransom money and the sum I would so expend."

"I will not pay ransom for the portrait of Mr. Laidlaw," the artist continued, "for the simple reason I have painted another one of Mr. Laidlaw to replace the one he loaned me for exhibit. This portrait was presented to Mr. Laidlaw and I was paid for it, and then Mr. Laidlaw loaned it to me for exhibit. When it was stolen, I went to work and painted a second portrait for Mr. Laidlaw, which is now completed and which I consider an even better portrait than the other one."

So the thieves have one picture on their hands which they might as well return for nothing.

Most of the Montreal painters affected are out of town on painting trip and could not be reached last night. It is believed, however, that some of them, particularly the portrait painters, would be glad to negotiate.

With so many clues now in their hands Montreal police are expected to show some action. Questioned yesterday, Captain of Detectives Tourville said no action had yet been decided upon. He had seen the ransom notes, he said, and the two halves of Mr. Fortin's landscape sent to the newspapers. The newspapers, however, had refused to surrender the notes. Before action is taken, Capt. Tourville said, the bureau will secure the decision of the Art Association.

STOLEN PAINTINGS SEEN IN NEW YORK

Star 23/8/33
Word Received Here That Works Have Been Exhibited

Several of the 16 paintings, cut from their frames in the Montreal Art Gallery on April 19, have been seen on exhibition in New York City since that time, it was learned this morning, in the course of inquiries into the latest racketeering development in the sensational theft, whereby the present possessors offer to return the works of art to their painters for 25 per cent of the value originally placed on them.

The situation now appears to be that of a person or persons, who, having stolen the paintings, cannot find a market for them.

Montreal police were silent on the matter this morning. Inspector Victor Foucault, commanding the detective bureau is now in possession of the picture and letters sent to the Montreal Star and La Presse yesterday, but declined to discuss the case from any angle, beyond saying that he had not heard from any of the artists involved.

CONSIDERED BLIND

Though the pictures have been seen in New York, there is no definite assurance that they are still there, as the demand by the racketeers that the reply to their offer be published in the New York Times, is considered a pure blind.

Two of the artists, Kenneth K. Forbes, of Toronto, and Joseph St. Charles, of Montreal, have expressed themselves ready to pay the demanded 25 per cent of the value of their works, if the same are in good condition.

So far, there have been no more communications in the matter, nor have any further messages been received from the present possessors of the paintings.

OWNERS OF STOLEN ART

GET WORD FROM THIEVES
Lewiston Daily News
MONTREAL PAPERS INFORMED
THEY MUST PAY 25% OF VALUE TO GET THEM
Aug. 23, 1933.

Montreal, Aug. 22.—(A)—Owners of $15,000 worth of oil paintings stolen from the gallery of the Art Association of Montreal at the close of the spring exhibition will have to pay 25 per cent of their estimated value if they want to recover them, said notes received from the thieves by two Montreal newspapers today.

Accompanying each note was a half of a pastoral scene by Marc-Aurèle Fortin, Montreal artist. The painting was identified by Montreal Art Association officers as one of 16 cut from their frames in the gallery the night of April 17. The thieves forced a window of the building.

The notes warned that if the terms were not met the paintings would be cut in bits and returned by mail to their owners. The owners were advised to insert an advertisement in the classified columns of a New York newspaper.

Artists Turn Down Offer of Thieves

Star 25/8/33
JOSEPH ST. CHARLES, professor at the school of fine arts, whose painting was one of those stolen from the Art Galleries and who indicated his willingness to pay the ransom asked for by the thieves, announces this morning that he has changed his mind and will not deal with the robbers. He takes this decision on the grounds that it would introduce an iniquitous principle into Canadian life, if people consent to pay ransom for stolen goods.

Kenneth M. Forbes, who at first was willing to pay a ransom of $250 for one of his paintings, has also reversed his decision and will have no business dealings with the thieves.

CANADIAN GROUP SHOWS PAINTINGS

Gazette 25/8/33
Art Critics of United States Appreciate Examples Now in Atlantic City

(Special to The Gazette.)
Atlantic City, N.J., August 24.—Art critics of the United States have had the first opportunity to comment on the work of the newly-formed "Canadian Group of Painters," which was organized last winter as an outgrowth of the "Group of Seven" movement. Sixty-one canvases by members of the new society are now on exhibition at the Heinz Art Salon, a well-equipped gallery which the H. J. Heinz Company maintains on its famous pier here. The company's interest in Canada, and its enterprise in the field of art, is indicated by the promptitude of its invitation to Canadian modernists to stage their first exhibition in an American city.

Most of the leading newspapers in the United States have reviewed the show, many of them with enthusiasm. The New York American says: "What is more immediately noticeable in the exhibition is that the development of modernism in Canada has not been characterized by exaggeration and excess."

As a whole their modern school remains happily aware that good art, whether modern or conservative, is dependent on knowledge, discipline and skill quite as much as on emotional pulse, spontaneity and intensity of expression. In consequence, their painting manifests fundamental integrity of craft, such as sound drawing and harmonious coloring. These Canadian painters, have taken decorative painting as their chief aim. At the same time, Nature has inspired their themes and motives and accordingly they have not been inclined to merely peculiar and idiosyncratic expression. Their painting has a rich, full-hearted character, strong in rhythm, direct in thought, poetic in mood and vigorous in approach."

The Philadelphia Record says: "The out-of-doors, being the principal inspiration of these painters, has caused their vision to partake largely of the same virile breadth of conception and muralesque simplicity of mass, occasionally quite rugged, but generally poetic."

The Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph says that the use of "the contemporary vocabulary of painting to sing the beauty of their land raises the group to one of national significance," and adds that "this is an exhibition that should be shown at Carnegie Institute to acquaint the public with Canada as her painters see their land."

The decorative quality of much of the painting in the exhibition is

STOLEN PAINTINGS NOT IN NEW YORK

Gazette 24/8/33
Central Police Bureau Has No Information on Montreal Art Treasures

Word was received by the local detectives last night from the New York police to the effect that they had no information on the reported sighting of the 16 paintings which were stolen from the local Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street west, on April 18 last.

Yesterday afternoon it was reported at local police headquarters that these paintings had been placed on exhibition in New York, and it was for this reason that the New York police were asked to investigate. The central police bureau in New York was notified with the result that a denial was received here last night.

The despatch from New York stated it is possible that these paintings may have been seen in New York by some art dealer and word sent to Montreal at once, but nothing definite about this could be obtained there. Local detectives, however, are awaiting the decision of the artists of the various pictures as to the ransom asked before proceeding with a further investigation. So far only two artists have agreed to pay one-quarter of the value of their paintings as required by ransom notes received by the two local afternoon newspapers.

16 OLD MASTERS STOLEN AT CANNES

Star 30/8/33
Corots, Manets and Renoirs Cut From Frames By Thieves

CANNES, France, Aug. 30.—(Star Special.)—The villa of a well-known art collector in the California district of Cannes was recently broken into by burglars in the early hours of the morning, and 16 old masters were cut from their frames in the main picture gallery and taken away, while the entire household slept.

Among the stolen pictures are: Four Corots, two Manets, two Fragonards, three Renoirs, and a Degas.

The villa is the Villa Adrianna, and belongs to Eugene Geoffroy, of L'Isle-sur-la-Sorgne, near Avignon. He and his wife—who is also a well-known art collector—and their servants had all gone to bed by midnight.

At 2 a.m. M. Geoffroy, feeling unwell, left his bed and walked about the house. He noticed nothing unusual; yet the burglary must have been carried out before that time.

In the gallery from which the pictures were taken 60 valuable paintings were hanging.

Fourteen canvases were cut from their frames as they hung, the frames being left on the walls. The remaining two stolen paintings were apparently taken into the garden and there cut out.

The frames were found in the garden in the morning.

The villa stands in an isolated position between the railway line and the sea. No doors were broken open. Presumably the burglars entered by a window.

recognized as distinctive by most of the American critics. Some find it refreshing and vigorous and akin to the character of Canadian landscape, while others find it monotonous. The New York Herald-Tribune, for example, in a lengthy review, says that "in spite of the full-flavored quality of their work, the Canadians are seldom painters of robust and telling vitality. Too much seems to depend upon a decorative formula which is repeated rather obviously by most of the painters in the exhibition."

The artists represented in the show include Lawren Harris, Alex. Y. Jackson, the late J. E. H. MacDonald, Arthur Lismer, F. H. Varley, Frank Carmichael, A. J. Casson, Edwin H. Holgate and LeMoine Fitzgerald, of the older group, and Bertram Brooker, Emily Carr, Charles F. Comfort, Prudence Howard, R. S. Hewton, Bess Housser, Thoreau Macdonald, J. W. G. McDonald, Yvonne McKague, Isabel McLaughlin, Mabel May, Lilius Torrance Newton, Will Ogilvie, A. H. Robinson, George Pepper, Sarah M. Robertson, Anne Savage, William P. Weston, Charles H. Scott and W. J. Wood.

The initiative of the Heinz Company in securing this show for its pier has been awarded by greatly increased attendance and interest, even though Atlantic City has drawn lesser crowds than usual this year.

Rançon exigée contre le retour des toiles volées à la Galerie des Arts

Une lettre anonyme, envoyée à la "Presse" avec la moitié de l'un des seize tableaux volés au Salon du Printemps en avril dernier, demande que l'on fasse connaître dans une petite annonce le consentement des intéressés.

A défaut de rançon, les toiles seront mutilées

Nous avons pratiquement fini par croire que la sensationnelle affaire du vol de tableaux, survenu en avril dernier au Salon du Printemps, devait rester sans lendemain, faute de Sherlock Holmes pour en dissiper le mystère. Or, à quatre mois de distance, presque date pour date, un rappel non moins sensationnel ramène le fait à la surface et le présente sous un angle digne en tous points des romans policiers de Conan Doyle. Des inconnus demandent par la voie des journaux une RANÇON DU QUART DE LA VALEUR AUTHENTIQUE où l'on a tôt fait de découvrir le "Paysage d'automne tardif" de Marc-Aurèle Fortin, l'une des 16 proies. Si les intéressés ne consentent pas à cette condition, dit la lettre anonyme envoyée à la "Presse", les tableaux seront retournés en petits morceaux. S'ils acceptent, il faut avertir les rançonneurs par le moyen d'une petite annonce insérée dans le "New-York Times".

Circonstances du vol

On se rappellera que la "Presse" donnait en primeur, le mardi 18 avril dernier, la nouvelle circonstanciée du fameux vol. Le cinquantième Salon annuel du Printemps venait à peine de s'achever, la veille, lundi de Pâques, à la Galerie des Arts, 1379, rue Sherbrooke-ouest, que l'on constata la disparition mystérieuse de 16 des meilleures toiles exposées. Elles avaient été coupées de leurs cadres avec un instrument bien tranchant, au cours de la nuit. On a conclu dans le temps que l'un des voleurs avait dû se laisser enfermer dans l'édifice et qu'après avoir accompli l'acte de vandalisme il passa les toiles à un copain de l'extérieur, puisqu'une petite ouverture avait été coupée dans l'une des fenêtres donnant du côté ouest. Il se serait ensuite faufilé jusqu'à la sortie, une fois l'édifice rouvert, le matin.

Les toiles volées

Le vol venait à peine d'être découvert au cours de la matinée que la "Presse" était également en mesure de donner la liste, d'autant plus que la plupart avaient été mentionnées et même photographiées pour la critique d'art hebdomadaire. Les seize toiles volées étaient :

"Composition en noir et gris", A. Sherriff Scott, Montréal, $400.

"Portrait de Miss H. Haig", R. S. Hewton, A.R.C.A., Montréal, pas de vente.

Portraits du Dr A.-W. Archibald et de Norman Dawes, par Alphonse Jongers, Montréal, $3,000 chacun.

Portraits du Dr A.-L. Lockwood et de John-B. Laidlaw, par Kenneth Forbes, A.R.C.A., Toronto, $3,000 chacun.

Portrait du Dr J.-A. Mireault par J. Saint-Charles, A.R.C.A., pas de vente.

"Paysage d'automne tardif", Marc-Aurèle Fortin, Montréal, $100.

"La Toison d'Or" (The Golden Fleece), Max Shulz, Outremont, $250.

"Petite Rivière aux Renards", G.-S. Bagley, $200.

"The Moorland Bridge", Elizabeth-Styring Nutt, Halifax, $450.

"Three Old Houses", Louisa Street, Toronto, Peter-C. Sheppard Toronto, $300.

"The Green Boat", P.-C. Sheppard, Toronto, $250.

"The Swimming Hole", Henry J. Simpkins, Verdun, $275.

"At The Bird Bath", Alberta Cleland, Montréal, $350.

Etude de portrait, Marjorie Smith, Montréal.

Evaluation à $20,000

Si l'on s'en tient aux prix de vente inscrits dans le catalogue de l'exposition, l'évaluation totale serait d'environ $20,000, mais c'est un chiffre maximum dont il faut probablement rabattre en réalité. De sorte que les rançonneurs récolteraient, si leur plan avait quelque succès, une somme de $4,000 à peu près.

La perte monétaire impliquée n'était donc pas très considérable, peut-être, mais dans le cas des principales toiles volées il fallait tenir compte

LE TABLEAU QUI A SERVI DE GAGE

"Paysage d'automne tardif", toile de Marc-Aurèle Fortin exposée au dernier Salon du Printemps, l'une des seize qui furent volées. C'est la moitié supérieure de cette toile qui a été envoyée en gage à la "Presse" avec la lettre anonyme demandant une rançon pour les quinze autres.

Le motif du vol

Le monde artistique en émoi glosa longtemps sur le motif de vol. On ne fut pas sans remarquer que les vandales n'avaient rien touché de la collection Van Horne hébergée à la Galerie des Arts depuis l'incendie de la demeure Van Horne; qu'ils respectèrent par bonheur les tableaux recouverts de vitres; qu'ils ne voulurent pas s'encombrer d'œuvres sculptées; qu'ils négligèrent de prendre certaines toiles plus dispendieuses. On parla de "sélection". Les toiles volées consistaient, du reste, surtout en portraits dont il est plus difficile de disposer. D'aucuns crurent à une vengeance d'envieux, — la chose arrive, — ou à truc de publiciste, — c'était possible. Il fut question de l'insuffisante protection de la Galerie des Arts en pareils cas.

Aujourd'hui le motif semble bien éclairci. Le rançonnage est une formule américaine à la mode; il ne manquait plus que de l'exploiter pour les œuvres d'art. Quant au reste, — petite annonce, menace de mutilation des toiles, etc., ce sont bien les procédés courants. On aurait pu croire, hélas, que les voleurs s'étaient guidés sur la critique d'art de la "Presse" pour choisir leurs victimes. La majorité des toiles volées avaient été mentionnées de façon particulière par REYNALD, dans sa série de critiques d'art depuis l'ouverture du Salon et, surtout, la plupart avaient eu les honneurs de la reproduction dans le journal.

Une grande enveloppe expédiée de Brockville, Ont., et adressée au chef des nouvelles, a été reçue hier à nos bureaux. Elle contenait un message écrit en lettres-blocs et la moitié supérieure de la toile de Marc-Aurèle Fortin intitulée: "Paysage d'automne tardif".

Traduit, le message se lit comme suit:
Au Chef des nouvelles:

Vous avez reçu une moitié de l'une des seize toiles volées le printemps dernier au musée de la Galerie des Arts. L'autre moitié est aux bureaux du "Montreal Daily Star". Les toiles pourraient être retournées à la condition qu'une rançon soit payée pour les autres. Une offre raisonnable couvrirait environ 25% de leur valeur actuelle. Si le propriétaire de chacune de ces toiles ne consent pas à ces conditions, chacun recevra sa toile sous forme de "jig-saw". Nous comptons recevoir votre réponse dans la colonne "Objets perdus" des petites annonces du "New-York Times"; autrement vous recevrez vos casse-têtes chinois peints à la main."

Sherlock Holmes demandé

Il n'y a pas de doute possible sur la moitié de toile reçue à la "Presse". Elle correspond à la grandeur et à la manière du tableau de Marc-Aurèle Fortin. Les détails sont bien ceux du tableau reproduit dans la "Presse" du 17 mars, au lendemain de l'ouverture du Salon du Printemps. On constate, de plus, que la toile a été taillée à même un cadre. Notez aussi que les rançonneurs ont eu soin d'envoyer en gage une toile qui, à part d'être l'une des moins dispendieuses d'entre les seize qui ont été volées, se sectionne par la moitié en ligne horizontale sans que le sujet soit trop massacré.

L'enveloppe aura sans doute été laissée à la porte au cours d'une simple halte. C'est ce qui expliquerait l'estampille "Brockville, Ont." Aurait-on aperçu quelqu'un mettre à la poste une grosse enveloppe blanche? Les timbres ont-ils été achetés sur place (deux 3c et deux 2c)?, etc.

Il reste à savoir maintenant ce que les intéressés entendront faire en l'occurrence. Nous avons appris officieusement que l'Art Association (Galerie des Arts) n'est au courant de rien. Il n'a pas été possible de rejoindre M. Fortin au cours de la matinée, ni aucun des autres artistes montréalais en cause.

On nous informe, d'autre part, que depuis le vol, la police n'a pu relever le moindre indice. Peut-être cet angle nouveau facilitera-t-il ses recherches?

LA LETTRE QUI DEMANDE UNE RANÇON

TO THE CITY EDITOR

YOU HAVE RECEIVED ONE HALF OF ONE OF THE SIXTEEN PICTURES WHICH WERE STOLEN FROM THE ART GALLERIES MUSEUM LAST SPRING. THE OTHER HALF OF THIS PICTURE IS AT THE MONTREAL DAILY STAR OFFICE.

THESE PICTURES COULD BE RETURNED ON CONDITION THAT A RANSOM BE PAID FOR THE REMAINDER OF THE LOT. A REASONABLE OFFER FOR THESE WOULD BE ABOUT 25% OF THE ACTUAL VALUE.

IF THE OWNERS OF EACH PICTURE DO NOT AGREE TO THESE CONDITIONS THEY WILL EACH RECEIVE THEIR PICTURE IN JIG-SAW FORM.

WE WOULD EXPECT TO FIND YOUR ANSWER IN THE LOST LOS OF THE NEW YORK TIMES OR OTHER. WISE YOU WILL RELIEVE YOUR HAND-PAINTED JIG-SAW PUZZLES.

Fac-similé de la lettre envoyée à la "Presse" pour offrir de retourner quinze des seize toiles volées au Salon du Printemps, en avril dernier, contre une rançon du quart environ de leur valeur actuelle.

Demande précédente

Comparaison faite aux bureaux du "Star", avons constaté qu'il s'agit bien, en effet, des deux moitiés de la toile de Fortin. M. Brownie, de l'Art Association, mandaté sur les lieux, a fait remarquer que l'association a déjà reçu une demande de $10,000 de rançon, rédigée dans ce même anglais d'homme plutôt cultivé, avec la même écriture. D'après lui, la valeur réelle des 16 toiles ne dépasse pas $5,000.

Le cas sera référé aux avocats.

DISPUTED PICTURE DECIDED A RUBENS!

Star 6/9/33 —
"Portrait of Emperor Charles" Not by Titian

AMSTERDAM, Holland, Sept. 7.—(C.P.)—After considerable puzzling over the question of whether a masterpiece painting was a "Titian" or a "Rubens" art experts have reached the decision that the picture in question, "Portrait of the Emperor Charles V," is really a Rubens. It was formerly in the collection of George Pretzman at Orwell Park, Ipswich.

It is generally recognized that the picture, which has hitherto been attributed to the Italian painter Titian, and which was exhibited as such at Burlington House in 1908, is really a work of the Flemish painter Rubens after a Titian model.

The authorship of the picture was challenged when it came under the hammer recently and was acquired by Dr. Vitale Bloch. The picture has been cleaned and the Rubens authorship is confirmed. It is now on view in the Rubens Exhibitions in Amsterdam. The original Titian picture is apparently lost.

Titian lived about 1477-1576, and Rubens was born in 1577 and died in 1640.

SCOTTISH MUSEUM REPORTS FOR 1932

Gazette 29/8/33

Despite Necessary Economies, Valuable Educational Work Was Done

It is satisfactory to learn from the report of the director, Edwin Ward, that, in spite of the economy wave necessitating some curtailment of the services, 533,162 persons, or 8,649 more than in the previous year, visited the Royal Scottish Museum, Edinburgh, during 1932. The public lectures were continued, although the necessary restrictions on this form of instruction caused a reduction in those who take advantage of them from 6,890 to 5,314. Assistance in the arrangement of their collections was given to a number of local museums and this form of co-operation is being continued. Students from various educational institutions in the city, including the Heriot-Watt College, carried out systematic courses in the museum, and relations of mutual benefit were established with the British Broadcasting Corporation and the Edinburgh Public Libraries. In the technological department a very successful temporary exhibition, illustrating meteorology, was opened for three months. This was rendered possible by the assistance of manufacturers who lent specimens of the latest types of instruments, and of the Air Ministry, which loaned a series of historical apparatus for comparison. All branches of meteorology, including lightning, terrestrial magnetism and seismology, were represented. Later in the year a second exhibition was arranged consisting of aerial photographs lent by Aeroflms, Limited, and illustrating the progress made in aerial survey work and in the production of photographs of engineering works, golf courses, and housing schemes. A Caxton type printing press, a model of an oscillating engine for a paddle steamer, and some early Wheatstone telegraph instruments were presented by the Science Museum, London, while six models of ships were obtained from James Barr & Sons, these having become available owing to the closing down of Messrs. Beardmore's yard. A spark wireless set from a small steamer which was broken up at Grangemouth early in the year was added to the Science Gallery—Engineering (London).

ARTIST, ONCE FAMOUS, DIES IN POVERTY

Mrs. Wentworth Painted Queen Alexandra

PARIS, Aug. 30.—(Special Cable to The Star. Copyright.)—Mrs. Cecilia E. Wentworth, an American woman artist whose work is represented by canvasses now in the Vatican museum, the Luxembourg at Paris and the Metropolitan at New York, has died penniless and in privation, at Nice, on the French Riviera. She was 80 years old. She held the Papal title of Marchesa.

Mrs. Wentworth, who once had a home at Peakamose, a estate near West Shokan, N.Y., achieved artistic success early in life and paintings by her have been exhibited at every Paris salon since 1899. She painted portraits, among others, of Queen Alexandra, Pope Pius X, Pope Leo XIII, Theodore Roosevelt, William Howard Taft and a portrait by her of Gen. John J. Pershing hangs in the Invalides at Paris.

Her husband, Josias Wentworth, who had been given the Papal title which she also used, died two years ago at Paris, where they had resided for many years. Mrs. Wentworth thereafter sought seclusion on the Riviera, where she tried to make the meagre remainder of a once comfortable fortune meet the bare necessities of life.

Mrs. Wentworth had received decorations from the French and Italian Governments and was widely known in Europe. It is believed that, in the poverty of her last years, she was too proud to appeal for aid from her many influential friends and her death has come as a shock to many of them.

THE PICTURE KIDNAPPERS

PICTURE KIDNAPPING is such a new racket in Canada that we do not wonder at the crudity of the technique. They do it much better in Europe where they have been stealing famous pictures for quite a long time now. The amateurs who burglarized the Montreal Art Gallery might very well look in that direction for pointers.

In Europe they never make the mistake of stealing a Young Master. They wait until he becomes famous — it may be fifty years, it may be a hundred — and then they come back for him or send their grandsons.

Indeed none but an Old Master has ever any chance of getting stolen on the Continent. The price of all the Old Masters is well known and can be closely figured in any subsequent transactions.

A Young Master may have the Old Master beaten forty ways for line, color, perspective, chiaroscuro and all that sort of thing, but the fact remains that he is a Young Master and will probably not be an Old Master, with an almost astronomical value on his product, in time for the market.

That the Montreal crowd were tyros at the game is proved by the fact that they stole Young Masters whose price might be anything or nothing and overlooked half a million dollars worth of authentic Old Masters in the next room.

No professional would do a thing like that.

However, it is not impossible that the picture kidnapers did take a look at the Old Masters but passed them up for the Young Masters whom they may have judged to be Old Masters, or at least pastmasters at their art, because they painted so much better.

Whatever way one seeks to explain it the truth is plain enough — they were no connoisseurs. They didn't know their Old Masters.

ANOTHER mistake the Montreal lads made was suggesting a twenty-five per cent. ransom by the bereaved artists themselves.

It is notorious that all our artists are in the grip of the economic depression and even if they could scare up the money, who are they to fix the price?

Unless the price is plainly ticketed on the frame how is it to be arrived at? Twenty-five per cent of what? The value set on it by the artist to whom it may be more precious than rubies? Or the price the thieves can get for it in the underground market, which is sure to be a great deal less?

Here again Europe points the way. As we said before, the picture kidnapers over there do not steal Young Masters until they are hoary with age, but even if they did they would not be so foolish to ask the artists to ransom their own pictures — first because the artists wouldn't have the price and second because the regular routine is to sell to a multimillionaire American collector who doesn't care where the picture comes from or how so long as he has to pay enough. The more he pays the better he likes it and the more he thinks of the picture as a work of art.

The Montreal bunglers certainly show their amateurishness when they imagine that the artists can redeem their own pictures at anything like twenty-five per cent. of the price that a good customer who has taken a liking to the pictures would pay for them.

Plainly their dealings should be with the patrons of art who have the money rather than with the painters who have none.

The artist who has painted a new picture to duplicate the one the robbers have taken has the laugh on these amateurs.

STANDARD A GHASTLY JOKE

Sept. 16 1933

PAUL THOUIN was a man whom the world will be better without.

It is a cruel epitaph, but he had earned it.

His death by his own hand, after he had killed a policeman and disgorged the loot is a grim confirmation that crime does not pay.

* * * * *

IT is a toss-up whether Thouin was driven to suicide by remorse at having committed a murder, and the certainty that he would be hanged for his wicked deed—in which case he was discounting his finish by about two months — or by chagrin at having stolen the wrong pictures.

He got away with a thirty thousand dollar collection—if they would bring that much in these hard times—but missed a three million dollar outfit with that price assured did they go to market.

A simple mistake like that netted labor lost to the amount of two million nine hundred and seventy thousand dollars.

The laugh was on Thouin.

* * * * *

THE hapless wretch seems to have had a perverted sense of humor.

His idea of ransoming the pictures at half their alleged value under threat of cutting them up into jig saw puzzles if the money was not forthcoming, was not without pleasantry.

No doubt he revelled in the joke, laughed up his sleeve at his own playful badinage.

He laughed just as long as he did not know he had failed to steal the Van Horne collection.

When the newspapers revealed that outstanding fact, Thouin probably laughed on the other side of his face.

The joke was on him. It was then apparently that he lost his sense of humor. At all events he killed a policeman, rendered his profitless treasure, and poisoned himself.

Life was no longer worth living. The moral, if any, that art collectors should always be sure that they have right pictures.

LAURIER MUSEUM DRAWS ATTENTION

Gazette 12/9/33

New Collection Being Made in Statesman's Old Home at Arthabaska

MANY DONATIONS GIVEN

Three Rooms Arranged Exactly as When He Resided There—Furniture and Data at Hand

(Special to The Gazette).

Arthabaska, Que., September 11.—Several hundred persons have already visited the new Laurier museum which was established here in the old home of Sir Wilfrid Laurier early this summer and a number of new and intensely interesting exhibits have been donated by friends of the late Liberal chieftain and Canadian statesman.

Not the least interesting of these is a souvenir in the shape of a section of a tree on which the father of Sir Wilfrid carved his name years ago. This valuable and unusual exhibit was presented by Hon. Honore Mercier, Minister of Lands and Forests.

Madame J. E. Perrault, wife of the provincial Minister of Highways, has taken a deep personal interest in the museum and has succeeded in having three of the rooms of Sir Wilfrid and Lady Laurier's old home, including the salon, arranged exactly as they were when the distinguished Canadian couple lived in the house. Even the wall paper and the pictures and paintings adorning the walls of the rooms are identically the same as those which hung there during Sir Wilfrid Laurier's lifetime.

The well-known French-Canadian sculptor, Laliberte, has presented the museum with a collection of his works while an excellent portrait of Lady Laurier, painted by the artist himself, has been donated by Suzor Cote, a native of Arthabaska. A. G. Mackenzie, of Amherst, N.S., has sent the museum a portrait of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and two fine busts have been presented by Emile Vailancourt, of Outremont.

With the assistance of Hon. Senator F. L. Beique, a fine collection of old Canadian furniture has been secured for the Laurier museum. P. G. Roy, provincial archivist, has prepared an important set of historical documents which have been collected for the museum, including correspondence between Sir Wilfrid and the late Hon. Edward Blake, of Toronto; parliamentary cartoons and private letters and documents supplied by Hon. H. G. Carroll, Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec; Hon. Ernest Lapointe, M.P., former Minister of Justice; and Hon. Lucien Cannon, K.C., former Solicitor-General.

The Laurier museum is conveniently situated and easy of access, being only two miles off the main Montreal to Quebec highway, via Victoriaville. The museum is being formed on an entirely voluntary basis and gifts of an historical nature from former friends of Sir Wilfrid Laurier will be gladly accepted. These should be addressed in care of Madame J. E. Perrault, Arthabaska.

Pictures by M. A. Fortin Star Are Shown at Eaton's

The collection of pictures in oil, water color and pastel by the Montreal painter, Marc Aurel Fortin, which is now being shown in the gallery of the T. Eaton Company, contains some of the best work that he has exhibited. In all of them there is his usual intensity and gaiety of color which give to them a fine decorative value, but in many of them the sky is treated according to a convention of Mr. Fortin's own, which does not always quite agree with the naturalism of the landscape. The view from Westmount mountain appears in several of these pictures and one of them is particularly successful and decorative; there are also several very happy pictures of typical Quebec houses. A large picture of a tree by the side of the Back River makes a striking decoration but the tree is in rather startling contrast with the sky behind it. In some of the other landscapes the nearer trees are painted according to a sort of formula to which one must get accustomed before one can appreciate the picture; they are sometimes simplified in a way that does not quite agree with the greater amount of detail in the rest of the picture. But in all of them the clearness and vividness of the color are pleasant to see.

ORIGINAL ART WORK ON VIEW

Loyola Sociological Society Awards Prizes to Montreal Artists

An interesting collection of original art sketches entered in the annual Art Contest for Montreal artists, arranged by the Loyola Sociological Society, is now on view at 1126 Drummond Street and will be until the end of the month. There is a marked increase in the number of entries this year, a total of 75 being on view. The sole judge of the contest, Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., has made the following awards:

In Colour, any subject—1st Prize, $20.00, awarded to Leslie Coppold; subject: "Chinese Lanterns and Bitter Sweet;" 2nd Prize, $10.00, Nesta Low; subject: "Street Scene;" Hon. Mention, Gwendolyn Sait; subject: "Bout de l'île."

Black-&White—1st Prize, $15.00 to Ide Lyman; subject: "Girl, nude;" 2nd Prize, No Award: Hon. Mention, Katherine Finn; subject: "Study of Bird."

The standard of work sent in, according to Mr. Simpson is higher than last year's. Studies in oil, water-color and pastel fill the larger room; a smaller collection of black-and-white includes studies in charcoal and pen-and-ink. The subjects cover a wide range of choice, including buildings, street scenes, portraits, figures, flowers, etc. A few pictures lent by Montreal artists who are hors concours, and specimens of students' work from the Guild's studio are also shown. The Exhibition is now open to the public daily, 10 to 5 o'clock. The Loyola Sociological Society is a group of graduates and other past students of the Loyola School of Sociology and Social Service, who have chosen this way to encourage while also calling attention to the creative talent to the community, number and variety of beauty spots in and near Montreal. On the recent retirement of Mrs. H. P. Nightingale, Herbert Potter was elected president, with Miss Katherine Finn, re-elected as honorary secretary-treasurer. The Montreal membership is about 30. A number of the graduates fill important positions as social workers in other cities.

Les Indiens dépeints de façon neuve

Louis Rigal, peintre français, a passé trois mois à les étudier dans l'Ouest.

A L'ART ASSOCIATION

LOUIS RIGAL, le grand Prix de Rome 1919 avec lequel nous avons eu une longue entrevue il y a quelque trois mois, lorsqu'il vint à Montréal, nous est revenu ces jours-ci pour exposer à la Galerie des Arts (Art Association), 1379 ouest, rue Sherbrooke, une série de têtes indiennes et de totems peints durant le séjour fructueux qu'il a fait, depuis lors dans l'Ouest. C'a été pour lui comme une sorte de distraction et d'étude spéciale en marge des larges fresques et des oeuvres décoratives dans lesquelles il s'est spécialisé jusqu'ici. Le type indien a toujours exercé une sorte de fascination pour les artistes étrangers, et à cet égard Rigal n'a fait que suivre une tradition créée par de bons devanciers. Mais il a vu neuf. Il s'est donné un genre bien éloigné des figures de "pâtisserie", des fines esquisses ou du travail fini, toutes manières essayées jusqu'ici, et il s'est jeté résolument dans de fortes, voire de brutales études de têtes, comme il est sans doute l'un des seuls à l'avoir fait.

Du caractère

Il a flanqué sur le papier d'énormes têtes, qu'encadre à peine la chevelure lisse et bleu-jaïs. Les plis et les rides, les saillies en sont analysées avec un relief hardi, où l'on reconnaît la méthode du sculpteur habitué aux formes arrêtées. N'a-t-il pas poussé son audace sûre d'elle-même jusqu'à peindre une vieille tête criblée des stigmates laissés par la variole, et tenté à cette occasion un rapprochement entre la figure fraîche d'une jeune fille et les traits si usés de sa mère? Ses têtes d'Indiens, posées en gros et sans façon, sans le moindre artifice, sont éloquentes de caractère primitif, vrai, vivant. On est sûr qu'il les a vues sur place. Il y en a des brunes cuivrées, encadrées de chevelure d'acier; il y a des études en noir et d'autres en rouge-brûlé.

Leurs fortes proportions suggèrent un peu l'affiche et nul doute qu'elles constitueraient, avec les diverses descriptions de totems, des annonces fort significatives pour les chemins de fer, par exemple.

La poésie des totems

En manière de contraste, Rigal expose plusieurs études attachantes de totems. Il s'est appliqué à en étudier la silhouette dans ses toiles en noir, mais ses descriptions en couleurs pâles et presque effacées respirent une singulière poésie, celle des mystères rituels associés aux totems des Indiens. C'est là que l'étrange couleur des choses en allées se dégage avec une vérité qui rend songeur, et que les bleus et mauves estompés prennent une signification mélancolique.

En marge apparaissent une couple de paysages forts: une vue de l'hôtel de Banff entre les sapins et la montagne pâle, une étude résolue de bleus et de verts dans un extérieur sauvage; un tableau qui roule de beaux nuages, etc.

De Vancouver à Paris

Rigal vient d'exposer avec beaucoup de succès à Vancouver. Ses études indiennes resteront affichées à la Galerie des Arts à Montréal jusqu'au 10 septembre, puis prendront le chemin d'Ottawa et de Québec, avant que le peintre ne retourne bientôt en France. Il n'a que des louanges à faire de l'extrême obligeance du département des affaires indiennes, de M. Marius Barbeau, des chemins de fer et des autorités de la Galerie des Arts, pour l'accueil empressé qu'il a reçu.

Sur une table, au milieu du petit salon de la Galerie des Arts où il expose, il a réuni des photographies de ses oeuvres sculptées ou décoratives (Prix de Rome 1919, décorations du Waldorf-Astoria à New-York, fresques, etc.) dont nous avons déjà parlé avec éloges.

National Gallery Of Canada "Most Efficient In Empire"

Statement By Secretary of The Museums' Association Of Great Britain After Empire Tour. Tribute To Effective Educational Program.

BY LUKIN JOHNSTON

From The Evening Citizen's London News Bureau
Copyright by Southam Publishing Co.

LONDON, Sept. 22.—"The National Gallery of Canada at Ottawa is probably the most efficient of all dominion galleries in the Empire. Others may be richer but Ottawa combines richness with an effective educational program that brings the blessing of art into the remote backwoods of the vast Canadian sub-continent."

This striking tribute is paid by S. F. Markham, secretary of the Museums' Association of Great Britain, in the columns of the Times. With Sir Henry Miers, president of the Museums' Association of Great Britain, Mr. Markham made a comprehensive study of the Empire's art galleries and museums. In the course of a review lamenting the inability of the dominions to purchase an adequate number of pictures of the historic European schools, he suggests that the London National Gallery should send on loan to the dominions examples of the great masters, scores of whose pictures lie useless in vaults from sheer redundancy.

La métropole en quelques croquis

Dessins et esquisses du concours de la Loyola Sociological Society. — Montréal abonde, pourtant, en coins pittoresques. — Relique douteuse. — Un film.

Prélude à la saison d'art

ON pouvait s'attendre à beaucoup mieux du concours de la Loyola Sociological Society, à mon humble avis. Sans doute faut-il tenir compte que la plupart des candidats peuvent être assez jeunes, puisque le concours d'été était ouvert à tous les artistes de 16 ans et plus. Mais un coup d'oeil dans la salle mise à la disposition des exposants par le Catholic Social Service Guild, à 1126 rue Drummond, ne jette pas dans des transports d'enthousiasme. Une nuée de croquis, dont plusieurs sont clairs-obscur et pas plus grands que ça. Peu de chose de caractéristique. Si on réfléchit qu'il ne s'agit ici que des dessins acceptés et de sujets ayant trait à Montréal et aux environs, pour sûr qu'il y a à se demander si la métropole n'abonde pas, pourtant, en coins pittoresques, faciles à synthétiser en quelques traits expressifs et pleins. Quoi! pas plus de petites "compositions" que ça? Des thèmes sans harmonisation?...

Visions fugitives

Il faut tout de même mentionner qu'on trouve dans l'ensemble de jolis sujets. Quelques jeunes artistes ont le coup d'oeil rapide et fin; tel, celui qui a dessiné en traits fugaces la scène d'hiver que l'on trouvera reproduite à côté. Certaines esquisses à la plume ont de la précision. L'un surtout des pastels consacrés au lever du soleil nous est apparu vibrant. Dans le reste il faut louer les qualités de travail et souhaiter qu'elles prévalent aux qualités de recherche et d'originalité.

Les prix décernés

M. Charles-W. Simpson, R. C. A., juge du concours, a déclaré que les candidats ont été plus nombreux pour le 2e concours annuel de la Loyola Sociological Society. En tout 75 travaux sont exposés. En général, dit-il, la qualité du travail est meilleure, bien que le caractère en soit moins accentué. Les prix ont été décernés comme suit: Sujets en couleurs: 1er prix, Leslie Coppold, pour "Chinese Lanterns and Bitter Sweet"; 2e prix, Nesta Low, pour "Scène de rue"; mention, Gwendolyn Sait, pour "Bout de l'île". Sujets en noir et blanc: 1er prix, Ide Lyman, pour "Nu"; 2e prix, mention, Katherine Finn, pour "Etude d'oiseau".

Les aquarelles et pastels occupent une chambre et les noirs et blancs, une autre. Le public est invité à visiter de 10 a.m. à 5 h. p.m., le dimanche excepté.

Il ne sera pas sans intérêt de signaler que le Loyola Sociological Society est un groupe d'ex-étudiants de la Loyola School of Sociology and Social Service qui s'efforce d'encourager les jeunes talents et d'attirer l'attention sur le nombre de la variété des jolis coins de Montréal et de la région environnante. Elle compte actuellement 30 membres et

M. Herbert Potter vient d'en être élu président à la démission de Mme H.-P. Nightingale.

Resquilleurs

LES resquilleurs de reliques d'histoire abondent. La crise semble fertile à cet égard. En tous cas, il me souvient d'avoir examiné par acquit de conscience, récemment, un mémorial écrit sur rouleau, une croix de feuilles sèches et un canif, le tout censé avoir été la propriété d'un compagnon de Jacques Cartier. Celui qui nous les prêtait était de bonne foi. Or, il a été découvert, l'accidant, que le canif était d'une marque anglaise encore sur le marché et que le mémorial ne datait sûrement pas de 1534. Sans compter nombre d'autres incongruités. Est-ce pour cela qu'une autre publication a donné foi et publicité à ces reliques "authentiques"!!!!

"Song of Songs"

IL m'a été donné de souligner en compte rendu pour la page du cinéma, mardi, la valeur hautement picturale du film "Song of Songs", le succès de Marlene Dietrich. L'atmosphère du film est créée en bonne partie par la présence d'une superbe blancheur de nu, d'une statue élanée dans laquelle s'incarne le rêve de l'héroïne et du jeune sculpteur qui l'aime. Le réalisateur a eu soin également de faire travailler l'artiste à sa charpente, à sa glaise puis à son modelage, plutôt que de nous servir le truc habituel de l'artiste qui travaille à une oeuvre bel et bien finie. Le studio respire la vérité; l'artiste joue vrai. La statue elle-même, si elle ne dit rien du point de vue physiognomie, exprime par ailleurs de façon juste l'élan de la bien-aimée qui soupire après celui qu'elle aime. Car il s'agit, n'est-ce pas, du "Cantique des cantiques": "J'ai cherché celui que mon coeur aime, et je ne l'ai point trouvé". Le texte biblique a mieux servi, du reste, l'oeuvre de sculpture que le récit lui-même.

Notes et rappels

LOUIS RIGAL, peintre français, expose jusqu'au 10 septembre, à la Galerie des Arts, des têtes et scènes indiennes peintes sur le vif en Colombie-britannique et en Alberta. Nous leur avons consacré une analyse dans la "Presse" de samedi le 2 septembre.

Percy-E. Nobbs, architecte mont-réalais, exposera à la Galerie des Arts au début d'octobre.

La restauration des toiles de la collection Van Horne se poursuit activement à la Galerie des Arts, sous les soins de la maison Sydney Carter.

Ivan Jobin ouvre un studio à l'ombre du Conservatoire national de musique. Il en étudiera les courbes.

Il y aura bientôt à Montréal une exposition spéciale des oeuvres de Louis Icart.

A l'exposition du Canadien National qui se tient actuellement à Toronto les tenants de l'Ecole des 28 (ci-devant Ecole des Sept d'Ontario) paraissent avoir le haut bout, Jackson en tête. Leur formule est avant tout synthétique et décorative, comme bien l'on sait. Un certain nombre de peintres américains sont les invités d'honneur.

André, collégien et fils de Mme Audet, du Conservatoire national de musique, a parlé l'autre jour, à l'Heure provinciale, de "Georges Delfosse et de son oeuvre", qui se recommande précisément par son absence de déclamation puérile.

Le prix de Rome en architecture a été décerné cette année à Alexandre-Alfred Courtois, de Paris, et en sculpture à Ulysse-Antoine Gemignani, de Paris. Les sujets proposés ont été respectivement "Une église de pèlerinage" et "Orphée apaise la tempête".

La politique n'est jamais quelconque du moment qu'on y mêle des principes d'art, quels qu'ils soient. Voyez Hitler; il ressuscite pour le compte de l'histoire la querelle classique de l'art international vs l'art nationaliste.

Cloth Clipping Craft Pictures On Exhibition

Monitor Sept. 14/33
Unusual Technique Employed in New Medium of Self-Expression; Some Fine Pictures

An unusual technique is employed as a medium of self-impression by Elsa Meri-Kallio, whose work is on exhibition at the Westmount Y.M.C.A. this week. The exhibitor is an artist but does not use a brush to create the work. Instead clippings of cloth are effectively employed. All kinds of fabrics are utilized in the art. They are cut in pieces the shape of their portion of the picture they comprise and are simply pasted in place. Many kinds of cloth are used in a single picture, each representing a certain feature. A piece of a green dress may be used for grass while a pocket of an old overcoat may be pasted on to represent the roof of a barn. Flowers, of many varieties, may be created by using many different clothes.

The general effect of the technique is very much like some boldly brushed modern painting and from a distance one can hardly realize that he is just looking at rags. That there is even beauty in scraps if one takes the trouble and has the patience to find it, is the impression gleaned by the visitor to the exhibition where over sixty framed specimens of the art are on public display.

The exhibition includes a wide diversity of interesting subjects, with flower pieces predominant. Landscapes also lend themselves without too much effort on the part of the "craftsman" to this theme.

Several frames contain deftly handled human figures but it appears harder to create effectively a "cloth clipping picture" of a person. The handling of the facial features is so intricate that unless the finished product is viewed from a distance it loses much of its charm. On the other hand, silhouettes have a unique appeal.

The exhibition opened at the Westmount Branch of the Y.M.C.A. on Monday and will be on public view there until Saturday. It is opened daily from two to eight o'clock.

THOS. W. MITCHELL SHOWS PAINTINGS

Gazette 5/10/33

Many Quebec Scenes in Collection at Eaton Fine Art Galleries

Landscape paintings by Thomas W. Mitchell, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., grace the walls of the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Co. Limited of Montreal, and will make appeal to picture-lovers who find satisfaction in seeing Nature recorded as it appears to them. Mr. Mitchell, capably equipped as a painter in oils, has an engaging sense of design and is an agreeable colorist. All seasons of the year have furnished him with comely subjects which have been set down without exaggeration. Keeping his colors clean and his touch generally light, he invests his canvases with a convincing suggestion of atmosphere. Well versed in what will make a good picture, Mr. Mitchell has found congenial material in many places. Varying tastes will find something to attract in these generally moderately-sized paintings, tastefully hung in two galleries.

"In Rural Quebec" features an old house, ox-cart and blue hills under a sunny sky. Figures are grouped about a fire near a tent at the edge of a lake in "The Camp." A massive hill in partial shadow backs trees and buildings in "The Mill Orchard, Quebec," and rolling wooded country with trees in autumn leaf are the pictorial elements of "The Beaver Valley." Noble dark hills rise above the stream in "Grey Day, Ottawa Valley," and the colors are light and vibrant in "Mary Stafford's"—a farmhouse amid leafy trees in glaring sunlight. "By the St. Lawrence" is marked by an admirably painted white horse in a field high above the sunlit waters that wash blue headlands. Autumn is the season of "Evening, Lake Boshkung" with gay foliage, blue water and a shadowed foreground splashed with sunlight. The colorful glory of the Fall is also revealed in "Reflections, Hall's Lake," "Early Autumn," "Credit River, Autumn," "The Flaming Maple," and the imposing landscape with bridge, morning water and golden foliage called "The Ironwood Tree."

Distinctly rural is "Milking, Quebec"—a farmer at his humble task near barns, with a hilly distance beyond. "Birches, Clear Lake" is a summer subject, while of the same season are "The Road to Murray Bay" and "The Day of Rest"—the latter showing three horses in a field above a river, with distant hills under a spacious sky. "Springtime" gives a vistas of apple-trees in blossom, with sheep and lambs in the shadowed grass. "Old Orchard," with cows, distant bush and hills, suggests heat, while more temperate atmosphere is suggested by the mist-wreathed blue hills in "St. Urbain, Quebec." "Pines, Clear Lake," shows a fringe of noble trees edging blue water with distant bush. The Quebec paintings make an attractive group.

24 STOLEN PAINTINGS BACK IN GALLERY

RANSOM BEHIND THEFT

Recovery of Valuable Works of Art Linked With Crime
—Total Value
$15,000

All the pictures stolen from the Montreal Art Association's gallery last spring at the conclusion of their exhibition were returned to the gallery yesterday in good condition with the exception of the one by Marc Aurele Fortin that was sent in two pieces to local newspaper offices with a demand for ransom. The artists have been notified and may have their works back again at their convenience.

The pictures were delivered by the provincial police following their discovery buried in the ground at L'Epiphanie, whether the police were led by Paul Thouin who had confessed to the theft. He admitted he had been after the masterpieces in the famous Van Horne collection which were temporarily at the gallery following a fire at the residence. He would have had little difficulty in collecting a ransom for their return from the insurance companies, but in mistake he took the pictures submitted for exhibition in the Association's annual salon. Two artists had expressed their willingness to pay for the return of portraits, but none of the others negotiated for the return of their works, and Thouin's attempts to obtain money for them proved abortive.

LIST OF PICTURES.

The sixteen pictures stolen were the following: Arrangement in Black and Grey, by A. Sherriff Scott, Montreal, valued in the catalogue at $400; portrait of Miss H. Craig, by R. S. Hewton, Montreal, not for sale; portraits of Dr. A. W. Archibald and Norman Dawes, by Alphonse Jongers, Montreal, valued at $3,000 each; portraits of Dr. A. L. Lockwood and John B. Laidlaw, by Kenneth Forbes, Toronto, $3,000 each; portrait of Dr. J. A. Mirault by J. St. Charles, Montreal, not for sale; Late Autumn Landscape, by Marc Aurele Fortin, Montreal, $100 (This was the picture sent in half to two newspapers). The Gold Fleece, by Max Schultz, Outremont, $250; Petite Riviere aux Renards, by G. S. Bagley, $200; The Moorland Bridge, Elizabeth Styring Nutt, Halifax, $450; Three Old Houses, Louisa Street, Toronto, by Peter C. Sheppard, Toronto, $300; The Green Boat, Peter C. Sheppard, Toronto, $250; The Swimming Hole, Henry J. Simpkins, Verdun, $275; At the Bird Bath, Alberta Cleland, Montreal, $350; Portrait Study, Marjorie Smith, Montreal. The total valuation of the 16 pictures was in the neighborhood of $15,000.

STORY OF RECOVERY.

How the recovery of the fifteen canvases, stolen this spring from the Montreal Art Association Gallery on Sherbrooke street west, came about was learned yesterday.

It was known in police circles for some time that Thouin had some information concerning the case and it was even suggested that he was the negotiator between the supposed robbers and the police.

For three weeks W. D. MacWorth, a local insurance adjuster and investigator, had been working on the case representing the insurance companies. He communicated with Leonce Plante, K.C., lawyer for Thouin, in his several cases before the local courts, asking for aid. But Thouin refused to give any information.

Following his arrest at Lanoraie on Friday morning Thouin was brought to the provincial police cells in Montreal and he was questioned concerning the pictures. He refused to give any information to either the provincial police or to MacWorth. But on Saturday morning after a long interview with his lawyer and MacWorth in the presence of Chief Jargaille and several officers, he finally agreed to give the information. He stated that he had nothing to lose since he was now accused of a much more serious crime and that perhaps his action in giving up the pictures would enable him to obtain a less severe sentence in connection with the charge of robbery.

So Thouin then admitted that he and other persons had stolen the paintings. He said that he believed at the time he was stealing the famous Van Horne collection said to be worth $750,000 which had been removed to the art gallery following the fire in the Van Horne residence some time before. It was only after the robbery that Thouin discovered through the newspapers, he said, that he had made a mistake.

Then he had hidden the canvases. Half of the pictures were buried in the ground at L'Epiphanie and the other half were concealed in the cellar of a house in Montreal. He told the police where they could find the first half in the city and the pictures were soon at headquarters. Then he described where the second half were buried at Lavaltrie but it was realized that the task of unearthing them after finding the exact spot was too difficult and it was decided to go there with Thouin. He had led the police officers to the spot and in a few moments they had recovered the remaining paintings intact. They were also taken to headquarters.

Leonce Plante, K.C., stated yesterday that it was through the co-operation of W. D. MacWorth and the provincial police, together with his own advice to Thouin, that the pictures had been recovered.

Art Treasure Trove Dug From Hillside By Sleuths

Herald Sept. 12, 1933.

(By Staff Photographer).

Here are a few of the sixteen paintings stolen from the Montreal Art Gallery during the Spring Exhibition by the master burglar, Paul Thouin, who suicided in dramatic manner Sunday night. On the day before he ended his life Thouin led Chief Jargaille, Sergeant Lasnier and others to the spot on a hillside near L'Epiphanie where the paintings were buried. They were practically undamaged. Yesterday they hung on show in the guardroom at Provincial Police headquarters. Insert is Sergeant-Detective Lasnier who aided Chief Jargaille in the recovery of the paintings and the investigation of the murder of Constable Mackie for which Thouin was held.

STOLEN ART PICTURES RECOVERED BEFORE THOUIN'S SUICIDE

As stated in the Star of Thursday last Thouin was the man who held the secret of the pictures stolen from the Art Gallery spring exhibition.

He led the police Saturday to the cache where the paintings were hidden. Above are some of the works of art which were not harmed in any way. W. D. MacWorth, special investigator, had been dealing with Thouin for the return of the pictures previous to the shooting.

There were 16 pictures stolen from the Gallery and one was cut in half and sent to La Presse and The Star by the thief who asked 25 per cent of their value for their return. All were found intact.

A list of the recovered pictures follows:
Petite Riviere aux Renards, by G. S. Bagley, $200.
The Moorland Bridge, by Elizabeth Styring Nutt, $450.
The Gold Fleece, by Max Schultz, $250.
Three Old Houses, Louisa Street, Toronto, by Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A., $300.
The Green Boat, by the same, $250.
The Swimming Hole, by Henry J. Simpkins, $275.
At the Bird Bath, by Alberta Cleland, $350.
A Late Fall Landscape, by M. A. Fortin, $75.
Arrangement in Black and Grey, by A. Sherriff Scott, $450.
Portraits by K. K. Forbes, A.R.C.A., R. S. Hewton, A.R.C.A., Alphonse Jongers, J. St. Charles, A.R.C.A., and Marjorie Smith.

Strychnine Hidden in Heel of Shoe Secured by Thouin from Home While Leading Police to Stolen Pictures

Guard Finds Prisoner Dead With Wrecked Shoes at Side — Paintings Found Hidden on Hillside at L'Epiphanie, Undamaged — Thouin Admitted Shooting of Mackie to Provincial Chief

PAUL THOUIN, 31, gang chief who was caught on Friday morning literally red-handed with the blood of C.P.R. Investigator James Mackie, killed himself last night between 11 and 12 o'clock with strychnine which he had concealed in the heel of his shoe. His body was discovered by Guard Leduc of the provincial police in his cell at 11.45 p.m. On Saturday afternoon he had led Chief Jargaille and other officers to a hillside six miles from L'Epiphanie and pointed out the spot where he had concealed 15 pictures valued at some $15,000 which he admitted having stolen from the exhibition of the Montreal Art Association this spring. At the same time he confessed that he had really intended to steal the extremely valuable Van Horne collections of old masters which is insured for something like $750,000 and was at that time temporarily housed in the art gallery.

GOT NEW CLOTHES

Thouin made his trip to L'Epiphanie the excuse for calling at his house and getting new clothes. He changed before the eyes of four officers of the Provincial Police, and put on the shoes which he knew carried the poison that would release him from the battle in the criminal courts that faced him. The officers searched the new clothes, and examined the shoes too, but the poison was so carefully concealed that short of tearing the shoes to pieces and making them useless, it could not have been found.

When Thouin was arrested in the railway yards near Lanoraie, after the struggle which resulted in the death of Investigator Mackie, he was wearing a pair of running shoes, as was Gaston Bouchard, his alleged companion.

These running shoes were taken from both prisoners by the provincial police because they wished to test the sand crusted on them, and the actual footprints against casts of tracks left at a burglary near Joliette two months ago. Since the cell in which he was confined had a cement floor, Thouin's request for permission to get another pair of shoes from his home was considered reasonable.

PREPARED LONG AGO.

Thouin must have made preparations long ago for suicide. He was a desperate criminal, according to the police, and for the past two years, on his own confession, had carried a revolver on him ready to shoot his way to freedom rather than go to prison again. The poison was his last line of defence from jail. It was contained in the lower portion of a small tin of corn-cure, little more than three-quarters of an inch in diameter and a quarter of an inch thick, and he must have concealed it in the right heel so long a time ago that he had forgotten himself which shoe it was in, for when he was discovered dead in his bunk last night, both shoes had their heels wrenched off, making it clear that he had first pried the heel off the wrong shoe.

TUMULT CAUSED.

Thouin's suicide in the provincial police cells threw the local department into a tumult of excitement which lasted until well on into the morning today. Newspapermen who heard early that Thouin had been found dead, could obtain no details of the suicide until close on 10 a.m., when Chief Louis Jargaille came out of a conference which had included Chief Maurice Lalonde and Leonce Plante, counsel for Thouin, and W. D. MacWorth, private investigator who had been trying to recover the stolen pictures for the Montreal Art Association.

At that time Chief Maurice Lalonde told the newspapermen that so far as he could see no one could be blamed for Thouin's death, and that all ordinary precautions had been taken to keep the prisoner from doing himself harm.

STORY OF SUICIDE.

Chief Jargaille later gave the full account of what had happened.

He spoke first of the recovery of the paintings, declaring that from private sources of information he had long suspected Thouin of connection with the robbery of the exhibition. Indeed he said that once he and several officers made a quiet search of Thouin's home, then on Dandurand street, and that though they did not find the paintings, this search drove Thouin to concealing them in the country.

"On Friday I questioned him about the paintings," the Chief related, "and in the beginning he refused to say anything at all about them. He said that he knew that he had committed murder and that he was going to go to the scaffold, and so, what was the use of telling where the pictures were, since he could do himself no good by doing so."

ASKED FOR LAWYER.

"Finally, however, he asked for Leonce Plante, his solicitor, whom he asked for advice. Mr. Plante, to whom I am very grateful, at once urged that he could restore the pictures to their owners. And then he gave us directions for the finding of the place where he had concealed them."

But the directions were too involved and eventually Thouin volunteered to lead the search party. This, made up of Chief Jargaille, Sergeant Detective Lasnier and Detectives Robert and Fournier set forth early on Saturday afternoon.

"Six miles beyond L'Epiphanie," Chief Jargaille told the story, "we plunged into the bush and came to a long and very steep hill. Thouin led the way to a point about 100 feet from the top of the hill. Here he stopped and took measurements from a clump of three maples. Twenty-five feet towards a big rock, he went, and then took a line on another tree. Then he told us to dig.

PICTURES FOUND

The officers dug, and three feet below the surface of forest mold they came upon a big roll wrapped in water proof tarpaulin. They were the pictures, and for the next few minutes the bushes around that particular spot were hung with valuable canvases as the officers checked whether the contents of the bundle actually came to fifteen.

"They were very well packed," said Chief Jargaille, "with four or five newspapers between each picture."

When the reporters examined the paintings in one of the offices this morning, the chief's words appeared to be borne out. They were undamaged but for a few flecks of newspaper adhering to one portrait.

The party returned triumphant at 8.30 p.m. on Saturday, and Thouin gave every sign of being about to tell of all the crimes with which he had been concerned.

"I spent all day Sunday with him," Chief Jargaille said, "and he told me of many things. He gave me a full confession of the shooting of Mackie."

"Signed and legal?" A reporter asked.

"I cannot answer that question," replied the Chief.

BOUCHARD COMPANION.

"He told me that Bouchard was his companion alright, although he said: 'I will never go into the witness box against him—I'm no squealer.' He told me also about other robberies."

"Did he name any accomplices in the Art Gallery theft?" reporters asked.

"I will not answer that," the Chief said. Later, however, he said that Thouin had admitted that he had committed the robbery himself, and that he had actually gone in for the Van Horne collection.

"I made a big mistake," the Chief quoted him as saying. "If I had got the right pictures I would not be in this trouble now. I could have got rid of them easily enough to the insurance company. I thought the Van Horne pictures were downstairs, when actually they were in the attic."

At 6:30 p.m. last night, Chief Jargaille left Thouin, and loaned him a book on his request.

"He seemed to be in good spirits, and asked to see his lawyer this morning as he had an important statement to make. My report from Leduc and Bernard who patrolled the

Thouin's Trick To Get Poison Proved Clever

Used Stolen Pictures As Excuse To Visit Home And Secure Shoes

IT seems reasonable to assume that Paul Thouin agreed to show provincial police officers the hiding place of the pictures he had stolen from the Montreal Art Association exhibition only because the trip to get the pictures would enable him to go to his home and get the poison with which he ended his life.

Officers with him who included Chief Jargaille, Sergeant Detective Lasnier and two others saw nothing strange in his request for permission to don another pair of shoes since the running shoes which he wore when arrested had been taken away from him.

"AFTER all," Chief Jargaille told reporters this morning, "it would have been cruelly not to give him shoes, because the cell in which he was confined had a cement floor."

And so on the way out of town on Saturday afternoon the police car drew up at Thouin's residence and the prisoner was brought up to his former bedroom.

HERE he changed his clothes, each article of clothing being carefully searched before he was permitted to put it on.

"The shoes too were searched, although, of course not taken apart," said Chief Jargaille. "There were, we could see, only two pairs of shoes from which he could choose. The other pair was very old and one of the shoes was split down one side. Hence his choice of the shoes he took was reasonable."

corridor is that he ate lightly at 7:30, but would not take more than a few bites of pie. At 8 p.m. he asked for a smoke. That was the last time the guards spoke to him.

GUARD NOTICED.

At 11.45 p.m. Guard Leduc, making his 15-minute tour of the cell gratings saw that the book which Thouin had been reading had fallen down on his chest. He was lying in his bunk covered by blankets, and appeared to be asleep. Lights are on all the time in the cell which measures 20 by 12 feet.

Something strangely white about Thouin's forehead attracted the guard's attention and he shook the bars of the cell to waken him. There was no reply. He called Thouin's name and then unlocked the cell, entering with Bernard, his companion.

Both felt Thouin's forehead, and it appeared normally warm. But Thouin was already dead.

The two shoes, the heels wrenched off as if Thouin had wedged them somehow between bars and then pulled hard, were under the bunk.

Thouin's face, according to Chief Jargaille was composed and peaceful, in spite of the painful death which he must have suffered from strychnine, a poison which ordinarily contorts the body of the victim in horrible fashion.

Never in the history of the medico-legal laboratory has a murder case come to such a dramatic conclusion as that of the Mackie case. Shortly after midnight when Chief Jargaille of the provincial police was informed of Thouin's suicide, Dr. J. M. Roussel, medico-legal expert, was notified and following an examination of the body, it was at once established that Thouin had done away with himself by taking poison.

Both Drs. Fontaine and Roussel, aided by Franchere Pepin, chemist, analyzed some of the fluid taken from Thouin's body and it was established that he had poisoned himself with strychnine.

The brown shoes in which the prisoner had secreted the poison were also examined and both doctors expressed the opinion that there was not the slightest doubt but that the poison had been taken from the little tin box, concealed in one of the heels. The box was a container for some cure of foot ailment.

In the wake of suicide the doctors made another discovery which they reported to the provincial police this morning. At the time of his arrest, Thouin was wearing a pair of black running shoes, the soles of which bore heavy zig-zag ridges made in the manufacturing. On Saturday morning, these shoes were taken from Thouin and given to Drs. Fontaine and Roussel.

The running shoes were put under the microscope to be carefully examined so as to ascertain whether or not they corresponded with plaster casts of footprints found at scenes of different crimes. The shoes corresponded in every way to a moulding of a footprint found following a burglary of a Joliette store two months ago, in which $800 worth of tobacco was stolen.

"There is not the slightest doubt but that the footprint was made by the wearer of the shoe which was brought to us," said Dr. Fontaine. "The provincial police, following the Joliette burglary brought us a pair of shoes which they had found on a man whom they arrested for another theft, and at the time they said they were certain that the man had committed the robbery in Joliette. We examined them and in spite of the certainty of the police, we informed them that they were not the same as used at Joliette, although they resembled them closely."

Deputy Coroner Pierre Hebert, when asked when the inquest would take place, answered that because of the fact that it had already been opened in the presence of a jury, it would be held on Thursday.

In the meantime an autopsy will be made of Thouin's body and all evidence of how he died will be brought before the same jurymen, who will hear the Mackie case.

Paul Thouin Dies From Poison Hidden In Shoe

Herald 11/9/33

Self-Slain Prisoner Linked With Art Thefts Last Winter—Police Make Finds.

Cheating the scaffold, Paul Thouin, 28, policeman's killer, committed suicide in the cells of Provincial Police shortly after midnight this morning. He died from poison which he carried in a hollow in the heel of his right shoe. Apparently the killer had carried the poison for some time and had forgotten which heel held the fatal drug. Both heels of his ~~shoes~~ were torn off. The right heel showed a hollow which held the miniature box of poison.

At 12.15 this morning, the guard making his rounds in the cells found Thouin's body laying on the floor beside the bunk. He was dead.

Thouin was arrested early Friday morning at the Lanoraie, Que., railway yards shortly after he had fired four fatal shots at Constable Mackie of the C.P.R. police.

With the announcement that Thouin had killed himself this morning, the provincial police announced that they had recovered all paintings stolen from the Art Gallery last Spring.

The dead ex-convict is believed to have been implicated in the theft. He had been appointed go-between by police in negotiations between the alleged thieves and the owners.

Shortly after his arrest Thouin, and his alleged partner in the box-car thefts at Lanoraie, Gaston Bouchard, were brought to the cells of the Provincial Police here. They were later advised of the death of the police officer on Friday night.

Thouin took the announcement with a fit of hysterics and cried for most of the night. He appeared calmer Saturday morning and accompanied the detectives to the cache where the paintings were hidden.

Investigator James Mackie of C. P. R. Police Dying in Hospital Here — Paul Thouin, Well-Known to Police, Arrested After Shooting — Alleged Companion Found Later

ACTING-INVESTIGATOR James Mackie of the Canadian Pacific Railway Police, is dying in the Royal Victoria Hospital, while Paul Thouin, out on bail on a charge of local burglary and active in abortive efforts to return the $30,000-worth of paintings stolen from the Montreal Art Association's spring exhibition, is in jail at Joliette, Que., charged with the shooting, the result of a battle between the railway's protective force and freight-car thieves, on a siding at Lanoraie, 48 miles east of Montreal on the main line to Quebec, in the small hours of this morning. Gaston Bouchard, arrested at St. Thomas, a few miles from Joliette, is also held, but denies all knowledge of the affair. The arrests were made by Investigator W. G. Miller, who was on duty with Mackie at the time.

WATCHED CARS

Acting on instructions from their headquarters, the two railway detectives visited Lanoraie station and siding last night, watching a long line of freight-cars, as the result of complaints of pilfering at the junction point for Joliette, extending over a prolonged period.

At 3:30 this morning, Mackie, on patrol, came suddenly upon Thouin and a companion in the act of breaking into a car. Without a word, Thouin drew a revolver and fired five shots at the detective, at point-blank range, four of them taking effect; two in the left arm, one in the chest and one in the abdomen. Mackie fell to the ground and the thieves ran.

Miller, hearing the shots, ran to his companion's aid and, after a chase, captured Thouin and took him, with the wounded detective, to Joliette, some seven miles distant, where he was placed in jail and the victim admitted to hospital.

The officer then called on Chief V. Simard of the Joliette police, who accompanied him to St. Thomas, some three miles from the town, where Gaston Bouchard of no address, was taken into custody, though declaring vehemently that he had no knowledge of the affray and had not been anywhere near Lanoraie. He was in an automobile when the police caught up with him.

CRITICAL CONDITION

Within a few hours it became evident that Mackie's wounds were so serious that his removal to Montreal became essential. He reached the Royal Victoria Hospital in an ambulance shortly after 8 a.m. He was conscious at the time and able to give a lucid account of the fracas to his superiors. He was too weak, however, to allow of immediate operation, and at 10 a.m. was given a blood transfusion, in the hopes of making this possible. At noon today he was reported to be in a critical condition. He is a veteran of the Great War, a former uniformed sergeant of the C. P. R. police, and lives at 6043 St. Urbain street.

Regret at the wounding of an excellent officer and praise for the capture of the men was voiced this morning by Superintendent S. H. Spry, of the C. P. R. Investigation Department's headquarters staff.

Sergeant-Detectives Lasnier and Lorrain and Detectives Forest and Durocher of the provincial police, left for Joliette this morning to bring the accused pair back to Montreal.

NOTORIOUS CHARACTER

Thouin is well-known to both the city and provincial police, and has a record, punctuated with many "fire in jail" endorsements. He has been arrested seven times in Montreal alone, was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary for burglary in 1921; ran foul of the Westmount police and paid $10 and costs for loitering in 1924; and later was sentenced to from six to 12 months jail in Toronto, for being in possession of burglars' tools.

At the present time he is out on $950 bail on a charge of burglary, dating from March 18, having made option for jury trial and then changed back to the Sessions' Court, where he is due to appear before Judge Cusson on September 12.

It was in this connection that Thouin tried to make a deal with the authorities in connection with the pictures stolen from the Montreal Art Gallery in the spring.

Some ten days ago, one of the pictures was cut in half and one half mailed to The Star and half to La Presse, each section being accompanied by an anonymous letter declaring the writer's readiness to return the balance for 25 per cent. of their assessed value, on answer being made through the advertising columns of the New York Times.

Failing this, the anonymous scribe proposed to send the works of art back to their painters, in jigsaw-puzzle form. Nothing happened and an advertisement in The Star failed to "draw" the mysterious one.

OFFER RECEIVED

Questions at the headquarters of the city's detective force revealed that some months previously an offer had been made to dicker for the paintings and that even a definite sum had been mentioned in that connection. The authorities, however, declined to deal with the criminal. Days went by and still nothing happened, the police begging the newspapers to remain silent on the stolen picture story. They did so and still nothing happened.

DYING MAN'S STATEMENT.

From his death-bed at the Royal Victoria Hospital, his condition weakened by the loss of a large amount of blood, and between gasps, Investigator Mackie related to his superiors how he had been shot. The story was corroborated by Investigator Miller who rushed his companion with the prisoner to Joliette, where he received first aid, while Thouin was lodged in the Joliette jail pending the capture of his companion.

For the past two months the C.P.R. police have been finding numerous freight cars broken into and robbed. Large amounts of goods had been stolen and it was practically impossible to effect any arrests. Investigator Miller and Acting Investigator Mackie were sent to Lanoraie. Both officers had been there for some time before they noticed two men breaking into a car.

Early yesterday morning Acting Investigator Mackie was making the rounds of the cars on one side of the siding, while Miller was considerably ahead of his companion on the other side. Suddenly Mackie noticed two men approaching one of the freight cars and he hid himself in order to watch their operations. When Mackie saw one of them breaking the lock on the freight car he ran in their direction and caught one of the men by the shoulders. They struggled for a while and then the man with whom Mackie was wrestling drew a revolver and fired a shot. Investigator Miller, hearing the shot, rushed to his companion's assistance and saw a second man running away from the scene.

Thinking that Mackie could look after his prisoner, Miller chased the fugitive into nearby woods. It was then that he heard four other revolver shots and, giving up the chase, returned to Mackie's aid. The latter, although wounded four times, did not flinch and continued struggling with his prisoner. He succeeded in overpowering him and turned him over to Investigator Miller. Weakened by the loss of blood, Mackie collapsed to the ground after aiding Miller in handcuffing the prisoner, and said: "I guess they've got me." Miller placed the prisoner in an automobile, and then carried his companion into the same car. He drove to a hospital in Joliette, where first-aid was rendered to the wounded officer.

SECOND MAN CAPTURED.

An ambulance from the Royal Victoria Hospital was summoned, while Investigator Miller took his prisoner, Thouin, to the Joliette jail. He then asked aid from Chief Simard, of the Joliette police, giving him the facts of the case as briefly as he could, and both set out to find Thouin's companion who had escaped. They were driving towards Lanoraie along the main highway when they noticed an automobile being driven at a fast speed and the horn blowing continuously. They overtook the car, and Miller at once recognized the driver as the man whom he had chased through the woods, and placed him under arrest. At Joliette the second prisoner gave his name as Bouchard, and denied having anything to do with Thouin. He was, however, placed under arrest.

By this time Investigator Mackie had been rushed to the local hospital and Chief Louis Jargaille, of the provincial detective office, was notified. News of the shooting which cost the life of one of his men, soon reached Superintendent S. H. Spry, of the C.P.R. investigation department, who started to work on the case. Investigator Miller notified the provincial police in Montreal, telling them that he had two men at Joliette in connection with the shooting. Headed by Sergeant Las-nier, three detectives were rushed to Joliette, and brought the two prisoners to Montreal.

Questioned yesterday afternoon by detectives, Thouin, the police say, admitted firing the five revolver shots from his .38-calibre revolver, while Bouchard denied having anything to do with the shooting. Both are being detained as material witnesses in connection with the officer's death.

Thouin, the police say, is well known to the city and provincial police, and has a record of having served several jail terms. He was arrested seven times in Montreal, having been sentenced to five years in penitentiary in 1921 for burglary. He was sentenced to 12 months in jail at Toronto, for being found in possession of burglar's tools. At the present time he is out on $950 bail on a charge of burglary committed on March 18, having made option for jury trial and then changed back to the Court of Sessions where he was due to appear before Judge Cusson next Tuesday.

Investigator Mackie was a veteran of the Great War, a former uniformed sergeant of the C.P.R. police, the harbor police and the Edinburgh, Scotland, police. Superintendent Spry, in charge of the railway investigation department, expressed his regrets last night at the death of an excellent officer. He also praised the work of Investigator Miller and Chief Simard for the arrest of the second man. The superintendent stated that Mackie was always known as a brave officer, and he showed his worth by capturing the man who allegedly shot him after he had been wounded four times.

PRISONERS UNEASY NOW.
Confronted with the news that Acting Investigator Mackie had died, Thouin and Bouchard became very uneasy when they appeared before Chief Louis Jargaille, of the provincial police, at headquarters one hour after the news of the death reached headquarters. Bouchard denied having had any connection with the shooting, while Thouin showed signs of worry and almost cried. Chief Jargaille later stated that although Thouin admitted verbally that he had shot Mackie, he refused to sign any declaration.

In an interview with a representative of The Gazette last night Chief Jargaille stated that he suspected Thouin in connection with several burglaries, and probably certain shootings which had not been solved. He said that Thouin is the leader of a gang of burglars who go after large hauls. Eric Neuman, of the Canadian Fire Underwriters' Association, stated that he suspected Thouin of being the leader of an arson gang. In fact, the investigator said, he received a telephone call earlier in the year telling him that Thouin would "get him" if he did not stop investigating suspect fires. Since the threat Mr. Neuman had received permission to carry a revolver.

While Montreal police asserted that Thouin had suggested dropping the present charge of burglary against him for information leading to the recovery of the stolen paintings from the Art Gallery, Chief Jargaille stated he had not questioned Thouin on this matter. Chief Jargaille stated that it was not the provincial police case. It is believed that information, if any, will be obtained by local detectives from Thouin after questioning.

At the conclusion of the interview Chief Jargaille stated that the inquest into the death will be opened this morning, but will be postponed probably until Monday morning. This will give the detectives time to make technical investigation. Various photographs surrounding the crime was taken yesterday and will be produced at the inquest. Chief Jargaille stated that although an attempt was made to procure an ante-mortem statement from Mackie, physicians would not allow this owing to his weak condition, and it was not necessary. He said that it was also unnecessary to have Thouin identified by Mackie before his death due to the fact that he had been captured by the dead man.

Paintings Return To Gallery

15 Works Stolen Last Spring Will be Reclaimed by Artists Today.

Thouin Case

Little the worse for their sojourn in the hands of thieves, 15 Canadian paintings stolen during the Spring Exhibition of the Montreal Art Association are back in the Art Gallery today. It is expected that the local artists whose work is included in the group will call for their masterpieces during the day.

The story attached to the paintings, which have a catalogue value of about $15,000, is interwoven with that of Paul Thouin, the master burglar whose dramatic suicide in the provincial police cells here attracted so much attention.

When the paintings were stolen last May city and provincial detectives were immediately put on their trail. Later W. D. MacWorth, private investigator prominent in many bank robberies, was retained.

No Market.

A few of the pictures made their appearance in New York, but found no market. A few weeks ago suspicion pointed to Thouin and he opened negotiations with the authorities for their return. The police refused art robbery following his arrest. Pri- to bargain, however.

Closely questioned concerning the day morning for the shooting of Constable Mackie, Thouin finally admitted his part in the theft and agreed to help the detectives recover the paintings.

Thouin said he had first hidden them in a house in Montreal, but later removed them to a spot on a hillside near l'Ephéphanie after discovering that police had searched the house. All the paintings were recovered in good conditions save that which was cut in half and sent to two local papers when Thouin attempted to secure ransom for their return.

Made Mistake.

The day before his death the burglar chief and alleged slayer told Chief Jargaille that his intention was to steal the paintings of the famous Van Horne collection temporarily stored in the Art Gallery and valued at $750,000.

"I made a big mistake," he said. "If I had known anything about pictures, I might not have been in my present fix."

DETECTIVES SEARCH FOR THIRD MAN IN MURDER OF MACKIE

Adopting the time-worn ruse of hiding a capsule of poison in the heel of his shoe, Paul Lepine, alias Thouin, held for the fatal shooting of Acting Investigator James Mackie, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, at Lanoraie, early on Friday morning, committed suicide in the Provincial Police cells in the old court house building late on Sunday night.

Chief Maurice Lalonde, head of the provincial police, announced last evening that he would personally investigate the circumstances of the suicide, which is the second to take place in the department's cells this year. The shoe containing the poison had been taken from the detained man's home on Saturday afternoon and donned in the presence of Chief of Detectives Jargaille, Sergeant Lasnier and two other detectives. It develops that the body was not seen by a doctor until 8.30 yesterday morning.

In the meantime the provincial detectives are still seeking a third man, wanted in connection with the killing, who is said to have been at Lanoraie at the time of the affray which has now cost two "ves. The information is that Thouin, whose real name is Paul Lepine, had his automobile on the scene, and it was removed and has not yet been found.

It was 11.45 o'clock on Sunday night when Guard Leduc found Thouin, as he was known to the police, dead in his cell. The guard visited the cell every 15 minutes, and on the previous visit had seen the man apparently asleep but very pale. Realizing that the man was not breathing, the guard summoned other men and entered the cell. It was found that the man was dead. The news was immediately flashed to Chief Jargaille and the superior officers of the department.

Efforts were made immediately to get Dr. J. M. Roussel, one of the provincial medico-legal experts to the scene to examine the man but it was only at 8.30 o'clock that the doctor was reached. It was then decided to wait until morning and the body was examined at 8.30. Later it was transported to the morgue.

Dr. Roussel stated yesterday afternoon that there was no doubt that death had been caused by strychnine poisoning. In addition the doctor stated that a quantity of undissolved strychnine had been found in the bottom of a cup from which the man in the cell had taken a drink of either coffee or some other liquid.

Investigation by the detectives showed that Thouin had removed the heels from each shoe he wore and that each heel bore a small hole in which a capsule of poison could be easily hidden. It was stated that the remains of an empty capsule had also been found.

It was announced last night by Chief Maurice Lalonde that the inquest would take place at the morgue on Thursday morning at the same time as the case of Acting Investigator Mackie continued; having been adjourned from Saturday morning last.

CAME AFTER CONFESSION.

Thouin's suicide came some hours after he had confessed to Chief of Detectives Jargaille and members of the provincial police that he was the leader of the gang which had stolen fifteen canvasses from the Montreal Art Association Gallery on Sherbrooke street west this spring.

Chief Jargaille said that he had questioned Thouin regarding these canvasses and that finally Thouin had admitted being one of the robbers. He had asked for a lawyer and then told the detectives that the paintings were hidden at L'Epiphanie in the bush. The spot was difficult to find and on Saturday afternoon Thouin went to the spot with Chief Jargaille, Sergeant Lasnier and two other provincial detectives and unearthed the paintings, undamaged. It was while on this trip that he used a ruse to obtain his shoes. He was wearing running shoes when arrested and held by Acting Investigator Mackie at Lanoraie on Friday morning, being caught by the investigator after breaking into a freight car. Though suffering from four bullet wounds Mackie held Thouin until investigator Miller came to the rescue.

Coming back from L'Epiphanie Thouin told the police that he would like to change his shoes and he went with them to his home, 3939 Dandurand street, Rosemount, and in the presence of the officers changed all his clothing and his shoes. He then was taken back to the provincial police cells. The change in shoes suited the police, it is said, as they wished to examine the running shoes "Thouin" wore when arrested.

It was clear from the investigation made yesterday morning that Thouin was not certain in which shoe the capsule was hidden since he removed the heel of each shoe.

The man who died yesterday morning in the cells in the old court house building was known to the police as Paul Thouin, though it was known that his right name was Paul Lepine, which he had not used for many years. But to residents of Rosemount on Dandurand street he was known as Paul Drouin. He claimed to be a dealer in paint though to the police he always gave his trade as that of painter. He was 31 years of age.

RENTED HOUSE IN MAY.

"Drouin" had rented the house in May and moved into the place late in the month. He was visited by many friends and held frequent parties to the extent that there were many complaints lodged against him at the Masson street station. As it was a matter that the police could not settle, the parties went on. One of the neighbors living next door complained and reported to the police that on one occasion he had taken up the matter with Drouin himself. But there were other men present and one of them had struck the complainant with brass knuckles. He complained to the police but did not take out a warrant. The neighbor at the time had heard stories of "Drouin" being the head of an organized gang and the matter was reported to the local detectives, and "Drouin," or Thouin, as he was known to them, was suspected of being mixed up with several robberies in the city and district. But of late he had always managed to elude the police.

He had not always been so successful, however, and on one occasion was arrested in three rivers for theft. On that occasion he was found guilty and sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. He served over four years before coming out again. To the local detectives he was particularly known as an automobile thief having been arrested on three occasions for that offense by Sergeant-Detective L. Blanchette.

A short time ago, he was caught by a member of the radio patrol squad, and accused of the theft of a quantity of tea from a grocery on St. Lawrence Boulevard. He was arraigned on this charge, sent up for trial and released on $950 bail. He had optioned for a speedy trial and was to have appeared today for trial.

When arrested last Friday morning, Thouin gave his address as 2047 Chamby street. This proved to be the home of a sister who refused any information yesterday on the plea that she had been told by Chief Jargaille not to speak and that he would "fix" anyone who bothered her.

Investigators of the Canadian Pacific Railway police went to the Chamby street house on Friday night and searched in the hope that they might find clues or goods. They failed to find anything, but on Saturday night they learned of the Dandurand street address and went there to search. They found, to their surprise that the house was vacant and neighbors informed them that a truck had backed up to the place during the late part of the afternoon and had moved away all furniture and other goods. All the investigators found were a large number of empty champagne bottles in the cellar.

The suicide in the cells of the Provincial Police Department in the old court house is the second this year. The first occurred on February 1 when Joseph Killen, held as a material witness in a murder which occurred near Hull last November, was found hanged in his cell. There was an investigation and subsequently two guards were suspended but one was later reinstated.

HOLD INVESTIGATION.

An investigation into the circumstances surrounding "Thouin's" alleged suicide has been opened by Chief Maurice Lalonde, head of the provincial detectives, according to a statement made by him to The Gazette last night.

"From what I can see from the reports thus far submitted to me by Chief Louis Jargaille and Sergeant Rene Lasnier," Chief Lalonde said, "I cannot see any breach of duty on the part of these two officers. Nevertheless, I am investigating the circumstances further. As far as I can see so far, it was impossible to avoid the suicide."

Chief Lalonde further stated that when Thouin was found outstretched on a bed in his cell on Sunday night by Guard Leduc, it was noticed that his forehead was very white. The guard thought at the time that Thouin was sleeping and it was only when the guard tried to awaken him that he found that Thouin was apparently lifeless. The guard at once notified Chief Jargaille and Sergeant Lasnier who, after investigating, notified Chief Lalonde of the affair at one o'clock yesterday morning.

According to reports of the suicide sent to Chief Lalonde by Chief Jargaille, Dr. Jean Marie Roussel and Dr. Rosaire Fontaine, provincial medico-legal experts, had been summoned to provincial police headquarters and that Dr. Roussel had pronounced Thouin dead.

Questioned yesterday afternoon about the case Dr. Roussel said that he had gone to provincial police headquarters only at 8.30 o'clock yesterday morning. The body was taken to the morgue at 11 o'clock yesterday morning and in the afternoon an autopsy was performed which showed that death was due to strychnine poisoning. When asked whether he had gone to provincial police headquarters on Sunday night or early yesterday morning, Dr. Fontaine stated that he was out of town during the week-end. The expert said that he had examined Thouin's body with Dr. Roussel at 8.30 o'clock yesterday morning.

BELIEVED HEART FAILURE.

From reports submitted to him by Chief Jargaille yesterday morning, Chief Lalonde stated that it was at first believed that Thouin had died from heart failure. Sergeant Lasnier, however, searched the cell in which Thouin was confined, and found the shoe with a torn heel under the cot. There was also an empty capsule near the shoe. This discovery, the chief said, was only made at one o'clock yesterday morning—one hour and fifteen minutes after Thouin was first found by the guard. Chief Lalonde stated that he was notified by Chief Jargaille at 12.30 o'clock yesterday morning about Thouin's death.

Gaston Bouchard, who was arrested shortly after the C.P.R. investigator was shot, and who denies having had anything to do with the shooting or attempted robbery of the box-cars, is still being held as a material witness for the inquest into the death of Mackie which will be held on Thursday morning. "We have very good proof against Bouchard," Chief Lalonde stated, "and we will proceed with the case."

The inquest into Mackie's death which was opened on Saturday morning last when the body was identified by Investigator Miller, Mackie's companion, and the report of the autopsy read by Dr. Fontaine, will also be held on Thursday morning.

NATIONAL GALLERY AT OTTAWA LAUDED

Gazette 23/9/33

Described as Probably Most Efficient of Any in Empire's Dominions

(By The Canadian Press.)

Ottawa, September 22.—A special cable to the Ottawa Citizen from London quotes a striking tribute paid by S. F. Markham, secretary of the Museums Association of Great Britain, to the National Gallery of Canada. The tribute appeared in the columns of the Times.

"The National Gallery of Canada at Ottawa," Mr. Markham stated, "is probably the most efficient of all Dominion galleries in the Empire. Others may be richer, but Ottawa combines richness with an effective educational programme that brings the blessings of art into the remote backwoods of the vast Canadian sub-continent."

Mr. Markham, along with Sir Henry M. Miers, president of the association, made a comprehensive study of the Empire's art galleries and museums, the cable went on.

In the course of a review lamenting the inability of the Dominions to purchase an adequate number of pictures from historic European schools, he suggests that the London National Gallery should send on loan to the Dominions examples of the great masters, scores of whose pictures lie useless in vaults from sheer redundancy.

Museum In Summer Home Of Sir Wilfrid Laurier Star Oct. 5/33

A museum established in the old home of Sir Wilfrid and Lady Laurier in Arthabaska, Que., early this summer has attracted many visitors. Three of the rooms including the salon have been arranged exactly as they were when the distinguished Canadian couple lived in the house. Even the wallpaper and the pictures and paintings adorning the walls of these rooms are identically the same as those which hung there when Sir Wilfrid was alive. This has been made possible by Madame J. E. Perreault, wife of the Quebec Minister of Highways, who has taken a deep personal interest in the museum, which was formed on an entirely voluntary basis, many interesting exhibits being donated by friends of the late Liberal chieftain and Canadian statesman.

A portrait of Lady Laurier, painted by Suzor Cote, a native of Arthabaska, has been presented by the artist himself. Laliberte, the well-known French-Canadian sculptor, has made the museum a gift of a collection of his works while a portrait of Sir Wilfrid has been received from A. G. Mackenzie, of Amherst, N.S., and two fine busts from Emile Vaillancourt of Outremont, Que.

There is a collection of old Canadian furniture, also a set of important historical documents prepared by P. G. Roy, provincial archivist, including correspondence between Sir Wilfrid and the late Hon. Edward Blake of Toronto, parliamentary cartoons and private letters.

Not the least interesting of the exhibits is a souvenir in the shape of a section of a tree on which the father of Sir Wilfrid carved his name years ago. This was presented by Hon. Honore Mercier, Minister of Lands and Forests.

The Laurier museum is conveniently situated for tourists, only two miles off the main Montreal to Quebec highway, via Victoriaville.

EFFECTIVE WATER COLOR EXHIBITION Gazette 3/10/33

Drawings of Percy E. Nobbs Make Fine Display in Art Gallery

Some effective water color drawings by Percy E. Nobbs, illustrative of certain color effects peculiar to the skies of the West Indies and of the north shore of the St. Lawrence, are now on view in the print room of the Art Gallery. In addition to his cloud studies, Mr. Nobbs shows some rather charming vistas of the Quebec and English countryside.

Mr. Nobbs has been singularly successful in capturing the almost incredible pageant of color and the brilliant and melodramatic atmosphere found in the West Indies. In "At St. Thomas" the clouds rise in green and mauve masses against a sky shading from clearest lemon yellow at the horizon to deep purple at the zenith. The tropics' quick change of mood is seen in "North End of St. Kitts from Brimstone Hill," where dark threatening clouds "draw water" on one side of the sky while, on the other, the heavens are a limpid blue. "Caribbean Clouds," washed in in pale iridescent tones, depicts those peculiarly light vaporous clouds of the region. Another of the West Indian sketches, "Evening Surf, Barbadoes," is an interesting study of water running up on the sand. The undulating progress of waves over the surface of the sea is expressed with a rhythmic life in "Native Craft off Nevis."

Among the studies of more northern lands, "A Pool on the Cornell" is outstanding, with its mirror-like expanse of water and its rich green pines burnished flame by the low rays of the setting sun. "Nun's Island from Westmount" gets a lovely silvery light on the river. A mysterious, poetic quality distinguishes "Earlshall, Fifeshire" which depicts the old house in an autumn twilight with a bare tree patterned against the sky. "Old Barge, Beetz Bay, P.Q." has sure, easy brushwork in its wide expanse of sky and sands. The exhibition will remain open until October 17.

Among the other events planned by the Art Association for the coming season, the loan exhibition of the Van Horne collection from October 16 to November 5 will be of very wide interest. Other exhibitions this season will be the Canadian handicrafts from October 21 to November 5; the Labrador V. E. League from November 8 to 19; the Royal Canadian Academy from November 16 to December 17; and a Canadian group of painters from December 23 to January 14.

The first illustrated lecture of the season will be "Modern American Sculpture" by Richard Cross, of New York, on November 14. This will be followed by "Contemporary French Painting" by M. A. V. Declos on December 5.

Star Oct. 4/33 West Indian Skies Make Striking Exhibition

A notable exhibition of water colors by Percy E. Nobbs is being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. These pictures, according to the painter, "for the most part illustrate certain color effects peculiar to the skies of the West Indies and of the North Shore of the St. Lawrence," and they most certainly do this but they claim attention as pictures as well. There are some splendid color effects among which the intense sky colors, from rich blues passing through violet to pink, and the reflections on the water of the West Indies, compete with the blues and greens of the water and the rustier skies of Canada. One of the most striking effects is of the brilliant turquoise sky of a night scene at St. Kitts, but there are others which are not less surprising. With these there are other pictures, of places in Canada, Scotland and France, painted under less spectacular conditions of lighting but quite as well worth seeing. One large one of the well known view from Westmount not only provides a good contrast to the more brilliant pictures but is a witness to the truth of their coloring.

Thomas W. Mitchell's Pictures at Eaton's

The work of the Toronto painter, Thomas W. Mitchell, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., is not very well known in Montreal, though many of the pictures in his present exhibition at Eaton's galleries were painted in this province. They are mostly quite small pictures, broadly and apparently quickly painted, of rural scenes in Ontario and in the neighborhood of Murray Bay and other places on the St. Lawrence. The subject of most of them is sunlight, with strong shadows, falling on gaily colored Canadian landscapes, very truly and pleasantly painted, at all seasons of the year but for the most part in summer and early autumn. A few of them show quieter and duller conditions of light but these are not so successful as the brighter ones. Two pictures of groups of horses, particularly the larger one, are remarkably good. The effect of space in some of these small pictures is striking and, all together, they make a most attractive show of brilliant lighting and color.

YOUNG WIFE IS LEFT WITHOUT A HUSBAND, AND LITTLE SON IS FATHERLESS

Pictures, published exclusively by The Standard, show the late James Mackie, C.P.R. Secret Service Official, who was slain by bandit, and his wife; centre, their young son, James Douglas Mackie, and on the right, the late officer in uniform.

Startling Story Is Told The Standard of Slaying Of Police Officer Mackie

Standard 9/9/33

Deputy Coroner Pierre Hebert, M.D., presided over the preliminary inquest on the body of James Mackie, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Secret Service, who died as the result of a struggle with a bandit, who was robbing the C. P. R. freight cars or trying to rob them, on Thursday night at Lanoraie, the junction point on the mainline to Quebec, where a spur runs towards Joliette.

There were only two witnesses heard, Dr. Fontaine, the head of the Medico-Legal Department of the province, and W. G. Miller, the man who was with Mackie, when the latter was fatally shot.

Both of these gentlemen gave merely routine evidence; Dr. Fontaine about the injuries received, and the three bullets which he found in Mackie's body—for there were only three, not four—and Mr. Miller one of the C. P. R. Secret Service operatives testified about the identity and the antecedents of his dead and much mourned comrade.

But the real story of the fight these two men had with the bandit, now in custody of the Provincial Police, which probably will be told at the next session of the Coroner's Court, or at least in the Criminal Court, when the man who killed Mackie is brought to trial for his life, was only told to The Standard after the Coroner's Court session closed for the day.

And it is the only real and correct story that has appeared in any newspaper thus far, clearing up all the misstatements that have been made in the daily press until now, and a story sanctioned by the head of the Canadian Pacific Railway Secret Service, Brigadier-General E. D. T. Panet, a story that, in interest dwarfs many of the popular fiction stories of crime and its suppression.

It was told to The Standard by Inspector O. F. Gellizeau, in command of the District of Quebec for the C. P. R. Secret Service, and in it stands out the marvelous courage and ill-power of a man, who had three bullet wounds in his body, two of them bound to be fatal, and of a companion, who like the other, did not know what fear was in the discharge of their duty.

Few people know what these Railway Secret Service men are constantly up against, because they do their work quietly and silently and the stories of their struggles, in which in many cases they risk their lives, never appear in the news papers.

The cases of Mackie and Miller are a good example of what these faithful and ardent detectives face, although it is a long time since there have been any casualties in their ranks.

"For months," Inspector Gellizeau told The Standard, both the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. have been up against robberies of freight cars, but some how or other the robbers were so clever that we could never catch them in this district.

So it was decided that the Secret Services of both railways should combine in an effort to bring the brigands who prospered in the province of Quebec to justice.

Therefore the C. N. R. appointed some of their best operatives to work in conjunction with us and some of our best worked with them.

In continuing his story, he told how reports had come that many of the robberies of freight cars on the C. P. R. had occurred lately on or near the Lanoraie siding, where there is a junction point on the main line to Quebec, from which a spur line leads to Joliette and St. Gabriel de Brandon.

Two men were sent out there on Thursday to see what they could find out, Mackie and Miller. And this is what happened, according to Mr. Miller's testimony, now in the possession of the C. P. R., although not yet officially incorporated in the criminal court proceedings.

They loitered about the junction point at Lanoraie, making themselves as inconspicuous as possible. In this they were helped by the weather, for although there was a moon, it was most of the time obscured by clouds.

They were waiting for the freight train from Montreal on Thursday night, when they knew a number of cars were to be sidetracked for the time being.

It was dark and cold for this time of the year when the freight came in, at 2:05 in the morning, Standard Time.

The engine went back to the spur track, and left most of its freight cars there, moving up to the station to await the time, when the dispatchers should give the engineer orders that the road was clear for him to proceed.

As soon as the cars were deposited there, Mackie and Miller hid under one of the cars.

Nothing happened for nearly half-an-hour, and then they heard steps in their direction, looked out from under their car, and saw two men approaching.

They ducked back again. The men stopped at the car just below the one they were under. The brigands broke it open, only to find that it was filled with waste paper.

Then came a ticklish moment, for the brigands tried the car the officers were under.

This also was broken open successfully, but gave them another disappointment, because it was filled with cement.

So the bandits tried another car, and were equally unsuccessful, for it was crammed with many gross of waste baskets.

Had they managed to get any further, however, they would have found rich pickings in other cars which were full of valuable merchandise.

But the Secret Service men thought they had enough evidence to make arrests with the hope of conviction of the brigands, and they jumped out from under their car and went for them.

The tragedy that followed did not take many minutes.

There were shots in the dark, when the two detectives were not more than ten feet behind their quarry, and Detective Miller did not know whether it was his partner or one of the brigands that did the shooting.

But it appears that, contrary to all published reports, thus far, Miller was pursuing Thouin, who it afterwards turned out had done the shooting, without knowing who was the man he shot at, and that Mackie, although shot three times, was pursuing Thouin's partner, who the Provincial police hope to prove was Bouchard, now in their custody also.

The man Miller was pursuing, and whose identity he did not know, ran across the track and into the underbrush, and there he slipped and fell, and when Detective Miller located him, he was lying on his back like a big spitting cat, with his arms and legs extended to ward off any enemy, and a big .38 calibre revolver in his right hand.

Miller naturally thought that the pistol was loaded, not knowing that the man who was Thouin, had emptied all the cartridges at his partner Mackie, and he fought the brigand for possession of the firearm, to prevent himself from being shot.

Thouin was not big but full of fight and nerve—a Standard reporter saw him for a moment in the Provincial Police headquarters when he was transferred from his cell to the private office of Chief Jargaille, and he looked thin, and of a height of probably five foot six, with a rather cadaverous face.

Anyhow he had all he could do to hold his quarry, when Mackie came to his assistance.

Now remember, that after Mackie had been shot three times he kept up the chase, not knowing who had shot him, and again, contrary to reports published thus far, pursued the man supposed to be Bouchard.

Losing him, he went back to see how his partner, Miller, was getting on, and to show what a wonderful vitality Detective Mackie must have had, he did not even then realize that he was mortally wounded, although he had one bullet in his body close to his heart, another in his liver which had entered his right side, and penetrated his intestines before it reached the liver, and another in his right arm which smashed one of the bones.

Miller had no idea how badly Mackie was wounded when the latter appeared near him, but was thankful for his coming because between the two of them they managed to subdue and handcuff Thouin, the wildcat.

Then the three started back to the railway track and after they had gone about ten yards, Mackie suddenly seemed to realize his condition, and said: "I think they have got me."

A few more feet and he collapsed. This left Detective Miller in a terrible predicament.

With his partner collapsed, and chained to a very unwilling captive he hardly knew what to do.

Fortunately his attention was drawn to the moving engine of the train, which had brought the freight cars to the siding.

The train was getting ready to start to its further destination and Mr. Miller realized that if it went away he would be left alone without any aid for no one could estimate how long.

He collected all his strength, and with presence of mind, dragged Thouin with him by main force, waived his hand and shouted as hard as he could to attract the attention of the engineer of the train, which just started to move. Dawn was only just showing.

The train crew assisted him, and he got an automobile and drove his prisoner and his wounded partner to the nearest doctor at St. Thomas, but then the latter, after proffering first aid, said the case was too serious for him, and suggested the nearest hospital, that at Joliette.

Mackie was taken from there to the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal where he died. Thouin was lodged in the Joliette Jail, the Provincial Detective force was notified, and Chief Simard, of Joliette, accompanied Mr. Miller, in a hunt for Thouin's accomplice. They found him shortly after in a swift car, which he was driving and brought him back to Joliette.

Both of them are in the private cells of the Provincial Detective Force in Montreal now.

The reason the inquest was adjourned, it was unofficially stated, is that Chief of Provincial Detectives Jargaille hopes to produce evidence on the 14th, that Bouchard was an accomplice, before the fact, during the fact and after the fact, and it is claimed that while the struggle between Thouin and the C.P.R. secret service men went on Bouchard was in the car some distance away sounding signals to Thouin, who it is said was identified by Miller.

The prisoners were not brought into the Coroner's Court this time, but there were present quite a number of C. P. R. Secret Service men, under Inspector Gellizeau and Provincial detectives under Chief Jargaille, and Sergeant-Detective Laskier.

Leonice Plante, K.C., represented Thouin's interest, it was said, and L. G. Perreault, K.C., assistant solicitor of the C. P. R. watch things for his company.

Both Prisoners Kept In Cells During Inquest

Parked in front of the Provincial Detective Bureau, at the old Court House, is a Buick automobile, license numbers H-31084. It is bespattered with light colored dirt, which completely hides the light brown paint of the car. It shows signs of having been driven many miles through the sand and gravel roads of the district of Lanoraie where the car was found by C.P.R. investigators, following the brutal shooting of one of their investigators.

This car was in the possession of Gaston Bouchard, one of the two men held by the police in connection with the death of James Mackie, 43-year-old C.P.R. investigator victim of an assassin's bullets.

Chief Louis Jargaille, the energetic head of the provincial detective office in Montreal, had his men check up on the ownership of the automobile and they found out through official registrations that Gaston Bouchard was the name of the man registered as the owner of the automobile that was at Lanoraie when the railway investigators came across Bouchard driving at a fast rate, with the horn blowing continuously.

Gaston Bouchard was at the wheel and was placed under arrest suspected of being one of the two men who were in the act of breaking into a freight car, and from one of whom came three shots fired at the approaching officers of the investigating bureau of the railway company.

But prisoners are in the cells at the Provincial detective office, where they will be held pending the inquest. In the event of being named responsible for the death of Mackie, they will be taken to Joliette, the official district of the province, to be arraigned there.

Paul Thouin, who is declared to have admitted statements to Chief Jargaille which incriminate himself, and who is named by eyewitnesses as the man who fired the shots that laid low the dead investigator, will be questioned closely about the stolen art pictures that disappeared from view some months ago.

Thouin's part in the disappearance of the pictures from the Art Gallery will be brought to light now that he is in the hands of the provincial detectives. Named as the go-between with the police and the artists whose paintings were stolen, with positive knowledge that he tried several times to come to some arrangements with the local detective bureau heads, he will be closely questioned while awaiting his second appearance in the Coroner's Court next Thursday. It took bullets from an ex-convict to bring the Art Gallery theft to light, and the scene has shifted from the city police authorities to the provincial detectives who will take care of the picture disappearance from now on.

Chief Jargaille denied this morning that he had questioned Thouin regarding the art theft. He was satisfied to say that he was taking the matter in his own way, and would go more fully into the case after the inquest into the death of Investigator Mackie.

Asked this morning if he had any idea of the present location of the stolen paintings, the chief had nothing to say. From other sources it was learned that the authorities are convinced that the paintings, once known to have been taken to New Jersey, were believed to have been returned to this city with the intention of making another dicker with the police. Thouin's arrest is believed to have made other plans necessary, but they are not known.

Investigator Mackie's Funeral on Monday

In an interview with Mrs. Mackie this morning at her residence, 6043 St. Urbain street, Mrs. Mackie was very much distressed about her husband's death.

She was at her husband's bedside when he died yesterday afternoon at the Royal Victoria Hospital. All she wanted to say, is that she wished to thank the nurses and doctors who were so good to both of them. She also thanked the C.P.R. for what they have done, too.

Mr. Mackie's little son, who is four years old and too young to understand yet the meaning of his father's death, was playing with toys, and was sore because his mechanic man didn't want to jump.

The funeral service for Mr. Mackie will take place on Monday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock from William Wray's Chapel on University street, and interment will take place at the Mount Royal Cemetery.

Mr. Mackie is survived by his widow, formerly Miss Constance Miles; one son, James Douglas Mackie; his brothers, Alexander, of Colborne, Ont., and George Mackie, of Aberdeen, Scotland; one sister, Mrs. Robert A. Hay of Toronto; and his mother, Mrs. George Mackie, of Aberdeen, Scotland.

ADIAN ARTISTS' WORK AT WATSON'S

Gazette Oct. 9/33

Sherbrooke Street Galleries Have Representative Examples by 23 Painters

VARIED TRENDS SHOWN

Picture That Drew Crowd of Costers Now on View

Fine Group by Morrice

Paintings by contemporary Canadian artists and a group of works by J. W. Morrice are drawing a large attendance to the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. Canadian painters, from this section of the Dominion at least, are well represented by pictures that reveal their various artistic convictions—academic, moderate and extreme. The group does not make pretension to being complete, but outstanding painters in Montreal are represented.

There are a number of examples of Laurentian scenery at varying seasons by Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., whose brush of late has been stayed through the painter's illness. This group includes his interpretations of sections of the Rockies and of his favored sketching ground—the region about Lac Tremblant, the Cache and North Rivers. Among the lovely works is "The Deep Pool," a study of sunlit and shadowed hillside with rocks bearded by icicles, and tree stems that glow in the light and are mirrored in the cold water in the foreground. Glimpses of the northern streams with river ice and overhanging trees a smother of snow, mountains shadowed or flushed by the sun, the scrub and brush of snow-clad shores with flooded ice and fast water—all the pictorial elements that make the Laurentians beautiful in the winter find place in this group, which shows how thoroughly Mr. Cullen has captured the spirit of the country and with what sympathy and skill he has set down his visions. A pastel from this hand is a bit of rolling country with trees and rocks at the season when the sun has reduced the carpet of snow to scattered patches of white.

Of the winter season, too, is the chief example by A. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., a sugar camp with horse and man in a maple bush, the shadows of the trees streaking the snow and building. "The Ambuscade"—Indians in sunsplashed shade beneath trees—is a spirited bit of painting. There is also a decoratively treated landscape—clms against a golden sky, distant blue hills and a stream winding in the valley.

VIEWS OF THE SEA.

Rock-bound coasts with breaking waves, lowering skies, the hum of wind and the hiss of spray call to mind the loss suffered by Canadian art in the sudden passing earlier this year of G. Horne Russell, R.C.A. This group is an unusually complete one and shows the ability he possessed in depicting atmospheric conditions and in painting watercraft in quiet havens at varying hours.

Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., whose occupation with illustrations for a Paris edition of "Maria Chapdelaine" has temporarily called a halt to easel pictures, is represented by a French beach scene, with white-garbed figures promenading the sand, rolling blue water and the flash of distant sails.

The strongly decorative sense of Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., is revealed in winter landscapes, in addition to which he has a small marine—spray flying above flat rocks. F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., shows a winter scene with a red sleigh, and the art of Archibald Browne, R.C.A., is represented by an autumn landscape—winding stream backed by a bold hill against a sky that threatens unsettled weather. F. W. Hutchison, A.N.A., has found a congenial subject in "Quebec Farmhouse," and R. W. Pilot, A.R.C.A., shows his fine color sense in a painting of a Government ice-breaker at Quebec and in a view of St. Patrick's Church, as seen from the parking space on St. Alexander street. The latter work is marked by entrancing blues in the building against a luminous sky and trees powdered with snow.

Gertrude Des Clayes, A.R.C.A., has a capital work in "The Pearly King," a coster and his little son in traditional costume that recalls the age of Chevalier—not Maurice but Albert of "My Old Dutch" fame. It is interesting in subject, color and handling, the subject of the paintings, done in London last year, being so proud of his part in it as model that he asked the artist leave to let his friends view the picture. Miss Des Clayes did not bargain for a continuous line of donkey and other carts with bearded occupants jamming traffic outside her studio, so she was relieved when the owner of a "pub," frequented by costers, asked to place it on view. The work, appropriately lighted, drew crowds of costers from all parts. Father and son are quaintly garbed in costumes embellished with pearl buttons, tradition apparently ordaining that the higher the rank the richer and more numerous the "pearls." From the same brush is a portrait of a girl holding a cat.

Men sawing logs in a landscape is the offering of Des Clayes, who shows a good sense of design and agreeable color.

Mrs. Lillian Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., has a strong and effective portrait in "Tanya," a girl resting her chin on her hand, and a quaint Russianesque background to the portrait of the musician Andrei Illashenko, who is garbed in a fur coat.

A. Y. Jackson, R.C.A., has two winter scenes—"Ste. Agnes, Quebec" with rambling buildings grouped about a church, and "The Abandoned House" in a landscape that adds to the sense of desolation. Albert Robinson, R.C.A., has a boldly designed scene of sleighs on a hilly road edged by houses and telegraph poles, called "Sunday in the Country." More restful in spirit is a nocturne—a moored ship under sail. Edwin Holgate, besides a group of sunlit red-roofed houses in France, has a vista of hilly land with lakes, painted in a typical manner, and Frank Carmichael has not flattered "Cramberry Lake" or "The Old Pine." Prudence Howard has a boldly painted study of tulips, and Frank Panabaker shows "Cathedral Mountain" against an evening sky.

Among the examples by George Thomson is "April Ice, Georgian Bay," while of a more clement season are the landscapes by Frederic Ede. Henri Fabien has gone back-stage for his subjects, ballet dancers waiting to "go on," and Paul Caron has characteristic works, among them being an oil of a habitant and sleigh in an old courtyard.

The group of works by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., is a choice one that will make appeal to both the connoisseur and the student. "Mountain Hill" shows pedestrians and a horse and sleigh at dusk descending that Quebec thoroughfare, old buildings and a clump of trees still in autumn leaf caught by an early snow flurry. "Night Effect on the Seine, Paris" is bewildering in its simplicity of treatment—a quay with barge and watchman with lantern in the foreground, the spacious placid stream mirroring the glitter of lighted watercraft, and the dark distant shore with riverside lamps. The Venetian canal scene with typical irregular buildings and a gondola is a work of lovely subtle values that is completely satisfying. The sands at St. Malo, with buildings stretching into the distance under a cloudy sky, promenaders and bathing tents near sea of a lovely blue, shows another phase of this Canadian painter's marked skill. "Qual des Grands Augustins" is a capital atmospheric study of fresh green leaves, sunlight and figures about bookstalls above the river. There are also some small panels that show practised handling and completeness despite the summary treatment—rapid notes of effects caught "on the fly" that are of vital value to the student.

According to present plan the show will remain open until October 21.

MASTERPIECE REVEALED

Paint Removed from Portrait of King Henry VIII

London, October 10.—Removal of four coats of paint from a portrait of King Henry VIII has revealed what is claimed to be a masterpiece from the brush of the great Hans Holbein, the "merry monarch's" court painter. The portrait, apparently dated 1542, shows the corpulent ruler distinctly grayer than any picture extant.

The painting belongs to Geoffrey Howard of Castle Howard, near York, and is a half-length portrait of the off-married king who ruled England from 1509 to 1547.

For years the picture hung unrecognized in the famous collection at Castle Howard. It was spotted by Dr. Paul Ganz, well-known art historian, who noted visible evidence that the original had been painted over. At his suggestion the over-paint was removed. Four successive coats were taken off before the original was uncovered.

ART IN THE EMPIRE.

The able article on "Museums in the Empire" that appeared in the Times this morning was made doubly interesting by the fact that I had made a pilgrimage to Bond Street in the pouring rain yesterday to see the collection of recent purchases of contemporary art by the trustees of the National Gallery of New South Wales. The etchings, sculpture, drawings and paintings are on view for a fortnight at Messrs. Tooth's Galleries before they are sent out to New South Wales. The standard of excellence was so high that one wished the collection had been destined for Canada. Among the etchings chosen by the committee, which included Sir P. A. Street, Lieut.-Governor, and Messrs. J. R. McGregor, S. N. Smith, and L. Lindsay, were modern ones by Sir D. Y. Cameron and Henry Rushbury and interesting portraits by Joseph Simpson of Brangwyn and James Pryde, the latter reminding one of the magnificent portrait in oils of this great artist by James Gunn, which is still available. There were also two etchings by Rembrandt and Charles Meryon. The sculpture purchases consisted of a brilliant metal portrait bust by Maurice Lambert and one of Epstein's smaller works, a charmingly vital head which makes one deplore his all-too-frequent excursions into abnormality. There were drawings by such well-known artists as Lucien Simon, Eric Gill, John Nash, John Skealing, Orpen, and Mulready Bone. The paintings chosen included two delightful canvasses by William Nicholson; one of them, "The Blue Shop," made one regret it was going so far away.

It was pleasant to read in the Times article that in the opinion of the writer, S. F. Markham, the National Gallery at Ottawa is probably the most efficient of all the Dominion galleries, since it combines richness with an effective educational programme that brings the blessing of art into the remote backwoods of the vast Canadian sub-continent. But in spite of this compliment and a full appreciation of the value of the Toronto collections and commendation for the research work done by Ottawa and Victoria, B.C., Canada does not show up very well in the matter of the encouragement of art by means of well-organized museums. With Great Britain at the top, of course, as regards expenditure per head, Canada shares with South Africa the lowest place, while New Zealand takes the highest, because of "the existence of a spirit of enlightened citizenship that will not be content with the second rate where museum or art gallery are concerned," while Winnipeg and London, Ontario, are cited as among the towns where there is as yet no worthy museum or art gallery.

The appreciation of beauty, that "quality of appearances that through the senses wakeneth spiritual emotion in the mind of man," is the right of every man, woman and child, and nothing is more depressing in this great city than to go eastward and note the miles of ugliness debarring the citizen from that right. The Jerry-builders in the middle of the last century forgot, if they ever knew, that they held a great responsibility in the power to decide whether they would give the people for whom they built the art that "as it createth new forms of beauty, awakeneth new ideas that advance the spirit in the life of reason to the wisdom of God."

FAMOUS PAINTER, LADY BUTLER, DIES

Artist Noted for Military Pictures Was in Her 83rd Year

London, October 3.—Word came today of the death of Lady Butler, painter of "The Roll Call," "The 28th Regiment at Quatre Bras" and other military pictures which gained for her world-wide celebrity, at the home of her daughter in County Meath, Ireland. She was 82 years of age.

Daughter of English parents, she was born in Switzerland and from her earliest years revealed the ability necessary to become a painter of merit. Her association with the famous South Kensington School lasted over a long period and she also had ample opportunities to study abroad.

"The Roll Call," commissioned by a Manchester patron, astonished the world at the Royal Academy in 1874 and won highest praise from the Prince of Wales, later Edward VII, and his celebrated kinsman, the Duke of Cambridge, for 40 years' Commander-in-Chief of the Army.

The painting was presented by the patron to Queen Victoria and still hangs in Buckingham Palace, while engravings of it and of "Quatre Bras," which hangs in the Melbourne National Gallery, are found in every quarter of the earth. "Scotland For Ever" was another work that achieved widest popularity.

She married in 1877 Lt.-Gen. Sir William Francis Butler. He died in 1910.

La Presse Oct. 5, 1933. Des paysages aux doux apaisements

Thomas-W. Mitchell, A.R.C.A., peint avec exactitude et en clarté des paysages tranquilles, ornés de beaux arbres.

— Percy-E. Nobbs s'attache aux heures mauves.

La collection Van Horne

THOMAS-W. MITCHELL, A. R. C. A., O. S. A., de Toronto, expose pour une quinzaine chez Eaton des paysages qui se distinguent par leur douce poésie et le charme de leurs beaux arbres. Son pinceau est très net, clair, précis, bien qu'il fasse un emploi souvent généreux de sa pâte. Le coloris, sans être effacé, incite à la quiétude charmante.

Mitchell ne recourt point aux simplifications hardies, il ne cherche pas à "styler" ses paysages, si je puis dire; sans pourtant s'encombrer d'éléments de surcharge, il rend avec exactitude et en clarté la nature telle qu'il l'a vue en des endroits choisis avec goût. Il a eu le souci de l'équilibre et de la grâce dans ses compositions. Et ses toiles sont diverses comme les saisons mais reflètent toutes la même poésie tranquille des campagnes canadiennes.

Dans la plupart de ses tableaux, de grandeurs diverses, il chante surtout un hymne aux arbres. Le feuillage mordoré et le mouvement de l'arbre au bois-de-fer (Ironwood). Les mille teintes de l'automne, l'éclaircie en feu. Les sapins qui montent la sentinelle en hiver. Les ormes protecteurs. Les bouleaux et leur délicatesse au bord de l'eau. Le verger fleuri en rose et blanc dans les souffles du printemps. Le coloris chante en douceur chez Mitchell.

Il s'attarde aussi à visiter des coins solitaires de fermes canadiennes. Dans "Rural Quebec", c'est une vieille maison, un charriot à boeuf et des collines bleues sous le soleil; dans "Mary Stafford's" un bâtiment blotti derrière des feuillages épais pour se garer contre la lumière chaude; dans "Milkings, Quebec", une scène rurale vigoureusement broyée.

"Jour de repos" montre trois chevaux sur le bord de la rivière; il se dégage de sa robe une tonifiante sensation d'espace et d'air pur de cette vaste toile. Ailleurs, des Laurentides aux couleurs vibrantes, une couple de scènes d'hiver d'un ton excellent, des vallées remplies de soleil, des coins d'eau fort limpides. Tout un bain de soleil et de quiétude qui fait oublier un moment les heures ternes et les "belles" escaliers de la métropole.

Percy-E. Nobbs

Il s'est attaché à rendre avant tout l'atmosphère des paysages qu'il a peints un peu partout, depuis les Indes occidentales jusqu'à la campagne anglaise. Ses aquarelles dénotent un sens aigu des tons doux, pittoresques à la fois et limpides. Il charme toujours. On aime surtout retrouver dans une poésie adoucie les heures mauves des crépuscules dans les firmaments des Indes et le bleu-pastel des mers chaudes. Il procède sans la moindre surcharge, sans heurts de pittoresque, avec une économie résolue dans la composition de ses sujets. Nobbs connaît les secrets de lumière des nuages paisibles.

Le coloris limpide et divers des firmaments tropicaux est illustré dans les sujets suivants: "Nuages caribéens", vaporeux, presque transparents; "Marée du soir aux Barbades", sable et horizon envahis par l'eau montante; "A S.-Thomas", masses vertes et mauves de nuages qui se dressent contre le ciel multicolore; "St-Kitts vu de la colline Brimstone", où il charrie tous les nuages menaçants d'un côté pour laisser voir un pan de ciel clair, tandis que les carrés de terrain se déroulent en catagorie.

Des scènes canadiennes il faut remarquer surtout: "L'île des Soeurs vue de Westmount", avec la rivière-argent; "Vieille barge à la baie Beetz, P.Q.", composition largement broyée.

"Le moulin abandonné d'Antigua" présente un mélancolique paysage en brun où se dresse une cheminée moderne, en manière de contraste cruel avec le charmant moulin dont les ailes ont cessé de battre. "Earlshall, Fifehire", décrit un crépuscule d'automne contre lequel se dresse un arbre triste et solitaire. Dans quelques autres sujets on découvre de jolis bouts de lacs, d'une eau bleue infiniment.

Prix du "standing"

Dans telles familles d'Outremont on a soin de laisser l'étiquette de prix bien en évidence sur les marbres artistiques ou commerciaux dont on orne le salon. On a beau avoir essuyé et même lavé le marbre depuis des années, l'étiquette est toujours là, qui s'offre sans la moindre discrétion aux regards, et vous êtes censé être "épaté" quand vous lisez, au lieu de "L'Enfant à la grappe" ou du nom de l'auteur, "Cie X,—$160". Si vous réfléchissez aussi que Mesdames payent tant pour leurs souliers, qu'elles ont fait tel voyage à tel prix, et ainsi de suite (du reste, rien ne sert d'y réfléchir, on vous le dit tout de go), vous vous faites une idée de leur "standing" social, de... leurs puériles vanités et de leur commun... mauvais goût. Les parvenus ont des trauvailles.

Le plaisir d'être cité

Le peintre Louis Rigal vient d'avoir du succès à Ottawa avec son exposition de têtes indiennes et de totems peints dans l'Ouest et précédemment exposés à Montréal. Pour le présenter au public un reporter outaouais qui l'interviewa ne trouva rien de mieux que de citer sans guillemets dans son article le titre et de substantiels passages de notre article paru le samedi, 2 septembre, dans la "Presse". Le reste, qui n'est pas de nous, parle vaguement de merveilles, de chefs-d'œuvre, d'idéalisme, de réalisme, d'inspiration classique, de renouveau et de régal tout à la fois. Sans doute aurons-nous le plaisir de nous relire plus au long dans une prochaine analyse de notre jeune confrère!

Une saison pleine

L'une des expositions les plus intéressantes de la saison sera sûrement celle de la collection Van Horne à la Galerie des Arts, du 16 octobre au 5

novembre. Dommage que le bandit Thounin ne soit plus ici pour constater de ses yeux toute l'étendue de sa méprise lorsqu'il prit le Salon du Printemps pour la collection Van Horne. Mais les tableaux seront bien gardés cette fois.

Le Salon d'automne des Artistes Indépendants s'ouvre samedi en l'édifice de la Sun Life, au 8e étage, pour jusqu'au 22 octobre. Admission gratuite sur semaine de 10 h. a.m., à 10 h. p.m., et le dimanche de 3 h. à 9 h. p.m. On assure que le Salon des Indépendants fournira d'étonnantes réalisations.

HANDICRAFTS GUILD OPEN NEW QUARTERS

The Canadian Handicraft Guild had the official opening of its new headquarters at 2019 Peel street yesterday afternoon, when many members attended and inspected the new premises. The first floor of the building is given over to showrooms. The second storey provides comfortable quarters for offices and for Guild meetings. The top floor is used for the weaving school which was formerly situated out on Victoria avenue.

ENTRIES ARRIVING FOR C.H.G. EXHIBIT

Entries have been arriving from all parts of the Dominion, for the exhibition which the Canadian Handicrafts Guild is holding in the galleries of the Art Association, and which opens on October 21. As it requires time to arrange the exhibition to advantage, the committee in charge requests that all entries be sent in between the present time and October 14. Some very interesting pieces have been received, and there are indications that the forthcoming exhibition will be a notable one.

EN HAUT, A GAUCHE, "The Pearly King", vaste toile de Gertrude des Clayes exposée chez Watson; elle dénote chez l'artiste, en plus de ses qualités habituelles de finesse et de pittoresque, un raffinement sensible dans la manière. EN HAUT, A DROITE, "Regardant dans la première ballerine" ou "Observant la star", exposé chez Watson également, l'une des compositions harmonieuses et intelligentes de Henri Fabien. EN BAS, A GAUCHE, une émouvante et vigoureuse tête de vieillard modelée par Jeanne Brodeur et exposée au Salon des Indépendants. EN BAS A DROITE, "South Shore Farm", paysage de Charles Tulley exposé au Salon des Indépendants et dont on apprécie les tons limpides et reposants. — (Clichés la "Presse").

FINEST HOLBEIN RECONDITIONED
Star Oct. 13/1933

On display at the studios of Spinks and Son, Ltd., London, is this gorgeous portrait of Henry VIII done by Holbein while he was in the King's service, just over four hundred years ago. It is valued at anywhere between £50,000 and £90,000, though it is said not yet to be for sale but just on exhibition. The greatest living authority on Holbein, Dr. Ganz, has spent two years removing four coats of paint by which lesser artists sought to "improve" it.

Portrait of Henry VIII. Found After Long Years

Valuable Work by Hans Holbein Discovered Under Four Coats of Paint in Castle Howard

By J. E. POOLE

The Star's London Resident Correspondent.

LONDON, Oct. 13.—The artistic vandals of today are not to be compared in audacity with those of the good old days, judging by a discovery which has just been made of the treatment to which an Old Master has been subjected by would-be "improvers." Since 1720 a painting has hung on the walls in Castle Howard, the Yorkshire seat of the Hon Geoffrey Howard, attracting but little attention. A year or so ago Professor Ganz, the greatest living authority on Holbein's works, saw the picture and after examination became convinced that underneath the four coats of paint which had been superimposed was a painting of value.

After two years of delicate "stripping" of the work of the "improvers," a genuine Hans Holbein painting of Henry VIII appeared, little the worse for the treatment it had received. The painting, which was formerly in the possession of the Dukes of Norfolk and may have been presented to the family to assuage their hostility over the King's ruthless disposal of his Queen, their relative, was bought by Charles, third Duke of Carlisle, at the Arundel sale and has been in the family since.

JOY TO GAZE ON

The painting, which is on view at Spinks & Son, is a joy to gaze upon. Its rich colorings, mellowed slightly by time, are parts of a magnificent whole, fully up to the level of the best of the Holbeins and in fact the experts declare it is the best of them all, particularly valuable since it is the only one painted at this period of the King's reign. There is a certain melancholy discernible in the features of the King, but it breathes a truly regal air, nevertheless, and will become world-famous.

Professor Paul Ganz speaking of the painting, says: "The portrait of King Henry VIII is painted in resin tempera on an oak panel, consisting of three boards (36½ x 26½"). It is signed with the initial "H" and dated (15)42. It is one of the most important genuine works by Hans Holbein the Younger. The Monarch is represented in half-length, but smaller than life-size, facing the spectator and wearing an enormous mantle of scarlet velvet, richly embroidered. He is fifty-one years old, five years older than in the sketch for the wall painting in Whitehall, but he appears much older, having lost his powerful and athletic nature by growing corpulence of his body. He looks distressed and unhealthy, holding a big staff in the left hand for his support.

"Holbein had to study the King very carefully from nature and he chose the unusual small and high size of the picture for improving the general impression of the King's mighty appearance, cleverly supported by the brilliant colors and the lively drawing of the ornaments.

"The picture is in an excellent state of preservation, showing Holbein's art in its best quality. It is a wonderful example of his genius as a portrait-painter who was able to render the real features and body of the elderly King, besides his still powerful royal splendor.

"This picture is the only ceremonial portrait of King Henry VIII known today painted by his celebrated court painter, Hans Holbein. Until today good old copies have been known, but this newly discovered genuine portrait of the great King puts all the copies in the shade. As well as being a great work of art, it is a most important document of English history."

Famous Van Horne Art Collection On Display

October 14, 1933.

The late Sir William Van Horne.

SIR WILLIAM VAN HORNE—whose energy and good taste gathered together the fine collection of paintings which will be shown in the Art Gallery during the next two weeks—was one of the most remarkable men Canada ever possessed. He was not only a great art lover. He was also a matchless railway builder, as was proven by his services and success in carrying through to completion the tremendous adventure of the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then it was his genius for organization and administration that made the road the success it subsequently became.

Sir William was in the truest sense a man of astounding versatility. He was not only a judge of pictures—he could make them. He was a man of direct action. He was outspoken and courageous. His independent treatment of the politicians was something new in railway management in Montreal. If there were any cringing to be done, that was left to others. So when he passed away at the zenith of his powers, there was universal regret as at the death of a great citizen.

The painters of twelve countries are represented in this splendid collection. France has more artists in the collection than any other country, with 31 out of the total of 120, and with 61 pictures out of the total of 195. There are four pictures by Corot, six by Monticelli, five by Daumier, and three by Theodore Rousseau. Cornelille de Lyon, Greuze, Gericault, Delacroix, Georges Michel, Bonvin, Courbet, Theodore Ribault, J. F. Millet, Daubigny, Decamps, Diaz de la Pena, Adolphe Hervier, Charles Bargue, Troyon, Boudin, Renoir, Cezanne, Toulouse-Lautrec, Benjamin-Constant, Sisley, Monet, Pissaro, Louise Mettling, Mary Cassatt and Marie Laurencin are all represented by one or more pictures each.

Of the Dutch school, which is next in size, there are works by 27 painters, old and modern. Four pictures are by Rembrandt and four by Frans Hals; the others are by Jan Vermeer, Jacob and Saloman van Ruysdael, van der Helst, de Witte, de Heem, Cuyp, Karel Fabritius, Backer, van Goyen, Ferdinand Bol, Molenaer, Cornelius Huysmans, Nicholas Maes, Breckelenkam, Koninck, Ochtervelt, van Mieris, van Beyeren, Jan Steen, Brouwer, among the older painters, and by Marius Bauer, Bosboom, Jacob Maris, and van Gelder among the modern ones.

Spanish pictures, though fewer, are not less important, with eight pictures, of which four are portraits by Goya, three by El Greco and four by Velasquez, as well as works of Murillo, Ribera, Zurbaran, Magnasco, Pedro Orrente, Jose Leonardo, Pantola de la Cruz, del Mazo, Juan Labrador and Eugenio Lucas.

15 BRITISH PAINTERS

Some fine works represent 15 British painters. Four are by Reynolds, seven by Constable and two by Romney, together with pictures by Raeburn, Hoppner, Turner, Lawrence, Hogarth, Gainsborough, Morland, James Inskip, Crome, and of newer painters, Richard Dadd and Walter Greaves.

Comparatively few of the Italian painters are represented but the list of them includes Titian, Leonardi da Vinci, Moroni, Anselmo da Forli, Canaletto, Guardi, Giambattista Tiepolo, Salvatore Rosa, Tintoretto, Cima da Conegliano, and Lorenzo Lotto.

The five Flemish painters whose works are shown are Rubens, by whom there are three works, Gerard David, Ambrosius Benson, Marcellus Koffermans and the unknown "Master of the Female Half-Lengths." Portraits by Helbein and by Cranach the Elder are two of the German pictures, with works by Adam Elsheimer and Michael Wolgemuth, the last named being the painter of a triptych which is a striking feature of the exhibition.

The Van Horne Collection

Since its present building was opened with a loan collection, twenty-one years ago, the Art Association of Montreal has never had on its walls an exhibition which could be compared with that which now hangs there. The collection of pictures made by the late Sir William Van Horne fills three large rooms and one small one and makes the Art Association, for two weeks, the guardian of one of the important galleries of this continent,—the sort of gallery that the founders of the association may have seen in their dreams. At the same time it is clear that the gallery confers certain advantages on the pictures and allows them to be seen and appreciated far better than can be possible in any house.

The exhibition contains not quite the whole of this famous collection but a selection of nearly two hundred of the best pictures in it. The pictures afford clear evidence of having been brought together by a man of fine taste, who chose them by using his own taste and judgment rather than by following fashions or reputations. Some of the pictures, by painters who now rank high with collectors, must have been acquired by Sir William at a time when those painters were comparatively little esteemed or little known. While, too, there are works by some of the most important of painters, the collection is rather remarkable for the possession of some unusually good works by painters of lower rank.

The twenty-seven pictures of the Spanish school form the choicest part of the collection, since among them there are three pictures by El Greco, one of them being the fine "Holy Family with a dish of fruit,"—and eight by Goya, which would make a distinguished collection without all the many other good things that are here. By Goya there are four small pictures of many figures,—perhaps made to be etched,—but the four portraits are more striking. There is a splendid portrait of "The Marquesa de Castrofuerte,"—that of her husband is not quite so good,—and one of "The sculptor Cameron," in grey clothes and hat. The portrait of a young nobleman, attributed formerly to Murillo and now to Velasquez, Zurbaran's "St. Elizabeth" and Ribera's "Diogenes" are other notable pictures in this Spanish group, which also contains very interesting pictures by Magnasco, and by Jose Leonardo, Pedro Orrente and Eugenio Lucas,—painters whose names are generally known only to experts.

The Dutch pictures, which are more numerous than the Spanish, include some very excellent works. They are headed by four Rembrandts, among which are the very fine "Young Rabbi" and a lovely little landscape study. But it is particularly in the Dutch school that this collection has such good works of rather less important painters. There is a delightful Nicholas Maes of an old woman with a Bible, another very good old woman by Cuyp, a big portrait of an admiral in a buff coat by Van der Helst and a young girl by Backer which are able to hold their own even with the Rembrandts and with Frans Hals' "Tooper," in a scarlet cap and embracing a big stone jug, which hang in the same row with them. There are many other good Dutch pictures, particularly an interior by Ochtervelt, an excellent landscape by Brouwer and some by Jacob van Ruysdael. The modern Dutch pictures are very few but among them are a good Bauer and an exceptionally good little picture of a girl knitting by Jacob Maris.

The few Flemish pictures include two small but good examples of the work of Rubens, one of which, "The Feast of Herod" is a beautiful color composition and has a further interest as containing a series of portraits of contemporary painters. Another excellent Flemish picture is a portrait of a man in black by Ambrosius Benson.

The works of Italian painters are one of the less important parts of the exhibition, but it contains three examples of Giambattista Tiepolo,—a portrait and three subject pictures which may be composition studies for bigger works, a good portrait by Moroni and a very beautiful study in monochrome of a woman's head, which is believed to be by Leonardo da Vinci. Only four German pictures are here but among them are a head of Melanchthon by Holbein, which once belonged to Horace Walpole and the fine triptych by Michael Wolgemuth, which is one of the outstanding pictures of the exhibition.

Constable's pictures hold a distinguished place among the British pictures here; the large "Vale of Dedham" is a magnificent picture and there are several smaller ones which are very good examples and in excellent condition. The other outstanding British pictures are portraits,—the beautiful, large Raeburn of "Mrs. Glengowen and daughter," and a specially good head, "The Countess Waldegrave," by Hoppner. Romney's "Jane, Duchess of Gordon" is a good portrait of his more formal kind, there are three portraits by Reynolds and, by later and lesser painters, a lady's portrait by James Inskip and a striking head by Richard Dadd.

Pictures of the French school form the largest section of the Van Horne collection; there are many very good pictures among them and their presence here is specially interesting, since the Art Association's own French pictures, which are the best part of the permanent collection, remain hanging in their places in the south gallery and the two collections supplement each other. A few painters are represented in the south gallery as well as a better than in the Van Horne collection and, together, the collections give a very satisfactory view of some of the best of modern French painters. Two groups are conspicuous among the Van Horne French pictures; one of six splendid works of Monticelli, the other of five particularly good examples by Daumier. The large "Nymphs pursued by Satyr" by Daumier is a very important work but it will give much less pleasure to most people than the small picture of a group of women lighted from a bright shop-window in a dark street; the others represent Daumier well in different ways. The Van Horne Corots are small ones,—two landscapes and two figure subjects, one of which is a delightful figure of a peasant girl. Of three good works by Renoir a head of a Neapolitan girl outshines the large and rather hot-colored pastel which is next to it. Troyon is represented only by a portrait, but it is a very interesting one, of George Sand. There is a delightful green view of the sea from the Normandy coast and another picture by Monet and a good Pissarro, but the work of these painters is well shown in the Art Association's collection. Other notable things among these French pictures,—to mention only a few of them,—are by Sisley, Libot, Mary Cassatt, Daubigny, Boudin, Georges Michael and Delacroix, with a brilliant study of a woman by Toulouse-Lautrec and a sketch of Montreal by Benjamin-Constant.

Thirteen pictures are by eight American painters, and Leon Dabo's pictures, rather in the manner of Whistler, and Maurice Sterne's sketches of Balinese women are to be noticed. Of the few Canadian works, William Brymner's small pastel sketch of Sir William Van Horne painting has special interest.

A group of Sir William's own pictures show the taste and understanding which made his collection. Many of them are large and ambitious pictures of very difficult subjects; some of them inevitably show that they are the work of a very busy man painting for recreation, but there are some very successful landscapes among them. In a table-case there are a number of water-color drawings which he made of some of his own Oriental porcelains, excellent drawings which have more in them than mere accuracy of form and color.

Some fine Oriental paintings, — three Chinese and one Japanese,—and two Greco-Egyptian coffin portraits, are also in the exhibition.

The works which are shown are not the whole of the great collection, and a few unimportant changes have been made since the printing of the catalogue. The exhibition has been very well selected and is exceedingly well arranged, without too exact a regard to the divisions of schools and countries.

THE VAN HORNE EXHIBITION

MONTREAL has been singularly fortunate in the past in having numbered among its citizens several men whose love of art and understanding of painting, combined with the requisite wealth, enabled them to assemble collections of pictures that compared favourably with the greatest private galleries in the world. Among them no name stands out more clearly than that of Sir William Van Horne. He was the perfect example of the great executive seeking surcease from business worries in the world of culture. He loved art in its manifold forms, but most of all he loved good pictures. And during his long life he brought together a collection that is amazingly diversified and contains notable examples of both classic and modern schools. These pictures are now on view at the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, through the courtesy of the Van Horne family.

During his lifetime Sir William was ever a generous lender and willing to afford the public opportunities to see his art treasures. It is in keeping with his desire to share the enjoyment which the contemplation of a thing of beauty confers that the pictures he loved so much are now placed where the public of the city of which he was so distinguished and devoted a citizen may view them to the best advantage. Could he see the crowds that daily throng the galleries where they are hung, it would afford him the most intense satisfaction. The labours of such men as he in assembling works of art from all over the world attain a cumulative value as the years go by. The cause of culture in this Dominion owes a debt to Sir William Van Horne that can never be repaid.

AT ART ASSOCIATION

Works by Famous Artists of Various Schools From Montreal's Last Great
Private Gallery

With a private view on Monday evening in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, the exhibition of pictures in the Sir William Van Horne collection will be inaugurated. Open to the public on Tuesday, the works will remain on view until November 5.

This exhibition, made possible through the generosity of the family of the late Sir William Van Horne, accords the public the opportunity of seeing again masterpieces of the world's greatest painters, among them pictures that Sir William placed at the disposal of the Art Association when its present fine building was opened and on the occasion of loan collections shown in the old premises on Phillips Square.

This presentation of nearly 200 works is a rare occurrence—the works coming from the last of the great private collections in Montreal. Affairs of estate caused the breaking up of the fine collection of the late Sir George Drummond, and from the rostrum at Christies the works accumulated by the late James Ross were bid in by collectors from the art centres of the world. Many fine works, too, gathered by Dr. William Gardner went, at his death, by way of the auction room.

The present show, which has an educational value impossible to estimate, is certain to draw thousands, for it is questionable whether so rich a gathering of various schools of painting can be found outside important public galleries.

COVERS WIDE RANGE.

Students, picture-lovers and connoisseurs have—naturally with some gaps—a chance to see paintings from the first and second century, B.C., down to the Impressionists. Further, there is a group of paintings by Sir William which show that his love of art was ingrained and in large measure explains his flair for good things, often at a time when some of the painters did not enjoy the prestige that came to them later. In his selection of works by painters—some in their day the subject of ridicule and abuse—yet to "arrive," his vision and good taste did not mislead him.

Envy, morally speaking, is taboo, but this collection excites it when one views the fine examples representing the various schools—Spanish: Goya, El Greco, Velasquez, Murillo, Zurbarán; Dutch: Vermeer, Frans Hals, Fabritius, Cuyp, Rembrandt, Ruisdael, Bol, Jan Steen, Brouwer, Maes; Flemish: Rubens, Holbein the Younger, Cranach the Elder; Italian: Tiepolo, Guardi, Moroni, Canaletto, Titian, Da Vinci, Tintoretto; British: Sir Joshua Reynolds, Turner, Hoppner, Sir Henry Raeburn, Constable, Romney, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Gainsborough, Morland; French: Delacroix, Greuze, Monticelli, Decamps, Corot, Daubigny, Rousseau, Millet, Courbet, Boudin, Daubier, Renoir, Cezanne, Sisley, Monet, Pissarro, Ribot; American and Canadian: Lawson, Ryder, Woodcock, Innes, Brymner, Morrice, La Farge, Barnsley, Wyant. These are a few of the outstanding painters.

There are, too, Chinese and Japanese paintings, and of a more personal nature is the catalogue of ceramics, each item being the subject of a small watercolor sketch done by Sir William.

The Sir William Van

Horne Collection

IT is not often that one has the privilege of walking into the art galleries of the Art Association of Montreal and finding oneself before so rare a collection of paintings representative of all the important schools as is being exhibited today. Through the generosity of the family of the late Sir William Van Horne a selection from his famous collection has been made available to the public and for the next three weeks one can wander among Grecos and Gainsboroughs, Daumiers and Cezannes, Rembrandts and Renoirs—one picks the names haphazardly and finds on every side works which will repay close study and observation. Never, perhaps, has one had quite the sensation of so much artistic opulence locally. Enter the large room opposite the head of the gallery stairway and you find yourself among canvases rich in texture and subject, each betraying not only the individual work, but the whole history that lies behind that creative effort, the magnificent background of the centuries therein reflected.

To take them school by school as they are exhibited, and glance at them even hastily is to find there a multitude of subjects. The three El Grecos, a portrait of La Casa, or the Holy Family with a Dish of Fruit, or the head of St. Maurice are striking representative works of that sensitive master. There is a Rubens rich in its dramatic composition, representing the Feast of Herod and said to be entirely the work of that prodigious and prolific worker, in which it is thought he portrayed his contemporaries and the members of his family, with the great craftsman himself presiding over the feast. There are some Daumiers, cunning in their shrewd characterizations as in the case of A Musical Party, or filled with robust paganism when he portrays nymphs pursued by satyrs. There are some representative Rembrandts, the Head of An Old Man, the Portrait of a Young Rabbi, and the Portrait of an Old Man With a Slashed Black Cap. There are some Franz Hals, the Jolly Toper, for instance, ruddy of face, his grin giving you a tremendous sense of the joys of living and the pleasures of the bowl, to mention only one of four precious Hals canvases on view. There is a Cezanne landscape, subtle as a study in greens; there are Velasquez, and Titian, Sir Joshua and Romney, Hogarth and Crome—one could go on enumerating the list of 200 works, each holding out a world of interest. A few contemporaries are included, and a few Canadian works—a delicate Morrice for instance. There is a small landscape by John La Farge, he who had his studio in Newport in those days when American society gathered there and where at least two distinguished Americans, as youths, dabbled in art and gained their early inspiration and their early fondness for the arts which was to lead them abroad later. It was here that William James studied painting before he turned to philosophy and psychology.

All these works carry with them reminiscence and history. It is as if a corner of some great European gallery had been transferred to Montreal. And in one room you will find some of Sir William Van Horne's own work, which, the catalogue very appropriately points out, were "done from memory and by artificial light in the small hours of the night—the hours of relaxation of an exceedingly busy man. The present exhibition is a tribute to a man who was obviously a sensitive and fine lover of the arts; and for Montrealers should constitute an all-too-rare artistic adventure. There will be some who will haunt the galleries during the coming three weeks.

INDIAN PAINTINGS.

As things Indian are so much in the public mind at the moment I had a double interest in visiting the exhibition of one hundred modern Indian paintings at the Fine Art Society's rooms in Bond Street. I went with misgivings, for I had the preconceived notion that contact with western art would debase the older methods of tradition. The paintings in Bond Street are the outcome of the School founded in Bengal about thirty years ago by Dr. Abanindranath Tagore. The pictures have little in common with western art. People familiar with the work of the late Aubrey Beardsley will recognize whence he drew his inspiration, but the soft cloudy coloring of the long-fingered gods and goddesses is inimitable. I liked best the work of S. Choudhury.

MANY FAMOUS WORKS

Spanish, Dutch, Flemish, Italian, British, French, American, and Canadian Artists Represented

Outstanding examples of painters of many schools collected by the late Sir William Van Horne went on exhibition with a private view in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, last evening. Open to the public today, the exhibition will remain on view until November 5.

The gathering of paintings, represents the last of the great private collections which for years made Montreal the envy of other Canadian cities. Indeed, the exhibition is of such importance that were it being held in a European capital it would draw admiring connoisseurs from distant points. As it is the period of this show should result in record attendance figures.

Various causes have led to the dispersal of the other important private collections that Montreal could boast and this is the first time that the Van Horne treasures have been publicly shown. Proud, and with reason, of his possessions, he was always generous in placing some of his masterpieces at the disposal of the Art Association on the occasion of loan exhibitions—at the old premises on Phillips Square and also on the occasion of the inauguration of its present modern home.

Montrealers in the next few weeks will count themselves fortunate in this opportunity to see paintings by the world's most famous artists—a circumstance made possible through the kindness of the family of the late Sir William Van Horne.

The urge to acquire is the strongest elemental instinct, but to form so magnificent a collection requires two prime essentials—good taste and financial means. Having the former in good measure, Sir William allied it with sound judgment and vision that prompted him to gather the works of many painters before they won the acclaim of the general public. This particularly applies to works of the French school, which is rich in modern examples. This group alone would be enough to "make" a private collection worthy to be talked about, but it is only an incident in the procession of valuable works the galleries at present hold.

WIDE ARTISTIC SYMPATHIES.

Even a cursory survey suggests the breadth of Sir William's artistic sympathies. The Spanish school with its great painters is grandly represented—not with single examples but by many. Goya, 1746-1828, masterful painter and great lover, who as a young man spent some time dodging the authorities—after a murderous brawl to Madrid, from there, for a similar reason, to Rome, and thence to North Italy for a little affair connected with breaking into a convent—occupies an important place with eight works which reveal his spirited brushwork and lovely color. The subject pieces of marked action include "Peasants Fighting Soldiers" and "The Horrors of War"—a murdered baby and women being seized by soldiers. Seductive in glance is the portrait of the actress Rita Molinos, and there is pride in the bearing of the Marques and Marquesa de Castrofuerte. Another dignified portrait is that of the sculptor Cameron.

El Greco, about 1547-1614, who was partial to rather elongated and emaciated figures, is represented by "The Holy Family with a Dish of Fruit"; and "Head of St. Maurice" and a striking portrait of La Casa—a man of noble bearing with pointed beard, lace collar and rich dress.

Valasquez, 1599-1660, whose works are in the forefront of the glories of Spanish painting, is here to delight with four examples—the imposing full length portrait of Philip IV. of Spain, arresting in design and magical in handling; a smaller portrait of the same monarch at a later age; a portrait of a young nobleman, and "Christ on the Cross."

By Ribera, 1616-1656, is "Diogenes"—a bearded man with a lantern bound on a futile errand, while "A Spanish Gentleman" by Murillo, 1617-1682, is an excellent example not marred by that tendency to sweetness which characterize many of his subject pictures. "St. Elizabeth of Hungary" in a richly brocaded dress, by Zurbaran, 1598-1662, is a powerful piece of painting. "Dragoons Waiting" represents Leonardo, 1466-1519, while monks in refectories are the subjects of two low-toned works by Magnasco, 1631-1747. In this group, too, are paintings by Lucas the Younger, 1824-1870; Orrente, 1560-1644; Cruz, 1564-1612; Del Mazo, 1612-1667; Labrador, 1530-1600,

Rich in big names is the Dutch group—four by Franz Hals, 1584-1666, and a like number by Rembrandt, 1606-1669, being among the masterpieces. Hals is represented by two manners—"Samuel Ampsing," two marvellously painted portraits of a Dutch gentleman and a Dutch lady dressed in their best and sober of men, each holding a loose glove, dignified and conscious of their importance, and "The Jolly Toper," much gayer in color and more free in touch, suggesting that this breezy, informal portrait of some convivial fellow comrade of the inn, where Hals when not in his studio could generally be found, was more to his taste than the precise, exacting portrait client. The toper, ruddy faced and laughing, hugs a jar of liquor. The character of this roisterer is marvellously caught and set down with brushwork that suggests rapid execution. In marked contrast are the serious, typically lighted subjects of Rembrandt—"Head of an Old Man," "An Old Man with Slashed Black Cap" and "Portrait of a Young Rabbi," the last with curly hair and melancholy gaze being a wonderful bit of characterization. "A Landscape Study"—stormy sky, trees and building is typical of some of his etching subjects. Bartholomeus van der Helst, 1613-1670, has a bluff portrait of Admiral Cornelius Tromp, dressed in a buff uniform with colored sash. Curly-haired and rotund of face and figure, there is more than a hint of self-confidence. Recalling school-room days and the robust song of late-hour "smokers" revives the memories of a gentleman of this name who tied a broom to his mast-head and swore to sweep the English from the seas.

Of high excellence are these representations of this school. Here will be found that painter whose known works are relatively few—Vermeer of Delft, 1632-1675, with "Young Girl Reading"; Fabritius, 1620-1654, "Young Man in a Fur Cap"; Cuyper, 1620-1691, with a wonderfully sympathetic rendering of "Woman with Ruff" and "River View with Cattle"—cows at the edge of water, with shipping; Van Goyen, 1596-1656, with "Winter Sports"—horses, tent, skaters and a distant mill; Jacob van Ruisdael, 1628-1682, with a wonderfully composed flat landscape, river and distant town under a spacious cloudy sky—"Bleaching Grounds at Haarlem," "Landscape with Waterfall and Church," wooded country with a turbulent stream, and another example of his skill in painting country. More sombre in tone is "The Marien Kirche at Utrecht" by Saloman van Ruisdael, 1600-1670.

Maes, 1632-1693, is there with a hint of homage to his master, Rembrandt, in the lighting of "Old Woman with Bible"; Jan Steen, 1626-1679, with "Children Playing with Cat," while this section is rounded out with examples by De Witte, 1617-1692; De Heem, 1603-1660; Backer, 1608-1651; Bol, 1616-1680; Molenaer, about 1600-1668; Huysmans, 1648-1727; Marius A. J. Bauer, 1864-1932; Brekelenkam, 1620-1668; Koninck, 1619-1688; Oosterveld, 1635-about 1700; Bosboom, 1817-1891; Jacob Maris, 1837-1899; Van Mieris, 1635-1681; Van Beyeren, 1620-1675; Brouwer, 1605-1638.

PAINTINGS BY RUBENS.

The Flemish group has two by Rubens, 1577-1640—a small "Adoration of the Shepherds" and "The Feast of Herod," the latter showing a characteristic practice—a Biblical incident being represented with the characters in contemporary national dress. This work of lovely color shows the moment when the cover of a charger is being raised, revealing the head of the hapless John. The figures about the table, it has been suggested, are portraits of fellow painters and others of Rubens—Vasari, Palma the Elder, Raphael, Tintoretto, Paul Veronese, Titian, the mother of Rubens, Rubens' son Nicholas, Isabella Brant, the artist's first wife; Helen Fourment, his second, and Rubens.

Other works are by Benson, 1521-1550; Hoffermapa, worked 1549; Ysenbrandt, working in Bruges 1519 (died 1551); Gerard David, 1450-1523; and two works described as by Master of the Female Half-Length Figures, worked 1525-1540.

The German school does not boast a single modern example, so far as the present show is concerned, which suggests that, though Sir William showed liking for the French Impressionists, a first-rate example by Max Liebermann, who painted in their manner in Germany, was not available. An altar triptych of large dimensions, crowded with figures and animals, by Michael Wolgemut, 1434-1519, holds important place, other representatives of this group being Hans Holbein the Younger, 1497-1543, with a portrait of Philip Melancthon, which came from the collection of Horace Walpole; Lucas Cranach the Elder, 1472-1553, with a portrait—"Martin Luther with a Beard"; and Adam Elsheimer, 1578-1600, whose example is "Leto with Apollo and Artemis."

Important names have place in the Italian section. Tiepolo, 1696-1769, besides the figure subject "Submission of Henry IV. of Germany to Pope Gregory VII. at Canossa, A.D. 1077," is represented by "Apelles painting a Portrait" and a gracious likeness of a lady in page's costume. Moroni, 1520-1578, has brought distinction to the "Portrait of a young Italian Nobleman," while the subject by Titian, 1477-1576, is "The Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine." Leonardo da Vinci, 1452-1519 did "Study of a Woman's Head," and Tintoretto, 1518-1594, has honored with his brush a Venetian Councillor.

Salvatore Rosa, 1615-1673; Guardi, 1712-1793; Forli, worked 1455; Canaletto, 1697-1768; Cima da Conegliano, 1460-1517; and Lorenzo Lotto, 1480-1556, complete this group.

Portraits of women, full-face of the 1st. and 2nd. century, B.C. are examples of Hellenic or C. Roman period.

The British school is worthily represented, outstanding portraits being among the features. By Sir Joshua Reynolds, 1723-1792, are portraits of "Countess of Carnarvon," "Lady Talbot" and "Master Gawler." A lovely portrait of the Countess of Waldegrave is by J. P. Reynolds, 1758-1810; from the brush of Sir Henry Raeburn, 1756-1823, is "Mrs. Glengowen and Daughter," while among other portraits are "Miss Morland" and "Jane, Duchess of Gordon, and her son" by Romney, 1734-1802, and "Georgiana, Lady Dover," by Sir Thomas Lawrence, 1769-1830. Gainsborough, 1727-1788, famous as a portrait painter, is represented by "Landscape and Cattle."

In this group are works by Richard Dadd, 1817-1887; Turner, 1775-1851, with "Shakespeare's Cliff, Dover"; John Crome, 1768-1821; Constable, 1768-1837, who brought air and light into English landscape painting and saw his influence spread to France, with six typical vigorous works; Hogarth, 1697-1764, with a portrait of a little girl; Inskipp, 1790-1868; Morland, 1763-1804, and the relatively modern Walter Greaves, 1846-1930, whose transcriptions of the Thames show sympathy with Whistler.

THE FRENCH GROUP.

The French group would bring joy to any collector—simple scenes of lovely color of which the beholder cannot tire.

Touching first on the older men, there are Claude Lorraine, working 1630-1675; with "a French Ecclesiastic"; Greuze, 1725-1805, with "Portrait of Madame Mercier," a work much to be preferred to his tearful damsels with dead birds; Gericault, 1791-1824, with "Horses in their Stable" and Delacroix, 1799-1863, whose sense of the dramatic is revealed in "Christ on the Lake of Gennesaret," and painting of a lion and lioness in which the lithe cat-like characteristics are admirably suggested. Dramatic in spirit, too, are "Horsemen on a Mountain Road" and "Saul pursuing David," by Decamps, 1830-1860.

Varying periods are represented in the works of Corot, 1796-1875,—"Mother and Child" and "Peasant Girl by a Wall" are of his early "lighter" manner, while "Les Gaulois" troops in a sandy landscape, introduces the typical type of tree associated with this artist. "Landscape—Sand Dunes"—figures near a brook in an almost treeless landscape, has atmosphere and values that will make the student look again. Daubigny, 1817-1878, is represented by landscapes, lovely in its subtle indication and tones being a sheep pen in a flat meadow that stretches to a line of distant trees under a sombre sky. Rousseau, 1812-1867, shows different phases in the three examples—"Great Oaks at Bas-Breux," being big in feeling and bold in execution. Millet, 1814-1867, whose "Sower" and "The Angelus" spread wide his fame, did the "Smithy in Normandy," and by Eugene Boudin, 1825-1898, is "A Corner of Louvain"—a waterway with buildings, lovely in color and rich in touch. Painting of the finest kind marks a small still-life—a study of fruit by Courbet, 1819-1877.

No fewer than six works represent the great colorist Monticelli, 1824-1886. "Algerian Landscape" shows his ability as a draughtsman, but for those who would revel in color there is "Fete Champetre" and other works where gorgeous hues have been leaped on with lavish hand—jewels piled on jewels or autumn riotously scattering the richest of her hues. Opposite to the fervid visions of this native of Marseilles, who with absinthe drank himself into an eight-day slumber before death came, is Daumier, 1808-1879, whose forceful drawing and bold design are combined with color of distinction. Son of a glazier, Daumier quit Marseilles for Paris where most of his life was spent in journalistic illustration—chiefly as a characterist of life about him and above him—since an unfortunate pictorialization of the King sent him to prison in 1831. Bold in modelling are the subjects shown—a nocturne with figures looking into a lighted shop window; two men singing as a third plays the piano in a Salon; "The Fugitives," figures mounted and afoot in a bleak landscape in boisterous weather; "Le Premier Pas"—a massive man holding a baby while it paddles in the water, with an admiring mother and child sitting on the bank. These works are marked by lovely values, but for high color and energetic movement the palm must go to "Nymphs pursued by Satyrs," which was exhibited at the Paris Salon of 1850. The nymphs, who have been careless of their diet, pound, rather than trip, through the wooded sunlit landscape, while emerging from the shelter of the trees in the background the satyrs are speeding to make their capture. It is a powerfully painted work.

Paintings by the Impressionists comprise the best work by exponents of that school. Monet, 1840-1926, with "Boulevard" and "Normandy Coast," is seen as a painter of sea and ships in the latter, and as a landscapist in the former. The painting is solid and the color clean, both examples being of the period before his experimentation carried him to painting vaporous visions. Sisley, 1839-1899, has a glowing stream-side scene with poplars flushed against warm sky. Pissarro, 1830-1903, has an arrangement in gold, purple and blue—"Old Chelsea Bridge, London," the wooden structure familiarized by Whistler in some of his etchings. Renoir, 1841-1919, shows much delicate color in "La Toilette," a girl at a stream. "Two Sisters" and "Neapolitan Girl" are from his hand. Mary Cassatt, 1845-1926, an American who was in sympathy with this group, is represented by a typical "Mother and Child." Toulouse-Lautree, 1864-1901, whose lithographs and posters have immortalized Yvette Guilbert, the mortallized Yvette Guilbert, has typical examples of his open, free brushwork and transparent color in "At the Cafe" and "In the Garden." The brush of Cezanne, 1839-1906, gives weight and volume to "Roadway in Provence," and Benjamin Constant, 1845-1926, who painted the East without its squalor, inscribed to Sir William a little winter sketch of Montreal as seen from Mount Royal.

Completing the French school are paintings by Barye, died 1833; Hervier, 1818-1879; Troyon, 1810-1866; Bonvin, 1817-1887; Michel, 1763-1843; Metting, 1848-1904; Ribot, 1823-1891, and the contemporary Parisian painter, Marie Laurencin.

In the group of American and Canadian paintings are examples by Ernest Lawson, Ryder, Maurice Sterns, Burroughs, Woodcock, Dabo, Mathews, Inness, Brymner, Morrice, La Farge, Barnsley, Hammond and Wyant.

All the paintings by Sir William Van Horne, done, according to the foreword to the catalogue, "from memory and by artificial light in the small hours of the night—the hours of relaxation of an exceedingly busy man," show that no problem was too big to tackle. Here are "Japanese Fete," a nocturne; landscapes at different seasons of the year, so uncompromising a subject as "Steel Mills at Sydney, C.B.," "Moonlight at St. Andrews" and "Railroad Station at Night," where the glare of a locomotive headlight flushes a string of cars and the depot building. This was inspired by Kipling's story, "007." These performances are of ample size and show that a love of painting was a very real force.

Besides Chinese and Japanese paintings, his love of the pottery of the Far East is shown by the care he bestowed in cataloguing his collection, there being tinted drawings from his hand of his cherished pieces.

Exhibition Of Pastels by F. Hennessey

Pictures by Art Hennessey, of Ottawa, have attracted attention in several exhibitions of the last few years, but the quality of his best work has never been better shown than in the collection which now covers the walls of two of the galleries at Eaton's and is to remain on view till the end of next week. All but two of them are in pastel and, while they are most interesting and attractive as pictures, they are also admirable examples of the clever use of that medium. They are views of typical Canadian scenery, many of them drawn in the Gatineau Valley, at different seasons and in different kinds of weather, with many very good studies of newly fallen or melting snow. It is to be noticed how skillfully Mr. Hennessey has got some of his effects with the simplest subject matter; one of the best of the pictures is of a ploughed field, with some trees in the distance, which is delightful in its color and something of a feat in the use of pastel; in another, "March Thaw," a pleasing picture is made of a characteristic snake fence at the corner of a wood. In "The River Road," the woods and a passing sleigh are quite distant and the picture makes its effect chiefly with an expanse of snow. The gay colours loved by habitants are used to good purpose in many of these drawings and there are a number of happy studies of cottages and their surroundings. Figures appear in only a few of these pictures, but in one of them, "In The Hills," there is a very expressive drawing of a tired and discontented white horse. Mr. Hennessey has taken subjects of many kinds, as he found them, and the variety of composition and color makes one of the attractions of the exhibition.

Notes of Art In Europe

"Mona Lisa," Leonardo da Vinci's famous portrait which hangs in the Louvre,—one of the world's most famous pictures,—it threatened by a rival. A picture which has been for many years the property of Earl Brownlow, at one of his country houses in England, has always been supposed to be a copy of the Louvre picture, but now claims are being made that it is, in point of fact, the original picture by Leonardo and that the Louvre has only the copy. It seems that Leonardo, somewhere in his writings, speaks of his "Mona Lisa" as a picture which never was finished; the Louvre picture has every appearance of a finished picture,—it is hard to see what

English Pictures At Johnson's

Star
Oct. 18/33

The twenty-fifth annual exhibition in Montreal of the Cooling Galleries, of London, has just been opened at the Johnson Galleries on St. Catherine street. As in former years, there are a number of good works by modern European painters, which call for attention. One of the best of these is a very good example of the work of Le Sidaner in his quietest mood—"La boucherie," a peaceful street in a small town, seen in a dull evening light. A very good Boudin, "On the Lorr," is also a picture of evening light, darker in tone than is usual with Boudin. Yet another evening picture, a sunset by Ziem, is a blaze of rich colors. With these there are a charming little figure study by Blommers and examples of the work of Willem Maris, Roybet and others.

A large part of the interest of this exhibition is given to it by the collection of work by some of the less important painters, chiefly English of about a hundred years ago—little known painters, some of them, whose work was overshadowed by that of men who have remained famous. Many of them are still well appreciated in England for the truth and sound painting of their pictures. William Shayer is one of them whose work is known even in Canada, and there are two good examples of his work in this exhibition—"The Milkmaid," a good stable interior, and a group of fisherfolk. Two good and very English pictures, one large and one small, are landscapes by Baker of Leamington, a painter whose fame was chiefly confined to his own part of the country. A coast scene, with a fishing boat in the surf, by E. W. Cooke, a group of animals by Sidney Cooper and a view of old Westminster Bridge by D. Turner are among the more notable pictures in the collection. More recent painting in England is represented by pictures by Edgar Bundy, Dudley Hardy, James Peel, T. B. Hardy, Edwin Hayes and many others, and there are several works by French and Dutch painters.

There are in this exhibition two very interesting small Canadian pictures, of Indians with sleighs and snow-shoes, signed "Somerville, Montreal." The painter was evidently a close follower of Krieghoff, but nothing seems to be known about him.

more the painter could have wanted to do to it—but the Brownlow picture is unfinished. Since the picture in Paris is clearly too good to be only a copy, it is suggested that both pictures are the work of Leonardo, as is probably the case with his two pictures of Virgin among rocks, one in the Louvre and the other in the National Gallery in London.

An important exhibition of British Art is to be held in London, by the Royal Academy in January and February. It will contain a quantity of the best works of British painters from private collections and perhaps also from foreign galleries. There will also be drawings and works of sculpture but the exhibition is not to be confined to works of the so-called fine arts; there are to be tapestries, and specimens of furniture, silver and of work in other branches of art in which British craftsmen excelled.

Two interesting appointments have just been made in connection with the national collections in London.

The distinguished painter, Augustus John, has been made one of the trustees of the Tate Gallery. Since the chief purpose of this gallery is the exhibition of modern British art, the choice of John seems a sound one, but it may surprise people who remember the opinions which were held about his work twenty or thirty years ago.

The other appointment is of Kenneth Clarke to be Director of the National Gallery. Mr. Clarke, who has been for two years keeper of the art collection at the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford, is recognized as an authority on art history, but is only 30 years old and is said to be the youngest man ever appointed to direct any gallery or museum of so great importance.

PRIMAGE DUTY CUT.

Additional to the foregoing exchange adjustments, Australia has cut its "primage" duty—an impost which coincides with Canada's import tax—from 10 per cent. in some cases to five per cent., from 10 per cent. to four per cent. in others, while in some categories the "primage" duty is eliminated altogether.

A partial list of Canadian exports to which the adjustments will apply follows:

Cocoa and confectionery; canned crustaceans; canned fruit and vegetables; sundry goods, not named in the tariff, put up for household use or for retail sale; onions; tractors.

Books for public libraries, caustic soda and caustic potash for felling-mongering and rock salt, formerly subject to four per cent. primage from any country, are now exempt. Infants' and invalids' foods, printing paper, maps and charts, specified surgical instruments and appliances, and some minor articles, are now subject to four per cent. primage from any country instead of 10 per cent. as formerly.

The Van Horne Collection.

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir.—A city is no greater than its citizens, and does not justify its existence at all if it is merely a soulless market place. Montreal has been fortunate, in that her share of noble citizens has been adequate to spread an influence in the realm of art that is a light within her eyes. Great among them stands the late Sir William Van Horne, whose magnificent collection of paintings is now on view at the Art Gallery. Every citizen who is above the "barbarian" tone of mind should endeavor to see the treasures here on view. There are not many private collections on this continent that can excel it, and not even our National Gallery can compare with it in breadth and importance. There are representative paintings from the primitives to the French impressionists, and to think of flye Daumiers together, and four Rembrandts in a row, is to realize the importance of the whole.

Sir William Van Horne was a "born" collector and had a natural flair for things of intrinsic excellence. He relied on his own judgment, and found his way along the path of connoisseurship by trial and error. He once showed me his "attic" which contained his "mistakes" as he called them, for he had the genuine collector's courage to eliminate. How broad his range of appreciation was, the present exhibition testifies; for he recognized the almost timeless universality of art. You will find works dating from before Christ to his own contemporaries. That he might have made a name as an artist himself is indicated by a study of his own pictures which are hung together. His modesty is here exemplified by the fact that he never signed his own pictures except cryptically backwards, or with a single H.

It is perhaps safe to say that such a magnificent collection will never be formed by a private citizen in Canada again. But there are many others today who are enjoying the same pleasure on a more modest scale. That Montreal is one of the most art-loving cities on the continent we perhaps owe to the silent example of this great citizen. We owe a debt of gratitude to the Van Horne family for their generosity in lending their pictures for the public to see, and to the enterprise of our Art Association in undertaking the great task of hanging them so admirably that the pictures have never been seen to greater advantage. It is to be hoped that public appreciation will be shown, and that everyone who cares for "the things that are more excellent" will visit the gallery between now and the fifth of November. I have been informed that over 700 people crowded the gallery on the opening night alone.

THINGS TO SEE.

Sir.—At this time of year, when the average citizen is somewhat puzzled to know how to fill in his leisure, it is well to offer a kind reminder. At the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street west, there is going on that remarkably successful showing of water color drawings by Percy E. Nobbs. Here is something that none ought to miss. It is the finest and most satisfying one-man exhibit that Montreal has been fortunate to view in many a decade. I have no hesitation at all to say so. Then, again, there is now to be observed at the Sun Life Building, the Second Exhibition of the Independent Art Association Incorporated. Some 405 art items have been assembled, and very charmingly displayed, balanced and lighted. There are things to be seen in the collection that will surely fill the heart of art lovers with instantaneous joy. Among the even larger group of distinguished work may I but briefly draw attention to such contributions as Beattie (8), Campbell (26), Macaulay (78), McCorkindale (80), Morency (95), Robertson (116), Royle (121), Sher (141), Wright (158), Linder (248), Hornyansky (314), Norlin (325), Starkey (335), Galea (380), and Wheeler (392). My final humble advice is: Let no Montrealer pass up the opportunity to visit both these exhibitions. I feel sincerely confident that they will derive much pleasure thereby; and will never regret the effort made to reach these two centres of contemporary local art interest.

INFLUENCE OF PARIS ON ART EMPHASIZED

Star 18/33 Oct.
Address by Prof. Desclos
to Art Society

Since the Middle Ages Paris has been one of the art centres of the world, and for centuries it has been the great mart where people have gone from all over the world to provide themselves with beautiful things, said Prof. Auguste V. Desclos, of the University of Paris, who addressed the Women's Art Society yesterday afternoon in Stevenson Hall. Speaking on the "The Artistic Life of Paris", Professor Desclos dealt with the art production in that centre, the attitude of Paris towards things artistic, the encouragement given to artists, life in the studios, and the many factors that make Paris noted as an art centre.

Characteristics of the art production of Paris, the lecturer noted, are originality, capacity for assimilation and adaptation, and universality.

Professor Desclos touched on the circumstances that make Paris a favorable background for artistic production. Beautiful in itself, the city is the residence of writers, scientists, musicians, critics; a city of theatres and concerts; of schools, studios and museums, of which last, there are 30 in Paris. The prestige attached to things of the intellect was evidenced in statues to savants and artists, in street names, in the space devoted by the press to art and literature, even in names given to battleships, two being named the Michelet and the Renan.

Even in this time of depression there are in Paris approximately 50,000 artists working, nearly half of them regular exhibitors. One element that influenced art production in Paris was the tradition of fine workmanship handed down for generations. "L'Ouvrage bien fait" was an inspiring motto. Paris was generally considered a city of pleasure but it is also a city of hard work, declared the lecturer, who showed pictures of studios in which students of all ages were at work. There was, he said, a curious contrast between the gaiety outside and the serious atmosphere within the studios and academies. Exhibitions of their works were essential to the artists in disposing of them, and sometimes a painter, not being able to send his pictures to the salons, held an exhibition in the street, hanging his pictures on the walls of houses.

Encouragement to artistic production was given by the government, which buys pictures and statues to give to museums in towns and provinces, gives decorations to artists, and promotes exhibitions of the schools. The picture dealers often take more than a commercial interest in art, and sometimes recognize the merit in a movement or the work of an individual still unknown to the public.

Mrs. R. A. Dunton presided at the meeting. She mentioned that the studio group of the society will begin work next Wednesday, in a studio at the art galleries, Mrs. R. R. Thompson is convener of this group.

WINDOW SKETCHES SHOWN AT LECTURE

Francis Chigot Speaks on Stained Glass and Illustrates Subject

Some striking watercolor sketches for stained glass windows were shown at the Ecole des Beaux Arts last evening by Francis Chigot, of Paris, France. Mr. Chigot prefaced his exhibition by a lecture on the history and technique of stained glass windows, which he illustrated with lantern slides.

The majority of the sketches shown were devoted to religious subjects. There were given varied treatment, some being done in the mediaeval manner and others in the bolder simplified design of the present day. In addition to the ecclesiastical windows there were some effective secular subjects. These included windows for the hall of a navigation company and some very original studies for a porcelain factory in which the actual scenes of the manufacturing process provided the subject material.

Mr. Chigot was introduced by Charles Maillard, director of the school, and thanked by Arsene Henry, French Minister to Canada.

GOOD EXHIBIT OF WORK FROM LONDON

Cooling Galleries Collection
Includes Examples By Boudin, Le Sidaner and Ziem

There are a number of attractive paintings in the collection from the Cooling Galleries, Limited, of London, England, now on view in the Johnson Art Galleries, Limited, 1340 St. Catherine street—west. The varied works, brought to Canada by J. H. Cooling, form the twenty-fifth annual show organized by this London gallery which has during this period brought many important paintings to Canada. A few years ago it was a group of watercolors by Brabazon, and later, among other valuable works, a striking example of John Singer Sargent's skill as a watercolorist.

Boudin is represented by landscape in cool greens and greys—a stretch of stream edged by trees under a cloudy sky. It is a restful scene charged with atmosphere and painted with the direct and confident touch that marks Boudin's best work. Of the French school, but of later date, is a poetic interpretation of late afternoon by Le Sidaner called "La Boucherie." Against the darkening sky a lamp gleams above the little butcher shop, the illuminated interior throwing into relief the hanging carcasses. The contrast between the colored wooden trim and doorway of the shop and the range of greys in the stone building and pavement shows skill. Beyond the rising roadway, where the wall suggests a bridge, is a row of house in pale light, with two figures chatting on the sidewalk. It is painted in typical manner—broken brushwork and lovely values. By Blommers is a spirited bit of quiet color—a little girl playing with a boat. "Cattle by a stream" by William Maris says all that need be said in small compass—a reedy meadow, cattle, and a sail against a silvery, cloudy sky. The touch is deft and the values are fine. "Sunset, Venice" by Ziem is a work of vivid color, with a fine suggestion of gathering darkness on the rolling water. The spars of ships are silhouetted against the glowing sky and in the middle distance is a boat with crew.

Paintings with figures in costumes of an older day, when masculine dress was more gay and picturesque, are always interesting, and in this collection there are several examples—"Waiting an audience," a man in court dress, by Roybet; "Plan of Campaign"—soldiers studying a map, by J. Villigis; "On Guard," a well-armed sentinel in Oriental dress before a gateway, by Joanawitz, and a strongly painted watercolor of a Puritan, with hand on sword, parleying with two opponents before a table covered with a dashing painted colored cloth, by Edgar Bundy, R.A., called "Puritan's Demands." An earlier example by this painter in oils is a man with tankard emerging from a door and exchanging banter with a maid who shells peas beneath a timbered archway. "The Connoisseur"—richly dressed men examining prints, is a work of fine finish by Lesrel.

Among works, regarded by some as a bit old-fashioned but for which there is a growing demand in England at the present time, must be mentioned examples by William Shayer Sr. "The Milkmaid," in a stable interior with cattle and figure, is well designed and effectively lighted, and "Southampton fisher folk" is marked by nice values in the distant sand and a delicately-hued cloud, contrast being supplied by the sturdy figures and incidental fish, basket and sail. By W. and C. Shayer is "Gipsy Encampment"—a woodland glade, hut, and a family of wanderers. Ch. Clair is represented by "Feeding Time"—a sunlit barn interior with sheep and fowls, and "The Rug Merchant" by Dudley Hardy has some rich color. Baker of Lemington, of the old school, shows academic perfection in "Lane Scene With Figures."

In a large group of works which offers many opportunities for the modest collector there are attractive items. Jose Weiss, a painter of solid worth who studied atmospheric effects with success, signs effective landscapes—"Clouds and water," "Winding Path," "Houghton, Sussex," and "River Arun," which show distinct sympathy with his subject. The touch is free and fluid and the color clean. Jansen has a group of Dutch scenes—typical barges in port and wrack gathers on wave-washed sands. R. W. Allan is especially effective in "Moret, France"—a waterway, buildings and a shepherd with sheep. Action marks the fighting soldiery in "A Brawl" by Tenkate, and "In Full Cry"—huntsmen and hounds, by Sanderson Wells, has gay color. Painting of high finish marks "Child With Doll" by R. McGregor. This section of the collection, which numbers over 70 works, has variety enough to meet widely differing tastes.

La collection des Van Horne

Les magnificences d'une exposition unique en son genre, où figurent plusieurs grands noms de la peinture classique à travers les siècles.

Un événement artistique

L'exposition Van Horne inaugurée l'autre jour à la Galerie des Arts, rue Sherbrooke, avec beaucoup d'éclat est un événement considérable pour le monde de l'art à Montréal. La collection de feu sir William Van Horne est de celles dont peut se vanter l'Amérique; elle ne se cède en rien à la moyenne des meilleures collections d'outre-mer. Mieux encore, elle porte dans ses vieux classiques toutes les marques de l'authenticité, ce qu'on voudrait pouvoir dire de certaines autres. L'exposition est ouverte jusqu'au 5 novembre, mais déjà la Galerie des Arts a connu un va-et-vient de visiteurs comme il n'en est pas souvent. L'occasion est unique de contempler des œuvres signées de grands noms, réunies avec goût dans les salons de l'Art Association. Pèlerinage à travers l'opulence des siècles en allées. Choix de toiles, grandes et petites, qui révèle chez sir William un sens averti des valeurs, surtout si l'on tient compte que, par une sorte de prévision aigüe, il a présenté la vogue qu'aurait tel ou tel artiste alors inconnu dont il recueillait des toiles.

Les classiques ne vieillissent point. Les portraits, en particulier, restent d'une étonnante fraîcheur, d'une constante actualité. Les regards des personnages de Velasquez, Frans

Hals, Ribera, Murillo, vous fixent droit dans les yeux, vous hantent, vous suivent. Vraiment, les modernes ont dû désapprendre l'art du portrait; il semble que les artistes ne puissent plus fixer que le "devenir", des instants d'une évolution, tandis que les Anciens ont fait si profondément humain qu'ils sont encore de notre époque.

La collection de quelque deux cents toiles présente, il va sans dire, une superbe variété de genres et de manières.

Ecole espagnole

L'Espagne classique est l'une des sections d'éclat à l'exposition. De l'œuvre considérable et inégale du célèbre Goya il n'y a pas moins de huit exemples. Deux petits sujets patriotiques qui datent de sa campagne, à la fin de sa vie, contre l'invasion napoléonienne: "Les horreurs de la guerre", qui a du mouvement, un peu de jolie pose, mais rien d'horifiant, et "Paysans luttant contre les soldats", d'un sentiment beaucoup plus vrai. Puis le portrait de l'actrice Rita Molinos, plein d'humeur noble; celui du marquis de Castrofuerte — et, surtout, celui de la marquise, intelligente, pressée, un peu hautaine, personne de caractère. Un coin de Madrid et taines œuvres connues du même auteur. De Zurbaran une toile magnifique: "Ste Elisabeth de Hongrie", portrait en pied. Dans cette œuvre qui "parle" on admire la tête menue du personnage, les superbes cassures des étoffes et le sentiment religieux à la fois et humain. Enfin, deux natures-mortes de Labrador.

L'école hollandaise

Sir William Van Horne n'aurait pas eu le cœur anglais s'il n'avait fait une large part à l'école hollandaise dans sa collection. Il y a réuni, en plus d'œuvres signées de grands noms, d'excellents sujets de peintres moins connus qui n'ont pas toujours été aussi heureux dans leurs tableaux.

Voici Frans Hals. Il scrute la physionomie de ses modèles avec une finesse d'analyse qui ne s'embarrasse pas autrement de considérations morales. Le gentilhomme et la dame au gant se font pendant; très dignes l'un et l'autre, lui porte un air soucieux et une barbe carrée sur un visage net, elle semble plus jeune et rondelette. Mais le peintre des tempéraments sanguins et expansifs se donne libre carrière dans "Le joyeux buveur", au sourire grivois, à la trogne rouge, œuvre où les tons rouges et la manière joyeuse sont de la truculence agréable. De lui également un portrait de Samuel Ampsing.

"Portrait d'un gentilhomme hollandais", par Frans Hals (1584-1666), l'un des tableaux de la grande époque qui figurent dans la collection Van Horne. (Cliché la "Presse")

Rembrandt se retrouve dans le style qu'on lui reconnaît: étude fouillée, finement observée, de masques impassibles. Voyez la "Tête de vieillard", penseuse, usée, comme illuminée, et le "Portrait de jeune rabbin", d'une mystique qui sent la Bible. De lui aussi une étude de paysage et un autre portrait de vieillard coiffé d'un chapeau noir.

Puis, Jan Vermeer: "Jeune fille qui lit", d'un intimisme robuste et charmant; — de Witte: "Intérieur d'église", dans la délicatesse de tons blancs de ce spécialiste d'intérieur de temples dénudés; — Van der Helst: "L'amiral Cornelius Tromp", en livrée jaune, personnage replet et rempli de suffisance; — de Teem: une nature morte, — bouquins et tête de mort, d'une admirable précision, noyée dans la lumière gris-perle; — Fabritius: Un visage aux gros traits, aux lèvres épaisses, empreint de mélancolie; — Guyp: rien de ses mariées réputées, mais un portrait de femme qui respire la santé et un paysage délicat où la lumière poudroie; — Backer: "Jeune fille en habit d'équitation", je dirais plutôt Petite enfant à la bavette, avec un minois délicieux; — Jan van Goyen: "Sports d'hiver", d'une lumière froide et agréable, toile quasi monochrome; Jacob van Ruisdael, paysagiste fidèle et mélancolique: Petits poèmes des terrains plats; "Eglise et chute", fleuri; — Saloman van Ruisdael: Une tour contre le firmament, en tons sombres; — Ferdinand Bol: "Jeune homme qui tient un médaillon"; il a la grâce poudrée des Aiglons féminins; — Molenaer: "La chanteuse", cette fois une bonne bourgeoise d'âge mûr, vêtue de jaune mat, qui prend une respiration; — Huysmans de Malines: Trois paysages fondus dans une lumière douce; — Bauer: "Château en Espagne", dans un cadre rocailleux et gris; on y reconnaît moins la palette claire de Bauer; — Nicolas Maes: "Vieille femme avec sa bible"; fatiguée, elle prend un instant de repos et lève les yeux sur le spectateur; c'est d'une vérité charmante d'expression; — Brekelenkam: "La famille du médecin", un intérieur intime d'un temps où l'on connaissait la vie du foyer; — Ochtervelt: "Maitresse et bonne", d'un gentil naturel; — Bosboom: "Chambre du Conseil", tableautin fait de précision de détail et baigné dans une lumière claire; — Maris: "Jeune fille qui tricote", probablement une œuvre de sa première manière toute consacrée à décrire dans ses humeurs diverses la petite hollandaise; clarté, fini, rondeur s'y retrouvent; — Brouwer: un paysage clair sous un soleil blanc.

L'école flamande

Rubens avec son soloris ardent et profond domine le coin flamand. Il y a de lui un fragment d'Adoration des Bergers, mais surtout "Le festival d'Hérode", marqué au coin de la fastueuse exubérance de Rubens: couleurs chaudes, éclat, composition habile. On assure que cette toile est toute entière du pinceau du maître et que cette fois il ne s'est pas démis sur ses élèves du soin de finir les détails, d'autant plus que les personnages représentés en costumes contemporains auraient tous été pris dans l'entourage de Rubens. A côté du tableau figure une esquisse au crayon ou à la plume qui lui a servi à élaborer la scène.

De Benson, qui aime les floritures, un Portrait de gentilhomme qui vous toise de sa physionomie précieuse et vivante. Koffermans présente un Christ en croix esquissé en traits rapides et tourmentés. La fine sensibilité de Ysenbrandt se fait jour dans la toile délicate et fine qui a nom "Femme lisant son Bréviaire". Gérard David montre une petite "Madeleine en prière" dans un paysage plein de fraîcheur. Et l'artiste mystérieux qui s'intitule le Maître des portraits féminins et vécut au 16^e siècle expose une Descente de croix, où l'emploi de rouges primitifs (le beau rouge de Frà Angelico) donne un ton attirant à la multitude de figures typiquement flamandes impliquées dans la scène, puis, mieux encore, "La dame qui écrit" d'un air spirituel et délicieux qui n'a pas vieilli du tout.

L'école allemande

L'école allemande n'est pas amplement représentée. Les modernes en sont tout-à-fait absents. Mais quelques exemples classiques suffisent à lui donner du ton à l'exposition.

Holbein, le Jeune, portraitiste de la Cour, figure à la Galerie des Arts avec un petit portrait de Philippe Melanchton d'une surprenante acuité de vision et d'une admirable précision de détail. Cranach le Vieux montre une tête de Luther qui, pour être grasse et avoir le regard éveillé, garde un quelque chose d'un peu plat. D'Elsheimer un paysage mythologique, plein de profondeur, sous l'ardeur d'un ciel bleu. Mais ce qui attire beaucoup l'attention c'est le triptyque d'autel de Michael Wolgemut, maître de Dürer, qui représente la scène du Crucifiement d'une manière un peu gauche peut-être et assez sèche mais avec un luxe de détails et de figures minces et tourmentées.

L'école italienne

Ici encore de grands noms. Les tons nourris et la joie de vivre du Titien caractérisent sa toile intitulée "Le Mariage mystique de Ste-Catherine", un thème à la mode dans ce temps-là. Personnage en bonne santé, somptueusement vêtus. Expressions arrêtées.

Une toute petite ébauche de Léonard de Vinci représente une tête de femme qui se dégage d'un fond or. De Tiepolo, amant des formes plastiques, "Femme en costume de page" qui a un air expressif et même câlin; "Apelles peignant", d'une santé résolue, "Henri IV devant Grégoire VII à Canossa", un peu vieilli. Puis, Salvatore Rosa: Paysage sec et rocailleux où l'on reconnaît moins le fin romantique que fut Rosa; Guardi, un paysage et surtout une marine fraîche, mouvementée, aérée, d'un nuancé subtil; Moroni, au métier incisif: un portrait de noble italien qui n'est pas joli mais sincère; da Forlì: Jeune noble avec coiffure, à la manière de certaines physionomies moins heureuses de Raphaël; Canal nous fait jeter un coup d'œil furtif dans un intérieur de S-Marc jauni et anémié; Conegliano: Une Vierge et l'enfant, style bourgeois et non sans quelque gaucherie; le Tintoret: "Conseiller vénitien", visage barbu, taquin, hâlé, tourmenté sur un fond sombre; Lotto: Femmes en prière (fragment), où l'on ne sait qu'admirer le plus des visages candides, du geste recueilli, des drapés excellents; Lotto était sûrement un méditatif...

De l'époque gréco-romaine

Deux fragments, des portraits de femmes, sont censés être du 1^{er} et du 2^e siècle avant J. C. et venir de la civilisation gréco-romaine. L'un, beau type d'Egyptienne et l'autre, visage marron, sont tellement d'actualité qu'on reste perplexé!!!

L'école anglaise

L'école anglaise est représentée par des œuvres qui ne remontent pas plus loin que le 18^e siècle. Pas moins de quatre exemples de Reynolds, père de la peinture anglaise d'une certaine époque: ils témoignent d'un art de société sans trop de profondeur mais bien distingué: "La comtesse de Carnarvon", visage spirituel; "Lady Talbot", un tantinet compassée dans sa robe jaunée par le temps; un minois d'enfant; une grappe de chérubins où l'on retrouve toutes ces petites figures rondes et gracieuses qui ont rendu Reynolds si populaire. Constable, chanteur de l'air et de l'espace, montre à côté de quelques paysages aux tons un peu pesants des scènes pâles et finies qui témoignent de ses efforts heureux pour émanciper le paysage de son temps des tonalités sombres. De "Gainsborough, peintre du "Blue Boy", une toile qui date de la première époque de sa carrière, celle du paysagiste; c'est d'un brun harmonieux, imité des peintres hollandais.

Ensuite, Dadd: "Corse", tête vigoureuse, qui attire l'attention; — Turner: "Shakespeare's Cliff, Dover", paysage blanc savamment éclairé; — Hoppner: "La comtesse de Waldegrave", précieuse et très jolie, décrite avec facilité; — Crome: Paysage curieux, teintes vert-pâle contre des tons ambres; il peint avec une palette chaude des natures pauvres; — Romney: "Miss Morland", visage de porcelaine encadré d'une ce qui reste d'un minuscule "Marché aux esclaves" complètent Goya à l'exposition.

D'Eugenio Lucas le Jeune "Moine incitant la populace", d'une touche large, plus moderne, avec des blancs éclatants. Pedro Orrente: "Chevaucheurs attardés" dans le vent. Jose Leonardo: "Dragons dans l'attente" — prestance, éclat reposant. De la Cruz: "Le Duc de Weimar", visage mince et bilieux décrit dans un style nerveux. Del Mazo: "Un ecclésiastique" jaune et las, dans une manière de Velasquez embourgeoisé. Magnasco: Moines gris autour du feu ou au réfectoire, dans toutes les poses les plus dramatiques, peints avec une liberté d'allure qui rappelle que Magnasco excellait aussi dans les scènes de bambochades.

De superbes exemples d'El Greco, l'artiste aux formes tourmentées qui aspirent au supra-sensible, le poète ardent, cher au cœur de Barrès. En vue de spiritualiser ses personnages il leur imprime des allongements, des amincissements qui en font comme des flammes qui se consumment. Le portrait de La Casa révèle une tête amincissante. Le visage de S-Maurice épelle le jeûne. "La Sainte Famille avec un plat de fruits" se présente dans un vif coloris, comme une vision qui tourne; c'est un tableau de rare mérite.

Apparaissent ensuite des œuvres de l'aristocrate Velasquez. Un portrait de gentilhomme à l'aspect résolu. Un splendide portrait en pied de Philippe IV, son modèle préféré, qui a bel air et le visage spirituel, bien que le monarque y apparaisse un tantinet précieux; dans un petit sujet que l'on trouve à côté, le visage plus âgé de Philippe IV donne déjà les signes de l'inquiétude et du désabusement. "Le Christ en croix" de Velasquez, la tête tombée après le dernier soupir et les membres détendus, a été tellement popularisé par l'image que j'incline à croire que nous sommes ici en face d'une seconde version de l'artiste plutôt que de l'original; mais l'œuvre est d'un calme émouvant.

Sir William Van Horne s'est acquis l'une des toiles de la série des Philosophes que Ribera entreprit avec une irrévérence bourgeoise et bon-enfant; il s'agit de "Diogène", face ronde, surprise, ébouriffée de bon sang. Murillo apporte le portrait d'un gentilhomme de noir vêtu, dont le visage reposé et cérémonieux, pour ne manquer point de grâce, apparaît un peu moins suspect d'être aussi efféminé que pourraient l'être cer-

Daumier respire un paganisme robuste d'où les divinités sont absentes: les nymphes sont de plantureuses bourgeoises dont la présence dans un paysage aussi éclatant semble une ironie. Et Daumier était sûrement capable d'ironie. On préférera "La vitrine attirante" qui assemble sous la lumière étrange du reverbère un groupe de femmes curieuses. Dans "Un peu de musique" se révèle le Daumier de la caricature, qui crée des binettes inoubliables. Renoir présente "Les deux sœurs", d'une étonnante fraîcheur, les plis des vêtements étant brossés comme en vagues rouges; "La Toilette", scène délicate et qui respire la joyeuse santé; "Napolitaine", pittoresque et jolie.

Avec cela, Cézanne: un rude portrait de sa femme; un paysage provençal en tons juxtaposés, véritable étude de verts; de Toulouse-Lautrec, affichiste célèbre: un jardin touffu, une esquisse qui représente une femme dans un café, l'air abattu, prenant; Benjamin Constant: délicate étude de Montréal vu de la montagne en hiver; Georges Michel, paysages d'un traitement large; Marie Laurencin, une contemporaine, portrait d'enfant brossé en quelques touches mates sur un fond gris.

Américains et Canadiens

Quelques artistes de l'Amérique du nord ont trouvé place dans la collection: Lawson: paysage en broderie; Ryder, dont on aimera un paysage de sombre féerie inspiré de Goethe ou de Wagner; Sterne, au modernisme cru et rude, aux esquisses résolues; Burroughs, qui a fait un tableau par étages, si je puis dire, une assez intéressante étude de blancs et noirs d'un sujet comme "Jour de lavage"; Woodcut, dans un crépuscule charmant; Dabo, qui a une marine d'une extrême sobriété; Inness, dont le pinceau fait rêver un bois profond où il superpose les tons bruns sur les tons verts; Brynmor, qui a esquissé avec esprit sir William Van Horne peignant; Barnsley, qui présente, à côté d'un paysage délicat comme un pastel, un sujet sombre; Hammond, dans un paysage imité du hollandais; Wyant, style anglais pur, fini; Matthews, dans un sujet d'intimité; Morrice, un paysage vert-olive.

Sir William Van Horne a pris plaisir lui-même, dans ses loisirs, à jouer du pinceau. Il aimait faire grand, aéré, et s'est décidé à attaquer à des sujets parfois assez raides. Il lui arrive de tricoter laborieusement des nuages invraisemblables comme dans "Moonlight at St-Andrew's". On aimera de lui "Autumn Woods", touffu mais poétique; "Railroad Station at night", inspiré du "007" de Kipling, où on entre en gare à la seule lumière distante du phare de la locomotive; "Woods and Fields", en teintes douces; et un hiver tout blanc. Il excelle à peindre de beaux arbres à l'écorce grise qui craque. Les quelques pages du catalogue où il a soigneusement dessiné des modèles de vases témoignent d'un goût averti et fin.

Quelques toiles japonaises et chinoises, d'un art subtil, complètent la magnifique collection Van Horne.

Comment les arts domestiques font oeuvre pratique

L'hon. H.-G. Carroll inaugure l'exposition de la Canadian Handicrafts Guild.

A LA GALERIE DES ARTS

L'exposition annuelle de la Canadian Handicrafts Guild, à la Galerie des Arts, a été inaugurée samedi après-midi par une brève cérémonie présidée par l'hon. H.-G. Carroll, lieutenant-gouverneur. Le colonel Wilfrid Bovey, président de la Guild, adressa la bienvenue, fit remarquer des améliorations dans les arts domestiques en général et annonça que l'exposition se complètera cette année d'une journée anglaise et d'une Journée française spéciales. La Journée anglaise aura lieu samedi prochain; il y aura déjeuner au Viger et danses de folklore le soir. La Journée française aura lieu dimanche.

au cours du déjeuner, au Viger, l'hon. M. Perrault et M. Georges Bouchard adresseront la parole, tandis que le soir M. Albert Rioux, président de l'U.C.C., et quelques autres feront des allocutions en marge de la visite de l'exposition.

L'hon. M. Carroll, dans son allocution faite dans les deux langues souligna la double portée des arts domestiques à l'heure actuelle: ils donnent à la population le sens de la beauté dans les choses les plus usuelles et constituent un dérivatif au chômage et à l'urbanisation.

Il rappela que les arts domestiques sont à l'honneur depuis longtemps déjà. La Nouvelle-France s'y adonnait avec succès du temps de Jean Talon, qui écrivait fièrement à Colbert: J'ai ici de quoi m'habiller des pieds jusqu'à la tête. Qu'y a-t-il de plus reposant que de passer au milieu de toutes ses catalogues pittoresques et de ces étoffes jolies, d'admirer les œuvres de l'artisanat en fait de reliures, fer forgé, sculptures sur bois, etc.? Et n'est-ce pas là la première réponse au problème de l'urbanisation excessive, la première forme de cette décentralisation dont le pays a besoin?

Le lieutenant-gouverneur était accompagné de Mme Carroll, de Miss Alice Lighthall, présidente du comité d'organisation, et du lieutenant-colonel D.-B. Papineau, son aide-de-camp.

FRANK HENNESSEY EXHIBITS WORK

Gatineau Country Subject of Pastels in Eaton Fine
Art Galleries

Frank Hennessey, O.S.A., of Ottawa, holding an exhibition of his paintings in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company Limited of Montreal, shows himself an accomplished worker in pastel. His drawing is sound, his color clean and he uses the chalks with force and decision. In the choice of his subjects he reveals a nice appreciation of what will make an interesting picture and, while the majority of the works deal with snow, he is by no means a one-season painter. The paintings of moderate size, are faithful transcripts of bits of the Gatineau country without striving for the unusual in form and tone. It is a satisfying collection that merits more than a casual glance, there being enough variety to meet differing tastes. Generally speaking the pictorial elements are few and simple—the edges of lakes, distant hills, farm buildings under snow, ice-cutters at work, sleighs traveling over drifted roads, bits of streams scoring the melting ice, and the patchwork of snow and rock under the spring sun.

"Log Dump" is a strong bit of drawing—a winter road, piled snow-covered logs and beneath the bank a hint of water flooding the icy stream. It shows ability in handling a range of browns without becoming monotonous. This skill is shown in "After the Snowfall"—a team of horses and sleigh near buildings on a high road in rounded hills, with the bush in varied tones of brown. Trees edge the winding stream in the valley. "Yard with Snow" is interesting in composition—farmhouse and barn, in the shelter of which a man works, as seen from an upper window. Sunny is the wooded landscape with river in "Covered Bridge." A team that has crossed the structure is ascending a stiff snowy incline.

Larger in size is "Ice Cutters"—men with team on a lake backed by a noble hill against a sunny sky. Spruces warn the ignorant wanderer of the square of open water where the men work. "On the River (near Ottawa)" pictures the base of a rocky hill with trees, a band of sunlit snow and, in the shadowed foreground, a teamster blowing on his chilly hands while his horses drink through a gap in the ice. "Gatineau, Winter" shows houses and barns in the gathering darkness, hills and a gleam of pallid light beneath a grey cloud. "March Afternoon," an arrangement in subtle greys and white, reveals an expanse of snow-covered lake surrounded by wooded hills. "Winter Road" is impressive in the suggestion of deep snow rutted by a sleigh. Blue shadows streak the snow beneath a group of spruces touched by the sunlight.

In this group, too, there are a number of works that show careful observation and distinct sympathy with the subjects, among them being "Pickanook River," "Open River," with its play of sunlight and shadow and strip of blue water; "The Ice Hole," "Last of the Snow," "The River Road" and "Melting Snows."

"Gatineau Rapids"—wooded banks with a hint of autumn leaf and the tumble of white water, is of a more clement season and is confidently done.

Two oils are included in the show. "Fin de la Visite"—a woman at the door of a country house "seeing off" a party of visitors. Stovewood powdered with snow litters the porch and lamplight through a window warns of the rapid fall of night. The other canvas is "Day in March"—a man outside his cabin lighting his pipe preparatory to entering his sleigh which is almost hidden by snowbanks. A massive wooded hill in shadow almost fills the background.

ART LECTURE GIVEN

Gazette 24/10/33
Prof. Thompson Discusses

Landscape Painting

It was the influence of St. Francis of Assisi that gave rise to landscape painting, when his teachings showed that there was nothing antagonistic between the beauties of nature and the Christian faith, said Prof. R. R. Thompson, of McGill University, in the course of an illustrated lecture given before the Women's Art Society yesterday morning in Stevenson Hall.

Giotto was the first naturalistic painter, Prof. Thompson observed, painting trees and birds in his portraits of St. Francis. Fra Angelico introduced flowers into his paintings.

Prof. Thompson dealt with the preoccupation of the academies with the classic influence until it was broken by such painters as Constable and Delacroix. The development of landscape painting in Italy, Flanders, Holland, England and France from the seventeenth century onward was traced by the speaker. Claude Lorraine he described as the first painter to put the sun in the heavens and to realize the effect of sunlight in painting; Rubens as one of the first to ignore the classical tradition and show the charm of the pastoral scene; Rembrandt, Van Ruysdal, Kup and Hobbema as among those who raised landscape painting to its new eminence. Richard Wilson, the first important landscape painter of the English school, Gainsborough, Constable and Turner, were also discussed.

Mrs. W. A. Gifford presided.

Newer English Artists' Work At Scott's

Star 25/10/33

The collection of pictures which now are being shown in the gallery of W. Scott and Sons, on Drummond street, form the forty-first exhibition brought to Montreal by Mr. Harry Wallis of the French Gallery in London. As in similar exhibitions in former years there are a number of fine examples of modern European, particularly French and Dutch, painters, but this year a new note is struck by the bringing of a most interesting group of works by some of the younger English painters.

The continental pictures include twelve very characteristic works by J. Scherrewitz, some of the best of his work, with a variety of subjects, landscapes and marines, pictures of figures and animals, a fine and typical Courbet of boats on a beach, in front of a cliff, a good Boudin of ships lying by a pier and an excellent little sketch by him of people on the sea-shore, a good view in Paris by Lepine. There are two most attractive figure pictures by Ribot and Bonvin, two brilliant Monticellis and a striking green wooded landscape by De Bock. Some admirable smaller sketches are by Le Sidaner and Jacob Maris; there are four very good examples of the work of Karl Heffner and Ter Meulen and Neuhuys are well represented.

At the head of the British painters stands D. Y. Cameron with a very fine Scottish landscape, one of his latest works and a small coast scene, of delightful color. The other British pictures are by people, many of whom, though well known in England and elsewhere, are so far little, if at all, known in Montreal. None of them are extreme modernists; all combine sanity with a good deal of freshness in ideas and methods. Two of them are painters whose work has been seen here before. Two landscapes by John Nash are very characteristic of his work but a little closer to nature than some of his past work has been; by W. Lee Hankey there are an admirable head of an old woman and a small group of figures painted out of doors and full of pleasant atmosphere, as well as a very good study of the light and color of a street in the south of France. A contrast to Mr. Hankey's freedom of painting is to be seen in the simple and more formal landscapes and buildings of C. Brooke Farrer and Richard Eurich, good in their own, different way. One of the most notable pictures here is a very clever room interior by C. Henriques, by whom also there is a sketch of a French Harbor. Two landscapes, particularly one of a bridge over a river, by Stephen Bone, a son of Muirhead Bone, a quiet picture of a house among trees by Alan Gwynne Jones, well known in England as both painter and teacher, an excellent portrait study by Alfred Hayward, which comes from this year's Academy exhibition, and a clever head of a Zulu by a South African painter, Neville Lewis, are among the notable exhibits. Of women painters, Fairlie Harmer has a gay spacious sea-shore picture with many figures and a picture of Monte Carlo at night which is not quite so successful; Ethel Walker has two flower pictures in which very simple painting makes remarkable effects. Another good flower picture is by I. La Primaudaye. Other painters whose work is here are Nadia Benois, who belongs to a famous Russian artistic and theatrical family, Bridget Evans, with interesting sketches of Constantinople and Sofia, E. S. Wood, Rodney Burn and Evelyn Abelson, all with pictures which have something worth seeing.

VAN HORNE PICTURES ON VIEW TONIGHT

In view of the great public interest which is being taken in the Van Horne collection of pictures, which is now being shown in the upper galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, the Association's building on Sherbrooke St., will be open this evening from 7:30 till 10 o'clock. Members of the Art Association will be admitted free and a charge of 25 cents will be made to other visitors. The Canadian Handicrafts Exhibition will be open as well as the Van Horne collection.

Notes of Art In Montreal

The Van Horne collection has drawn so many visitors to the Art Gallery on Sherbrooke St. that the attendance has beaten all the Art Association's records. On Saturday afternoon there were 1279 visitors, in the three hours during which the gallery was open on Sunday afternoon there were 2173, and the total for the first week of the exhibition was 5516. The attendance is just as good in the second week, and arrangements have been made for large numbers of school children to visit the exhibition with their teachers.

The exhibition of pastels by Frank Hennessey at Eaton's galleries closes at the end of this week and will be followed on Monday by an exhibition of water colors by Frank D. Allison of Halifax, N.S. These are landscapes and marines of Canadian and European scenery.

The exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy will open at the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday evening, November 16th, and remain open till December 17th.

On Monday, Nov. 20th, an exhibition will open at the Art Association of wax miniatures by Ethel Frances Mundy, who, while reviving an old form of art, has invented new compositions for use in wax portraiture.

At the Watson Galleries the show of work by Canadian painters has come to an end and is followed by a collection of pictures by some more important modern European painters. At the Johnson Galleries the exhibition brought from the Cooling Gallery in London remains on view.

Exhibition Prize-Winners

The Independent Art Association, in connection with its second annual exhibition, offered six works of art, which were shown in the exhibition, as prizes for holders of lucky catalogue numbers. These prizes were drawn for at the close of the exhibition on Sunday; the prizes and the winning catalogue numbers are as follows:

Oil painting by Jas. McCorkindale won by catalogue number 388; Oil painting by Chas. Tulley, No. 416; Charcoal drawing by John A. Norlin, No. 373; Etching by Roland A. Chalmers, No. 422; Etching by George Starkey, No. 381; Sculpture by Edw. Z. Galea, No. 600.

The winning holders of the catalogues with these numbers are asked to call for their prizes at the exhibition hall, Sun Life Building, Room 860, today, Thursday or Friday between 2 and 5 p.m.

EXCELLENT WORKS HERE FROM LONDON

Collection From French Gallery Has Examples by Leading Young Painters

ON VIEW AT SCOTT'S

Pictures by European Artists of Established Reputation Take Important Place in Show

A special collection of pictures from the French Gallery in Berkeley Square, London, is at the art galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street, this week and includes a striking group of paintings by the more prominent of the younger generation of English artists among them the modern landscape painter, John Nash. The exhibition also includes a number of examples of celebrated European painters such as Jacob Maris, Monticelli, Boudin and Bosboom. Special space is reserved for a small but varied collection of paintings by the Dutch artist, Johan Scherrewitz.

Many in the English group are new to Montreal. Their work tends to be conservative but is none the less interesting and imaginative because of that. Nash in "Winter Mendle" offers a winter landscape with an effective color scheme of brown and green with the white of the snow as a background. S. Bone shows a fine sense of form in "Cardigan Bridge" and "Low Tide, Scarborough." E. Abelson paints quietly but richly and effectively in "A French Town."

In "Paysage, Chamboeurcy" and "La Marina Espanola," C. Brooke Farrer handles the brush with strength and character. Both landscapes are original and striking. N. Lewis in "Head of a Pondo," limns the features of a native in a vivid manner. E. Henriques shows versatility by offering an interior in the old Dutch manner and a landscape in the modern impressionist style.

Interesting still life comes from the brushes of E. Walker, Le Bas and L. La Primaudaye. "Joanna," a Royal Academy portrait by A. Hayward, is evoking much favorable comment. Others represented in the English section are A. Gwynne-Jones, E. S. Wood, R. B. Evans, R. Burn, N. Benois, F. Harmer, R. Eurich and W. L. Hankey. Scherrewitz's collection, which numbers a dozen pictures, most of which are landscapes, and marines, is typical of this artist's work. The continental pictures are all by painters who are well known and appreciated in Montreal and elsewhere in Canada. There is a fine marine by Courbet, a splendid view of Amsterdam by Jacob Maris, two excellent Monticellis and a striking landscape by De Bock. Ter Meulen, Karl Heffner and Neuhuys are also represented.

The exhibition is in charge of Harry Wallis of the French Gallery in London.

Canada Taking Long View in Adding to Art Collection Says Constable

Quebec, October 26. — "Canada is to be congratulated upon taking the long view" in continuing purchase of paintings and other objects d'art for the National Gallery at Ottawa, W. G. Constable, British art expert, stated upon arrival here today in the liner Empress of Britain.

Mr. Constable, who is en route to Ottawa, stated his visit is partly under the auspices of the National Gallery and partly in the interests of the Carnegie Trust which, he said, had authority to spend some of its funds in the Dominions.

Many nations seem to forget, Mr. Constable said, that they are to be living for a long time and that the depression is, in the history of nations, purely momentary. "The United States has in some ways been almost panicky in this respect and that is true of other nations who have discontinued additions to national art treasures." Canada was to be congratulated upon taking the long view.

It was possible that as a result of his visit the Carnegie Trust would spend some of its money here. "My visit is really the result of the report made by Sir Henry Miers who toured Canada inspecting museums some years ago, and of a former visit I made," he said.

Canada was also to be congratulated upon the recent acquisition by the National Gallery of a painting of Job by Jan Lievens, a 17th century contemporary and close friend of Rembrandt. The painting was a gift to Canada, from the British National Art Collections Fund and was the first presentation to a Dominion by the association which is privately supported.

Mr. Constable is to deliver an address at Ottawa tomorrow.

Nova Scotia Regrets Misleading Remarks About Its Artists

Gazette 27/10/33
Address by Dr. Barbeau, of National Museum, Stirs Up Storm of Protest

DOES Nova Scotia "lag behind the rest of Canada" in the calibre of its artists? A storm of protest has been stirred up in provincial art circles by Dr. Marius Barbeau of the National Museum at Ottawa, who holds a low opinion of Nova Scotian art.

Here is what he said on the subject in the address that provoked the dissent:

"So far, artists who have made Nova Scotia known to outsiders are not her own, but come from other parts of Canada. This province lags behind the rest of Canada in art; it lacks advanced artists in its schools of art; it needs fresh blood."

At its next meeting, the Nova Scotia Society of Artists "regretted" that Dr. Barbeau should have made "such misleading remarks." And President Edith A. Smith and Secretary N. K. Hay wrote to the papers to straighten out the lecturer on a few points.

"He evidently has never heard," they wrote, "of Ernest Lawson, a Halifax man, whose fame is so well known in Canada and the United States, and of Gyrth Russell, a son of Judge Russell of Dartmouth, who has painted his native province. Some of our Halifax artists have had their work exhibited at well known Canadian art centres, and we might mention Miss Marjorie Tozer as having painted outstanding pictures of Nova Scotia scenery."

As to the charge that schools lack advanced instructing artists, the society officers had this to say:

"What better teachers could Nova Scotia have than those men who have taught in our own Nova Scotia College of Art—H. M. Rosenberg, Arthur Lismer, O.S.A.; Miss Elizabeth S. Nutt, A.R.C.A.; and Stanley Royle, R.B.A., ARWA"

QUELQUES COINS REPOSANTS DE LA GRANDE NATURE

EN HAUT A GAUCHE: "Milking Time, Quebec", toile de Thomas-W. Mitchell, A.R.C.A., brossée avec vigueur en pleine lumière; EN BAS A GAUCHE, du même artiste, "JOUR DE REPOS", qui s'élève en hauteur plus encore que ne le montre ici la photo et respire l'espace et le grand air. Ces deux tableaux sont de ceux que Mitchell expose de ce temps-ci chez Eaton. A DROITE, "Le moulin d'Antigua", aquarelle de Percy-E. Nobbs exposée à la Galerie des Arts et qui établit dans une symphonie de bruns le contraste cruel de la cheminée moderne près du pittoresque moulin. (Clichés la "Presse".)

Des Hollandais au réalisme charmant

La Presse Oct. 26/33

Une collection des galeries French et Goupil, de Londres, exposée chez W. Scott & Sons.—Quelques modernes anglais.—A propos du vitrail.—Cas de daltonisme.

Canadian Handicrafts Guild

M. Harry Wallis expose pour quelques temps aux galeries Scott, 1490 rue Drummond, une collection de tableaux étrangers pris aux galeries French et Goupil, de Londres. Le choix en a été fait de façon judicieuse et inclut un groupe de modernes anglais, de ceux dont la formule tout en étant neuve ne détonne pas trop. On retrouve aussi, — dans des oeuvres de valeur inégale, il est vrai, — quelques noms bien connus de la peinture française. Puis, toute une série des Hollandais au réalisme charmant.

Le salon coquet de la rue Drummond est l'un de ceux où l'on s'attarde le plus volontiers. L'ambiance en est tout intime, bien artistique, et les toiles disposées avec goût prennent du relief sous l'éclairage soigneusement distribué. L'exposition plaira, pour sûr, à toutes les personnes de goût; elle est d'une moyenne qui tient compte des affections du moment, et les esprits plus chercheurs se féliciteront qu'on ait apporté de Londres à leur intention des toiles d'inspiration proprement moderne.

Modernes anglais

Et donc, pour un tour rapide de l'exposition.

D'un contemporain dont le nom m'échappe cette figure de vieille femme à bonnet fixée dans une expression méditative et rassise.

Une scène de forge où Ribot emploie des tons gris, sans chaleur mais profonds. Puis, les modernes anglais: C.-B. Farrar — Blocs de maisons autour d'un lac bleu-vif, contre un rocher clair, ou "La Marina Espanola", paysage d'une rondeur toute décorative; Ethel Walker, — des fleurs aux teintes enneigées; Elford Hayward, — une toile qui a été exposée à l'Académie: le portrait de sa fille peint avec fermeté et amour, avec une solide distribution de tons charmants et un souci de l'expressivité qui n'a rien d'efféminé; R. Entish, — De vieux murs gris; I. la Primaudaye, — Des fleurs qui restent superbes à travers des teintes pâles; F. Harner, — Une scène de grève où remuent les personnages et poudroie le soleil; W.-L. Hankey, — "Grasse", un paysage aux tons chauds et estompés; John Nash, — "Duck Pond", harmonie de verts...

Paysages hollandais

Il y a toute une série de J. Scherrewitz, scènes de plages aux tons limpides, d'une jolie fluidité. "Gathering Sea Weed" en est un bel exemple.

A Neuhys présente "La leçon", un intérieur hollandais d'un clair-obscur mat, où l'on aime étudier le visage appliqué de la fillette qui épelle dans un livre sous la direction maternelle. De P. Royld "Le collectionneur", qui ramène au genre correct et précis; ce visage d'une fine rondeur au milieu des vieux cuivres plait de singulière façon et l'artiste connaît bien ses étoffes aussi. Deux petits paysages de K. Heffner chantent les grands arbres minces dans une pâleur de vert qui a quelque féerie. F.-P. Ter Meulen présente ses scènes habituelles de troupeaux que l'on aime toujours; "Winter Time", surtout, est agréable dans sa lumière rose-jaune d'hiver; dans "Summer Day" l'artiste a bien décrit la laine touffue des brebis qui attendent la tonte. Mentionnons encore A.-M. Gorter: automne limpide; J.-H. Van Mastenbroek: marines pâles et claires; — Th. de Bock: un paysage très vert; — J. Maris, Anton Mauve...

En terrain connu

Le visiteur s'aventure ensuite en terrain connu. Il relève au passage: G. Courbet: une marine résolue dans une tonalité sombre, sous un ciel lourd; — A. Monticelli: petits sujets décoratifs, effacés; — sir D. Cameron: "The Bass Rock", une marine bleu-pastel; — J.-B. Madon: petit portrait spirituel et fini d'un fumeur d'opium; — J.-G. Vibert: un cavalier résolu; — E. Boudin: "Trouville", une plage peuplée cette fois de petits personnages pittoresques, menacée par la pluie qui s'en vient dans le firmament tourmenté; — Le Sidaner: un soir très brumeux; — Henner: encore un de ses visages ardents de jeunes filles aux cheveux roux; — Bosboom: minuscule intérieur d'église décrit en quelques détails un tantinet fades; un petit L. Lhermitte...

Canadian Handicrafts

LA 27e exposition annuelle de la Canadian Handicrafts Guild, inaugurée par le lieutenant-gouverneur, est ouverte au public à la Galerie des Arts jusqu'au 5 novembre. Le coup d'oeil est réconfortant et varié. Le niveau d'ensemble accuse sans nul doute une amélioration constante sur les années précédentes. En vérité, les arts domestiques se réveillent pour de bon.

Ce n'est pas que les tendances nouvelles se fassent jour. Si vous m'en croyez, il y avait même plus d'originalité l'an dernier. Les catalogues et carpettes du pays sont généralement de bon goût, cette fois, mais je n'y retrouve rien des formules neuves dont j'avais souligné la présence l'autonne dernier. Le coin du fer forgé, pour remarquable qu'il soit encore, me paraît moins fourni et surtout moins varié. La table des étains et cuivres repoussés s'est renouvelée, à quelques exceptions près, mais les travaux se confinent à quelques genres conventionnels, bien qu'il faille y noter l'apparition de certains motifs nouveaux. Les reliures sont plus solides et moins fantaisistes; il vaut la peine de les remarquer de façon particulière. Moins de petits bateaux.

Absence de maintes petites particularités si originales, signalées en 1932; tels, les objets en poils de porc-épic et certains genres de jouets. Par contre, un standard plus égal, pratique à la fois et mieux défini.

Les travaux de certaines écoles d'enfants valent une attention spéciale. D'autre part, on constate déjà un réveil d'imagination dans le département des jouets. Je remarque non sans plaisir l'apparition timide encore mais agréable de tableaux en brins d'étoffe et de tableaux de bois en relief. Le bel apostolat des propagandistes et professeurs d'art domestique a déterminé aussi un courant de bon goût qui se manifeste, entre autres choses, par le choix plus judicieux des accords de couleurs dans les travaux de fantaisie et les tapis. D'aucuns eussent aimé que les meubles soient représentés de façon plus variée à l'exposition et, à ce sujet, il me souvient de fort jolis spécimens vus l'an dernier. Les frères Bourgeault, créateurs de fines statuettes en bois, exposent cette fois un portement de croix d'une composition remarquable. Enfin, pléthore de dentelles, de travaux brodés, d'articles de garde-robes, fruit de la patience et d'un bon goût délicat. Ajoutons encore que les noms canadiens-français figurent volontiers à l'honneur.

En somme, l'exposition des arts domestiques est couleur du temps, pratique, soignée, variée. Il faut féliciter les organisateurs de la Canadian Handicraft Guild d'avoir écarté judicieusement les non-valeurs qui encombraient naguère d'autres expositions du genre. C'est la seule façon de garder du ton à l'ensemble.

Le vitrail au Canada

Je n'attends pas qu'on puisse me le faire remarquer pour noter que dans le bref compte-rendu écrit sur la conférence Chigot aux Beaux-Arts une simplification plutôt sommaire, due à la fièvre du moment, m'a fait prêter au directeur des Beaux-Arts, M. Maillard, des paroles qui peuvent paraître équivoques dans le contexte. Quand il souhaite pour les "nôtres" qu'ils se mettent à étudier dans un avenir rapproché le beau métier du vitrail il s'agit, naturellement, des élèves et des Anciens des Beaux-Arts. Il songe même qu'il ferait bon envoyer, à la première occasion, un de ses élèves étudier le vitrail sous la direction de M. Chigot, à Limoges. Personne ne songe à oublier que plusieurs de nos églises possèdent des vitraux qui sont d'origine et de fabrication canadiennes, bien que le beau métier n'en soit pas encore à son épanouissement au pays.

L'exposition qu'a tenue M. Chigot, maître-verrier de Limoges, à l'Ecole des Beaux-Arts, au commencement de la semaine, n'a pas manqué d'attirer l'admiration des visiteurs pour le bel emploi qu'y démontre l'artiste des formes proprement traditionnelles du vitrail — celles du verre lumineux aux inégalités chatoyantes qui font tableau à eux seuls. Il ne s'agit plus ici du verre peint, procédé de décadence dans le vitrail. Maquettes et fragments de vitraux, sans trop de recherches d'originalité, dénotent une connaissance solide des valeurs chantantes, des harmonies de composition, du caractère religieux.

Daltonisme

UN comité spécial d'enquête, qui a fait une étude des conditions dans la marine anglaise, vient d'attirer l'attention dans son rapport sur le daltonisme sous une forme ou sous une autre. Dix pour cent au moins de la population masculine, dit-il, n'a pas la vision de la couleur. Il recommande des examens spéciaux là-dessus pour les candidats à la marine et insiste pour que les enquêtes sur les accidents dus à la malinterprétation des signaux en fassent un cas particulier.

La simple expérience permet de constater, en effet, que le daltonisme est fréquent. Combien de gens ne distinguent pas entre l'orange et le jaune. Combien plus la difficulté de discernement nuances de bleu et de vert. Il semble même à cet égard — c'est curieux! — que les myopes, habitués à scruter de près, y voient souvent plus clair que les personnes à la vue trop parfaite. J'ai connu, par ailleurs, un ecclésiastique qui ne voyait jamais le noir mais seulement une sorte de mauve foncé — cas qui me paraît assez étrange. Puis il y a tous ceux qui sont tellement sensibles à la forme que la couleur leur échappe; affaire d'habitude et d'inclination, cette fois.

Quelques toiles d'une vérité qui charme et repose

Trois des toiles des collections French et Goupil de Londres, exposées de ce temps-ci à la galerie Scott, rue Drummond: EN HAUT A GAUCHE, "Gathering Sea Weed", oeuvre de J. Scherrewitz aux tons limpides; EN HAUT A DROITE, le portrait de sa fille par le peintre contemporain anglais Elford Hayward, tableau sincère et expressif; EN BAS, "Winter Time", paysage de F. P. Ter Meulen d'un réalisme doux. (Cliché la "Presse").

Mieux encore, l'un de nos romanciers bien connus ne voit pas du tout la couleur. Ses yeux ne distinguent qu'une grisaille plus ou moins foncée selon les teintes. "Ceci doit être vert ou brun, dit-il; tout ce que j'en sais c'est ce que je devine". Le prisme, connaît pas. C'est la vie en blanc et noir. La vie à quatre sens et demi. La vie sans la chaleur de la vie...

Les numéros de catalogue favorisés par le sort du tirage au Salon des Indépendants sont: 388, peinture à l'huile par James McCorkindale; 416, peinture à l'huile par Charles Tulley; 373, fusain par John-A. Norlin; 422, gravure par Roland-J.-A. Chalmers; 381, gravure par George Starkey; 600, sculpture par Edouard-Z. Galea. Prière de réclamer son prix d'ici demain soir à l'édifice de la Sun Life, salle 860, entre 2 et 5 h. p.m.

La collection Van Horne est exposée à la Galerie des Arts, 1379 rue Sherbrooke ouest, jusqu'au 5 novembre.

M. H.-Y. Guillou, de la Gravure Française, 1240 rue Union (arr. Phillips) édifice Old Birk's, vient d'ajouter à sa collection complète de Louis Icaris une série de nouveautés qu'il invite à visiter. Éléances de bon goût qui esquissent en quelques traits de plume des rêves ailes et bien féminins...

Percy-E. Nobbs

Il s'est attaché à rendre avant tout l'atmosphère des paysages qu'il a peints un peu partout, depuis les Indes occidentales jusque dans la campagne anglaise. Ses aquarelles dénotent un sens aigu des tons doux, pittoresques à la fois et limpides. Il charme toujours. On aime surtout retrouver dans une poésie adoucie les heures mauves des crépuscules dans les firmaments des Indes et le bleu-pastel des mers chaudes. Il procède sans la moindre surcharge, sans heurts de pittoresque, avec une économie résolue dans la composition de ses sujets. Nobbs connaît les secrets de lumière des nuages paisibles.

Le coloris limpide et divers des firmaments tropicaux est illustré dans les sujets suivants: "Nuages caribéens", vaporeux, presque transparents; "Marée du soir aux Barbades", sable et horizon envahis par l'eau montante; "A S. Thomas", masses vertes et mauves de nuages qui se dressent contre le ciel multicolore; "St-Kitts vu de la colline Brimstone", où il charrie tous les nuages menaçants d'un côté pour laisser voir un pan de ciel clair, tandis que les carrés de terrain se déroulent en catalogue.

Des scènes canadiennes il faut remarquer surtout "L'île des Soeurs vue de Westmount", avec la rivière argent; "Vieille barge à la baie Beetz, P.Q.", composition largement brossée.

"Le moulin abandonné d'Antigua" présente un mélancolique paysage en brun où se dresse une cheminée moderne, en manière de contraste cruel avec le charmant moulin dont les ailes ont cessé de battre. "Earlshall, Fireshire", décrit un crépuscule d'automne contre lequel se dresse un arbre triste et solitaire. Dans quelques autres sujets on découvre de jolis bouts de lacs, d'une eau bleue infiniment...

MINISTER OF ROADS VISITS EXHIBITION

Encourages Workers to Continue Handicraft Development Efforts

RURAL CENTRES HELPED

Movement Aids Farmers to Stay Out of Red—Perrault Lauds Col. Bovey's Work

Handicraft products and the thought of development of this industry in the whole country were the centre of interest among a number of people during the past week, but more especially over the week-end when conferences were held by the Canadian Handicraft Guild and addresses heard by the general public explaining the purpose of that organization.

The importance of the movement to popularize this type of product could be seen from the attention given yesterday to it by the Hon. J. E. Perrault, Minister of Roads in the Quebec Government, when he spoke enthusiastically of the amount already accomplished by the Guild for the province of Quebec alone. He and other public men were guest speakers at a luncheon meeting held in the Place Viger Hotel, which was followed by a gathering in the Montreal Art Gallery where, in the midst of the excellent display of handicraft, the place of such work in the country at the present time was noted by various speakers.

"The best way for a people to grow great and prosperous is to be faithful to themselves in developing such resources as are peculiar to them—those qualities of heart and mind which are essentially their own. They must keep their originality which has been gained by them through sacrifice, thought, and the circumstances which have made them what they are," declared the Hon. Mr. Perrault. He was addressing a crowd of people who were studying the handicraft exhibition at the Art Gallery and his further words were very appropriate as he dwelt on the quality of the wood carving, wrought iron, book binding, upholstering, weaving, and other works of skill which he said called forth the admiration of all who saw them. It was quality such as this which would encourage visitors to travel across the length and breadth of the province to get the handicraft products, he said.

TRIBUTE TO COL. BOVEY.

Personal tribute to Lt.-Col. Wilfrid Bovey, president of the Canadian Handicraft Guild, was given by Mr. Perrault, when he referred to the contribution which he had made in general to secure a better understanding of the French-Canadians by others as well as by themselves. "Let us hope that he will continue to give his talent and energy in the service of a cause so noble and useful," declared the Minister of Roads.

The utility value, as well as that of beauty, made this enterprise a fundamental one for the province and whatever encouraged the domestic arts would tend to the decentralization of industry, making the many centres of the agricultural districts centres of economic activity. The handicrafts products have already paid into the pockets of the producers over a million dollars, Mr. Perrault informed the gathering.

"If in the days when there did not exist much encouragement for the domestic arts a million dollars could be obtained through their sale, what might we not expect when the due support for them is forthcoming," said Albert Rioux, president of the Quebec Catholic Farmers' Association, in the course of his remarks at the Art Gallery. As there are about 50,000 more men in the country districts than women and a much greater proportion of women in the towns and cities than men, the movement of the women to the larger centres is manifestly greater than that of men. It is necessary to encourage women to stay on the farms and in this respect much can be done through the encouragement of the domestic arts, Mr. Rioux argued. It is just the little amount extra that a woman on a farm can earn through the sale of her work that often lifts the farmer's account out of the red. In other words give the woman a desire to stay on the farm and the farming industry will be aided, he claimed.

COUNTRY INVADES CITY.

Emile Vallancourt, Paul Boucher and Georges Bouchard, M.P., all brought their meed of praise for the work of the Guild. "Snobisme urbaine" had invaded the country and now it was time for the "snobisme rurale" to invade the cities, thought Mr. Bouchard.

At the banquet of the Guild at the Place Viger Hotel on Saturday evening the affairs of the organization throughout the country were considered, and reports from Miss Helen Mowatt, founder of the Charlotte County, N.B., handicraft society, and Mrs. H. D. Warren, of Toronto, were read, showing what was being done in their respective sections of the country.

One very interesting diversion for the evening's programme was a presentation of folk dances by a group of dancers under the direction of Miss Hilda Suddes, representative of the English Folk Dance Society.

Lt. Col. Bovey, who presided, also gave a review of the work in progress in Canada. Among the practical hints which he left with the guests was the reference to the diminishing number of hours of work which across the border is taking place. The trend to shorter hours taking place everywhere, giving greater leisure and the encouragement to creative and artistic efforts on the part of everyone is an important reason for giving support to the Guild's programme, was the opinion advanced.

LOVE OF BEAUTY CURE FOR MANKIND'S EVILS

Star Oct. 31/33
Prof. Constable Says Art Need in Daily Life

OTTAWA, Oct. 30.—(C. P.)—The way to cure the besetting evils of mankind lies in the more direct regard for art and beauty in everyday life, Professor W. G. Constable, of the Courtauld Institute of Art, University of London, told the Canadian Club here Saturday. Art was the expression of beauty and harmony, and to incorporate such into the things which man constructed was to bring them into purview of daily life. Mr. Constable emphasized that it cost no more to erect an artistic building than it did to raise up an ugly one.

A reintegration of art and life was what was most urgently needed in these modern days, a resurrection of the atmosphere in artistic conception of 5th century Greece, or 15th century Italy, or 17th century England. The problems which confronted the present generation in its effort to arrive at these things were two-fold.

First was the business of conserving the fine things inherited from the past, ensuring that the complex activities of present day living did nothing to endanger these heritages.

Second was the business of seeing that what was brought into existence was fine and good.

CANADIAN ART LAUDED

Prof. Constable, of London, to Give Lectures Here

Ottawa, October 27.—Tribute to Canadian art was paid today by Prof. W. G. Constable, director of the Courtauld Art Institute of London University. The Dominion was making a distinct contribution to art, he said, recalling Canada's exhibition at Wembley several years ago.

Professor Constable expressed pleasure that Queen's University was this year trying the experiment of establishing a course in art under the direction of Goodrich Roberts, member of the famous Canadian literary family. Until Queen's established the course, the Courtauld Art Institute was the only art body in the British Empire that operated in conjunction with a university.

Brought to Canada by the Canadian National Gallery and the Carnegie Trust, Professor Constable will give lectures in art throughout Canada.

ART MUSEUMS NOT JUNK REPOSITORIES

Gazette Oct. 31/33
Canada Should Check False Belief, English Expert Advises

GOOD START MADE HERE

Professor Constable, London University, Urges Claims of Art as Aid in Life Fulfilment

Canada has the beginnings of an art gallery and museum system and, right at that beginning, is the time for those interested in art in the wider sense of the word, to check a belief, prevalent almost everywhere, that galleries and museums are places for the hoarding of all sorts of miscellaneous junk. This was one of many thoughts left with an audience of the Young Men's Canadian Club last night, by William Constable, M.A., F.S.A., professor of the history of art, University of London, whose topic was "Has Art a Place in Modern Life?"

Professor Constable recalled that during the 19th century, art was looked upon as a superfluity, a delightful distraction. Fortunately, however, he thought, this belief had made way for a view, held fairly widely today, that the reintegration of art was needed as something that would at least help individuals in securing a greater sense of fulfilment in everyday life.

He stressed the urgent need for both civic and individual effort to raise the artistic enthusiasm or sense of the community and, in this connection, mentioned two lines of action as being of prime importance: the business of conservation—the preservation of fine things handed down from generation to generation, and, creation—the act of making something new and seeing that it is fine and dignified.

CONSERVATION PROBLEMS

On the subject of conservation, he pointed out that the real basis lay in the fact that art is neither old nor new. It is either good or bad, he said. Some of the problems of conservation, he continued, were in preventing over-zealous but none too artistic government officials and business men from allowing their activities—roads, unsightly industrial developments, wretched billboards, etc.—from ruining the countryside. He insisted that business, any business, could be advertised or housed by mediums and in establishments that were both attractive and practical, without it costing the management one penny more than unsightly advertising signs and hideous factories.

In England, he continued, there had been a wanton disregard of maintaining beauty, and some sections of the country he referred to as "ghostly" through want of a little thought and foresight on the part of industrialists who held the "short run view of small financial gain." He pointed to the contrast between such towns in Germany as Dresden, Hamburg, Munich, and Frankfurt which, he said, had been well planned and retained their old world charm, and certain English urban centres where "people living in gardenless slums breathed nothing but chimney smoke for most of their days."

It was ridiculous to think, he declared, that a revival of art could be brought about by reverting to the village industry and the craftsman for, he said, those days were past and this was the machine age. "But," he argued, "whereas machinery can never replace the craftsman, it can, nevertheless, be attuned to turn out things he has in mind, and I include mass production in this."

EXPENSIVE ARTISTS USED

He observed that in Sweden one large firm of potters paid an artist as much as £3,000 a year to design cups and saucers which machines then turned out by the millions; still another company in Germany paid a fabulous salary to a man who could design furniture properly. All this to prove, he affirmed, that mass production need not be considered as "nasty" when a little foresight could cause the machine-made article to be good to look at and serviceable.

Professor Constable spoke of the education of children as a means of instilling the community with an appreciation of the thing beautiful, and concluded by an urgent appeal to his audience to keep before them the importance of town-planning as one way of awakening a sense of what is order, and therefore art, in the minds of the masses.

Paul Coffey, president, was in the chair.

STAINED GLASS IS TOPIC OF LECTURE

Gazette Oct. 31/33
History and Technique Are Described by Peter Haworth, A.R.C.A.

Stained glass windows, their history and the methods employed in making them, formed the subject of a lecture by Peter Haworth, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, yesterday before the Montreal Women's Club in the Mount Royal Hotel.

It was through the medium of stained glass, mosaic and fresco painting that the story of Christianity was told, said Mr. Haworth, whose lecture was illustrated by lantern slides, colored by a method of his own, depicting many famous windows in churches in France and a few in England, and some from the period of the revival of the art in the nineteenth century. By request he had included a number of slides of his own work in stained glass.

The great period of stained glass was from about the middle of the eleventh century to the middle of the sixteenth, Mr. Haworth remarked. It afterwards declined, until, at the beginning of the nineteenth century it was completely a lost art. Now it is possible to produce any color known to the early workers in stained glass, and some which they did not achieve.

Mr. Haworth then went into the details of making stained glass, saying that all the colors are in the glass itself except yellow stain, which is applied to the back of the glass, and a brown or black monochrome pigment which has an affinity for glass, this also being painted on. "Saddle-bars," the metal cross-sections, are required to support the great weight of a stained glass window, and in addition each color section requires leading.

The title of Mr. Haworth's lecture was "Stained Glass Windows—The Book of the People," and he spoke of such windows in the thirteenth century as the newspapers, familiar figures in the community being represented in the design, tavern keepers, members of the guilds, and others.

Revival of the art came about with William Morris, in carrying out Ruskin's ideas, he said.

For stained glass to be effective in this time it must have the spirit of 1933, said Mr. Haworth. He satirized its commercialization, by which, he said, one paid so much a foot for something selected from a catalogue. The bits of "stained glass" over the dining room window, the rosette in the pane of glass in the bathroom, these must go, he said.

It was unfortunate that stained glass in this country should be made abroad, for the climate and light here imposed conditions to which foreign craftsmen were unaccustomed. His own first piece of work in Canada was a failure for this reason, he said.

Among the slides displayed were several of windows in Chartres Cathedral. The earliest was of a window in the Cathedral of St. Julien, at Le Mans, France.

A tribute to the late Judge Emily Murphy, of Edmonton, was paid by Mrs. John Scott, a friend of long standing, after which, at the instance of the president, Mrs. D. S. Higginson, the meeting stood for a moment.

Songs were sung by Albert Downing, accompanied by Mrs. Franklin J. Hodgson.

GOOD BASIS FOR ART COLLECTIONS ASSURED

Expert Heard at Y.M. Canadian Club

To check a belief which seemed to be prevalent that art galleries and museums are places for the hoarding of junk, William Constable, M.A., F.S.A., of the University of London, declared before an audience of the Young Men's Canadian Club last night, that Canada had a real basis for a system of art galleries and museums, ranking in a very high place.

The speaker stressed that art was needed to help individuals in securing a greater sense of fulfilment in life, and that there was urgent need for awakening a sense of artistic appreciation in the community. There was need for conservation, he held, to prevent non-artistic and over-zealous government officials from creating ugly public works, roads and industrial developments.

Education as a means of sowing seeds of artistic appreciation in children was one of the prime necessities in modern teaching, the professor stated, making an appeal to his audience to keep town planning and community development before them looking forward to the time when these factors would play an important part in individual life and contentment.

MUSEUM HAS PLAN

ould Use Specimens for Canadian Handicrafts

Ottawa, October 27.—Employment of decorative designs taken from objects in Canadian museum collections in the making of distinctive Canadian handicrafts and manufactures is the suggestion put out to the Canadian people by officials of the National Museum. Over 800 factories have been approached on this point. Museum specimens are made available to them by the director of the National Museum.

At present over 1,100 factories in Canada are making more than 170 different kinds of such products, as classified by the Trade and Commerce Department. These include such articles as linoleum, bronzes, blankets and mantle-pieces. The ornamental designs for such could be adapted from museum specimens representing the mythology of the Canadian aborigines, the officials suggest.

In order to popularize the study of museum subjects, the authorities here have approached the railway companies with a view to establishing a travelling collection. The idea would be to have a railroad car fitted up with specimens. This car would be taken all over the country and open, under proper supervision, to public exhibition.

Amazing Public Response to Showing of Famous Van Horne Collection

The first public exhibition ever held of the famous art collection of the late Sir William Van Horne, closed yesterday at the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west. During the three weeks since it opened on October 16, the exhibition was visited by 34,740 Montrealers, of whom 8,164 availed themselves yesterday of the opportunity to view the $2,000,000 collection. The second largest attendance was on Sunday, October 29, when 6,600 people visited the Art Gallery.

The Van Horne collection had been removed to the Gallery at the time of the near-disastrous fire which broke out in the Van Horne residence, 1130 Sherbrooke street, west, on April 3 last. The blaze, in lighting which two firemen were injured, was fortunately confined to the upper floors, so that the paintings, which were for the most part hung on the lower floors, were only slightly damaged by water, and only one was actually destroyed.

Regarded by critics as "one of the most notable private collections in Canada," the results of the late Sir William Van Horne's efforts included over 200 paintings, and a great variety of Japanese pottery, furniture, tapestries, and many plaques, most of which represented sailing ships, of which Sir William was very fond, and models of which he had also collected in large numbers. Much of the furniture and tapestries had been seriously damaged by fire, smoke and water.

The popularity of the Van Horne collection, on view during the last two weeks in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, on Sherbrooke street, is still increasing, authorities at the Association report. Yesterday afternoon 6,679 visitors viewed the famous paintings between two and five setting a record for the gallery's busiest day.

(Special to The Gazette.)

Quebec, October 29.—Variety of subject and treatment marks the collection of oils, pastels and charcoal drawings at the exhibition entitled "Portraits of Places and Persons on the Gaspé Peninsula," which Miss Kathleen Shackleton is holding at the Chateau Frontenac. This exhibition will last for two weeks.

Miss Shackleton has been very successful in depicting the brilliant coloring of autumn. The eighteen pictures which have been lent by the provincial department of highways and mines show scenes along the Perron boulevard, from the picturesque fishing village of Anse à Beaufils south of Gaspé Basin to the great height of Mont St. Pierre, on the northern part of the peninsula, "North Beach," showing Perce rock and the interesting strata of Mont Joli. Three studies of French-Canadian types are also on this screen. These and the five fishermen's heads which have been acquired by the Provincial Museum reflect Miss Shackleton's gift of portraiture.

"Guardian of the Coast," is the title of an interesting view of Cap des Rosiers lighthouse. This and a study of a Labrador schooner in port have been lent by the Clark Steamship Company.

The exhibition was opened yesterday by Mrs. L. A. Taschereau wife of the Premier of Quebec.

Famous Collection Attracted Crowds to Gallery

The famous collection of paintings of the late Sir William Van Horne, which have been on view at the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, attracted 34,740 visitors during the past three weeks. Of this number 3,998 were students from various city schools, who, through the generosity of Lord Atholstan, have been enabled to visit probably the most notable private collection in Canada.

Yesterday, the final day on which they were on view, 8,154 visitors inspected them, while on the previous Sunday the number was 6,600. The pictures number 200 and are valued at $2,000,000.

The keen interest taken by the general public in the Van Horne collection has been remarkable. The paintings were removed to the Art Galleries following the fire that broke out in the Van Horne residence on April 3, and thanks to the efficient work of the fire brigade and salvage corps, only one picture was destroyed, and a few damaged by smoke and water. Many of the tapestries, of which Sir William had a fine collection were, however, badly damaged.

F. D. Allison's Water Colors At Eaton's

Gazette 2/11/33

Water colour painting, which has received too little respect in this country, is coming into its own, so far as the painters are concerned, and is taking a more important place in Canadian exhibitions. Some very good and attractive water colours by one of the newer Canadian painters, Frank D. Allison, are being shown in the Eaton Company's galleries and make an exhibition well worth visiting. Mr. Allison, who comes from the Maritime Provinces, studied for a time in Montreal, but his work is better known in many other places; he has, however, exhibited here before and won a Jessie Dow prize at this year's Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal.

This exhibition is unlike most of those that are given here in the fact that there are only few landscapes; Mr. Allison's subjects are principally the streets and buildings of old towns and, more particularly, towns in the south of Europe. The pictures are mostly large water colours, painted with much breadth and freedom, full of the gay colour and sunlight of places in Spain, Italy, southern France and Morocco. The little town of Espalion appears in several of these pictures and one of the best of them is of the big arch of its bridge. There are some other good bridges here and a very fine one is the bridge at Cahors, with its towers standing out in a blaze of sunlight against distant hills; and in good contrast with this is an English bridge, at Ludlow. The street scenes are many and good and one of a street at Pradines is especially happy in its colour. Rather different is the fine effect of red-roofed Corsican houses standing on top of a blue-green hillside.

The few landscapes include a delightful picture in greens and blues of a mill pond, but most of the landscapes are of rocky places which come near to the pictures of buildings. Two of the most successful pictures, in colour and composition, are a view of a granite quarry and "The bathing hour" of a group of men in front of a mass of grey and brown cliffs.

Notes of Art In Montreal

Two of the prizes won at the recent exhibition of the Independent Art Association have not yet been claimed by their winners. The owners of Catalogues numbered 388 and 422 have won an oil painting by Jas. McCorkindale and an etching by Roland J. A. Chalmers, respectively, and are asked to call and collect their prizes from John A. Norlin, 1877 Dorchester St. W., Apt. 5, between 4 and 6 p.m. on Thursday, Nov. 2nd. Prizes not called for on that day will be placed before the board of the association for further decision.

The names of winners of the other prizes were: Dr. Donat Rousseau (Charcoal drawing by J. A. Norlin); Gaston Genereaux (Etching by Geo. Starkey); Mrs. W. Topp (Oil painting by Charles Tulley); Miss Jeanne

Brodeur (Sculpture by Edw. Z. Galea.)

The exhibition of the Van Horne collection of pictures at the Art Association of Montreal will be open to the public for the last time next Sunday afternoon.

The Royal Canadian Academy's exhibition will be opened in the Art Association's galleries on Thursday, Nov. 16th.

Scottish Collection Opens

Tour of Dominion Today

Ottawa, November 2.—A reciprocal gesture to the exhibition of Canadian water colors sent by the National Gallery on tour of the United Kingdom this year, the collection arranged by the Royal Scottish Society of Painters in Water-Colors will be on exhibition here tomorrow. The Governor-General will open the display which will remain in Ottawa for a month before touring the principal cities of the Dominion.

Supplementary to the 116 pieces comprising the Scottish collection is an exhibition of original cartoons and caricatures from "Punch," which feature the drawings of that periodical's most famous artists—Sir John Tenniel, George Du Maurier, Charles Keene and John Leech. The two exhibitions combine to make one of the most fascinating displays which the National Art Gallery has ever staged.

The water-color section is declared to represent the best work in its medium now being accomplished in Scotland. That it adheres to no particular "school" but is strongly individualistic both in conception and execution is quite patent.

WATERCOLORS BY FRANK D. ALLISON

Gazette 2/11/33

Interesting Subjects on View in Eaton Fine Art Galleries

Frank D. Allison shows himself to be a capable exponent of water color, in the collection of his work on exhibition in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. His handling is bold and direct and whether it be a case of full, free transparent wash or of using opaque color, he shows keen appreciation of the legitimate limits of the medium. To an agreeable color sense is added adequate drawing, and he knows what will make a good subject. Buildings interest him and in painting them he succeeds in imparting solidity. Quaintness in design makes a strong appeal to him, but there is never any hint that distortion has been resorted to. In fact the show is a succession of varied subjects seen normally and recorded faithfully. In the selection of his subjects, too, there has been no striving for just those things that will fall into a distinctive individual pattern. He seems open-minded to anything paintable and there is a total absence of mannerism. This makes the exhibition distinctly refreshing and worth while.

Far afield has Mr. Allison gone for his material. Espalion has been unusually fruitful. Here he has seen the possibility of "The Red Tower"; a quiet corner with old timbered houses and figures; irregular old buildings with steps; the noble lines of "Gables End." From Venice comes two works in gayer hues—"Fish Market," with figures, arched roof, hanging lantern and the glow of sunlight through an awning; and "Fruit Market," the latter showing the piles of vivid blooms on stalls, beneath awnings striped and plain, with admiring buyers. The arrangement of sunlight and shadow is good in "A Street, Pradines" and good design marks "Le Chateau de Calmont"—the building on a massive hill with houses in the wooded valley. "Along the River Lot" is effective with its irregular buildings, little galleries, steps to the water and the colorful contrast of red chimney stacks against slate roofs.

In higher key are "The Little Gate, Fez" with laden white-garbed figures coming through the opening in the city wall, and "Bab Djema, Fez" with its arch, vegetation, bare tree and figures in strong sunlight—the last-named being the picture awarded the Jessie Dow prize for watercolor at the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal this year. "Shipyard, Venice" is solidly painted, and there is atmosphere in "The Mill Pond"—trees edging water under a cloudy sky. "Lobsterman's Row," with its little wooden structures and figures working among a litter of lobster traps, is a vivid impression set down with decision.

Mr. Allison has not overlooked the pictorial possibilities of bridges, has found a congenial subject in the massive cuttings of a granite quarry, and reveals a nice sense of values in a row of fishing boats at Honfleur. Similar in handling to this port scene is "Chartres"—buildings fronted by trees at sundown, which has marked poetic feeling.

Frank D. Allison, who was born at Saint John, N.B., studied under Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., and attended classes under Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., in Montreal, later following his studies with John H. Carlson, N.A., at Woodstock, N.Y., and with George Elmer Browne, N.A., abroad. He is a regular contributor to exhibitions in Canada and in the United States.

Pays Tribute To Scottish Artists

Governor-General Opens Royal Scottish Art Exhibition

Ottawa, Nov. 4.—(C.P.)—Paying tribute to the contribution made by Scotsmen in Canada and voicing praise for the work of Scottish artists, the Governor-General opened the exhibition of the Royal Scottish society of artists in watercolor at the National Gallery here yesterday. Commenting also on the collection of original cartoons and caricatures from "Punch" which supplements the exhibit, His Excellency recalled that "with its un-failing commonsense, its unique power of keeping up the national morale by the greatest of human tonics, laughter, 'Punch' was one of the most typically English things that ever came out of England."

Upwards of thirty-four thousand people visited the magnificent exhibition of paintings of the Van Horne collection which opened on October 16 and closed yesterday afternoon. This circumstance is indicative of the fact that great works of art have, in this busy and hustling age of ours, a strong hold upon the public imagination. And the fact that the crowd so interested in this display of fine pictures included folk of all ranks and classes in the social scale lends additional significance to this event; for it goes far towards confirming the conviction expressed by many competent observers that there are in this day and generation manifold signs of a revival of public interest in things artistic. It is one of the instructive features of human history that great art has never been able to flourish and abound during the furore of commercial impulses, nor amid the agitations of political forces in contest with each other. Great art is not born amid the vicissitudes and distractions of a nation in the convulsed throes of a transitional period. Yet, once the vehemence of the social passions has simmered down, the opportunity again opens out for a renewal of the artistic faculty and function, and the poised mind and steady eye again make for the rightful play of that temper which is a balance of serviceable qualities and promotes the restoration of good sense and the aesthetic tastes in the community at large. For who can doubt that it is in the objects we choose, and in the things our hands shape forth, that the taste and temper of any community are made manifest? This truth is amply shown in the historic fact that the character of every great nation is reflected indirectly in its art and literature. And just as every nation has its own special scenic groundwork from which to derive artwork materials, so each nation has in the structuring of art-forms, its own peculiar mode. The poets, painters, sculptors, musicians and architects are the exponents of the thoughts and feelings that pass through the mind of a people and their artistic types embody in an ideal form the objects that appear to the community most noble, beautiful, or worthy of pursuit.

Moreover, it is to be noted that while the historic chronicle mainly keeps within a recording of the succession of events, along with sundry political or moral lessons drawn from the facts so indexed and filed, the art faculty goes much more deeply into the complexion of the social fabric and exhibits the most sensitive sympathy with every social change which a nation undergoes. This keen intensity of art, ever focussing its gaze upon what may be termed the interiors of life, accounts for the definition of art as being the bridge between the seen and unseen. True art never stops at the mere imitation or the mimicking of things. The moment it comes down from the status of its penetrative power to show forth, not actions only, but also the symbolism of creative things; not alone form and color, but also the spirit and genius of human behavior, it has lost its force. It belongs to the copyist. It is a mere gloss and a superficial and poor thing. Genuine art comes much closer to life than the sheer knack of setting geometrical curves in juxtaposition or trimming up forms for window-dressing purposes. Of Turner's paintings it has been said that "the diffused light" and the far distances of his pictures blend "in extraordinary sympathy with the human associations of the scenes he represented." And all great art is allegorical in the sense that this mystic blend of human associations with whatever is derived from the outer world, and depicted upon the canvas, reaches the summit of its excellence in the "Testament of Beauty," teaching us that the ideals of perfection and beauty are not to be sought afar off, but close at hand; not in the heavens, but upon the common earth; and that above and beyond all defects and singular forms that crowd into the foreground, and beyond local peculiarities and the so-called vulgarity of ordinary life—

One beauty maketh its occult abode
In all things scattered by great Beauty's hand.
And who amongst us can doubt that the wholesome and elevating influence of art, thus imbuing the human imagination and helping us to extract precious essence from commonplace surroundings, is of high educational value and of conspicuous advantage? It is in the light of these considerations that the present trend towards a keener appreciation of artistic genius and its manifold gifts may be regarded as a very healthy sign.

Star Nov. 8/33 INFLUENCE OF PARIS ON ART EMPHASIZED

Address by Prof. Desclos
to Art Society

Since the Middle Ages Paris has been one of the art centres of the world, and for centuries it has been the great mart where people have gone from all over the world to provide themselves with beautiful things, said Prof. Auguste V. Desclos, of the University of Paris, who addressed the Women's Art Society yesterday afternoon in Stevenson Hall. Speaking on the "The Artistic Life of Paris," Professor Desclos dealt with the art production in that centre, the attitude of Paris towards things artistic, the encouragement given to artists, life in the studios, and the many factors that make Paris noted as an art centre.

Characteristics of the art production of Paris, the lecturer noted, are originality, capacity for assimilation and adaptation, and universality.

Professor Desclos touched on the circumstances that make Paris a favorable background for artistic production. Beautiful in itself, the city is the residence of writers, scientists, musicians, critics; a city of theatres and concerts; of schools, studios and museums, of which last, there are 30 in Paris. The prestige attached to things of the intellect was evidenced in statues to savants and artists, in street names, in the space devoted by the press to art and literature, even in names given to battleships, two being named the Michelet and the Renan.

Even in this time of depression there are in Paris approximately 50,000 artists working, nearly half of them regular exhibitors. One element that influenced art production in Paris was the tradition of fine workmanship handed down for generations. "L'Ouvrage bien fait" was an inspiring motto. Paris was generally considered a city of pleasure but it is also a city of hard work, declared the lecturer, who showed pictures of studios in which students of all ages were at work. There was, he said, a curious contrast between the gaiety outside and the serious atmosphere within the studios and academies. Exhibitions of their works were essential to the artists in disposing of them, and sometimes a painter, not being able to send his pictures to the salons, held an exhibition in the street, hanging his pictures on the walls of houses.

Enrouragement to artistic production was given by the government, which buys pictures and statues to give to museums in towns and provinces, gives decorations to artists, and promotes exhibitions of the schools. The picture dealers often take more than a commercial interest in art, and sometimes recognize the merit in a movement or the work of an individual still unknown to the public.

Mrs. R. A. Dunton presided at the meeting. She mentioned that the studio group of the society will begin work next Wednesday, in a studio at the art galleries, Mrs. R. R. Thompson is convener of this group.

Engraving Methods at McGill Library

The exhibition of Graphic Arts for Students which is being shown in the upper gallery of the McGill University Library has been put together to represent the practice as well as the art of engraving and is worth seeing by every one who is interested in printed illustration. So far as the limited space allows the various processes of engraving are shown very completely by means of pictures, very good explanatory labels and, in some cases, specimens of the tools and materials that are used. The exhibits are for the most part prints, reproductions and book from the library's collection and they range from illuminated manuscripts and woodcuts of the fifteenth century to specimens of the most recent book illustration. Any student of graphic art may find here something to suggest further study and people whose interest is less practical can get clear ideas of the great variety of methods which have been used in engraving, the characteristics of methods and the differences between them. To make the display more complete, it contains books on materials concerned with painting and drawing but these take only a small space. Among woodcuts and wood engravings there are Japanese and European specimens, sets of prints showing the stages in color printing, and some modern wood engravings printed both in relief and in intaglio, with the ink held in the lines instead of on the surfaces. Printing from metal plates and the prints made from them take up a large part of the exhibition space and a series of prints with descriptive labels give a good idea of the distinctions between etchings, d'points, aquatints, mezzotints, a many other of the processes which have been used in engraving metal. Lithography is also, of course included and, to bring the exhibit up to date, even linoleum cuts, a modern photographic process though the latter can not be illustrated in any detail.

The examples of engravings include originals and reproductions of many countries and times; there are works by Blake and Bewick, and by William Nicholson, and even a poster.

WORK WIDELY PRAISED

Exhibition in Connection with "Britain Week's"—Everest Flight Pictures Prominent

Eloquent of the high standard of technique and beauty set and maintained by photographers of The Times staff in London is the exhibition of photographs which opened yesterday on the fifth floor of the Henry Morgan & Company store, under the auspices of the National Council of Education.

This exhibition has received praise throughout the cities of Europe where it has been shown, and was brought to Canada in conjunction with the "Britain Weeks," sponsored by the National Council of Education. The photographs, taken by members of The Times staff during the course of the day's work, are truly splendid examples of first-class photography. To this writer they stand out, not only because of their beauty and the technique behind them, but because they are "real." The photographer was doing his job of work and conscious only of his subject, very seldom pre-arranged and often taken on a few minutes' notice. The pictures of the British scenes are full of life, and the pastoral scenes which make up a large part of the exhibition are truly magnificent in their quality and beauty.

Action abounds in this display, and action with exceptional clarity, as, for instance, the picture of Derby horses in training at Newmarket. Every detail in this photograph of two horses thundering the track at full speed is clearly defined, and the effect is real and alive. There is poetry in every one of the landscapes and the water scenes, whether it is poetry of action or of the quiet beauty of the English countryside.

There are several night photographs and these are particularly appealing. As for the scenes of industrial life, even factory chimneys have been portrayed with a beauty of their own.

MODERN ADVANCE SEEN.

Action is an eye-opener, and from their quality the photographic fine glimpses of lofty peaks. The planes climbed to a height of 22,000 feet in crossing the Himalayas and battled all the time with the snow driven winds from the crest of the range.

can be clearly seen in the photographs. The exhibition is open to the public from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. today.

Toronto, Nov. 4. — (CP) — The Canadian Group of Painters, a new association of artists, made their debut today in the Art Gallery here when their first exhibition was opened.

The group's history dates back only a few months, but the organization developed from the historic Group of Seven, known as the storm centre of Canadian art for several years. The aim of the present group is to extend the creative faculty beyond the professional meaning of art and to make of it a more common language of expression. It had its roots also in the ambition of the Group of Seven, which sought to find a way out of the conventionally pictorial and pastoral imitation of European work.

The group includes 26 artists, among them being Frank Carmichael, A. J. Casson, Charles Comfort, Lawren Harris, A. Y. Jackson, Arthur Lismer, Yvonne McKague, George Pepper, William Wood and L. Fitzgerald.

Labrador League Aims To Assist Coast Folk With Home Industries

A sale of handicraft goods, the product of natives of the Canadian Labrador coast, is being held in Salon B of the Mount Royal Hotel on Wednesday, November 8, from 10 a.m. to 10 p.m. These goods consist very largely of hooked mats, table runners and tapestries, worked frequently in designs symbolic of life and scenes of the Canadian Labrador, also a number of wood carvings of birds, boats and similar elements of coastal life, as well as knitted goods.

The Labrador Voluntary Educational League has turned its attention, in the last year, to the organization and direction of home handicraft industries along the coast, because this work shows possibilities of contributing toward economic support. The fishing and trapping industries, upon which practically the entire population of the coast depend for support, have been greatly depressed of late, and it is extremely desirable to cultivate other accessory means of providing livelihood. Consequently, under trained direction, the development of the production of handicraft goods is being furthered. In this work the League has had the support of a number of private individuals and of many chapters of the I.O.D.E. in various parts of Quebec, which have been represented through the Provincial Chapter.

Social and Personal.

The Governor-General and the Countess of Bessborough will honor Sir Montagu and Lady Allan with their presence at dinner on Thursday evening, November 16, at Ravenscrag, prior to the private view of the 54th Royal Canadian Academy Exhibition at the Art Association of Montreal, which Their Excellencies will later attend, with their host and hostess.

Mr. E. Wylie Grier, R.C.A., president of the Royal Canadian Academy, is arriving in the city on Saturday from Toronto, in connection with the forthcoming exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy at the Art Association. He will be joined here next week by his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Crawford Grier, of Lennoxville, who is coming to town for the private view of the exhibition.

Private View.

At the private view of the 54th Royal Canadian Academy Exhibition at the Art Association of Montreal tomorrow night, on which occasion Their Excellencies the Earl and Countess of Bessborough are to be present, the guests will be received by the president of the Royal Canadian Academy, Mr. E. Wylie Grier, R.C.A., and his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Crawford Grier, of Lennoxville, and by Mr. W. S. Maxwell, vice-president of the Academy, and his daughter, Miss Mary Maxwell. On the arrival of the Vice-regal party at a quarter past nine o'clock, members of the Academy and their wives will be presented to Their Excellencies, who will later proceed to the First Gallery, where the Governor-General will give an address to the assembled guests; a tour of inspection following.

VALUABLE PORTRAIT IN TORONTO BASEMENT

$7,000 Painting Badly Damaged by Damp

TORONTO, Nov. 15.—(C. P.)—A portrait of Dr. Goldwin Smith, painted by John Russell, was found in the cellar of the University Club here yesterday, its frame wrecked, the canvas punctured, and the painting badly marred by the moisture of the basement.

The portrait had been painted shortly before the death of Dr. Smith, one of Toronto's most eminent savants, in 1919. After the painting was finished Mr. Russell left for Paris where he resided almost continuously until his return to Toronto more than a year ago.

The portrait was left with the University Club until Mr. Russell asked for its return a short time ago. The Club officials were surprised to find it in the basement, among old papers, badly defaced. It is thought that it was moved with other club effects to the new building some years ago, then forgotten. The artist valued the work at more than $7,000.

Silhouettes Of a New Kind At the Arts Club

Something quite different from what are usually known as silhouettes are to be seen in the collection of work by Rene L. Kulbach which is being shown at the Arts Club on Victoria street. The old-fashioned and very familiar kind of silhouette was a picture, usually a portrait, cut out in solid black, with little if any detail; Mr. Kulbach gets his results also by cutting black paper but does it in such a way that the white surface on which the cutting is mounted plays a very important part in the making of the picture. In this way he gets strong and broad highlights and in some cases the black paper is cut down to mere outlines on white surfaces. The work is like the making of linoleum cuts, with the cut itself and not its print as the final result. Knife drawing might be a suitable name for the method, and, if it seems rather a laborious way of drawing, Mr. Kulbach does it in a way which justifies it; there is both good drawing and good design in these works. Most of them are of animals and the method is ingeniously used to show the stripes of tigers and zebras and the white breasts of penguins. The grouping and movements of the animals and the suggestions of landscape surroundings give very happy results.

M. K. Serailian's Landscapes and Flower Pictures

Star Nov. 15/33

Pictures by a painter who is new to Montreal, Mihram K. Serailian, are now being shown in Eaton's gallery. Mr. Serailian, who has travelled and painted in many parts of the world, some of them little known to painters, was for some years living in California as an assistant to Luther Burbank, the inventor of new plants and flowers, and many of his pictures in this exhibition are Californian landscapes and flower pictures. The flower pictures indeed show the influence of the botanist on the painter; some of them have a certain stiffness which makes them better as illustrations than as pictures, but there is one of red poppies which is much more freely and effectively painted. A portrait of Burbank at work among his flowers is very interesting as a record.

Some of the landscapes have something of the dryness and formality which appears in the flower pictures but there are a number of them in which Mr. Serailian has put much more pictorial feeling and less concern for the statement of facts, though all are good views of pleasant places, ranging from California to Egypt, Arabia and Syria. Some studies of breaking seas on the Californian coast are among the best of these, and there are some striking pictures of mountain scenery. These last are of places in California—a good picture of mountain shadows in the Yosemite Valley, and a view of Mount Tamalpais, in Switzerland, the Jungfrau, in Cappadocia and in Arabia—a remarkable effect of sunrise on Mount Ararat.

The exhibition also contains a few "mystery pictures," apparently representations in colour of the painter's states of mind and emotion, but they need some key to give them meaning.

American Sculptors

Star Nov. 15/33

The growth of the art of sculpture in the United States from its first beginnings about the year 1800 to the activity and comparative importance which it has reached in recent years was the subject of a lecture, given to the Art Association of Montreal on Tuesday evening by Richard Cross, of New York. The subject, treated in detail, was almost too much for a single lecture and Mr. Cross was obliged to make his address, with the help of many good lantern slides, into an illustrated catalogue of American sculptors, starting with the early classicists, Greenhow, Hiram Powers and others and passing quickly to John Quincy Adams Ward, described by the lecturer as the founder of modern American sculpture. Much of the lecturer's attention had to be given to the principal sculptors of the latter nineteenth century, with Augustus St. Gaudens, Daniel French, George Barnard and Paul Bartlett foremost among them. The illustrations showed, incidentally, how much of the work of these and other men had to be devoted to the making of statues of George Washington and, still more, of Abraham Lincoln, but one of the bigger works shown was Bartlett's great pediment group on the Capitol at Washington. Passing to newer men, Mr. Cross paid special attention to Karl Bitter, whose work as a sculptor and in the general cause of sculpture was very important, and to Frederick MacMonnies, still a leader among living American sculptors. A long list included Borglum, as a carver both of mountains and of more ordinary works, and place was found for two names better known in Montreal, Tait Mackenzie and Mrs. Whitney.

ARTIST SAYS TORONTO IS BECOMING UGLY

John Russell Says City Lacks Idealism

TORONTO, Nov. 15.—(C. P.)—Absence of idealism in Canadian life was leaving the country with less national character than any other in the world, and mechanized education had so submerged the appreciation of individualism that it even had entered the world of art and was endeavoring to standardize the creation of artists, declared John Russell, artist, in an address in Toronto.

Mr. Russell criticized Toronto and declared that the city, which had the opportunity of becoming one of the most beautiful in the world, was becoming the ugliest. He denounced it for a lack of idealism as expressed in ungenerous criticism of its public men and for its submergence of all individualism in education.

The ART NEWS

Exhibit of Sir William van Horne Collection Notable Event in Montreal

MONTREAL.—The exhibition of Sir William van Horne's collection at the Art Association of Montreal last week gave a rare opportunity to appreciate, not only outstanding masterpieces of European painting and Oriental art, but a collection intimately reflecting a taste that developed along the most independent and catholic lines. The result as we judge it today, eighteen years after the death of its creator, fully justifies the indomitable courage of this giant, who in the Nineties formed the nucleus of a group of outstanding modern French paintings, and even in the old master field bought works, not for the names they bore, but the qualities of art which he felt them to possess.

Sir William's Spanish pictures are recognized as the finest to be seen outside of Spain, while the French group, containing as it does works of the more advanced French moderns acquired in the early years of the present century, promised at the time of his death in 1915 to become a collection of the order of Barnes'. In addition, there are remarkable examples of Dutch, Flemish, German, Italian and English painting, as well as fine Chinese and Japanese works of art.

As a collector he was a rare type for this country, buying everywhere when he saw quality, ruthlessly cutting his losses when he made a mistake, seeking advice wherever he could, but so well known for his ferocity that often his best friends were too afraid to tell him the truth. One man, who never hesitated to give him his honest opinion was Stephan Bourgeois, who on his first visit to this country advised Sir William to throw out some twenty canvases, and exchange them for others of more permanent worth. Sir William, far from being enraged by this wholesale slaughter, acted on the suggestion, handling the exchanges tactfully and with resultant benefit to his collection. Later, he was equally willing to take advice from Mr. Bourgeois on purchases of the then revolutionary French moderns.

The quality of his Spanish paintings is strikingly indicated by the Velasquez "Portrait of a Young Nobleman," which he bought from the Ehrich Galleries under the title of Murillo, and was afterwards assigned to the greater master by Dr. August Mayer, and so described in his publication. Three other works by Velasquez, including two portrayals of Philip IV, create an unusual representation of this great virtuoso of Spanish art.

The Goyas, too, are of amazing quality and range. Two of the finest portraits he ever painted are the ones of the Marques and Marquesa de Castrofuerte, while that of "The Actress Rita Molinos," which Van Horne obtained from the Bourgeois Galleries, comes extremely close to these masterpieces. Several other canvases and a very fine set of sketches depicting the horrors of war complete this outstanding group. Topping the lot we find in the "Portrait of La Casa" what is perhaps the greatest El Greco in existence, and featured in M. Cossio's publication on the master as well as Die Kunst des Greco by Mayer. Another canvas, also of high quality and dealt with by the same authors, is his "Head of St. Maurice," while "The Holy Family With a Dish of Fruit" will be remembered from the Burlington Magazine article of April, 1927.

Another superb portrait is that of a Spanish gentleman by Murillo, which Sir William procured from the Knoedler Galleries. Such a work as this approaches very close to the class in which Rembrandt holds a special place. The masterly characterization, so strongly realized in the face, is carried throughout the body, being emphasized by the firm handling of the right arm and the amazing use of chiaroscuro to light up the hand and beautifully painted lace of the cuff. The rendering of textures is of an almost unimaginable richness, the handle of the sword being especially striking in this respect. The Zurbaran depiction of St. Elizabeth of Hungary is another extraordinary figure piece, being painted with an exquisite coolness in the rendering of personality, together with a wealth of detail in the material of the gown.

In the Dutch group, the Rembrandt head of an old man, acquired from the Bourgeois Galleries, and the "Portrait of a Young Rabbi," formerly in the Maurice Kann collection and obtained by Sir William through Knoedler and Company, are, of course, outstanding, and dealt with in the leading publications on the master. Another portrait and an interesting landscape study executed in 1654 are also noteworthy. The two Hals portraits, depicting a Dutch lady and gentleman, are also extremely well known and discussed by Bode, de Groot and Valentiner. Among the other paintings of this school "Young Girl Reading" by Vermeer, "Old Woman With Bible" of Maes, "Mistress and Maid" by Jacob Ochtervelt and two fine Cuypss should also be mentioned.

A portrait of Philip Melanchthon by Hans Holbein the Younger, formerly in the collection of Horace Walpole, is a work of importance that would add luster to any collection. The Italians number a Titian, several Tiepolos, a Cima and a Lorenzo Lotto fragment, as well as a Guardi "Storm at Sea," of which one realizes the unique character even from the illustration in the Burlington Magazine, October, 1912.

The collection of modern French is really extraordinary when you remember that it was made prior to 1915. The Cezanne portrait of the artist's wife, acquired from the Bourgeois Galleries, "La Toilette" and "Neapolitan Girl" by Renoir, which Sir William bought from Durand-Ruel in the Nineties, all testify to the collector's foraging spirit that would have ranked him, had he lived, among the foremost collectors in this field. In the earlier work, six Monticellis are of such a quality that anyone desiring to study the artist's work would have to go to this collection, or to Scotland, also noted for its fine examples of this artist. Again, the Corots are outstanding—an artist where it was at one time so easy to go wrong—among them being two acquired from Durand-Ruel in the very early days of collecting. Five Daumiers constitute a superb group, headed by the "Nymphs pursued by Satyrs," exhibited in the Paris Salon of 1850. Four fine Delacroix, a Courbet still-life, a Boudin, two Toulouse-Lautrecs, and examples of Sisley, Monet and Pissarro indicate the range of representation achieved at that early date.

The British works number examples of the XVIIIth century portraitists, among which the Hogarth portrait of a little girl, obtained from the Knoedler Galleries, is especially fine, as well as a Gainsborough landscape, a Turner, and an "Old Crome" and Morland of some note. In relation to the rest, the American group does not seem remarkable, except that one notes that Sir William early got on to Ryder, his "Constance" being mentioned by Roger Fry in the Burlington Magazine of April, 1908.

In the Oriental field, Sir William had an outstanding collection of Chinese potteries, as well as one of Japanese wares unique outside of Japan. It is especially interesting to observe that this astute collector owned a Chinese painting of a Tartar Huntsman, purchased from the Bourgeois Galleries and reproduced in Binyon's classic Painting in the Far East.

Landscapes, Marines and Subject Pictures Varied in Treatment—Entrants for Architectural Medal

Graced by the presence of Their Excellencies the Governor-General and Countess Bessborough, the fifty-fourth exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts opened with a private view in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, last night.

The exhibition from all angles is a successful one—the representation of painters who have "arrived" is large, there is a fair proportion of work by artists of promise, and, further, there is evidence that the jury of selection has, as ever, shown an open mind in giving place on the walls to paintings that, while in treatment opposed to what is commonly understood as "academic," are generally accepted as signifying a phase of Canadian art. The works in this group are at least coherent examples and are calculated to exemplify the better points in the aspirations of this school.

The black and white section is not large nor has the sculpture in size destroyed the balance. In architecture there are 90 items—photographs of buildings submitted in competition for the medal of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada. Landscapes at varying seasons of the year predominate and portraiture occupies an important place.

E. Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., is well represented by portraits done in his accomplished manner, his examples being, G. H. Duggan seated at ease with a pipe in his hand; W. Perkins Bull, K.C., in robes, a strongly handled work, and "La Poudreuse"—a lady, with fur-edged cloak fallen from her shoulders, seated at a small table and taking a final glance at the mirror before departing for a dance. In arrangement this painting is distinctly happy and the textures of the various materials well suggested. Ernest Fosbery, R.C.A., sends three portraits among them, Admiral Sir Charles Kingsmill in uniform with decorations, and the Hon. P. E. Blondin, Speaker of the Senate, who is robed and seated in a richly-colored chair, seems alert to what is going on in the Red Chamber. Kenneth K. Forbes, A.R.C.A., has a striking portrait of his attractive wife dressed in green, and one of Captain Melville Millar in a trench coat. Alphonse Jongers shows his skill in the head of a long-haired girl, called "Meg," and a portrait of the Hon. Chief Justice Greenshield, in a brown suit with carnation in his button-hole, seated in the quiet of his study. Arthur Gresham has a strongly painted portrait of Wm. Gray Mitchell in evening dress and a work of sound values and good arrangement is "One of Them"—a killed man seated in the open under a spacious sky by Stella Grier, A.R.C.A. Firm in touch is Barbara Barber, by Harry Keating, and there is an old English portraitist setting of Miss Allison, by Barnes. Nice in pose the handling of greens is portrait of Miss Constance by Marion Long, A.R.C.A., and Kennedy, the poet, proves genial subject to Thos. Macdonald. Mrs. Lillas Torrance, A.R.C.A., shows a portrait of Robert Mackay, and of a girl, "Tanya," which is effective in arrangement and good in tone. R. S. Hewton, A.R.C.A., is represented by "Portrait of T.A."—a seated man with a cigarette. Allan Barr, A.R.C.A., in "The Toast," shows a standing man with wineglass before a table with flowers and fruit.

LANDSCAPES ARE NUMEROUS.

Landscapes, marines and subject pictures make a large group. J. W. Beatty, A.R.C.A., shows his fresh, vivid color in "Brook's Falls, Magallowan River" with its sunlit and shadowed water rushing over rocks, and in "Autumn, Beaver Lake" where a sense of solidity is imparted to the rocks. He also has two winter scenes.

Harry Britton, A.R.C.A., has an effective composition in "The Goat Farm"—a woman with her charges breasting a knoll, and a summer atmosphere in "Italian Women Washing" which shows a group about a fountain with a bit of vivid blue sky framed by an archway. Clouds occupy Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., in "Evening" and "Summer Clouds." Harold Beament has been happy in his arrangement of light and shade in "Sponge Trimmers, Nassau"—colored workers loading baskets backed by a heap of yellow sponges under a blue sky. A man carving a picture frame in a workshop, entitled "Chisels and Wood" is from the brush of Mrs. Henrietta Britton, and Archibald Browne, R.C.A., is effective in his low-toned landscape "The Day's Ending."

Robert W. Pilot, A.R.C.A., is represented by "Winter Twilight, Levis," which is a big step forward in the handling of subtle values and the placing of figures and vehicles at the south shore ferry. Dusk is falling fast and in the mirk a steamer is pointed through the floating ice to Quebec which is silhouetted against the darkening sky. In the foreground snow stretches to the landing where a ferryboat is releasing its load of passengers and sleighs. By this painter, too, is a decorative canvas, "The Flying Canoe." Based on the old legend, Mr. Pilot has ignored the usual season—the winter, and takes perfectly justifiable licence in setting it above a misty Laurentian landscape, with church and buildings beyond the screen of birches in autumn leaf in the foreground, and carpeting the grass with trilliums and violets. This mural decoration, the property of John H. Molson, in composition and color is a thing of beauty.

Four marine and shore scenes by the late G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., remind the picture-lover of the loss suffered in the passing of this sterling painter. His love of the sea was sincere, and as his art ripened he was ever revealing new beauties in the rocky coasts under varying atmospheric conditions. Here shown are subjects closely identified with his brush—a clam digger, a quiet haven and the silveriness of foam breaking on rocks at evening.

Entrants for medal of Royal Architectural Institute of Canada: Hugh L. Allward, Barott and Blackader, Murray Brown, Henry J. Burden and G. Roper Gouinlock, S. B. Coon and Son, Ernest Cormier, Craig and Madill, A. T. Galt Durnford, H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, Robert and F. R. Findlay, A. L. Hazelgrove, Henri S. Labelle, John M. Lyle, Marani, Lawson and Morris, Mathers and Haldenby, Maxwell and Pitts, J. Cecil McDougall, Molesworth, West and Second, Forcay Page and Steele, G. A. Poitras, Dyce C. Saunders, W. L. Somerville J. Francis Brown and Son, Twizell and Twizell, Mackenzie Waters.

Frederick S. Challener, R.C.A., has a sunny atmospheric work in "The Road to Mattawa," and A. J. Casson, A.R.C.A., shows his usual facility in two watercolors, the suggestion of cold being well conveyed in "Mill in Winter." In the same medium is Paul Caron's typically handled buildings, habitation and sleigh in "18th Century Houses, St. Vincent Street, Montreal." F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., remains faithful to the winter season with open roads or sheltered bush and men handling or hauling logs. Alice DesClayes, A.R.C.A., is sympathetic to horses and has a well arranged subject in "La Plage." Berthe DesClayes shows flaming maples edging a field being ploughed in "October," and Gertrude Des Claves, A.R.C.A., shows one of her most recent and best works in "The Pearly King"—a coster and his young son in traditional garb. Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., has a work of nice values in "At Sunrise"—stretch of landscape and distant hills, and sounds a dramatic note in "The Squall," in which, under a darkening sky, bare trees bend to the blast. It is a vivid and convincing impression produced by the simplest of means. Henri Fabien has a portrait of a dancer and "Dancer Exercising Nude"—a subject more ambitious than attractive. A vivid watercolor impression of a sunlit white buildings with carriages is "Palais Ugocioni," Florence by Willford A. Gagnon. A well-controlled "wash" watercolor is the unassuming landscape "Near Dundas," by John S. Gordon, A.R.C.A. Clare Hagarty, A.R.C.A., shows good drawing and color in her flower pieces, and Fred S. Haines, A.R.C.A., reveals a downright style of painting in his landscapes, especially effective in arrangement being "Winter, Mary Lake." John Hammond, R.C.A., has "Bay of Fundy, N.B." and there is much that is attractive in the firmly painted "Chateau de Ramezay," by Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A.

DECORATIVE CANVASES.

Arthur Heming reveals a decorative sense in "Canadian Jam Crackers" and "Canadian Timber Cruisers"—the first men meeting sudden death in white water as logs thunder down falls, and the latter boatmen on a timbered stream under snow. Frank Hennessey depicts winter in pastel—broadly handled works, though the piled up harvest of "The Ice Sawyer" lacks gleam and transparency. Charles W. Jefferys, R.C.A., shows his old skill as a watercolorist in attractive landscapes in Canada and Jamaica, and in the same medium Hugh G. Jones has an effective Venetian scene. In watercolor, too, is a "Peonies" by Ruby LeBoutillier, which shows an advance in composition and tone—the pink blooms in the blue bowl making an engaging color scheme. Emile Lemieux has an excellently painted winter scene at Val Morin.

Congenial material from Nova Scotia for the subject of two painting by Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A., who shows a stricter regard for readily understood forms. Manly Macdonald, A.R.C.A., is worthily represented by "The Ravine, Winter," and F. H. McGillivray, A.R.C.A., has found sympathetic material in Quebec, Jamaica and England. Herbert S. Palmer, A.R.C.A., remains true to the rolling country and pasture lands of Ontario with evident ability in painting cattle, and Elizabeth S. Nutt, A.R.C.A., shows a solidly-built old English bridge with an angler in the stream. Chicoutimi Basin has given Mrs. Jean Munro a good subject, and Gaspe still reveals beauties to Rita Mount, Mrs. Jane C. Luke is effective in a flower study, and there is a typical bit of old Quebec by Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A.

"The Old News Shop," by Hal Ross Perrigard, A.R.C.A., is a capital bit of painting of an old landmark known city-wide as "Mill-loy's." The quaint structure is handled in a sympathetic manner and the work has historical value in view of the rapidly changing aspect of St. Catherine street. W. J. Phillips has a good watercolor in "Margaret in Rumanian Dress." Besides etchings, Herbert Raine has watercolors done at Metis Beach, and there is vigor to the works of G. A. Reid, R.C.A.—"The Dark Canyon," "Lake Timagami," with its rain breaking on a distant hill, and the two figures examining a find, entitled "Gold." "Winter Evening"—church, building and river by Albert Robinson, R.C.A., is typical of his present artistic convictions, and Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A., besides a solidly painted ocean freighter, find a mixture of old and new city buildings interesting material. A. Sherriff Scott has an ambitious landscape with figures called "Summer Afternoon"—a woman has laid her book aside and views the scenery, while nearby is a partially clothed boy. Rocks, water and hills fill the background. It is a departure from the low-toned portrait of a lady with a portfolio shown at the Spring Show.

Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., is represented by three works—"Christmas Day" having those picturesque elements—old houses, sleighs, snow and figures which make the festival so attractive in habitation districts. George Thomson has attractive color in his painting of trees, water and cloudy sky, called "Spirit of the Georgian Bay." An old house under snow at night is effectively presented by Thurstan Topham, and Homer Watson, R.C.A., shows a glimpse of boisterous weather in "Drovers Cabin in Clearing Weather." Henry Simpkins has invested with solity "The White Pine," and Stanley Royle has two Nova Scotia scenes that are handled with fence.

VISITE DES SALLES

Selon une tradition précieusement conservée, il était réservé au gouverneur-général d'inaugurer hier soir, à la Galerie des Arts, le Salon annuel de l'Académie Royale canadienne. Devant une assistance élégante et nombreuse lord Bessborough, accompagnée de lady Bessborough, procéda à la simple cérémonie d'ouverture puis fit le tour des salles. MM. E. Wyly Grier, président de l'Académie, et W.-S. Maxwell, vice-président, leur présentèrent les hommages de l'Académie Royale et leur souhaitèrent la bienvenue.

Dans sa réponse lord Bessborough rappela que depuis la fondation de l'Académie Royale canadienne par le duc d'Argyll, il y a cinquante-trois ans, tous les gouverneurs se sont intéressés de près à l'oeuvre et ont voulu inaugurer les Salons annuels, une tradition que lui-même tient à conserver.

Son Excellence fit ensuite de fort judicieuses remarques sur la leçon qui doit se dégager de toute grande exposition d'art national: l'art doit donner le ton à l'artisan et par là influencer profondément sur la culture de la Beauté chez le peuple et dans la vie quotidienne.

L'artiste dicte la formule

Le commerce dépend directement des écoles d'art, qu'il le sache ou non, pour la présentation ou le ton de ses produits. L'artiste est comme le médecin qui prescrit la forme et la matière de la pilule; le manufacturier est le pharmacien qui remplit la prescription et c'est au public à avaler, conclut en badinant le gouverneur-général.

De célèbres exemples montrent le bien qu'un pays entier peut retirer d'une grande exposition artistique. N'est-ce pas à la suite de l'Exposition internationale de 1851 à Londres que le peuple anglais comprit, combien l'art s'était divorcé chez lui de la vie quotidienne et entreprit de progresser immensément dans ce domaine? L'Exposition de Philadelphie en 1876 eut pour effet d'ouvrir les yeux des Américains là-dessus et ils multiplièrent depuis les écoles d'arts et métiers pour répandre la culture du beau.

Il reste encore du chemin à faire au Canada à ce sujet. L'art doit amener un réveil de l'artisanat de bon aloi et du goût chez le peuple. Il reste à s'entourer davantage d'objets qui ne soient pas aussi laids que pratiques. Le Canada est jeune; la tradition ne pèse pas d'un poids aussi lourd sur nous; la voie est ouverte à de grandes réalisations.

Leurs Excellences visitèrent ensuite les salles d'exposition et le café fut servi dans le Salon des gravures.

Follows Tradition Half a

Following a tradition over half a century old and a custom established by the Duke of Argyll when he was Governor-General of Canada, His Excellency the Earl of Bessborough, accompanied by Her Excellency, last night attended the opening ceremony of the Royal Canadian Academy's annual exhibition held in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal. Before a distinguished gathering, His Excellency declared the exhibition open and then proceeded on a tour of the galleries.

Their Excellencies were welcomed by E. Wyly Grier, R.C.A., president of the Royal Canadian Academy, his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Crawford Grier, of Lennoxville, W. S. Maxwell, vice-president of the Academy, and his daughter, Miss Mary Maxwell, who had all previously received the members and their friends. Their Excellencies, who were accompanied by Lt.-Col. E. D. Mackenzie, Comptroller of the Household, Hon. Mrs. Gordon Ives, secretary to Her Excellency, and Lieut. Sir Michael Culme-Seymour, A.D.C., were escorted to the First Gallery, where a few words of welcome were extended by Mr. Grier, on behalf of the Academy.

In responding His Excellency said:

"Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

"It is a great pleasure to me to perform the opening ceremony of the Royal Canadian Academy's annual exhibition tonight. The Academy, as you all know, was founded by my predecessor the Duke of Argyll, 53 years ago, and since then every Governor-General has, I think, had the privilege of officiating at one of its annual exhibitions. That is a tradition, over half a century old. I should be very sorry indeed to break such a chain and, tonight, I am very glad to be able to add yet one more link to it.

"Now I do not propose to say much of this year's exhibition, because, like most of you ladies and gentlemen, I have not yet had the pleasure of seeing it. I will only say that I am confident it is up to the high standard usually set by the Academy, and that I fully expect that confidence to be justified when I have the opportunity of seeing some of the pictures in a few minutes time.

LESSONS CAN BE TAUGHT.

"But, since I am to have the pleasure of addressing you, I should like to make some reference to the influence which exhibitions in general can exert, and of the lessons they can teach—lessons which are of considerable importance, not only to the individual in his, or her, home, but also to those engaged in commerce. For—and this is a fact that is often overlooked—commerce is entirely dependent upon art for its designs. Every design which goes to make a commercial product interesting, attractive, and, therefore, saleable, owes its first origin to the Art school. If I may use a homely simile, the artist is the physician who prescribes the shape and constituency of the pill; the manufacturer is the chemist who compounds it; and the great public is, as always, the suffering patient who has to swallow what the experts consider good for him.

"Now, this process is certainly affected by the holding of exhibitions of the products of Art. The great International Exhibition, organized in London by the Prince Consort in 1851, is a classic instance. There is no doubt that this Exhibition revealed to the British people the fact that, compared to the French, they were manufacturing ugly things instead of beautiful things, and that Art had become entirely divorced from everyday life. It is to the credit of the British that, this revelation having been vouchsafed to them in the glittering halls of the Crystal Palace, they set to work with characteristic energy to remedy their shortcomings; the remarkable growth of Art galleries and Art schools in the last half of the 19th century was the immediate result, and, as a remoter result, we now see British design holding its own throughout the world today.

"In the United States of America, the Philadelphia Exhibition of 1876 achieved a very similar revolution of public taste; the remedy applied was also the same, and we know that in the past 50 years our neighbors to the South have spent literally hundreds of millions in developing Art schools and Art museums, with results that have had an immeasurable effect on the growth and progress of their coun-

MORAL FOR CANADIANS.

"There is, it seems to me, a moral in all this which we in Canada might well take to heart. Although great progress has been made in the past century, Canada has still, I think, to realize how great a part the national art-institutions of any country must play in bringing about a renaissance of national taste; and even more important, a renaissance of that good craftsmanship which can only be created when demanded by national taste.

"The nineteenth century nearly succeeded in making an unbridgeable gulf between 'fine art' and the things we use in every day life; it tended, generally speaking, to make impossible any connection between the work of the artist and the work of the craftsman and the designer. The result, as we all know, was that the shops of the retailer and the homes of the consumer were full of articles which, if durable, were irredeemably hideous.

"So, in the present century, it has been one of the major tasks of both artist and public to bridge that gulf; to make ourselves, as a people, appreciative of beautiful, rather than tolerant of ugly, things; to demand good design in our surroundings; and to be content with nothing less than beauty and suitability in every detail of them.

"In the discharging of this task, exhibitions can do much. But the Royal Canadian Academy, with its honorable history of half a century's pioneering as a professional Art-institution, has, I think, a further duty, extending beyond the boundaries of annual Exhibitions, however excellent these may be. And it is in the very direction that I have just tried to indicate—in the practical realms of improving public taste and educating the younger generation, that that duty lies. There are immense possibilities. Canada is a young, a forward-looking country. She is not so heavily burdened by tradition as Europe; and part of her great inheritance surely is that she is singularly free to express her own individuality in every form of Art and Craft."

OFFICERS ENTERTAIN.

Their Excellencies then made a tour inspection of the exhibition, and expressed great interest in many of the pictures. Later Their Excellencies were escorted to the Print Room, where they took coffee with the president and officers of the Academy and the president and officers of the Art Association of Montreal prior to their departure.

Her Excellency wore a gown of midnight blue velvet with a long train and her ornaments were pearls and emeralds and diamonds. The Hon. Mrs. Gordon Ives was in a gown of dark green satin on princess lines with the skirt finishing in a short train. Governor-General Opens Annual Art Exhibition

Star Nov. 17, 1933.

His Excellency Recalls Traditions of Predecessors—Stresses Art's Part in Renaissance of National Taste

CANADA has still to realize how great a part the national art institutions of any country play in bringing about a renaissance of national taste. His Excellency the Governor-General declared last night at the opening of the Royal Canadian Academy's annual exhibition in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, 1379 Sherbrooke street west. Lord Bessborough followed a custom established by an illustrious predecessor, the Duke of Argyll, in opening the exhibition, which has been successively opened by all Governors-General of the Dominion since that time. Those who welcomed Lord and Lady Bessborough were E. Wyly Grier, R.C.A., president of the Royal Canadian Academy, his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Crawford Grier, of Lennoxville, W. S. Maxwell, vice-president of the Academy, and his daughter, Miss Mary Maxwell, who had all previously received the members and their friends.

FOUNDED 53 YEARS AGO

Responding to Mr. Grier's address, His Excellency said:

"It is a great pleasure to me to perform the opening ceremony of the Royal Canadian Academy's annual exhibition tonight. The Academy, as you all know, was founded by my predecessor, the Duke of Argyll, 53 years ago, and since then every Governor-General has, I think, had the privilege of officiating at one of its annual exhibitions. Their Excellencies Open

Exhibition at Art Gallery.

Well over a thousand guests attended the private view of the 54th annual exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy at the Art Association of Montreal last night, when the Governor-General of Canada, following a tradition over half a century old and a custom established by the Duke of Argyll when he was Governor-General of Canada, accompanied by Her Excellency, attended the opening ceremony of the exhibition. Their Excellencies were welcomed at the foot of the grand staircase by Mr. E. Wyly Grier, R.C.A., president of the Royal Canadian Academy, his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Crawford Grier, of Lennoxville, Mr. W. S. Maxwell, vice-president of the Academy, and his daughter, Miss Mary Maxwell, who had all previously received the members and their friends. Their Excellencies, who were accompanied by Lieut.-Col. E. D. Mackenzie, Comptroller of the Household, Hon. Mrs. Gordon Ives, secretary to Her Excellency, and Lieut. Sir Michael Culme-Seymour, A.D.C., were escorted to the First Gallery, where a few words of welcome were extended by Mr. Grier, on behalf of the Academy, and His Excellency then addressed the assembled guests. Their Excellencies later made a tour inspection of the exhibition, and afterwards were escorted to the Print Room, where they had refreshments with the president and officers of the Academy and the president and officers of the Art Association of Montreal prior to their departure.

Her Excellency wore a gown of midnight blue velvet with a long train, slippers to match, and her ornaments were pearls and emeralds and diamonds. The Hon. Mrs. Gordon Ives was in a gown of dark green satin on princess lines with the skirt finishing in a short train. FINE WATERCOLORS
BY W. J. PHILLIPS
Prairies, Pacific Coast and Lake of the Woods Inspire Subjects
Gazette Nov. 21/33
MASTER OF THE MEDIUM
Collection at Watson Art Galleries Shows Winnipeg Painter Sympathetic to Best English Traditions.

Watercolors of widely differing types of country by Walter J.
Phillips, R.C.A., of Winnipeg, grace the walls of the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west.
The collection shows how expert is this painter in handling the exacting medium and how thoroughly he has based his art on the best traditions of the English school—sound drawing, good design and fluid wash.
To attain this desirable trinity of essentials the artist must mentally see his work complete before his brush touches the paper for the medium permits of only minor correction or revision—lessening or intensifying passages of color—without showing it. The prime charm of a good watercolor is its spontaneity, and the impression of this quality Mr. Phillips has imparted to the works on view. While possessing a marked individual style, this painter never pushes it to the extreme of mannerism. That he is open-minded as to subject is evident by his selection of subjects —scenes on the Pacific coast, in the region of the Lake of the Woods and prairie vistas. To these he has given their distinctive character under varying atmospheric conditions.
In the first-named series there are a number of fine items, well designed and cleanly treated. "Jim King's Wharf, Alert Bay" is a convincing presentation of old wooden buildings on log piles, with a man on the staging talking to a man in a dugout canoe. Across the water, mountains lose their peaks in mist, and capitolly handled are the reflections of the wharf. "The Road, Alert Bay"—buildings on fence-enclosed land, the highway and the stranded, bleached roots of a huge tree that forms a haven for a moored boat at the edge of water that stretches to a timbered shore, backed by mountains, is a work of good design and color. Impressive is "Memorial Totems, Alert Bay"— the carved images against a darkening sky, with, backed by a stretch of water, two tourists viewing the totem poles. "Cormorant Island" features a stranded, bleached tree near rocks on a pebbled strand and, beyond the expanse of water, mountains swathed in mist. "King-come," shows snow-capped mountains above a band of mist, out of which in the foreground rises a huge carved wooden figure with arms upraised. Clear of the mist, a man works with a scoop-net from a dugout canoe. "Kingcome River" —restful in spirit and mellow in tone, reveals a man in a canoe in the stream, with, between the trees and hills that rise from the high bank, a glimpse of distant snow-capped mountains. "Indian Village, Alert Bay" features totems before the wooden houses that line a street leading to a cannery, and "The Waterfront, Alert Bay," with its buildings, water and misty mountains, shows a totem pole flat at the edge of the shore.

MIST AND STEADY RAIN.
There are other interesting items in this series, but as an expression of that dolefulness that comes with seemingly incessant rain "Simoon" touches a high mark. The group of buildings near the shore, the booms of big logs and watercraft look wet, roofs gleam with moisture and mist almost obliterates the smoke from stacks and the distant wooded shore. The drum of rain on roofs can be imagined. In "Johnstone Straits" gulls make a decorative pattern against the cloudy sky.
Free in handling and admirable in the massed arrangement of sunlight and shadow is "Vista Lake and Mount Wymper." Part of the huge mountain and wooded hill beneath are shadowed, while timber to the right is in full light. The tone of the greenish water is effectively caught. This work is big in feeling and broad in treatment.
"The Assiniboine River" is seen in quiet mood, with shacks on the opposite bank, and in the foreground a girl in a check dress near a yellowed poplar.
Views from the prairies include a roadway lined by trees in autumn leaf; a group of barns with cattle and a horseman; "Country Elevator, Brunkild, Man., with a grain cart entering a shed at the base of the elevator; and "St. Agathe, Man.," which well suggests limitless, flat country. In this a church spire rises about a group of buildings and telegraph poles line the road.
From the land of rocks and water come a number of engaging works—"Rushing River" with spruces and birches edging a stream that tumbles in white water near big lichen-covered rocks. The crisp treatment of the water and the dexterous employment of the pure white paper in the falls are telling notes. "Hanging Rock Island" suggests weight and bulk in the rocks which edge water near pines. "Mud Lake" with its wooded setting is a midsummer scene, and "Laclu" shows an expanse of water with wooded rocky islands in autumn. Bits about this section have inspired "The Bather" and "Against the Sun," the latter being a daring experiment which will be understood by the observant lover of nature—a stretch of water, partly masked by a birch, which catches the gleam of the sun in a broad band, while near the rocky shore the ripples are dancing spots of light.

DUTCH LANDSCAPE PAINTINGS SHOWN
Gazette 24/11/33
Work of J. H. Van Mastenbroek on Exhibition at Scott Galleries
The familiar characteristics of the Dutch scene may be viewed in a collection of landscape paintings by J. H. van Mastenbroek which is being shown at the galleries of W.
Scott and Sons, 1490 Drummond street. The pictures form a part of the collection brought to Canada by Harry Wallis from the French Gallery, London, England, and depict chiefly the canals, streets and scenes in and about Rotterdam where van Mastenbroek was born.
The painter is recognized as one of the best living Dutch artists and is ranked by experts with masters like Bosboom and the Maris Brothers. His pictures have all the atmosphere of the Low Countries, its cloudy skies, its deep brown tones, and, above all, its peculiar and romantic melancholy.
There are nineteen landscapes in the exhibition. They might be styled a set of variations on a Dutch theme, that theme being the still canals and ancient houses, churches and bridges of Holland.
Each is the work of a master of his medium, a conservative who could not possibly enter into any fight with modern art because he labors in a world completely removed from it and because he could express himself in no other way than he does.
Van Mastenbroek is particularly skillful in depicting light effects in the water of his canals. He is bold in his use of cloud effects. A typically fine effect is obtained in "Evening Clouds," an unusual treatment of sunset.
Other pictures calling for special mention are "Evening, Rotterdam," an expansive water scene; "At Delfshaven" in which great play is made with bold sky effects, and "Dordrecht" which fills a large canvas with a typical Netherlands scene in which the tall cathedral is admirably portrayed. There is also charming work on a smaller scale like "Near Overschie." Occasionally van Mastenbroek becomes something near a realist as in "The Drawbridge" in which he drops his mistiness for the more sharply drawn line.

London, October 27.—Canadian artists and all those who wish to increase their appreciation and knowledge of art, will welcome the arrival in Canada of Prof. W. G.
Constable, Director of the Courtauld Institute and Professor of the History of Art in the University of London, who by now will be delivering a course of lectures in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and Winnipeg on the invitation of the Carnegie Trustees.

Few people are better fitted for this task than Professor Constable.
The study of the history of art and of its application is not in his case a hobby but a life-long work.
A friend who has watched his career from the earliest days has told me that as a young man with no money to spare for travelling or hotel expenses, Mr. Constable found his way to Italy and, disregarding the real privations made necessary by such conditions, spent all his time in galleries and churches there, laying the foundation for his profound knowledge of the history of the arts of painting and sculpture.

After a distinguished career at Cambridge University, where he became a Fellow of St. John's College and Whewell Scholar, he served throughout the Great War, rising to the rank of Major and second in command of his regiment.
The "British Primitives Exhibition" at the Royal Academy in 1923, of which he was the secretary and author of the catalogue, brought him to the notice of that well-known connoisseur, Viscount Lee of Fareham, who, recognizing Mr.
Constable's outstanding abilities, secured for him the appointment of assistant director of the National Gallery, and later on the post of director of the Courtauld Institute, in whose foundation Lord Lee has played so prominent a part.

Professor Constable's visit to Canada, brief though it must necessarily be, will do much to stimulate interest in the development in the Dominion of a body of well-informed opinion on art matters.
The manufacture of art experts, like that of a nation of sailors, is not a matter to be achieved in a day, nor even a year. It must be the result of a long period of intensive study coupled with facilities for research.

The Courtauld Institute exists to provide the means for such study, a fact on which I wrote in more detail on the occasion of its opening ceremony. It is the first institution of its kind in the Empire, a curious fact when one recalls the opportunities for study found in Dresden thirty years ago. But a belated beginning in this country usually means that early mistakes are avoided and the greatest success obtained in the end and it is possible that in the future, owing to its geographical position and exceptional facilities, it may become the most important world centre for the study of, and research in the History of Art.

What makes the Courtauld Institute so alluring to me is the generous provision for the enlightenment of those who are only able to attend an occasional lecture.

The programme of lectures for the coming season that includes talks on every conceivable phase of art, ranging from Islamic Architecture Saracenic, Coptic Russian and Chinese art down to lectures on British art, are many of them open to the public, either with or without a small fee.

Professor Constable himself will open the course of public lectures on British art with a lecture on English painting and English history illustrated by lantern slides on January 15.

One of the lecturers in this series is the Scotch artist Stanley Cursher, director of the Scottish National Gallery. In 1916, in the intervals of fighting on the Somme, he made a series of pencil sketches of life at the front and behind the line, before he found himself in the same ward as a certain Capt. Rogerson in the South African Stationary Hospital at Abbeville.

TWO CONTROVERSIES.
Setting aside things of more serious moment, as the people of these islands are apt to do, two controversies are enlarging the columns of the London press at the present.
One is over the Castle Howard portrait of Henry the Eighth. Is it or is it not a Holbein? Dr. Gans the great German expert on Holbein thinks it is. Sir William Rothenstein boldly says he thinks it is not; and the air is thick with opinions.
I confess that I am not among the 20,000 people who have taken the trouble to go in to Messrs
Spink's shop in King street, St.
James, and see this now famous picture, though I hope to see it soon, but one cannot help agreeing with Sir William that it is a mistake to ask the public to help in the acquisition of this doubtful painting for the nation, when, as he says, "We have among us a few highly gifted men whose talents for mural painting are, without employment, wasted. Here is actual loss of a national asset for which no museum acquisition can compensate."
The work of one of those "Highly gifted men" is at last to find a resting place in Swansea. The 16 glorious panels painted by Brangwyn and refused by the House of Lords as unsuitable, have been given by the Iveagh Trustees to decorate the assembly room of the new Town Hall in Swansea, even though America offered to pay double the £20,- 000 they originally cost Lord Iveagh.

Open Academy Exhibition Herald Nov. 17/33

(Exclusive—by Herald Staff Photographer). The Excellencies the Earl and Countess of Bessborough last night graced with the presence the formal opening of the Fifty-Fourth Exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy, which took place in the Art Association, on Sherbrooke street.

Fine Work Shown At Royal Academy

Rich Variety Seen in Exhibition That Opened Last Night at Montreal Art Association — Well-known Painters And Some Newcomers.

Why painting should have developed so much more brilliantly in Canada than any other art is a problem it would be difficult to solve, but a convincing demonstration that it has is afforded by the Fifty-Fourth Exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, which opened last night at the Art Association on Sherbrooke street.

Splendid Selection

Never before in Montreal has there been an exhibition of Canadian paintings sustaining such a high level of workmanship, displaying such a wide variety of competent effort; and the show is punctuated by the presence of numerous canvasses worthy of very particular consideration. It is a fresh and stimulating collection of paintings which betray a sincere, intelligent attitude toward the problems of attaining modern expression in line and form and color. The committee chose 239 canvasses from about 700 submitted. They seem to have been guided by fairly liberal standards and have accepted a number of pieces that must have been submitted with misgivings by their creators.

There are also, of course, many of the usual, conventional, comparatively unimaginative paintings as well. And there are some that are definitely bad. In fact, it is reasonable to suspect that most everyone who goes will find something exactly to his liking.

Two survivors of the original "Group of Seven", whose work had so much to do with drawing the attention of the outside world to the remarkable development of the visual arts in Canada, have paintings there. Three canvasses by Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, attract attention. Three drawings by the same artist hang in the print room. His restless designs beset the eye with detail and frequently refuse to "read" clearly, but their vigor and forthrightness is beyond challenge.

The other original Group of Seven member is Frederick H. Varley, A.R.C.A., of Vancouver who contributes a small portrait of a woman astonishingly framed, ordinary moulding with white line. It is a beautifully painted but vaguely reminiscent of the work of Augustus John.

The place of honor is accorded as seems proper, to the President of the Academy, E. Wyly Grier, Toronto. In the centre of south wall in the Long Room he has a large, skillfully executed portrait. To the left of it there hangs "La Poudreuse", also by the President, another satisfying portrait in realistic idiom.

Jongers' Portrait

A portrait of Hon. Chief Justice Greenshields by Alphonse Jongers, of Montreal, which also hangs on the south wall demands attention. Its design is pleasing, and a vivid characterization of the distinguished jurist emerges.

Marion Long, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, also has a canvass on the south wall. It is a portrait of Miss Constance Burns, whose well painted costume strikes two pleasant notes of green.

Other portraits of importance include two distinguished canvasses by Mrs. Lillian Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, one of "Fanya" and another of Robert Mackay. Although both are interesting, it is the former which seems the more successful. Thomas Macdonald, of Montreal, contributes an interesting impression of Leo Kennedy. Yulia Birlukova, of Toronto, offers a splendid pastel of a young woman. Randolph Hewton, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, exhibits a painting of a well-known local art critic.

Landscapes and Groups

But it is not the portraits which distinguish the collection, interesting as they are. The outstanding contributions are the landscapes and group studies — much more characteristically Canadian work.

Lawrence Panton, of Toronto, who has exhibited before in Montreal on many occasions, offers two landscapes essentially different from the work he has shown before. At the vernissage yesterday afternoon painters paused before them to discuss their originality with admiration. Both are remarkably beautiful, urbane and restrained, with mobile shapes locked together into an intricate solid design. And the color is as integral as the composition.

Near it there is a painting of two little girls and a rabbit, by Aleksander Bercovitch, also of Montreal. It is done with simple and effective directness that commands acknowledgement.

Andre Bieler, of this city, whose talent for presenting the picturesqueness of French Canadian life without sacrificing any of the more austere canons of art to his literary pre-occupations, has a fine group of Canadian peasants occupied with the baking of bread in an open air oven. Both color and line, in his work, are distinguished.

Etchings, Photographs, Etc.

A large canvas representing a bare-footed woman and a child on a sunlit hillside, by A. Sherriff Scott is striking not only for its judicious use of the landscape background but also for the strength of the drawing in the figures. This Montreal painter, who is well known for his work as a portraitist, has happily succeeded in combining two phases of his Canadian background — preoccupation with the Canadian scene, and his ability to produce convincing images of human beings.

This is to mention but a few of the most important paintings. There is also an interesting exhibition of water colors, of etchings, drawings and illustrations, of architectural photographs, and of sculptural achievements, a number of which are noteworthy.

Quebec Scene

Robert W. Plot, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, contributes "Winter Twilight, Levis", which does not quite live up to the standard his work has set elsewhere. The painting is pleasing enough, but closer examination leads one to wonder why the figures in the foreground are not more carefully articulated. It is not a question of painting lightly, but rather of failing to live upon a well conceived and generally well executed canvas some of the more obvious limitations demanded by the intellect.

Albert Robinson, of Montreal, has a painting called "Winter Evening" which is a delight. Conventionalized hills overlook a Quebec village, taking up and elaborating in restful, quiet design the felicitous shapes in the foreground.

One discovers with pleasure, too, a painting by Graham Norwell, now of Montreal, who has been abroad for some years and has not contributed to the exhibitions here since 1925. "Winter, Ottawa Valley" is its title. The painting betrays a well developed feeling for the subtler shades of design, a lyrical sense of the decorative.

Sponge Trimmers

Among the groups that seem particularly deserving there is "Sponge Trimmers, Nassau", by Harold Beament, of Montreal. Against a mountain of sunlit sponges a dozen or so of black figures are seen at work. It is one of the few subjects in the exhibition which has a definitely foreign, "locale." This tends to make it the more arresting. But the composition is in itself sufficient to hold attention.

Governor-General And Consort Open Academy Exhibit

Fulfilling a long established custom the Governor-General of Canada and his consort, the Earl and Countess of Bessborough, attended the opening last night of the Royal Canadian Academy's Annual Exhibition at the Montreal Art Gallery. A large and distinguished gathering heard His Excellency open the exhibition.

"It is a great pleasure to me to perform the opening ceremony of the Royal Canadian Academy's Exhibition tonight," declared Lord Bessborough. "The Academy as you all know well, was founded by my predecessor the Duke of Argyll, 53 years ago and since then every Governor-General has, I think, had the privilege of officiating at one of its annuals of over half a century. I should be very sorry indeed to break such a chain and tonight I am very glad to be able to add yet another link to it.

"There is, it seems to me, a moral in all this which we in Canada might well take to heart. Although great progress has been made in the past century, Canada has still, I think, to realize how great a part the national art-institutions of any country must play in bringing about a renaissance of national taste; and even more important, a renaissance of that good craftsmanship which can only be created when demanded by national taste.

Their Excellencies were welcomed by E. Wyly Grier, R.C.A., president of the Royal Canadian Academy, his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Crawford Grier, of Lennoxville, W. S. Maxwell, vice-president of the Academy, and his daughter, Miss Mary Maxwell, who had all previously received the members and their friends.

Royal Canadian Academy's 54th Exhibition

The first general impression of this year's exhibition,—the fifty-fourth,—of the Royal Canadian Academy, at the Art Association of Montreal, is that there is more sunlight and fresh air and a greater diversity of subject in the pictures than has been the case in other recent exhibitions. The jury of selection has taken a broad view of its functions and has hung many pictures designed or painted in ways that are certainly not what is usually called academic. At the same time painters of an older school are well represented, among them some of the Academy's senior members. Homer Watson, a past president has sent a large and important landscape, Charles De Belle has two of his characteristic pastels of young children, T. Mower Martin sends one landscape and Archibald Browne three evening and moonlight scenes. There are also four of the last works of G. Horne Russell, scenes on the shores of New Brunswick.

Landscapes do not seem to predominate as much as in former years, though there are many good ones. There are atmosphere and weather in the pictures of Paul Earle, gaiety of color and light in those of Fred Haines, F. S. Chalener and Mrs. Hortense Gordon, as also in those of Arthur Lismer, who has gone much nearer to nature than usual. J. W. Beatty, and, in one by George Reid, Stanley Royle has two vivid pictures of the coast of Nova Scotia, and others to be noticed are by George Thomson, R. L. Wright, Jean Royle, Henry J. Simpkins, A. A. Innes and C. W. Kelsey. It is to be observed that this year the landscape painters have for the most part preferred summer and autumn effects to winter snows.

The portraits in this exhibition are more than usually interesting as pictures. The president, E. Wylie Grier, sends three good portraits, of which one of a lady seated at a dressing table is the best picture, and on the same wall hang Kenneth Forbes' very lifelike portrait of Captain Melville Millar,—the best that he has ever shown in Montreal,—Alphonse Jongers' comfortable picture of Chief Justice Greenfield, and two excellent pictures, one a study in greens the other in reds, by Marion Long. Near by are Ernest Fosbery's dignified portrait of Sir Charles Kingsmill, a small and good head of a girl in red by Patrick Larking and two interesting heads by Harriette Keating. Other more conspicuous portraits are by Archibald Barnes, Frank Shadlock, Henri J. Barnes, Arthur Gresham and Allan R. A boy's head by Charles Scott part of an amusing composition, and there is a certain liveliness with some crudity in Aleksander Berdovitch's picture of two children.

Figure subjects and pictures in which figures have an important place seem more prominent than usual. Gertrude Des Claires "Pearly King," should rather be classed as a portrait,—and it is a very good one,—and the same may be true of George Reid's large figure group, "Gold." Charles Simpson's picture of a habitant Christmas, Harold Beament's West Indian sponge trimmers, Dorothy Stevens nude Negroes, Henrietta Britton's wood worker and Henri Fabien's nude dancer, with the pictures of F. S. Coburn, A. Sher-riff Scott, Harry Britton and Franklin Arbuckle, all contribute to the variety and cheerfulness of the exhibition.

Flower pictures are not very numerous and among the best of them are the naturalistic pictures of Clara Hagarty and the more formal decoration, in water color, of Ruby Le Boutillier. Other more notable pictures are the large decoration, "The Flying Canoe," with a good landscape foreground, by Robert Pilot, the interiors of Freda Pemberton Smith and R. B. Partridge, a still life picture by Dmitry Licushine and the ships and street scenes of Peter Sheppard.

The water colors are few, as always, but good. The landscapes of Charles Jeffreys, D. H. MacFarlane, Hugh Jones, A. J. Casson and W. S. Maxwell and the works of Frederick Cross, Stanley Turner, Peter Hawthorth, Paul Caron, F. H. McGil-livray, A. C. Leighton, and Hugh D. Robertson are among the best. In pastel, two winter scenes by Frank Hennessey and Yulia Biriukova's large portrait are outstanding. There are a fine illumination of the charter of Montreal by J. Charlebois, and two miniatures, a girl's head by Lela Crist and a family group by Mrs. Percival Huffman.

Some of the things that are most worth seeing in the black and white room are the drawings of Louis Muhlstock, J. W. G. Macdonald and Oscar De Lall, the etchings of Herbert Raine, an etching and an aquatint by Frederick B. Taylor, lithographs by Ernest Neumann and Charles Goldhamer, wood engravings by Katherine Gray and W. J. Phillips, and colored woodcuts by Leonard Hutchinson.

The collection of sculpture is largely made up of busts, some of the best of which are by G. W. Hill, Dinah Lauterman, Eric Hannibal and Emanuel Hahn's formalized portrait. There is clever and effective modelling in Elizabeth Wyn Wood's large figure and in two works by H. McRae Miller and interesting or amusing design in Frances Loring's Turkey and Girl with a fish, Henri Hebert's St. Christopher, John Sloan's baby Pan, Henri Fabien's Bacchante and Florence Wyle's "Chicago."

Pictures by Van Mastenbroek

To the collection of pictures brought to Canada by Mr. Harry Wallis from the French Gallery in London and exhibited at Scott's gallery on Drummond street, there has just been added a series of works by the Dutch painter J. H. van Mastenbroek. Mastenbroek, who is considered the most typically Dutch of living painters, takes for his subjects the towns and canals of his own country. As a leading painter of Dutch scenery he has lately completed a big commission to paint views of the most important work in Holland, the great dyke which cuts off the Zuiderzee from the North Sea. The pictures now at Scott's are all canal scenes in or near Dutch towns, with red roofs, church towers, windmills and the big beams of drawbridges, seen under cloudy skies with the heavy atmosphere and the warmth of color characteristic of Holland. There is water in all of them, and the barges and boats and the busy life of the Dutch canals. They have delightful effects of sky and water, freely and apparently hastily but always truly painted.

Water Colors By W. J. Phillips

The work in water color of W. J. Phillips has never been better shown in Montreal than in the exhibition which is now open at the Watson Gallery on Sherbrooke street. This is a collection of western scenes,—of the Pacific coast, the prairies and the Lake of the Woods district,—pleasant places admirably painted in pure, clean water color, with some striking effects of atmosphere and distance got by the simplest and most direct means. Some of the coast scenes, with wharves and totem poles conspicuous in the foreground are among the best of these pictures and two quite remarkable ones are a view of Johnston Straits, with a flock of gulls making a pattern in the sky, and the view of Simoon, seen through falling rain. Others which are remarkable are a view of a mountain with the whole shaded side painted in a single wash and a picture of York boats on a lake, seen by moonlight. Everything that he has painted comes equally well to Mr. Phillips and even prairie farm buildings and grain elevators have been turned to good account for pictorial effect.

Famous Woman A.R.A. Gazette 24/11/33

Mrs. Annie L. Swynnerton, whose death at Hayling Island, England, occurred on October 24, was one of the most distinguished woman artists of her day. Her pictures hang in public galleries in all parts of the world, and, when she was 77 years of age, recognition came to her from the Royal Academy.

It was in 1922 that she was elected an Associate. She was the first woman to be so honored—though the foundation academicians included two women—Angelica Kauffman and Mary Moser.

The daughter of Francis Robinson, a solicitor, Mrs. Swynnerton was born in Vinegrove, Hulme, Manchester, in 1845. Her first training was at the Manchester School of Art, and after study in Rome, Paris and London, she began to contribute to the Royal Academy in 1879. She had come under the influence of G. F. Watts, as a great deal of her work shows, and among the famous artists who admired her work and gave her encouragement were Burne-Jones and Sargent. In 1883 she married Joseph William Swynnerton, a sculptor, who did much of his work in Rome, and until recently she often visited Rome to paint.

During the forty-odd years between the first appearance of one of her pictures on the walls of the Academy and her election to the associateship, Mrs. Swynnerton was a persistent candidate for exhibition. But though her portraits were hung with a fair regularity, her idealistic work did not find the same favor. Indeed, from 1914-1920 she did not appear in the catalogues at all.

Mrs. Swynnerton was a worker to the last, and with hardly impaired skill. In 1930, when she was 84 years old, she had four pictures in the Academy, one of which—a portrait of the late Dame Millicent Fawcett—was bought for the nation by the Chantrey Bequest. Even this year, when her 85th birthday was past, she was engaged in painting "An Image of Desire" and another picture, both intended for the Academy.

Three of her pictures are in the Tate Gallery. Two of them—Chantrey purchases—are "The Convalescent" (hung in the Academy in 1929) and "Risen Hope." The other, which was bought and presented by Sargent is "The Oreads" (1907).

It was one of Mrs. Swynnerton's practices to do most of her painting, even the portraits, out of doors. Another was to paint each picture in the light that suited the subject. Hence one took six successive sittings to complete, and another, "St. Martin's Summer," a like number of November.

Mr. R. R. Tatlock writes in the Daily Telegraph:

Though Mrs. Swynnerton deliberately avoided anything in the nature of sensationalism, her work always arrested the attention of serious art lovers. During the years when the Royal Academy authorities dabbled unsuccessfully in modernist art her pictures were undoubtedly a steady influence.

Technically she was one of the soundest of English painters, and occupied a place of more importance than has generally been allowed in the sequence of great portraitists. Her portraits were always the result of prolonged, intel-

U.S. Professor Claims "Birth of Christ" Incorrectly Titled "Adoration of Kings"

Raleigh, N.C., November 22.—An art-minded professor today announced he has "discovered" through photographic aid one of the world's long lost and most famous paintings—Leonardo da Vinci's "Birth of Christ."

J. D. Paulson, assistant professor of architecture at North Carolina State College, in announcing his findings today, contended the painting for 400 years has been erroneously titled "Adoration of the Kings" and incorrectly ascribed to Sandro Botticelli, celebrated Florentine.

He said inscriptions found on "a perfect photographic reproduction" of the original painting, "which must be on the original if they are on the reproduction," definitely established, in his opinion, the authenticity of the work as Leonardo's.

Paulson, using the reproduction, pointed out where he found on the shoulder of the third man on the right—a young man partly bowed—the letters "LDV, AO. D. 1483," which he contended identified that portrait as the artist himself.

50 CHOICE PAINTINGS FROM AMSTERDAM

Gazette 24/11/33
Collection by Dutch and French Artists at Johnson
Art Galleries

MODERNISTS INCLUDED

Works by Impressionists, Cezanne, Van Gogh and More Academic Men on Exhibition

Dutch and French pictures of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, brought to Canada by P. C. Eilers, of E. J. van Wisselingh & Co. of Amsterdam, make an interesting exhibition at the Johnson Art Galleries Limited, 1340 St. Catherine street west. In this choice collection will be found examples by outstanding painters of varying styles, included among them being works that recall that gallant insurrection in the art world which won for the Impressionists a secure place in the history of painting. Here, too, are works by artists who extended the aims of this group and, ignoring public appeal, painted in a distinctive and original manner. In viewing the paintings by Cezanne and Van Gogh it can be readily understood how their independence madened those following the accepted academic lines. These names crop up glibly in any discussion of the "modernists," but examination of the examples on view makes it plain that these artists in bringing a more personal interpretation and life to painting were far from sneering at the sound fundamentals on which a long line of forerunners based their art.

In this group Paul Cezanne is represented by "La Maison de Zola a Medan"—a strongly painted group of sunlit buildings fronted by trees that are mirrored in the stream. It is directly painted and vivid and clean in color, qualities which it can easily be understood appealed to Gauguin, who once possessed this work. In its setting this house suggests an atmosphere strangely placid when contrasted with the turbulence in many of the books by the great French novelist and fiery defender of Dreyfus—the French officer, degraded and "drummed out," and rehabilitated only after Zola's famous letter opening "l'accuse" stirred public opinion and brought the health-broken man back from Devil's Island to France, where he was finally acquitted of selling military secrets to Germany.

TWO BY VAN GOGH.

Vincent Van Gogh in "Moulin de la Galette" shows a square, wooden windmill with red flag fluttering at its roof against a fresh, cloudy sky. Trees bare and in sparse leaf suggest spring, the impression being intensified by a man, beneath the tall stone wall, tilling the ground. His other work is a self-portrait which is an arresting work in mixed techniques—stippled broken tones in the background and spots and stripes in the coat which is an admirable foil to the fresh, boldly modelled head of a strong-featured man with red moustache and beard. In its firm, crisp touch and clean color this painting of the artist around 1880 is a noteworthy performance.

Of the Impressionist group are works by Pissarro with "Le Repos"—a woman in red sunbonnet, striped blouse and blue skirt lying on grass in sunlight; Renoir with a typical girl in a bonnet against a colorful background done in pastel, and a large oil of a bather. The latter is an important example of this painter's treatment of the nude—a woman, with back to the spectator, against a background of foliage and water. It is powerfully painted, the modelling is convincing and in the flesh tones there is an absence of that hectic red flush which mars some of his works in this genre. By Jongkind, the Dutch exponent of Impressionism, are a marine—marked chiefly by the daring arrangement of a cloud above turbulent water and ships, and "Moonlight," which is lovely in tone and restful in spirit. In this work the moon glows in a cloudy sky above a barge in a quiet waterway edged by trees and windmills. Marius A. J. Bauer, who, without being of the group, betrays his sympathy with its aims—suggestion rather than definite statement—is worthily represented by works which, by their excellence, emphasize the loss to painting by his death last year. "Procession with Elephants" is a fine oil—the ponderous beasts with drivers emerging from the lofty archway of a palace, preceded by guards with shields and lances. Red trappings bedeck the elephants and the blue sky is seen through a distant arch. It is a work full of glitter and movement. In contrast with the glare and heat of this work is an oil in a lower key—Segovia under a stormy, cloudy sky against which are silhouetted the spires of the cathedral and a Calvary on a knoll below which, in the rocky foreground, two ox-carts rumble downwards towards the plain beneath the city walls. The buildings of the city in subdued light are admirably indicated. Silver, mother-of-pearl, and grey are the tones in "Indian Palace"—the building in shimmering light is mirrored in a pool, the darkest note in this work being a peacock in the foreground. Among the water-colors is a free, "washy" impression of figures in a street edged by a white building, called "Natives of Diokjakarta," and a more solidly painted watercolor of lower tones entitled "Street in Foo"—a veiled woman in white on a donkey, with male attendant, in a dark, arched thoroughfare. Monticelli's love of vivid, harmonious color is evident in a landscape and in a painting of bathers in a brook amidst trees. Bright sunlight dapples the foliage and the garments of the women wading in the water. By Daumier is a strongly painted group of varying types—passengers leaving a railway station.

SCENES OF HOLLAND.

In the Dutch group are some landscapes by P. J. C. Gabriel, whose quiet, unaffected art is more engaging on close acquaintance. He attempted no grand flights, but was content to set down the scenery about him—low country with streams and nets drying, waterways with buildings and windmills sheaves in a field, and the quaint farm buildings of the section he knew so well. "Meditation" by Josef Israels shows a young woman seated at a window looking at flat country under a crescent moon. William Maris is represented by

"Cattle in Meadows"—the animals with a calf are deep in grass near a pool, the pasture with a few thin trees stretching to low rolling dunes. By James Maris, painter of canals and waterside town, are five works—vibrant in touch and rich in color. "An Old Flour Mill," with cart being loaded at its base, is an imposing work with its spacious, grey cloudy sky in which pigeons wheel; "Towing Horse"—the white animal against trees near a stream with a barge in shadow, a work of rich tone which was the painter's wedding gift to his artist brother, William; "Bridge, Evening" is broad and summary in treatment—woman with pails attached to a shoulder yoke approaching the structure, while in the stream beneath a man rests in a boat. The other works are typical and good. Mauve is represented by a small watercolor of free, vigorous quality called "Sheep in the Downs"—a flat landscape under a stormy sky, a flock of birds settling in the sparse grass behind the sheep which are being urged forward by a shepherd. In watercolor, too, are "Interior of a Church," and "Coblentz" by Bosboom.

The art of Boudin is represented by a coast scene and by the sea off Trouville with fishing craft under sail. A flooded river with trees and cattle is by Daubigny, and by Weissenbruch is "Shell Gatherers"—a curving sandy shore and man with net near a cart and horse in the water which breaks in gentle waves. The sky is spacious and luminous in tone. Complete sympathy with her subject is shown in "Roses" and "Cactus and Snow-berries" by M. Van Regteren Altena, who imparts a sense of fragility to her blooms and shows competence in the painting of still-life objects.

J. W. Morrice, the Canadian painter who enjoyed wide appreciation in Europe and Canada, is represented by a low-toned winter scene—children descending a rutted road edged by fences and fields under snow. The sky, a leaden grey, suggests that the flurry of snow will develop into a storm.

Paintings by Decamps, Bastart, Jacque, De Bock, Neuhuys, Poggenbeck and Raffaelli, and etchings by Bauer, Witzel, Dupont, and De Zwart are also items in the collection.

Un beau J.-W. Morrice

M. P.-C. EILERS se soucie peu de la publicité. Voilà trente ans qu'à tous les douze mois il vient à Montréal avec une collection choisie d'oeuvres hollandaises et françaises des Contemporains et s'abouche avec sa clientèle régulière. Il a rencontré plusieurs des peintres dont il montre les toiles; il fut l'ami du grand orientaliste que fut l'artiste Bauer. Il vit pour les tableaux qu'il promène avec lui.

Cette fois il a emporté aux galeries Johnson, rue Ste-Catherine ouest, de la part de la firme E.-J. Van Wisselingh, d'Amsterdam, qu'il représente, un choix vraiment trop remarquable de tableaux pour que j'aie le droit de laisser ignorer au public le passage à Montréal de quelques grands modernes. J'en sais plusieurs qui durent attendre jusqu'à l'exposition Van Horne pour satisfaire leur vive curiosité de voir de près des toiles impressionnistes. Eh bien! Van Gogh, Cézanne, Pissarro, Renoir, ils y sont tous chez Johnson de ce temps-ci.

La lumière vibre

De l'étrange Vincent Van Gogh, aussi curieusement Français que Hollandais, M. Eilers montre rien de moins que le portrait de l'artiste peint par lui-même avant que dans sa folie il n'allât se couper une oreille. C'est l'un des meilleurs des six qu'on lui connaît. La barbe rousse, les yeux très bleus, le visage inquiet et tourmenté, Van Gogh a ici 35 ans. La couleur a été appliquée en menues hachures, qui sont comme autant de vibrations de la lumière, et ajoutent à l'inquiétude de la physionomie. De lui aussi, le "Moulin de la Galette", où la couleur pure chante en une fine lumière; l'oeuvre date de la manière parisienne de Van Gogh, sa deuxième, avant qu'il ne se fatigue du ciel clair de Paris pour lui préférer la lumière d'Arles.

De Pissarro "Le Repos", en teintes

effacées, mates, comme assoupies, où l'on sent l'influence de Millet; au milieu de l'herbe, en plein centre du tableau, la seule forme de la fermière endormie. C'est d'un calme extraordinaire.

De Paul Cézanne, que l'on voit très rarement à Montréal, "La maison de Zola à Medan", où, fidèle à ses principes, l'artiste a dégaïgé toutes les formes par le seul jeu des couleurs. De grands arbres verticaux et quelques plans de terrain en horizontale; c'est l'harmonie des verts qui jette une poésie habile sur cette composition en lignes droites.

Il y a de Renoir une "Jeune fille au bonnet" d'un charme subtil fait de demi-tons et, surtout, un nu superbe vu de dos, une "Baigneuse" à la chair fraîche, ronde, où la lumière argentée, chère au coeur de l'artiste avant qu'il ne donnât dans les teintes roses, fait passer comme un frisson à la vue de l'eau froide.

La lampe d'Aladin

M. Eilers montre avec enthousiasme les oeuvres de son ami A.-J. Bauer, le grand peintre orientaliste de Hollande, mort l'an dernier. Ses gravures esquissées en traits rapides, avec sûreté d'exécution et un rare souci de la composition lui ont déjà valu d'être comparé à Rembrandt comme dessinateur. Dans ses aquarelles et tableaux à l'huile il ne fixe que des vibrations, de la lumière et du coloris en action, et cela vit intensément. Nul ne fut plus Oriental d'esprit et d'imagination. Il aimait confesser lui-même qu'il vivait constamment dans les Mille et une Nuits. Spontané, jamais il ne s'est répété; pas une de ses toiles ne se ressemble. Voyez de lui "Procession d'éléphants", l'une de ses meilleures oeuvres, en petits tachotements de coloris; "Palais hindou", en pleine blancheur; "La traversée à gué à Java", où les pâles suggestions prêtent beaucoup d'animation à la scène; "Caravane", aquarelle aux tons délicats à la fois et sonores, etc.

Expressions diverses

Pas une non-valeur dans la collection. Il faut mentionner encore Jongkind, Père de l'impressionnisme: une marine au ciel lumineux et blafard; — J.-H. Maris: des paysages dont le coloris a un chaud éclat et l'expression est majestueuse; — Willem Maris, son frère: une scène de vaches broutant, comme sa palette claire aimait en créer; — Anton Mauve: la charmante poésie des troupeaux; — Bosboom et Th. de Bock: de petits intérieurs d'église dans une lumière froide.

Les contemporains français sont représentés aussi par Boudin: "Barques de pêcheurs à Trouville", eau pleine, mouvementée, et ciel travaillé; "La côte de Benerville", dont il faut admirer le détail des rochers; — Daubigny: "L'inondation", eau grise, très liquide, sous un ciel frais; — Daumier: une petite "Sortie de la gare" où respirent dans une caricature pleine d'humanité des visages de faubourg; — Decamps: "Le Christ à Emmaüs", en tons profonds et poétiques qui se ressentent de l'influence du romantisme et de Delacroix; — P.-J.-C. Gabriel: des paysages calmes; — Ch. Jacque: "Au bercail", toile dont le clair-obscur et le chaud coloris sont bien de l'école de Barbizon; — Monticelli: deux toiles qui sont de son meilleur genre, en petites taches sonores; — Raffaelli: "La Seine à Paris", fini au trait noir, délicat et précis.

Un J.-W. Morrice moins connu

M. Eilers s'est procuré d'un connaisseur local une toile de J.-W. Morrice que d'aucuns estiment l'une de ses plus remarquables. "En route pour l'école" fait excellente figure à côté des tableaux hollandais ou français. Le grand artiste canadien se révèle ici sous un jour qu'on lui connaissait moins; on se croirait en face d'un beau tableau flamand peint par un contemporain. Un groupe de fillettes s'en vont à l'école par la grande route; l'atmosphère est blafarde; le ciel est gris-mauve, la neige est sombre. La scène respire une poésie intense de mélancolie. Le paysage est véritablement breton à certains égards et fait rêver.

Van Mastebroek

EN marge de l'exposition des galeries French de Londres on a consacré tout un mur du salon d'art de W. Scott & Sons, rue Drummond, à dix-neuf toiles de J.-H. Van Mastebroek, le maître hollandais que tous les pays et surtout le sien ont comblé d'honneurs depuis 1900.

"Jeune Fille au Bonnet", petit portrait esquissé par Renoir en demi-teintes qui lui donnent un charme discret.

Nul mieux que lui ne sait décrire toute l'animation qui règne autour des ports enfumés et le long des petits quais. Les chalutiers vont et viennent, l'eau s'agite de toute cette activité, l'atmosphère se voile de mille vapeurs, épaisses, tentues, transparentes. Les tons bruns moelleux fondent la scène dans un ensemble harmonieux.

Puis le grand artiste, en manière de repos, aime faire surgir sous le pinceau de limpides visions de canaux endormis, la brume lumineuse des aubes sur les baies bordées d'herbes et parfois des scènes de rues où fond la neige.

"Dordrecht", une vaste toile aux bruns moelleux, est l'une de celles que l'on remarque davantage chez Scott; elle montre sur le bord de l'eau peuplée de reflets une ville d'où surgit la tour carrée d'un temple. A côté, dans un style chantant qui fait contraste et marque la manière plus neuve de l'auteur, un paysage vert très ensoleillé.

PAUL CARON SHOWS GOOD WATERCOLORS

Gazette Dec 11/33

Montreal Artist Effective in Quebec Province Scenes
at Scott's

Depicting the Canadian scene with truth and charm is an exhibition of watercolors by Paul Caron, now on display in the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, Drummond street. An evident admirer of rural Quebec and of old streets and old houses, this Montreal artist invests his work with interest, and the product of his brush makes an exhibition that is worth seeing.

The watercolors are bright and they catch and hold the eye, both because of the subjects and because of Caron's talent in capturing the spirit of the rural countryside and city streets. In his lighting effects he is uniformly good, and his rendition of sunlight falling across the roofs of old farmhouses, over the snow of the countryside, or casting beams down city streets is striking.

Caron, in most cases, has not gone far afield for his subjects. Montreal, Quebec and the rural districts of the province have adequately met his needs.

There is character in Caron's scenes. One, a view of the old Picken's store on Beaver Hall Hill, painted from a sketch made in 1912, is especially good. The single window, the old door, the step up from the street are done convincingly, retaining the original character of the old book shop.

"The Road to Les Eboulements," a rural scene, is another of the works which makes strong appeal. Here is the old French-Canadian farm, backed by distant mountains; the winding road through the snow, and the sleigh with its horse and driver.

There are several other scenes of rural Quebec, mostly of the winter season, that are attractive. One is struck by Caron's evident admiration for the horse. He has one or two in almost every picture; real, shaggy, farm-horses they are. In Montreal he has found several subjects. Bonsecours Market has apparently appealed to him as a setting, as has the Chateau de Ramezay, painted from an angle that makes the historic building an attractive subject. There is, too, a market scene at the base of Nelson's Monument that has attractive qualities.

Caron had depicted the Quebec scene with true understanding and a practised brush. This exhibition, which comprises 35 items, should be seen as an adequate presentation of this Montreal artist's work in water-colors.

PHILLIPS, qui vient d'être honoré par l'Académie Royale Canadienne, expose chez Watson, rue Sherbrooke ouest, de jolies aquarelles dans la meilleure tradition anglaise: dessin net, coloris délicat et limpide. Quelques sujets présentent dans l'agencement du coloris de fort agréables idéalisations, mais en général l'artiste s'en tient à un réalisme charmant. Il arrive même à une ou deux occasions qu'il atteigne sans le vouloir à l'effet de la photographie colorée, sans plus, — exemple: la petite fille au bain.

Ce qu'on aime constater surtout chez Phillips c'est l'extrême facilité de son pinceau. Rien dans ses aquarelles ne sent la retouche. La scène naît tout naturellement; on trouve certaine montagne bleue, par exemple, qui paraît avoir été dépeinte d'un seul coup de pinceau, tant la couleur y est étendue avec assurance. Avec une belle économie de moyens, Phillips atteint à un effet décoratif qui reste en dedans des bornes du réalisme poétique et ne manque jamais d'être joli. Mais où ses aquarelles deviennent le plus intéressant c'est lorsqu'il étudie, comme dans "Simoon", la brume qui tombe sur le quai et dans l'eau, ou des paysages vus directement contre le soleil.

La gravure française

NOUS avons maintes fois parlé de la grâce de boudoir, — disons le mot: de la joliesse spirituelle des gravures de Louis Icart, et mentionné quelques fois déjà les charmants intérieurs de Charlet et les bonnes scènes fermières de Salvator Hugar. Luigini a été cité souvent pour ses vues flamandes sous la neige ou la pluie, décrites avec une agréable limpidité. Mais ce n'est pas là toute la gravure française et il vaut la peine de retourner aux bureaux de M. H.-Y. Guillou, au 4e étage, édifice Old Birks, 1240 rue Union (carré Phillips) pour s'en mieux rendre compte.

Sa collection a pris de l'ampleur depuis la belle exposition tenue chez Morgan l'an dernier. On s'arrête plus particulièrement aujourd'hui

M. Ellers vient d'emporter d'Amsterdam une collection intéressante de Contemporains français et hollandais qu'il a logée à la galerie Johnson, rue Sainte-Catherine ouest. Les impressionnistes y sont à l'honneur. Voici, pour exemple, un portrait de l'étrange Van Gogh peint par lui-même. La couleur appliquée par menus hachures donne à la toile une vibration de clarté dont on peut à peine se faire une idée par la photo.

MODERN LANDSCAPE PAINTERS PRAISED

Gazetée Nov. 25.
Canada Has Notable Group
Worth Encouraging, Says
Prof. W. G. Constable

Canada has a notable group of modern landscape painters who should be encouraged, assisted and supported, as they form a school that is distinctly Canadian and worthy of respect and admiration in the opinion of Prof. William G. Constable, F.S.A., noted English art critic and authority, who lectured last night in the Montreal Art Gallery, under the auspices of the National Gallery of Canada and the Art Association of Montreal.

Prof. Constable mentioned such Canadian painters as Cullen Thomson, Gagnon and Jackson as being among those who comprised the new school of art. "Notable," he said, "because it holds to tradition — and no school can be great without that — and at the same time employs atmosphere and form that are distinctly Canadian and a real part of the country in which the paintings are produced."

The older painters in Canada, he explained, were more attached to the English and the French schools, and their work was definitely associated with the overseas painters.

Prof. Constable dealt in his lecture with modern landscape painting in France, England and Canada. He showed how the basis for the modern idea had been laid by the Dutch and the French, and took his audience up through the 19th century to the present day. He stated that Turner and Constable were among the first to show a definite tendency toward the use of light and atmosphere, and of broken colors in their work. They were followed by the Impressionists, and this school, stated Prof. Constable, was not really revolutionary, but a logical outcome of the work done by Constable and Turner.

Prof. Constable showed numerous reproductions of famous paintings of this period to illustrate the change that had taken place in landscape painting, showing how light and atmosphere had become the dominant factors in the work of the Impressionist school, followed by the Post-Impressionists with their revolt against form and design.

The Impressionists pictured the scene as it might strike the eye at a given moment, Prof. Constable explained. The Post-Impressionists in their work showed more the emotions and feelings of the painter.

Dr. J. W. A. Hickson was in the chair.

A PROPHET IS NOT STAY WITHOUT HONOR

A strong plea for the encouragement of local artistic effort was made last night by Sir Andrew Macphail, M.D., LL.D., O.B.E., in a radio talk sponsored by the Graduates' Society of McGill, in which he spoke plainly of the proneness of Montrealers to belittle the efforts of their fellow-citizens.

The machine age had brought the word "pictures" to mean the products of the screen and practically reduced music to radio offerings. Montrealers would do well to remember their own art gallery and orchestra, for which he suggested special protection by the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, in order that it might not be eliminated from the air by American programs. He added, however, that "not all local singers sing well. If it were not for the foreign element, our week-end radio programs would be even more intolerable than they are."

GOOD LOCAL PAINTERS.

An appeal for encouragement and support for Canadian modern landscape painters was voiced by Prof. W. G. Constable, F.S.A., English art authority, who lectured last night in the Montreal Art Gallery. Among the modern landscape painters worthy of support were Cullen Thomson, Gagnon and Jackson.

Art Head Comes of Noted Literary Family

FREDERICTON, Nov. 28—(C. P.)—William Goodridge Roberts, who has been appointed as the first occupant of a newly established chair of drawing and painting at Queen's University, Kingston, comes from a noted literary family in New Brunswick. Aged 29, he is a son of Dr. and Mrs. Theodore Goodridge Roberts of Fredericton. Dr. Charles G. D. Roberts, noted Canadian writer, and William Carman Roberts, managing editor of a widely known literary periodical in the United States, are uncles. His appointment was made on recommendation of the National Art Gallery.

Born at Barbados, in the West Indies, Mr. Roberts spent the first eight years of his life in England. He came to Fredericton and graduated from high school here. For two years he studied at Beaux Arts, a French-Canadian art school affiliated with one in Paris. During the next few years he continued his studies at the Art Students League in New York, one of the largest of its kind in North America. He was a pupil of John Sloan, famous New York artist.

For the past four years Mr. Roberts has been carrying on his work and instructing private pupils in Toronto and Ottawa districts. He has had exhibits at Hart House, Toronto, and Ottawa, and is now exhibiting at Hart House, Toronto.

ART FACES DANGER OF DISAPPEARANCE

Gazette Nov. 25/33
But Cause Against Machine Not Yet Lost, Says Sir Andrew Macphail

LOCAL TALENT WORTHY

Support of Home 'Industry' Urged Rather Than Disparaging Attacks, Scornful Neglect and Fault-finding

The habit of defaming every artistic endeavor in Montreal for the sole reason that it arises in this city, should be abandoned, in the opinion of Sir Andrew Macphail, M.D., LL.D., O.B.E., who pleaded for the support of native art and warned of the danger of the disappearance of the sense of beauty under the brutality of the machine in a radiologue sponsored by the Graduates' Society of McGill University which was broadcast over station CKAC last night.

"One may go through life, like the sleep-walker in the tragedy of Macbeth, the senses open, but the mind shut," Sir Andrew said. "All the mechanism for the transmission of sound and the display of pictures is designed as an appeal to the senses and a relief to the mind from the pain of thinking."

"In the present state of 'progress' it is the ear that is most fully satisfied. The five senses must be exercised lest they fall into abeyance. It is in vain that one clamors for the kingdom of the intellect unless one is able and willing to pay the price. The price the mechanism demands is too cheap; one gets what one pays for."

Sir Andrew spoke, in part, as follows: "The sense of beauty is the last to come; the first to go. It is a shy creature. After the downfall of Greek civilization, under the brutality of the Roman Empire it disappeared from the world for a period of a thousand years, save for a small remnant which found refuge in the Church. It is in danger once more under the brutality of the machine. When music and musicians, artists and actors are destroyed, the machine will then have nothing to feed upon."

CAMERA DOUBLY FALSE.

"Not all local singers sing well. If it were not for the foreign element, our week-day radio programmes would be more intolerable than they are. Even in radio music there is room to discriminate. In Canada the most popular American music is symphonies. Those who provide our programmes would do well to ask themselves why it is that every purchaser strives for an apparatus powerful enough to cut out the local stuff when he so desires. Bad music is worse than none."

"Pictures to the present generation mean merely the product of the camera. The essence of art is selection—selecting from nature what is beautiful. The artist alone can select. The camera records equally the good and the bad. In most of the 'pictures' one sees the camera is not aimed at nature. A young person under pretense of being educated by the film may think he is looking at a photograph of a celebrated building. In reality he is shown some contraption conceived in the mind of a stage carpenter. The camera is doubly false."

"Possibly this cult of the camera is only a passing phase. The silent picture gave way to the picture that appears to talk; but the public unconsciously tired of the raucous hare-lipped voices that come out of the void. This present month, the Van Horne collection of pictures was placed on view, and was seen by 34,000 spectators whose eyes were opened to their old beauty."

"The machine has not triumphed. The cause is not yet lost. At the moment every city in Canada is turning to the living theatre, and proved their sincerity at the Dominion Festival in April. The Repertory Theatre and the Theatre League have found a new audience. The Montreal Orchestra has given 72 concerts, and is fast approaching the first rank. The exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy now open to the public is the best in the 54 years of its existence. The buildings erected in Montreal the past ten years rival in design and execution the work of the world's architects."

QUESTION OF DUMPING.

"The groups who are interested in these various forms of art ask nothing; they merely offer; they invite informed criticism. I ask on their behalf that we ascribe to the proper cause our failure to give to them a more enthusiastic support, that is, to our own non-chalance and indolence, and not to the pretense that they are unworthy of our notice."

"They ask no public money, although public money could not be better employed. They ask no protection even in a country that lives by 'protection' and by laws against 'dumping'; although the Montreal Orchestra might very properly demand of the Broadcasting Commission protection for at least one hour a week during which the American orchestras, excellent as they are at home, would not be permitted to dump their performances into Montreal, and smother our own."

"One thing more may be asked: that we abandon the habit of defaming every artistic endeavor in Montreal for the sole reason that it arises in Montreal. Let us have courage. If a thing is good, admit that it is good. If we do not know the difference between good and bad, let us admit that, too. We may be as wrong in fault-finding as in praise; but it is better to be generous than to be mean. Let us at least be neutral. To carp is to make the senseless boast that we have heard and seen better things elsewhere."

"The way of art in Montreal is long and hard. We are not yet sufficiently sure of ourselves and are therefore uncertainly fastidious. We demand the best or, at least, the already certified. Impatient of the slow growth in any native art, we join in the clamor for imported books, imported pictures, imported theatres, and imported music. That is all. You will now listen to the Symphonic Strings from New York," concluded Sir Andrew, making reference to the radio programme which followed his address.

French-Canadian Statuettes In Wood Reach Museum

Quebec, December 3.—A collection of 215 statuettes in wood, carved by the French-Canadian sculptor Alfred Laliberté, of Montreal, and purchased by the Provincial Secretary's Department, have arrived at the Provincial Museum.

Divided into three sections, the statuettes represent the work, customs and legends of old French-Canada, showing such familiar scenes as ploughing the fields, the blacksmith's forge, a family gathering, etc.

At present they are being stored at the museum temporarily. They will now be sorted out and exhibited effectively in the art galleries of the building.

Vues de Paris et de Belgique, coins connus de ceux qui ont fait leur tour d'Europe, croqués sur le vif, avec une touche de coloris délicat; hôtels de ville au gothique rayonnant ou tours carrées au centre de l'activité des marchés. Quais paisibles. Puis cette spirituelle boutique de bric-à-brac qui aurait pu être située rue Craig.

Et aussi: Paul-Émile Lecomte: des coins d'Adriatique décorés de feuillures pittoresques et si clairs;—Lochmaria Kerr: cours bretonnes, marines liquides;—Louis Haumont: extérieurs de campagne enveloppés dans une lumière chaude et une brume de poésie;—E.-R. Haumont: ciel mélancolique de Bretagne ou soleil blanc d'Arles qui cuit les pierres;—Maurice Lévis: des marines détaillées bien finies;—Lambrecht: jardins d'Espagne très fleuris, encadrés d'une architecture mauresque;—Grès: tableaux d'une rondeur poétique et subtile à la fois qui représentent les chevaux de hâlage;—Mazi: Silhouettes brunes sous un ciel très élaboré;—Brunelleschi: des pochoirs brillants, dont une japonaise qui attire l'attention;—Francis Roth: charmants moulins de campagne;—André Lafitte: marines limpides, dans toutes les teintes;—Francis Regour: des chevaux solides en action;—d'Allemagne: visions des cathédrales d'Amiens ou de Rouen, au bout des rues anciennes, d'une admirable précision dans le rêve;—Henri Jourdain: des gravures au trait qui sont d'une minutie délicate qui peut paraître un peu sèche;—Van Santen: une procession de peupliers-fantômes le long d'un canal flamand; c'est d'un doux impressionnisme;—Henri Leriche: gravures au pointillé genre esquisses;—sans compter d'anciennes lithographies colorées à la main, d'un fini précieux; des caricatures anglaises d'antan avec leurs caresses immobiles et leurs chevaux minces; et toute une section d'oeuvres des graveurs animaliers.

Quatre des vitraux de l'abbaye de Fecamp, en Normandie, datant du XIVe siècle et envoyés en 1923 à Boulogne-sur-Seine pour fins de restauration auraient été habilement imités et deux d'entre eux auraient été vendus pour 130,000 francs à un riche américain. L'affaire crée toute une sensation. A la demande du ministère des Beaux-Arts, la police fait enquête. Elle a trouvé sur les lieux les deux autres vitraux, représentant des scènes de la vie de S. Louis (tandis que les deux disparus racontent la vie de S. Bernard) et les experts seront appelés à juger de leur origine probable.

Les multiples toiles et oeuvres d'art réunies dans les vastes Salons d'art tenus en marge de l'Exposition de Chicago viennent d'être retournées sans encombre à leurs propriétaires.

Lecture and Exhibition of Fine Arts Club

Star Nov. 28/33

The Fine Arts Club, an older club revived under a new name has begun its activity with a small exhibition which is being held in the Jacoby Studio on Crescent street. Some eighteen artists, some of them well-known in Montreal galleries, have contributed to make an exhibition that is worth seeing. Among the more notable works that are shown are some portrait drawings by Oscar Delall and Louis Muhstock, an oil portrait and an attractive landscape sketch by A. Sherriff Scott, a water colour of two French peasant women by Miss L. Freiman, a flower picture by Clair Fauteux, studies of negroes by A. Lefort and L. Shklar, landscapes, figure subjects and a small design for stained glass by C. W. Kelsey, and landscapes by Wilfred Barnes, C. W. Simpson and N. Raginsky. Other exhibits of interest are by Charles De Belle, G. G. Kaufmann, Ruth Murchison, R. Siden, E. Williamson, V. Graham and H. Mitchell.

At the opening of this exhibition a short lecture was given by Prof. Chambers of McGill, who talked of artistic individuality. He started with the thesis that individuality in portraiture is not to be found in medieval and gothic art and showed the appearance of character, and ugliness, in the work of the renaissance and its later developments. He passed from this to the individuality of artists and mentioned several cases in which genius and eccentricity were united. The address was illustrated with lantern slides of portraits and other pictures.

Montreal Art Association

A very old art, revived and improved, is shown in the little group of miniature portraits in wax by Ethel Frances Mundy, of Syracuse, N. Y., which is being exhibited in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal. The use of coloured waxes for painting is very ancient and miniatures modelled in low relief with coloured waxes, like these of Miss Mundy's were popular in the 18th century, but in reviving the method, she has made an advance by giving special attention to the properties of her waxes and devising mixtures which are specially suited to her work. These little reliefs are pretty but they get something more than mere prettiness from the fineness and truth of the modelling and the skill with which the colours are used and blended. Some of the best of them are portraits of children, several of them full lengths, generally shown against backgrounds of a single colour, though two very good ones have faintly suggested landscape backgrounds; one in which the landscape is more realistic is one of the less successful. They make a rather original and attractive exhibition.

One of the best lectures that has been given at the Art Association recently was that by Prof. W. G. Constable, of the Courtauld Institute in London, last Friday evening. In dealing with his subject, "Modern Landscape Painting," Mr. Constable began at the end of the eighteenth century, with the development of Turner's painting from his early to his late work and with the art of Constable. The more modern painters with whom he dealt were mostly French, and he traced the pedigree of landscape painting from Turner and Constable through Delacroix, through Corot and the other Barbizon painters, through the impressionists, Monet, Sisley and others to the post-impressionists, Cezanne, van Gogh, Pissarro and others. At the end Mr. Constable who is visiting Canada by arrangement with the National Gallery of Canada, added much to the interest of his lecture by showing the connection between Canadian and European landscape painting, citing the work of J. W. Morrice as essentially French, of Homer Watson, as a follower of Constable, and the more strictly Canadian art of Gagnon, Tom Thomson, A. Y. Jackson and others.

A lecture on "Contemporary French Painting," by A. V. Desclos, of Paris, will be given at the Art Association on Tuesday evening, December 5th.

Dutch and French Pictures at Johnson Gallery

The collection of pictures which has been brought this year to the Johnson Galleries on St. Catherine St. by P. C. Eilers from the van Wisselingh gallery in Amsterdam is a particular good one and contains very good and unusual examples of the work of several modern French and Dutch painters. Two of these are by Monticelli, both fairly large, — a very fine one of a group of women bathing in a brook shaded by trees, and a landscape, mostly in tones of brown, with little colour but full of form and space. There are an important Cezanne landscape, of Zola's house at Medan and two good Renoirs, in the larger of which, a cool toned nude, one may admire the painting if not the figure of the model. An excellent little Daumier, "Sortie de la gare," is a row of very characteristic heads. By van Gogh there are a brilliant little sketch of the "Moulin de la Galette" and a portrait of himself, in which clever painting and rather painful truthfulness are combined. Five good examples of Jacob Maris are in this exhibition, and nine of Marius Bauer, one of the best of which is a picture of an Indian palace, very light in tone, almost in gradations of white. With these there are a picture of a rough sea with fishing boats and another by Boudin, a striking picture of a girl asleep by Pissarro, a water color by Mauve, some admirable flower pictures by Mme van Regteren Altena, a number of landscapes by P. J. Gabriel and good examples of the work of Bosboom, Jacques, Neuhuys and others.

Batiks and Pictures

At Eaton's gallery some works in batik by Kenneth Dawson and Lawrence Smith of Toronto are being shown. Work by these artists was shown at the same gallery about a year ago and the present collection, if not quite so large, is just as interesting. Some of these works are dyed on silk, with their pictures sharp and clear, others on cotton, with the softness which comes from the diffusion of the color. One of the most striking is a large one with a centre piece and two wings, of large figures against a white background. The smaller ones, with simple color schemes of reds, browns, greens and blacks, have excellent decorative designs which fill the space with detail.

Nov. 21, 1933 Eleven Honorable Mentions Accorded Photographs of Work Exhibited by Canadian Architects — Various Sections of R. C. A. Exhibition Also Contain Displays

(By R. B. ROLLAND).

MONTREAL, Nov. 20.—Prefaced by a private showing last Thursday evening under the distinguished patronage of His Excellency the Earl of Bessborough, Governor-General of Canada, the fourth annual exhibition of photographs of buildings submitted by architects in competition for the medal awarded annually by the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada is now open until December 17 next at the Sherbrooke street galleries of the Art Association of Montreal. It is being held in collaboration with the fifty-fourth annual exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts. Some 90 photographs, representing work as far east as Halifax, N.S., of architects as far west as Vancouver, B.C., are hanging in the wing of the building in the R.A.I.C. event, and a Canadian Academy of Arts exhibition devoted to Architecture is an interesting layout and elevations of a proposed hotel at Antigua, B.W.I., by Nobbs and Hyde; Perry and Luke have a colored perspective of the residence for Gerald W. Birks, Esq.; Maxwell and Pitts are represented by photographs of Sir Thomas Tait's residence at St. Andrews, N.B., and by a water color of a two family farm dwelling. A photograph of a petit chateau by Raphael Boillard, and a H. Ross Wiggs' small stone house and French Canadian cottage are deserving. John M. Lyle has submitted photos of two keystones over the banking room windows of the Bank of Nova Scotia in Halifax, N.S.

Several architects are represented in the oil paintings, water colors and pastels section of the R.C.A. exhibit. Hugh G. Jones has three water colors, one of Venice, one of a Long Island terrace, and the third, a landscape at Lake Macdonald. A water color sketch by Willford A. Gagnon has Florence as its locale. A Leslie Perry has painted a winter sunset, and

At the Iron Cat, Regd., 2037 Victoria St., a little exhibition of works by George Shirley Simpson, a young Montreal painter, is being held. Most of these are landscape sketches and small pictures of places in Montreal or at St. Andrews East, painted in oil, tempera, or water color. The smaller sketches are the more successful on the whole and include some good studies of light and weather in Quebec woodlands.

The annual Christmas exhibition of the Arts Club is now open in the club's gallery on Victoria St. It contains nearly a hundred works in oil and water color, with a few drawings and prints. Works are shown by Paul Earle, the late George Fox, Herbert Raine, Wilfred Barnes, R. H. Lindsay, Thurston Topham, Hugh A. Peck, Robert Pilot, Jas. McCorrindale, Lincoln Morris, Felix Shea and other Montreal artists.

Hugh A. Peck, evening light, three water colors, one a sketch of at Gaspe by D. H. MacFarlane, and the other two views of Sealteele, G. A. Poitras, Dyce C. Cove, Grand Manan, N.S., by W. Saunders, W. No award of the gold medal of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada was made this year. The granting of this honor is left entirely to the discretion of the committee of judges each year, and it was deemed appropriate to withhold the award for 1933. This step is readily understandable, in view of the dearth of large or paramount construction projects during the past two or three years. The members of the committee of judges were Professor E. R. Arthur of the University of Toronto, Professor Percy E. Nobbs, of McGill University, and J. O. Marchand, eminent architect of Montreal.

Eleven awards of honorable mention in the various classes were made by the judges. The Loyola College chapel exterior, Henri S. Labelle, architect, was so ranked in the Ecclesiastical Buildings classification.

Three honorable mentions were awarded for Exteriors of Public Buildings as follows: to J. Cecil McDougall, for Administration Building for the Protestant Board of School Commissioners, Montreal; to Marani, Lawson and Morris, for North American Life Building, Toronto; and to John M. Lyle for approach to high level bridge, Hamilton, Ont.

Honorable mention was given to examples of Interiors of Public Buildings as follows: To Barott and Blackader, for reception room, Molson's Brewery, Montreal, and J. Cecil McDougall, for detail of board room, Administration Building for Protestant Board of School Commissioners, Montreal.

Robert and Frank R. Findlay, with country residence, of W. W. Ogilvie, Esq., Saraguay, P.Q., and Mathers and Haldenby, with residence of Thomas H. Wood, Esq., Toronto, were given this award for Exteriors of Residential buildings.

Three awards of honorable mention were given for Craftsmanship, viz. to H. L. Fetherston-

Mme de Montigny-Giguère

MME E.-L. de Montigny-Giguère, sculpteur, compte d'ardentes admiratrices et, à son insu sans doute, quelques ennemis. Il y a beau temps que son art est arrivé à sa maturité. L'Académie Royale canadienne lui a rendu témoignage en acceptant chaque année depuis assez longtemps quelques-uns de ses envois. Elle a été formée à très bonne école, sous Brynmor, avant les Beaux-Arts d'aujourd'hui, et sous Laliberté. De cette période d'initiation féconde elle a gardé des principes solides, un goût averti, quelques bustes qui furent des premiers prix à l'école, tel cette espèce de Socrate qui vous regarde avec une bonhomie farouche, et à travers son œuvre des sujets qui font penser à la manière de son maître, tel "Retour en beriot sous la rafale".

Mais la femme a repris le dessus en elle et c'est lorsqu'elle s'est fermée les yeux pour voir défiler devant elle des Madones de pureté ou qu'elle les a ouverts tout grands pour observer les minois d'enfants qu'elle a réussis davantage.

A l'exposition qu'elle tient à son studio, 7944 rue S.-Denis jusqu'au 10 décembre, on se trouve en face d'une sorte de récapitulation à laquelle s'ajoute une série récente de biscuits, — appui-livres, cendriers et chandeliers.

Rêves concrétisés

Plusieurs des rêves qu'elle a concrétisés dans la terre-cuite conservent quelque chose de flou. C'est comme si une fois l'inspiration venue elle en moulaît dans la gâselle l'essentiel seulement. Mais ces imprécisions, parfois même ces gaucheries, empêchent par moments d'admirer sans réserve après que le premier coup d'oeil a plu. Mme de Montigny-Giguère permet volontiers qu'on le lui dise; elle n'est pas de celles qui roucoulent: "Je préfère tel genre de critique, vous savez". Ses sujets ambitieux témoignent de la souplesse de son métier. "L'adolescent et la chimère", par exemple, présente une composition fort harmonieuse. Mais on la préférera dans ces Madones au visage idéalement fin, aux yeux baissés, ou dans toute la série de minois d'enfants, deux à deux, dont elle a saisi tout le charme câlin. Rien de plus caractéristique à cet égard que "Frère et soeur", ces petits visages français si intelligents. Il faut s'arrêter aussi devant les têtes de jeunes filles qui ont une agréable candeur. Pour très naturelles que soient quelques physiognomies de religieuses, vous les moins apprécier; l'expression et le sentiment y apparaissent ins.

Le miracle du feu

D'un Christ taillé dans une expression de douleur vraie, un accident de cuisson a fait un petit miracle; le gaz a rongé dans la terre-cuite des taches qui rendent mieux qu'on n'aurait pu les imaginer le sang coagulé sur le front du Sauveur, la trace des épinettes, les meurtrissures des épaules. L'artiste a des préférences pour cette pièce qu'elle a intitulée "Le miracle du feu" et qui attire particulièrement l'attention. "Maternité" offre sous une forme touchante un symbole courant. "L'épave" ou le cadavre de nymphe renvoyé par le flot, a beaucoup d'inspiration. "Le pas de trois" (bronze), montre un groupe en plein mouvement, et c'est précisément ce qu'il faut attendre des danseuses: qu'elles dansent. La grâce et l'élan de ce petit groupe en font un morceau des mieux réussis. Une couple de sujets anecdotiques, la "Commère" entre autres, ont leur charme assez piquant.

Peintures et biscuits

Comme les terres-cuites, les peintures sont plutôt une récapitulation. Après une intéressante copie d'après Gagliardi, "Marie-Madeleine repentante", le "Petit Chaperon Rouge", par son charme spirituel, et l'"Etude en rose", dans sa grâce italienne, retiennent les regards.

Mme de Montigny-Giguère a fait neuf dans les biscuits. Des tables pleines d'objets disent combien elle travaille. Je ne me réconcilie pas beaucoup avec les chandeliers roses, ni même avec les appui-livres lils d'eau, c'est probablement du goût des femmes, — en tout cas je ne leur trouve rien d'assez particulier. Les cendriers où repose une esquisse de jeune femme nue sont gentils, sans beaucoup plus. Mais qui ne voudrait de ces appui-livres faits d'un volume ouvert d'où se dégagent nettement, comme d'un rêve éveillé, les figures de Shakespeare, de la comtesse de Noailles, etc.? Voilà qui est bien trouvé et travaillé avec goût.

Il reste encore "moults" objets qui valent une visite dans l'extrême-nord de la ville chez Mme de Montigny-Giguère, et elle loge chez elle aussi de beaux exemples d'autres sculpteurs bien connus.

Chez Eaton

LA collection de photographies du "Times", le grand journal de Londres, est exposée de ce temps-ci chez Eaton, à la galerie d'art. Ce sont pour la plupart des paysages et des scènes pris au jour le jour, en marge du reportage quotidien. Il en a été fait un choix judicieux qui a mérité à maintes reprises de faire le tour de l'Europe avant de venir au Canada.

Photos bien représentatives du genre anglais. Là où Russes et Allemands, pionniers de la photographie moderne, eussent cherché en profondeur des effets de perspectives ou des trouvailles d'ombres et de lumières, là où les Français eussent cherché des élégances et de l'élément humain, les photographes du "Times", typiquement Anglais, ont voulu nous montrer dans des scènes paisibles, précises, parfois un peu sèches, le visage de leur pays. C'est avant tout le culte de la nature elle-même, sans personnification, sans autre mystère que le calme poétique. Cette perfection du détail et cette quiétude caractérisent même les scènes d'action, comme la course de chevaux ou le ciel en travail avant l'orage. On reste étonné du fini de certaines photographies qui font tableau. En quelques cas l'emploi des rayons infrarouges, dans lequel le "Times" a été un devancier, atteint à un détail excellent.

Une section à part montre les premières photos jamais prises du mont Everest, lors d'une expédition en avion. Il a fallu une habileté consommée pour saisir sur le vif, avec autant de netteté, les scènes de neiges balayées par le vent.

A la Galerie des Arts

ETHEL-FRANCES MUNDY expose à la Galerie des Arts, rue Sherbrooke ouest, une douzaine de petits portraits en cire, sertis dans des médaillons. C'est un peu comme de grands camées. L'art de la "portraiture" en cire qui a fleuri cinq cents années durant en Europe avant de disparaître au cours du XVIIIe siècle, reparait ici sous son aspect plus mignon. Rien du grand genre, mais de charmantes petites compositions. Les teintes naturelles donnent de la vie et du relief à ces minois d'enfants, à la fillette hollandaise, aux jeunes femmes qui posent gentiment.

Ethel-Frances Mundy, née à Syracuse, N.Y., a fait de solides études artistiques. On assure qu'avec l'aide d'un chimiste elle a trouvé une composition nouvelle qui perfectionne en certains aspects le bel art du portrait-miniature en cire. Ses études sont toutes immanquablement charmantes, sans beaucoup de recherche d'originalité. Même les deux portraits de vieillards étudiés en finesse sont, comme les autres, d'une grâce qui n'est heureusement... que féminine. C'est très joli.

A l'Iron Cat Regd

LE GOUT ingénieux de quelques jeunes gens qui travaillent fort bien le fer forgé a transformé en pièces modernes le salon et l'entrée du local situé à 2037 rue Victoria. Vous n'imaginerez jamais que l'on puisse tirer un aussi bon parti du papier d'emballage et de la grosse toile. Après s'être cru dans un salon tout-à-fait style 1933 dans son élégante sobriété, il faut examiner de près pour constater d'où vient l'effet. Nous sommes à l'Iron Cat Regd. Ils donnent l'hospitalité jusqu'au 8 décembre à un groupe de collègues d'un de leurs amis, George-Shirley Simpson.

Ses tableaux ont leur place toute désignée dans une atmosphère aussi joyeuse, aussi claire. C'est, lui aussi, un jeune homme plein de promesses. Son art est un peu unilatéral jusqu'ici; je ne vois pas qu'il se soit encore adonné à autre chose qu'au paysage et aux fleurs. Mais ce n'est sûrement pas de lui que l'on pourrait dire: Pourquoi tant de vert banal l'été et des neiges si blanches l'hiver? Il est déjà maître de son pinceau. Sa manière est nette, dégagée, et il use d'une pâte abondante. Harmonie et optimisme dans le coloris, une certaine plénitude dans la composition. On sent une imagination ardente qui envisage la vie avec confiance. Citons de lui, à part quelques jolis tempéra qui ont servi de sujets à des cartes de Noël, un pastel intitulé "April Waterfall", aux gris-blancs très poétiques et vivants, et surtout une série plus expressive d'huiles aux tons chauds. Exemples: "Garden in St. Andrew East", tout fleuri; "Summer Holiday", paysage frais, aéré; "Old Aunt Kate", scène claire, dominée par un joli ciel; "Golden Autumn", sous-bois joyeux et rempli; "The River Road", où l'on se sent content de vivre.

Notes et réflexions

SANS prendre au pied de la lettre toutes les prétentions scientifiques de l'exposition du Monde d'il y a un million d'années chez Morgan, il faut admettre qu'elle est d'un intérêt exceptionnel et nous fournit l'une des rares chances de la vie de faire une excursion vivante dans le monde de la préhistoire. Il y a un flot constant de personnes qui défile de ce temps-ci chez Morgan à côté des dinosaures, des King-Kong, des mammoth.

La galerie d'art Eaton expose actuellement d'intéressants batiks (peinture sur soie) de MM. Dawson et Smith.

L'une des vitrines centrales montrait l'autre jour chez Morgan un mobilier de chambre à coucher genre moderne, en noir bordé de blanc. La couverture du lit carré était en noir avec jaune. J'observai les atours de la chambre, par de ma vie de plus de moues, grimaces et témoignages de stupeur. Je relevai les expressions catallique, chambre mortuaire, ça me donne un frisson de mort, bon pour un entrepreneur de pompes funèbres... et tutti quanti. Le mobilier avait pourtant un caractère original. Edgar-Allen Poe en eût raffolé. Et le conclusion, un peu perplexes, que sans doute le noir est-il demeuré comme une couleur de élite, — des poètes et artistes beaudelaïres, par de ma vie de plus de moues, grimaces et témoignages de stupeur. Je relevai les expressions catallique, chambre mortuaire, ça me donne L'exposition Van Horne a-t-elle drainé toute l'attention? Il semble que le Salon de l'Académie n'attire pas autant qu'il le faudrait. Il est pourtant l'un des plus intéressants que l'on puisse souhaiter voir.

Pourquoi le barilago pictoresque qui marquait naguère l'entrée du club catholique hongrois, rue S.-Catherine, à côté de l'Institut Nazareth, a-t-il fait place aux teintes et au lettrage si fades d'aujourd'hui? Il n'y a plus rien de hongrois dans la nouvelle enseigne du "Catholic Hungarian Social Club".

Le malin aurait beau jeu qui voudrait dénoncer un jour le truc des "doublures" dans les métiers d'art. La personne-doublure fournit les esquisses, d'autres se chargent de l'exécution, et celui qui les emploie garde pour lui le crédit et les principes. Mais les doublures ne s'en soucient pas plus que ça du moment qu'on les paye bien.

Au fond de la scène de l'auditorium du Plateau s'achève une jolie toile qui représente la métropole et ses feux aperçus dans la brume du soir de l'autre côté du fleuve. Les reflets dans l'eau grise sont habilement trouvés. L'effet est un peu mélancolique, mais limpide. A gauche, un gros arbre un tantinet trop décoratif. La toile est l'œuvre de Faucher, un jeune des Beaux-Arts.

PASTELS AND OILS SHOWN IN QUEBEC

Gazette 5/12/33

Gordon E. Pfeiffer Is Holding Exhibition at Chateau Frontenac

(Special to The Gazette.)

Quebec, December 4. — Variety of subject and treatment marks the collection of oils and pastels at the exhibition which Gordon E. Pfeiffer is holding at the Chateau Frontenac. The exhibition will last two weeks.

A lover and close student of the outdoors, Mr. Pfeiffer has devoted most of his work to the reproduction of rural scenes to be found in the villages and countryside surrounding Quebec. The general effect is distinctly bracing, and shows the many sidedness of this young painter's talents. He is not a follower of any one school, yet some of his pictures have a faint reminder of Kriehoff. His pastels are a new venture and in these his colors are strong, glowing and invigorating and his choice of subjects both unusual and interesting. "Autumn Vermillion," "Harvest Gold" (a study of a field of pumpkins), "The Pink Cloud," "Wind and Clouds" are among the pastels shown. The oils include "The Crimson Tree" (a blue shadow cast by a red tree on the side of an old French-Canadian plaster farm house); a large canvas, "Cape Eternity, Saguenay," "Lumber

Camp, Laurentians" and "October Glow."

Mr. Pfeiffer has exhibited frequently in Montreal and is considered one of the most interesting of the younger Canadian painters. Four of his large canvases are in the Quebec Provincial Museum.

WOMEN ARTISTS HOLD EXHIBITION

Interesting Work by W.A.S. Members at Eaton's—Color Prints Also Shown

Works by members of the Women's Art Society of Montreal are on view in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Co., Limited, of Montreal, and, as is usual with this group, this annual exhibition is interesting. True, the work is uneven in quality, but in all the examples there is evidence of industry and sincerity.

Among the attractive items must be mentioned the flower pieces of Lilian Hingston who shows skill in the arrangement of her blooms and harmony in her color schemes. Mrs. Hingston, long a member of the society, finds congenial material in lilies, marigolds, sweet peas and hawthorn, the last-named being set in a copper bowl. Asters captured the interest of Mary L. Dunning, while the yellow of daffodils lured Mary C. Strelt. Francis Sweeney has a study of trilliums in addition to a broadly handled old house in Caughnawaga. A small winter scene with house by M. I. Allan is a good interpretation of the season, and "A Young Girl" is a well modelled work by Ida Beck. Ethel Derrick shows a study of birches and Jean Kyle has New Brunswick scenes, the broad handling of "Fireweed, New River Beach, N.B." being effective.

Mrs. Jean Munro has well painted work of good design in "Christmism Cathedral in Evening Light" and a Brittany port scene with boats. Beatrice Long shows a dancer tying her shoe and Margaret Sanborn has several works, among them "Old Stone Wharf, Great Chebeague." Margaret C. Thompson has found her subjects abroad and has colorful souvenirs of Capri, Dijon, Geneva and the Clyde on a stormy day.

Foam and rocks at Cape Elizabeth is from the brush of Elizabeth Smith, and Violet Robertson has a restful bit in "Houses, Piedmont." Annie Pringle well suggests the falling white water in "Darwin Falls, Rawdon," and sounds a gay note in "Fall in the Laurentians." Jane C. Luke is worthily represented by "A Road to Mount Royal" and "An Italian Garden," the latter being an engaging bit of color. E. G. Richardson shows a firmly treated "Portrait of Violet," and "Carleton Mountain, From New Richmond" is the offering of Alice Lighthall.

Ida M. Huddle reveals a free, firm practised hand and good color sense in her group of works—"St. Genevieve" with road and buildings; "Street in Longueuil" and "Late Autumn Day," the last-named being true to hour and season.

Others represented are Mrs. Allan Turner, Margery Allan, A. Dillon Brown, Winifred D. Lewis, E. J. Macfarlane, A. E. Mulock, S. A. Phillips, Annie B. Powles and Norah Smyth.

SOME GOOD REPRODUCTIONS.

In the adjoining room are excellent reproductions of paintings by modern men—works that, failing the opportunity to possess originals, would bring good measure of satisfaction to their owners. For these who like a glare of color exam by W. Herman—autumn trees, a glimpse of lake and birches edging a sunlit harvest field are bold performances. Well painted ducks in a stream is a work by A. Koester, and scenes at Amalfi and Capri, where strong sunlight bathes buildings and water, have been painted by K. Garbatoff. There is a bold, patterned landscape by Derain, and pattern occupies J. Nash in "The Cornfields." A quiet stream by Sisley and a delicately colored scene on the Seine by Monet are among offerings by the Impressionists, while by Renoir is "Dejeuner"—two women and man at table. The American painter, Willard L. Metcalfe is represented by "The North Country"—a work done at the height of his powers—lofty rounded mountain, village buildings and church on a ridge above a bend in a stream edged by trees. The season is autumn and the mood is one of peace.

bed as colour-mad, and of Utrillo all mentioned and illustrated. Jewish painters, particularly Elian, were referred to as of pictures which were at same time ugly and beautiful. came Derain and the constructivists, who claim to return towards the French classical tradition, —intellectually rearranged,—and the work of Dunoyer de Segonzac, who has won honour in the United States, was cited as an example of pure intellectualism. Among works by Picasso a specimen was given which was supposed to be a joke at the expense of the public, which seems a strange use for art.

Last of all Mr. Desclos came to the Dadaists and the Surrealists and here even he admitted defeat; these people, he said, spoke a language of which he did not know even the alphabet. The reason for his failure was not perfectly clear after a sight of some of the works which he had admired.

A number of excellent lantern slides illustrated the lecture but, as Mr. Desclos was careful to point out, they could give no complete ideas of pictures in which colour is the essential element, and the audience had to rely a good deal on his descriptions or on imagination founded on memory. If the lecture did not quite convince all who heard it, it at least gave an idea of the point of view of those who endure and encourage some of the strangest efforts in the history of art.

Pictures by Miss Des Claves

At the studio of Miss Berthe Des Claves, Beaver Hall Square, there is now a little exhibition of work by herself and her sisters, Miss Alice and Miss Gertrude Des Claves. Her own work includes several English gardens and country scenes, full of cheerful color, and with these there are a few oil pictures and many pastel drawings of Canadian landscapes, among which rich autumn tints spring flowers stand out. By Miss Alice Des Claves there are, as always, some very good studies of horses,—two particularly good ones of plough teams and several of groups of ponies seen in the wide spaces and misty atmosphere of Dartmoor. A portrait of a man and a gay picture of two children are

Women's Art Association at Eaton's Gallery

This year's annual exhibition of the Women's Art Association of Montreal is now open in one of the galleries of the T. Eaton Company, and stands up well in comparison with the association's past exhibitions. Landscape sketches in oil, water color and pastel of course make up by far the larger part of the exhibition, but there are two fairly large and quite striking portraits by E. C. Richardson, a small still life study by Annie B. Powles, and a number of flower pictures. Some of the best of these last are by Mrs. D. Hingston, especially those of Pink Lilies and Sweet Peas; Mary C. Streit's Daffodils and other flowers by Frances Sweeny and Mrs. F. E. Dunning are also to be noticed. Among the many landscapes, six water colors of places in Europe by Margaret C. Thompson call for mention, as do the Canadian scenes of Ida M. Huddell, Mrs. C. A. Lewis, Elizabeth Smith, Mrs. Jean Munro and Margaret Sanborn. The pastel and the oil sketch by Jane C. Luke, the small sketch by Mrs. A. A. Long, who also shows a figure picture, and the sketches and pictures of Ida Bec, Jean Kyle and A. Dillon Brown are features of the exhibition, which also contains works by Annie Pringle, Alice Lighthall, Violet Robertson, A. E. Mulock, Mrs. John Allan, Ethel Derrick, E. J. Macfarlane, Norah Smyth, S. A. Phillips and Margery Allan.

In another gallery at Eaton's there is being shown a collection of large color prints. Many of these come from German workshops but some which are quite as good as by English printers. They are reproductions of paintings, done with an accuracy and completeness that brings out the brushwork of the painter and even the grain of the canvas. Works by Renoir, Sisley by Miss Gertrude Des Claves, by whom there are also, among others, two delightful pictures of English country lanes,—one with a group of children, the other with a party of gypsies and their green caravan.

Mural Depicts Christ—But With Back Turned!

Curious Form of Compromise Between Frank Brangwyn British Artist and Officials of Rockefeller Centre on "Spiritual Freedom" Decorative Panels

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(A.P.)—There's a figure of Jesus Christ in the Frank Brangwyn mural at Rockefeller Centre—but you can't see the face. It's a rear view.

Thus the dispute between the eminent English artist and Rockefeller Centre ends in a compromise.

Brangwyn—given a free hand at the outset—had planned to use his somewhat-modern conception of Christ in the panels, which portray the freedom of man spiritually.

Learning of this, Centre officials objected.

The Praise of Contemporary French Painting

Star 6/12/33

In beginning his lecture on contemporary French painting at the Art Association of Montreal on Tuesday evening, the distinguished French critic, M. A. V. Desclos, made the claim that Paris is, and has been for some considerable time, the centre of the world's artistic activities and the place in which most of what is original and significant in modern painting has had its beginnings. And this claim might easily be accepted by people who could share his enthusiasm for the pictures which he showed on the screen.

Mr. Desclos began his story of the modern painters with the effects of impressionism on Seurat, Albert Besnard, Henri Martin and their followers, the neo-impressionists. Examples of the work of Signac and Maurice Denis were shown and the lecturer went on to Gauguin and his followers, revivers of pagan traditions and users of strong color. The advice of Gauguin was quoted,—to find a color pleasing to the painter and use it for the making of the picture, regardless of nature. The influence of the important of savage sculpture was mentioned with approval, and the ensuing school of painters who arranged nature into a new world of expressive form; then came the school of "Les fauves,"—people who had not likings but hatreds in common.

Matisse and his fellow colourists came in for special attention, and the progress of Matisse from his earlier to his later work was shown. Mr. Desclos was careful to assure his hearers that all these painters could paint and had painted just like other, more ordinary people; a drawing by Matisse was shown to prove that the vagaries of drawing in his later pictures were not accidental but used intentionally to produce freedom to enjoy the enchantment of the colour. The works of Van Dongen, the society portrait painter, of Marie Laurencin, of Vlaminck, de-

$100,000 REALIZED ON HOWE PICTURES

LONDON, Dec. 8.—(C. P. Cable)—Britain today had further indications of the improved state of the art market in the announcement that about $100,000 was realized from sale of pictures alone in the auction of treasures from Penn House, Buckinghamshire, seat of Earl Howe. For Guy's "Milking Time" about $10,900 was paid and a Rembrandt portrait of an "Aged Man," measuring 9½ by 8 inches, realized $10,000. Many continental buyers attended the sale which realized a much greater amount than expected although some of the choicest pictures, being Curzon family heirlooms, were not offered.

PREFERRED SYMBOL

Christ, they maintained, particularly in a business structure, should not be represented pictorially but by some heavenly form, such as a column of light.

The mural, in four sections, was unpacked and put in place yesterday. Interest in the outcome was keen. A large crowd, many of them artists, filled the lobby of the R.C.A. Building—the central structure of the Centre.

Recalling that the muralist once depicted Christ in the clothes of today, there had been some conjecture over the raiment. But this time, he followed the conventional lines of a robe. There is a cowl on the head.

COMPROMISE REACHED

"It's a compromise," said one official. "Brangwyn still has his figure of Christ. Rockefeller Centre gained its primary point of not having Christ's face depicted."

The figures in the crowd range in dress from Roman days to top hats and cutaway coats of this age.

In finish, the mural is a sort of monochromatic, suggestive of an enlarged lithograph, carrying out the decorative scheme of the lobby. This left little leeway for Brangwyn to make use of the color work for which he is noted.

ONE OF THREE GROUPS

The mural is on the south facade, on the north is one by Jose Maria Sert, portraying man's freedom physically—his liberation from slavery.

On the east side, is the covered work of Diego Rivera, the Mexican artist. This—showing man's development scientifically and industrially—was walled up, unfinished, with panel of canvas after Rivera refused to delete a head of Lenin.

De la féminité cherchant l'art

Exposition annuelle de la Women's Art Society chez Eaton. — Les ressources du batik de mieux en mieux démontrées. — Reproductions de Modernes.

Sus à la contrefaçon!

LA WOMEN'S Art Society tient son exposition annuelle chez Eaton. L'ensemble est inégal mais intéressant. Je n'ai pas à parler ici de femmes-peintres à l'art viril, comme je l'ai fait pour le beau groupe de l'hiver dernier dans lequel Marjorie Smith s'était signalée. L'impression de doux coloris, le travail délicat, voire la présence de quelques tableautins d'une joliesse appliquée, mettent le visiteur dans une atmosphère de féminité. Aucune oeuvre qui frappe par son envergure, mais plusieurs jolies choses.

Ida Beck a peint une physionomie de "Jeune fille" d'une expression ardente. Lillian Hingston se distingue particulièrement dans le groupe par d'excellentes études de fleurs, qu'elle sait bien disposer et combiner. Annie Pringle obtient d'une pâte abondante un éclat qui charme dans ses paysages boisés. Francis Sweeny affiche une harmonieuse "Vieille maison à Caughnawaga". "La baie de Fundy" et "New-River Beach, N.-B." par Jean Kyle ont du mouvement, de l'air pur. Mme Jean Munro a baigné dans une agréable lumière blafarde sa toile "Villages bretons", et "La cathédrale de Chicoutimi vue le soir" montre le beau parti que l'on peut tirer d'une vision qui sait choisir quelques teintes essentielles. Béatrice Long s'est attaquée à un sujet plus ambitieux; sa "Danseuse" rose reste élégante, malgré quelque raideur. Margaret C. Thompson a trouvé de charmants sujets outremer, encore qu'il manque un peu de chaleur à ses paysages des pays du soleil. Ida Huddell combine avec spontanéité des tons délicats. Deux portraits de E.-G. Robertson ont de la sincérité mais pas beaucoup d'éclat.

D'après les Modernes

L'UN des salons d'art chez Eaton abrite actuellement une série de reproductions d'après des peintres modernes. Reproductions bel et bien affichées comme telles, cela va de soi. Comme il est rare que l'on puisse se payer le luxe d'avoir certains originaux, c'est une consolation pour les amateurs d'art ou les admirateurs de tel ou tel artiste moderne d'avoir une reproduction qui rappelle du mieux possible la toile de l'auteur. Ici l'on trouve "Le déjeuner" par Renoir, en tons pâles, qui montre spirituellement deux femmes et un homme à table dans les costumes élégants de naguère; un paysage de la Seine par Monet, d'un coloris très délicat; un ruisseau paisible décrit par Sisley; deux paysages audacieux, hardiment barriolés, par W. Herman; de fort jolis canards dans un ruisseau, oeuvre due au pinceau net et décoratif d'A. Koester; des scènes italiennes lourdes de soleil, par K. Garbatoff; un paysage déroutant par Derain; "Champs de maïs" par J. Nash, où l'effet décoratif a toute l'attention; "The North Country" par l'Américain Willard-L. Metcalfe, vu en courbes qui ont du mouvement et de l'allure.

Des batiks

EN marge de l'exposition féminine se continue chez Eaton celle des batiks de Dawson et Smith, de Toronto. On sait que le procédé peut s'assimiler un peu à celui de la gravure en couleurs: chaque couleur est appliquée séparément sur la soie ou le coton, tandis que les parties à respecter sont recouvertes d'une couche de cire.

Les artistes torontonniens nous révèlent les possibilités grandissantes du batik pour la décoration murale à grands effets. Par une heureuse sobriété de goût ils s'en sont tenus à des harmonies de teintes douces ou dominent les jaunes et verts de toutes nuances. On se demande s'il n'y aurait pas de brillants effets à tirer des couleurs d'éclat. Mais alors, sans doute, les batiks se rapprocheraient trop, dans l'esprit de leurs auteurs, du vitrail dont ils ont généralement pris leur inspiration. La plupart des sujets, en effet, sont du Moyen-Age chevaleresque. C'est très agréable de s'attarder devant chaque batik à étudier les mille détails dont il est rempli, sans pourtant qu'il y ait surcharge. Cette plénitude nettement décorative nous ramène par certains côtés à cette multiplicité du détail qui, avec l'humanité narquoise, fait tout le charme des estampes du Moyen-Age.

Le racket des similis

C'EST pas d'aujourd'hui que le racketeering poursuit son oeuvre dans le domaine artistique. Les vieux pays ayant à faire avec beaucoup plus de toiles classiques et de collections n'ont pas trop de moyens de s'en garder. Les copies abondent dans les musées privés: il y a quelques nids de simili-classiques même à Montréal. Puis, il faut se réfier parfois de ces connaisseurs entreprenants qui se présentent à vous avec des liasses de lettres reçues du monde entier et préchent trop fort pour l'authenticité. Mais à la veille des fêtes, depuis quelques années, il apparaît toujours un peu partout dans la métropole une pluie de reproductions illégales fabriquées à la quantité par certaines firmes américaines, qui ont bien soin de les expédier à l'ouest ou au Canada plutôt qu'à New-York où les agences d'art ont l'oeil trop ouvert.

Remarquez d'abord que le Canada est signataire de la Convention de Berne, qu'il exige le respect des droits d'auteur dans les arts et les lettres. Les littérateurs ont sans doute raison de demander que ces mesures mettent à leur disposition des moyens plus efficaces de faire respecter leurs droits. Les artistes diront de même. Mais, en tout cas, le principe est consacré. Et c'est pure justice.

Or, pour ne nous occuper ici que de certains cas sur lesquels on nous a bienveillamment éclairés, ne voit-on pas de ce temps-ci à Montréal et à Ottawa des reproductions de sujets de Louis Icart signées Côté, Hart, etc., (dans ce cas les modèles sont d'ordinaire réduits). Pis encore, ne voit-on pas des reproductions de gravures de Luigini, Charlet, Hugard, signées parfois du nom même et de la signature bien imitée de Luigini, Hugard et Charlet eux-mêmes. Plusieurs sujets de Van Santen ont été prêtés à la reproduction. On a même constaté que certaines de ces reproductions au petit pied servent en certains cas à des calendriers que l'on trouve dans les 5, 10, 15. Consultez, par exemple, le catalogue des oeuvres d'Icart et dites-moi si vous n'avez pas vu "Carmen", "Effronteries", etc., signées d'un autre nom dans certains grands magasins.

On plaide ignorance. Avec raison parfois. Je sais telle maison de confiance qui, dès qu'on l'eût avertie du fait, a décidé de faire disparaître le plus tôt possible son stock de reproductions légales et de se mettre en garde pour l'avenir. C'est de bonne politique, puisque de pareilles reproductions à l'héliogravure ou à la lithographie n'ont aucune valeur originale, mais aussi, en somme, par le fait même, aucune valeur proprement commerciale. D'autres disent: "Oh! mais nous avertissons les clients qu'il s'agit de reproductions". Quelques fois sans doute. Trop souvent: Où ça? Ne parlez-vous pas de "gravures originales" dans vos annonces? Les vendeuses elles-mêmes savent-elles seulement de quoi il s'agit pour en prévenir le client? etc., etc.

Notes et rappels

UN confrère au retour d'une charmante exposition d'oeuvres féminines à Trois-Rivières fait remarquer sans malice que la copie abonde. Il a bien raison d'affirmer que la production la plus baroque, du moment qu'elle est le fruit d'une idée ou d'un sentiment personnel, dépassera toujours en mérite tous les simili-Duguay et les paysages d'après cartes postales que les jeunes filles et les autres se croient obligées de peindre indéfiniment. La même remarque vaut pour le modelage et les portraits d'après magazines. Avec des aptitudes moyennes, — elles ne sont pas rares! — qui n'arriveraient pas à quelque résultat, à force de décalquer, de reproduire par petits carrés ou de transposer ponce par ponce. Que l'on y prenne une salutaire distraction, fort bien! Mais le malheur veut que trop de gens y voient de l'art et se permettent des comparaisons ridicules. Puis un jour, il faudra bien aussi faire le procès de la joliesse, du train où vont les choses.

Plusieurs personnes m'écrivent encore pour demander à vendre des oeuvres par l'entremise de la chronique d'art. Je rappelle que je n'y puis rien. La "Presse" n'entend pas se constituer en agence de vente ni en galerie d'art. Il ne saurait être question, non plus, d'annoncer dans la chronique hebdomadaire les tableautins ou objets à vendre. Mieux vaut s'adresser aux galeries ou magasins qui s'en font une spécialité.

Il y a exposition paroissiale d'oeuvres d'art au Manoir des Jeunes, à Notre-Dame de Grâce, jusqu'à dimanche. Elle est ouverte de 2 h. p.m. à 10 tous les jours.

MURILLO PAINTING COMES TO OTTAWA Star Dec. 28/33

Spanish Artist's Masterpiece Acquired For National Gallery

OTTAWA, Dec. 28.—(C.P.)—Abandoned by the soldiers of Napoleon in their looting of the wealthy Spanish convent of San Francisco at Seville, 123 years ago, one of the most famous of Murillo's paintings has just been acquired by the National Gallery of Canada for "an extremely small sum." A large canvas, too stiff to be rolled up and conveniently carried off by the troops of Marshal Soult in their Peninsular campaign, the picture by the famous pupil of Velasquez found its way into the hands of an English collector, and within the last few days has been secured by the Canadian Institution.

It depicts two Franciscan Monks beneath a tree, one of whom is standing and laying his hands in benediction on the head of his suffering companion. Described at length and illustrated in every work on Murillo, the painting's romantic history culminates in its having escaped the general plundering of the convent in 1810, when all the other art treasures therein were carried off to adorn the Louvre in Paris.

ESTABLISHED REPUTATION

The date of the masterpiece is about 1645, shortly after the return of Murillo to his native city following his association with Velasquez. It immediately won for the artist great fame as one of the foremost painters of his time.

The National Gallery will place it on exhibition on January 3, when His Excellency the Governor-General will open the exhibit of French paintings.

W. E. Gladwish Presents Vivid Picture of World- Famous Expedition

HUMOR VS. HEARTACHES

Amusing Incidents Interspersed With Hair-Raising Thrills Feature Lecturer's Talk

Chuckles and heart-throbs of the great Shackleton expedition which failed in its aim to cross the Antarctic continent, were vividly related by W. E. Gladwish, during the course of an illustrated lecture at the Presbyterian College Tuesday night. Mr. Gladwish is a personal friend of Worsley, Shackleton's lieutenant on the expedition, and has made a particular hobby of the adventures of intrepid explorers of the southern polar regions.

After their little ship had gone down, caught in the terrible grip of an ice pack, the little band of men had to eke out a precarious existence on huge ice flows. They were in constant danger of the floes cracking, sending them hurtling into the numbing icy waters of the Antarctic Ocean, or pinning them between the ledges of ice.

One day a crack opened up right across the floor, as it were, of one of the tents. Shackleton turned hastily to see that his men were all right, and peering down into the slowly widening chasm, saw a sleeping bag wedged a few feet down—with a man in it! Quickly he dropped to his knees, reached down and providentially secured a grip on the man's sleeping bag, and dragged him up to safety. Within a space of seconds, the gap gradually closed up again, leaving not so much as a trace of the crack into which the man had been tumbled.

He had been rescued from a horrible death, and with white and drawn faces, his companions stood around him, gazing at the man and his rescuer, expecting to hear torrents of thanks and heartfelt gratitude to Shackleton pour from his quivering lips. But his lips were quivering with a very different sentiment.

"What d'you know about that," he demanded indignantly, "I've lost my 'baccy!"

His friends, somewhat shocked, suggested that he ought to say something in the way of thanks to Shackleton, who had saved his life.

"Sure, I know he did," returned the man heatedly, "but what am I going to do now, without my tobacco?"

When the orders came from Shackleton: "Three pounds for each man," on the long trek from the shores of the Antarctic Continent northward, after their ship sank, many treasures were cast away, never to be recovered. Gold watches, cigarette cases, expensive photographic and cinematographic equipment, money, and many other valuables were discarded. "But there were some Scotchmen in the party," declared Mr. Gladwish last night, "for this is what many of them did:

SCOTTISH CAUTION.

"They carefully piled their money and watches and things in little heaps, wrote their names on bits of paper or cloth, and attached them to the piles, in the hope, and on the offchance, that some day, perhaps, when the floe on which they were camped finally made its way to the ocean, and floated north, it might be discovered, and their possessions picked up by someone with sufficient scruples and conscience to return them. Or perhaps they thought they might themselves return to whatever spot that particular floe happened to be in, sometime in the future."

The photographer who accompanied Shackleton on his expedition to cross Antarctica was beset by some blood-chilling adventures. He spotted some killer whales, most deadly denizens of the deep known to polar explorers, and ventured out off the solid floe onto the looser sea ice to try to get some snapshots of them. The killers were gambolling about the smaller pans, poking their heads over the edges and displaying mouths full of wicked looking teeth. Try as he might, the photographer could not manoeuvre for a successful shot.

Then the killers spotted the photographer, and with one accord they dived under the pan on which he was perched. While he was wondering where they had all gone, he felt a violent bumping under the pan, which began to tilt and to crack in all directions. He had a narrow escape, just leaping from pan to pan onto the main floe, while the killers pursued him, smashing the pans almost the second he left them. He did not get any photographs.

After the party finally struggled as far as Elephant Island, Shackleton, accompanied by five of his men, including Worsley, set out in a small 25-foot boat for South Georgia, an island upon which there was a permanent whaling station. As they embarked, two of the men fell off into the freezing cold water and were thoroughly drenched. Immediately two of the party left on Elephant Island changed clothes with them, saying that they could not possibly make the long trip to South Georgia in wet garments. It took the men on shore three weeks to dry out the wet clothes they had taken from Shackleton's companions on the dangerous mission.

After indescribable hardships, Shackleton and his men reached South Georgia, and only he, Worsley and a man named Creal were in fit condition to essay the difficult and dangerous climb overland to the whaling station. Finally they arrived there, and after five attempts a ship contacted the remainder of the party on Elephant Island and brought them out to civilization, when they promptly enlisted for service in the Great War, which was then in progress.

After the war, Mr. Gladwish related, Shackleton succumbed to the lure of the Antarctic, and returned, never to come out again. He died on the night before the day on which the expedition had planned to celebrate Christmas, rough weather having prevented them from enjoying their festivities on the day itself. Lady Shackleton was advised of his death, and of the plans to bring his body back to England, but she cabled the expedition to take him back to his beloved Antarctic, where he was buried on South Georgia Island, beneath a cairn that looks ever to the South Pole, which he made such heroic efforts to attain.

Mr. Gladwish illustrated his lecture with a remarkable collection of lantern slides, including colored reproductions of actual photographs taken on the expedition and sketches and paintings made by members of the party.

An Artist Draws His Impression of "Expressionist" Art!

ning Telegram Nov. 25/33

Up at the Art Gallery they have a label on it, "Sea and Rocks." When a Telegram artist looked at it he saw gas pipes, cheese, straws and crackers. Just an impression of expressionism!

Our gastronomic Rockies! Our artist was ready to digest the mound of jelly and whipped-cream peaks—but what to do with a couple of broken chair legs!

Even "The Bather" made the artist hungry. He thought it was a cook watching a salad sprout with forks, spoons and all!

"Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Wolf?" Wouldn't even the three little pigs have a swell time if this impression of "Georgian Bay Islands" were really real!

"Flowers" they call this, but the art critic is sure they don't call them that in smart women's magazines!

Take this one seriously! It shows labor slaving for the capitalist. But our artist thinks Santa will pinch that armored car for some kid's sock!

What You See You Don't See Looking at Modern "Art"

Impressionable Visitors Find Sewer Pipes, Ladies' Unmentionables, Whipped Cream and Furniture Store in Canadian Riot of Modern Painting

By KENNETH WELLS

It was a grey day in town and Charlie, one of the staff artists, was not feeling well.

"I feel like a visit to the Art Gallery," he told the art critic. "The first Canadian exhibition of the Canadian Group of Painters is still showing there."

"Shall we?" I asked, rising to the unspoken invitation like a modernist trout to a fly by Picasso.

"Yes," agreed the artist, reaching for his hat and coat, and overshoes, and gloves. "What do I care?"

We went in to the show.

Now it may just so happen that you have had delirium tremens, too, or have experienced the satisfaction of being the only survivor of a dye factory explosion. If you have had either experience, you will appreciate the vision that unfolded to our view as we entered the first gallery showing the work of the Canadian Group of Painters. A barn painter having an epileptic fit on a steep steel roof could have been no more liberal with his color than are the least of these. A bumble bee half drowned in ink could have been no more unexpected in its drawing. And composition . . .

"INTERESTING" IS SAFE

"Gosh!" said Charlie, and broke into tears.

My expression was three syllables longer. It was given me in the first place by the curator of the Gallery, and has proved useful several times where silence might suggest ignorance and other utterance confess it.

"Interesting," said I, and let my eyes wander. They fastened on a canvas and stuck.

"You know," I told Charlie, still staring, "for some strange reason I'm thinking of female unmentionables."

"It's not strange," corrected Charlie, "but why this place and time?"

"I don't know," I puzzled, "but . . . Look!" I whooped, pointing at a picture.

"Yes," said Charlie, looking in the catalogue, "Decorations," it is called. A flower study. He looked at the picture. "Yes, it's flowers."

"Unmentionables," I insisted.

"Flowers," said Charlie.

"Well—" I wasn't going to fight over it. "I tell you," I said, "you can see girls wearing them, in any smart magazine, but they don't call them flowers!"

FOREST GIANT OR ASPARAGUS?

"It's this modernism," sighed Charlie. "You've got me seeing it that way now. And it isn't natural. I'm telling you it's wrong. Those things don't grow on bushes!"

"A delicate bit of work," moaned a voice over our shoulders. "Subtle color, fine design, a sensitive understanding of nature at her loveliest."

We ignored it.

Maybe it was the day or maybe it was the fact that we had eaten no lunch, but somehow, as we wandered about, the show seemed a short course in gastronomy. A Montreal artist showed a picture called "Still Life," and it was still enough.

"A fine study of what insects can do to asparagus," said Charlie. "It's a corker what a bug can do to a vegetable."

"Soup gone to waste," I answered. "Dolts." That voice came again over our shoulders. "That is a fine sketch of a fallen forest giant. A mighty king of the northern woods fallen but still sublime."

PATIENCE NEEDED.

"Patience," said Charlie. Patience. Give them enough rope and they'll cook their own goose."

"Patience!" I expostulated.

"Yes," said Charlie. "Look at this. The catalogue calls it 'The Bather.' Why, I don't know, but it's a fine example of patience."

I looked at the picture. All I could see was a woman of a type planned to exemplify those "larger Canadian rhythms" which Mr. Lismer talks about, a background of cardboard rocks, and a lake that might have been coffee or basalt. Of course, the woman wore a green bathing suit—which might have suggested the title, and in the sand just off the end of her toe was growing a tiny scrap of some green stuff.

"It's glorious," said Charlie. "It's an object lesson this day and age might well take to heart. It's symbolic, allegorical . . ."

"Plain bilious," I supplied.

"No," said Charlie, "a bit gastronomic if you like. But imagine the genius of a painter who could conceive of a woman sitting in a bathing suit, surrounded by nothing, and waiting for the salad to grow. That's salad," said Charlie, pointing to the green stuff as I tried to object. "Look at the salad fork painted in beside it. I wish my wife would get a cook like that."

AMAZING SNOW.

We moved along to the next.

"The color's strong," said Charlie.

"Yes," put in a total stranger, "and if my boy were to say anything that sounded anything like it looks I'd wash his mouth out with soap and water."

And the stranger had other things to say. Apparently he came from the farm, for he was much interested in a snow scene by one of the Group of Seven. With ecstatic fingers he traced the piled up, stringy paint that made snow on fields and hills.

"You see it?" he demanded. "Great stuff. Tastes good as any you can buy in the stores, better, I'd say. We used to pull it when we were kids, but I'm danged if we ever thought of making pictures out of our taffey. We were too busy eating it. And the colors he has made his snow. I can speak for that, too. My uncle saw snow that color once and we sent him away for the gold cure."

"Aw," said Charlie. "What do you know about art?"

"Who's talking about art?" demanded the stranger, and left us.

PERHAPS SANTA PAINTED IT.

"He scored there," muttered Charlie. "After all, it is a group show. There is good stuff here, but, oh the stuff that isn't!

"Look at this picture called 'Lumber Town.' All the old laws of composition and design are deliberately, obviously, stultifyingly violated. Why? Houses are built like those toy block houses one buys in the toy department at Christmas."

"But, Charlie," I answered, "think of the children."

"Yes," he agreed. "The children will like them. Why, Santa Claus may have painted that himself. I never thought of that!"

I was beginning to get hungry. "Tea time," I told Charlie.

"Yes," he said, "I was just thinking that. How would you like a nice big mould of jelly topped with whipped cream?"

"You're looking at that 'Mountains in Snow' picture?"

"Yes, and I'm wondering how many chairs and tables are buried in the whipped cream. Look at the bits of them sticking out!"

I looked, and certainly there was a delicatessen store masterpiece, with the wreckage of a furniture shop thrown in for good measure.

"Talking of furniture and modernism," I suggested, "brings us to gas pipe furniture."

THEM'S WAVES.

"And so to gas pipe," laughed the staff artist. "I wonder what Toronto is going to do about the sewer question. I was wondering about that when I was looking at that picture. 'Sea and Rock, Nova Scotia.' I've never been there. Are sea waves really like sewer pipes? And are the rocks in Nova Scotia really like broken crackers and cheese straws?"

"It all depends on how you see them," I answered, for I had read much on modern art and knew some of the right answers.

"It depends on what eyes you have and how you're taught to use them," protested Charlie. "Look!"

A teacher, followed by half a hundred young Toronto school children, came into the gallery. They sat down on stools before the pictures and she proceeded to point out the qualities of the work on show.

"A gem," she said of one.

"Lovely color," she said of another. "And don't you think so?" she asked the children.

"Yes," they chorused, as obedient children should.

"Look at all the lovely little bits in this picture," she pointed out. "Wouldn't you like to have it in your home?"

"Yes," chorused the children.

Charlie was agast. "Good heavens," he said. "They take it seriously."

"The Group," I said solemnly, "prepares its own posterity."

French Canada Pictures by Paul Caron

No one has been more successful in painting the houses and the type of people of this province than Paul Caron whose work makes the present exhibition in Scott's gallery on Drummond street. These water colors are thoroughly characteristic of Mr. Caron's work. Nearly all of them are street scenes in Montreal and Quebec, with their own special charm as pictures added to their interest as records of buildings and ways of life which may not last very long. Mr. Caron has a pleasant way of discovering and displaying the beauties of old houses which are plainly to be seen but generally escape notice in their modern surroundings and his pictures give new views of quite familiar places. In all these pictures he has, as his way is, introduced well known types of Quebec people, of their long-haired horses and of their sleighs, with the wonderfully shaped and many colored constructions which are built on them. These are, in point of fact, most pleasant pictures of things which we can but generally do not see every day, and there are no pictures which give a better idea of a certain side of the life of French Canada.

Montreal Art Association

The exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy remains open till the end of this week; the last day will be next Sunday, December 17th.

The next exhibition at the Art Association of Montreal will be of works by members of the recently formed Canadian Group of Artists, who succeed or replace the Group of Seven.

The Art Association of Montreal is holding its annual auction sale of magazines to members of the Association on Friday afternoon, December 15th, at 5 p.m. The magazines for the year 1934 will be sold to the highest bidder and the purchasers will receive their magazines a week or month later, as the case may be.

MONTAGUE DAWSON DISPLAYS MARINES

Gazette Dec. 13/34

English Painter Depicts Beauty of Sailing Ships in Different Ages

WORKS BY MONTREALERS

Katherine Gray Exhibits Oils and Watercolors — Pastels of Dogs by Kenneth G. Rowell

Three exhibitions occupy the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Co., Limited, of Montreal, and the variety of work shown is drawing a good attendance of picture-lovers. Two rooms are devoted to paintings by Montague Dawson, one to oils and watercolors by Katherine Gray, and another to pastel studies of dogs by Kenneth G. Rowell.

Montague Dawson, a marine painter highly regarded in England, knows ships, skies and seas. The canvases are the work of a well-equipped and finished painter whose subjects exact skill in drawing of a high order and in this regard make greater demands than on a painter of pure landscape. Forms must be true and rigging must be correct. Rearrangement or elimination for effect cannot be resorted to in this genre, and Mr. Dawson has specialized in a far from easy subject—the sailing ship. The paintings show him to be very much at home in his element and he reveals marked skill in suggesting the weight of surging water, its depth and the shifting colors under varying lights. His ships under full canvas speed along and the impression of wind is felt. Nor has he been blind to the graceful pattern made by shadow of sail on sail or the beauty of full-rigged craft against a calm sky. In the collection are paintings of some famous clippers that are still the conversational stock-in-trade of those old salts who bemoan the introduction of steam. In scenes where ships are becalmed Mr. Dawson is as effective as when seas run high. One such work is lovely in the handling of the spacious sky and the quiet sea which in the distance loses itself in heat haze, while in the middle distance is a sailing ship followed by gulls. What the sailors yearning for wind are saying is left to the imagination.

Going back to an earlier day—the period of ships unwieldy in form and brave in decoration—Mr. Dawson's art suggests an amount of research. Of this era is a painting with a dramatic note—two ships off-shore at dusk in a placid sea that reflects the lights of their lanterns and the glare and smoke of a town sacked and burned. This work is of the age when seamen lived chiefly on fighting. Another spirited performance is a duel between two ships under sail with flags flying. Here is an honest-to-goodness scrap—no firing on craft over the rim of the world but a toe-to-toe slugging contest with the smoke of powder drifting down to the gently heaving sea. The sky suggests a lovely day; but the peace of it ends there. There is also a powerful canvas of a sailing ship in a particularly "dirty" sea.

Mr. Dawson also shows some effective yachting scenes with the big craft gracefully carrying their white clouds of canvas, and, barring these pictorial records of today, his only other concession to the present is three cruisers in battle array ploughing through a sea under a grey sky. The fighting craft as seen from a ship ahead, the churned white wake of which occupies the foreground, suggest power and might as they buck the seas and the wind that flattens the smoke from their stacks.

To those who love the sea the exhibition will appeal, and it should also draw those who delight in spacious skies and expanses of moving water.

SCENES ABOUT MONTREAL.

Katherine Gray, of Montreal, shows much meritorious work in her group of oils and watercolors. In handling the latter medium she shows freedom of touch and clean color. Montreal and district have proven a happy hunting ground and some picturesque bits on the Riviere des Prairies attest to how congenial the subjects have been. Some of the resorts on the Lower St. Lawrence have inspired interesting items and there are some glimpses of mountain scenery at different seasons that are vivid pictorial impressions of the rolling country north of Montreal. In arrangement the works are effective and in treatment the initial wash has generally been left alone and not worried by niggling afterthoughts. Of the oils, a kitchen scene is broadly handled and excellent in the lighting of the room where two figures are engaged in preparing a meal. The painting of the stove and utensils is well done and the treatment of the girl at a table in the foreground is good. Other oils include a scene outside Bonsecours Market, an uptown street scene with its traffic, and a view of Victoria Square with, above the trees and buildings, the Bell Telephone Building.

STUDIES OF DOGS.

Forcefully handled pastel studies of dogs are the offering of Kenneth G. Rowell, of Montreal, whose work reveals the careful observer and not a little patience. Mr. Rowell has undertaken anything but easy work, but he generally succeeds and, for Montreal at least, has opened a new avenue of artistic endeavor as a portraitist of dogs and one that should appeal to those who would have a pictorial souvenir of their particular pets. The heads shown are true to type and painted with sympathy. The small gallery reveals nearly all the breeds known to Canada from the energetic outdoor types to the smaller, coddled haughty-looking animals of the lap. The group makes an interesting show and should result in tangible encouragement being shown this young artist.

Seas and Ships, Landscapes and Dog Portraits

Star Dec. 13/34

A wide choice of subjects is to be seen in the triple exhibition which is at present on view in the Eaton galleries. The largest of its three sections, filling two of the bigger galleries, is of sea pictures by Montague Dawson. Mr. Dawson, as most people know, is a man who knows the sea thoroughly in all weathers and at all times of day and night; he also knows the ships that sail on it, their rigging and their sails and the effects that difference of wind and light can produce with them. And to all this exact knowledge he adds an amazing skill in painting seas and ships in all their many forms and colors. In the present collection there are calm seas and rough seas, in some pictures almost white in the misty calm of the Solent, in others nearly black in the deep greens of ocean waves; and in all of them the color and movement are entirely convincing. The ships too are of many kinds, from the rather formal lines of small yachts, racing or lying becalmed, to the more dignified shapes of full-rigged ships. And not all of them are modern types; there are ships of the 17th and 18th centuries in several of the pictures, two of the best of which are one of a running fight in the open sea and one, "Raiders," in which ships are lying off a burning town. One thing that strikes one about the collection is that, while the subjects are so much alike, the pictures are so entirely different in every way. They are pictures which will delight all many lovers of the sea.

To many people, however, the has little interest, but many of the are lovers of dogs, and for them there is a small room full of dog pictures by a young Canadian artist, G. Rowell. These are mostly in pastel and are evidently intimate portraits of dogs that the artist has known. A few only of them show whole dogs, and one of these is of a very good couple of wire-haired terriers; but most of the pictures are of dogs' heads, of almost every breed full of the expressions which dog-lovers know and understand, or profess to understand.

The gallery between the ships and the dogs is hung with a collection of pictures by Miss Katherine Gray, most of them water colors with a few oil pictures. Miss Gray's excellent work in woodcuts and engravings is well known; her water colors are no equal to these but they have many good qualities of their own. The pictures are nearly all of Canadian scenes—street scenes in Montreal and places in the Laurentians and on the lower St. Lawrence. For the most part they are evidently painted sketches, slight, true, though in some cases suggest the atmosphere of England rather than Canada. There are several suggestions of Canadian coloring. In a few of these deep and ink work has been the water color, and some are among the most successful of the exhibition.

THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

British Art
In a Great
Exhibition

The organizers of the big exhibition of British art, which is to open in London in January, have determined that it shall be as important and as representative as the great shows of the arts of France, Italy and other countries which have been held there in other recent years. As was the case with those other exhibitions, every form of art will be represented and goldsmith's work, embroidery and furniture will naturally take a conspicuous place in it. At the same time, the collection of pictures will be a very fine one, though the best of English painting begins at a later date than that of some of the other countries. There are to be forty Gainsboroughs, thirty by Reynolds, fifteen by Turner, ten each by Hogarth, Raeburn and Romney and good representations of later painters, and all the principal owner of works of art, from the King downwards, are lending exhibits.

One fact to be remarked in connection with this exhibition is that most of the objects in it will be lent by British owners. While foreign works which were formerly owned in Great Britain have been passing to other countries for many years, the proportion of British works which has gone abroad is very much smaller, and, though some loans to the exhibition are being made from abroad, British art is still better represented in the galleries and private collections of its own country than anywhere else.

Notes of Art
In Montreal

The exhibition of the work of the Canadian Group of Painters will be opened at the Art Association of Montreal on Monday, January 1.

An exhibition of pictures by Alexander Bercovitch will begin in the Eaton galleries on Tuesday, December 26. The present triple exhibition of works by Montague Dawson, Katherine Gray and Kenneth G. Rowell will close next Saturday.

A collection of 215 statuettes by the Montreal sculptor, Alfred Laliberté, and purchased by the Provincial Secretary's department, have arrived at the Provincial Museum at Quebec, and will be put on exhibition there soon. These statuettes represent the work, customs and legends of Old French Canada, showing familiar scenes such as ploughing, a blacksmith at work, and a family gathering.

The Art Association of Verdun is growing rapidly in size and activity, and it is proposed to hold a large exhibition in the near future. At the recent election of officers, Charles Tulley was re-elected president; Mr. Gordon, secretary; Miss de Wit, treasurer, and L. Thompson, publicity secretary.

American City Receives
A Noble Gift

The opening of the new art museum at Kansas City has been considered an important event not only in the west but in all the United States, and a special number of the Art News of New York is given to it. The museum has been built and filled with art collections to carry out a bequest of one man, the late William Rockhill Nelson, whose name is given to the museum. He left $12,000,000 for this purpose. Though he had acquired a keen interest in art he had made no great collection, except one of copies of important pictures in European galleries; this collection has been put into the new museum for study purposes. While the museum was being built, a number of the best experts in the United States were occupied in bringing together the objects which were to fill it and it has now been opened complete, with one of the finest art collections in any American museum, outside of a few of the bigger centres.

Some 200 pictures and drawings represent nearly as many of the world's principal painters, including Rembrandt, Frans Hals, Cranach, Titian, Tintoretto, Veronese, Canaletto, El Greco, Claude Lorrain, Goya, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Raeburn, Gilbert Stuart, Corot, Delacroix, Pissarro, Whistler and many others old and new. Other branches of art are equally well represented. The collection of oriental, and specially of Chinese art is said to be quite remarkable, and Egyptian, Greek and Roman art are also represented. There is a large collection of European furniture and other works of decorative art and, in this department of the museum, there is a series of period rooms, showing older American and also English and French decorations and furniture.

Scheme to Put Art
In All New Buildings

PARIS, Dec. 20. — (C.P. Cable.)

Georges Lebecq, noted French artist, has submitted to the Paris Municipal Council a scheme under which a minimum provision would be made in all funds for new municipal buildings for paintings, mural decorations and sculpture. Adoption of the scheme would not only help artists, but stimulate the artistic sense, he argued.

He also thinks the products would prove to future generations that France of the post war years has not lost her prestige in art. In this connection an evening paper records how a sandwichman passed by an underground station to rest a moment from his weary tramping of the streets. He took from his pocket a well-thumbed book and began to read.

It was the Latin text of Tacitus.

L'oeuvre de Paul Caron

DES trois expositions qui occupent les galeries d'art Eaton jusqu'à Noël les vastes marines de Montague Dawson, un peintre haut-côté en Angleterre, valent une longue visite. La mer est son élément. Il a scruté ses horizons lointains, ses firmaments si vastes, ses volumes d'eau dans toutes les humeurs. Il l'a peuplée de galions antiques, toutes voiles dehors, de brigantins et de frégates lancés de l'avant ou laissés au repos dans le calme des crépuscules et des aubes. Les toiles disent la mâle poésie des voiliers de tous genres et l'appel au voyage des grandes époques d'avant le bateau à vapeur.

Sa manière est ferme, achevée, et cependant remplie d'erre d'aller. On conçoit ce qu'il a fallu d'observation pour décrire avec justesse le détail des agrès dans toutes les manœuvres et d'habileté consommée pour traire sur la toile le mouvement divers des eaux et celui des bâtiments qui les cinglent d'altière façon. C'est de la grande peinture. Dawson connaît les secrets de la lumière et de la profondeur des ondes. Ses mers sont vivantes, essentiellement vraies; ses navires à voiles sont vécus, y compris les galions fleuris.

Il s'attache très peu aux sujets modernes. Vous ne voyez à peu près à l'exposition qu'une scène de cuirassés

"The James Baines", navire aux voiles remplies de vent, épanouies comme une grosse fleur; — puis, des frégates ballottées, suivies de mouettes, bien frêtées, en partance ou au mouillage; des mers soulevées, calmes, moutonneuses ou striées de petites écumes; des firmaments sombres, clairs, proches ou distants.

Quelques-uns des sujets sont des reproductions à tirage limité surveillées par l'artiste lui-même. On sort de là rêveur, tonifié, comme d'avoir respiré le grand air de l'océan. Hélas! les galions ne sont plus; mais il y aura toujours les "corsaires"...

Variations sur un thème

LES GALERIES SCOTT, rue Drummond, exposent jusqu'à Noël, une belle série d'aquarelles de Paul Caron qui le montre sous un jour à peu près complet. Quelques-unes ont été vues ailleurs, d'autres sont neuves, toutes sont charmantes et semblables. Nul n'ignore plus le genre de Paul Caron, d'autant plus qu'il n'a pas varié, encore que sa technique se soit assoupie. Si les circonstances l'ont quelque peu éloigné des Canadiens-Français, il n'en reste pas moins des nôtres par sa manière et son inspiration.

La plus grande partie de son oeuvre consiste en variations autour du thème du cheval de campagne et du berlot. Ce leit-motiv popularisé par les reproductions de cartes de Noël a fait une excellente réputation à l'artiste. Mais il n'a pas cherché à faire neuf, à synthétiser, à imposer en quelques compositions harmonieuses tel ou tel sentiment; pour mieux comprendre comparez, si vous le voulez, avec quelques-unes des illustrations de Clarence Gagnon pour "Maria Chapdelaine". Caron s'applique à traduire la réalité en teintes douces, très délicates. Il vit dans le passé, le passé des petits coins enneigés autour des maisons du rang et dans les fonds de cours anciennes, un aspect extérieur du passé, joli, un tantinet stéréotypé et terroir.

Ses paysages sont toujours paisibles, clairs, soigneusement finis. Le cheval rustique y est à peu près toujours au repos, et la scène aussi. Tout s'inspire du vieux Québec et du vieux Montréal. Cela ne manque pas de caractère, assurément; cela ne peut être que fort joli, mais c'est trop invariablement du Paul Caron.

Ce qui intéresse le plus, cette fois, dans l'exposition Caron, ce sont certains sujets qui font diversion à son thème habituel. Plus que tout autre, celui qui représente la vieille Hilarie Picken, sur la côte du Beaver Hall en 1912; les reflets, la neige humide dans la rue, la montre du magasin, tout y est dépeint avec un charme rare. Quelques scènes du port de Montréal sont rendues avec une vérité poétique qui attire l'attention. Une pittoresque scène de mar-ché, au pied du monument Nelson, ne peut manquer de plaire. Notons aussi que les sujets plus récents, ce semble, attestent d'un soul de composition beaucoup plus poussée.

SCENES FAMILIERES

KATHERINE Gray, une artiste montrealaise, expose chez Eaton une série de toiles et surtout d'aquarelles dont les sujets s'inspirent d'endroits familiers de Montréal et des environs. Avec une touche souple et de la spontanéité, elle fixe de petites visions sans beaucoup d'éclat, sans beaucoup de hardiesse, mais justes, fines, somnolentes, voire pittoresques parfois. Il lui arrive de susciter une charmante impression de paysage en quelques coups de pinceaux seulement, comme par exemple dans "Octobre à Dorval".

Elle a observé avec une discrète intelligence le va-et-vient de la rue Ste-Catherine, près Guy, l'activité du marché Bonsecours, le square Victoria au temps où il avait ses arbres, l'île Ste-Hélène sous un coin de feuillée, quelques fermes ensoleillées. Parmi ses pièces plus caractéristiques il faut surtout mentionner une excellente étude de bouleaux et la "Cuisine de campagne", où dans une lumière admirablement rendue travaillent auprès du poêle la mère et sa fillette; le naturel y plaît beaucoup. Sa couleur est appliquée avec netteté.

Au Manoir des Jeunes

MARGUERITE Lemieux, notre excellente artiste canadienne-française, a été bien inspirée de s'installer à l'ombre du couvent dominicain de Notre-Dame de Grâce. Les Dominicains sont presque nés protecteurs des arts. Tout comme le groupe des Confrères-Artistes fleurit sous leur aile à Ottawa, je ne doute pas qu'ils deviennent l'âme dirigeante d'un noyau d'élite à Montréal. Je le souhaite même. Tout est prêt; il ne manque plus qu'un Père Raymond Voyer, O.P.

Maintes expositions ont révélé le talent abondant et divers de Marguerite Lemieux. Celle qui vient de s'achever au Manoir des Jeunes, où la distinguée artiste a pris quartiers depuis avril, n'aura pas été la moins intéressante dans sa discrétion même. Un choix de pièces montrait au visiteur comment Marguerite Lemieux peut réellement faire école dans les arts décoratifs. Aquarelles, pastels, reliures, toutes espèces de bibelots témoignent d'idées intelligentes chez ses élèves, de goût averti. Ce sont ces articles qui en se multipliant dans nos foyers contribueront pour beaucoup à créer l'atmosphère artistique, à ranimer le bon goût français. Mlle Lemieux connaît mieux que quiconque les secrets de la technique délicate qui préside aux sujets décoratifs; elle a reçu une formation fort avertie en France; elle a su prendre à la peinture des thèmes décoratifs qui lui seront retournés en développant le sens esthétique dans les foyers et en apprenant aux esprits cultivés à l'apprécier. Que Mlle Lemieux cherche seulement à varier son inspiration (son meilleur élève, son frère Yves le fait déjà d'intéressante façon), qu'elle ne craigne pas de styliser davantage dans la mesure où art et métier se peuvent conjuguer dans ce domaine, et elle est toute préparée à faire école et à influencer sur notre climat artistique. Ce n'est pas peu de chose qu'une école du goût...

"Still Waters", l'une des toiles que Montague Dawson, l'excellent peintre de marines, expose jusqu'à Noël chez Eaton, nous montre un élégant trois-mâts carré, voiles dégonflées, qui se laisse glisser sur l'eau calme en attendant le vent. — (Cliché la "Presse".)

L'activité artistique

Le bilan chargé de l'année 1933

La Presse Dec. 21/33

Un événement considérable: l'exposition de la collection Van Horne. — Le vol sensationnel du Salon du Printemps. — Calendrier rempli en avril et novembre. — Les magasins.

D'une chronique à l'autre

L'ANNEE qui s'achève aura été féconde dans le domaine de l'art. Si elle n'a pas apporté d'orientations nouvelles ni montré par moments toute la vie que l'on aurait souhaitée, elle n'en a pas moins été marquée d'événements uniques. Ce n'est pas peu de chose lorsqu'une collection aussi précieuse que la collection Van Horne est montrée au public pour la première fois, et plusieurs milliers de personnes ont envahi la Galerie des Arts à cette occasion. Le Salon de l'Académie a fait preuve de progrès indéniables dans la qualité d'ensemble. Le Salon du Printemps a laissé place à des tendances nouvelles, encore inédites il est vrai, mais susceptibles d'éclorre. La Petite Industrie se réveille un peu partout dans la province. La génération montante des artistes prend de plus en plus de place au soleil et commence à élaborer une nouvelle "couche sociale" artistique, si je puis dire. Les connaisseurs affirment que le goût de la beauté gagne rapidement du terrain chez le peuple et on nous fait l'honneur de dire que le contact établi régulièrement par la "Presse" entre les galeries d'art et le grand public lecteur y est pour beaucoup chez les notres.

L'année a été marquée, au surplus, par le passage en ville de belles collections étrangères signalées pour la première fois et par la "Presse"; — par l'affaire sensationnelle du vol des 16 toiles au Salon du Printemps, achevée en l'histoire de roman policier; — et nous avons cru faire oeuvre utile en signalant au début de l'année la collection privée de l'un des notres.

Il convient aussi de mentionner la part des grands magasins dans la diffusion du beau par les expositions, et le rapprochement qui s'opère graduellement entre le monde du théâtre et celui de l'art.

Au nom de la Beauté

Voilà quinze mois que la chronique d'art a été instaurée de façon régulière à la "Presse". Elle a servi le lecteur; elle est lue, de nombreux témoignages le disent. Elle a aussi servi l'artiste; les milieux bien informés nous l'apprennent si, à côté de quelques gentlemen-peintres, d'autres sont trop absorbés dans leurs rêves et soucis pour réagir au nom de la reconnaissance ou de la critique. Félicitations ou reproches ne sont pas d'ailleurs pour changer le cours de la chronique d'art.

J'ai conscience de n'exprimer en général qu'une opinion "moyenne" sur les gens et les choses, en dépit parfois de mes sentiments personnels, précisément parce que le journal s'adresse à la masse autant qu'à l'élite et n'est d'aucune école. Mais, au moins, cette attitude obligée je la reprocher la sincérité à qui que ce soit, surtout si l'on tient compte que les chroniques sont forcément rédigées à la hâte au retour de visites pressées. Le pseudo de Reynald est resté libre de toute attache; il efface l'individu et sa jeunesse derrière une garantie d'honnêteté; l'inconnu peut jouer le tour d'empêcher que l'on soit "reconnu" parfois même par les siens mais rassure probablement le grand public.

Louée, parfois critiquée, citée, tra-maintiens au coin de l'impartialité et de la recherche de la vérité, en dehors des influences et des castes, du bluff, des partis-pris, de la publicité intempestive, des admirations béates, du catichisme, — ce à quoi je me suis toujours exercé, même dans les autres domaines (musique, théâtre, cinéma, etc.) On diffère d'opinion en matières d'art plus qu'ailleurs. Personne, toutefois, ne pourra les françaises et hollandaises contemporaines, aquarelles de Miss E.-M.-B. Warren; chez Morgan, affiches de voyage rassemblées par l'agence Cook; — chez Eaton, sujets historiques de Harold-W. Lapalme.

La "Presse" dénonce le racket des reproductions illégales (N.B., ces jours-ci, on peut voir encore dans les magasins 5-10-15 de petites reproductions signées de Louis Icart, que duite, incidemment plagiée, la jeune chronique d'art de la "Presse" a poursuivi dans le calme son tour des expositions, tandis qu'à côté d'elle le coin artistique d'un autre journal subissait des éclipses sérieuses, que la récapitulation mensuelle d'un troisième verse graduellement dans le pessimisme intelligent mais cruel, que de temps à autre un article écrit ailleurs sert en fricassée tardive l'ensemble des opinions parues avant, que le reste est un silence à peine entrecoupé par de rares considérations quelquefois plus bêtes encore que le silence.

Espoirs

Les expositions se répètent; un air de critique d'art nous la démontre suffisamment. Bientôt, si Dieu prête vie à la chronique, devra-t-elle sans doute se dégrader et se permettre des essais d'orientation. Peut-être alors me permettrai-je de revendiquer plus d'interprétation et d'idéalisme dans l'art de tous les jours, et oserai-je à cette même place vous dire, par exemple, à l'occasion de la Noël, ami lecteur, combien je m'étonne, même du strict point de vue esthétique, que le Christ soit si absent de notre oeuvre artistique.

Pour l'heure, voici l'activité artistique des derniers douze mois, aperçue dans les seules mentions des sujets de nos chroniques de 1933.

Juillet-Août

Article spécial consacré à Edouard-É. Galea, sculpteur maltais établi à Montréal. Choix d'oeuvres canadiennes au salon Heintz, à Atlantic-City.

Le 22 août, la "Presse" reçoit une moitié de toile de Marc-Aurèle Fortin, l'une des 16 volées au Salon du Printemps, avec demande de rançon aux artistes. Reynald se met en communication avec un journal anglais qui avait reçu l'autre moitié, mais n'y avait pas pris garde. Le lendemain, deux artistes disent consentir à la rançon. Le 24, la "Presse" annonce sensationnellement, d'après des renseignements exclusifs, que le voleur est connu. Le 25, Forbes renonce à payer rançon; Reynald per-l'artiste lui-même assure n'avoir jamais autorisées).

Les dessins originaux du Mickey Mouse et des Silly Symphonies de Walt Disney font le tour des États-Unis en exposition.

Et ainsi, en des modalités diverses, dans des mesures inégales, à travers des tempéraments différents, l'Art continue le resplendissement du Vrai...

Old Master Destroyed By Flames

Herald Jan. 3/34

$300,000 "Angel's Choir" By Van Dyck Lost — Private Collection.

Picture's History

Ottawa, Jan. 3. — Through the ravages of fire, Canada today was apprized of the destruction of one of the three celebrated canvasses each known as the "Angel's Choir" or "Concert Des Anges" which have been attributed to the brush of the famous Flemish master Van Dyck.

News that the lone painting of this subject in existence on this continent had been destroyed, came following a survey of damage caused by a blaze which struck at the heart of a private art collection yesterday in the home of John Gleeson, prominent Ottawa businessman.

In addition to the reputed Van Dyck, several other paintings and prized treasures were burned or damaged by smoke and water, with loss estimated in excess of $300,000.

Suffering from the effect of shock, Mr. Gleeson was still in hospital today, but he had recovered sufficiently to discuss briefly with reporters what he described as his "irreparable loss" chief among which he said was the "Angel's Choir." It is reported he acquired this canvas for about $150,000, but Mr. Gleeson would not disclose the actual amount.

Checked History Of Famed Painting

This painting he said had originally been taken out of Belgium by Napoleon's soldiers. Later it had found its way to Albany, N.Y. and then to the home of a well-known Nova Scotia family, with whom it had remained for about 90 years. Mr. Gleeson revealed he had purchased the painting "about five or six years ago," after he had satisfied himself that it was a genuine Van Dyck.

The great masters, Mr. Gleeson said, often had made several models of the same subject. In this case there had been three. One of these was now believed to be in Rome, another had been stolen in December 1929 while being shipped from Brussels, Belgium, to an art dealer in London.

"The other, and I believe the finest of the three came into my possession, but it is gone," Mr. Gleeson lamented. Several authorities, he declared, had passed upon his painting as an authentic Van Dyck, but apart from this assurance he had also despatched a representative to Europe to check on its history, which Mr. Gleeson said had proved the canvas genuine to his own satisfaction.

Disappearance of Another Famous Canvas Recalled

London, Jan. 3.—(C. P. Cable) — Destruction by fire in Ottawa of the painting "Angel's Choir," ascribed to Van Dyck, brought to mind in London's Art colony today the sensational disappearance just four years ago of the canvas "Concert Des Anges" also credited to the great Flemish master.

Details of the loss on Dec. 31, 1929 of the $150,000 master-piece were vague and have not unravelled themselves.

M. Bechbache, Belgian owner of the painting, had personally supervised its packing in Brussels, and sent it to Godfrey Phillips, a West End art dealer in London. Opening the packing case in the British capital, however, Mr. Phillips found the canvas, which measured five feet six inches by four feet three inches, was completely cut from the frame.

The Belgian connoisseur lodged a protest with the King's Prosecutor against person or persons unknown. The British customs had failed to notice the absence of the famed painting. The Brussels Branch of Lloyd's, famous insurance house, offered a reward of $40,000 for the return of the canvas.

The bride was formerly Miss Mathilde Savard, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Savard, of Sherbrooke, her marriage to Mr. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., having taken place at Daytona Beach on November 23.

Montreal Artist and Bride Receive.

Mr. M. A. de Foy Suzor-Cote and Mrs. Suzor-Cote held a reception recently at their apartment at Daytona Beach, Florida, for members of the Canadian colony there. The rooms were decorated very attractively with yellow and white chrysanthemums in the sun parlor and yellow roses with coral and orange gladioli and greenery in the living room, where the host and hostess received their guests. Large yellow chrysanthemums decorated the buffet in the dining room and the same flowers were arranged in jardinières at the entrance to the room. Mrs. Suzor-Cote, who before her marriage was Miss Mathilde Savard, of Sherbrooke, was wearing her wedding gown of white satin, completed with beaded cape. This is the first reception held by Mr. and Mrs. Suzor-Cote since their marriage on November 23. Among the guests were Judge and Mrs. Albert Malouin, Miss Jacqueline de Courval, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lee Riggs, and others from Quebec City; Miss Frances McGovern, of Montreal; and a number from places in Ontario, Prince Edward Island and other parts of Canada. Mr. and Mrs. Suzor-Cote will give a similar affair for their American friends before leaving for Nassau and Jamaica.

Montreal Art Association

The annual New Year's Day reception will be held at the Art Association of Montreal next Monday afternoon from 4 to 6 o'clock. This reception will also be the occasion of the opening of the exhibition of the Canadian Group of Painters. This will be the first showing in Montreal of the work of this group, which includes a number of Montreal painters, some of them well known, and was formed this year as a growth of the Toronto Group Seven.

English Town Lends Pictures To Its Citizens

The well known town of Bournemouth has long been distinguished as an enterprising place; it has for years had an orchestra which has made quite a name for itself, it has an excellent concert hall and it has a small art gallery, the director of which has lately found a new use for such galleries. People, he thinks, need to see pictures at home more than in public galleries, and are getting tired of bare walls in their houses, without pictures. He has therefore started a "circulating art gallery"; citizens of Bournemouth can now subscribe to this gallery as they can to a lending library and get the use of pictures which they change from time to time. For an annual payment of a guinea (five dollars), each subscriber gets four pictures, which are changed at the end of three months.

"This personal contact with the 'masters' and other works of art, and pride in their temporary possession, will encourage people to take a much more personal interest in art generally, it is claimed, and in the gallery in particular.

Once residents have actually had the privilege of handling some of these works, and of seeing them daily in their own homes and showing them to friends, they will feel that the gallery has a more personal touch.

In this way people will appreciate the gallery more as belonging to themselves, and the art it contains as part of their glorious inheritance, rather than thinking about it all somewhat nebulously as something to do with the Corporation.

There is another way in which the gallery authorities will benefit, and that is financially. The present funds of the gallery can only provide for extension of the art treasures at a small rate—a rate which is estimated to take a hundred years to double the collection.

The revenue gained by making the present pictures "earn their own keep," as it were, is wanted for increasing the collection at a more rapid rate by the purchase not only of the works of the great national artists, including the "masters," but the works of outstanding local artists, of whom there are many.

Four classes of residents are singled out as being likely to be particularly attracted by the scheme—newly-weds who have no pictures; those who have moved without their pictures and are "starting all over again"; those whose innate love of art has, after a game fight, been smothered by the sheer horror of pictorial heirlooms (you know the type!); and connoisseurs, for whom a change is good as much as for ordinary people.

HONOR E. LIONEL JUDAH

First Canadian to Receive British Museums Award

In recognition of his 37 years' work in connection with the museums of McGill University, E. Lionel Judah, director of the university's museums, has been awarded the diploma of the British Museums Association in Art and Science, according to an announcement made yesterday. Mr. Judah is the first Canadian to be thus honored and the second recipient of the award living outside of Great Britain, the other being a museum director in Singapore.

While the award was made several months ago, announcement was withheld until yesterday.

Pictures by A. Bercovitch Make Good Show

Star Dec. 27/343

A small collection of the work of Aleksander Bercovitch was shown at Sidney Carter's gallery last season. It contained some remarkable Oriental studies of places and men and some very interesting decorative designs, mostly formed from oriental ideas. Some works of the same kind are shown again in the larger collection which is now to be seen at Eaton's gallery, with a number of pictures and sketches made in Montreal and its neighborhood, and, all together, they give a far better impression of Mr. Bercovitch's unusual abilities.

The oriental pictures, mostly in water color or tempera, are of fine effects of the color and form of buildings in Bokhara, Ashkhabad and other places in central Asia, and of strong portrait studies of natives of that part of the world. Completely contrasted with these, but quite as good, are the Canadian pictures, mostly oil paintings. These are freely and boldly painted studies of atmosphere, light and reflections in streets and woods and on ships in Montreal harbour and they show another side of the painter's skill. One picture, called "Grey Day," has a striking effect of distance and atmosphere on a green hillside with rocks; "L'autome passe," which hangs next to it, also has delightful color and atmosphere and the simplicity of the means in both pictures is surprising. Several little studies called "Summer" are very good and specially one of reflections on a wet pavement, and there are several good tree studies. Some of the street pictures have excellent effects of splashes of light falling through trees on buildings and there is a good sketch of a street under snow. The harbour pictures show the same feeling for light and its reflections and the forms of the ships make fine effects. Of a different kind is "The Day's Ending," a very striking picture of strong green trees seen against a vivid pink sky; yet another picture which is full of light and warmth is a large view of an eastern verandah.

Art Is Taken Seriously in the United States

Whatever effect the recent Century of Progress Exhibition at Chicago may have had on American industry, it is claimed that the great display of works of art, which was a part of that exhibition, has had or will have important consequences. In some United States papers the belief is expressed that this exhibition ranks "as a milestone in the building of a more general artistic culture in the United States."

Further efforts in the same direction of establishing culture are to be made by a new organization which has been formed by the joint work of the American Artists' Professional League and the governing board of the National Commission to Advance American Art. The general purpose of this new organization is stated to be "first towards national art recovery in a lasting sense, and to aid artists and craftsmen who would otherwise be forgotten in the present enormous recovery activities." The methods to be used for this end include steps towards teaching appreciation of art in schools and also to adults, and a campaign to arouse Americans to a consciousness of the merit of American art. The new foundation does not yet seem to have received a name, and its plans and aims are to be more exactly decided at a meeting to be held for the purpose in January.

Fourteen Works of Falardeau Left in Will of Late Col. W. M. Macpherson

(By The Canadian Press.)

Quebec, December 31.—Fourteen paintings ranking high in the list of the French-Canadian artists' work have been given to the province through the will of the late Colonel William Molson Macpherson, of this city, who died on August 13 of this year. The pictures are the work of A. S. Falardeau, of Cap Sante, who died about half a century ago after making a lasting name for himself through his portrait work.

Most of the 14 paintings consist of copies which Falardeau made during trips to Europe of the works of Italian masters, and others. The paintings will be hung in the provincial museum on Battlefields Park.

The paintings consist of Beatrice Cenci (after Guido Reni) 1859; Ste. Catherine (after Paul Veronese)

1854; Young Woman Reading a Letter (Urfini Gallery, Florence 1857; portrait after Carlo Dolci (Urfini Gallery) 1852; La Fornaria (after Raphael) 1853; Madeleine (after Titian Petti) 1869; San Spirito (after Guercino, Urfini Gallery, 1865; The Triumph of Charity (after Barocci) 1860; Environs of Rome (after Paul Ferg) 1856; portrait of Michel Angelo; portrait of Raphael; Madonna (after Carlo Dolci) 1857.

KRIEHOFF SHOW HELD IN TORONTO

Gazette-Jan. 11/34
Affords Comprehensive View of Art of Painter Specializing in Pioneering Scenes

(Written for The Canadian Press by Marius Barbeau).

Toronto, January 8.—For the first time, Canadian art lovers may gain a comprehensive view of the achievements of a true pioneer whose standing in the world of art still has to be determined. The current exhibition at the Art Gallery of Toronto of 77 paintings by Cornelius Krieghoff, who died in 1873, satisfies a need long felt, often expressed.

Born, educated and travelled abroad though he was, Cornelius Krieghoff preferred Canada's Eastern woodlands and rural settlements to anything he had seen elsewhere, and spent his career as their highly creative interpreter in terms of pictures. Indeed, his pictures of early Canadian life, as shown in this exhibition, place him in the front rank of the initiators of modern art on this continent.

And he is far more than a primitive. His work at its best has weathered the assaults of time, obscurity and remoteness. It is still vital and refreshing, and holds the affection of those who for many years have treasured it as a heirloom. Varied and resourceful, it embraces French-Canadian and Indian folk life, river and forest lore, as they were in the early days, autumn and winter landscapes in an inspired vein, and even illustrated fiction, portraiture and still life. He belongs somewhere among the world pioneers whose contribution to art is nowhere else duplicated.

His craftsmanship, except for non-professional schooling in Rotterdam, where he was born in 1815, was developed on this continent. Out of humble beginnings it advanced and improved so much in the 30 years of his active career that his work falls into distinctive periods and types. His early Longueuil and Montreal period (1841-1853) is interesting chiefly as one of formation. Yet it furnished some fine canvases and valuable themes, for instance "The Ice Bridge at Longueuil," "Winter Landscape—1849," "The Lent," and several others in this showing.

But the Quebec period (1853-1866) is incomparably his best and most productive. It constitutes a record of early life of great wealth and an art utterance that is hardly excelled on the continent even at the present day. Year after year, till 1863, it went on improving till he painted his glorious "Merry-making at Jolifou's," where a crowd of revellers break out at dawn in the winter and start on their way home; his "After the Ball" or his "Playtime at the Village School." Here his foreground figures, numerous and spontaneous-like as those of Peter Breughel, the ancient Flemish painter, blend admirably with a background that can hardly be bettered for local color and authenticity. Some fine canvases bear a later date, 1865 and 1866, when he visited Lake Huron and the country of the Chippewa Indians; or even 1870 and 1871, two years before his death in Chicago where he still painted splendid scenes of the Laurentians in winter.

His life was that of a true artist and Bohemian, a citizen of the world and born linguist. An amateur naturalist, he was an excellent woodsman. He preferred the St. Lawrence to anything he had seen in his nomadic life throughout Europe and the eastern United States.

If Krieghoff created Quebec with its inhabitants, Indians and landscapes, Quebec richly returned the compliment. It made him into a painter whose message to posterity gains steadily in value and prestige, and whose art deserves international recognition. Quebec in him found its self-expression with a joy of life, a pioneering spirit and a fanciful realism which are her very own.

Quebec furnished the themes, the artist supplied the genius, and the small cultured class of the old town was only too glad to pay the piper. The Quebec bourgeois and military took the art and the artist, foreign-born though he was, to its heart, acquired many of his pictures, enjoyed them a lifetime, and passed them on to their heirs as souvenirs of the happy days long since past but not altogether forgotten.

The paintings will be shown later in Ottawa and Montreal.

VANDYKE PAINTING DESTROYED BY FIRE

Jan. 3/34 Star

Also Burn in Blaze at Ottawa

OTTAWA, Jan. 3 — (C.P.) — The celebrated canvas known as the "Angel's Choir" or "Concert des Anges" attributed to Vandyke, the famous Flemish master, was burned here, it became known yesterday after a survey of damage caused by a fire in a private art collection at the home of John Gleeson, prominent Ottawa businessman. This picture was one of three canvases bearing the same title and dealing with the same subject.

In addition to the reputed Vandyke, several other paintings and prized treasures were burned or damaged by smoke and water, the loss being estimated at over $300,000.

Suffering from the effect of shock, Mr. Gleeson was still in hospital today, but he had recovered sufficiently to discuss briefly with reporters what he described as his "irreparable loss" chief among which he said was the "Angel's Choir." It is reported that he acquired this canvas for about $150,000, but Mr. Gleeson would not disclose the actual amount.

HISTORY OF PICTURE

This painting, he said, had originally been taken out of Belgium by Napoleon's soldiers. Later, it had found its way to Albany, N.Y., and then to the home of a well-known Nova Scotia family, where it had remained for about 90 years. Mr. Gleeson purchased the painting "about five or six years ago," after he had satisfied himself that it was a genuine Vandyke.

The great masters, Mr. Gleeson said, often had made several models of the same subject. In this case there had been three. One of these was now believed to be in Rome, another had been stolen in December, 1929, while being shipped from Brussels, Belgium, to an art dealer in London. "The other, and I believe the finest of the three came into my possession, but it is gone," Mr. Gleeson lamented. Several authorities, he declared, had passed on his painting as an authentic Vandyke, but apart from this assurance he had also dispatched a representative to Europe to check on its history, which, Mr. Gleeson said, had proved the canvas genuine to his own satisfaction.

Other masterpieces destroyed in the same fire were the "Late Arrival" by Frank Brangwyn, the British master; "Marguerite and Mephisto" by the Frenchman Delacroix; "The Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine," by Pietro Paolini, acquired from the collection of the Earl of Northbrook, a Dutch masterpiece by Bauer, "Etrete" by Courbeils, two canvases by Joseph Israels and single works by such noted artists as Corot, Fantin Latour, Daubigny, Charles Jacques and Monticelli.

Slight damage was also done to the furnishings, but the fire was brought under control before it had gained great headway. The cause of the outbreak has not yet been discovered.

Mr. Gleeson suggested that the Vandyke as it stood in his house at the time of the fire might be worth $40,000. "But it was not for sale, and no one was ever asked to place a price on it; I had not thought of disposing of it."

The "Angel's Choir" was a representation of the Madonna with the Holy Child in her arms, and with four angels about her feet, playing musical instruments.

Disappearance in 1929 Recalled

LONDON, Jan. 3.—(C. P. Cable)—The destruction by fire in Ottawa of the painting "Angel's Choir," ascribed to Vandyke, brought to mind in London's art colony today the sensational disappearance just four years ago of the canvas "Concert des Anges," which was also credited to Van Dyck.

Details of the loss on December 31, 1929, of the $150,000 masterpiece were vague and have not been fully disclosed.

M. Bechbach, Belgian owner of the painting, had personally supervised its packing in Brussels and sent it to Godfrey Phillips, a West End art dealer in London. Opening the packing case at its destination, Mr. Phillips found that the canvas, which measured five feet six inches by four feet three inches, had been completely cut from the frame.

The British custom officials had failed to notice the absence of the painting. The Brussels branch of Lloyd's, famous insurance house, offered a reward of $40,000 for the return of the canvas.

Drawings for 'Punch' at the Art Association

Star-Jan. 11/34

The collection of original "Punch" drawings which, brought to this country by the National Gallery of Canada, is now being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal, is made up almost entirely of the work of four men, but they are the four men whose work did most to make the fame of Punch in the world. John Leech, whose first work for the paper was in its fourth number, in 1841,—is the earliest of them; the others all began to draw for it before his work came to an end, Charles Keene beginning in 1851, Sir John Tenniel in 1851 and going on till 1901, and George Du Maurier in 1860. And all their drawings are well worth seeing and studying on their merits as drawings, even if their humor is sometimes a little worn out or needs explanation. There are about 150 drawings in the collection, of which nearly half are by Leech; many of them are quite beautiful drawings and together they make a record of the history, dress and habits of British people, which almost exactly covers the reign of Queen Victoria. A quantity of printed pages and proofs adds to the value of the collection.

In the earlier days Punch's pictures were all woodcuts, and it appears that woodcutting was not entirely given up by Punch till 1901,—about the time of the latest of these drawings,—though process engraving was used on the paper before that. The Leech drawings are quite rough sketches for the finished drawings, which were made directly on the wood block. The works of the other three men are finished drawings; Tenniel's are in pencil,—beautifully fine and delicate pencil work such as would be very hard to get nowadays; Du Maurier's work is mostly in black ink, Keene's in brown ink, and in both cases the drawings are finished as they appeared in print and could have been used for photo-engraving. The Du Maurier drawings are not very late ones; in his latest work failing sight obliged him to work on a larger scale, and the drawings were reduced for printing.

The exhibition makes it clear how and why the pictures in Punch, even if they have not always been the funniest in the world's comic papers, have consistently been among the best drawn.

Pictures Of Flowers

At Eaton's gallery there is now being shown a collection of pictures,—between thirty and forty of them,—by Mrs. Beatrice Robertson of Toronto. Her work is already well known here and a similar exhibition was held in the same gallery last winter. There are flowers of all kinds,—garden flowers and wild flowers,—Mrs. Robertson knows them all and paints them in a simple and direct way which gives her pictures much of the charm of the flowers themselves. They are painted alone or in all sorts of groupings and in all sorts of lights, and the pictures are all true and faithful portraits and very decorative.

Some pictures by Arthur Heming of Toronto will be shown at this gallery, in addition to Mrs. Robertson's pictures, opening at the end of this week.

Chinese Art At McGill Library

The current exhibition in the gallery of the McGill University Library is one of Chinese prints in color. Most of them are evidently quite modern but a few are either old or drawn in imitation of older work; some may be modern prints from old blocks. A few more explanatory labels would add greatly to the value of the exhibition. All, with very few exceptions, are pictures of figures,—single figures of gods or demons, some of groups of gods and some evidently of groups of actors and stage scenes. The single figures of gods,—some of them intended for use as charms,—are mostly old-fashioned and formal in their drawing; some of them are printed on elaborate, rather over-decorated backgrounds, and some on red paper which is cut into lace patterns. In the more modern prints, especially the stage scenes, the drawing is often quite realistic, particularly in the drapery, though there is generally some resemblance to old Chinese ways of painting. They are all quite unlike Japanese color prints. The colors used in many of the newer prints are distinctly crude; there is a red, which is often used, which seems to give a good example of the bad effects of the exportation to the East of European

Dinnerware, Produced in Canada, On Display

Toronto, February 19. — Fine China from Hamilton potteries, said to be the first dinnerware produced in Canada, went on display today at the Royal Ontario Museum, under the direction of Dr. C. T. Curdell, museum director.

The various pieces of a dinner set were set up, flanked by the "saggers"—containers—in which they were fired, and the ingredients which went into their fabrication: bitstone from Lac Seul, Que., plaster of Paris from Hillsboro, N.B., feldspar from Verona, Ont., ball clay from Saskatchewan, kaolin from Georgia, flint from Ohio, and various clays from Kentucky.

From the individual clays to the rich ivory and white of the finished and decorated dish, each step in the making of fine pottery was illustrated. The ware was shown in its "green" form, after coming from the molds; as "bisque," after the first firing; "glaze," after dipping and second firing; and decorated, after the transfer of the various designs, which are set by a final trip to the kilns.

"Montrealer" Jan. 6/34

The Canadian Group of Painters, whose exhibition held in the galleries of the Art Association opens January fifteenth, is an enlargement of the Group of Seven, whose work has had to withstand much adverse criticism from those who, hidebound by tradition, clung tenaciously to the 'pretty pretty' school of art, and refused to recognize this modern spirit which trampled upon all they held so dear. In many minds, too there arose the idea that these artists held themselves aloof, and were unsympathetic to outsiders. This was at no time true, probably no group of painters has done more in Canada to stimulate and encourage young artists in whom they saw ability, new energy and vision as the Group of Seven. It was this desire which led them to invite outsiders to exhibit with them, thus increasing their numbers until it was decided to remain no longer the Group of Seven, but to establish the Canadian Group of Painters, of which there are now twenty-eight members. Toronto's recognition of this modern school came before that of Montreal, possibly due to the fact that the artists were in the main of Ontario, and that the scenes they painted were mostly all of Muskoka, Georgian Bay and Algonquin districts. That which is familiar always has an added appeal, and their work was done with such strength and clarity of understanding that even the most prejudiced were forced to fall into line and champion them, while Montreal, less familiar with these scenes, rebelled against the wind-swept trees, bleak pools and barren rocks. But it was not long before they invaded the Saint Lawrence and the Laurentian districts, and possibly this has done much to sway Montreal opinion towards a more favourable issue. Too, it will be noticed that some of the artists of the original group, who displayed what was to many an exaggerated sophistication in their work, have climbed down from their exalted heights, while many of the new members have ascended still higher. Although many of the members have held private exhibitions from time to time in Montreal, we have never before had the opportunity of viewing such a large and representative collection of this group's work as that to be held this month, when more than a hundred pictures will be on view. Mr. Lawrence Harris, president of the Canadian Group of Painters, and Mr. Will Ogilvie, are in Montreal now, to supervise the hanging of these pictures. While here, they will be the guests of Miss Prudence Heward.

BOLDNESS IS KEYNOTE

Comment Excited by Pictures of Artists in Numerical Extension of Well-known Toronto Coterie

Works by members of the "Canadian Group of Painters" now being exhibited in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, are exciting plenty of comment and drawing a good attendance. This band of painters—a numerical extension of the old Group of Seven—are a hard-working lot with individual views, fired with determination to express themselves in a personal way, even if their interpretations suggest that all that past ages have contributed to the development of Art is now distinctly demode. As exponents of a phase of Canadian painting, they have won place in a country certainly big enough to harbor comfortably many more groups with differing aspirations. To pretend, as do their sympathetic followers, that their work is THE Canadian painting is to bestow an honor scarcely warranted by performance thus far.

The creed of these painters is aptly outlined in a foreword to the catalogue, as follows:

"The Canadian Group of Painters is a direct out-growth of the Group of Seven—all members of which are in the new group which numbers twenty-eight—drawn from the whole of Canada. Its policy is to encourage and foster the growth of Art in Canada which has a national character, not necessarily of time and place, but also expressive of its philosophy, and a wide appreciation of the right of Canadian artists to find beauty and character in their surroundings. To extend the frontiers of art and to bring it to a more common language of expression is also a part of its aim. Hitherto it has been a narrow, typical of all new movements, but here and there figures and portraits have been slow to add to the subject matter, strengthening and occupying the background of landscape. Here also more modern ideas of technique and subject have been brought into the scope of Canadian painting, keeping the art in the van of our forward stride as a nation."

EFFECTIVE PAINTINGS.

Of course the lover of the moderate and normal is going to suffer some shocks, but the ultra-extreme note is not sounded by all. Bertram Brooker is effective in "Still Life With Bag," and Frank Carmichael verges on the poetic in "Evening" and "Hilltops"—simple forms engagingly arranged. Emily Carr in "The Mountain" suggests height and bulk. A. J. Casson in "Thunderstorm" shows wooden buildings, a rutted road with puddles, and over all the odd, livid light that precedes such atmospheric disturbance. Charles F. Comfort has strong brushwork in "Unpainted Barn" and Lawren Harris is concerned with design in "Mountains in Snow" and "Island, Georgian Bay." Prudence Heward among her offerings has "The Bather"—a seated woman in bathing dress, with rocks and water—which is uncomfortable in pose, disagreeable in color and lacking in grace. If these elements are pitfalls to be avoided, the work is an outstanding success.

In portraiture, R. S. Hewton sounds a gay color note with the yellow dress in "Miss Audry Cook" with violin. "Miss Margot Macdougall" is his other offering. Lilias Torrance Newton, besides a portrait of Frances McCall, has as other subjects A. H. S. Gilson and Eric Brown.

Among the works by Edwin H. Holgate are "Laurentian Valley," a snowscape put in with decision, and "The Break Up," a northern stream with riven ice beneath rounded hills. A. Y. Jackson has two typical winter scenes—"Road to Baie St. Paul" and "Winter, Charlevoix County" in which the glow of sunlight is effectively suggested. Arthur Lismer shows boldness in the painting of rock and timber in "Pine Wrack," and H. Mabel May shows good design and mass in a canvas called "In the Bay"—rolling water and rocks touched with patches of snow under a darkening sky.

George Pepper, besides "Totem Poles, Skeena River," shows two marines which are an acquired taste. Albert H. Robinson is effective in his two winter scenes—"Sun Clad Hills" and "Village in the Valley."

Others exhibiting are Lemoine Fitzgerald, Bess Housner, Thoreau Macdonald, Yvonne McKague, Isabel McLaughlin, Will Ogilvie, Sarah M. Robertson, Annie Savage, Frederick H. Varley and W. P. Weston.

The exhibition also includes works by invited contributors—John Alfson sends a seated nude; Andre Bieler, with a habitant outdoor oven; Hazel M. Caverhill, with a painting of cyclamen which is nicely arranged and well painted; Paraskeva Clark, with a self-portrait; Nora F. E. Collyer, with "December Thaw, Eastern Townships"; Kathleen Daly, with a bold, sincerely painted view of a street under snow at St. Urbain, which shows a marked advance; Kathleen M. Morris, with two street scenes; Adrien Hebert with a directly handled port scene, and Marc A. Fortin with a typical bit of the city—"Landscape at Hochelaga." Others showing in this section are Charles G. Eliot, Mary R. Eliot, Mabel Lockerby, Marjorie Meredith, Carl Schaefer, Ethel Seath and Gordon Webber.

Notable Displays Feature Start Of New Year

Star Jan. 3/34

By MARIUS BARBEAU,
Curator of the National Museum,
Ottawa.

OTTAWA, Jan. 3. — (C. P.) — If business recovery follows the lead of art, it will soon be out of the woods. For the year begins with three outstanding exhibitions of paintings: The first Canadian group shown in Montreal, on New Year's Day, a century of French painting, in Ottawa, and the Krieghoff exhibition, opening on the 5th, at the Art Gallery of Toronto.

The French exhibition bids fair to be a memorable event in our three cities, Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal, where it will be held this winter. For it can hardly be surpassed for the glory of its 110 pictures and the story it tells of a century of progress in a field of art in which France led the world. It follows close on the heels of the splendid display of contemporary French art at the Chicago World's Fair, where a whole room was devoted to Cezanne alone, the modern genius who recently fought the modernists' battle.

LIVELY INTEREST

It was timely that Canadians should acquaint themselves further with the growth of art abroad, since they show a lively interest in their own advance in landscape painting. So the National Gallery arranged for this exhibition covering no less than four important art movements; these have left indelible marks upon contemporary painting as we know it today. The exhibition opens on the evening of January 3, with the reception by the Governor-General of over 2,000 invited guests and the visit of the collection occupying all the second floor of the National Gallery.

The feature the least familiar first attracts attention: A small but impressive set of post-impressionist paintings by Cezanne, Gauguin, Van Gogh and a few others. Here we marvel at the freshness and beauty of a new vision of the world and respond to the throb of creative inspiration.

Who will fail to rise to Gauguin's gorgeous picture "Bretagne?" That strange genius, ignored in Paris, turned his back upon civilization and adopted the ways of Tahiti, where he lived among Polynesians and died after writing his "Noa-Noa." There he painted canvases that breathe primeval power.

SOUTH SEAS PICTURES.

Two of his famous South Seas pictures are exhibited here: "Tahiti" and "L'Offrande," also his "Paysage de Martinique." They are perhaps the most remarkable contribution in the whole exhibition.

Cezanne is represented by no less than 10 numbers, a large order in itself. Pictures by this towering master no longer are easily available, though he, like Gauguin, had to die in poverty before winning universal recognition. His "Maison de Zola" ranks second to none here. The two portraits, of "Madame Cezanne" and of his son, are equally vital. A few still life pictures, and his large "L'Enlèvement," show further his amazing versatility.

Van Gogh comes next with four pictures, the most striking of which are "Les Oliviers" and "Ciel Mouvementé." Both of these were lent by H. S. Southam, of Ottawa. If the bulk of this collection was first exhibited in London and belongs to art collectors abroad, not a few of its valuable items are the property of Canadian connoisseurs, by whom they were lent.

EIGHT RENAISSANCE

Of the impressionists whose methods once revolutionized painting, the best represented here is Renoir, with eight pictures, some of which are outstanding for their beauty and iridescence; in particular, "Baigneuse," "Jeune Fille," and "La Songeuse." Monet, Pissarro and Sisley also hold their own with fine examples of their work; among others, Monet with his "Waterloo Bridge," "Mer Agitée" and other landscapes.

The Barbizon school, long familiar here, is granted a good share of space, with Corot, Millet, Degas, Daubigny.

Several good examples of Courbet bring us back to the time when France responded to the influence of the British landscape painters, Turner and Constable. French painters with him began to paint outdoors either landscapes or the activities of the people. It was the self assertion of the lower classes in art, after the downfall of aristocracy.

Delacroix is well represented here. Like Courbet, but before him, he painted in "Plein Air," but only grand or romantic subjects from the Levant, after the campaigns of Napoleon in Egypt.

Ingres is as far back as this exhibition will take us, with only a small portrait, a good one, in the neo-classic vein of the Court of Napoleon, the Emperor.

Another noteworthy feature of this magnificent show is a number of fine pictures by Puvis de Chavanne, the greatest of modern mural painters, in particular, his "Vendanges"; by Daumier, the powerful humorist, with two of his famous characterizations, "Le Wagon des Troisleins Classe," and "Les Connoisseurs"; and by Carrière, the most Parisian, yet spiritual, of all the modern French painters, with his mystic "Jean Dolent et sa Fille."

Art News From England and America

Star Jan. 3/34

The United States Government has a proposal to do something for the relief of American artists by employing some 2,500 painters, sculptors and craftsmen to work on the decoration of public buildings. This is hailed as being the first official recognition of art by the United States Government. With so large a number of workers as 2,500 it is obvious that the quality of the work done will be very unequal, and some doubts are expressed as to whether this plan will do much to help art, however much it may help the artists.

Trouble often arises when works of art get in to the law-courts or the custom house. A London firm of art dealers is having trouble with the customs over some pictures made by patching together pieces of woven stuff and metal foil, etc., with only a little painting. The firm in question claims that they are pictures to be assessed like paintings, the customs' view is that they ought to be classed as "commercial tapestries." The doubt is still unsettled and probably lawyers will have to settle it.

Notes of Art In Montreal

Pictures entered in the competition for the Brynmor Memorial Prize must be delivered to the Art Association of Montreal, with entry forms, duly filled out, not later than Monday, January 15th.

A collection of photography reproductions of pictures by European masters is being shown in the print room of the Art Association. These are part of a recent gift to the Association by Mr. W. A. Scott. There are about seventy of them and they reproduce some of the principal works of some of the greatest painters who worked before the year 1800. There are no primitive works among them and the Dutch and English schools are those which are the best represented.

The interest in the Royal Academy Exhibition of British Art that opens in Burlington House next month grows each day as knowledge of the treat in store increases. Twenty-three Gainsboroughs have been definitely promised and eleven Turners, including Lord Strathcona's "Mercury and Argus." The list includes many by Constable, Reynolds, Romney, Zoffany and ten by Crome. Scotland is well represented with no less than ten works by Raeburn and five by Allan Ramsay. It will be interesting to see Hogarth's "March to Finchley" again; not because of its intrinsic value but because it so shocked George II. that he refused to buy a picture not flattering to his army. Hogarth then raffled it and the Foundling Hospital won the prize with the tickets he turned over to them.

As usual, the exhibition has evoked a crop of books about British art. "The Listener," that well-informed periodical published by the B.B.C., not only reproduces about twenty of the pictures to be shown, but has an informative article appraising the merits of the different books on the subject which have appeared, by Sir Charles Holmes, the former director of the National Gallery.

Progressive Painters Give Exhibition

Star Jan. 3/34

With most commendable fairness, the Art Association of Montreal has lent two of its largest galleries for three weeks to the Canadian Group of Painters, in succession to the Royal Canadian Academy, for an exhibition which opened this week and is to remain till January 21st. It is evidently only just that, if a body of 28 painters, with some outside supporters, claims to have something that is worth seeing, it should at least be given a chance of showing it, and the people who like these pictures least will have to admit that they can express their dislike far more clearly and forcibly after than before seeing the pictures.

FEWER PICTURES

This exhibition has one advantage over that of the Academy in the fact that there are far fewer pictures in it. This allows of fairly wide spacing between the pictures, which,—always a good thing,—is specially desirable in the case of these, some of which make uncomfortable neighbors for anything else. The policy of the group is stated in general terms in the foreword to the catalogue, and there is nothing at all startling in it. A few of the exhibitors seem to have further aims, one of which may be to show that truth and beauty are not necessarily connected and that neither is essential to a picture; but freedom is evidently another aim and the painters have agreed to differ pretty widely on the questions of what is a good picture and how it should be painted. It should be noted by visitors to the exhibition that many of these pictures are best seen and are meant to be seen from a little distance, and that the other side of the gallery is not too far for some of them.

The pictures, as has been said, differ greatly, the group seems to have a conservative and a radical wing, and some of the more experienced painters are to be found among the conservatives. Two landscapes of snow-covered hills in brilliant sunlight are among the best things that A. Y. Jackson has shown here in recent years; two snow landscapes by Albert Robinson and two by Edwin Holgate are just as good in their own different ways; Thoreau Macdonald has a clever study of evening light, Frank Carmichael some very interesting landscapes of open country, painted in low, sad tones; even Arthur Lismer, who continues to become more of a realist, is fairly conservative in his "Mountain Lake" and his "Milk Weed" and in the painting of his "Boat Deck" with its sloping horizon. F. H. Varley's "Open Window" shows some very distant snow peaks bounding a clever illusion of empty space,—a strange subject for so large a picture; Lemoine Fitzgerald gets much effect with simple means in "Silver Heights," the best of his three pictures. These are all members of the group and fairly conservative, as are, among the invited guests,—Adrien Hebert, with one of the best of his harbor scenes, Kathleen Daly and Marjorie Meredith with cheerful pictures of villages in Quebec and Ontario.

EXCELLENT STUDIES

Among the more conventional portraits and figure pictures are Mr. Holgate's "Interior," a good study of a nude figure, and Andre Bieler's group of habitants in "Les patates." Mrs. Torrance Newton has a pleasant color effect in the greens of a girl's dress against a landscape background, and two fierce and determined men's portraits,—good portraits of Eric Brown and A. H. S. Gilson. Randolph Hewton's two portraits stand out from the other pictures in more ways than one; they are vivid pictures with his usual good line and much better color schemes,—of yellows and greys,—than in some of his recent pictures. A portrait of a man is the more human of two portraits by Gordon Webber.

More radical leanings are to be seen in the pictures,—in their usual manners,—of M. A. Fortin, Sarah Robertson and Kathleen Morris, and in Prudence Heward's portrait of a child. W. P. Weston's rather realistic and decorative mountain pictures may be compared with the symbolic snow peaks of Lawren Harris, and these have a certain affinity with the quite orthodox still life of a white table cloth by Bertram Brooker. Mr. Brooker has also a large picture, almost in monochrome, of strange vegetable growths, and a curious piece of geometry which, at a distance, falls fairly well into a landscape. Mr. Harris has a conventionalized view of a Georgian Bay island, with much gayer color than he has generally used in recent work. A. J. Casson has done better work in water color than in the two oil pictures which he shows here; George Pepper's "Blue Rocks" is rather overfilled with detail, his "Totem Poles" is rather dismal in color.

Conspicuous among the really radical pictures is Charles Comfort's "Unpainted Barn," a conjunction far more than a composition of a barn, a life-sized man's head and a group of small pigs. Will Ogilvie's picture of Negro boatmen is ugly with a sort of strength which suggests that there may be more there for people who can see it; his "Girl and Plant" is a simple kind of diagram. In two large figure pictures, John Alfson's "Nude" and Prudence Heward's "Bather," there is so much ugliness that it hides all other qualities.

Of the remaining pictures of the more than ninety in the exhibition, there are several which are worth seeing, if not very important, some are of the diagrammatic school, and in some simplicity of treatment has been carried to a point where it almost becomes childish. H.P.B.

Les formules neuves du Groupe des Vingt-Huit ont à la fois des avantages et des inconvénients, comme on peut le voir à l'exposition qui se tient de ce temps-ci à la Galerie des Arts. Voici quatre exemples différents: EN HAUT A GAUCHE, portrait de Miss Margot Macdonald, par R.-S. Hewton, où les tons de la chair sont très frais et l'étoffe mauve de la blouse bien rendue, malgré que le fond de la toile soit d'un jaune très citrin; EN HAUT A DROITE, un pied de céleri dans un bloc de jello devient une île de la Baie Georgienne, d'après Lawren Harris;—EN BAS A GAUCHE, Charles Comfort nous donne un spécimen de peinture dite-sociale pour s'apitoyer sur le sort du fermier; c'est très vaste, massif, raide et impossible et cela s'intitule "Unpainted Barn";—EN BAS A DROITE, le portrait de Frances McCall, par Lillias-Torrence Newton, qui sur un fond de verdure juxtaposées montre un visage naturel et expressif. (Clichés de "La Presse").

Aleksander Bercovitch

On parle du secret de la peinture ancienne. Eh! qu'est-ce donc à côté du secret d'une certaine peinture moderne? Le secret des Anciens tient à leurs moyens extraordinaires de faire beau et durable. Celui de certains petits-maitres tient à toutes les peines qu'ils se donnent pour faire laid. Pourquoi laid? Mystère impénétrable, secret des seuls initiés, communion des cerveaux dans des fumées de théories, machiavélisme d'une certaine géométrie appliquée, nihilisme de l'art. Il paraît qu'il y a une certaine philosophie derrière cette caricature de l'art: il s'agit d'exprimer le mouvement plutôt que l'état. Oh! oh! comme si le mouvement ne repose pas sur l'immobile et la relativité sur les pôles de l'absolu! En tout cas, jugez aux fruits: "Much ado about nothing". Et, avec cela, des riens souvent affreux, outrageants.

Tout ceci pour dire qu'il y a exposition d'oeuvres du Groupe des Vingt-Huit (dit: des Peintres Canadiens) à la Galerie des Arts, rue Sherbrooke ouest, jusqu'au 21 janvier.

Le Groupe des Sept a été un signe de contradiction, mais il fallait lui reconnaître au moins d'avoir aéré notre peinture, de lui avoir inculqué un certain sens de l'interprétation qui parle souvent mieux que la pure et simple copie de la nature. Pourquoi fallait-il qu'avant même d'asseoir ses principes d'assez décisive façon il s'alliât un luxe d'éléments hétérogènes et indésirables, qui lui donnent maintenant dans l'ensemble et malgré certaines belles œuvres une allure de Groupe des Refusés. Les Indépendants, les voilà bien! Surréalisme, surréalisme, cubisme et nihilisme s'y cotoient d'une manière bien étrange. On reste abasourdi à visiter l'exposition actuelle.

Un pied de céleri dans un bloc de jello; ça c'est une île. Un amas de je ne sais quoi qui va je ne sais où: cela s'intitule "Croissance" et il y en a pour plusieurs mois avant que cela ne prenne forme. Des villages peuplés de cubes de ciment ou de boîtes de cartons en couleurs criardes. Des arbres avec les branches plus visibles que les feuilles. Des fleurs blanches géantes qu'un malin a prises pour une annonce de lingerie féminine à 34 cents. Une forêt en béton armé. Des pics énormes recouverts de colle ou de glace à gâteaux. Des neiges en farine. Une vision apocalyptique où l'on croit reconnaître des tuyaux d'égoût, mais le programme dit: "Mer et rochers". "Plus entortillés" c'est-à-dire peinture entortillée. "Pine Wrack", c'est-à-dire "Pine Wreck". Des cahots de calorifères. Une fenêtre qui ouvre sur un rien immensément vide. Des lisières de terrain en boules coïlées par juxtapositions. Des choux-fleurs au lieu de chênes. Des vilaines têtes. On pourrait se croire au Pays des Merveilles cocasses, si de très vulgaires compositions ne venaient ajouter à son amusement un profond dégoût; impardonnable outrage au bon sens et à l'esthétique, par exemple, que ce chef-d'œuvre de plate vulgarité, la "Baigneuse" en décomposition, de Prudence Heward, un paquet de graisse difforme qui ne connaît pas le savon ni l'eau (une baigneuse, avec cela!) Et parlez-moi de cet autre nu de John Alfsen, sans consistance, aux chairs tombées, ignorant tout des bienfaits du corset au besoin. Il revenait à une femme, Ruth-M. Elliot, de déformer le plus affreusement possible, comme par un accès de tétanos, un visage de petite fille.

Des couleurs vives, frappantes, pompier,—toute la gamme. Pas le temps de s'ennuyer. Et dire qu'à côté, parmi toutes ces toiles généralement encadrées d'argent, il se trouve quelques choses fort agréables.

Qu'est-ce donc qui fait l'unité dans cette diversité?

Je remarque aussi un abus de certains bleus et jaunes qui ont tendance à se décomposer très tôt. La postérité ne connaîtra-t-elle donc pas nos émotions variées devant ces toiles?

Citons en toute justice de bons tableaux qui reposent des autres: deux portraits très frais, très chauds, de R.-S. Hewton, encore qu'il aime les tons vifs; un nu ferme et rond d'Edwin-H. Holgate; des paysages torturés, tournoyants, d'A.-Y. Jackson, qui sont de fines et originales études de lumières (voyez surtout "Hiver dans le comté de Charlevoix"), bien que l'artiste paraisse un peu figé dans sa formule; — trois portraits très naturels par Lillias-Torrence Newton, en particulier celui de l'intelligente et réveuse Frances McCall. Puis, à un moindre degré, mais encore intéressants, une nature-morte, très juste de Bertram Brooker, pourtant l'impardonnable auteur de "Croissance"; — une vue de lointain village gaspésien et un beau pin sensible par Frank Carmichael; — une église décorative et une agréable étude d'orage par A.-J. Casson; — une scène d'un charme piquant intitulé "Jour gris en ville", par Lawren Harris, qui cuisina aussi, hélas, l'île de jello; — un crépuscule très original de Thoreau Macdonald en bleu et brun foncé; — une image naïve et angélique de Will Ogilvie que l'on aime pour son allure byzantine; — une scène du port par Adriën Hébert, qui dit vrai; — et quelques toiles agréables d'Yvonne McKague et Kathleen Daly.

STEALING BURGLAR ALARMS NEW FORTE

Gazette Jan. 10/34
Modern Raffles Develops Regular Trade in Disposing of Articles

TRIES ONCE TOO OFTEN

One Victim Identifies Alarm in Possession of Another — Three Months Is Sentence

The most ingenious burglar of modern days appeared yesterday in court, a veritable Raffles, daring, resolute and full of initiative as ever. He has changed his name by the way to A. Levine, and sometimes uses the name of Livingstone, but there is no mistaking his care-free methods.

Burglary hasn't been so good these last few months. Perhaps the police may have been more on their toes than usual, or maybe there hasn't been so much worthwhile stuff left lying around. In any case Crackman Levine came to the conclusion that unless he removed some of the obstacles to his worthy trade he might as well settle down to a decent life.

Nothing was more distasteful to him. So to pave the way toward bigger and better times for the burgling business, this brainy burglar began burgling the burglar alarms from unoccupied buildings. Whole alarm systems disappeared, bells, wiring, switches, the whole electric gear that so often had disturbed him at his nightly task.

Crackman Levine was very pleased with himself. Soon the world would be made free for burglary. Then another brilliant idea struck him. Why not dispose of the alarm systems to a selected list of suitable clients? Clients, to be sure, whose premises would hardly be worth the attentions of his fraternity in a big way.

This, too, was an excellent idea. As soon as he removed the alarms from buildings that required them he sold them to people who thought they needed them. But he knew, better.

His career came to an all too swift end yesterday. J. Alex. Prevost complained that his burglar alarms had been disappearing from 473 St. Catherine street west, from 6642 St. Hubert street, and from 6848 St. Hubert street. Not only that, but he had found one of them installed in the premises of Miss Mary Bercovitch at 108 St. Catherine street west, a dress establishment. Miss Bercovitch was a witness for the prosecution. Chief Judge Gustave Perrault sentenced the ingenious thief to three months' imprisonment, thereby handing over the second storey men once more to the tyranny of burglary alarms.

FRANCE WILL MAKE GIFT OF PAINTING

Memorial Picture for Gaspé Church Commemorates Cartier's Landing

Quebec.—Details of a memorial picture to be offered by the French Republic to the Government of Quebec in commemoration of the discovery of Canada by Jacques Cartier are given in a description of the painting which has reached here. The artist is D. Ch. Fourquerey, who is well-known in France and in the colonies as a painter of historical and naval scenes, of war pictures and of illustrations.

Mr. Fourquerey, a descendant of seafarers and sailors, was much attracted by the idea of featuring, in vast proportions, the landing of Jacques Cartier at Gaspé, having already illustrated in a work of Paul Schack's "Les Grands Croisières de la France" a handsome scene where he evokes the planting of Cartier's cross.

This will also be the central inspiration of the picture he is now working on, in which is seen the Bay of Gaspé. The anchors are thrown and the Indians of the neighboring forests have rushed to the seashore. The two and three-decked vessels, displaying the fleur-de-lys on their flags, sway gracefully on the shining waves. In the distance are the blue silhouettes of Gaspé mountains, enhancing by their darker shade this admirable scene of nature.

Jacques Cartier is surrounded by his crew, and to the sounds of the hymn "Vexilla Regis" they have planted the cross bearing the inscription which proclaims the taking possession of the Canadian soil in the name of the King of France and Navarre. The savages have knelt down and appear to understand that this is a symbol of salvation. The figure of Cartier dominates the scene. It seems to possess the artist such is its inspired attitude.

The picture is destined to adorn the walls of the Basilica of Gaspé facing the sea on the very spot where Jacques Cartier planted the cross, but in the meantime, following its completion, the Quebec Government will place this precious gift in safekeeping.

Aleksander Bercovitch

ALEKSANDER BERCOVITCH est le peintre que l'on "découvrit" l'an dernier avec quelque sensation à Montréal. Né à Cherson, près d'Odessa, il poursuivit ses études artistiques à Moscou et à Leningrad et se mit ensuite à voyager au hasard à travers l'Asie. Il fut "lancé" l'an passé par la maison Sydney Carter, qui exposa une série de ses œuvres. — Visages jaunes et verts, décorations hautes en couleurs, motifs curieux. Tout cela était assurément slavo-oriental à souhait, et plus oriental que slave peut-être. Récemment les têtes de petites filles exposées au Salon de l'Académie nous ont paru rudes, très paysannes. Que pouvait donc bien nous réserver une exposition Bercovitch chez Eaton?

Eh bien! disparus la rudesse et les chocs trop violents de couleurs, disparus peut-être aussi quelques traits forts de personnalité que j'aime toujours trouver aux artistes. Je soupçonne un choix qui a laissé plus de place au joli qu'à l'original. Ici, cette semaine, vous voyez le Bercovitch canadien surtout. Des sujets pris sur place, une touche sûre dégagée de l'accessoire, un coloris chantant mais adouci cette fois, un don de choisir ses sujets. Les aquarelles sont d'un joli fini. Les toiles sont peintes en touches sommaires mais harmonieusement composées pour donner l'impression de quelque chose d'achevé.

Il y a des scènes de quais baignés de lumières douces. Des paysages joyeux, avec les sentiers sous la feuillée, les nuages roses. Mais Bercovitch est surtout le peintre des rues de la ville; rues d'hiver avec poteaux, automobiles et passants dans le cadre de la neige ou mêlés dans des ombres bleues; rues du soir avec les vitrines allumées dans la noirceur; rues du jour, l'avenue Laurier par exemple, peuplées de couleurs, de reflets, d'enseignes et de passants. De pareilles scènes vivent sous vos yeux sans le moindre luxe de détails mais avec une rare vérité d'ensemble. Le sens averti du coloris y est pour beaucoup.

La partie de l'exposition consacrée aux œuvres asiatiques de l'artiste n'est pas la moins intéressante. Un piquant et féroce visage de Turcoman, de beaux chameaux, une mosquée plongée dans une douce lumière, une scène de marché, un coucher de soleil aux cent harmonies de couleurs. Dans ces sujets Bercovitch retrouve plus facilement, ce me semble, sa virilité farouche de slave et les joies des coloris orientaux. Si intéressantes que soient ses vues canadiennes, — et elles le sont beaucoup, — je préférerais toujours d'un slavo-oriental comme Bercovitch ses œuvres slavo-orientales, parce que plus personnelles et vraies chez lui, même si ma mentalité d'Occident ne doit pas toujours s'y comprendre et si, surtout, j'aie à me méfier des supposées influences étrangères dont se réclament certains des nôtres pour faire des laid.

Bercovitch montre de rares facultés d'adaptation. C'est par là qu'il doit être sémit.

Le précieux Murillo dont le Canada a hérité

La Galerie Nationale a hérité d'une magnifique collection anglaise une toile du grand peintre Murillo, citée comme l'une de ses meilleures et sauvée de l'invasion française en Espagne au début du XIXe siècle pour prendre place dans une famille anglaise. C'est une composition vigoureuse et vaste, qui mesure 4 pds par 6, et montre un franciscain bénissant, sous un arbre, son jeune compagnon souffrant.

Notes of Art In Montreal

Star Jan. 17/34

At the Arts Club, University St., a number of figure studies in Crayon by Frank Downey are being shown and will remain on view till January 27th. These drawings, nearly all in black crayon with only a few in water color, are mostly studies from female models, with two or three portrait studies. All are very interesting drawings, which show a good understanding of forms. The exhibition is open to the public from 10 to 12 a.m. and from 3 to 5 p.m. on every day except Saturdays and Sundays.

A retrospective exhibition of by Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., open at the Watson Galleries, Sherbrooke St. West, next Saturday, January 20th. It is to contain a number of the best of Mr. Cullen's pictures, both earlier and more recent.

Pictures by Miss Berthe, Miss Gertrude and Miss Alice Des Clayes will form an exhibition which is to be opened at Eaton's galleries next Monday, January 22nd.

A lecture will be given to members at the Art Association of Montreal next Wednesday evening, January 24th, at 8:15, by Henry F. Rossiter, of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, on the subject of "Some French Prints of the last Fifty Years."

At the weekly meeting of the Art

Association of Verdun at the Y.M.C.A., Verdun, tomorrow, Thursday evening at 8 o'clock, a paper will be read by the ex-president, Charles Tulley, on "Chardin, the great French painter." The meeting will be followed by an Art Club meeting for the study of freehand drawing.

European Art Doings

A very important bequest of modern French pictures has been made to the foreign section of the Tate Gallery in London by the will of the late C. Frank Stoop; it is spoken of as ranking in importance with the Lane bequest, to which this section of the gallery owes many of its best or most conspicuous pictures. This Stoop bequest includes examples of the work of Degas, Cézanne, Van Gogh, Picasso, Matisse, Braque, Modigliani, Marie Laurencin and Rousseau "le douanier."

In Paris a new group has been organized of painters of imaginative works which are inspired by music—pictures which are supposed, to some extent, to represent the meaning or sentiment of musical works. The group, which is called Les Artistes Musiciens, is to hold its second exhibition in March. It has a committee of honor, which is headed by M. Herriot, the former premier.

The newest, or one of the newest ways of taking art to the people and making it popular has been devised in Sweden. The National Museum of Art at Stockholm and the Swedish State Railway have gone into partnership for the purpose and have jointly arranged a rolling exhibition. Instead of pictures being lent to local galleries, as in the past and as in this and other countries, they are to be sent round for exhibition in a railway car built for the purpose. This car has no windows but specially designed electric lighting and can serve not only as a travelling gallery but as a lecture room, with equipment for showing lantern slides. It will be parked at various points in turn and left for such time as seems to be justified by the population.

OLD FAVORITES 18/1/34 IN PICTURES SHOWN

Everyone has a right to his own taste—to like whatever pictures appeal to him, and one does not require to understand the art of a painting in order to like the picture itself. This opinion was expressed by Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., who addressed the Women's Guild of the Church of St. Matthias, in the parish hall yesterday, when he gave a lecture entitled "Pictures and Memories," illustrated by lantern slides made by himself from many "old favorites."

Pictures commonly seen from 1900 onwards were shown when many homes had on their walls Luke Fildes' "The Doctor," Whistler's portrait of his mother, "Washington Crossing the Delaware," Watts' "Hope," or Da Vinci's "Mona Lisa." Some of Anton Mauve's sheep paintings, Ruysdael's "Mill," Millet's "The Angelus," Hoffmann's pictures of Christ, the Madonnas of many artists, and Maxfield Parrish's garden scenes, were among the pictorial memories brought back to the audience.

Mrs. M. Baldwin presided. Tea was served after the lecture.

Is Art Sane Or Insane Is Question Debated In Philly

Herald Jan. 22, 1934

Philadelphia, Jan. 17. (AP)—The Contemporary Club, despite the calibre of its talent, has failed to find the answer to the question: "Art, sane or insane?"

"What garlic is to the salad, insanity is to art," explained Homer Saint-Gaudens, director of Fine Arts of the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, Pa., and a son of the famous sculptor, Augustus Saint-Gaudens.

"My father once said," remarked Saint-Gaudens, "that artists have the same brains as other people, but that they are over at one side of the head, sticking out like a bump."

Le jardin créé par un pinceau délicat

La Presse Jan. 11, 1934.

Beatrice Robertson peint aimablement les fleurs du pays.—En marge de l'Exposition des Vingt-Huit, les vieilles caricatures de "Punch" font encore de l'humour.

Krieghoff et Cullen bientôt

BEATRICE Robertson, de Toronto, a donné toutes ses prédilections à la flore du pays. Les galeries Eaton tiennent actuellement de ses toiles une exposition plus complète, ce me semble, que celle de l'année dernière, où, en plus de retrouver la touche poétique et délicate de l'artiste et sa belle exactitude de traitement, on doit remarquer de sensibles progrès dans la manière d'harmoniser l'arrière-plan et de composer les bouquets.

Depuis la plus modeste fleur jusqu'aux reines des grands jardins, elle a tout décrit avec une âme sensible à la poésie des couleurs, à la fraîcheur des corolles qui vibrent, à la mélancolie souriante des bouquets qui prolongent leur vie dans les pots de terre. Beatrice Robertson n'a pas cherché à styliser, à combiner trop savamment le coloris, à personnifier les fleurs, si je puis dire. Elle les a peintes comme elle les a vues, au naturel, avec des pétales vrais, des tiges vraies, un abandon vrai. Ses fleurs ne sont ni de velours, ni d'étoffe; on sent qu'elles respirent tranquillement pour la joie des yeux, comme un chant de la nature qui rappelle aux humains trop pressés, oublieux du bel art de la flânerie esthétique l'immortelle jeunesse des choses et de leurs reflets.

L'école de l'humour

EN marge de l'abracadabrante exposition du Groupe des Vingt-Huit, la Galerie des Arts, rue Sherbrooke, montre dans son petit salon des gravures un choix intéressant d'esquisses et caricatures de "Punch". C'est bien trouvé pour donner le fini aux sentiments narquois dont le visiteur est rempli après avoir parcouru au second étage les pittoresques modernités du groupe d'Ontario. Qui ne connaît "Punch", la revue humoristique centenaire qui a fait ou refait l'Angleterre à sa façon et l'a secouée de "gaye" satire. Il y a un plaisir extrême à repasser les côtés de l'histoire à la lumière des caricatures minutieuses d'autrefois.

Nous qui sommes habitués à la caricature française, plus dégagée, moins pointilleuse et sèche, peut-être ne goûtons-nous pas autant que les anglo-saxons l'humour de tous les "Punch" au monde. Nous aimons la verve. Mais du point de vue dessin il faut admirer le travail délicat des esquisses à la plume, colorées ou non, et surtout la belle série d'esquisses au crayon, ébauches rapides et fort bien trouvées qui en disent long sur la technique solide des illustrateurs de l'autre époque.

Le diluant précieux

L'ACADEMIE des sciences à Paris s'intéresse beaucoup aux recherches de M. Jacques Maroger, membre de la commission de restauration des musées nationaux, sur la technique des peintres du XVe au XVIIe siècle. M. Maroger croit être à la veille de découvrir le secret de la peinture ancienne, le diluant des maîtres d'autrefois lorsqu'ils eurent cessé d'employer la détrempe. Il est admis que ce n'est pas l'huile, — car il est techniquement impossible de reproduire à l'huile les Van Eyck, Rubens ou même les flamands de la grande époque, — ni le vernis, qui provoque des effets tout différents. Il appert que c'est l'émulsion d'un vernis d'huile cuite et de résine par une eau saturée de gomme arabique chez les Flamands et de colle de peau chez les Italiens.

A l'horizon

La Galerie d'art de Toronto expose de ce temps-ci 77 tableaux de Cornelius Krieghoff, mort en 1873, un pionnier de la peinture canadienne. Nul étranger n'est devenu plus Canadien par son amour des paysages et des moeurs de l'est du Canada, qu'il a interprétés sur la toile avec fraîcheur et variété. Ses sujets comprennent aussi le folklore canadien-français et les coutumes indiennes. Le Québec l'a payé de retour; plusieurs de ses toiles sont passées de génération en génération dans la province. L'exposition Krieghoff viendra sous peu à Montréal et nous prendrons plaisir alors à la commenter plus au long.

Les galeries Watson tiendront, à partir du 20 janvier, une exposition Maurice Cullen. Vu l'état avancé de la maladie du peintre distingué, il est fort probable que ce sera la dernière exposition tenue de son vivant, et l'on veut en faire en quelque sorte un hommage spécial à son oeuvre.

Dom Bellot, le distingué bénédictin architecte, s'embarquera pour le Canada à la fin du mois. Il donnera des conférences sur l'architecture religieuse, à l'Ecole des Beaux-Arts, sous les auspices de l'Institut scientifique franco-canadien.

LA librairie du McGill exposera durant le mois de janvier des gravures populaires chinoises, durant le mois de février des illustrations faites pour le chef-d'oeuvre de Dante, durant le mois de mars des reproductions de vieux maîtres.

Aleksander Bercovitch, observateur original et neuf de nos rues et des verandahs au soleil, fils averti de l'orientalisme, a suscité beaucoup d'intérêt aux galeries Eaton depuis quelques semaines.

OPEN ART GALLERY AT SMITHS FALLS

SMITHS FALLS, Ont., Jan. 17.—(C.P.)—Mayor J. J. Marsh last night opened the Smiths Falls Public Art Gallery in the presence of a large number of members of the newly formed Art Association. Thirteen paintings by Canadian artists were on exhibition.

To say that Quebec is fortunate in having a native of the province to adequately interpret for readers in other lands life on the soil in what was once New France is merely to express the truth. This Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., has done as illustrator of the volume of "Maria Chapdelaine" from the press of Mornay, of Paris. In picturing the salient points of the late Louis Hemon's story of habitation life Mr. Gagnon rises to new heights, and this view makes no reflection on the excellence of the pictures he did for Louis-Frédéric Rouquette's "Le Grand Silence Blanc" — a vivid story of the American North. In the present volume the text deals with a subject in which the artist is thoroughly at home. While now a resident of Paris, Mr. Gagnon for many years worked in regions akin to those which Hemon describes, and apart from straight landscapes, his most congenial subjects have been scenes of country life—the pioneer at work and the farmer at his tasks under conditions of a primitive kind.

Apart altogether from being vivid Pictures of Rural Homes illustrations to a story on a theme to which Finis will be written only when the wild places of the province glow golden with the harvest, the scenes will be invaluable to the historian of the future. Here are shown the simple, severe interiors of log buildings, the home-made furniture, the rag rugs and the good old stove that makes a heavy drain on the wood-pile in zero weather.

Turning the pages of this book excites justifiable pride in what has and is being done by the French Canadian pioneer in pushing back the forest and leaving patches of comfort where hardship ruled before.

To the lover of the wilds the book brings satisfaction. Mr. Gagnon invests his paintings with the spirit of place, time and season—qualities that can be expressed solely by those who have first-hand knowledge of their subject and innate love for the country.

To these illustrations in color Mr. Gagnon devoted three years of industry. Then followed a severe, critical appraisal by the artist of his work, the result being slightly over fifty paintings to embellish a volume to which the much overworked word "sumptuous" can be truthfully applied. These pictures constitute a record that the honest lovers of this province will treasure on both historical and sentimental grounds. Here is no hint of the mechanical age—no gasoline tractor replaces teamed horse and ox in turning the clod of stubborn soil, no "gas"-driven saw saves wearied arms at the wood-pile. Trees come down by the might of man's muscle and cold steel and by like means timber is prepared for meet uses. True to the place and time of the story—1912-13—the roads are as they were at that time and the spicy tang of the spruce is not polluted by the exhausts of motor trucks.

Whatever else Mr. A Labor Gagnon may do as an of Love illustrator he has every ground for satisfaction with this labor of love. While pictorially interpreting Hemon's work, he gives us a glimpse of pioneering conditions which we must now go further "in" to see. Besides the views of Peribonka, the locale of the story, he shows us the rolling country at varying seasons, the quaint houses and barns, interiors with the occupants engaged in domestic tasks like making bread and weaving, the slaughter of a pig, the clearing of drifted snow, woodsmen felling trees, scenes on the land, the gathering of the harvest and groups picking blueberries. Of life beyond the settlement are the trapper preparing his frugal meal while his dog team rests, a man poling a canoe in a shallow stream, lumberjacks returning to the shanty at night-fall, to mention a few of many good things.

Especially effective has the artist been in depicting the lamp-lighted interiors where neighbors gather to smoke and chat, and he touches a high point in the picture of the death of Mme. Chapdelaine, with the standing surplised priest and the kneeling figures in the humble home. This scene seems to personify the simple piety and enviable faith of these people who wrest their needs from Nature, live hard and die content.

While, personally, deep down there has always been regret that a Frenchman from the Old Land should have scented a story in the lives and doings of the Chapdelaine family and their associates and forestalled a native writer, Mr. Gagnon by his outstanding work has lessened the sting and evened the honors.

As an example of fine book-making the publisher has reason for pride. The paper, water-marked "Maria Chapdelaine," is a delight to the touch, and how greater excellence can be brought to color-printing is something for the expert to determine.

Looking at the pictorial material of this volume makes one regret that Clarence Gagnon, born in Montreal and a student under William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., at the schools of the Art Association of Montreal, did not, in those early years when etching occupied him, sign a series of plates dealing with life on the land and in the bush of Quebec, instead of scenes in France where he went to further his art education. As an etcher he first won acclaim and his prints are in the leading galleries of Europe, Great Britain and Canada. As a painter, during residence in Canada, his tastes led him to scenes illustrative of aspects of Quebec's rural life, and his capabilities were quickly recognized by both the federal and provincial governments, not to mention private collectors.

Now that Mr. Gagnon has ended his task is it too much to hope that the Hon. L. Athanase David, who, in addition to his exacting duties as Provincial Secretary, has worked continuously for cultural development in Quebec and given tangible encouragement to Art, Music and Letters, will now be enabled to bring together that long-expected collection of work by Mr. Gagnon for exhibition at the Ecole des Beaux Arts? The Minister earned the gratitude of picture-lovers by assembling successively paintings by Horatio Walker, R.C.A., A. Suzor-Côté, R.C.A., and Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., and if in such a Gagnon exhibition a few of the original illustrations for Hemon's book could be included, their educative value would be great in giving impetus and guidance to this sphere of artistic activity in Canada.

LORD STRATHCONA

The British Government last night confirmed appointment of Lord Strathcona, grandson of the Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal, who was once governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, as Under-Secretary for War. Lord Strathcona will succeed Earl Stanhope, appointed to succeed Captain Anthony Eden as Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

Lord Strathcona was Conservative member of the House of Commons for North Cumberland for four years before inheriting the barony from his mother in 1926. From 1925 to 1926 he was Parliamentary private secretary to the First Lord of the Admiralty. From 1928 to 1930 he was a member of the Indian statutory commission.

TWENTY YEARS AGO

London. — Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, High Commissioner for Canada, died yesterday (January 21). It is announced that the remains will be interred beside those of his wife in the beautiful cemetery at Highgate, despite the widespread feeling that the nation should honor his memory by a funeral in Westminster Abbey or St. Paul's Cathedral. Lord Strathcona had expressed a desire that when the end came he should lie beside his wife. Canada's representatives at the funeral will be the Duke of Argyll, who was a former Governor-General of Canada, as Marquis of Lorne, and Sir Charles Tupper.

PRESENTS PICTURE AS IN MEMORIAM

Friends of the late Mrs. A. D. Finnie presented to the University Women's Club yesterday afternoon a picture in token of remembrance. The presentation was made by Miss M. Cream, and the picture was accepted on behalf of the club by the president, Miss Elizabeth C. Monk. Reference was made to the fact that Mrs. Finnie had been a charter member of the club and to the affectionate regard in which she was held. A. D. Finnie expressed appreciation of the tribute paid to the memory of his wife.

The picture, a landscape by Berthe Des Claves, bears an inscription which reads: "Presented to the University Women's Club in loving memory of Pearl Leslie Finnie, B.A., McGill '14, by her friends, January, 1934."

'PUNCH' DRAWINGS RECALL OLD DAYS

Gazette 16/1/34

HISTORY IN CARTOONS

Tenniel's Reflections of British Political Opinion Cover Wide Period—Humor of Past Era

Original drawings from "Punch" held the walls of the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal—an interesting exhibition arranged through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa—and are attracting a good deal of attention. Of course, in these progressive, bustling times, when with the majority the standard of humor is set by the "comic strip," the black and whites on view recall past days when the tempo was more leisurely and there was time to "see" a joke, their educational value lying in showing how seriously those older artists approached the task of drawing for the press. These works, done week by week, have regard to composition and accuracy of form which could not be bettered were the artists engaged on a contribution to the Royal Academy. Further, too, it must be borne in mind that the photographic and etching processes which today make line drawing reproduction a purely mechanical routine were not generally enjoyed by them. Drawings had to be translated by means of the graver and wood block—a large work, because of pressure of time, having to be reproduced in sections by many hands and the result assembled for printing. With these restrictions before them, the draughtsman devoted himself to the cleanest and most telling lines, since the reproduction of his work rested with the engraver.

and the drawings form part of a collection bequeathed to "Punch" by the late Henry Silver, a member of the staff from 1857 to 1870.

From the point of view of history, the drawings by Sir John Tenniel, who first contributed to this periodical in 1850, became cartoonist a year later and signed his last drawing in 1901 when he retired after fifty years' work, are of great interest to those who follow the politics of the Mother Land. Times have moved so fast since then that it is perhaps pardonable if something of the old thrill they excited is now missing, but as cartoons which have definite meaning, expressed with decency and point, they have still to be surpassed. It is a safe assumption that of the thousands who gave scant heed to these transcriptions of Britannia's political thought, the artist is known to many more than that number by his illustrations to Lewis Carroll's immortal books—"Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking Glass." Of his ability as a cartoonist, one might say the whole world knows his famous drawing "Dropping the Pilot," which shows the now ex-Kaiser leaning on the bulwark looking at Bismarck descending the ladder to retirement.

John Leech, who made his first appearance in "Punch" in the fourth number, August 7, 1841, and retained his connection with the paper until his death in 1864, is worthily represented by work that makes pithy pictorial comment on topics current in his times, political cartoons and illustrations for jokes that in their day excited the well-bred chuckle.

Charles Keene—a contributor from 1851 until 1890—in his work as a pen-and-ink draughtsman touches a high point. A keen observer of "characters," and an indefatigable sketcher at all times, he shows the happiest facility in the placing of his figures in outdoor settings in particular. His fluent and expressive lines amply repay close study. As a realist of types he was placed high, so that at his death in 1891, Sir Frederick Leighton, who was then president of the Royal Academy, declared that, "among the documents for study in future days of middle-class and of humble English life, none will be more weighty than the vivid sketches of this great humorist."

The work of George Du Maurier, who sent his first drawing to "Punch" in 1860, and signed his last contribution in 1896, a few weeks before his death, reveals his skill in satirizing English society as it was in the Mid-Victorian age. Contrasted with the free and easy democratic spirit of today, modern youth cannot honestly appraise that period as otherwise than ghastly. Restrictions abounded, and to be short of being absolutely "correct" in every detail was unthinkable. Du Maurier evolved a statuesque type of womanhood which, while magnificent, was a trifle overpowering, and his glorious males—well, they are a perpetual temptation to murder. His fertility of ideas and felicitous expression he showed again and again, both with pencil and pen, when the authorship of "Trilby," "Peter Ibbetson" and "The Martian" is recalled. His drawings are distinctly dated, and in viewing them it is, at this time, a little difficult to understand what gave his subjects such a vogue.

GAZETTE'S BUDGET OF LONDON TOPICS

Gazette Jan. 20/34

(By Elizabeth Montizambert)

London, December 29.—Christmas in the country was rather chill and damp for those courageous people who left their fireside, but they were rewarded by the mysterious transformation of the landscape when it is shrouded in the veil of a white mist. In London there was a subtle air of cheerfulness due to the belief that better times are soon coming.

One of the reasons that leads the superficial observer to think that this may really be so is the insidious infiltration of new ideas, or rather the signs that they are being adopted; there are always plenty of ideas lying about, but a people who revere tradition find it difficult to adopt them.

Bournemouth, of all places in the world, provides a good example. It is in this haven of semi-invalids that the up-to-date local art gallery has established a lending library for pictures. This improves on the Chinese idea of only exposing one treasure at a time because one then has to provide a storeroom for the others and insure against bandits. Bournemouth residents have no such cares attached to the enjoyment of Art. For a modest guinea a year they can borrow the picture of their choice and enjoy it for three months with the satisfaction of knowing that their subscription fee will swell the fund for buying more treasures for the Art Library. The scheme opens up all sorts of possible developments.

Londoners, behind the times in this matter, must betake themselves to the picture exhibitions and galleries if they want to see possessions not their own, and the wealth of attraction offered in these ways excuses their lack of enterprise.

The Lefevre Galleries were crowded the other day when that brilliant young man Oliver Messel was showing his sketches and clever masks. He is now one of the best known designers of stage settings and his masks have created a new feature in the theatre, notably in the production of Ballerina. The drawing for Cochran's productions of "Helen" and "The Miracle" were shown as well as those for "Ballerina," but the "clou" of the show was the life-size mask of Queen Elizabeth, complete with huge ruff and tightly curled auburn hair.

Mr. Messel's interests are eclectic. At the time when negro theatrical companies were all the rage in London he amused himself by making sketches of most of the actors and actresses. Now he is planning work for a possible production by Rhinehart of Schiller's "Marie Stuart" to be given a continental tour, but not in Germany.

In another room were the delightful caricatures of "Cola," a clever Italian artist who has long made Hampstead his home. His witty sketches of John Gielgud, Greta Garbo, Mark Hambourg, Cedric Hardwicke, Constant Lambert, the composer, and his brother Maurice, the sculptor, Bernard Shaw, Mussolini, Walter de la Mare and about two dozen other celebrities, pointed the remarks of the editor of the "Week-End Review," who maintained that the art of caricature should no longer be esteemed a Cinderella of the Arts but should take its rightful place as an equal.

INTERESTING PORTRAITS.

Invitations to make a special visit to the National Portrait Gallery are more unusual than those to other great collections, so the cards announcing an exhibition of recent acquisitions drew many people to the inconspicuous building in St. Martin's Place, tucked in behind the National Gallery, where during the 77 years since it founded, over 2,000 portraits celebrities have been collected. Among the most interesting of 41 newcomers were a very beautiful painting by an unknown artist, Sir Thomas Overbury, the victim of court intrigues, who, poisoned in the Tower in 1613, amateurish but charming sketch of Fanny Burney, a lively one making one think she must have penned "Evelina" with her in her pretty cheek; portrait of Mrs. Siddons' brother, John Kemble, of Sir Walter Scott, Lord John Russell, drawn by one of the first Lord Law, Mutiny fame, and a silhouette of "George Elliot," making a more attractive than most of portraits. There is a delicate sketch of Lewis Carroll by J. Furniss and the catholicity of collection is shown by the drawing by John Mansbridge of the saintly Bishop Gore side-by-side with that of the famous John Frederick Archer, while Sir William Orpen's portrait of Massey, Premier of New Zealand is neighbor to the lovely sketch of the late Charles Ritchie as a young man, done by his life-long companion, G. Shannon.

The Empire Day movement presented a portrait by Orpen of the Earl of Meath, who is on a card to be the founder of the Empire Day movement, to the attention of the author they would amend this statement by an inclusion of the name of Fessenden, to whom the idea originally due.

The National Arts Club Fund members, who enjoy many privileges for their $5 subscription, are having several interesting things arranged for the new year. They include a series of lectures on British Art at Queen's Hall, Langham Place, Mr. Roger Fry, soirees at Burton House early in February, the British Art Exhibition, visits to the Library and Museum in Westminster Abbey, treasures not usually on view be shown.

CROWD AT MUSEUM

One is reminded of the London, and the fact that this city harbors people of every taste and opinion, by the of the crowds that forsook daily tasks and occupations today to go and have a look at the new exhibition. They simply poured into the Museum, which I am sure of them had never seen before, the crowd stretched from the room to the entrance of the museum. Few brides at the door have ever attracted so much attention as these small sheets of yellowing vellum that we were told are the second of the Greek Bible, the book that, in spite of all ichabods, still remains the world's best seller.

MISS K. SHACKLETON VICTIM IN QUEBEC FIRE

Paintings, Sketches, Books Lost as Hotel Burns

QUEBEC, Feb. 1.—(C. P.)—Miss Kathleen Shackleton, well-known English landscape and portrait painter, lost several hundred dollars worth of paintings, it was learned yesterday, in a fire which destroyed the Manoir Montmorency here Tuesday.

In addition, Miss Shackleton, who is a sister of Sir Ernest Shackleton, the famous explorer, lost a number of unfinished sketches and several books containing material which she had gathered for a series of illustrated articles she is writing for a United States publication.

Miss Shackleton has made Quebec her headquarters since coming to Canada several years ago and had lived at the hotel for some time. A large number of books and much sheet music in her rooms were also destroyed.

SCENES IN LAURENTIANS

Group of Fine Typical Interpretations Supplemented by Interesting Examples Done
About Montreal

Paintings and pastels by Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., being shown at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, reveal the versatility of this Canadian artist whose health is causing concern to his friends. The works on view cover a period from 1890 onward, and at the opening on Saturday many picture-lovers showed great interest in the work he did before he "found" himself as an interpreter of Laurentian scenery—a phase of his art by which he will be best known. The display of pictures, in the nature of a retrospective exhibition, brings home with added force the great loss Canadian art suffers in the cessation of Mr. Cullen's labors at a time when the long years of struggle were behind him and he was enjoying a recognition too long delayed.

Looking at Mr. Cullen's paintings of the Northland it can be truthfully said that he has captured in an unusually sympathetic and intimate manner the spirit of that stretch of forest and stream that Montrealeers at all seasons are pressing into for rest and recreation—a country that yearly makes a more insistent call to the angler, hunter and devotee of ski and snowshoe. These oils and pastels Mr. Cullen's by their fidelity take the spectator to the actual scene, whether it be winding stream edged with trees in autumn leaf, in the flush of spring, or stark and cold in the frigid temperature of winter, or stretches of unbroken forest and noble hills. The artist has always made the appeal to the painter, and color sense, as manifested in his scenes, has done much to help the vision of the average layman who hitherto believed that snow was always white.

LOVELY WINTER SCENES.

In the present exhibition are works done at varying periods during many winters—snow-covered hills gleaming in sunlight, streams lined with spruce and birch, trees a-smother with new-fallen snow—with all the fine appreciation of subtle values as they are lighted or shadowed; rivers where sun and current have wrought havoc with the accumulated ice of months and the water boils down in a tawny flood. There are, too, visions of those moments at the passing of day when the westering sun touches distant ridges, gilds the boles of poplars and flushes the sodden ice of quiet waterways. Of a later hour is a poetic transcription of the North—a bend in a stream edged by a steep, snow-covered ridge behind which the yellow moon has risen. The scene expresses the majesty of nature in lonely places where the hum of wind, the creaking of branches and the gurgle of water are the only sounds. This "Moonrise, Cache River," is a work that kindles memories in those who love the open spaces in winter.

Of the winter season is "The Valley of the Devil River, Near St. Jovite"—the stream winding between snowy banks with a massive hill in the background. "Hoar Frost and Snow, Ste. Marguerite," is charged with lovely blues and greys—a vista of wooded country with a stream that tumbles down in a series of falls. "The Hillside, Beaufort," shows a ruddy bush flushed with sunlight and a stream beneath a steep snowy bank that gleams in the light. "The Ravine, John Larose River, Beaufort," capably solves a difficult composition and shows how snow gives beauty to a steep bare bluff above a stream. "Pointe au Pic, Murray Bay, Winter," with ice-floes and roseate water, is another bold design. There are also a number of striking scenes painted in the Canadian Rockies in which the artist's skill in painting massive forms is well exemplified.

Of unusual interest as showing the development and ripening of Mr. Cullen's art is the group of scenes done at the period when he looked for his subjects about Montreal—that phase when markets, old shops, cobble streets and ice-cutting scenes occupied his brush. "St. George's Church," a nocturne, recalls the old days when the C.P.R. station building was bounded on the south by Donegan street. The church tower is silhouetted against the dark sky, figures tramp the sidewalk, and sleighs await fares. This area proved a fruitful sketching ground and there are in this section "Winter Evening, Dominion Square"—sleighs in line and, behind, trees in the snowy expanse lit by arc lamps and the bulk of St. James Cathedral in the background, a variant of this scene in the sun shines and the Basilica is a lovely blue. "The Old School-House, Near Bordeaux," a bit of quaint architecture, is another winter scene, and a horse and sleigh outside a lamp-lit shop are the pictorial elements of "The Blizzard, Craig Street." From farther afield are two other winter scenes—"The Hill, Levis," with snow-covered buildings, sloping road and the broad river, across which can be seen the outline of Laval University; and "A Frosty Morning, Lower Town, Quebec," with its jumble of quaint buildings under a glowing sky.

A bit of Newfoundland is shown in "Petty Harbor"—a glimpse of water and a house backed by rising ground—direct forceful painting of a literal kind but lacking in those subtle values which later marked a long series of lovely works where fog and haze invested crude ugliness with beauty.

Of his sketching tours in Brittany, before he returned to Montreal in 1895, are two attractive works—"Apple Blossoms," showing trees in bloom outside a thatched farmhouse, and "The Three Trees, Pouldu," a sunny work with the trees in autumn leaf casting their shadows on old buildings near a path on which figures walk.

LIBRARIES CAN AID ART APPRECIATION

Gazette 23/1/34
Careful Selection of Books

Essential, Quebec Association Is Told

Librarians have it in their power to do much towards building a real appreciation of art, means of by carefully considered guidance in the public's selection of literature dealing with the various forms of art. Charles Maillard told the Quebec Library Association, at a meeting held last night in the library of the Catholic School Commission.

Mr. Maillard said that it was difficult for the public to become properly educated in an understanding of art, in view of the many varieties of criticisms which were available, some of which, he said, were not always written by thoroughly qualified critics. Literature which was a hindrance rather than a help to people in their efforts to acquire a complete understanding of art should be removed from public circulation, he said, and librarians should do all in their power to help people choose the proper books on the subject.

Mr. Maillard also emphasized the value of developing appreciation of art among children, saying that it was essential that artistic books should be carefully chosen and placed in their hands.

Painting was both an aspect and a symbol of the social order, said John G. Lyman, speaking on "Modern Painting," and the trend towards individualism that marked the progress of every civilization was accompanied by a trend towards naturalism in art. Theophile Gautier, in describing the cycles of painting, said that, contrary to seeming logic, paintings' starting point was the ideal, its conclusion, nature. Mr. Lyman said. In the beginning the painter represented deities, then ideal figures, then real personages in their relation to the ideal; then he introduced landscape in the background and finally painted landscape for its own sake, in which the human figure was but an accident. Mr. Lyman continued.

That was the superficial aspect of the trend, Mr. Lyman said, and from it alone it was easy to recognize that such a trend had reached its conclusion towards the end of the nineteenth century. It was the fact that a cycle of painting was drawing to a close, that gave birth to the modern movement, he said, and the whole history of the modern movement he characterized as the history of a reaction against naturalism.

Miss Dora Hood, of the Dora Hood Book Shop in Toronto, was present at the meeting and addressed the gathering briefly. Miss Laura Young, president of the Quebec Library Association, and head of the circulation and reference departments of McGill University Library, was chairman for the occasion.

CANADIAN ARTISTS WORK TO BE SHOWN

McCord National Museum at McGill University will provide two pictures for a special exhibit of the works of Cornelius Krieghoff, famous Canadian painter of the last century. The exhibit will be held in the National Gallery at Ottawa during the present month and will be brought to the Montreal Art Association Gallery for the month of March.

The two pictures provided by McCord Museum are an original oil painting, entitled "An Indian Chief," and a large lithograph showing a winter scene in Place d'Armes. One of Krieghoff's better known works is "Maple Sugar Time in Quebec." This and approximately 150 other examples of his work will be on display in Ottawa and later in Montreal.

TALENTED SISTERS SHOW PAINTINGS

Gazette 24/1/34

Gertrude, Berthe and Alice Des Clayes Manifest Skill in Varied Subjects

Three talented sisters—the Misses Gertrude, Berthe and Alice Des Clayes, are holding an exhibition of their paintings in the Fine Art Galleries of The T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and the examples in oils, pastel and water-colors reveal interesting variety, in that each artist has favored subjects: portraits and flowers, landscapes and scenes in which horses figure.

Gertrude Des Clayes, A.R.C.A., whose work as a portrait painter is well-known, shows some capital interpretations of child life—"Polly," a girl dressed in pink with a blue hat; "Perry," with a red and blue hat; "Pansy," a girl with long hair, and a cheerful face, and "Girl in Striped Cap," which has gay color—portraits that reveal breadth and decision in the handling of pastel. In oils, this painter plays with a wide range of joyous yellows in "Yvonne"—a young woman in an open-air setting, "The Bluebird," another work of interest, freely painted, shows brother and sister in sunlight, the girl carrying a red cage from which a bird has been released. "A Village Belle" is also an attractive item—a girl, in a red hat, holding an old-fashioned nosegay. Of an earlier period is "Portrait of a Man"—a strongly lighted and boldly handled work in which the sculpture-like modelling and values in the shadowed white stock are excellently done. This is a striking work of sound quality. Two flower pieces, with incidental still-life, are "Anemones" and "Ranunculus," which give opportunities for effective arrangement and subtle tones.

Alice Des Clayes, A.R.C.A., has a liking for horses which she sets in comely landscapes. One of the most spirited of her oils is "The Churchill Stakes"—horses in full stride, the crowds and odds board, the high color notes being supplied by the riders' silks. Another work of a quieter kind is "Judging the Farmer's Cobs," the spectators back of a rail, mounted figures with judges on foot, trees and a glimpse of the tower of a village church. In the same medium are "Old Post-bridge, Dartmoor"—a quaint old stone structure spanning a narrow stream, horses and rolling hills; and "La Plage, Ambateuse"—white and black horse in tandem drawing a cart on the sand. The sea and cloudy sky are put in with confidence.

Equally facile in pastel and watercolor, this artist employs both media in some spirited paintings done about Dartmoor in which horses, in spacious rolling country, are the centre of interest. In this group are "Ponies by a Winding Road"; "Ponies on the Hilltop," and "Ponies on the Moor." There are also some attractive rural scenes—farmers ploughing, and a hunting scene called "Cubbing on Dartmoor."

Berthe Des Clayes, accomplished with both oils and pastels, has generally devoted her efforts to landscape, with cattle and the occasional figures for interest. She has been particularly happy where her autumn subjects have given her free rein in handling lavish color.

Among her most effective works in oil is a Cornish harbor scene with rounded hills, waterside buildings and a schooner at anchor. "Dominion Square," with distant St. George's Church, a bit of the Basilica, and men loading sleighs with snow on Dorchester street, is another capital canvas. The study in pastel for this work is also on view. In oils, too, are "Gathering Storm," with menacing clouds and cattle in a meadow; "Autumn in Quebec"; "Haymaking," with men loading a wagon under a summer sky; "Melting Snow, St. Andrews"—snow-covered house in trees near a frozen stream with a channel of open water, a work of nice values and restful spirit; "Winter in the Woods," with a team hauling logs; a shore scene "On the Coast of Cornwall," with bold headlands, waves, and gulls; and "Crocuses, Hampton Court Palace."

The works in pastel are generally free, crisp and colorful transcriptions of nature which suggest joy in the doing. Besides autumn scenes in which the maples flame, there are effective winter vistas like "The Covered Bridge," "Hauling Logs, Como," and "Winter in the Woods." There are, too, engaging works called "Apple Blossoms, Como," "In the Daisy Field," "The Little White House," and a blaze of blossoms in "Rhododendrons, Hampton Court Palace."

Pictures and Sketches by Maurice Cullen

Star Jan. 24/34

A general view of the work of Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., is given, as perhaps never before, by the exhibition which is now to be seen at the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke street. Some of the works, and particularly the sketches have never been shown anywhere before and from the pictures, covering about forty years of Mr. Cullen's activity as a painter, it can be seen that the earlier work, painted in France, has the same truth and sureness and the same poetic feeling as his more familiar and recent Canadian work. One of the most delightful pictures in the exhibition is among these earlier ones, — of the rich greens of grass and pollard willows by the banks of a river of northern France,—and there are several other pleasant pictures of houses and trees in the soft sunlight of France and England.

For the most part Mr. Cullen's subjects have been landscapes with snow and melting ice, generally in early Spring, but there are a few pictures here which are full of bright Autumn colours. For the most part too the pictures in this collection are of views in the Laurentians, but several of the most striking of them are of other places. There are two or three views of Dominion Square, seen through evening haze, with the dome of the cathedral dimly seen through the mist and the familiar sleighs and horses giving an accent to the stillness of the picture. In "Winter Sunflow, near St. Marguerite," a view up the St. Lawrence,—there is a fine effect in the contrast between the broken shore ice in the foreground and the glow of sunset on the cloudy sky and the distant water. In a smaller picture of "Spring" snow at Chambly the contrast is between the snow on the ground and the strong reds of the trunks and the deep green of pine trees. Two pictures of skies stand out among the others; in a larger one of early Spring at Beaufort the distance melts into the clouds behind a foreground of reflections on water and snow; in a smaller one the Lower Town at Quebec, red walls of houses fill the middle of the picture in front of a wonderful sky, in which the smoke of more distant houses blends with the clouds.

Among the pictures of the Laurentians there are a few in pastel and they are perhaps even better than those in oil. One specially good one is of the Cache river, a very peaceful evening scene, even more peaceful than the oil picture of Moonrise on the Cache River, an admirable study of the blue tone of snow in twilight. The large view of the Valley of the Devil River at St. Jovite, with a big effect of space and distance, has a particular interest, since the sketch from which it was made is also in this exhibition and it is possible to see how little change was made from the sketch to the picture and how completely Mr. Cullen seized the effect which he wanted, at first sight. Another of the Laurentian pictures which is very satisfying is the little View from Northmount in Autumn, not a snow picture, in which much effect is got from a splash of sunlight on the plain in the distance.

Exhibition Of Pictures by Three Sisters

The current exhibition at Eaton's galleries is of work in oil and pastel by Miss Alice, Miss Berthe and Miss Gertrude Des Clayes. The studies of horses by Miss Alice Des Clayes are as interesting as always; there are horses of all degrees and in many different surroundings — big horses ploughing or drawing farm carts, race horses at Ascot, ponies on Dartmoor and hunters. Some of the best of these pictures are those of Dartmoor ponies—open landscapes with groups of ponies, drawn and painted with evident knowledge of their habits and movements. Some of the ploughing scenes are also particularly good and an attractive picture is of the seashore at Ambateuse with two horses and a cart in almost empty space in front of a splendid cloudy sky.

Both English and Canadian scenes, but chiefly Canadian, appear in Miss Berthe Des Clayes' pictures. There are English Spring flowers and an attractive picture of a Cornish harbor, with a big schooner against green hills, in a dull, soft, English atmosphere, which makes a good contrast with the harder sunlight in the Canadian pictures. For gaiety of color nothing could be better than the little picture of Trenholmville Woods in autumn and several others of the autumn scenes. There are quiet colors in an oil picture of hay-making and in a view of Lake Memphremagog, full of light and space. Miss Gertrude Des Clayes shows a few portraits and several good pastel studies of children and some English landscapes with figures. A specially pleasant one is of a country lane with brown trees and a group of children, one of whom wears a bright red coat. Another is of a green gypsy caravan in a wooded lane. Two of the most striking of her pictures are large pastels of still life and bunches of flowers, which are excellent in form and color and very decorative.

Workmen in East Not Badly Off

The first and probably the only European woman ever to be awarded a Japanese art diploma was a visitor in Montreal yesterday. Kogio, or Ruby, who in private life is the wife of Dr. Otto Kresta, is a Viennese of great charm and personality, and in an interview with The Gazette at the Mount Royal Hotel yesterday she told many interesting facts concerning life in Tokio, where she and Dr. Kresta have lived for the past ten years.

Mrs. Kresta studied art in Vienna, and when she was married to Kresta she went with her husband to Tokio, where he is technical director of the Japanese branch of Siemens, Limited, a large Berlin firm dealing in scientific equipment. Naturally, when she arrived in Japan, Mrs. Kresta had a real job ahead of her, becoming acclimatized to the vastly different living conditions as compared with those in Austria, her native land. But her biggest problem was one which she herself created.

Mrs. Kresta set out with the object of mastering Japanese art. How she did it, despite several years of almost discouraging endeavor, is eminently proven by the fact that she has three times given exhibitions of her work in Tokio, and at an exhibition in Vienna was successful in disposing of all 42 of the pictures she displayed.

The striking differences between European art and Japanese are explained by Mrs. Kresta, who said that it had taken her four years really to master the Asiatic touch, although she had secured her diploma from the Jkeda Shoen Art School in Tokio after three years' study. Her Japanese name, Kogio, which means Ruby, was given to her at the time of receiving the diploma. Japanese paintings, she said, were executed on silk, not on canvas, and a totally different mental approach was essential to the correct Oriental interpretation of the subject.

ART HAS SIMPLICITY.

Japanese art, she said, was much in harmony with the psyche of the Japanese people as a whole, embodying a simplicity and an inclination to take existing facts for granted rather than go to into intricate details elaborating on their various features. The Japanese picture, like the Japanese personality, might at first appear flat and uninspired, but as closer study was applied, the veil which hung before them to the uninitiated eye was slowly opened, and all the appeal and beauty that were really incanted into them was revealed.

Mrs. Kresta is more than an artist. She is, it transpired during the course of yesterday's interview, a widely-travelled, well-informed critic of world affairs generally. She answered a number of questions on international relations, explicitly and concisely. Dr. and Mrs. Kresta are on the final lap of a trip around the world, which has taken them to Australia, Europe, the United States, and Canada, and Mrs. Kresta was much amused by the universal belief that Japan was "on the war-path."

"Everywhere we go," she said, people ask us: "which country is Japan going to declare war upon next, and when?" It is really very silly. The Japanese have not the slightest desire for warfare; the Japanese Government's policies do not interpret the spirit of the nation, for the people are truly peace-loving. Let me tell you this: Europeans and Americans talk about a yellow peril; very well, talk about it, then. But don't make this mistake, and consider Japan as the potential source of that peril. The real danger lies in China. The Chinese are an ignorant, and a brutal mass of people. In their present state of uneducated inertia they are not actually dangerous; but wait a little while, until they become educated, and clever. Then you will see a real yellow peril. The Japanese are intelligent, well-educated people, and they know too well the folly it would be to attempt what so many people all over the world think Japan is wanting to do, to try to invade and conquer the Western world."

WORKERS WELL PAID.

Mrs. Kresta declared that although Japanese exporters were flooding the world's markets with low-priced competitive commodities, it did not by any means follow that Japanese labor was suffering. "People think that, because Japanese products are sold for such low prices," she said, "Japanese working people are being hired for less than living wages. It is not so by any means. The average workingman's family in Japan is ever so much better off than here in Canada, or in any other

Moirra Drummond Successful in William Brymner Competition

6 HONORABLE MENTIONS

Exhibition of Entries Opens at Art Gallery Saturday —Graham Norwell Showing Work

Miss Moira Drummond, of Montreal, is winner of the first prize of $200 with her portrait entitled "Madame Docquair," and Jean Paul Lemieux, of Montreal, winner of the second prize of $100 for his painting called "Maison aux Eboulements," in the William Brymner Competition, according to announcement made yesterday by the Art Association of Montreal. This is the first year of the competition, founded by friends and former pupils of the late William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., for many years director of the Art Association schools.

Honorable mention was given to the following artists—all, incidentally, by terms of the competition under 30 years of age: Franklin Arbuckle, Toronto, "The Model"; Fleurimond Constantineau, Montreal, "La Dispersion des Acadiens"; L. Petley Jones, Edmonton, "Cowichan Canoe Maker"; Mary Helen Gilmour, Montreal, "Breton Girl"; Jean Royle, Halifax, "Calm Evening," and T. R. MacDonald, Montreal, "Dancer Resting."

Besides these works, other paintings entered in this competition that passed the artist-composed jury of selection will be on view in the Learmont Room from Saturday until February 11.

The first prize painting is a firmly handled performance, the modelling being done with vigor and the arrangement of the sitter against a blue sky effective. In tone the work is not gay, though the values in the black dress are good. The second prize work shows in the arrangement of the buildings in the landscape that Jean Lemieux knows a paintable subject. The brushwork is solid and the general effect attractive.

"The Model," by Franklin Arbuckle, has nice texture in the material of the blouse worn by the seated girl, who with a gloved hand toys with a string of beads.

"La Dispersion des Acadiens," by Fleurimond Constantineau, is a trifle scattered in effect—soldierly amidst the unhappy Acadiens with their worldly goods on the beach, with sailing ships off-shore.

"Cowichan Canoe Maker," by L. Petley Jones, shows a seated man with a forceful face outside a shack. It is a boldly handled piece of painting.

"Breton Girl," by Mary Helen Gilmour, is a work restful in spirit and excellently painted—a seated figure in native dress.

"Calm Evening," by Jean Royle, is a maritime scene—rocks, pools, sea and distant shore put in with decision and very agreeable in color.

"Dancer Resting," by T. R. MacDonald, shows the subject stretched out in a chair against a screen. In lighting and in the rendering of the dress material the work is effective.

WORKS BY NORWELL.

An additional attraction at the Art Gallery just now is a collection of paintings by Graham Norwell which are now on view in the Print Room.

Mr. Norwell, who has exhibited in Montreal before, is at the moment occupied with winter landscapes—hills, trees and water, which he handles in a decorative way. The line done in crayon is clean, crisp and well arranged and the delicate wash of color is adequate. One pure watercolor—a bank with trees, open water and rounded snow-mounds, is a good example of his work in this medium.

In his group of oils he shows a vigorous touch, but in some is a trifle insistent on pattern. There is force to "Falls on the Gatineau" with birches, rocks and rushing water; "Winter," with snowed hills, water, birches and spruces under snow, makes a pleasing pattern; "The Covered Bridge," with buildings, road, hilly country and winding river is original in design, and works done in autumn show his ability to handle vivid tones with discretion. There are many interesting items in this show, which will remain open until February 11.

COMING ATTRACTIONS.

Coming exhibitions included silhouettes by Rene L. Kurbach, March 10-18, while an important exhibition of French art is due to be held early in the same month. This period, too, will be marked by an exhibition of paintings by Kreighoff. There is also to be an exhibition of bird pictures by Allan Brooks—a show arranged through the courtesy of the Royal Ontario Museum of Zoology.

Among the lectures during the present season will be one, on February 12, by J. Arthur MacLean, curator of Oriental Art, of Toledo Museum, on "India, the Mother Country of the Orient," and another, on March 14, by Lawrence Binyon on "English Water Colors of the 19th Century."

THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

Star. Jan. 31, 1934.

News of Art In Montreal

A survey of the work of some of the more interesting French engravers was given last week in a lecture at the Art Association by Henry G. Rossiter, the head of the print department of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. The artists whose work came under notice were for the most part men who are much better known as painters than as engravers and their prints were, in many cases, rather experimental. Manet, Degas, and Rousseau were among the earlier men cited by Mr. Rossiter, men who, being guided in their work by Bracquemond, did much of their engraving in opposition to Bracquemond's advice. A large part of the lecture consisted, of necessity, in the exhibition of examples of prints by lantern slides, and the number of these was so large that only hurried views of them could be given. The work which was shown included good examples of Daumier, Lepere, Toulouse-Lautrec and Fantin Latour, lithograph portraits by Carriere, the portrait of Victor Hugo and another strong, sculptural head by Rodin and specimens of the remarkable and less conventional work of Pissarro, Gauguin and other more recent engravers.

The exhibition of pictures by the Misses Alice, Berthe and Gertrude Des Clays at Eaton's gallery will close at the end of next week. It will be followed next Monday by a double exhibition, of pictures by Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., and pictures by Mrs. Statura Frame of Vancouver, B.C.

The next lecture at the Art Association of Montreal will be given on Monday evening, Feb. 12th, by J. Arthur MacLean, Curator of Oriental Art at the Toledo Museum of Art, on the subject of "India, its art and culture."

In the print room of the Art Association, in succession to the present exhibition of Graham Norwell's work, there will be an exhibition of pictures of Canadian birds by Allan Brooks. This exhibition will be given in co-operation with the Province of Quebec Association for the Protection of Birds and by the courtesy of the Royal Ontario Museum, which owns the pictures.

The exhibition of pictures by Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., has proved so interesting to its many visitors that it is remaining open another week and will not close till next Saturday.

NOTED ARTIST IS DEAD

Gazette Jan. 26/34
Thomas W. Ball Passes in U.S. at Age of 70

Old Lyme, Conn., January 25.—Thomas Watson Ball, 70, noted artist and mural decorator, died at his home here today after a stroke of apoplexy.

From 1894 to 1900, he was associate art editor for Harper Brothers and from 1901 to 1907 he acted in a similar capacity for Colgate and Company. He served likewise with the firm of Richard Hudnut from 1910 to 1913.

He was widely known as a landscape and marine painter, his paintings of ships and sea scenes being found in many important collections throughout the country.

Graham Norwell's Drawings at The Herald Art Association Feb. 1/34

BEING shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal, are some works by Graham Norwell, Canadian born artist who has only recently returned from abroad to this country. Mr. Norwell has drawn pictures which are refreshingly and distinctively of a Canadian atmosphere, with no definite end in view of apparently reproducing any specific place but rather of a general type of scenery common to the mountain country of Quebec, the rolling slopes, carpeted with snow, and the familiar scenes of birch and pine trees. The drawings reveal his ability to convey landscape without any marked elaboration of theme, but with a simplicity and rarity of crayon and water color that give an excellent artistic tone to the whole exhibition. One picture, slightly different in execution, showing the reflections of trees in broken ice, is a very fine work, and other oil pictures of similar subjects complete the exhibition.

Brymner Prizes Awarded to Young Painters

As trustees of the fund collected for a memorial to the late William Brymner, R.C.A., the Art Association of Montreal were in a position last year to offer two prizes, of $200 and $100 to be given as William Brymner prizes to artists living in Canada. The sum available was unfortunately not large enough for the funding of an annual prize.

The competitors were required to be British subjects under thirty years of age, who had lived in Canada for at least two years before the date of the competition. Each competitor was to send in two works in oil or water color.

The last day for sending entries for the competition was January 15, and the awards made by the jury, consisting of four artists and the president of the Art Association, were announced yesterday.

These awards are:

First prize of $200, Miss Moira Drummond of Montreal, for her portrait in oils of Madame Docquire.

Second prize of $100, Jean Paul Lemieux of Montreal, for his oil picture "Maisons, Les Eboulements."

Honorable mention: Franklin Arbuckle of Toronto, Fleurimond Constantineau of Montreal, Mary Helen Gilmour of Montreal, L. Petley Jones of Edmonton, T. R. MacDonald of Montreal and Jean Royle of Halifax.

The pictures sent in for the competition and chosen by the jury are now on view at the Art Gallery and will remain on view till the end of next week.

ADDITIONAL WEEK FOR CULLEN SHOW

Gazette Jan. 30.
Laurentian and Other Scenes Attract Big Attendance to Watson Art Galleries

So widespread has been the interest in the paintings and pastels by Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, that the term of the exhibition has been extended for an additional week—the present closing date being Saturday.

The show by this Montreal painter has for a long period of years been one of the art events of January in Montreal, and despite the fact that failing health has forced Mr. Cullen to lay aside brush and palette there is no evidence of waning interest in the work of this masterful interpreter of Northern solitudes. From the point of view of variety the present exhibition can be numbered among the most successful. There can be no denying that as a painter of Laurentian scenery he has won a staunch following of discerning admirers, but the other items on view have during the week excited comment in that they reveal the painter as infinitely more than a one-subject and one-season man. Those familiar with Mr. Cullen's work can readily recall when the city was a fruitful sketching ground—public markets and quaint shops by night; downtown streets with traffic blurred by the whirling snow of blizzards, cab ranks with patient blanketed horses, not to mention the more spacious works like ice-cutters loading sleighs while the moon swings above the spire of Longueuil Church. Some of the scenes done about Dominion Square prove how sure was his handling of those subtle values that come with nightfall. The paintings done in the Rockies, too, show his ability to paint to noble scale, the few examples on view being the last available since he made only one visit to these noble peaks.

Drawings by Graham Norwell

There is the attraction of the unusual to add to other merits in the drawings by Graham Norwell, which are being shown at present in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. These drawings, of which there are about twenty, are landscape compositions rather than pictures of actual places; they are all distinctively Canadian, with their stretches of snow-covered hills, birches and pine trees, and look exactly like views of places in the Laurentians. Mr. Norwell has used in them a method which seems to be his own, working with a combination of black crayon and slight washes of water color, and has made them excellent compositions of lines with indications and suggestions of color. The drawings have a sort of clean simplicity which makes them very attractive and original. A few only have warmer tones, got, apparently, by working on a tinted paper, and these are, in their way, as pleasing as the others. A single picture in pure water color is a very good one, of reflections of trees in water and floating ice, and there are some oil pictures, of subjects similar to the drawings; these appear to be earlier work and, with some good points, are less distinguished than the drawings.

WOODCARVERS HAD SCULPTURAL SKILL

Star Jan. 31/34
Early Quebec Artists Are Praised by McGill Architectural Expert

Research by the McGill school of architecture has revealed that, contrary to popular opinion, French Canadian woodcarvers of the 18th century reached a high degree of skill as sculptors, it was stated by Prof. Ramsay Traquair, director of the school, in an illustrated lecture last night before the French-Canadian Association for the Advancement of Science. Emile Vaillancourt presided.

Professor Traquair ranked the French-Canadian woodcarvers of the 18th century and early 19th century as the most beautiful school of woodcarving in America, comparable with local schools of woodcarving anywhere in the world.

He referred to the founding in 1668 of a school of "Arts et Metiers" by Msgr. Laval, first bishop of Quebec. This school, founded at Quebec with a branch at St. Joachim a few miles down the river from Quebec, gave instruction in woodcarving and other arts. A whole line of skilled craftsmen resulted. Apprentices carried on the tradition and a school of woodcarving thus created persisted until about the middle of the last century.

FAMOUS NAMES.

Some of the better known names in woodcarving included the two generations in Quebec and vicinity of the Levasseur family, of which the best known work was done in the Chapel of the Ursulines from 1734 to 1736. Others mentioned were Gilles Bordin of Three Rivers, who executed, among other things, a beautiful tabernacle in the church at Lachenaie; Pierre Emond, examples of whose work can be found in the Hopital General at Quebec, and Francois Baillairges and his son Thomas, the most prominent architect of the early 19th century, who did a good deal of work in the old Basilica at Quebec.

As Montreal was not as important a centre as Quebec until the middle of the 19th century, woodcarving somewhat slower in gaining a footing in this district. The traditional school however, was maintained by such skilled craftsmen as Maitre Liebert, followed by Louis Quillon and his associates, Joseph Pepin, Rene St. James, Paul Rolland, whose work was to be found in some 25 churches. Other sculptors following included Philippe Turcot, Fleury David, Urbain Brien, David Finistier and Etienne Berclier.

STORY OF MACKIE SLAYING RELATED

Star Jan. 31/34
Slain C.P.R. Investigator's
Companion Bouchard
Trial Witness

JOLIETTE, Que., Jan. 31.—(C. P.)
Plans for a mysterious automobile trip laid by Paul Thoun, alias Lepine, and Gaston Bouchard in Montreal were revealed here today in the Court of King's Bench at the trial of Bouchard, charged with the murder of Acting Investigator James Mackie of the C. P. R. in the Lanoraie Yards during the night of September 7, 1933.

Thoun, whose companion Bouchard allegedly was on the night of the murder, committed suicide in dramatic manner in Provincial Police cells in Montreal after leading police to the cache of valuable paintings stolen from the Montreal Art Association Galleries.

Bouchard was held criminally responsible for the killing of Mackie who died in hospital the day after the shooting in the Lanoraie Yards.

Having been with Thoun and Bouchard earlier during the night of September 7 in Montreal, Miss Ella Seguin, 21, testified that she had been at Thoun's home in Rosemount when Bouchard called for him in his automobile. The pair drove her home to Maisonneuve, she said, and then travelled in an easterly direction. She did not know where they planned to go, but stated that Thoun had changed into old clothes before leaving.

NAMED AS GUNMAN.

Thoun was described as being the one of the two bandits prowling in the Lanoraie yards who fired the shots that killed Mackie, in evidence by the latter's companion, Investigator George W. Miller.

Many robberies in freight cars at the Lanoraie yards had led the Canadian Pacific Railway to send investigators to the place, Miller testified. For 21 nights, he said, he and Mackie had kept vigil under freight cars and finally at about 2:15 o'clock on the morning of September 8 they heard two men approaching.

The prowlers stopped in front of the car under which he and Mackie were hiding, he said, and opened the door of the car. One of them saw the investigators under the car and called to his companion. Then, he said, they ran away.

"Giving chase immediately," he continued, "we soon caught up to the men. At about 15 feet from them, however, one of them—I found out later it was Thoun—turned about and fired five shots from his revolver. Mackie, however, did not seem to be hurt and kept after his man. Thoun slipped and fell and Mackie jumped on him. Meantime, the other fellow had gone off in another direction and both Mackie and myself gave our attention to Thoun. He was still armed when I came up to him.

MACKIE COLLAPSED

"We put the handcuffs on him and began walking back to the Lanoraie station when Mackie said: 'I think he got me.' He fell to the ground and there I was with Mackie shot and this fellow Thoun."

Relating then how he had been obliged to stand in the middle of the tracks to attract the attention of the engineer of a train, Miller observed that Mackie seemed to be getting weaker and weaker from loss of blood. "I stood in the middle of the tracks," he continued, "and waved my hands about, holding on to my prisoner all the time, and when not far from where we were the train stopped. The engineer went to the station and got one of the employees there to drive all of us to a doctor at St. Thomas. The doctor advised going to Joliette Hospital right away and we drove there."

Thoun was lodged in the cells at Joliette, Miller testified. On being searched 10 live cartridges were found in his pockets. On the drive back to Lanoraie later in the night Miller stated that he and Chief Simard, of Joliette saw a car coming in the direction of Joliette at a fast clip.

A hunch of some sort, he said, caused him to ask Simard to follow the car. Having succeeded in stopping the machine and questioned its driver, they decided to hold him also. The man gave the name of Gaston Bouchard, 22, Montreal.

A pair of wet running shoes were found underneath the front seat of the car, Miller added, and Bouchard had several scratches about the face. It appeared to witness as though Bouchard had spent some time in a swamp near the Lanoraie yards.

Bouchard, husky 22-year-old former wrestler, seems unconcerned at what is going on about him. He stares fixedly at a point on the wall before him and betrayed no emotion when the gun which Thoun is supposed to have wielded on the night of the crime was produced.

The trial is expected to end tomorrow night.

ART ASSOCIATION'S SPACE INADEQUATE

Gazette 5/2/34
Dr. C. W. Colby Stresses
Need for More Room in Addressing McGill Graduates

HISTORY IS REVIEWED

Development of Public Spirit and Artistic Appreciation Traced Since Inception of Movement

Though the dimensions of the present Sherbrooke street building of the Art Association of Montreal are considerably larger than those of its predecessor on Phillips Square, there is again a need for more space, Dr. C. W. Colby, D.C.L., F.R.S.C., LL.D., stated last night during an address on the history of local art which was broadcast from radio station CKAC under the auspices of the Graduates' Society of McGill University.

Less than a hundred years ago, the speaker said, Montreal had just reached the point where public spirit and artistic appreciation, working in conjunction, were able to assert themselves. This was the foundation for what has since been achieved. The Montreal Society of Artists came into existence in 1847 and loan exhibitions were organized in Bonaventure Hall. At the same time the Mercantile Library Association enlarged its functions by holding an exhibition at which over 300 pictures were shown to the public.

The second half of the last century opened with a notable quickening of interest in education and art among the English citizens of Montreal. Sir William Dawson became principal of McGill in 1855, and five years later the Art Association of Montreal was formally incorporated with Bishop Fulford as one of its most outstanding charter members. The establishment of an annual exhibition of paintings was its first sign of activity and during the last 74 years there has been no break in the continuity of these exhibitions.

DONATION OF LAND.

Benaiah Gibb, vice-president when the association was incorporated, gave the land on Phillips Square, where the Art Gallery was erected from the design of J. W. Hopkins, and a bequest from him formed the nucleus of the building fund. The gallery was opened in May, 1879, by the Marquis of Lorne. The Phillips Square Gallery was not fireproof, however, and after 30 years it ceased to be large enough. In 1912 the present building on Sherbrooke street was completed and opened by the Duke of Connaught.

Passing from incidents in the development of the Art Association, Dr. Colby touched upon the character of the collections as they are at the present time, and upon the service which the institution seeks to render to the public at large as well as to its own members. Although everything possible is done at the exhibitions to encourage architects and sculptors, the work of the association has been, and still is, chiefly concerned with painting, he said.

At the annual spring exhibition the pictures shown number from 300 to 400 and represent about 40 per cent. of those which come before the hanging committee. In alternate years the exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts is held in the galleries. There are loan exhibitions at frequent, though irregular, intervals.

Les moins de 30 ans en peinture

Gazette Feb. 1/2/34

Les belles promesses que nous révèle le concours Brymner.

A bonne école

Le concours William Brymner, que l'Art Association a tenu cette année à même les fonds du mémorial de l'artiste qui fut de son vivant directeur des écoles de l'association, a permis de grouper un ensemble d'œuvres des peintres de moins de trente ans qui révèle de solides talents et de belles promesses. Les toiles et aquarelles sont exposées à la Galerie des Arts.

On comprend que le jury du concours ait voulu tenir compte non pas tant de l'effet que tel ou tel tableau peut produire sur le public mais bien plutôt de la maturité de talent, de l'originalité, de la technique qu'ils dénotent. Toutefois, pour le visiteur (et c'est le point de vue de Reynald lorsqu'il donne quelques opinions, n'en déplaît à ceux qui voudraient lire dans un journal populaire des appréciations techniques qui conviendraient davantage à une revue spécialisée), pour le visiteur donc, il semble étrange que les préférences des juges se soient arrêtées sur une œuvre d'un réalisme aussi peu poétique que cette laideur qui s'appelle "Mme Docquir", quelque fermement de traitement qu'y ait montré Moira Drummond, de Montréal, déclarée premier prix. La faveur des physionomies brutales auprès d'un certain groupe depuis quelques années, cette socialisation du portrait ne laisse pas de nous étonner un peu.

"Maisons aux Ebolements" de Jean-Paul Lemieux, le second prix du concours, témoigne d'un choix heureux dans la composition du paysage et des maisons pittoresques vues en pitié. La perspective est agréable et le coloris est chaud.

Mentions honorables

On trouve du plus intéressant à certains égards chez les mentions honorables. "Breton Girl" de Mary-Helen Gilmour est un tableau d'une belle et paisible rondeur où le rouge des lèvres et le doux bleu des yeux éveillent dans un ensemble foncé des allusions chantantes; la manière de l'artiste y est ferme. "The Model" par Franklyn Arbuckle a du chic et de la grâce dans la pose un tantinet précieuse et le traitement de la blouse de soie; le visage de la jeune femme y est agréable encore que pas assez chaud. "Cowichan Canoe Maker" de L. Pettley Jones est brossé avec vigueur et bien souligné. "Dancer resting" de T.-R. MacDonald présente dans un cadre fort sobre, dans une lumière adoucie, une jolie apparition de dentelle blanche au repos où se jouent des reflets mauves. En "La dispersion des Acadiens" de Fleurimond Constantineau nous saluons un retour au genre historique; la très vaste toile est encombrée; l'uniforme rouge y met des tons chantants et les vaisseaux sont placés à l'arrière comme dans une région de brume superposée à l'avant-plan; mais le détail manque de consistance et l'on pourrait à peine relever les deux figures de vieux, à gauche du tableau, qui aient une expression plus marquée; la toile frappe, elle plaît même, et pourtant nous osons croire que le sujet était encore trop ambigu pour un jeune artiste; on ne s'improvise pas peintre d'histoire. "Calm Evening" de Jean Royle, c'est une marine harmonieuse et reposante où domine un tendre bleu.

Un choix intéressant

L'ensemble des œuvres admises au concours témoigne d'un choix intéressant où, malgré les canons traditionnels, une variété de formules ont trouvé place. Deux toiles de Marjorie Smith y attirent à bon droit beaucoup d'attention; elles marquent de constants progrès dans sa manière solide, soucieuse de réalisme paysan, curieuse des "moments" de la physionomie: "L'enfant aux pommes", décrite avec un ferme naturel à l'instant même où elle s'élance d'un sommeil et que la pomme va lui échapper des doigts engourdis, est d'un bel effet; le portrait de Jean Palardy avec son chat noir, si l'on excepte quelque raideur dans l'épaule, est à la fois ressemblant et agréable de vérité bourgeoise. Jean Palardy lui-même montre deux paysages intéressants: l'un, village en blocs sombres, sent la formule mais reste décoratif; l'autre, "Les Ebolements" présente un beau mouvement de lignes rondes et une étude originale de bleus et de verts. André Morency nous ramène son "Caughnawaga" au vert banal, trois fois exposé, mais son "Chez Jos Lachance", baigné de soleil et de joie et peint avec aplomb, constitue un paysage rustique qui plaît beaucoup.

Evan MacDonald s'est essayé avec assez de bonheur à un sujet mythologique intitulé "Daphné et Apollon". Jean Johnston, moins heureux dans d'autres portraits, a rendu avec vérité la physionomie piquante de la brunette habillée de vert. Clark-Middleton Hope a découvert une "Thelma" au visage frais, rond, éclairé par des yeux clairs. Une nature morte de Gwendolyn-L. Sait, vieux plat et vase de grès sur velours vert, est d'un superbe rendu. Allan Harrison en quelques coups de pinceau représente un "Reggie", ouvrier qui se repose au travail en lisant ; l'abandon et la facilité de ce genre caricatural valent d'être remarqués. Mentionnons au passage: "Old House on Virtue Road" de Gwendolyn-L. Sait, où l'artiste s'essaie à des reflets mauves; Barns, Mallorytown" de Chs-G. Eliot, composition purement décorative; "Plateau des Ebolements" de Madeleine Desrosiers, dont l'ensoleillement est rendu plus vif par une façon d'appliquer la pâte par mouvements superposés; "Deer Lake, Montfort" de Henry Simpkins, tapisserie aux teintes neutres; "Housekeeper" de T.-R. MacDonald, une ménagère très naturelle, très simple, les mains rouges, le visage fatigué (et je parie qu'elle se rase!); "Evening", une petite étude de nuages par Mona Craig; des fleurs veloutées peintes par Chs-G. Eliot; "Seignorial Mill, Québec", de Cynthia-F. Chisnall, une charmante aquarelle en brun et blanc à la façon des gravures anglaises d'autan; des paysages délicats et finis sans trop d'éclat par M. E. Matheson; "Sunset at Prospect, N.-S.", où Jean Royle nous fait passer d'un avant-plan rocailleux et aride à la chaude vision du village lointain; "New-River Beach" de Jean-Douglas Kyle, étude vibrante de lumière et d'eau mais traitement un peu empâté; "Passing Clouds", une belle étude par Clark-Middleton Hope. Les aquarelles de Goodridge Roberts montrent des paysages flous, insaisissables. Cynthia-F. Chisnall montre un "Bonsecours Market" qui pourrait être un bon travail d'écolier. Emile Gauthier n'a pas été trop heureux dans sa "Croix de Ste-Marie, Bordeaux", où, en dépit de tons rouges, l'ensemble est figé et maigre. Lois-A.-R. Lord a une nature morte dont aucun des éléments n'a de vraisemblance; c'est très faible. "September Sun" de Ruth-M. Dingle, montre un paysage bien feuillu, agréable, mais de soleil point. Mary-H. Gilmour présente un portrait de vieux monsieur édenté, au nez trop reluisant. Les chômeurs de W.-S. Wheatly sont un peu trop secs. Ruth-M. Elliot est allée chercher aux Bermudes une juxtaposition incongrue de couleurs, presque drôle, qui s'intitule "Mangrove Bay". Louis Muhlstock peint des paysages vivants mais trop tourmentés sinon négligés. Il faut renoncer à comprendre le modernisme de "Children in a school-yard" de Pegi Nicol, très drôle salmigondis de taches colorées qui, vues d'un sens ou de l'autre, représentent peut-être une scène; il s'agit naturellement d'impressions fugaces. Pour finir, un coup d'œil sur "Song of September" de Franklyn Arbuckle, gentil sous-bois bien garni au fond duquel on aperçoit une paysanne rêveuse.

Issus des Beaux-Arts

Il ne sera pas sans intérêt de signaler, puisqu'il s'agit de la génération nouvelle en peinture, que l'Ecole des Beaux-Arts a été le berceau de plusieurs des jeunes talents que le concours Brymner met en relief. Le premier prix, Mlle Moira Drummond, l'a fréquentée très longtemps et n'en est sortie que depuis une année environ. M. Jean-Paul Lemieux y est resté attaché par son enseignement du dessin dans nos institutions. Les Beaux-Arts ont été pour beaucoup également dans la formation artistique de Fleurimond Constantineau, Mary-Helen Gilmour, Marjorie Smith, Jean Palardy, Madeleine Desrosiers, etc. Par où l'on voit que de l'Ecole il faut beaucoup attendre.

WE were among the seven thousand who visited the Art Gallery the Sunday that was supposed to be the last day for the showing of the Van Horne collection. It wasn't a very 'arty' crowd. There was a complete dearth of art students with their little notebooks, standing in studious attitude before the pictures. But people in the main were too respectful. We fully appreciate that the collection is a very splendid one, but we are the perverse type that gets a childish desire to thumb the nose at people who gush, or who strike poses of reverence, the moment they get in front of a canvas. We were only saved from disgracing the family by falling in with a lad whose ribald remarks were as balm to our soul. We stayed as close to him as we dared, to hear such caustic gems as his comment on a couple of voluptuous (too kind a word, they really were just FAT) Daumier nymphs, being chased by satyrs. "Huh," said he, "stealing Mae West's stuff!" In the downstairs hall he gazed long and admiringly at that handsome mahogany dining table. At last, we thought, here's something he does appreciate. "What a table!" he breathed, "what a table for ping-pong!"

Manchester Academy's New Policy at Spring Exhibition Proves Popular

(Canadian Press Cable.)
London, February 6. — Several prominent critics of the Manchester Academy's spring exhibition commented appreciatively today on the policy, now well established, of including a large number of works of outside artists which is described as bound to produce a better understanding between the zealous amateur and the efficient professional.

The exhibition reflects many types of contemporary art. One of the finest pictures is Henry Lamb's portrait study of "A Girl in Black," possessing character and vitality, and done in glowing color. Just as noteworthy is T. C. Dugdale's vivid portrait of "Captain Adrian Jones," impressive in its fluent expressiveness.

William L. Clause, earlier considered to lean heavily towards the Victorian school, shows three works which might have been painted by different artists, the best undoubtedly being "A Lady and Her Dog," although having a certain primness of expression.

Among the landscapes Herbert Royle's two small canvases are outstanding. "Breezy Day in Wharfedale" and "Evening Light" answer their titles perfectly, the light truthful in effect. Four small landscapes reveal Miss M. L. Trench's sober style, always good in reticent color but perhaps not so effective in pattern.

A charming landscape is "Midsummer Twilight in Kirkcudbright" by Charles Oppenheimer, in which quiet illumination is carefully studied and the effect gains by the simplicity with which the forms are seen.

One critic remarks on a tendency towards formalizing landscapes of which the outstanding example is a work by Bertram Nichols, president of the academy, called "Gateway to the Hills." Executed on a large scale it is a worthy example of Nichols' calculated art. Several of his watercolors are equally deserving of mention.

Pictures and Drawings by Two Artists

The present exhibition at Eaton's galleries is shared by two Canadian artists—Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., with oil pictures and charcoal drawings and Mrs. Statira Frame, of Vancouver, with oil paintings.

Mr. Hebert's drawings are more successful than his oil pictures. They are large and finished drawings, which are, in some cases, studies for pictures which are also shown, and they cover a variety of subjects. Some of them are very good landscapes, with much light and shade and with trees which, though broadly drawn, have quite individual form and character. There are also some views in Montreal and a number of scenes in the docks and on board ship. Some of the most striking of these are scenes of work on ships at night, with very effective handling of lights and shadows and one very good one is a daylight scene in which a sail or hatch-cover makes a large area of shadow. The oil pictures are mostly of scenes in Montreal and its docks; they are very true but generally rather literal and somewhat hard and cold in color, though in one or two of them smoke and steam supply more atmosphere. There are also two good and amusing pictures of winter sports on the mountain, with plenty of color and movement in the many figures against the snow.

Mrs. Frame's oil pictures, in another room, make a complete contrast to Mr. Hebert's. They are very broadly and sketchily painted and detail is suggested much more than stated. They are bright, gay little sketches, full of light with very little shadow, simply constructed, with forms indicated by color. They are of places and people on or near the British Columbia coast. Some of the best of them are very good studies of boats and their reflections in water; a few are landscapes, but more are of houses and villages—Indian villages with totem poles and Japanese villages with their inhabitants; all of them subjects which lend themselves well to Mrs. Frame's happy sense of color.

News of Art Here and Abroad

A very comprehensive international exhibition of Theatre Art has just been opened at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. More than 700 designs and models for stage settings, from 13 different countries, are being shown, representing the best work that is being done in those countries. The exhibits from Soviet Russia, of which much was expected, arrived too late for the opening of the exhibition and, now that they are on view are considered to be rather disappointing.

As a part of the effort to spread the knowledge of art in the United States a series of radio broadcasts on "Art in America" is just being started, with the help of a grant from the Carnegie Corporation of New York. A program of lectures on American art and artists has been arranged, the first of which was given last Saturday, February 3rd.

A lecture on "India, Its Art and Culture" will be given at the Art Association of Montreal next Monday evening, February 12, by J. Arthur McLean, Curator of Oriental Art in the Toledo Museum of Art.

At a meeting of the Art Association of Verdun held in the Y.M.C.A., Verdun, last Thursday, a paper was read by Charles Tulley on "The Works of John Constable." A sketching meeting of the association will be held tomorrow, Feb. 8, at 8 p.m., at which any artists who wish to attend will be welcome.

OILS AND DRAWINGS SHOWN AT EATON'S

Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., Has Harbor Scenes and Old Buildings

PAINTINGS FROM COAST

British Columbia Subjects Favored by Mrs. Statira Frame in Fine Art Galleries

Paintings and charcoal drawings by Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, and oils by Mrs. Statira Frame, a British Columbia artist, hold the walls of the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and the exhibition contains much that will make appeal to the picture-lover and student. A good attendance has marked the show, which is due to close on Saturday, February 17.

In his paintings and in the bulk of his charcoal drawings Mr. Hebert has found his subjects in Montreal, his most favored sketching grounds being the harbor-front and the old section about Bonsecours Market. As a painter he is distinctly an uncompromising realist—he loves the works of men's hands, whether it be the ocean liner or tramp, the gaunt framework of crane or the massive forms of grain elevators and of cold-storage plant. The wharveside has been fruitful of many interesting subjects which have been faithfully interpreted with fine regard to drawing and truth to color. In design the works are admirable and it would be interesting to see this painter essay some of the scenes at an hour when the starkness of these harbor structures is softened by more delicate atmospheric conditions. That the nocturne presents no great difficulties to this painter is manifest in a few of the charcoal drawings which display skill in the art of suggestion. Such port scenes under more mellow lights would permit of a less restricted range of tones and enable the artist to display his ability in rendering subtle values. Under the light of day, iron, steel, coal, concrete, smoke and steam permit of small magic in the handling of color and since Mr. Hebert has kept close to the text he has had to shut out anything that might even hint at the poetic. As records of the activities of a busy port these paintings tell their story in simple and direct language.

PORT SCENES AND BUILDINGS.

Among the paintings must be mentioned "Market Basin"—wharves, vehicles, figures and drays in strong sunlight. At the nearby quay is a small warship, while moored in her place is a C.S.L. steamer. Beyond the Memorial Clock Tower is the Harbor Bridge. "Dominion Coal" shows black heaps, unloading apparatus, a locomotive of the Harbor Commission, flat cars, carts, smoke and steam under a stormy sky. There is a good impression of sunlight on the steamers in "Jacques Cartier Basin," with men apparently at lunch in the foreground. "From an Elevator" is effective in composition and well suggests looking down onto the decks of freighters. In suggesting the size of the structure, "Elevator No. 3" with a wharf-engine pushing a red freight car is convincing. In this medium, too, are a group including "Place Jacques Cartier," as seen from the lawn of the old Court House, with the Nelson Monument, the dome of Bonsecours Market and the distant Chateau de Ramezay—one of the east end of the structure as seen from Gosford street, with the irregular buildings on St. Claude street and the dome of the market; and the historic building, as seen from the west, with its lawn and poplars partly in shadow. The dome of the market, the spire of Notre Dame de Bonsecours and the grain elevator, dominate the adjacent buildings. Two winter scenes are included—skaters and spectators called "Winter, Westmount," and "Winter Sports, Fletcher's Field," with skiers enjoying themselves and a popcorn wagon in the foreground.

The charcoal drawings throughout are competent and satisfying in their sense of values. The landscapes reveal Mr. Hebert as a diligent observer and he shows especial skill in suggesting foliage, shadowed branches and the solid trunks of ancient elms. These studies of sunlight and shadow with incidental buildings are capital performances, and the same can be said of some kindred subjects done in brown wash. No less effective are the charcoal studies of harbor and street scenes. Besides drawings that are studies for some of the works in oil, there are some good night scenes—"Nelson Column, Night" with a lighted shop and the barely discernible grain elevator in the background; "When Day is Done"—Bonsecours Market as seen from the east, lighted stalls, refuse barrels and boxes on the near pavement and two men a trifle hilarious beneath an illuminated sign; and a drawing of the east end of Bonsecours Market as seen from Commissioners street. Other drawings are of port scenes—impressive examples being "Duchess of Atholl" with gang planks out and men engaged in loading; and "Duchess of Richmond" showing the liner under a stormy sky, with a wind kicking up the water and scattering the smoke of tugboats—the latter work being a very faithful interpretation of a dirty day.

MRS. STATIRA FRAME.

The oils by Mrs. Frame reveal the painter as a sensitive colorist with an engaging aptitude for effective subjects. In this group there are many examples of her skill in harmonious arrangements of tone. The brushwork is fluent and the modelling usually free. The works are interesting as being of scenes far removed from here. Her most favored subjects are wooden houses of irregular line and often far from new. Of this series must be mentioned "Post Office, Yarrow, B.C.," and "Indian Community House, Alert Bay, B.C.," the latter work including a totem pole. Totem poles also figure in "Indian Graveyard" and in "Indian Village." The last-named indicates a far from affluent settlement with noble mountains in the background. An effective impression of brilliant sunlight in a tree-shadowed doorway with an inverted red bucket, called "Sunny Corner," and the blaze of blooms is well rendered in "The Flower Market." "Japanese Village" is another sound work in which figures play their decorative part. A bright sunny day is depicted in "Observatory Hill, Victoria, B.C.," and a frankly decorative work is two figures in a lantern-hung arbor, entitled "Lanterns and Parasols." Decaying buildings have attracted the painter in "Old Cannery" and "Derelicts," and subjects set for the enjoyment of pure color include "Flowers and Fruit" and "Red Cabbage"—the latter work having an orange-hued pumpkin as foil to the purple-crimson of the cabbage. An impression of warmth is happily conveyed in "The Tent" in the shade of which a woman in a red blouse is seated. Near the shelter is a tree and beyond the blue sea.

Those who appreciate color will find much to enjoy in these spontaneously-painted works which are simple in theme, unmannered in execution and distinctly agreeable to the eye. They are essentially bits of color that would bring sparkle to the dullest wall.

Brymner Prize Pictures Are Exhibited

MH Star 07 02 34

The pictures, in oil and water colour, sent in for competition for the William Brymner Memorial Prizes are now being exhibited, that is, those which were not rejected by the jury, in one of the upstairs galleries of the Art Association of Montreal. There are nearly a hundred of them and they seem to be fairly representative of the work of younger Canadian painters, including some who have not yet figured very much in exhibitions here. Nothing among them is very outstanding, and the jurors may have had some difficulty in making a choice; there are good paintings but few very interesting pictures and due account seems to have been taken in the judging of the ambitions of the painters and the way in which they dealt with any problems that they had set themselves.

Portrait studies are rather conspicuous among the more successful pictures. Moira Drummond, a descendant of the poet of the Habitant, who won the first prize with a portrait of a woman, has another, of a man, which is almost as good. Franklin Arbuckle gets Honorable Mention for a well painted portrait of a girl and he also shows a good picture of a wood scene with a figure among the trees; L. Petley Jones' "Cowichan Canoe Maker" has in its painting a sort of rugged strength which suits its subject; Mary R. Gilmour has two portraits of which a head of a Breton girl is much the better; and these both get Honorable Mention. T. R. MacDonald's portrait, "The Housekeeper," is ugly with some good qualities; his "Dancer Resting" gets Honorable Mention, evidently for its drawing and painting rather than for its merits as a picture. There are good qualities of painting and drawing in Evan Macdonald's portrait study and in Marjorie Smith's picture of a boy with a plate of very green apples.

The second prize is won by Jean Paul Lemieux' not very interesting picture of houses at Les Eboulements; Jean Royle has two pictures of the Nova Scotia coast, full of light and colour, one of which gets Honorable Mention; Andre Morency has two attractive scenes of Quebec country life, Jean Douglas Kyle's picture of the Nova Scotia coast, Clare Middleton Hope's two landscapes, and Ruth M. Dingle's sketches of wooded lake country are also among the better pictures. There is one fairly large historical picture which gets Honorable Mention, Fleurimond Constantineau's "Dispersion of the Acadians," in which a brave attempt has been made at a difficult subject.

The water colours are few and not conspicuously good, excepting those by Henry Simpkins and Wilfrid J. Flood, and Pegi Nicol's very amusing sketch of a crowd of children.

ART GUILD REPORTS GOOD YEAR

Gazette Feb. 13/34

Attendance at Exhibitions
Evokes Special Comment
From Col. W. Bovey

NEW BRANCHES FORMED

One in P.E.I., Another in Ottawa Valley—Work Extended Through University Summer Schools

The most notable success of the past year for the Canadian Handicraft Guild has been the remarkable attendance at the exhibitions held by the Guild, its branches and affiliated societies, in the opinion of Lt.-Col. Wilfrid Bovey, expressed in the report he gave as president of that organization at their annual meeting held yesterday in their headquarters, 2019 Peel street. He was re-appointed to direct their affairs again for 1934.

He gave figures to show the significance of the comments on the attendance at the exhibitions. Edmonton came highest with the extraordinary number of 125,000. In Montreal the crowds who came day after day to the exhibition totalled 32,000 and in Winnipeg no less than 50,000 showed sufficient interest in the various specimens of handicraft on view to attend and examine it for themselves. Centres where this year's exhibition was the initial effort were as follows: Handicrafts Association of Canada at Toronto with 8,000 in attendance; the Mabel Hubbard Club, Montreal, 950; C. H. Guild, Charlottetown, 6,000; C. H. Guild, Banff, 2,000.

In his passing reference to the financial situation during 1933 the president said that the Guild owed appreciation to the finance committee under Mr. Fraser for the fact that the liquid position of the Guild has been unimpaired in spite of the loss owing to diminished sales which had been high and, in addition, there had been a great deal of new equipment installed and far better headquarters obtained.

It was noted in the report that two new branches were formed last year, one the Prince Edward Island branch and the other that of the Ottawa Valley, the former with the full support of the provincial Government and the latter with Dr. H. Tait McKenzie as president, and Monsignor F. L. French, of Renfrew, vice-president.

SOCIETIES AFFILIATE.

Associated societies were also added to the list in existence and these are the Cape Breton Home Industries, first established by Mrs. Alexander Graham Bell; also the Mabel Hubbard Club of Montreal. Other extensions of the Guild work were seen in the arrangements made with the Western University summer school at Trois Pistoles, and the University of Alberta; contact established with the Toronto group called "The Village"; and Dr. McKenzie's important museum of pioneer products at Almonte.

Among the suggestions by the President for the future were: The establishment of a small committee on design to obtain good saleable designs for woodwork, ironwork and textiles to pass on to the workers. The value of this may be seen from the fact that where handicraft fails to sell it is due rather to design than workmanship, he stated. The establishment of a small technical committee to classify new technical information and pass on for publication to the proper committee; extension of publicity work; establishment of a special committee on Indian work.

The following officers were appointed for the year. The patrons are: Their Excellencies, The Governor General and the Countess of Bessborough.

HANDICRAFT WORK INCREASE SHOWN

Star Feb. 13/34

Guild Reports New Branches Opened and Societies Formed

Establishment of two new branches, addition of two associated societies and greatly increased attendance at handicraft exhibitions featured reports presented at the annual meeting of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild held yesterday afternoon at the new headquarters, 2019 Peel street.

The new branches were the Prince Edward Island and the Ottawa Valley branches. The new associated societies are the Cape Breton Home Industries, founded by Mrs. Alexander Graham Bell, wife of the famous Canadian inventor, and the Mabel Hubbard Club of Montreal. Activities of the guild expanded, especially in the teaching of weaving and the formation of two new committees on Indian arts and design.

REVIVAL OF INTEREST

Reports showed that there has been a notable revival of interest in handicrafts. More than 230,000 visitors attended exhibits of handicraft work in various centres throughout the year. Credit was given Robert M. Campbell, chairman of the committee on publicity and publications and editor of the Handicrafts News for fostering this growth of interest in the home industries of Canada.

Col. Wilfrid Bovey, president of the guild, pointed out that the loss owing to diminished sales was offset by drastic economies, effected by guild officers and workers, so that "our liquid position has been very little impaired."

Reports were presented by the following committees: Montreal educational, exhibition, design, Indian, technical, finance and shop, permanent collection, publicity and publications, by the secretary treasurer and other executives and by representatives of the Prince Edward Island, Ottawa Valley, Manitoba and British Columbia branches.

Election of patrons, officers and members of committees was as follows:

PALACE GARDENS SEEN

Feb. 19/34

Paintings Made by Miss E. M. B. Warren at Sandringham

An interesting lecture on gardens of historical and romantic interest, from earliest times, through the mediaeval period to the present day, was given by Miss E. M. B. Warren, R.B.A., at a meeting held in Douglas Dominion Church under the auspices of the Douglas Dominion Ladies' Literary Circle last night.

Miss Warren's lecture was illustrated by lantern slides made from watercolors painted by herself at the various spots about which she spoke. Of particular interest were scenes of Sandringham gardens, which she had painted by permission of Queen Mary, especially in order to have slides made from them.

Mrs. R. C. Vaughan presided over the meeting. A number of songs were sung by Lila Valiant Reid.

THE ANNUAL meeting of the Art Association of Montreal will be held at the galleries Thursday afternoon, March 8. Reports for the year ending December 31, 1933, will be received and the election of officers held.

UNFINISHED MURAL TAKEN FROM WALL

Gazette, Feb. 14/34

Removal From Rockefeller Centre Involves Destruction of Painting

(By The Associated Press.)

New York, February 12.—Workmen with pickaxes dug from the walls of Rockefeller Centre last Saturday night the mural which Diego Rivera, noted Mexican artist, was prevented from finishing. It was learned today.

Officials of the Centre said that the mural, which contained a head of Nicolai Lenin, had been destroyed.

"The Rivera mural has been removed from the wall of the R. C. A. building and the space replastered," said a brief statement. "The removal involved the destruction of the painting."

A storm of controversy centred around the work when Rivera was ordered to drop his tools last May because his painting no longer was acceptable to the Rockefeller family. Attached at the Centre said John D. Rockefeller personally appeared and told Rivera to stop the work. The artist was given a cheque for $14,000, completing the $21,000 called for his contract.

Pickets later stormed the Centre, Left wing groups and individuals denounced the Rockefellers, and Rivera made bitter remarks. Since then, the partly completed fresco has been covered with burlap. It was reported recently that Rockefeller Centre officials were looking around for another artist to fill the space.

"Act of Barbarism"

Mexico City, February 12.—Diego Rivera described tonight as "an act of barbarism" the destruction of his murals in Rockefeller Centre.

"The destruction of my murals neither surprised nor disgusted me," the Mexican said, "because from the nature and symbolism of the work it was inevitable that capitalism, for the protection of its own class interests, had to destroy them."

"Nevertheless, I consider it an act of barbarism."

NOTED FEMINIST WILL LECTURE HERE

Signorina Amy Bernardy, a visitor in Canada under the auspices of the National Council of Education, will arrive in Montreal tomorrow morning. She is one of the outstanding women scholars of Italy, well known both as an author and journalist.

For a number of years she was professor of Italian at Smith College, Massachusetts, during which time she travelled widely both in the United States and Canada. She gained distinction in literature at the University of Florence on the staff of which she holds an important position at the present time. She has complete command of English, and is well known as an able and entertaining lecturer.

INDIAN ART HAVING TRUE RENAISSANCE

Gazette Feb. 13/34

Authentic Native School of Painting Described by J. Arthur MacLean

OLD TRADITION REVIVED

Past Decade Has Seen Distinct Break From European Influence, Art Association Is Told

There is a true renaissance taking place in the art of India today. Indian artists are breaking away from the European influence and developing an authentic native school of painting, based on traditional Indian art that flourished in the early days of civilization, stated J. Arthur MacLean, curator of Oriental art at the Toledo Museum of Art, in addressing members of the Art Association of Montreal last night. He spoke at a meeting of the association held in the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street.

Mr. MacLean dealt with the history of Indian art from the time of 3500 B.C. to the present day. He stated that excavations made during the past decade had proven beyond doubt that Indian art was a reality in those early days, and that there might be further discoveries to prove that the art of that country was really the mother of all Oriental art.

He showed slides of frescos in the cliff dwellings of India, the earliest of which, he stated, were probably painted around the first year of the Christian era, and the latest in the seventh century. He spoke highly of their beauty, of the technique with which they were executed, and declared that here was evident proof of the masterful talent of early Indian painters.

Mr. MacLean went on to speak on the Buddhist period of Indian art, when the artistic life of India was at its peak; of the impetus given painting by the invading Khans at a later date, and of the various stages of alternate progress and decadence up to the present day.

TURNED TO OLD FORMS.

Twenty-five years ago, Mr. MacLean stated, Indian painters felt to a great extent the influence of European art upon their work, and indeed, urged that they be taught the technique and methods of the European school. Consequently their art, as an original thing, was second-rate. The English, however, the speaker added, did all they could to dissuade the Indians from adopting the ideas of foreigners.

That was 25 years ago, Mr. MacLean stated. Today Indian artists have dropped the influence of the European school and are holding more to the traditional form of their forefathers, bringing the art of India into a true renaissance.

As for India's life, Mr. MacLean declared: "We hear on all sides that India is not intellectual. If that be so, then Americans and Europeans are barbarians."

Canadian Art May Be Shown in Rome

THANKS to negotiations opened by Don Mario Colonna, Duc di Rignano and his wife Donna Adelina, while in Toronto and Ottawa, it is likely that some of the best examples of modern Canadian art may be exhibited in Rome soon, Donna Adelina confided to reporters in the Ritz Carlton hotel this morning, while they waited to meet her husband.

She was impressed by the high and very distinctive quality of the work of some Canadian artists, and rather surprised to find these hidden in the basement of the Ottawa and Toronto galleries.

As pretty nearly every country in the world has some specimens of its national art on exhibit in Rome, except Canada, and as Donna Adelina was struck both by the high quality of some of the exhibits shown her, and the distinctive Canadian viewpoint they revealed, different from anything any other country shows, negotiations have been started which will probably result in exhibits appearing in some of the Italian galleries.

The Council of the Art Association of Montreal announce the opening of the Exhibition of Paintings by Cornelius Kreighoff, 1815-1872, on Monday afternoon at three o'clock, through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada.

BOUCHARD GIVEN 14-YEAR SENTENCE Star Feb. 13/34 Convicted in Connecticut With Death of C.P.R. Officer

JOLIETTE, Feb. 13 — (C.P.) — Gaston Bouchard, convicted of manslaughter in connection with the killing of Acting Investigator Jan. Mackie, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was sentenced here today to 14 years in the penitentiary. Mr. Justice Philemon Cousineau said Mackie was shot in the Lanore freight yards by one of two bandits who had gone there presumably to rob freight cars early on the morning of September 8, 1933.

MEN INVESTIGATING THEFTS.

Mackie and Investigator George V. Miller had been sent to Lanore to investigate several thefts that had taken place in the railway company's freight cars at that place. The two men hid under a freight car and caught Thounin and Bouchard trying to break the seals of one of the cars. They gave chase and Thounin, turning about, fired three shots at Mackie, who was the close behind him. Mackie died in a Montreal hospital the same day.

Following Thounin's suicide Bouchard was charged with the murder and brought here for trial. The jury hearing the case found him guilty of manslaughter following Mr. Justice Cousineau's advice they were at liberty to do so if they felt Bouchard did not know Thounin had been armed when the pair left Montreal bound for Lanore and the freight cars.

Bouchard will be brought back to St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary.

Bouchard was not the man who fired the shots that killed the investigator it was established at his trial. His companion on the night of the murder, Paul Thounin, alias Lepine, killed Mackie. Two days later Thounin committed suicide in a Provincial police cell in Montreal by taking poison that he had concealed in the heel of one of his shoes. Thounin had previously led police to the cache of valuable paintings stolen from the galleries of the Montreal Art Association.

Pictures by A. Heming and Stanley Royle

The work of two painters, one from Ontario and one from Nova Scotia, are being shown this week and next at Eaton's galleries. Arthur Heming is one of the senior Canadian painters and his illustrations of certain aspects of Canadian life are well known; Stanley Royle, R.B.A., has only fairly recently come to this country and his views of Canada have a freshness of their own.

The pictures by Mr. Heming are of life of men and animals in the wilder parts of Canada. Some of the best of them are of the life of lumber men in conditions which have ceased to exist—in the days of the big log-rafts—painted by an eye-witness, full of movement and action; one very striking one is of Indian trappers. There are, too, a number of pictures of the animals—the deer and the foxes—of the north country, true and well observed, but made into rather formalized decorations. Snow and tumbling waters fill most of these pictures, but there are a few of autumn scenes, with much rich color. In the same gallery is Richard Jack's very good portrait of Mr. Heming, dressed for the backwoods in winter.

From Mr. Heming's snows one can pass into the next room and warm up in front of Mr. Royle's summer sunshine. These pictures are nearly all of the Nova Scotian coast, bright with the color of red and grey rocks and blue water on hot summer days. There are pleasant little ports and coves with their houses and their boats and a few good studies of waves breaking on the rocks. Mr. Royle's point of view is so much his own and is so well conveyed in paint that it makes him a welcome addition to Canadian landscape painters. There are two or three English pictures—one very good one of a bridge in Derbyshire, and one of a Scottish moor—which emphasize the difference in Mr. Royle's way of seeing and even of painting English and Canadian scenery. Besides the landscapes there are three good portrait studies—one of the painter himself, one with much character of an old Nova Scotian fisherman and a good study of a Negro girl.

Canadian Bird Life In Pictures

Birds occupy the print room of the Art Association of Montreal this week and next, in a collection of pictures in water color by Major Allan Brooks. The pictures, which have been lent by the Royal Ontario Museum, come mostly from the collection of the Canadian poet, Wallace Havelock Robb, with additions by many other donors. Major Brooks, working with much love and knowledge of birds and their habits, has made it his aim to show them as they live, in their natural surroundings, and the beauty of the pictures is the beauty of the birds themselves. They are drawn and painted truly and exactly,—to be faithful records more than works of art,—and make an admirable study in natural history.

The exhibition, which is given with the co-operation of the Province of Quebec Association for the Protection of Birds, has evident educational value, and arrangements have been made for allowing children to see it. Classes of school children are admitted to the galleries, without payment, accompanied by their teachers, if notice is given to the Art Association by telephone.

News of Art Here and Abroad

The exhibition of works of the late G. Horne Russell at the Watson Galleries, Sherbrooke street, will open next Saturday, February 24th.

At the Johnson Galleries, St. Catherine street, W., there will be next week an exhibition of pictures from the Cooling Galleries of London. The collection will include old and modern French, Dutch and English pictures, among them being works by Abraham de Pape, William Shayer, Leonard Richmond and many other painters.

The increased interest in mural painting has led to the opening of a Studio of Workshop Practice for mural painters in London, at South Kensington. This studio will be a school for teaching known methods of mural painting and will also provide facilities for experimenting with new methods or improvements in old ones. Investigations are to be made with new or unusual surfaces to which decorations may have to be applied, and it is hoped to find an overcome the faults of method which have led to the fading or decay of so many modern mural decorations.

LANTERN SLIDES AID LECTURE ABOUT ART Star March 6/34 Signor Eugenio Croizat Addresses Group

Nearly 300 members of the Montreal Art Association last night attended in the Art Gallery the slide illustrated lecture of Signor Eugenio Croizat which had been announced as dealing only with "Gems of Italian Painting," but which was extended by the good nature of the speaker to a survey of all that was most beautiful in the products of Dutch, French and English painters.

Signor Croizat's lecture was accompanied by lantern slides consisting of photographs taken with the three color process, which, he assured his hearers, reproduced the shades and tones of the paintings far more exactly than the old fashioned hand colored slides which are commonly to be seen.

He spoke of the great explorers of the art of painting who have during the past seven centuries led the way to complete mastery of perspective, of light and shade, of the anatomy of the human figure and that of animals, and traced the gradual development of perfection from the days of Giotto.

His lecture was a vivid mixture of instruction, comment and personal anecdote about the great masters whose works he discussed. His praises were highest for Leonardo da Vinci, that painter, sculptor, engineer, poet and musician whom he described as the greatest man of the Renaissance.

art, and particularly of painting in India. Mr. MacLean referred to the attempts of Indian painters to imitate European methods and styles, an attempt which was wisely discouraged by English authorities. At present Indian painting is in an uncertain condition, with a movement, still in progress, towards a return to the older native manner of painting.

The exhibition of pictures of native Canadian birds, lent by the Royal Ontario Museum and shown in co-operation with the Province of Quebec Association for the Protection of Birds, will be opened at the Art Association next Saturday, Feb. 17th and will remain open till March 5th.

The fifty-first annual spring exhibition of the Art Association will be held this year from Thursday, April 12 till Sunday, May 6.

All entries for this exhibition must be sent in on or before Saturday, March 31.

A collection of prints by Canadian artists, mostly from Montreal, is being shown in the Produced in Canada Exhibition, which is now open in the Sun Life Building. There are some interesting works, some of which have not been shown before, by Messrs. Norlin, Galea and others.

An exhibition of pictures by the late G. Horne Russell will be opened at the Watson Gallery, Sherbrooke street, on Saturday, February 24—the last of the annual exhibitions of Mr. Russell's work which have been held in this gallery.

Pictures by Arthur Heming and by Stanley Royle, R.B.A., will make up the next exhibition at Eaton's gallery; this will begin next Monday, February 19. The pictures and drawings by Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., and the pictures by Mrs. Statira Frame remain on view till the end of the present week.

ARCHITECTS WANT PUBLIC WORK JOBS Gazette Feb. 27/34

Ask That Men in Private Practice Be Given Share in Relief Programme

W. S. MAXWELL IS HEAD

Montrealer Named President of Royal Architectural Institute of Canada at Meeting Here

Engagement of architects in private practice was urged in connection with the public works programme recently announced by Premier Bennett, in a resolution adopted at the 27th annual convention of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, which met in the headquarters of the Province of Quebec Association of Architects on Friday and Saturday. The resolution, copies of which are to be forwarded to the Dominion Prime Minister and to all provincial premiers, set forth that in view of the fact that one important purpose of the programme was to provide employment, it would be in keeping with the spirit of the project if the services of private architects, not at present working for the Government, were engaged to draw up the plans for building programmes in their own localities.

Inclusion of a slum clearance appropriation in the funds to be set aside for the public works programme, was requested in another resolution passed by the convention. It was stated that due to the serious shortage of low-rental housing, and to slum conditions resulting from this state of affairs, leading to a crying need for the abolition of slum areas in many centres, upon the public authorities of which the slums were a charge, the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada requested the Dominion Government to include in its appropriation for public works an amount to finance slum clearance and low-cost housing development. In this programme, the resolution suggested, municipalities could be asked to co-operate, and it was contended that the project would do much to stimulate private initiative.

The resolution of the Institute further recommended the appointment of an advisory committee, to act under the National Research Council in the administration of town planning, housing and slum clearance problems and in the manipulation of the funds appropriated for the purpose.

PLAN RESEARCH BUREAU.

A salient point in the report of the council of the Institute, presented by Gordon M. West, retiring president, was the advocacy of the establishment of a bureau to carry out research work on building materials, and the special appropriation by the Dominion Government of funds to cover this work. This recommendation is to be sent to Hon. H. H. Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa.

Mr. West also announced in his report that the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada had been invited to affiliate itself with the Royal Society of Canada, and that the invitation had been accepted.

The new council for 1934 announced the election of the following officers for the coming year: president, W. S. Maxwell, Montreal; first vice-president, Major H. E. Gates, Halifax; second vice-president, David Webster, Saskatoon; honorary treasurer, W. L. Somerville, Toronto; honorary secretary, Alcide Chausse, Montreal; secretary, I. Markus, Toronto. Executive committee: W. S. Maxwell, W. L. Somerville, Alcide Chausse, E. I. Barott, Ludger Venne, Percy E. Nobbs, H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, Irene Vautrin, M.L.A., and Ernest Cormier.

The council for 1934 includes the following: J. Martland and R. McD. Symonds, Alberta Association of Architects; William Bow and S. M. Eveleigh, Architectural Institute of British Columbia; W. W. Alward and H. Claire Mott, Architectural Institute of New Brunswick; L. J. Green, George W. Northwood and F. N. Rutan, Manitoba Association of Architects; W. M. Brown and Major H. E. Gates, Nova Scotia Association of Architects; Murray Brown, Burwell R. Coon, John M. Lyle, W. B. Riddle, W. L. Somerville and Gordon M. West, Ontario Association of Architects; E. I. Barott, Alcide Chausse, Ernest Cormier, H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, W. S. Maxwell, Percy E. Nobbs, Irene Vautrin and Ludger Venne, Province of Quebec Association of Architects; W. G. Van Egmond and David Webster, Saskatchewan Association of Architects.

STUDENT AWARDS MADE.

The Royal Architectural Institute of Canada Student Competition entries were judged during the course of the convention, and the following winners were announced: Senior problem, Phyllis Willson Cook, University of Toronto, gold medal; J. B. Langley, University of Toronto, honorable mention; Junior problem, Wilson Salter, University of Toronto, gold medal; W. D. Lount, University of Manitoba; J. T. Ridley, University of Toronto; H. W. Levin, University of Manitoba; Robert D. Powrie and W. E. Fleury, University of Toronto, honorable mention. There were no entries from McGill University.

The presentation of fellowships to three distinguished members of the Institute was one of the highlights of the convention. The presentation was made at the annual banquet held in the Club Canadien on Saturday evening, and the newly elected fellows were: Murray Brown, Toronto; S. P. Dumaresq, Hal-and Wilfrid Lacroix, Quebec. Appropriate remarks were made during the course of the dinner by Alex P. Shearwood, recently elected president of the Engineering Institute; Fred G. Rutley, vice-president of the Canadian Construction Association; Noulan Cauchon, of the town planning commission at Ottawa, and Professor Ramsay Traquair, of McGill University.

The retiring president, Mr. West, opened the function, and inducted the newly-elected president, W. S. Maxwell, to whom he ceded the office of chairman for the balance of the evening. Others at the head table included: Alcide Chausse, honorary secretary; W. L. Somerville, honorary treasurer; Percy E. Nobbs, past president; J. P. Hynes, past president; Major H. E. Gates, 1st vice-president; W. W. Alward, president of the Architectural Association of New Brunswick; Gordon McL. Pitts, vice-president of the Province of Quebec Association of Architects.

Considerable interest was shown in the display of decorative art in the gallery of the Province of Quebec Association of Architects, executed by pupils of the Ecole des Beaux Arts de Montreal, and exhibited by courtesy of Charles Mailard, director. Sculpture, designs for metal work, stained glass, textile weaving, wrought iron, posters and panels of painted decorations, were included in the exhibition. The designs all depicted familiar scenes in the national life of the Dominion.

DEAN OF CANADIAN ARTISTS IS DEAD Gazette March 17/34

Thomas Mower Martin One of Founders of Royal Canadian Academy

(By The Canadian Press.)

Toronto, March 16.—The "father of Canadian art" lay dead here today, behind him a life of 95 years in which he had painted landscapes which made Canada's scenery famous in many parts of the world. He was the dean of Canadian painters and one of the founders of the Royal Canadian Academy.

Thomas Mower Martin, a native of London, came to this country in 1862, when he was 24, and settled in the Muskoka district, only to find the climate too severe for his young English bride. He moved to Toronto and struggled to gain the recognition which finally came his way.

Ten times he crossed the Dominion in search of color for his pictures. Gradually his work won notice. Some of his paintings are hung in the halls of Windsor Castle, others in the National Gallery of Canada, and many in galleries of England, Scotland and the United States.

In the '70's, when the Marquess of Lorne was Governor-General of Canada, Mr. Martin found a friend in the Marchioness, who was a painter herself. She took great interest in his efforts, which resulted in formation of the Royal Canadian Academy and later the Ontario Society of Artists.

Mr. Martin was born in London, England, son of Edward H. Martin, acting treasurer of the Inner Temple. He was launched on a military career, but after attending exhibitions of the Royal Academy he decided to embark on an art career.

His wife died ten years ago. Surviving are four daughters, Miss E. May Martin, of Toronto; Mrs. George Lydiatt, of Vancouver; Mrs. John Herbert and Mrs. Henry Munderloh, both of Montreal. A son, W. A. Martin, of Toronto, also survives.

BRACING MARINES SEEN AT WATSON'S Gazette Feb. 26/34

Characteristic Shore and Cove Scenes by late G. Horne
Russell, R.C.A. on View

INVIGORATING WORKS

Collection Reveals Capable Painter's Sympathy for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia
as Sketching Grounds

Marines by G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., who died last year at St. Andrews, N.B., where he had his summer home, make an invigorating exhibition at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. At the opening on Saturday there was a large attendance of picture-lovers who have followed with interest the career of this painter who for many years held his one-man shows in these galleries. The works, which are effectively hung, form what is announced as the last annual exhibition by this painter who found the coasts and coves of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia sympathetic material for his brush. A direct and forceful painter whose sane observation was coupled with a marked technical ability to set down what he saw, Mr. Horne Russell has left true and vivid interpretations of scenes in these localities.

That the sea was not his only interest is revealed by the presence of a vigorous landscape—noble trees and cattle in a stream "put in" with a palette knife. There is, too, a painting of ducks in a brook which shows a thorough understanding of these fowl. Then, as is well known, portraits occupied an important place in his artistic activities, but these, being held by the sitters, have no place in the present show.

Two interesting works of a different sort are "Riverside Drive, N.Y." with figures grouped beneath the sunlit trees while down in the Hudson is a grey warship and beyond the distant shore; and a Montreal port scene, from near the mouth of the canal, with steamer and old hay barges, grain elevators and harbor structures. Smoke and steam add to the impression of activity. Of Quebec there is a snow-scene, marked by lovely values in the buildings which rise above the basin where dusted with snow lie moored many schooners. A break in the ice catches the gleam of the yellow sky, while above the buildings can be seen the tower of the Chateau Frontenac. It is a work of restful mood and highly effective in its scheme of color.

FAMILIAR WITH COUNTRY.

Paintings done amidst scenes he visited year after year form the bulk of the exhibition and attest to his skill in the handling of atmospheric problems—the threat of storm, sun-shot mists and the delicate silver of calm overcast days. Quiet in spirit are the scenes showing chummers raking the mud. The blue of their coats furnishes a fine foil to the rich mud in which they delve for the bivalves. In one of these scenes a white horse adds interest to the composition. There is also a plowing scene—the farmer with his team of oxen on high ground overlooking the sea.

One impressive nocturnal is shown, "Moonlight, St. Andrews," with the silver trail of the moon broken by a schooner and dory. The distant shore is dark and undulating and the silhouette of a wharf adds emphasis to the foreground. In the depiction of night Mr. Horne Russell was uniformly successful in both oils and water-colors—the latter medium being one in which he was equally facile. Summer calm is well suggested in a scene where the placid water, edged by mud and rocks, mirrors a schooner. Less settled weather threatens in "Line Fishers" where, under a grey sky, men in their dories hope for luck.

Security and quiet are suggested in the sheltered waterways of coves, with their rounded rocky hills boasting scrubby patches of spruce, old pile wharves and weather-stained buildings. Here rest the odd schooner and many dories. Sometimes from a wooden bridge fishermen look down to the water, "yarning" as they await the tide. Such scenes have been painted at varying hours, the most poetic interpretations being those that show the light of the setting sun lingering on a building and the peak of the sail of a shadowed schooner. One important harbor scene shows many schooners and boats, with houses in the background, under a golden sky. In this group are harbor scenes with ships which reveal how thoroughly the painter knew his watercraft, wharves and old buildings.

Outstanding is a group of paintings where the artist faced the sea in its fury. Here are rocks that stand up to the pounding of tons of water driven by tide and wind. Rocks gleam where spray and foam have dashed against them, and the spacious heavens are packed with heavy racing clouds. Scenes there are, too, where the wind clips off the spray as breakers crash on rocks. Such works convincingly suggest the roar of wind, hiss of spray and the turbulence of surging water. In one painting, where the wind bends trees on a dreary shore, the foreground is filled with waves that pile in on wild water broken in its assault upon the rocks. These canvases are virile performances painted by a man who knew and loved the sea and who was happy in painting it in

ART IN REVIEW

Decorative Pictures by Claire Fauteux

Mlle. Claire Fauteux, whose pictures and designs are now being exhibited at Morency Freres, St. Catherine street, East, was formerly a student in Montreal under the late William Brymner and Maurice Cullen; she later continued her studies in Paris and has done a good deal of work there in mural painting, which she made a special subject of study; she is at present engaged on a mural decoration at the Cercle Universitaire in Montreal.

The pictures and studies which are being exhibited are many of them small designs for large mural decorations, using for the most part landscape subjects, in which there are well designed masses of trees and single trees, with figures and animals used only incidentally; among the best of them are those called "Orient," "Ete," "Matin," and "Cimetiere Persan," and some others with no names, which, in their designs and color schemes are effective little pictures which should be still better on the larger scale for which they are intended.

A sense for formal decoration appears also in the treatment of some of the landscapes which Mlle Fauteux is exhibiting. One of the best of them, "Pic des trois soeurs, Perce" has an interesting composition of waves and cliffs, and the oil picture of Lac Guindon in the Laurentians also has decorative arrangement. There are fine notes of colour in an oil painting and a pastel of Riviere du Nord. Among the landscapes are also some attractive sketches of very nice gardens in Paris and other places in France.

In all Mlle Fauteux's work general decorative design is helped by simplicity and breadth of treatment. In two larger portraits the treatment is rather over-simplified and they are less successful than some of the other works, but two quite small studies of Gypsies, and particularly the head of the man, are far more interesting.

News of Art In Montreal

At the newly opened Continental Art Gallery, 1310 St. Catherine st., West, some pictures are being shown by a number of European painters whose work is little known here. One of these is Meindl, of Vienna, a painter of mountain and sea coast scenes, some of them, particularly the coast scenes, closely and smoothly painted, others, perhaps painted more for his own pleasure, very broadly handled and all interesting. Another Viennese painter of mountains, by whom there are some pictures here, is Tucek, and there is bright and gay color and sunlight in Josef Stoitner's Tyrolean landscapes. Among other good pictures there are some true and cheerful flower pictures by Alois Haenich, of Vienna, a little picture of a girl by Max Michael and some excellent figure drawings by Tchistovsky and Rozmainsky. English painting is also represented by a nice group of figures on the sea shore by William Shayer and by several characteristic, freely painted pictures by Lee Hankey, one of the best of them a street scene in Abbeville. There are also a few Canadian pictures, a large group of children by Charles de Belle and a good little green landscape sketch by Maurice Cullen.

The annual general meeting of the Art Association of Montreal will be held at the Galleries on Sherbrooke street, on Thursday afternoon, March 8th, at 5 o'clock.

SWEDISH ART SHOWN 1934 Illustrated Lecture Given by T. V. Scudamore

Swedish artists are more interested in depicting the life of their country and its scenery than in painting portraits, observed T. V. Scudamore, of Vancouver, in addressing the Women's Art Society yesterday in Stevenson Hall, when he showed over fifty slides of work done by outstanding painters and sculptors of Sweden. The climate, and consequently many typical scenes, is very like that of Canada, he said.

Mr. Scudamore, in discussing the slides which illustrated his lecture, pointed out the touches of humor introduced into their work by many of the artists. He indicated this in reference to some of the sculpture of Carl Meller. Prince Eugen, brother of the King of Sweden, was said by the lecturer to be one of the finest painters in the country. Others whose work was shown included Anders Zorn, Nils Kreuger, Carl Larsson and Ernest Josephson among the painters while Swedish sculpture was represented by Carl Meller, Carl Eldh and Per Hasselberg.

Mr. R. A. Dunton presided.

Last Works of Horne Russell
At Watson's

The exhibition of pictures by the late G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., which opened last Saturday at Watson's gallery, Sherbrooke street, contains, with some earlier pictures, some of the last work done by him. All are oil pictures of the sea or of places near the sea, and the sea itself, with its waves and its boats, is the subject of some of the most important of them. An outstanding one, "After the Storm," of breaking waves under a heavily clouded sky, is perhaps one of the best pictures that Mr. Russell ever painted, and another large one of breakers on the "Grand Manan Coast" and another, smaller, of Louisbourg are almost as good. Similar subjects are in the "Crescent Beach," a recently painted picture, and, with a calmer sea, in "Near Louisbourg"; all of them full of Mr. Russell's love and understanding of the sea. Calmer moods of the sea are shown in "Off Shore, St. Andrew's," a group of fishing boats on still water in early morning light, and in the small "Line Fishers," an excellent sketch of boats in a seaway; "Moonlight, St. Andrew's" is a striking picture of boats in shadow against a bright sky.

Fishing boats and fishermen's houses are, of course, the subjects of many of these pictures—for the most part of smaller ones. "Fish wharf, Grand Manan," "Market wharf" and "Fishermen's wharf" are three very good ones and there is an excellent little picture of a white fishing boat and another, full of gay color on boats and sails in "Evening, St. Andrew's." In some of the pictures land rather than sea provides the chief interest; "The coast of Nova Scotia," with its fresh green foreground, is one of these and "A summer sea," in which the sea is the background to a group of trees on the cliff, is another. There is vivid coloring in "Lord's Cove, Deer Island" and in "Evening light, St. Andrew's."

In a few of these pictures Mr. Russell has deserted his usual subjects, though the "Louise Basin, Quebec" of ships among ice floes, with the buildings on the height standing out against an evening sky, and the ships and fog in "Windmill Point, Montreal" still keep some connection with the sea. More unusual are a very attractive little sketch of "Riverside Drive, New York" and a larger landscape, "Scotch

High Level of Old Masters Not Reached By Modern Painters Star March 2, 1934

This Opinion is Expressed by Richard Jack, Well-Known
Portrait Painter

MODERN painters have never reached the high level of the old masters, in the opinion of Richard Jack, R.A., noted English portrait painter, who sailed the other day to attend the annual Royal Academy exhibition in London. Mr. Jack has been a resident in Montreal for a couple of years.

The old masters, said Mr. Jack, when interviewed Saint John, devoted themselves entirely to art while present-day painters were, perhaps handicapped by the stress and diverse interests of modern life. The men whose work has survived the centuries were concerned chiefly in their own creations and were not led away by the influence of other schools. Some of the world's finest modern painters had turned against the old masters in their youth but with years came wisdom and then they had realized their mistake.

Time, said Mr. Jack, provided the real test of art. He recalled several painters of the last century who were regarded as geniuses in their day but whose work is now gradually losing position.

A definite art movement was apparent in Canada but better times were needed to bring it along because after all could not flourish without financial support, he said. In those days people were confining their purchases to necessities mainly. He was doubtful that there would ever be developed a distinctive Canadian art. Artists were painting Canadian scenes but their work was influenced by the traditions of the old schools.

Ultra-modernistic painting does not impress Mr. Jack in the least. He considers that the radical artists sacrifice all that is accepted as beautiful to achieve their results. "Perhaps," said Mr. Jack, "these paintings are understandable to the person who creates them but I am inclined to believe that it is nothing more than sensationalism. I should hate to live in a world that resembles these pictures."

Mr. Jack said that although only a small percentage of the people appreciated art, the lovers of pictures came from all classes, rich and poor. In this respect art resembles good music.

ITALIAN ART GEMS SHOWN IN LECTURE

Gazette March 6/34
Signor Eugenio F. Croizat Speaks at Art Association of Montreal

Admirers of the Florentine and other schools of painting for which Italy was, and is still famous, found pleasure last night in hearing and seeing an illustrated lecture

"Gems of Italian Art," by Signor Eugenio F. Croizat, given at the Art Gallery under the auspices of the Art Association of Montreal. World famous works that can be seen in continental galleries were thrown on the screen with a wealth of coloring and exactness of reproduction that was astonishing, and as they passed, the lecturer reviewed their history, analyzed their meaning, their beauty and sometimes their shortcomings, giving at the same time an insight into the human side of those who enriched the world's treasures by brush, panel and paint.

Italy's various schools of painting in different ages were discussed and illustrated, among pictures shown being many that are familiar to visitors to the leading galleries of Europe, such as Leonardo da Vinci's "The Last Supper," "Mona Lisa," works of Raphael, Botticelli, Michelangelo, Fra Angelico, and others. Dealing with schools that centred largely upon religious subjects, Signor Croizat discussed them in that light; but also displayed a number of fine portraits and allegorical scenes on which he discoursed with equal effect.

Signor Croizat is an Italian lecturer of international reputation, who in 1930 was placed at the head of a list of five lecturers by the French Minister of Education at the Sorbonne. He has lectured at the Century of Progress Exhibition at Chicago.

H. B. Walker, president of the Art Association, presided.

BEAUPRE SKETCHES PRESENT CONTRAST

Gazette,
March 9, 1934.
Miss Lily Barry Points to Cleanness as Compared to Dirty Montreal

A discourse on the first field sketching classes from Montreal under such artists as Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., Ed. Dyonnet, R.C.A., and the late Wm. Brymner, R.C.A., together with some advice to young artists, formed the subject of an impromptu address by Miss Lily Barry, author and artist, before the first general meeting this year of the Independent Art Association in the Windsor Hotel last night.

The original guest speaker, Miss Claire Fauteux, artist and mural decorator, was unable to return from Ottawa for the meeting. Robert Sharps acted as chairman. Besides the address from Miss Barry, the evening was rounded out by a musicale.

Miss Barry told of her early experience in sketching classes around Beaupre, informing her audience that she had "never seen so passionately clean a country after poor, dirty Montreal. I even believe they swept and washed the backs of their cottages every day." Her advice to young artists stressed the necessity of being to oneself and not to any one else, claiming that it was a vicious influence in the life of an artist to paint merely what people liked just in the hope of selling the work. Sincerity was also stressed, Miss Barry maintaining that while technique was a great asset, yet it was not everything in the production of great work. There was a great field for young artists, she thought, in the portrayal of historic spots in this city of Montreal.

Musical numbers included: Piano solos: Fantaisie—Saint Saens and Dance—Andalusia, by Dantes Belieu; violin solos: Berceuse from Jocelyn and Hungarian Dance from Brahms by Miss K. Lachapelle, with Mr. Belleau accompanying; songs: Dream of Paradise—H. Gray, and Mighty Lak a Rose—Nevin, by a ladies' musical trio under the direction of Mrs. H. R. Tatchell, assisted by Miss Maud Price and Mrs. F. Johnson. The accompanist of the trio was Miss Olive Peacock while the violin obbligato was played by Miss Kathleen Lachapelle. Two French songs, Elegie by Massenet and Bergerettes by Weckerlin sung by Miss Geraldine Lachapelle, accompanied by her sister, Miss Kathleen Lachapelle, concluded the programme.

IMPRESSIONIST ART HAS OLD TRADITION

Titian and Rubens Suffered Same Criticism as Many Modern Painters

OUTLINE VS. COLOR

Illustrated Lecture Given by Prof. F. P. Chambers for Cathedral Women's Guild

"He can't draw." Exactly what many people today say about the Impressionists was said of Titian by the Florentines in the middle of the sixteenth century and of Rubens a hundred years later by the French academicians.

Frank P. Chambers, assistant professor of architecture at McGill University, discussed the age-old controversy between what he described as the "shape" painters or draughtsmen and those who are essentially colorists, yesterday at a meeting of Christ Church Cathedral Women's Guild in the parish house. He illustrated his lecture by means of lantern slides of paintings ranging from the work of twelfth century artists down to that of some present day artists. The Impressionists themselves, he said, are largely to blame for their unpopularity, some being guilty of bad manners, in producing work calculated to offend, and being unpleasant and quarrelsome.

Sight is the only sense which conveys two kinds of information at once, Mr. Chambers remarked. These, shape and color, are not related. "Do what you will, you cannot paint shape and color at the same time," he said. "One or the other will be more important and dominant." He pointed out that some are essentially "shape" painters or draughtsmen, drawing outlines and then filling in with color, while the others, the colorists, working in oils or pastel, do not use outline.

The Florentine school, illustrated by Giotto's "Death of St. Francis" in Santa Croce, Florence, was among the early examples shown, fresco, the lecture remarking, necessitating an outline later to be filled in with color. Mantegna was purely a painter in outline and turned to engraving in his later years.

Until about the fifteenth century this was the normal way of painting, until the school of oil color grew up. The change was illustrated by a canvas by Leonardo da Vinci. The real oil painters of Italy were the Venetians, Mr. Chambers pointed out with some slides of paintings by Titian. Veronese showed the method more clearly, the outline disappearing and the effect approaching what is now called the Impressionistic. Rubens, he said, never drew outline in his life.

LENGTHY CONTROVERSY

In France the wrangle about shape versus color lasted until the time of the Revolution. Rubens spent some time in Venice, and threw his entire weight on the side of the colorist painters, and he and Poussin were fated to become rival types. Several illustrations of Rembrandt were also discussed by the speaker.

The work of Watteau, the Fleming who became a naturalized Frenchman, had been described as "photography a little out of focus." Prof. Chambers said. In Fragonard, outline as outline disappeared; pastel, even more than oil, lends itself to rather hazy outline.

The rivalry between Delacroix, with whom modern painting is generally held to begin, and Ingres, "supreme representative of the 'outline' school," was commented upon by the speaker. It did not appear to be realized, he said, that Delacroix himself had a long controversial tradition behind him. In his diary he spoke of himself as a follower of Rubens—and beyond Rubens were the Venetians.

Professor Chambers turned to England for a consideration of the work of Constable and Turner, remarking that the latter, beginning as an outline painter, later became fully developed as a colorist. The colorist school developed in France with Corot, Millet and other Barbizonists. The so-called modern school of Impressionist painters began with such artists as Courbet and Manet. A picture by Monet, of vigorous brush strokes, some of Cezanne and two of Seurat, depicting the method of the latter in applying blobs of color, a Van Gogh and some work of contemporary Canadian painters, among them Thomson, Robinson and Gagnon, were shown. Mrs. E. O. Blachford presided.

ART ASSOCIATION VIEWS PAST YEAR

Gazette March 9. Despite Economic Strain, Reports Show Fairly Good State of Affairs

GREAT ACTIVITY NOTED

Notable Exhibitions Staged and Several Gifts Received —H. B. Walker Elected President

While facing a decline in revenue and increased taxation, the Art Association of Montreal was able to stand the economic strain of the past year fairly well, according to the report of H. B. Walker, president of the association, presented last night at the annual meeting in the Art Galleries, Sherbrooke street.

Mr. Walker announced, however, that additional funds will be needed to provide fully for the ordinary requirements during 1934. The deficit on the maintenance account for the year, as announced by William B. Blackader, honorary treasurer, was $2,625. The association's finances were helped considerably by a generous donation of $2,000 from Lord Atholstan. On the other hand, the City of Montreal reduced its annual grant from $1,200 to $200, and taxes were increased from $1,186.74 to $1,966—the increase being the association's contribution to the paving of Sherbrooke street.

A notable year was registered by the association in the field of exhibitions. Through the courtesy of the family of the late Sir William Van Horne, the association was privileged to exhibit a wide selection from his celebrated collection of paintings. The attendance during the three weeks of this exhibition was exceptional, totaling 34,840. On the final day of the display, 8,154 visitors passed through the doors of the Sherbrooke street galleries.

Other successful exhibitions were the annual spring showing of contemporary Canadian art; several one-man shows; the 54th exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy; an exhibition of American water colors and one of British prints; the annual display of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, and many more. A number of lectures were also given at various times during the year.

The following paintings were added to the permanent collection: "Oxen Ploughing" by Janos Viski, the gift of Dr. Charles Winter, Hungarian Consul-General; "Golden October," by M. A. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., the gift of the artist; "Old Benignity," by the late G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., the gift of Ernest Alexander; "The Baggage Wagon," by J. C. Ibbetson, and "Tourville Market Place," by Eugene Louis Boudin, the gifts of Mrs. John Edgar Gatehouse, in memory of her husband.

GIFTS HELP MUSEUM.

Many other gifts were received by the galleries, and by the museum department, the report of which was read by Prof. Ramsay Traquair, F.R.I.B.A. Thanks were tendered to all contributors and to those who gave financial help.

Great regret was expressed at the death of George Horne Russell, R.C.A., a member of the association and a former president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts; also at the death of the following members of the association: George Armstrong, C.M.G., M.D.; Arthur J. Hodgson, George T. Bell, Strachan H. Bethune, General Sir Arthur Currie, G.C.M.G., K.C.B., F. G. Daniels, William A. Desbarats, Mrs. Alexander Ewan, Mrs. Roswell Fisher, Joseph Fortier, George G. Fox, J. Edgar Gatehouse, E. H. Godin, Mrs. W. Grant, Charles M. Hart, James Hutchison, Mrs. J. H. Liddell, H. W. Maynard, Mrs. J. S. McLachlan, Gavin Milroy, Charles E. Reid, John J. Robson, Mrs. James R. Smith, George H. Smithers, Lt.-Col. Herbert Snell, Dr. E. Hamilton White.

The following officers were re-elected for another term: Honorary president, Rt. Hon. Baron Atholstan; president, H. B. Walker; vice-presidents, Dr. C. F. Martin and Dr. C. W. Colby; honorary treasurer, W. B. Blackader. Two new councillors were elected in the persons of G. W. S. Henderson and Philip S. Fisher.

ART ASSOCIATION HOLDS MEETING

The important thing for young artists to remember is that they must be true to themselves and not paint just what people liked in the hope of selling their work, Miss Lily Barry, author and artist, told the members of the Independent Art Association at their first general meeting this year in the Windsor Hotel last night. She spoke of the first sketching classes from Montreal around Beaupre and thought there was a great field for young artists in the portrayal of historic spots in Montreal. Robert Sharpe presided. A musical program was contributed to by Dantes Belleau, Miss K. Lachapelle, Miss Gerald Lachapelle, Mrs. H. R. Tatchell, Miss Maud Price and Mrs. F. Johnson, and was much enjoyed.

Annual Meeting of the Art Association Star March 9/34

A year of much activity, in spite of prevailing difficulties, was reported to the members of the Art Association of Montreal at the annual meeting, held at the galleries on Sherbrooke St., on Thursday afternoon. The President, Mr. H. B. Walker, reported on the exhibitions which had been held, including that of the Royal Canadian Academy, and that of the Van Horne Collection, at which the number of visitors was greater than at any previous exhibition held by the Association; he also reported a number of valuable additions to the collection of pictures. Mention was made in this report of the loss suffered by the Association through the death of Mr. Horne Russell, R.C.A.

The report of the Hon. Treasurer, W. B. Blackader, showed that revenue for the year had not met expenditure, but that the deficit, thanks to generous donations, was less than might have been expected. Arthur Browning reported on ways and means and the progress of the Sustentation Fund. The reports of F. Cleveland Morgan, chairman of the Museum Committee, and of Prof. Ramsay Traquair, chairman of the library committee, were read and showed the continued progress of both collections.

Officers were then elected for the coming year. Lord Atholstan was re-elected Honorary President; H. B. Walker, President; Dr. C. F. Martin and Dr. C. W. Colby, Vice-Presidents and W. B. Blackader, Hon. Treasurer. For the council, Messrs. Ernest Alexander, D. Forbes Angus, G. Alfred Morris, Howard Murray, and Prof. Ramsay Traquair were re-elected for a period of three years and two Messrs. G. W. S. Henderson and Philip S. Fisher were elected, also for three years.

The attendance at the meeting included Mrs. W. M. Marler, Mrs. S. W. Ewing, Mrs. Charles A. Lewis, Mrs. L. Levalle, Mrs. G. Edson Burns, Rev. L. A. MacLean, Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, Messrs Gordon MacDougall, K.C., Howard Murray, H. Marin, R. Chaffey, A. A. Bowman, P. Douglas Garton, E. W. Kelsey, R. P. Jellitt and Dr. A. G. Nicholls.

MONTREAL ART ASSOCIATION

DESPITE an increase in taxation of its property and a reduction in the civic grant from $1,200 to $200, the Art Association of Montreal came through the troubled waters of 1933 with no little measure of success. All essential services were maintained, and the deficit is the comparatively small sum of $2,625. This, in the circumstances, may be regarded as satisfactory, although additional funds will be required to carry on throughout the current year.

The growing popularity of the Art Association as a cultural centre for Montreal is being manifested in many ways. There has been a very good attendance at the permanent exhibition, while the numerous special exhibitions held during the past year were exceptionally well attended by the general public, which is showing an increased interest in art. Also the lectures given during the year on various aspects of the fine arts have drawn bigger audiences than in the past.

While it is not of course practicable to embark upon any elaborate expenditure during the present period of financial stringency, it is very reassuring to be able to record that the Art Association has not relaxed its activities in any direction and that it is continuing to serve the public in the cultural field with appreciably progressive results. The cultivation of a love of beauty and of the ability to appreciate its manifestation in a variety of art forms is one that cannot but prove beneficial to any community.

INTEREST GROWING Gazette March 15. Toronto Art Gallery Reports Attendance Increasing

Toronto, March 14.—The Toronto Art Gallery in its annual report says the attendance during 1933 had reached 152,997, an increase of 24,113 over attendance last year.

The gallery purchased 16 paintings during the year and launched a plan to encourage attendance of young persons.

R. Y. Eaton, re-elected president, announced that Arthur Lismer, noted Canadian landscape painter and educational superintendent of the gallery, will leave in the spring for Cape Town and Johannesburg, South Africa, to take part in conferences being held at those cities.

POETRY COMPARED WITH OTHER ARTS

Gazette March 15. Little Relation Found Today Between Intellectual and Imaginative Life

The relation of English poetry to painting and the other arts, from the time of Chaucer to the present day, was outlined to members of the Women's Art Society yesterday afternoon by Laurence Binyon, celebrated poet and former keeper of oriental prints and drawings in the British Museum, during the course of an address delivered in Stevenson Hall, Drummond street.

While it is desirable that the various arts should keep in touch with one another there is very little union between the intellectual and the imaginative life of the nation at the present time, the speaker said. There is more than rhythm in great painting and great poetry, it is what is expressed, he added. Each has its own boundaries but both have a common stream in their imaginative life, and a common fund of thought and feeling.

Mr. Binyon briefly reviewed the chief periods of English literature and pointed out the relations of poetry to the other arts during each of these eras. During the age of Chaucer, plastic art failed to grow because of continual wars and the Puritan spirit, a fear of joy and suspicion of beauty, he said. During the Renaissance music was most closely allied with poetry. In the 18th century, a reign of reasonableness, painting was equal or superior to poetry.

The gathering forces of revolt against the out-worn traditions of the 18th century resulted in what is now known as the Romantic Revival and the 19th century presented a contrast to its predecessor in that popular painting became more enslaved to the doctrines of naturalism and thus lost its connections with poetry. Meanwhile, poetry maintained its great traditions.

During the present century, the great change that has come over painting has affected poetry and the tendency has been to turn towards France, said Mr. Binyon.

Mrs. R. A. Dunton, president, who was in the chair, introduced the speaker. Miss Beatrice Hickson proposed the vote of thanks.

DEVON ART COLONY PLANS DESCRIBED

Gazette 13/34 Canadian Party Sails June 21 to Spend Summer in West of England

Devonshire, Somerset and Dorset, districts unrivalled in the traditions of the common heritage enjoyed by English-speaking peoples the world over were described in an interesting illustrated talk given by Miss A. B. Stone, Montreal artist, before a representative group of Montrealeers at the Royal Victoria College last evening.

Miss Stone outlined the objects of the new Devon Art and Literary Colony, of which she is director, and in doing so she took her audience on a thrilling tour of the west of England, the country of the great explorers, Raleigh, Drake, Hawkins and Davis, the land of romantic idyll and legend, site of Glastonbury and the Isle of Avalon, of stately city and glorious cathedral, Exeter, Bath, Wells, and Plymouth, the quaint fishing villages of North and South Devon, lonely Dartmoor and the coombes and vales of the Doone country, the land of Blackmore, Gay and Hardy, of Tess and Angel Clare.

It is this atmosphere, that of unchanged England, that the colony's members will breathe. This summer the first party of Canadians leave to spend several weeks there, making their headquarters in the country near Torquay. They will sail from Quebec on June 21 in the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Australia.

The colony, as Miss Stone described it, has been formed for Canadians of literary and artistic tastes. During their stay near Torquay, classes and lectures will be held, to which guest speakers will be invited. Excursions will be made throughout Devon, Somerset and Dorset and as far afield as Stratford-on-Avon, Warwick and London. Several days will be spent in London and the excursion to Stratford-on-Avon is planned for the Festival weeks, when plays are performed at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre.

It was pointed out by the speaker, however, that the members of the colony will enjoy independence unknown on the average tour and artists will be free to ramble at will throughout the countryside during the entire period of their visit. Tennis, golf and other tournaments will also be arranged, and membership in the Tor Bay Country Club is to be a privilege of the colony's members.

Ven. Archdeacon I. M. Almond introduced the speaker and acted as chairman of the meeting.

Romantic Story Lies Behind Brooks' Paintings

Few people know the romantic story behind the story of the magnificent collection of Allan Brooks' paintings of Canadian birds recently on view at the Montreal Art Gallery.

On the walls with the exhibit was a legend to the effect that the poet, Wallace Havelock Robb, of Abbey Dawn, dreamed of the collection in terms of aesthetic and poetic appreciation of birds in Canada; but, behind this brevity, is a long trail of lonely idealism and practical effort. And, behind that, again, is the real story, the romance of Abbey Dawn and the Prince of Wales' patronage of the poet, much as princes favored bards in medieval times.

In 1925, with his Royal Patron's approval, Mr. Robb returned to Canada from U.S.A. to help his countrymen to know their birds, and to devote his muse to an interpretation of their beauty. In 1927, when the Prince of Wales confirmed his patronage by publicly recognizing Mr. Robb by a personal interview in Victoria, B.C., His Royal Highness asked what progress was being made in the service of beauty. The going was hard, and Mr. Robb frankly said so; the work of interesting people in a collection of bird paintings and its usefulness, was discouraging, and the outlook was not rosy—and the poet was almost ready to give up. Then came that wonderful response:

"I know, Robb, I know; and I get blue and a bit down myself, at times; I'm not supposed to, but I'm only human, you know; and, when we're feeling down, we must get up and 'Carry on!'" And when Wallace Havelock Robb left his patron, Abbey Dawn had a new slogan, "Carry On!" and a poet had a new torch, a challenge to his fighting soul, and an inspiration to his genius.

Quickly following this dramatic incident Mr. Robb's first volume of poems, "The Quill and the Candle," was issued under the sponsorship of the Prince. Five hundred copies were timidly issued, in Canada, but they were sold and out of print in four weeks! They contained "Behold, O My Country!" the poem of dedication, with which he presented the Wallace Havelock Collection to the Royal Ontario Museum, Toronto, for Canada. Some time afterwards Mr. Robb asked that his name be removed and asked that the collection be known simply as the Allan Brooks' Collection out of tribute to the artist, who is a Canadian, and as a native gesture his international fame so justly deserves.

When presented, the collection was not more than 33 works, but "Carry On!" was the order. Mr. Robb invaded Montreal, enlisting the support of E. W. Beatty, K.C., president of the C.P.R., Ross H. McMaster, Hugh Paton, J. W. McConnell and other prominent men; and the collection was more than doubled, to say nothing of the thousands of beautiful, full-color reproductions made from the originals. And Wallace Havelock Robb still "carries on" at Abbey Dawn, writing his exceedingly lovely poems of birdland in a wild, native rhythm not unlike the birds themselves. He is an exponent of the personal presentation of poetry, and his rich, round voice in recital, either in an illustrated lecture or over the radio, is an intellectual experience not easily forgotten.

Abbey Dawn is located in a 500-acre sanctuary of great natural beauty, five miles east of Kingston, Ont., and its two outstanding, physical features are The Prince of Wales Ridge, a prominence giving a vast view over the St. Lawrence River, and Allan Brooks Falls, a waterfall with a drop of 50 feet or more. A farm, Abbey Dawn Grange, supports the Sanctuary (it is supposed to!) and the Prince of Wales' slogan, "Carry On!" is supported by pen and recital.

News of Art In Montreal

A very important exhibition of modern French pictures is to be opened in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal next Friday, March 9th. There will be no opening ceremony. This collection of pictures, which was brought together by the National Gallery of Canada, has been shown in Ottawa and Toronto, and an account of it by Marius Barbeau was published in The Star when it was opened to the public in Ottawa, at the beginning of January. In Mr. Barbeau's words, "It can hardly be surpassed for the glory of 110 pictures and the story tells of a century of progress in a field of art in which France led the world."

Ingres and Delacroix are two of the earliest of painters who are represented in this collection and both are well represented. Following them come Courbet, of whose work there are several good examples, and Puvis de Chavannes, by whom there are a number of fine pictures. The Barbizon school, particularly Corot, Millet, Degas, and Daubigny have an important place, and there good pictures by two very different painters, Daumier and Eugene Carriere.

Coming to painters of a newer sort, there are eight examples of the work of Renoir, and good pictures by Monet, Pissarro and Sisley. Lastly there are four pictures by Van Gogh, several by Gauguin and ten by Cezanne. The collection is one of the most interesting and important that has ever been shown here and may serve, as was said of the great French exhibition in London a year ago to make clear the way in which the paintings of recent French painters has grown out of that of the men who worked before them.

At the Art Association of Montreal on Monday evening a lecture was given by Signor Eugenio Croizat on "Gems of Italian Art." Signor Croizat, who has been brought to Canada by the National Council of Education, has devoted his time for some years past to bringing a knowledge of the great works of art to people who are far removed from the facilities for the study of art, which are provided by the European galleries. He has particularly given his attention to perfecting lantern slides in color photography, and has brought with him to Canada some 300 slides of pictures in the galleries of Italy, Spain, France, England and Germany. The slides, which were shown by him on Monday and were the most striking feature of his lecture, were of Italian pictures, covering about four centuries of art history, and included works of Giotto, Fra Angelico, Botticelli, Leonardo da Vinci, Luini and many other painters. With the help of these he was able to give a graphic and extremely interesting account of the history of art in Italy.

Signor Croizat gave a lecture, sponsored by the Universite de Montreal and L'Association Canadienne-francaise pour L'Avancement des Sciences, on Tuesday evening, on the subject of "L'Italie pittoresque et artistique." He is to lecture again on the same subject tomorrow, Thursday evening, at 8.15, at the Plateau School, Lafontaine Park.

A lecture will be given at the Art Association next Wednesday evening, March 14th, at 8.15, by Laurence Binyon, who has recently retired from the keepership of prints and drawings in the British Museum. The subject will be "English water-color painting in the nineteenth century," a subject which Mr. Binyon is one of the first

The Independent Art Association will hold a regular monthly meeting tomorrow, Thursday evening at 8.30 in room 135 of the Windsor Hotel. Miss Clair Fautoux, Canadian painter and mural decorator, will address the meeting in French and in English on the subject of "My experiences in Paris." A musical program will follow. George Starkey, the president, will be in the chair. Members of the public and friends of the association will be very welcome.

Interesting pictures by A. Henderson, C. Tulley, L. Thompson, Messrs. Smith, Delisle, Goodale and other members are being shown at the Art Association of Verdun. Meetings are held on Tuesday evenings at 8 o'clock in the Y.M.C.A., 1000 Gordon Avenue, Verdun.

Landscapes Of Ontario And Quebec

Two Canadian painters share the exhibition, opened this week at E. ton's galleries. Both are painters of Canadian scenery and, while their pictures have some similarities, they have differences enough to make a comparison between their work very interesting.

George Thomson is a brother of one of the most remarkable Canadian painters, the late Tom Thomson; his painting is less broad and sure than that of his brother, but he has something of the same vision of the beauty of Ontario landscapes and has painted them at all seasons of the year. There is a certain reminder of the work of Tom Thomson in the "Young Pines" in this exhibition, with a snowy valley seen between tree trunks, in "Birches in Summer" with its strong lights and shadows, and in "A Color Decoration," of red trees in autumn against a background of dark greens, and these are among the best of the pictures here. "October Snow" is another good picture of trees, while "New Snow" and "Hill and Vale" are excellent pictures of wide, open valleys. There is splendid autumn coloring in "The Shore Road," and "A Carpet of Leaves," "Rural Countryside" shows the colors of earlier autumn, and "An October Breeze" is a fine study of a cloudy sky and waves on a lake. Two very striking studies are "Sunset on Lake Huron," with the sky behind heavy grey clouds, and "The Moon's Pathway," all sky and water. Among the best of the summer pictures are "A Country Road," which has a pleasant warmth, and "A Canadian Farm"; and there are some good small sketches of gardens and fruit trees. Two very attractive studies of early spring, painted in browns and greys, are "The Approach of Spring" and "April at Owen Sound."

The pictures of Emile Lemieux, who is a newcomer to exhibitions, are also of his own province and chiefly of the Laurentians and Montreal Island. His painting is generally lighter and more sketchy than that of Mr. Thomson but he often gets a stronger and gayier lighting. Winter and autumn scenes are again conspicuous, as is usual in Canadian landscapes. A good composition of trees on a snowy hillside, "Over Manitou Lake" is one of the best of the winter pictures; there is a good feeling of space in "Hiver—Lac des Quatorze Iles" and in "Early Snow Fall—Fourteen Island Lake," a good effect of snow on a tumble of rocks in "Mountain Side, St. Sauveur," and a contrast of brown trees and snow in "Val Morin."

SOMETHING TO SEE

Sir,—It is hardly to be expected that everybody will rush to the Art Association to see "The Exhibition of French Painting of the Nineteenth Century." Why? Simply because Montreal does not respond in just that way. But it will be, however, a deep blow to the cause of Art if more than a mere customary crowd doesn't flock to 1379 Sherbrooke Street West—to Montreal's sanctuary of the arts—during the month of March. Tastes, of course, differ. In the case of this writer, after visiting this French Exhibition, he felt so refreshed and regaled by the remarkable paintings there that he cannot remember an occasion of a trip to an art exhibit, among the many he attended, in which he felt so inwardly supremely satisfied with what he saw.

There are some 115 representative pictures, from Ingres to Cezanne, in this important collection, on the physical side, in itself, no small task to assemble. For giving Montreal this grand opportunity to view a stimulating period exhibit, from that great aesthetic nation called France, we owe sincere thanks, and even civic crowns to the Board of our own Art Association of Montreal, to Eric Brown, the director of the National Gallery of Canada, and to those sterling collectors of paintings in Ottawa, Montreal, London, Amsterdam and Paris, by whose valuable co-operation this glorious event was made possible for all of us here. I need add but one final admonition to my fellow-citizens: "Please be sure to see this exhibition!"

WATER COLOR ART

Gazette March 15
Nineteenth Century Trends in England Described by Laurence Binyon

VALUABLE CONTRIBUTION

Contrasting Schools of Painting
Coalesced to Develop
New Form—Painters'
Work Considered

With the opening of the nineteenth century, a great change came over water-color painting in England. Previously there had been two schools of painters, those who were occupied mainly with topographical subjects and an answering to the gradual awakening of English people to the beauties of their own country, and those who were interested rather in landscape composition. With the turn of the century these two streams coalesced to make a most noteworthy contribution to the tradition of art in England. Laurence Binyon, C.I.E., told members of the Art Association of Montreal in a lecture at the Art Gallery last night.

Speaking on "English Water Colors of the Nineteenth Century," Mr. Binyon said that the history of the period was best described by the work of the outstanding artists of the time, men like Girtin, Constable, Turner, Cotman, de Wint, Cox and Rossetti. The contribution of each was cited with accompanying lantern slides to illustrate the text.

Thomas Girtin, born in 1796, introduced into water-colors in England the substitution of cold for warm under-paintings. The bringing of a new emotional power was the essential factor in the transformation he effected. A characteristic of his sketches was the wide sweep of empty foreground, showing his love of great spaces and the grandeur and solitariness of nature. Girtin's precision of brush was perfectly spontaneous, said Mr. Binyon; his mastery might have been a danger to his art had it not been accomplished by intense sincerity. Though animated by a vague romanticism, Girtin's works are masculine in outlook, the speaker noted. He likened the artist's love of solitude to that of Wordsworth, and suggested that his art was really ahead of his time.

Girtin exerted a strong influence upon John Constable, one found that his whole conception of art underwent a change after he had studied 30 of Girtin's sketches. Constable, however, developed his own technique in his works, which Mr. Binyon thought was best illustrated in his sketch of Stonehenge.

Born in the same year as Girtin, J. M. W. Turner worked along parallel lines with him, displaying a singular delicacy of touch and atmosphere. Turner was interested in accumulating facts of nature which later he used and transformed, unlike Girtin who seized a pictorial motive which he developed and emphasized. "Turner conceived his whole work in what might be called an epic mood," said Mr. Binyon. Like Wordsworth, he desired that no painting should be considered simply, but all the varied mass of his production was to be contemplated as his interpretation of life and the world. The impression left of his works is one of extraordinary power and variety. In his Alpine scenes particularly, pointed out the speaker, Turner evoked light and form, with his design always in depth, a vibrating mystery of distance and light, giving a sense of infinity and space.

Pattern and felicity of poise were characteristic of John Sell Cotman, who was born in 1872. His architectural draughtsmanship was masterful, said Mr. Binyon. In his Yorkshire-Durham drawings no lovelier water colors were ever made. Later in life his style changed, his works becoming warmer and more in the character of oil paintings than sketches.

Peter de Wint, born of Dutch descent in 1784, resembled Constable in his integrity and directness and love of the English countryside. There is something Dutch in the stubborn and rather solid character of his paintings, said Mr. Binyon, and in all he deserves a greater measure of fame than he has received.

GENUINE SIMPLICITY

The picturesque incident and not the larger relations of form or the principles of composition was the preoccupation of David Cox. The intellectual element is almost absent from Cox's art, observed the speaker, and the emotional element is the simplest, but he is very genuine in his simplicity.

A new kind of imaginative water-color painting was introduced by Dante Gabriel Rossetti, who was born in 1828. He invented a method to correspond with the intensity of his conceptions, using pure contrasted tones of intense color. He used in his early work the straight line and angle such as the current tradition avoided.

Towards the end of the century impressionism came, and design and structure were cast aside to give way to "the painter's joy in simple vision." In the present century, said Mr. Binyon, the English water-color, responding to new influences, has renewed its life with brilliance and vigor.

Mr. Binyon was introduced by Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, chairman of the lecture committee of the Art Association, and thanked by Dr. Charles F. Ma...

FRENCH ART SHOWN OVER WIDE PERIOD

IMPRESSIONISTS STRONG

Works Drawn from Public and Private Collections on Exhibition for Three Weeks

French painters of the 19th century are admirably represented in the exhibition which opened yesterday afternoon in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west. The comprehensive collection, which has already been shown in Ottawa and Toronto, enables the picture lover to obtain a fair survey of French paintings from the smoothly treated portrait by Ingres to the freely handled paint and bold color of the Impressionists and Post-Impressionists. The show is interesting, too, in that the examples reveal the development and change in style that marked the mature years of some of the painters.

The pictures have been drawn from the National Gallery of Canada, private collections in Montreal and Ottawa and some examples have been made available by Reid and Lefevre, of London, E. J. Van Wisselingh & Company of Amsterdam and Etienne Bignou of Paris. The exhibition will remain open until the end of the month. Seven paintings represent Boudin and among them there are four beach scenes under varying conditions of light which by the dress of the men and women promenading or sitting on chairs distinctly dates them. Certainly the 1934 mode tends to greater grace, though these admirable examples of painting give pleasure by reason of their design, color and atmospheric effects. A view of Etaples, with figures washing clothes and shipping on the mud awaiting the return of the tide, is marked by a spacious blue sky with summer clouds that seem to move in the warm air.

A portrait of Jean Dolent and his young daughter by Carriere is a fine example by that painter who showed uncanny skill in "melting" his contours. A dog lies on the floor and the treatment of the incidental objects in the background is masterly.

The development of the art of Corot is particularly well shown in examples that range from the period when the landscapes were "light" and precise in treatment as exemplified in "Une Cour Normande avec deux Vaches"—house and barns near apple-trees, fowls and two cows, a work of cool clear atmosphere, to "Houses, Trees and Water" with the mellow sunlight flushing the buildings by a stream edged by willows treated in the manner by which he is best known. In this group is the golden and freely handled bit of the beach at Biarritz, the more detailed "Une Ferme a Dardagny" with its summer clouds, houses, trees, glimpse of pond and a woman and child walking in the pasture. There is charm and delicacy in the painting of a girl with her hand in her hair, and quaintly formal is the portrait of Mme Sennegon. "Street at Auvers" with its old buildings edging a hilly road edged by noble trees is a work simply handled and lovely in its subtle values.

Daubigny is represented by two—cattle in a wooded meadow with flooded fields beyond, and "Les Bords de L'Oise."

Delacroix's art is revealed in the good design and glowing color of an Oriental scene—horses and their riders at a watering trough. "Lady Macbeth" carrying a lamp is the other example.

"Portrait of Bernier" by Ingres shows that master draughtsman in typical vein—precision of detail with high value set on surface. The subject, a young man with curly hair is dressed in a naval uniform of the period and wears a white stock. By Millet is a vertical figure piece entitled "Oedipus Taken From the Tree," and Puvis de Chavannes is represented by two decorative subjects.

WORKS BY COURBET

The powerful painting of Courbet is manifest in a group that includes figures, marines and landscape. Lovely color marks the blonde woman in "La Femme aux Bijoux"—the subject dropping into a jewel box a string of pearls. Finer still in the handling of low tones is the woman with a glove in her hand. This arrangement in black, grey and silvery whites, has qualities that will make the student of painting look again and again. "Les Cascades" is a typical landscape of big design with a river tumbling over tree-edged rocks and breaking into a rapid below. The massive cliffs and pebbly shore are masterfully put in. It is a grand scene. Of like solid qualities and fine appreciation of values is "Les Rochers, Etretat," with beached boats, waves rolling onto the shore edged by massive cliffs in sunlight and shadow.

Daumier, who by necessity was forced to spend the major portion of his life as a draughtsman for the popular press, is represented by outstanding examples — "The Third Class Carriage" — the interior of a railway coach with its crowd of passengers seated on the hard benches. Here in the crowd are a young woman with a baby, an old woman, in bonnet and cape, grasping a basket and nearby a slumbering boy with a box. Beyond are other figures variously attired and through the window can be glimpsed the bare countryside. It is a human document set down with sympathy and understanding. In watercolor is "The Critics" — a seated connoisseur flanked by standing figures, looking at a framed picture on an easel, while in the shadowed background is a painter talking to a friend. There is also a pen and wash drawing of a lawyer addressing the judges. Fantin-Latour is adequately represented by a beautifully painted nude — "Ariane Abandonnee," a group of figures marked by a lovely color in the raiment, called "La Parade de la Feerie," and some magnificent flower pieces, generally roses, which well suggest the fragility of the petals. "Asters" is a beautifully arranged and painted work. In all these uncanny skill is shown in the painting of the bowls and vases and the tones of the backgrounds play an essential part.

Glorious color marks the works of Monticelli, whose work is shown at varying periods from the landscape with figures and goat — which is a trifle more modelled than "Paysage Accidente," a work of free golden tones, to the heavy, luscious paint of the gaily-clad women in "Fete Champetre," and the broadly handled effect of sunshine and shadow in the tree-lined stream with bathers.

THE IMPRESSIONISTS

Particularly strong is the representation of work by the Impressionists. Manet's forceful brushwork is shown in a flower-piece called "The Chinese Vase" and a forceful pastel "La Dame a la Toque." This portrait of Mery Laurent is a boldly handled painting. Monet, besides a marine with rolling waves under a sky packed with billowy clouds, is shown as a painter of atmosphere in "Waterloo Bridge, the Sun in a Fog" — a work that "grows" on the beholder. The sun, a bright red ball, gleams on the vapor-hidden water where passing barges can be dimly discerned. The quaint fashions of 1888 are shown in the sunny "L'Embarcadere a Argenteuil" with its yacht, figures in a boat, on shore and on a gallery overlooking the water. Pissarro has a more than usually solidly painted work in "Laine, Auvers-sur-Oise." There is also a group of women raking hay in sunlight and shadow, and "Le Pont St. Pierre, Rouen," which shows his skill in suggesting quay-side activity. Sisley has well caught the delicate sunny atmosphere in a landscape called "Un Jour d'Printemps," and has invested with glowing light a quiet waterway with sailing boats. From this brush are a number of other fine examples. Degas signs two pastels — "Danseuse Rose" — a ballet dancer in characteristic attitude on stage and "Dancers at the Bar" — two young women keeping in condition for their dance. Jongkind has a beautiful nocturne — bridge, distant mills and a barge in moon light; some scenes on the Seine and a work of beautiful quality in "The Scheldt," with shipping. Renoir is represented by rather done in characteristic manner, portrait of a young girl, and pastel of a girl in a white hat.

In the gallery devoted to the "moderns" there are powerful examples by Cezanne, Gauguin, Van Gogh, Seurat and Toulouse-Lautrec, which give the student an unusual opportunity of studying these men in original examples of selected quality. It is here that the warmest debates will probably take place during the next three weeks. The illustrated catalogue makes acknowledgement of receipt of works from the following collections: the National Gallery of Canada, Gordon Edwards, Ottawa; Mrs. Louis S. Colwell, Mrs. W. W. Chipman, Miss Olive Hosmer, Elwood B. Hosmer, Mrs. W. F. Miller, Mrs. Howard Pillow, F. N. Southam, Montreal, and H. S. Southam, Ottawa.

Modern French Painting at Art Gallery

Star March 14/34

Several facts contribute to the unusual interest of the exhibition of French Painting of the Nineteenth Century, brought together by the National Gallery of Canada and now being shown in the upstairs galleries of the Art Association of Montreal. There are more than a hundred pictures, all worth seeing and some of them very good, and many of the best of them are generously lent by private owners in Montreal and Ottawa. The exhibition has a special interest since it is supplemented, and some gaps in it are filled in by the Art Association's permanent collection of French pictures, which remain in their places in the end gallery, and visitors to the loan exhibition should make a point of looking at them as well.

It would, of course, be impossible to give a complete review of nineteenth century French art in a collection of this size, and the successive schools and movements can hardly be illustrated, since most of the painters, whose work is shown, were leaders and not followers, and their pictures here show their diversity and individuality. It has also been impossible to get pictures which truly represent some of the painters. The two oldest painters in the collection are Ingres, by whom there is only a small, but good portrait, to present the end of an older generation, and Delacroix, with two pictures, also small but good, as the beginning of a newer era. Two pictures by Puvis de Chavannes, — small ones for him, — stand among the others as examples of conservatism.

The exhibition really starts with Corot, who is quite well represented by thirteen pictures: one of these is a fairly early portrait and two are excellent studies of girls; the pictures of houses and trees by a river, of figures on a road at the entrance to a wood, and of a Norman farmyard, and the admirable little sketch of fishing boats at Dunkirk, are among the others, which illustrate his work at different periods. Millet is barely represented, though there are by him a fine composition of "Oedipus" and a characteristic pastel drawing of a girl with some goats. Two pictures by Daubigny and one by Theodore Rousseau are not very important, but the seven by Courbet are quite another matter. Two of these are portraits, — one of them the very fine, dark toned, "Femme aux gants," — and the others include the big "Cascades," a picture, almost in black and white, of snow among trees, and a delightful sketch of a sunset over the sea.

Four of the works by Boudin that are here are not the kind of things that are usually expected of Boudin, — groups of people on the shore at Trouville, — very attractive pictures and admirable illustrations; there are also some more typical pictures by him, — a fine one of Etaples and a very good sunset at Trouville. Sisley is well represented by six good landscapes; by Jongkind, a Dutchman working in Paris, there are five pictures, among them a moonlight scene and a view of shipping on the Scheldt, which looks much like a Boudin.

Manet is one of the painters whose importance is not shown in this exhibition; there are by him an interesting little pastel portrait and a fine picture of still life and flowers. There are six good examples of the flower painting of Fantin Latour, with a small and pretty figure picture of "Ariadne" and a larger one which is rather dull. A single, characteristic, portrait group is by Carriere and one head by Henner.

The five works by Monticelli are all remarkably good; — a splendidly lighted picture of girls bathing under trees, a group of women, in reds and whites, and three landscapes, — one in rich greens, another mostly in browns and yellows and a third of figures in a farm orchard. Another very good group is of three very characteristic works of Daumier, one of them, the fine "Wagon de troisieme classe," an oil picture.

Cezanne has good representation in nine pictures, which range from the early and strong "Enlèvement" to the late and unflattering portraits of his son and wife, with, in between, the pleasantly green picture of Zola's house at Medan. By Degas there are two rather striking drawings in pastel of dancers. Among eight works by Renoir are an attractive head, "La songeuse," a small, cool and fresh, nude and a larger but less pleasing bathers.

The work of Monet is well shown here, as is that of Camille Pissarro. By the former there are only four pictures but among them are a very good early one of the river at Argenteuil, a wonderful study of waves breaking on the shore and a late dream of Waterloo Bridge, hardly visible through a lovely blue fog, such as no living man ever had the luck to see in London. It is worth while to compare this last with the coast scene by Monet in the Art Association's collection. Eight works by Camille Pissarro cover the work of his life well, from the jolly, green view of Louveciennes and that of a lane at Auvers-sur Oise, to the glowing "Moissonneuses," painted when he was seventy, which, in the effect of its color and light, though not of course in its painting, suggests some of the work of English pre-Raphaelites. There are three quite typical, but not important, examples of the work of Seurat, who did not live long enough to do much work.

Gauguin is well represented by a characteristic picture of two Tahitian women and by a Tahitian landscape with some figures, but more interesting are three works by Van Gogh, — "Les oliviers," a very decorative landscape, of conventional form, color and lighting, the, also decorative, "Paysage sous un ciel mouvementé," in which there is a conventional disagreement between the lighting of the sky and the landscape, and a pleasant sketch of one of the windmills at Montmartre. A small head and two little figure studies by Toulouse-Lautrec are by no means to be missed, and they are far more interesting than his larger portrait of a boy with a dog.

The National Gallery has prepared a good illustrated catalogue of the exhibition, which is to remain open in Montreal till Sunday, April 1st.

L'art français du XIXe siècle

La Presse. March 15, 1934.

Une exposition vraiment représentative, qui montre la courbe suivie par la peinture française depuis Delacroix jusqu'aux Modernes, via l'Impressionnisme.

Puvis de Chavannes

L'ART Association tient actuellement à sa galerie, rue Sherbrooke, l'exposition du XIXe siècle français, organisée sous les auspices de la Galerie nationale et qui a remporté un vif succès à Ottawa et à Toronto. C'est l'une des occasions uniques qu'il y ait de trouver ainsi réunies une magnifique collection de toiles qui racontent la courbe profonde suivie depuis Ingres et Delacroix jusqu'aux Modernes, en passant par l'Impressionnisme. C'est un fidèle récit du triomphe graduel de la couleur sur la forme au cours du siècle. Il ne s'agit pas ici de le discuter. Constatez, sans plus.

Il est à Souhaiter que les Femmes Prennent cette Habitude aussi bien que les Hommes

Un verre d'eau chaude chaque matin nous aide à paraître et à être en d'heureuses dispositions.

Le bonheur, la vigueur et la vivacité — une bonne peau claire — un teint rose naturel et l'absence de maladie ne sont assurés que par un sang net et sain. Si seulement les femmes et les hommes pouvaient se rendre compte des merveilles du bain interne matinal, quel heureux changement se produirait.

Au lieu des milliers d'hommes, femmes et fillets malades, anémiques, aux teints pâtes et terreux; au lieu des multitudes de "ruines nerveuses", d'épuisés, de malades du cerveau et de pessimistes, nous verrions partout une foule de gens aux joues roses, virils et optimistes.

Un bain interne se donne en buvant chaque matin avant le déjeuner un verre d'eau chaude avec une cuillerée à thé de sel JAD condensé pour enlever de l'estomac, du foie, des reins et des dix verges d'intestins les rebuts indigestes, les fermentations acides et les poisons du jour précédent, nettoyant, adoucissant et rafraichissant ainsi tout le canal alimentaire avant d'introduire d'autres nourritures dans l'estomac.

Les personnes sujettes à la migraine, à l'excès de bile, à la mauvaise haleine, au rhumatisme, au rhume, et particulièrement celles qui ont le teint jaune et pâle et qui sont souvent constipées, devraient se procurer un paquet de sel JAD condensé à la pharmacie; cela leur coûtera une bagatelle mais suffira pour démontrer le changement rapide et remarquable qui se produit tant dans la santé que dans l'apparence de ceux qui pratiquent cette sanitation interne. Il faut se rappeler que la propreté interne est plus importante que l'externe, parce que la peau n'absorbe pas les impuretés pouvant contaminer le sang, tandis que les pores des trente pieds d'intestins le font.

Nota: Si vous suivez un régime pour maigrir il importe que vous teniez votre corps libre des matières de rebut alourdissantes et des toxines nocives. Pour cette raison le sel JAD condensé aide merveilleusement à maigrir.

Il me semble que l'exposition aura plus d'attrait pour l'esprit canadien-français que pour la mentalité anglaise. Nos milieux intellectuels sont beaucoup plus proches des leçons de l'art français du dernier siècle. A certains égards ils en sont beaucoup plus proches que les Français eux-mêmes, qui passent rapidement à d'autres formes quand nous nous y attardons encore.

Diverses galeries et certains particuliers ont prêté des œuvres à cette exposition, l'un des événements artistiques de l'année. Il ne faut pas le manquer.

Une grande époque

La première époque, celle des classiques du XIXe siècle français, pour ainsi dire, n'est pas représentée à l'exposition d'une manière suffisamment complète ni toujours caractéristique. Mais on y trouve, par ailleurs, les quelques toiles les plus remarquables.

Malgré que la mentalité anglaise n'y comprenne pas grand-chose, elle dont le sens positif fuit l'allégorie, et bien que plusieurs de nos n'y voient encore que des compositions décoratives, l'ose croire que les deux tableaux de Puvis de Chavannes, — plus petits que la plupart de ses fresques connues, naturellement — dominent toute l'exposition. Dans "Ludus pro patria" et "Les vendanges" vous avez de beaux exemples de l'art au service de la pensée, l'idée, la modération, la mesure. Une rigoureuse unité, des gestes et des attitudes d'une noble simplicité. C'est de la composition. De l'art clair. Mais cette clarté bien française, dans les idées définies traduites par la forme, se conjugue avec une douceur bien italienne dans le coloris, un coloris fait de nuances pâles et fines qui baignent dans une lumière discrète, blanche et transparente. Mettons que c'est de la fresque et qu'on attend plus de moelleux de la peinture à l'huile; n'oubliez pas, pourtant, que le coloris paraît avoir perdu dans le temps quelque chose de son premier éclat. Et, surtout, cet art décoratif n'a-t-il pas beaucoup plus de sens que bien d'autres genres lorsque, dans une atmosphère d'une si douce sérénité, dans un harmonieux équilibre, il porte lucidement à des considérations plus élevées?

Réalisme humain

Nombre de visiteurs s'attardent plus volontiers devant les Daumiers. "Le Wagon de troisième classe", plusieurs fois cité et exposé en Europe, mérite à juste titre une attention particulière. Il est caractéristique du sens profondément humain que Daumier ajoute à son populisme narquois, et l'on y trouve même, suggéré surtout par certains costumes, un accent Moyen-Age qui évoque agréablement je ne sais quels fabliaux. "Les critiques": quelle vie ironique dans ces attitudes poseuses et lassées! "Le défenseur à la barre", un petit sujet, présente un contraste bien senti entre le pathos artificiel de l'avocat et le pathétique vrai de l'accusé.

Les Daumiers sont toujours des documentaires. Gouailleurs et sympathiques. Ils me font l'effet d'être par rapport à la grande peinture ce que le journalisme est à la littérature.

Paysages de repos

Corot est l'un des plus amplement représentés à la Galerie des Arts, si tant est que toutes ces toiles sont complètement de lui, car on sait combien il aimait faire faire le gros œuvre par des élèves, quitte à mettre le "finishing touch" et la griffe du maître. Sa palette a toujours traduit la sérénité. Ses deux manières figurent ici. La première, serrée, nous donne des paysages trop uniformément nets et sans vie comme "Cour normande avec deux vaches". L'autre, plus dégagée, s'attache aux valeurs subtiles et mélancoliques, et c'est alors que naissent ces paysages silencieux et recueillis comme "Maison, arbres et eau", très limpide; "Souvenir de la plage de Biarritz", attachant, aux ocre rêveurs; "Route à l'entrée du bois avec un cavalier et une paysanne" où réapparaissent les arbres touffus, verts cette fois; "Le chevrier italien", prétexte à ces masses réveuses d'arbres bruns à la Corot; "L'étang", menu coin de toile éclairé par un soleil chaud et calme. A cela s'ajoutent une marine et une scène de rue, belges, d'une atmosphère reposante; un délicat portrait de "Jeune fille", en bruns et rouges, et "Le portrait de Mme Senegon", un Corot paysan, très net.

Talent exubérant

Les bons exemples de l'exubérance facilitée de Courbet ne manquent pas. Il est généralement "méridional" par sa verve abondante, son gras moelleux. Mais quelle versatilité! A côté de "La femme aux bijoux", aux tons si joliment doux et pleins qu'on pardonne au tableau le manque d'idéalisme, "La femme au gant" se montre réveuse, délicate, baignée dans une atmosphère de quiétude pémoine, tel, un hiver brun et blanc dans la forêt, composition rude et poétique qui a surgi sans effort; là, une marine qui a du mouvement, de la brume, une luminosité adoucie; plus loin, une rêverie sans sujet mais finement colorée qui s'intitule "Coucher de soleil, Etréat". Une vaste toile, "Les cascades", a de la verve, des verts abondants, de l'air même, mais il nous semble que la couleur a dû faiblir un peu avec les années, car on imagine que Courbet a dû prêter plus d'éclat argenté aux chutes qui tombent à travers les arbres.

Ingres et Delacroix

Où sont les dessins de Dominique Ingres? Ou ses crayons célèbres? Il n'y a de lui que le portrait de Bernier, une œuvre "mineure", quelque valeur intrinsèque qu'elle puisse avoir. Un portrait franc, rond, profond, ferme, où les valeurs sont dégagées avec calme et non noyées. Un portrait parfaitement lisible, qui s'impose à l'attention.

L'adversaire de Dominique Ingres n'a pas trouvé meilleure chance. Delacroix n'a que deux toiles à l'exposition. "Lady Macbeth" montre en petit une figure dramatique qui sort de l'ombre; c'est du joli shakespearien. "Chevaux à l'abreuvoir", c'est un paysage romain un peu de carton, présenté dans un coloris chaud et sombre, avec des verts glauques et des rouges profonds, et tous les contours submergés, fondus dans une profondeur qui dit: Le drame n'est pas loin.

Des fleurs jusqu'à la mer

Le talent varié de Fantin-Latour se déploie librement à l'exposition. Tel nu de lui, "Ariane abandonnée", est à admirer pour son modèle exquis: nu rose, poudré, gracieusement abandonnée, en effet, dans l'herbe tendre et la douce chaleur. "La Parade de la féerie" est un charmant frou-frou de coloris, de gazes, de personnages en fleur. Puis, toute une série de ces compositions de fleur qui l'on rendu célèbre, Magnifique d'arrangement et de composition avec des arrière-plans harmonisés. C'est de l'intelligente perfection dans le genre.

Un portrait de Carrière répond tout à fait à l'idée que l'on se fait de son genre, d'après les reproductions connues. Dans la pénombre d'un salon renfermé, un afeul et une fillette. On les aperçoit à travers une vapeur, un fond qui brouille les contours et précise l'allure aristocratique du rêve. Une vision sympathique de myope, si j'ose dire.

"La filieuse avec chèvres", de Millet, pastel fini au crayon, est dans le genre connu de ses paysanneries recueillies, émuës, très douces, — tandis que "Oedipe arrachée à l'arbre" présente du mouvement dans le clair-obscur qu'approfondit la vitre mise sur la toile.

La minutieuse ingénuité de Rousseau le douanier est représentée par une marine très aérée, qui disparaît presque toute sous de lourds nuages voyageant rapidement dans l'espace.

Enfin Boudin. Léger, transparent, des soleils mouillés, de l'atmosphère. Plus encore que des marines de lui, pourtant plus profondes de tonalité que celles que les galeries montrent le plus souvent, il faut admirer les scènes de plages, — toutes fashionables attendant l'orage qui monte au firmament blafard, ou s'ébattant joyeusement sous un ciel très bleu. Boudin fait respirer le grand air, sous de vastes horizons.

Les Impressionnistes

Les impressionnistes ont une part significative à l'exposition, et l'on a eu le bon goût de les loger dans un salon qui sert d'intermédiaire entre leurs précurseurs et l'école moderne. Ici, l'atmosphère plus que le sujet lui-même est la raison d'être de la peinture. La théorie de la couleur, résolument abordée par Delacroix, a grandi jusqu'à l'extrême des formes nettes d'antan; les convenances de temps et de lieu le haut bout dans cette peinture destinée à suggérer le mouvement. Tout cela est évident, à passer d'une salle à l'autre. Mais il n'y a pas à reprendre ici une vieille discussion et à se demander si la mobilité n'est pas mieux suggérée par l'immobilité qui tient compte de ce que Dom Bellot appelle le "mouvement fictif", par opposition au mouvement réel ou figuré, et si, en somme, la "substance" n'en dit pas toujours plus long que les "accidents". Ici donc, l'amour de la vivante nature, l'imagination chercheuse d'horizons nouveaux, le romantisme de la D'abord la fraîche ingénuité de Renoir. Des fraîcheurs de chair tendre et des diaphanes. Un nu première manière, bleuté, gentiment moulé. Un nu seconde manière, rosé, avec de la finesse dans la rondeur. Un portrait de jeune fille, nuancé, rose aussi, dans un frou-frou de tons satin. Une bonne femme au bonnet, fabriquée en touches striées. "La femme à l'éventail", sujet traité un peu à la manière farineuse et avec une certaine banalité.

Vient Manet, dont on aime "Le Vase de Chine", œuvre aux sonorités cristallines, espèce de laque aux teintes douces qui représente des fleurs contre un fond chatoyant. Il y a de la simplicité expressive dans les bruns de "La dame à la toque"; on s'y attache. Mais "Les quatre mandarines", croyez-moi, auraient pu être n'importe quoi; quatre taches rondes et jaunes qui ne sont pas dignes de la manière dégagée de Manet, même si l'on y veut chercher des harmonisations de taches.

Un Monet caractéristique

Il y a à l'exposition une toile de Monet qui fait immédiatement penser à celle qui a provoqué, d'après l'histoire, la dénomination d'Impressionnisme. Une impression de mer intitulée "Le soleil dans la brume". Pont de Waterloo. Je la reconnus de loin, pour l'avoir vue à la Galerie d'Ottawa; cela ne s'oublie pas. Un disque orange dans un ciel bleu poudreux, dans une atmosphère tellement brumeuse que l'on ne distingue pas où finit la mer et où commence l'horizon; le sujet vous envahit à mesure que vous révez devant le peu de chose à quoi il tient. C'est de l'atmosphère, sans plus, mais pas moins que ça. Un peu plus loin vous trouverez le Monet endimanché des pares bourgeois, bien caractéristique, puis une sorte de suggestion pour mer de papier qui a peut-être quelque mouvement.

De Pissarro des poétiques paysages, quelquefois trop verts, mais éclairés par une lumière invisible qui vibre. Dans les quelques scènes de ville quelle habileté à suggérer le va-et-vient mouvementé des rues, l'activité quotidienne; tout cela est remuant, grouillant. "Les moissonneuses", c'est du Millet mis en mouvement. "Le repos de la fermière", dans l'herbe d'un vert banal, prend de l'intérêt par le naturel de la pose et surtout par l'atmosphère de quiétude chaleur qui baigne le tableau.

Recherche d'atmosphère

Sisley, de même, a recherché l'atmosphère, avec une acuité et une sensibilité délicates qui peuvent paraître par moments confiner au dandyisme. La demi-douzaine de paysages que l'on trouve de lui à la Galerie des Arts sont plongés dans une lumière qui flotte et danse. Ici un ciel d'un rose insinué qui chante, là une féerie de mauves et de bleus filtrés dans la dentelure des branches d'automne; ailleurs un poème en bleu; ou encore le gentil effet des commencements de mauves dans les reflets sur la route; plus loin, dans un petit coin de toile, un ciel très limpide. Je n'en dirai pas autant de "Lavasse", qui me semble trop blanc, et de "Route de Louveciennes", dont le coloris ne dit rien que de banal.

Avec Degas on ne sait pas; peut-être bien a-t-il voulu par moments se payer la tête des snobs? Oh! alors, quel succès! Mais il y a autre chose; une couple de tableaux nous le prouvent. Ses danseuses, saisies en plein mouvement, ont beau être laides, à peine esquissées et parfois en gros traits, leur gaucherie narquoise a son imprévu, son mordant, et surtout son rythme, car voilà bien tout ce qui semblait importer pour Degas, n'est-ce pas? dans l'animal humain: le rythme, l'attitude au vol.

Jongkind met une note hollandaise dans cet ensemble. Un nocturne sur mer, plein de rêverie profonde et en jolis tons fondus. Des marines à la grisaille poétique.

Tachetage vibrant

Les quelques Mentiellis le montrent sous divers aspects: certains paysages, dont l'un plus fini relève sans doute de la première époque de son art, et les autres tachetés à souhait. Le "Paysage accidenté", aux bruns sales, ne dira rien. "Paysage avec des gens" plait dans son exubérance de teintes fauves. "La Fête Champêtre" nous présente les gens à travers un miroitement de jaunes et de rouges qui produisent des effets de flammes. "Les baigneuses" apparaissent un instant dans une vibration de taches colorées. Un dernier paysage, une tapisserie de verts, montre quel bon parti on peut tirer du genre.

Chaz les Modernes

Au Salon des Modernes français toute discussion est permise. Les Jos Commaissants qui se croient l'esprit Quartier Latin ne manqueront pas de remuer des formules livresques et de pousser des exclamations entendues. D'autres y voudront voir tout simplement des tentatives de saisir l'insaisissable par des moyens souvent courageux et parfois neufs. On se fait rappeler dès l'abord que la mode est à la peinture crayeuse, farineuse, pâle, libre; le satiné a supplanté le velouté.

Voici Cézanne, aux conceptions rugueuses, aux tons amplifiés et synthétisés. Cézanne dont Zoia n'eût peut-être pas tellement raison de se moquer dans "L'Œuvre". Je ne comprends pas, je l'avoue, que d'aucuns veuillent tant admirer "L'enlèvement", avec son homme primitif en bronze qui se sauve avec une loque de femme, en plâtre, contre un ciel bleu-de-prusse; c'est rien moins que naturel comme expression et, pourtant, je conviens de la valeur des contrastes et de la composition decorative. Nature-morte, que voit peu de chose bien rendu à cause d'une certaine harmonie résonnante. "Le Vase de jardin" et "La route à Auvers-sur-Oise" sont assez de coratifs, en somme. "La m. on d. Zola à Medan", dont nous avons déjà parlé, est remarquable pour ses superpositions d'étagères vertes coupées par de beaux arbres verticaux. Les portraits de son fils et de sa femme attirent beaucoup plus de sympathie à l'endroit de Cézanne car, si simples qu'ils soient dans le traitement, si sommaires même, il faut leur reconnaître une expression muette, comme suppliante, dans le regard, et cela vous parle.

Du primitif au visionnaire

On n'a pas souvent l'occasion de voir du Gauguin. Son système décoratif comportant le soulignement de la forme et l'application des couleurs à l'état pur, sans fondu, ne laisse pas de surprendre. Il se dégage, toutes fois, une étrange poésie de ses toiles essentiellement coloniales. Ces torsades bronzées, ces paysages d'une luxuriante primitivité s'imposent avec une certaine franchise.

Trois œuvres de Van Gogh: "Moulin de la Galette", à la manière parisienne de l'artiste, d'une liquidité exquise; "Paysage sous un ciel mouvementé", ou plaine verte surplombée de nuages bouffis; enfin "Les oliviers", pâteux, visionnaires, qui montre le chemin parcouru depuis le ruissellement solaire, premier stage de la décomposition du paysage en vibrations, jusqu'aux angoisses apocalyptiques, prodromes de la folie. Au dernier stage Van Gogh devient illisible.

Seurat a fait des petits quelque-chose de rien. A preuve: "L'échouage de bateaux" et "La Baie de Grandcamp". Ce sont des exemples de la peinture à "pigments", à pigments si j'ose dire; ce n'est pas ce que je leur voudrais reprocher autant que de manquer de sujet. Par ailleurs, "Le pêcheur" a de la finesse.

Les portraits peints par de Toulouse-Lautrec ont de la finesse, aussi dans leur souplesse. Si "L'enfant avec la chienne Raméla" n'est rien d'autre qu'une esquisse facile tirée en grand, le portrait de Missia se présente dans une belle harmonisation de roses dans des verts satinés, "La Goulue" a l'air aristocratique et intelligent, et "Les deux amies" traduit avec une sûreté de touche délicate l'incident expressif.

Notules

Le 51e Salon des Peintres sera ouvert à la Galerie des Arts du 19 avril au 13 mai. Les entrées seront reçues jusqu'au 31 mars.

L'exposition des œuvres françaises du XIXe siècle, à la Galerie des Arts, durera jusqu'à Pâques.

M. Maurice Gagnon, ancien élève de l'Université d'Ottawa et de l'Institut dominicain de philosophie, a donné en Sorbonne en janvier une conférence sur l'architecture anglaise. Il étudie depuis deux ans à l'École du Louvre et à l'Université de Paris. Durant ses vacances au Canada il inaugurera cet automne, chez les RR. PP. Dominicains, une série de cours sur l'histoire de la peinture.

M. H. Viens, de l'Université des Arts, nous annonce qu'elle tiendra une exposition de sujets canadiens à l'hôtel Windsor à partir du 25 mai prochain. Ce sera sa première exposition: les 285 œuvres exposées diront surtout l'intérêt donné au portrait, et en particulier, croyons-nous, au portrait-souvenir de famille. L'une de nos principales maisons d'éducation y apportera son concours.

Georges Jeannet, illustrateur de premier ordre, vient de mourir en France, à l'âge de 86 ans. Degas disait de lui: "Il dessine celui-là". Il avait fait la guerre de 1870. Son tableau "La Ligne de feu" est au Musée de Pau.

Le Musée d'art moderne de New-York vient de se porter acquéreur, moyennant $200,000 de fonds de dotation, de la collection de feu Miss Lissie-P. Bliss, l'une des plus belles collections de Modernes au monde. Elle est évaluée à $750,000 au moins et comprend des œuvres de Degas, Gauguin, Delacroix, Pissarro, Renoir, Matisse, et Cézanne y est représenté par 10 toiles et 12 aquarelles.

Chicago veut faire grand. En marge de la prochaine "foire-exposition" qu'on organise pour cet été aura lieu une extraordinaire exposition de tableaux. L'an dernier un seul chef-d'œuvre avait été emprunté à l'étranger: "Mother" de Whistler. Cette fois on empruntera pour la circonstance une centaine de chefs-d'œuvre, pris aux musées et dans les collections particulières d'Europe. La Russie a promis d'envoyer quelques toiles de la célèbre collection des anciens Tsars, et le gouvernement italien enverra un tableau de Michel-Ange et un de Léonard de Vinci.

Canadian Geographical

As the leading article in the March number of the Canadian Geographical Journal, Marius Barbeau writes in readable style of the work of Cornelius Krieghoff. Krieghoff was a Canadian artist of an earlier generation, whose landscapes served admirably as an interpretation of the life of the people of rural Quebec about the middle of the last century. The article is illustrated with a number of Krieghoff's pictures, including two in color.

Reminding us, as the Journal so often does, of the magnitude of the Dominion, another article in the March number, by W. K. Gibb of Toronto, describes a journey through the Yukon with Professor Innis of the University of Toronto. Mr. Gibb gives an interesting account of how the placer-mining of other days has given place to gold-mining on a large scale by the hydraulic method.

Krieghoff Exhibition Is Record of Early Days Ottawa Citizen Feb. 16/34

Going through some private galleries in the homes of Canadians, fortunate enough to be able to buy fine pictures, this reviewer invariably comes to a stop before the work of a certain artist. Doubtless he has lingered in awed contemplation in the tender effulgence of a Corot, ascended to the spiritual uplands with Watts, Burne Jones or Holman Hunt, marvelled at the deathless magnificence of a Renaissance master but when he reaches a canvas by this artist his stay is long.

It is long because this almost untutored seer in ochre, amber and dun tells with unparalleled insight the story of a section of our homeland, a veritable picture tale of a cold, strong, happy, snow-mantled, flower-starred land of deep forests, soaring hills, rushing streams and of a people who left more benign climes to find near-Paradise in a primeval wilderness.

Who is this painter who is so distinctly Canadian in his viewpoint? He is known, well-known of course, to the art dealer, collector and what might be termed the cognoscenti of the studio but he certainly is not known as he should be by the vast majority of Canadians of culture and refinement. And yet Cornelius Krieghoff (1815-1872) has done more than any artist, living or dead, to preserve an extraordinarily beautiful record of a particular section of Canada and of a formative and colorful period in its history.

Real National Heritage.

Because his work is a real national heritage and because it should be even wider known, special importance attaches to the exhibition which opened yesterday at the National Gallery of Krieghoff pictures. Let it be said at the outset that it is a splendid showing, probably the finest ever got together, and includes no less than 163 canvases large and small. The dozen or more Krieghoffs owned by the National Gallery are there, others come from dealers, but the vast majority are from the private collections of Canadians in Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Quebec, Kingston and other places. Canadian donors have co-operated in a most praiseworthy way in making this exhibition outstanding. It will be open to the public for a month.

Before commenting briefly on a few of the pictures on view something might be said of the quite remarkable life of the artist himself. Krieghoff, born in Holland of well-to-do and cultured parents, was essentially a nomad, forever looking for that something "lost beyond the ranges." Getting a good education and some, but not very extensive, training in art, he got a few guilders from his father, packed a haversack with a well-loved flute, a few clothes and some oft-thumbed books and for many years thereafter, wandered about the continent of Europe.

He was supremely well endowed to earn pay for "bed and board." He spoke five languages besides German, was an amateur naturalist of distinction, a crack shot with gun and pistol, a hunter who could pick up a trail like an Indian, a fine actor, artist and musician, a wit and brilliant conversationalist, and one who, even in those hard-drinking days, could down his two bottles of old Tokay by night and never know a "head" in the morning.

So he wandered about from Berlin to Petersburg and from Paris to London, earning enough for good talk and much Tokay by selling stuffed animals to museums, playing the flute, painting pictures of noblemen, merchants and innkeepers. A few of the pictures he painted in those days now hang in great European galleries. Most of them he sold for the price of a meal or a bottle of wine.

Settles In Canada.

Then he found his way to New York, enlisted as an artificer in the United States army, was used as a scout in the war against the Seminoles in Florida, deserted, fled to Canada and in 1840 settled down (as much as one of his nature could) at Longueuil. His "settling" was mainly the result of his marriage to a French-Canadian girl. At Longueuil where he stayed 13 years he began his real career as a painter. It was continued with ripened power when he moved down to Quebec in '53. Here he stayed 14 years, went West to Chicago in 1867 dying there in 1872.

In the 27 years he lived in French Canada, Krieghoff simply soaked himself in the atmosphere of the country. A born woodsman, he lived for months at a time with the Indians, with trappers, coureurs de bois, habitants of the near and far settlements, inn-keepers of the fringe of the forest. Then came back to talk books, the Paris salons, the doings of society, in the colony and overseas with the old noblesse of Quebec, with the British officers then in garrison there, or to dance gay quadrilles with high-born dames on the Grand Allee beneath clustering candles reviving memories of Champlain, Maisonneuve, Frontenac and Montcalm. But it was chiefly with the simple folk that he loved to foregather. Out from the city he went with crowds bundled in gay blanket coats and bearing snowshoes to the modest auberge of the suburbs and more distant settlements. Followed all night dances when the wine ran freely but all was good-natured fun and jollity so dear to the heart of a habitant.

The various phases of the life he lived are depicted in the exhibition at the National Gallery. Take for instance that wonderful big canvas, Montmorency Falls, 1853 (lent by Col. G. S. Cantlie of Montreal).

It is a Winter scene, the atmosphere alive with the spray from the mighty falls, the grey-blue skies, the great piles of snow, the pines and balsam clinging to the precipitous hillsides, the wide frozen river, where are seen many high sleighs filled with joyous sight-seers. The truth to nature and sense of poetry in this canvas is sufficient alone to make a painter's reputation.

Depicts Various Seasons.

Another Winter scene (lent by Mr. John T. Ross, of Quebec) is "Merrymaking" a large canvas showing a big wooden inn with sloping, snow-covered roof, dormer windows, high balcony running the whole length of the house and high steps reaching it from the ground. It has been an "all-night" party, servants and guests are harnessing up horses in the quaint old sleighs, the balcony is still crowded with revellers having a final libation. In the East a red, red sun is rising and making majestically beautiful a world of forest and deep snow in which these revellers strive to forget the hardships and privations of their lot.

Space forbids mention of many pictures but we have rarely seen a Canadian sunset with that still, majestic, "frozen-warmth" which it conveys more perfectly manifested than "Woodsmen Returning At Sunset," which is lent by Hon. Cairine Wilson. But Krieghoff did not paint Winter alone, even if that season had a particular attraction for him. Not even Brownell or Homer Watson have caught the almost inexpressible loveliness of our woods in Autumn with greater verity than has this transplanted Dutchman. The opulent beauty of those forests in Summer and in fact in every season are shown in many pictures.

To really appreciate this exhibition it must be seen. R. B. F.

Feb. 21/34 Cornelius Krieghoff

An exhibition of the paintings of Cornelius Krieghoff is to be held shortly in Montreal. The pictures have been on view in the National Gallery, Ottawa, where they attracted a lot of attention. In The Citizen, Regina Lenore Shoolman gave an interesting account of the artist's career and an understanding criticism of his works.

It is almost impossible to consider the work of Krieghoff from a so-called "purely artistic" point of view, she said. His art is so closely related to the various phases of his life, that it has become an important historic document. Here is no outburst of emotional disturbances, no mere dabbling to satisfy aesthetic sensibilities, but a serious preoccupation with, and a profound delight in, the earth with all its material possessions, all its human elements. Because of this, Krieghoff became the faithful interpreter of a period that is very near to all those who identify themselves with the growth of Canada.

Let us examine the personality of the artist. Comparatively little is known of his life. His birthplace has been a matter of some dispute, since some authorities claim that he was born at Dusseldorf, Saxony, while others maintain that he saw light of day in Amsterdam. A few years ago, there were still two or three people alive who had known Krieghoff intimately, and it is through them that most of our knowledge concerning him has come down to us. Thus it was established that he was born in the year 1815 and educated in Holland and Germany. When quite young, he wandered about the continent, earning his living by playing the mandolin and painting slight sketches. He spoke fluent French, English and German as well as his native Dutch.

When he was twenty-two years old, he joined the U.S. Army and went to New York and enlisted in the American army. He must have possessed considerable skill, for he was employed as an artificer, in which capacity he might have been called upon to work as a draughtsman, scout, assistant engineer, etc. From 1837 until 1840 he took part in the suppression of the rebellion of the Seminole Indians in Florida. Then he left the army and went to Canada, settling first in Toronto, then in Longueuil and Montreal. In 1853, having married a French-Canadian girl from Longueuil, he left for Quebec, where, with the exception of two years which he spent in Europe, he lived until 1867. The last years of his life were spent in Chicago, with his married daughter. It was there that he died in 1872.

As was inevitable, a personality as colorful as his, could not sink into the obscurity of oblivion, but must become the subject of a host of legends. The passage of time and the lack of authentic information make it difficult to dispel all the tales of heroic exploits among the Indians and elsewhere. It has been ascertained, however, that Krieghoff was an expert hunter, that he shot, rode and fished with perfection and gusto, and that he had absorbed a good deal of Indian lore among the natives of Caughnawaga, Lorette, and the Lake Huron country. His versatility, charm, wit and adventurous spirit helped to endear him to red people and white people alike.

Earlier Work

Krieghoff's earliest pictures were studies of Indians. He painted them in their native surroundings, portraying their encampments, wigwams, lakes and forests as well as their various occupations—fishing, canoeing, shooting the rapids, duckhunting, trapping, basket-weaving, trading with the white men, etc. At first the backgrounds of these canvases were unimportant: flat plains of greyish snow, vague mountains and blurred foliage of trees. But gradually definite landscapes begin to emerge, and we recognize the outline of Mount Royal, the Chaudiere Falls, Lake Memphremagog. So absorbed was Krieghoff in his Indian themes that he even illustrated some of Fenimore Cooper's "Leatherstocking" tales.

It would be fantasy to call Krieghoff's work of that early period good painting. Much of it was crude, amateurish, confused. But there was always a searching for indigenous atmosphere, an intimate approach to things foreign, a desire to express the indwelling, essential qualities of the subject. It has been pointed out that Krieghoff painted a good many "pot-boilers," canvases that were poor in composition and feeble in execution. Without any attempt at justification it must be remembered that, like so many other artists of past and present days, he was forced to commercialize his art and to paint what was picturesque, novel and saleable, rather than that which was simple and serious. It is a notorious and unfortunate fact that poor paintings appeal more quickly to the unimaginative mind and, for that reason, are much more easily disposed of. Thus when Krieghoff was in need of some ready cash, he would dash off a dozen or so trite subjects, color them prettily, and dispatch them to the auction-room, that ill Porado of bargain hunters. A catalogue of such an auction sale, still in existence, and bearing the date 1862 is a mute testimony to this sad state of affairs.

Posterity has wisely agreed that a man shall be judged by his best, rather than his worst work. For this reason we must turn to Krieghoff's Quebec period, which began about 1853. It is believed that he travelled in Europe for a year or two after his arrival in Quebec, encouraged by his friends, Gibb and Budden, who advised him to perfect his technique on the Continent, and also helped him financially. Although he had had some art training before coming to Canada, it had only been rudimentary, and not until his visit in 1854 did he become interested in European art to the extent of copying Old Masters and studying their methods.

This theory is borne out by the fact that his early works show a definite German influence which he probably acquired as a very young lad when he studied in Germany. It is something quite undefinable, a way of approach, rather than a technique, but it is unmistakably there. He gradually lost it during the formative years of 1840-1850. When he begins to paint his Quebec subjects, however, the technique is definitely Dutch. This can be seen in his heads of Habitants, his interiors of French-Canadian homes and one or two other pictures like "The Alchemist" and "The Painter's Studio."

It has become the Dutch fashion to describe Krieghoff's work as "humorous" and "quaint." One writer has even gone so far as to bestow the title of "Canadian Hogarth" upon him, a title which, in my opinion, he neither merited nor would have desired. For Krieghoff was no moralist, no bitter satirist, no preacher.

His humor was affectionate, sometimes sly, but always good-natured. In this, too, he resembles the Dutch and Flemish artists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Habitant heads, the interiors, and little scenes like "The Jealous Husband," "The Card Players" and "The Picture Pedlar" might have been painted by Brouwer, Jan Steen or Pieter de Hoogh.

Perhaps the most successful pictures of this early Quebec period are the "Jolifou" series. There were a number of inns on the road to Quebec, the most famous of which was called "Chez Bureau." Krieghoff has named it "Jolifou" rather pointedly, and he has painted again and again the gleeful crowds that gathered there to dance, drink and listen to sprightly folk. The canvases vary somewhat, but the principal motifs are always present, like gay melodies: the overturned sleigh, the jaunty equipage, the drunkard asleep on the stairs, the gossiping little group of women, the debonair gentleman bidding his lady-friend au revoir, the breezy, tipsy fiddler in his red beret, and the hostler saddling the horses. There is nothing that is superfluous, no figures put in to fill a space. Each actor plays a part in this vivacious scene.

Progress Made by Members

From Sicily to the Austrian frontier, members of the Women's Art Society, were conducted on a tour of Italy in word and screened picture by Mrs. C. L. Henderson at a meeting held in Stevenson Hall yesterday, in a lecture which brought vividly before the audience the richness of the art treasures of that country, something of the spirit of the people, and a lesson in pronunciation of the language. Additional charm was given to the recital by several poems of her own composition read during its course. Beginning at Naples, a trip up to the crater of Vesuvius was made, and then down to Pompeii, by time-worn ruts similar to those of certain Montreal streets, Mrs. Henderson commented, Capri with its bird sanctuary and its memories of the imperial glory of Tiberius who built twelve palaces there was visited, then Palermo with its Sicilian architecture blending Greek and Saracen, as exemplified by the cathedral.

Tours about Rome were made, and several pictures of the Eternal City shown. Mrs. Henderson paused to explain the nicknames by which several of the great Italian painters are known—Tintoretto, "the little dyer," and Masaccio, "Untidy Tom," among them. The Church of Santa Maria Maggiore, one of the 47 important Santa Marias in Rome, and midnight mass there were described, and pictures shown of the Bambino of Arcoelli, the hall of the Vatican, the Vatican Ariadne, and one of the old Papal coach, it being commented that the present Pope prefers a high-powered motor car.

Mussolini was described as the true "Ace of Spades" in his projects for digging and improving, even to an idea of draining the Tiber so as to rescue the treasures lying in as votive offerings in the days of ancient Rome. The English associations of Italy were sketched—Keats and the heart of Shelley buried in Italian soil, Byron's Venetian palace and Robert Browning's residence, also the act that Shakespeare set the scenes of twelve of his plays in Italy.

Orvieto, Perugia, Assisi, Siena, Pisa, Pistoia, Florence, Genoa, Ravenna, Venice, Padua, Milan, and the Italian lakes were described as pictures were shown on the screen. Mrs. R. A. Dunton presided.

STUDIO WORK EXHIBITED.

Prior to the lecture an exhibit of the work done by the student group of the society was held, conveying a striking impression of progress made by the group as a whole.

Ida Beck showed a pastel of young girl, in soft and pleasing color. Strong characterization marked the head of a girl by Ada Low Allan, who also exhibited a still life composition of flowers. Ida M. Hubbell contributed many excellent works, among them a street scene at Ste. Lorette, a charcoal drawing of a man's head, a country road near Snowdon, a girl wearing a white headdress, a still life of a basket of roses, and a fine portrait of an Indian girl. Annie Pringle exhibited a painting of a woman's head, a country scene and a portrait of a young man. E. G. Richardson showed two portraits of girls, in blue. M. Sanborn exhibited several scenes from abroad, including the entrance to the church at Lucerne, Switzerland.

and also an early spring scene of the Cote de Liesse road and one of an old stone wharf.

B. M. Long showed a painting of Lake Macdonald, an autumn scene and a portrait of a girl. I. B. was represented by a water view from St. Helen's Island, an autumn scene in vivid colors, and a pleasing portrait of a young woman.

Mrs. Denning exhibited an interesting portrait of a girl. Mrs. J. Maclean showed two paintings of flowers, a country scene and a small seascape. An exquisitely colored flower study was exhibited by Lil Hingston.

Kriehoff Exhibition at National Gallery Most Comprehensive Ever Brought Together

Cornelius Kriehoff was a half-German Dutchman who, after various adventures in Europe and the United States, reached Canada in 1840 at the age of 25. He settled first at Longueuil, across the river from Montreal, there married a French-Canadian and began painting a series of pictures which have since become one of Canada's greatest legacies in the realm of native art.

For long, there was a tendency to underrate the significance of Kriehoff, but in recent years he has become recognized as one of the pioneers of art on this continent—and his pictures begin to fetch handsome prices. There are probably hundreds in existence, but like the work of most artists, they vary in quality. When he was painting at his best, however, he created canvases that show him to have been an artist of considerable resource and ability, and that now bring to him a belated and posthumous fame.

At the National Gallery there was opened to the public yesterday a memorial exhibition of paintings by Kriehoff. It is the largest and most comprehensive ever brought together. There are 163 items in the catalogue, and of these it is said three or four are of doubtful authenticity. For the rest, the show is as complete and as representative as any Kriehoff show is likely to be.

Kriehoff fell in love with French Canada. This is seen in his work. He paints habitants with an affectionate and sometimes mischievous humor. He roamed the countryside winter and summer making sketches which he later transferred to canvas as joyous and vital landscapes. He was perhaps the first artist to paint the rich colors of the Canadian fall in a manner which was really Canadian. He observed closely, first people, then natural objects. As an historic record, his work is invaluable. As an artistic achievement, it is significant.

As already hinted, Kriehoff's work varies a good deal—in style, in quality, in outlook. He had a hard time getting enough money to live on, and so was not above pot-boiling. Some of his paintings are genre stuff that was made over time and again. And between his early efforts and his later, there is a remarkable disparity in conception and technique. He was good at composition, always courageous in color, and could draw with the best. Today he seems almost primitive. This he certainly was not, as the vitality of his best work shows—work that has withstood eighty years of time and change.

Kriehoff's painting career divides itself roughly into three periods. The first was the Longueuil period, from about 1840 to 1853. He began by painting Indians at Caughnawaga and scenes along the banks of the St. Lawrence in sight of Mount Royal. The Indians are depicted in their colorful native dress and at various pursuits, mainly on snowshoes or pulling toboggans. Kriehoff was primarily interested in costume and types in these early efforts, and backgrounds were there in a conventional sort of way mainly because they obviously could not be left out.

Yet in this period he developed his latent powers and in such pictures as "Settler's Home" (158), "Ice Bridge at Longueuil" (90), and "Winter Landscape" (91) we see him painting the scenes about him with insight and power in the delineation of character and arrangement of his objects. He was still a little vague about the full possibilities of landscape, however, and his backgrounds have an artificial aspect and none of the depth and movement of his later period.

Montreal, engrossed in furs and banking, somewhat neglected Kriehoff, and he had a struggle to make a living. In 1853 he was induced to go to Quebec. Here he did his best work, mainly because he got more patronage and therefore more encouragement. He went into the country and painted waterfalls and lakes and farms, and Indians and habitants, too, this time with fresh insight and a firmer grasp of essentials. A year later he went to Europe for several months, and this journey seems to have done him a world of good. He probably saw some of the early Impressionist work and possibly that of the English landscapists of the period. In any case, in his work during the next ten years he created canvases of lively and enduring quality and painted with a maturer understanding of his problems.

In the present exhibition there are a score of works of this middle period which represent Kriehoff at the height of his powers. "Montmorency Falls" (19) is one of the best known works of this time, and it is a fine thing, with a good sky effect and a sense of space and movement. But for charm, hum-and characterization, skilful color and notable composition we must look for the habitant farms and country life scenes.

"The Habitant Farm" (93) is characteristic of these. Here is sound atmospheric effect and a sense of organization that stamps Kriehoff as an authentic and creative artist. "Playtime Village School" (103) is another with one of the painter's most inspired moods behind it. "Settler's Home" (105) is yet another, with its gay air, its depiction of type, and its sound painting. In all, Kriehoff's advancing powers are seen in every department, and in none more than that of background and perspective and general arrangement.

With this group also belongs the delightful "Chez Jolifou" series, three excellent examples of which are to be found in the current show. One is "After the Ball" (102), which is remarkable more as a social document than as a painting. In this he used his favorite models, and many of them may be identified in other pictures. It is said that Kriehoff himself was fond of the jug. If he was, it did not deter him from observing with amused kindness and a craftsman's insight the ways of the habitants who also occasionally sought bouts with the demon rum. "Chez Jolifou" (104) is another of the group.

In 1867 Kriehoff went west and settled in Chicago with his daughter. He continued to paint, and made trips to Quebec again. In this final period he produced some notable work, but not much, nor anything so characteristic and delightful as that of his Quebec years. "Winter Scene, the Blacksmith's Shop" (38) is one of his late efforts, and very creditable, too, but though its drawing and composition still retain the old adeptness, the old vitality has waned. "New Year's Day Parade" (113) is an excellent canvas, also, and possesses much of his earlier force and color.

Kriehoff visited Ottawa in 1858 and has left several mementoes of the trip. One is "The Chaudiere" (92). He went to Niagara Falls and "Niagara" (147) is a reminder of the fact. There was a time when at Longueuil the artist went in for interiors, and several interesting examples are to be seen. "The Picture Pedlar" (3) is a human study and also shows how French Canada got its art in the eighteen-forties. "The Jealous Husband" (1) justifies its title and also explains why there are many of Scottish descent in Quebec. "The Game of Cards" is a charming item, too, as well as "Interior of a Canadian Home" (110).

Kriehoff's autumn landscapes are best known to most persons. Many will be seen that suggest his pioneering courage as a colorist. Indeed, allowing for the date, not a few suggest spiritual affiliation with the modern Canadian landscape school. There are a number of freakish pictures, too, probably painted to order, and one flower piece which very likely reveals why Kriehoff abandoned flowers when he began. "Woodmen Returning, Sunset" (157) is the best of a number which used the same theme, and shows a crimson sunset over an ice-locked lake. "Owl's Head and Skinner's Cove" (149) is one of the most beautiful things Kriehoff ever did of this subject, and discloses a distinct mastery of light and distance effects.

There are also on view a collection of prints made from Kriehoff originals. It is interesting to note that his work found its way to England and Germany in the eighteen-sixties. It would be interesting to know if Currier and Ives made any prints from his work. A self portrait in oil rounds out the exhibition.

Much credit for the representative character of this Kriehoff exhibition is due to Dr. Marius Barbeau of the National Museum. Dr. Barbeau has made extensive research into the life and work of the artist, and it was through him that many of the finest examples now to be seen were obtained from owners in Quebec and elsewhere who have had the pictures in their homes as heirlooms. Romance of Artist Whose Work Illustrated Life in Quebec

A RETROSPECTIVE exhibition of the paintings of Cornelius Kriehoff, Pioneer of Canadian art, opened yesterday at the Montreal Art Association. In view of the importance of this exhibition and of its interest locally (there are almost seventy-five people in Montreal who own paintings by him) the following article on the life of this accomplished musician as well as artist should prove helpful in viewing and estimating his work, which is illustrative of early life on the St. Lawrence, and notably of Quebec City.

By MARIUS BARBEAU

WHEN KRIEHOFF landed in New York, at the age of twenty-two, he had already earned his way on foot through Europe as an itinerant musician and painter, and he planned to discover America on the same terms. The world was not too large an abode for him. He wanted to circle it and explore it from the northern snows to the tropics. It was like a treasure house—his own; and a rover's life was the key to its golden opportunities. With very little money in his pocket he would start on a long journey and tempt Fortune. Fortune snatched his fate on the doorstep and placed it in the hands of a beautiful girl. She made him her own and changed his existence by conferring upon him a country. One of three people in his life who arrested his affections, she made of him a painter of ancient Canada and a man into whose debt posterity has fallen. She must have left an indelible stamp upon his soul.

ROMANCE OF YOUNG KRIEHOFF

Little enough has come down to enlighten us on the romance of young Kriehoff and his sweetheart, who chanced to meet at a hotel, soon after he had landed in New York. It's only mention occurs in the margin of an old newspaper article of Louis Frechette, the Montreal writer: "Kriehoff was very young when he landed at New York. At the hotel where he had put up, he became acquainted with a young French-Canadian girl . . . Louise Gautier dit Saint-Germain, and he married her. The young couple soon after passed the frontier into Canada." (Les Petites Choses de notre Histoire, IV, 168-171, P.-G. Roy).

The story may not really be so brief. For the young nomad enlisted in the American army soon after his arrival at New York—on the 5th of July, 1837; he was discharged only three years later, on May 5, 1840, at Burlington, Vermont, to enable him to re-enlist; and he deserted the next day. Why, no one can tell. But we may surmise that Louise had something to do with his need for freedom. For a little daughter, Emily, was born to them some time before March, 1841.

HIS WANDERINGS

Where did Cornelius wander after his desertion? Perhaps to Canada, with Louise. Vermont is close to the Canadian border; Canada's earliest railway would have taken them from the Richelieu River to Longueuil, opposite Montreal; and Longueuil was the home of Louise's parents. The direct route from Montreal to New York had provided Louise in the first place with an opportunity for a visit to New York, where she had met Cornelius.

The young lovers may have chosen another course; for they do not seem to have taken the trouble to regularize their marriage—he was, perhaps, a Lutheran; she a Catholic; and there was a good deal of leeway in those days. Coming back home so soon might not provide Louise with her "carte blanche." Waiting a little while might make a great difference.

In the few years following 1840, Cornelius is supposed to have "made several hundreds of drawings" for the American Government of various episodes of the Seminole war in the Everglades of Florida, which he had witnessed and recorded. His original sketches "became the property of John Budden" (of Quebec) and "were all destroyed in the great Quebec fire of June, 1881." His drawings for the Government would have been made "in his studio at Rochester, N.Y., where he resided for several years. He next removed where his brother Ernest Again he opened a "Gleanings from Quebec." But this information has a roundabout way; it may not be quite correct. No such records can be traced; and the American authorities, it seems, might not have been so indulgent with a deserter. Nor has any evidence been produced, beyond hearsay, of his residing at Rochester and Toronto.

AT LONGUEUIL IN THE EARLY FORTIES

We find him at Longueuil and Montreal in the early forties. Several of his first sketches of "habitant" life and Caughnawaga Indians ante-date 1845; they are crude and amateurish. A small picture, owned by F. R. Heaton, Esq., Montreal, bears the title "A House in Winter, C.K." and the date, 1845. It shows the inn of the "White Horse," with a painted signboard, on the shore of the St. Lawrence.

His French-Canadian interiors of the Longueuil period often show a beautiful young woman with her daughter, whom he was fond of using as models. They were Louise and Emily, his wife and young daughter. One of those pictures goes back to 1842 or 1843; the child was then about two years old. It was later reproduced in a colour lithograph entitled "Canadian Habitants playing at cards."

Of the year 1846 we have the "Picture Pedlar" with the inscription "Montreal, 1846," at the back of the canvas, and "Habitant Sleigh," now owned by Messrs. E. Bayly and F. A. Gaby, of Toronto. A gentleman pedlar, in the first, shows chromos to some French-Canadians whom we recognize, among them: "le Vieux Lapocane," Louise's father, and his family, Emily, then a child in arms, is there with the others. The second picture is a large and delightful winter landscape in which a group of people sit in, or stand around, a red "berline" on the ice in front of Longueuil; among them we see Louise, a pretty young woman in a fur bonnet and bright homespun cape, with Emily, a few years old, and "le Vieux Lapocane." Cornelius himself stands by, still young, long haired, clean shaven, and handsome, in a winter sporting costume. The same characters appear in other tableaux of the following years, in particular, "The Ice Bridge at Longueuil," and "Winter Landscape" also at Longueuil and dated 1849. Lovely Louise again sits with her young daughter at the rear of the "berline," the color of which now has lost its freshness; from bright red it has aged into a dull ochre red; Emily, with a shawl over her head, has grown into a pretty little girl. Gautier's long hair now is turning to silver; and his red horse of 1846 has given way to "le Blanc." The features of Emily are also repeated at various angles in the children standing on the ice, behind the sleigh.

A CANADIAN MEETS THEM IN GERMANY

That Louise had gone over to Europe and travelled there with Cornelius is also borne out by an anecdote of Louis Frechette (mentioned above). I translate it from the French:

"Phileas Roy once visited Stuttgart (Germany), in one of his annual trips to Europe. Stopping in front of a modest shop window, he noticed a picture and was startled. Here were Indians and a camp in the woods, a familiar subject for a Canadian.

"I'll be damned," he exclaimed, "if this is not really 'Canayen.' I must go in and bargain for it."

"The good woman inside, finding out that German was not his language, comes to his rescue by answering him in French, volla!

—Ah! you speak French?

—Yes, Sir! I am French.

—Most delighted, just like me!

—Yes, I am French, but from Canada.

—Is that possible! Madame, so am I.

—You are only joking!

—Upon my word of honour! Then from where, in Canada? Tell me!

—From Boucherville (here Frechette is mistaken; it was Longueuil)!

—Boucherville! Roaring thunders!

My own village too. Phileas Roy is my name.

—Monsieur Roy? Are you 'petit Maurice' or 'petit Guillaume'?

—Petit Guillaume!

—If I know it! I am the daughter of 'Vieux Lapocane' (Old Smoke)!

—Really! Then let me kiss you, my dear!

"Kriehoff, arriving at that moment, stood dumbfounded on the doorstep. His wife was in the arms of a man who, in the circumstances, never failed to give a good account of himself."

It is strange that Louise should not appear again in the artist's pictures or his life, after he had come back to Quebec, at the end of 1855, save perhaps in vague spoken recollections.

KRIEHOFF'S SECOND WIFE

"He was not supposed to be married to his first wife. That is why, according to my father, the people here objected to her—I mean, some of the people." "Budden, his intimate friend used to say, 'His first wife.' Then he must have had a second" (Mrs. C. M. Finnes, Quebec).

His second wife was quite different from the first. "She was a very stout woman—and quite large in comparison with him. He did not look nearly as big," still remembers Mrs. Moffatt (Elizabeth Hunter), of Toronto, who was twelve years old when the Kriehoffs, in 1864, spent a summer at Lake Laron, near Quebec, at the same boarding house as her parents and herself. "He called her, 'his frau.' It did not impress me that he was as German as she was, because he spoke better English; hers was broken English. I often thought that sometimes he must have lived in England, for he spoke better English than she did. She undoubtedly was of German descent, not a French Canadian."

KRIEGHOFF, A GREAT PIONEER OF ART.

Kriehoff's pictures of early Canadian life place him in the front rank of the pioneers of modern art on this continent. And he is more than a primitive. His work at its best has weathered the assaults of time, remoteness and obscurity. It is varied and resourceful, embracing, as it does, French-Canadian and Indian folk life, river and forest lore, autumn and winter landscapes in a direct and inspired vein, and even, at times, illustrated fiction, portraiture and still life. It remains vital and refreshing, and holds the affection of those who have treasured it for many years as an heirloom.

The aim of the retrospective exhibition of a selection of his works, organized by the National Gallery of Canada, which opened last night at the Montreal Art Association, is to enable us for the first time to gain a comprehensive view of his achievements and determine his standing in the world of art at large. In this it is even more than of national importance.

Kriehoff belongs somewhere among pioneers whose contribution to art is nowhere else duplicated. Indeed, he blazed the trail through our Eastern Woodlands so that no one could mistake it, and he created the French-Canadian habitant and the Quebec bourgeois with such finality that our painters since, unless they were blind, had to pick up the threads where he dropped them, whether for a loss or a gain, most of them till recently for a loss.

His craftsmanship slowly emerged out of limbo and improved vastly during a fruitful career of nearly thirty years. His pictures for this reason fall into distinctive periods and types, as a visit to this exhibition will show.

He lived in a French-Canadian cottage with a verandah and a flower garden, on Grande-Allee. It still stands there, one of the last landmarks of a past age, in the splendid neighborhood of the Plains of Abraham.

He implicitly believed in Providence and spent whatever he had without a thought for the morrow. With a hundred dollars in his pockets one day, he had, the next, only five cents left; so the story goes.

Then he dashed off small pot-boilers, showing a Lorette Indian woman selling baskets, or a Huron hunter on snowshoes tracking the moose, and he would start with them under his arm, on the street, to sell them for a pound or two to whoever had the ready cash.

HAPPY DAYS IN FRENCH CANADA.

The British officers at the Citadel were among his best customers. Besides associating with them at Lorette and at Jolifou's night parties, he painted Canadian scenes for them to bring back home as souvenirs of the good times they had among the Indians and those quaint people, the French-Canadians. Or again, they picked up landscapes with the snow piled high on the roofs, and French Canadians, with blue and red 'tuques,' racing their swift little horses on the ice in front of high cliffs. Or again, they carried off some autumn scenes, so characteristic of the Laurentians. The maple trees were so red that the folk at home refused to believe they could be true to life. To them they were as exaggerated as the anecdotes brought back from the wilds of New France!

KRIEGHOFF'S BEST PERIOD

The Quebec period of Kriehoff, from 1853 to 1866, is incomparably his best and most productive. It goes on improving year after year, till, in 1860 and 1861, he painted his glorious 'Merrymaking at Jolifou's,' his reveillon parties at J. B. Jolifou, aubergiste, at Bureau's, and such large pictures as are nowhere excelled in depicting the joy and color of French Canadian folk lore. Those canvases are still as worthy of admiration and as vital as the first day. Unfortunately they are little known, being the property of the heirs to the old Quebec families who treasure them in their private homes.

QUEBEC FINDS IN HIM ITS OWN SELF-EXPRESSION

If Kriehoff created Quebec with its habitants, Indians and Laurentians, Quebec richly returned the compliment. It made him into a painter whose message to posterity has steadily gained in value and prestige, and whose art undoubtedly deserves international recognition.

The Kriehoff Exhibition at The Art Gallery Star March 21/34

A revival of interest in the work of some of the older Canadian painters, which has been growing for some years past, gets a good lead from the collection of pictures by Cornelius Kriehoff, which have been lent by many owners to the National Gallery of Canada for exhibition in several Canadian cities. This collection is now to be seen at the Art Association of Montreal, where it fills the whole of the large Canadian room and overflows into the Print Room. It represents all sides of Kriehoff's art and, as the illustrated catalogue prepared by the National Gallery shows, all stages of it from 1845, when he was thirty-one and had lately come to Canada, till the time of his death in 1872. A brief account of the little that is certainly known about the painter's life is given in a preface to the catalogue by Marius Barbeau, who has made a very special study of Kriehoff's life and work.

Though he was born in Holland and though many of his ideas and methods as a painter were evidently derived from the old Dutch masters, there has never been a painter who was more thoroughly Canadian. There appear to be no pictures of his, painted before his coming to Canada, and after that all his pictures, except for some copies made in European museums, were of Canadian scenery and Canadian people. In Longueuil, in Montreal and still more in Quebec, where much of his best work was done, he set himself to study and record his surroundings and his neighbors, with the result that he has left many delightful pictures and just as many excellent illustrations of the life and habits of the people of this province from sixty to ninety years ago.

There are in this collection a few interior scenes, which are distinctly reminiscent of Dutch painting, but it is chiefly the outdoor life of Canada that is to be found in these pictures—the life of Indians and trappers in the woods in summer and autumn and of people who go about in sleighs in winter. Figures appear in nearly all of them, though they are sometimes only small and comparatively unimportant; there are some pure landscapes, such as two pictures of the falls of the Ste. Anne River, one of them with a very striking storm effect, and one of the Chaudiere; in others minute figures give a great sense of space and height, as in the two fine views of the Montmorency Falls in winter, with the ice cone in front of them. Other pictures which tell more of places are of the frozen river at Laval and of the ice hummocks just above Quebec. There are small groups of Indians in several pictures of variants on the same portage and two of the most interesting of them have the red light of a camp fire at one side, with moonlight at the other side reflected from the river which recedes into the distance.

The movement and humor of the pictures of Quebec life will make them the most attractive to many people. In the more serious of them trappers and Indians are seen meeting, hunting and coming home to their log cabins. Others give us a very good idea of how the citizens lived and enjoyed themselves, in the "New Year's Day Parade," in the "Merrymaking," in front of a roadside inn, with a mixture of rough country sleighs and smart turning with well groomed teams from

The pictures of Jolifou's inn some of the best of these and there is a broader humor still in the two views of the same toll-gate with its short-tempered guardian. The portraits are few; the best of them are the head of the artist himself and the outdoor portrait of his friend, John Budden. The study of his wife, dressed as an Italian girl, has personal interest, and the picture of Dr. Arnoldi of Quebec is too ugly to be anything but a truthful portrait.

and distribute it according to its own arrangements."

Manuscripts should carry the mark of "Prize Competition" with the name and address of the composer appearing on the title page and on the upper corner of each succeeding page. No person should submit more than one composition, and no manuscript will be returned to the composer unless accompanied by self-addressed envelope. Manuscripts are to be addressed:—Prize Competition, The Caravan, 132 East 65th St., New York, N.Y.

The poem to be set is:

"THE SONG OF THE CARAVAN." Feet on the sands, — heavy feet, light feet, Boot, sandal, moccasin,—yellow feet, white feet; Treading the desert waste,—with the step of Kings Now we advance a foot,—yes, we advance a foot, But soon—on wings.

We, who were told — that sunlight would blind us, We, who were trained to look — ever behind us, Toward the horizon's brim,—with the step of Kings, Now we advance a foot,—yes, we advance a foot, But soon—on wings.

Songs on the air, — swung to new measures, Gypsy and Vagabond,—caught by new pleasures, Forward, the CARAVAN!—with the step of Kings, Now we advance a foot,—yes, we advance a foot, But soon—on wings.

Works by Four Canadian Painters

CHARLES De BELLE, A.R.C.A.

An exhibition which is now open in one of the galleries of the T. Eaton Company contains some of the best work by Charles de Belle, A.R.C.A., that has been shown in Montreal for years, and one which brings out some quite new sides of his art. The brighter part of the collection is in some of the pleasant fancies of children which Mr. de Belle has made familiar, and conspicuous among them is "Around the Throne," a decorative row of children's heads. Two pictures of brides are delicate and graceful and another interesting study in white is "The Madonna." Interesting for their similarity and their difference are the two large oil pictures of mothers and children. There is a good deal of sadness in the large head of a girl called "Dreaming," and far more still in "The Thinker," an emotional and imaginative picture of a man's head. Mr. de Belle's landscapes are all winter scenes, with deep snow and stormy skies. One of the most striking of them is a fine study of big tree trunks against snow; in most of them the feeling ranges from a rather sad peacefulness, in "The Cottage" and "Solitude," to a tragic gloom, which is emphasized and increased by groups of half seen figures, in "The Lonely Road," "In the Woods" and "Going Home." M. Fougere's fine portrait drawing of Mr. de Belle hangs in the same gallery.

W. H. CLAPP

As gay an exhibition as one can want to see is that of pictures by W. H. Clapp, which opens today at the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke street. Mr. Clapp, a Canadian by birth, has spent many years in other countries, particularly in France, Spain, Cuba and the United States, and all these countries appear in his pictures. In some of the pictures he has used methods which are realistic and almost conventional, and this is more specially true of some of the figure studies, but for the most part he has concerned himself chiefly of entirely with effects of light and with the ways in which it falls on and is reflected by trees and foliage and figures. His methods of representing light are partly derived from French impressionists and partly his own; some of the pictures are evidently experiments but very successful ones and the collection, as a whole, has a sort of sunny cheerfulness which makes it the best of antidotes to the horrors of a Montreal winter or spring day.

H. S. PALMER, A.R.C.A.

Rural scenery of Canada, and particularly of Ontario, has always provided the subjects of H. S. Palmer's pictures and it still does so in the collection which is being exhibited at Eaton's galleries. It is an inhabited country that he paints, places where there are horses, sheep and cows, but close to the edge of wilder country, and his painting of it has a greater breadth and freedom than before. He chooses the summer or the early autumn for painting, and there are no snows or storms in these pictures but an abundance of sunshine which has not only light but warmth as well. His pictures are of very pleasant places in Canada, seen under their happiest conditions.

HAROLD BEAMENT

Both Canada and the West Indies appear in the pictures and sketches by Harold Beament which are being shown at the Arts Club, Victoria street. Most of them are oil pictures but some of the water colors are among the best of them. Of the best of these are a group of Sponge Boats at the Bahamas, a group of Sponge Trimmers in a dock shed at Nassau, of the Boiling Springs at Dominica, a rocky valley half filled with clouds of steam, a West Indian Sail Boat with a crowd of small figures on the wharf behind it, and a study of Porto Rico Sunshine, in all of which there is plenty of tropical light and color. Some of the best of the Canadian water colors are a delightful blue picture of St. Marguerite, an "Early Evening, Winter," also in the Laurentians, and the quiet and rather sad "Close of Day, Laurentians." Mention must also be made of some very interesting studies of Negro heads, drawn on structural lines, and of some Laurentian scenes, very effectively drawn in crayon with light washes of color. The oil pictures include three large ones, a rather impressive view of the demolition of the old St. Andrew and St. Paul's Church, a rather gloomy "Rocky Headland" and an interesting study of the glare around electric welders at work. Among the smaller oil pictures the "Early Spring," with patches of snow, the "Valley of the Rouge River near Huberdeau," the "March Melancholy" and "Birch Pattern" are some which call for notice.

THE ART GALLERY

Persuade my sister to accompany me to the Exhibit of 19th century paintings at the Art Gallery. The right one piece of work is in for some rather stringent criticism. The "piece de resistance" is the sun. A rather bizarre sun with a light brown rim to distinguish it from a glaringly yellow sky. The artist evidently wore smoked glasses. An adorable pen and ink silhouette of a Japanese lady in an out-of-the-way corner. An ingenious and guileless study of a fillette by Greuze and very close to it a sympathetic character study of a gentleman of the old school, every line, hollow and shadow denoting a past-master in the art of portraiture. Nearby—a large picture "October" of a very beautiful girl out in a raw autumn wind with colored leaves falling all round her—strikingly natural. "La Rosee"—living up to its title—very, very refreshing. "Les Crevettieres"—a veritable masterpiece of expression and tone.

And so many others. Clever sketches and larger, more pretentious pictures which capture the charm of far-away lands and their people.

Over there, a loquacious lady very much occupied in acquainting her escort with her various reactions to this or that work. Waxing very enthusiastic over a monotone nature study in a neutral yellow. "Penetrating," she said. Well, maybe, but rather impenetrable.... A refined, elderly gentleman, whose every gesture and intonation betrayed the artist—explaining the fine points of the exhibits to a striking girl in black and her escort.... Observing, a young man in gray with the face of an ascetic and the eyes of a poet.... A tall, willow girl in powder blue—fine, beautifully proportioned features and quizzical grey, or was it blue, eyes. An interesting face. A good-looking, collegiate youth in a camel's hair coat, taking notes.... Several good-looking men, young or otherwise, very much interested.... A couple sitting on a bench—quite obviously a rendezvous.

Exhibits of Canadian artists. Snow scenes. Indian lore tableaux. Rare collections of ancient paraphernalia. A rather humorous family scene with the mother quietly occupied in some task near the fireplace—one of the boys making a pied-de-nez and the other lying on the floor, reciprocating with a kick.

I think I shall go again in the morning when it is quiet and deserted. The gong of departure sounded before I had picked up anything but surface impressions.... It requires all the application of your concentration technique to discover the fine points in a painting with a crowd milling around you.

No doubt some may have noticed a girl in brown and a girl in grey, as I noticed others, but then, surface impressions are so misleading....

Some Painters In the French Exhibition

The nineteenth century, fertile in new ideas, feverish with revolutions, and singularly corrupt in politics, gave birth to the greatest painter of satire since the days of Hogarth. Honore Daumier became the eloquent interpreter of a society that glittered with elegance, artificiality and ill-disguised hypocrisy. His caricatures, mostly lithographs that appeared in the French newspapers, exposed without mercy the sham politician, the greedy lawyer, the ranting actor and the fat bourgeois profiteer.

Three of these brilliantly satirical subjects are to be seen at the exhibition of French Painting, now on view at the Montreal Art Gallery. The "Third Class Carriage" which reveals Daumier as a master of figure painting, has been cited often as an important social document. But it is more than that; the fusing of sombre, almost monochrome colors, the strong handling of blunt, massive forms, the deliberate emphasis of certain details and the skilful subordination of others, all combine to make this a composition of powerful, concentrated intensity. Beyond the technical perfection lies the artist's masterful conception of his subject—pathos, deep pity and infinite understanding. "The Critics," a fine water-color owned by a Montreal collector, belongs to the "Amateur" series, a number of sketches depicting with sly, good-humored irony the raptures of pseudo-connoisseurs. Finally, there is "Le Defenseur a la Barre," a spirited wash drawing of Daumier's favorite subject: the wind-bag orators of the court-room.

A direct descendant of Daumier is Toulouse-Lautrec, the cynical, gifted aristocrat who portrayed with startling, sharp vision the pleasure-seeking crowds of Paris. Lautrec, the morbid hunch-back, wanted to capture on canvas all that the world had denied him—beautiful women, the music and laughter of cabarets, the friendship of handsome men. "Les Deux Amies" and "La Goulue" express in swift, nervous, telling lines, Lautrec's ardent desire for vividness, movement, excitement. Visitors at the Art Gallery should not neglect, after seeing the French paintings, to re-visit the permanent collection of the Gallery which contains three splendid Daumiers—"Head of a Peasant" and "Street Scene, Montmartre," in oil and "At the Opera" a lithograph that hangs in the Print Room. To this same school of satirists belongs Jean Louis Forain, who died a few years ago. "The Verdict," an oil-painting in the Permanent Collection is strongly reminiscent of Daumier at his best.

The Post-Impressionists had two great masters whose names are inevitably linked together: Paul Gauguin and Vincent Van Gogh. Their bizarre appearance and exotic lives have provided endless material for biographers and romancers, but it is their work which has earned for them a place among the immortals. Of the three canvases by Gauguin, shown in this exhibition, one belongs to the Brittany period, while the other two were painted in Tahiti. "L'offrande," in which two Tahitian women are silhouetted against a brilliantly-colored landscape, carries out to perfection Gauguin's theory on figure painting. "Avoid motion

Montreal Art Notes

The exhibition of French pictures at the Art Association of Montreal will be open to the public for the last time next Sunday, April 1st.

The exhibition of pictures by Kriehoff will remain open till Sunday, April 22nd. It will be succeeded in the Print Room of the Art Association by a collection of silhouettes by Rene Kulbach, which will be opened about April 24th.

This month's exhibition the McGill University Library is of a collection of reproductions of drawings by old masters in the Uffizi at Florence. The drawings are for the most part the work of Italian painters and among them are works by some of the more important masters and by some who are less well known. Useful biographical information is given on the labels attached to the reproductions.

The exhibition of works by Charles de Belle, A.R.C.A., and by H. S. Palmer, A.R.C.A., at Eaton's galleries closes at the end of this week. It will be followed by an exhibition of work of Georges Delfosse, with which there will be an exhibition of landscape photography. These will open next Monday, April 2nd.

The private view of the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal is to be on Thursday, April 19th. The exhibition will be open to the public on the following day and will remain open till May 13th.

In a pose," he wrote. "Let everything about you breathe the calm and peace of the soul." In the landscape of Tahiti, one senses, indeed, that infinite peace is the key-note to Gauguin's conception of this land and its golden-skinned people.

Gauguin's friend and disciple, Van Gogh, painted in rich, vibrant colors. "Les Oliviers," dominated by the glaring disk of the rising sun, is startling in composition: the purple shadows, entirely out of their natural place, give a perfect balance and proportion to the design. "Paysage sous un ciel Mouvemente" shows a striking play of light and shade. A still foreground of flat, flower-sown fields is contrasted with tempestuous clouds, producing an effect of storm and turbulence.

ART SOCIETY REVIEWS SATISFACTORY YEAR

Star March 27/34

Mrs. W. A. Gifford is Elected President

A particularly interesting season was reviewed at the fortieth annual meeting of the Women's Art Society, held yesterday afternoon in Stevenson Hall, Mrs. R. A. Dunton presiding. The membership now stands at 347, with fifteen studio members, seventeen life and five honorary members. Thirty-nine new members were admitted during the year.

The secretary, Mrs. P. V. Raven, in her report referred to the president's course in which phases of European art were presented by four outstanding lecturers: the morning course, under Mrs. W. A. Gifford's direction; the poetry and drama course, under convenership of Mrs. J. M. Almond, and music, which was in charge of Mrs. Alexander Murray. In all departments, the high standard set by the society had been well maintained.

The studio, under convenership of Mrs. R. R. Thompson, opened last October, and will close at the end of this month. Fifteen members have been working and creditable work has been shown at the studio exhibitions. The outdoor color sketch class, under direction of Miss M. J. Sanborn, had from twelve to sixteen members. The library, of which Miss Ethelwyn Bennet is convener, distributed over 250 books.

During the year grants had been made of $50 to the Children's Library; $25 to the educational classes of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild; $50 to the Christmas Cheer committee; and $100 to the Montreal Orchestra. At the meeting yesterday, it was voted, on the motion of Mrs. C. L. Henderson, to raise the Children's Library grant to $100.

The treasurer, Mrs. Dakers Cameron, reported for the year

News of Art In America And Europe

This year's exhibition of the Salon des Artistes Independants in Paris celebrates the jubilee of the society, which has contributed a fair share to the history of modern painting. When its first exhibition was held in 1884 the founders and exhibitors included Cezanne, Seurat, Signac, Van Gogh, Toulouse-Lautrec, Roussel, Matisse and others whose names have become almost as well known. Some of this year's exhibitors have done honor to the occasion by sending early works for comparison with their new works. It appears to have been expected that the jubilee would be marked by the showing of some surprisingly unconventional pictures, but there are, in point of fact, very few "monsters." It is no longer easy to paint pictures which will surprise or shock the public in Paris.

Art in the United States has initial-lettered movements to match the N.R.A. and other industrial movements. The chief of these is the C.W.A.—Civil Works of Art project, the purpose of which is partly to find employment for artists but, still more, to do this by developing the public appreciation of art. An offshoot of the C.W.A. is the P.W.A.P.—Public Works of Art Project, which promotes the painting of mural decorations in public buildings. According to a recent report, more than one thousand mural decorations have been painted at various places in the United States and 722 artists were engaged in February in such work under the regional committee which is centred in New York. Decorations were then in progress at such different, and strange, places as Ellis Island, the New York Custom House, the Military Academy at West Point, various schools, colleges and county courts. 4,000 artists have been registered with the C.W.A. headquarters at Washington and the works done have included oil pictures, drawings, lithographs and etchings, sculpture and various kinds of craftwork.

total receipts of $3,814.84, and disbursements of $2,848.38, leaving a balance of $966.26.

SOLDIERS REMEMBERED

The administration of the soldiers' fund had gone on as usual, it was reported by Miss Hay Browne, who briefly outlined the history of this work, which was started during the war, and has gone on ever since, supported by the society as individuals. The ex-service men in St. Anne's Military Hospital are visited regularly, and fruit, cigarettes, candy, playing cards, etc., distributed. The growth of the work was indicated. Last Christmas some 500 patients received gifts. Approximately 6,000 magazines are given every year. During the unemployment emergency, interest has been extended to Verdun and Rosemount, among unemployed ex-service men. Total receipts for the year were $738, and disbursements amounted to $476.45.

OFFICERS ELECTED

The following officers were elected for 1934-35: President, Mrs. W. A. Gifford; first vice-president, Mrs. Darwin S. Higginson; second vice-president, Miss Mary Saxe; recording secretary, Mrs. G. S. Plow; executive committee: Miss Ethelwyn Bennet, Miss A. D. Hay Browne, Mrs. R. M. Mitchell, Mrs. Alexander Murray, Mrs. C. A. Richardson, Mrs. J. S. Rutherford, Mrs. G. Maxwell Sinn, Mrs. R. R. Thompson.

The retiring president, Mrs. R. A. Dunton, was presented with a life membership in the society and with a bouquet of roses.

A program followed the business meeting. Piano compositions were played by Mrs. R. R. Thompson, three songs were sung by Mrs. A. W. Schell, accompanied by Miss Georgina Murphy, and selections were rendered by the Montreal Ladies' Quartette, composed of Mrs. W. H. Harrison, Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Harold Mills and Mrs. Schell, the accompaniments being played by Mrs. R. T. Andrae. A paper, entitled "A Visit to Dublin," was read by Mrs. Thomas Morgan.

MAURICE CULLEN DIES AT CHAMBLY Gazette March 28/34

Eminent Canadian Landscape
Painter Had Been Ill
Over Year
ELECTED R.C.A. IN 1907

Best Known as Interpreter of Laurentian Scenery—
Did Work in France
For War Memorials

Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., recognized as one of Canada's leading landscape painters, died at his home at Chamblay Canton, Que., shortly before one o'clock this morning. Mr. Cullen, who was 68 years of age, had been ill for over a year.

Born in St. John's, Newfoundland, Mr. Cullen came to Montreal with his family at the age of three years and grew up in this city. In 1890 he went to France to study art, showing such rapid progress that four years later his first picture, a summer landscape, was exhibited at the Paris Salon. A winter landscape painted shortly afterwards was purchased by the French Government. He returned to Montreal in 1895 and since then had followed his profession here—his favored season being winter and, of later years, the Laurentians, just north of Montreal, his best-loved sketching ground. He was elected A.R.C.A. in 1899 and R.C.A. in 1907. In 1918 he was commissioned by the Canadian Government to paint scenes associated with the World War.

He is survived by his widow, Robert Pilot, A.R.C.A., is a step-son. Maurice Cullen was known as an artist who painted with superb freedom and authority. His favored subject was the Canadian landscape in early or late winter and he created a series of little pictures which sparkled with the riotous colors of the Laurentian landscape—the cold, scintillating sunshine on the snow covered, tree clad mountain tops, the deep green of the firs and cedars, the ultramarine of the streams and the sombre shadows of the forests. He caught the spirit of awe and desolation felt in the trackless wilds, but he also saw and reproduced the tranquility and expectancy of spring.

Maurice Cullen's artistic inclinations manifested themselves at an early age. At his home in Montreal lumps of clay half modelled and dozens of sketches scattered about indicated his natural bent. As a youth he was placed with a dry goods merchant but his parents realized a mistake had been made and were prevailed upon to let him study art. He attended the classes of Philippe Hebert, noted Canadian sculptor. Mr. Hebert suggested he go to Paris.

He had no sooner started in his studies than he realized his forte was painting not sculpture and he joined the Ecole des Beaux Arts as a pupil of Elie Delaunay. He remained studying figures and landscape painting under this master for several years. Emphasis in those days in Paris was placed on outdoor painting and this influence remained with Cullen for the rest of his life.

Despite the fact that his art had been definitely recognized in France and a fine future appeared to be awaiting him there Cullen returned to Canada.

He began to paint urban scenes, such as "The St. Lawrence Market at Night," "Montreal Harbor," and "The Blizzard, Craig Street," and some ice-cutting scenes on the St. Lawrence. But he was soon to surrender to the appeal of the Laurentians with their frozen or thawing streams and lakes. Among his earliest works in this field is a canvas in the Toronto Art Gallery which was painted entirely out-of-doors in winter.

The first glimmer of Canadian appreciation of his art came in 1899 when Cullen was elected as an associate of the Royal Canadian Academy. It brought in few commissions, however, and Cullen said once in discussing this phase of his life, "there were eight more years of dodging the wolf after that." In 1907 he was elected a full member of the academy and he may be said to have won complete recognition as a great painter when in 1910 the National Gallery of Canada acquired one of his works. A Laurentian landscape he sent to the International Exhibition at St. Louis was warmly praised by the critics and awarded a bronze medal in the same year. For more than 20 years after that Cullen turned out pictures of his beloved Laurentians regularly and so great was his vogue that frequently he had as many as 20 unexecuted orders on hand. On one occasion a representative of a New York firm offered to purchase an entire exhibition of his pictures, but Cullen refused. He wanted his works to go into the homes of Canadians who had bought his pictures in the past.

Cullen once said his material ambition was to own "a studio of my own, a shack in the mountains, an acre for a garden of flowers, and every winter heavy with snow." He realized it and lived and worked in ideal surroundings. His home at Chamblay consisted of an old stone house with a studio and capacious flower garden nearby. The rapids in the Richelieu River roared within 20 feet of his studio. In the mountains was a shack where he spent months in the autumn and spring and from which he set out on trips which were to produce sketches for the dozens of masterful oils and pastels which bear his name.

A signal honor was paid Cullen when the Government of Quebec in 1931 held a retrospective exhibition of his work at the Ecole des Beaux Arts in Montreal. Fifty canvases collected showing the sweep and of his skill.

FAMOUS ARTIST DIES AT CHAMBLY

Maurice Cullen, R.C.A.,
Was Noted For His Laurentian Landscapes

Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., painter whose winter landscapes of the Laurentians have become famous about the art world, died early this morning at his home in Chamblay Canton, Que. He was 68 years old and had been ill for more than a year.

Born in Newfoundland, he started out in trade with a dry goods merchant as a youth, but later persuaded his parents that he wished to go to art school. Here in Montreal he attended the classes of Philippe Hebert, the noted Canadian sculptor, who urged him to continue his studies in Paris.

STUDIED IN PARIS.

In that city Maurice Cullen discovered that painting rather than sculpture was his metier and he became a pupil of Elie Delaunay. After his studies were over Mr. Cullen travelled over Europe and North Africa, returning to Paris in 1894 when he sent his first picture to the Salon. The summer landscape was not only accepted but accorded the honor of being "hung on the line." In the following year he painted the first of the long line of winter landscapes which have come from his brush and crayons. It was a snowy scene in Brittany and after exhibition it was bought by the French Government.

In the same year he was elected associate of the Societe des Beaux Arts and the French Government soon after bought another of his pictures.

It became apparent that Maurice Cullen was headed for a successful career in Paris. But he wanted to return to Montreal and this he did plunging forthwith into a desperate fight against the general apathy of Canadians to his work.

It was not until 1899 that he was made an associate of the Royal Canadian Academy and even after this Mr. Cullen used to say "there were eight more years of dodging the wolf" until in 1907 he was made a full member of the Academy and won full recognition.

He had in the meantime become a lover of the Laurentians in all seasons of the year, but it is his winter landscapes painted there that were in greatest demand. Many of them he actually painted in their entirety out of doors and when the weather was too cold he worked with crayons.

His home at Chamblay Canton, within 20 feet of the Richelieu River was close to many scenes of beauty perpetuated by him on canvas. His shack in the mountains was the center from which he made many trips of pictorial exploration.

HONORED BY GOVERNMENT

During the war while his four step sons were serving in the army—one of them John, was killed—Mr. Cullen was commissioned by the Canadian Government to do paintings of the war in France. In 1931 the Quebec Government honored him by holding a retrospective exhibition of his work at the Ecole des Beaux Arts in Montreal.

Mr. Cullen was a partial invalid for many years and he owed his remarkable capacity for out of doors work to the manner in which his wife managed to look after him. Mrs. Cullen survives him as do three step sons and one daughter. The sons are Edward, William and Robert Pilot, the latter being an artist also and and A.R.C.A. and Mrs. (Capt.) Byrne of St. John's, Newfoundland.

The funeral services will take place tomorrow at 2 p.m. in the chapel of Jos. C. Wray & Bro., Mountain street, and interment will be made in Mount Royal Cemetery.

AN APPRECIATION

CANADIAN artists are one of its most eminent exponents and Canada an artist of the first rank through the death of Maurice Cullen. As an interpreter of the Quebec scene he stood head and shoulders above his contemporaries, particularly in his treatment of the Canadian winter landscape. It has been said of him by critics of international standing that he was perhaps the greatest painter of ice and snow of his generation. Certain it is that he could portray such phenomena as the reflections of light in ice and the color tinges lent vast sweeps of snowclad field and stream by sky and cloud with a master's hand.

He was intensely proud of his adopted province—by birth he was a Newfoundlander—and he never tired of paying tribute to the beauties of Quebec, through all the seasons, though his favorite period was the winter time. He was a first-class draughtsman, and he always insisted upon this as a primary essential to good painting. The brilliance of his color work and the breadth of his treatment of landscapes commanded the admiration not only of his fellow-artists in Canada but of many notable art critics abroad. In Paris his reputation stood high, and he was regarded as one of the outstanding landscape painters of the North American continent.

Tempting offers were made to him from time to time to settle outside Canada, even to sell a whole exhibition of his pictures; but he loved his Laurentians and would not leave Quebec, and he always wanted those who had encouraged him in his early years to possess the best work of his mature age. Socially, he was a man of unusual charm, enjoying the warm friendship of a wide circle, and himself a host of great generosity and kindly ways. He will be sorely missed, but he leaves behind him a legacy that will grow in value with the passing of the years.

MINISTER MAKES EULOGY

Rev. Lawrence Clare Pays Tribute to Principles and Art of Noted
Painter

Simplicity marked the service yesterday at the funeral of the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., as it had marked the character of the well-known Canadian artist, and among the large gathering at the chapel of Jos. C. Wray and Bro. Mountain street, were many fellow artists, architects, pupils and patrons of Canadian art.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Lawrence Clare, of the Church of the Messiah, who in a short eulogy told of the effect of Mr. Cullen's work and the quality of his personality as he had known it. The front of the chapel was aglow with the color of many flowers, the tributes of friends and admirers to the genius of the painter.

"He left an impression of such simplicity of type and of faithfulness to his own calling," said Mr. Clare, describing a visit to Mr. Cullen last year at Chamblay Canton, and in the reference to his independence of the world about him the Minister said, "the artist can be just as free from the world as the saint."

"Mr. Cullen was an artist, and a great one. It was his life's work to convey his sense of life by means of great skill in the application of color. In each picture he realized an experience afresh. There are artists and artists—some who keep so near to nature that they emulate photography, and others who keep so near to themselves that they subject nature to almost any conceivable distortion. There are various schools of art which excommunicate each other. Mr. Cullen was faithful both to himself, for each picture conveys delight, and to nature. In making his pictures an expression of delight in nature, Mr. Cullen joined in that kind of praise which reached its highest expression in the Canticle of the Sun, written by Saint Francis of Assisi."

After quoting three apt stanzas, the minister said: "I hold that an artist is necessarily a happy man. He has the delight in skill, the delight in self expression, and the delight in losing himself in natural beauty, with a preoccupation that is, perhaps, more than even happiness."

"He has passed," said the Rev. Mr. Clare in conclusion, "yet not all is taken away. There remain his pictures. His spirit is in his work. They compel an unclouded remembrance of him, so that there lifts from his memory the shadow of death. In those pictures he added something to nature which, after all, comes to its fruition in our reception. He lent us his eyes, trained us to his own responses. A life like that suggests that matter is not triumphant, for throughout he has been subordinating it to the artistic spirit."

PALATIAL MANSION DESTROYED IN FIRE

Priceless Paintings Lost
by Capt. Tremayne—
Narrow Escapes

PERRANARWORTHAL, Cornwall, Eng., April 5.—(A.P.)—The palatial country mansion "Carlew," owned by the noted polo player, Capt. Charles Tremayne, was wrecked early today by a fire which also destroyed Rembrandt's priceless painting, "Pontius Pilate."

No one was injured, but the occupants of the house escaped only narrowly.

Several members of the Tremayne family and their guests were trapped in various places in the mansion. Both the Captain and Mrs. Tremayne were driven back by the flames when they tried to escape in their night-clothes over the roof. They finally got out down the back staircase.

Mrs. A. H. C. Swinton was caught by the fire in her bedroom but was carried out down a ladder.

Rembrandt's painting was not the only old master to be destroyed; two paintings by Murillo were burned as were many valuable books.

Maurice Cullen

An Appreciation.

In the death of Maurice Cullen Canada has lost one of her noblest gentlemen, and the world of art a genius whose influence is yet to be measured. His attitude in his last long sickness was as true to the character of the man as his whole life. In circumstances to try the soul of any man, he scarcely uttered a word of complaint, his concern being more for the welfare of others than for himself. It is pleasing to state that he passed away peacefully as in a dream. One would like to quote Lander's beautiful lines as being singularly appropriate for his passing:

"Nature I've loved, and next to Nature, Art;
I warmed both hands before the fire of life;
It sinks—and I am ready to depart."

In the long siege of ill-health, Cullen never lost his sense of humor, which was of the dry quiet kind, and always kindly in intent. He made friends by the sheer charm of his personality, even as a patient. Discipline had to relent when Cullen wished a favor. We used to wonder what he thought about in his hours of dreaming. Not so long ago I had taken him a photograph of one of his last great pictures; holding it before him for a few moments, he looked at it with reminiscent eyes, and said, very quietly, "Perhaps I shall bring fame to one little river" (the Cache). Such a perfect Cullenesque remark came to a little river... not to himself.

Among his brother artists he had many friends, for with him there were none of those barriers that often mar professional friendships. He was free from prejudices. Though his criticism of the work of others was always sincere and sound, he would, at every opportunity say a constructive word, and found joy in the whole-hearted praise of any achievement deserving it. Students who came to him for help and advice were always sure of a generous and sympathetic response, and the humblest were never scorned. Cullen was extremely catholic in his views on Art, and recognized that others, seeing differently to himself, had found the truth at the bottom of their own particular wall; perhaps were looking with different eyes at the same bright star.

We have sat on the deck of a ship with Cullen, talking under the mid-Atlantic stars; in Paris, at "The Dome," with Gagnon and other friends; at his shack in the Laurentians, and at his studio at Chamby, and he was always the same. His personality transcended environment, or was in harmony with any. He never flashed cheap wit, nor displayed the surface smartness of clever words; you felt as comfortable with him as with a tree. He was a nature-lover of the Thoreau type; not nature as a spectacle, but as a revelation through beauty of the oneness of the whole. Thus a daisy could epitomize all flowers, or Mount Tremblant all the mountains of the world. To many people Cullen might have been inarticulate, but to the fool he would always give "the soft answer that turneth away wrath." Thus to the lady who suggested that he should paint something more exciting than a snow-clad vale, "such as a high-powered automobile dashing down the road," Cullen merely smiled, and answered: "Well, think of the trouble I'd have jumping out of the way of it!" To the critic who said, "I never saw a mountain look like that," he quietly answered, "Perhaps not, but that's the way I did." He would give eyes to the blind, not condemn them for their blindness.

Our loss is a void in the heart, that words, which smother feelings, are inadequate to express; we have lost one of life's richest treasures... the perfect friend: Maurice Cullen, he who had the power to enrich our lives by the great example of his own.

ART IN REVIEW

Quebec Houses
In Pictures by
G. Delfosse

An exhibition of pictures by Horatio Walker, R.C.A. (retired), is to be opened at the galleries of Scott and Sons, Drummond street, next Saturday, April 7th, and will contain some important examples of Mr. Walker's work. Though he has been for years a resident of this province, on the Isle of Orleans, only few of his pictures have been seen here in recent years and it is understood that no exhibition entirely of his work has ever been given in Montreal before.

What is described as the biggest art school in the world, a school for unemployed carried on by unemployed, is holding its first winter term in New York, with an enrollment of some 3,500 men and women of ages from 18 to 70.

"Bankers without jobs, dowagers without money, plumbers with no work, and college graduates who find the business world unresponsive stood in line to register in a public school building within the shadow of midtown skyscrapers.

Teaching the classes are more unemployed; well known artists who used to get $2,000 for a portrait or a landscape, fashionable illustrators who in the boom days earned $1,000 a week. The former vice-president of a bank who collected art and antiques as an avocation and who lost his fortune in the crash, is supervisor of the school and says he enjoys it more than banking. A doctor of Arts from the Sorbonne in Paris, who used to be a highly paid architectural designer, is chief counselor.

Restoring old paintings, making marionettes, advertising layouts, Oriental rug making, etching, sculpture, watch making—these are only a few of the subjects offered."

Considerable reconstruction and redecoration is now going on at the Tate Gallery in London—the National Gallery of British Art, which now contains also modern works of art of other countries and particularly of France. A new and quite interesting feature of the decorative work is the material which has been chosen as a wall covering suitable to show up pictures. The choice of material for this purpose is never very easy and the Office of Works has discovered a pattern of tweed, which is said to fit the case admirably.

More important than this decoration is the constructive work which is being done; the galleries which are now used for exhibiting sculpture are being rearranged and a new large sculpture gallery is being built. This care for the proper exhibition of modern sculptural work is something rather new in English public galleries.

Two modern pictures of some reputation have just come into the possession of the National Gallery in London, though they are at present not gifts to the gallery, but "indefinite loans."

The pictures by Georges Delfosse which are now being shown in Eaton's galleries are nearly all views of old buildings, some of which no longer exist, in different parts of this province. Many of these have historic interest, as the places where famous Canadians of the past were born or lived and nearly all of them are very typical examples of the simple, comfortable houses which are so characteristic of Quebec. Mr. Delfosse's pictures of them are therefore good both as illustrations and as memorials; they have the value also of recording buildings which are fast disappearing; many of them have gone already and some of these pictures are reconstructions made from old prints.

In addition to these interesting records Mr. Delfosse shows one pastel portrait of a man and a number of small pictures and sketches, in oil, like the pictures of houses, of places in the neighborhood of Montreal, on the mountain, on the back river, on St. Helen's Island and elsewhere. Some of these are very attractive little pictures, and particularly several of richly colored autumn scenery.

Pictorial
Photography

A collection which fills two of the galleries at Eaton's may owe its exhibition, in part, to the interest which was aroused by the English photographs sent to Canada by the Times of London and shown here not long ago. Saturday Night of Toronto has been moved to show that something of the same kind can be done in this country, and is fairly justified in doing so by the quality and general interest of the photographs by "Jay" which form the present exhibition. These photographs are all of places or events of some importance or interest and many of them are attractive pictures as well. The quality of the photography is all the more remarkable since all or most of the pictures seem to be enlargements of small shots taken with a "candid camera," one of the small cameras which can be used on Governor Generals and other such people without drawing attention to itself. It takes skill for the user of such a camera to get the depth and definition which are to be seen in many of these photographs.

The subjects of them cover many sides of life in Toronto and Montreal and some other places in eastern Canada. There are a number of good pictures of water, skies and ships in the loans. They are Manet's "Bar aux Folies Bergères" and Cézanne's "Montagne Sainte Victoire,"—two important additions to the gallery's collection of French pictures.

Montreal harbor and on the St. Lawrence. In Toronto the races at the Woodbine course and the Canadian National Exhibition appear several times; there are views of the Seignurie Club and groups of members of both the Conservative and the Liberal summer schools, and, among the interior views, are some of the new Royal Ontario Museum and several remarkable pictures of stage scenes at last year's Drama Festival at Ottawa.

ANNUAL EXHIBITION

Interesting Display Presented at Ontario Royal Museum.

AN INTIMATE APPEAL
Variety of Subjects and Treatment Shown by Artists.

By PEARL MCCARTHY.

The annual exhibition of the Society of Canadian Painter-Etchers, one of the most considerable art events of the year, opens to-day at the Royal Ontario Museum. This organization has guarded its standards with care, and superior work is found in the collection of etchings, color etchings, aquatints, drypoints, mezzotints, linoleum blocks, wood blocks and combined media.

The prints have special interest for the home owner because, for one thing, these good artists have explored the possibilities of their arts so as to give variety of pleasures in pictures which have an intimate appeal. They have brought diverse sorts of subjects within their treatment. Specially constructed cases in the print room of the museum aid good presentation of the pictures.

Stanley Turner, president of the society, is represented by excellent etchings. Woodruff K. Aykroyd displays aesthetic sense as well as architect's precision in fine etchings of European subjects, the lacy beauty of "Church of St. Ouen, Rouen" being outstanding. Leonard Hutchinson shows delightful color harmonies in linoleum block landscapes of a poetic touch and also exhibits woodblocks.

Nicholas Hornyansky is represented by aquatints and etchings which infuse reality with a hint of the mystical. S. H. Maw presents the genuinely architectural aspect. G. A. Reid gets singularly rich effects in drypoint landscapes.

Color Etchings.

Among the most telling pictures are the color etchings by which Owen Staples (who combines the qualities of learned traditionalist and explorer in art), depicts the texture of a church interior or the light in a scene of ships landing. These prints carry the spirit of the scene without being trickily atmospheric. Mezzotint and etching are also used with authority by this artist.

Design and color are honored in the linoleum color prints of flowers by Mary Wrinch.

W. F. G. Godfrey takes an outstanding place in the show by woodblocks of decided excellence.

Human character has been embodied in etchings by P. J. Edgar of Winnipeg, among whose exhibits is "Charwomen." T. G. Greene's ability in drypoint is again shown in pictures of horses. The lithographs of Charles Goldhamer present the Ontario landscape or the woodland vista with spontaneity and happy verve of feeling for design. Portraits in drypoint and etching represent a new member, John Byrne. A most interesting corner is that devoted to the very fine bookplate etchings by Stanley Harrod.

James W. Lowe and C. J. Travers, who present ship subjects with individual treatment; W. W. Alexander, Cecilia MacKinnon, John J. Barry, W. P. Lawson, Harry D. Wallace are among exhibitors in this collection which will remain at the Royal Ontario Museum until March 20 and will later be on view at the Robert Simpson Co. galleries.

Lectures at the museum are to be given on March 1, 5 p.m., W. W. Alexander on "Canadian Etchers"; March 6, 10 a.m., demonstration on mezzotint and aquatint by Owen Staples; March 8, 5 p.m., demonstration and lecture on etchings by Owen Staples. It is expected that there will also be a lecture by W. F. G. Godfrey on woodblocks.

du Maurier Pass.

62nd Year Follow-

HAD NOTABLE CAREER

Known as Both Producer and Actor—Son of George du Maurier, Author of "Trilby"

By THOMAS T. CHAMPION
(Canadian Press Staff Writer)

London, April 11.—As actor, producer and manager one of the outstanding personalities in the English theatrical world, Sir Gerald du Maurier died today following an operation in a nursing home. His sudden death came as a great shock for although he had entered the hospital earlier this month his progress had been regarded as satisfactory. He was 61 years of age.

Sir Gerald came of artistic stock. His father, George du Maurier, was a famous artist with Punch and the author of "Trilby," "Peter Ibbetson" and "The Martian." It was just about the time "Trilby" created a sensation that Gerald left Harrow to appear at the Garrick Theatre. Valuable association with Sir Johnstone Forbes-Robertson and Beer-bohm Tree followed, after which the actor, returning from tour, was the original "Captain Hook" of "Peter Pan" in London.

Old theatregoers also remember his creation of the part of "Raffles." Sir Gerald in later years proved himself as adept at producing and managing as acting, while only three years ago he scored a great moving picture success with "Escape."

To his many distinctions might be added his discovery of the celebrated actress Gladys Cooper. When the latter was appearing in a tiny part in "Milestones," Gerald du Maurier suggested to the late Sir Squire Bancroft that she be given the lead in a revival of "Diplomacy." "Are you mad?" demanded Bancroft.

But Sir Squire went away and during his absence du Maurier drilled Gladys Cooper and another unknown—Owen Nares—to such effect that after the first performance Sir Squire, a dean of the English stage, went back of the curtain and kissed them both with delight.

OF ARTISTIC STOCK.

Sir Gerald was born at Hampstead, England, March 26, 1873. At 21, he made his first stage appearance at the Garrick Theatre in the play, "The Old Jew."

He went to North America in 1896, playing in "The Dancing Girl," "Hamlet," "The Seats of the Mighty," "The Red Lamp," "Trilby," and "King Henry IV."

One of his big successes was scored at the Hicks Theatre in May, 1907, when he appeared as Montgomery Brewster in "Brewster's Millions." He became associated with Frank Curzon in the management of Wyndham's Theatre and opened in September, 1910, as John Frampton in "Nobody's Daughter." As his fame grew steadily, he was called upon to appear at many command performances and played in a number of productions arranged for benefits.

Sir Gerald interrupted his brilliant theatrical career in 1918 when he joined the army as a cadet in the Irish Guards. He did not reappear on the stage until September 8, 1919, as John Ingleby Cordways in "The Choice," at Wyndham's Theatre.

PLAYED MANY ROLES.

He terminated his managerial association with Wyndham's after 15 years and went to St. James's Theatre, where he became associated with Gilbert Miller in 1926. He appeared there as Lord Arthur Dilling in "The Last of Mrs. Cheyne." The play ran for more than a year. Sir Gerald and Miller ended their association in 1929.

He was a tremendously hard worker. Besides producing all the plays in which he appeared at Wyndham's from 1910, St. James's and the Playhouse, he produced a number of plays running in different theatres up to 1932.

Honors were heaped on him from many sides. At various times he served as president of the Actors' Orphanage Fund, as president of Denby Hall, home for aged actors and actresses, and as president of the Actors' Benevolent Fund.

He received the honor of knighthood in the New Year's honors of 1922.

He was author of "A Royal Rival" and part-author with his brother Guy, of "Charles I. and II." and of "The Dancers."

Sir Gerald was featured in the motion picture "Escape" three years ago and appeared in "Lord Chamberlain's Lady" in 1932.

Major Guy Du Maurier, brother of Sir Gerald was the author in 1909 of "An Englishman's Home," an exciting play which dealt dramatically with an imaginary invasion of England "by the Northlanders" and by implication was a plea for preparedness for the Great War in which Major Guy was destined to give his life.

Scene Before Wayside Shrine Is Important Example of Canadian Painter—
Varied Collection

An exhibition of works by Horatio Walker, R.C.A., N.A., now showing in the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street, is an event in Montreal art circles, since this sterling painter holds only occasional shows. No such comprehensive collection of the work of this distinguished Canadian artist has been shown in the city, since the memorable retrospective exhibition held in the Ecole des Beaux Arts.

Walker—atill active with his brush at 76 years—has a wide following of admirers both here and in the United States. It was in the United States that years ago recognition came to him and few of the noted galleries and private collections across the border lack examples. He handles his paint with authority, is splendidly equipped as a draughtsman and is a sound colorist. To these qualities he adds deep understanding of the rural scenes and life on the Island of Orleans, a place that has claimed him for its own during many years of his life.

From this Island below Quebec comes the inspiration for the work included in the present exhibition. In these paintings Walker gets down to the very bottom of things, to the simple, rugged core of life as it is lived by the natives, and lingering in front of the pictures, the visitor captures the real feeling that lies therein. This undeniably is Quebec through and through.

At one end of the gallery hangs the large "Deo Gratias," Walker's intensely human and spiritual picture of a farmer and his wife stopping before the wayside shrine at the close of day. The figure of Christ hangs from the cross, and before Him with bowed heads stand the dark figures of the farmer and his companion. Behind is the old cart and horse, half-visible in the darkness. There is a deep spiritual quality in this painting.

A VARIED COLLECTION.

There are 34 examples of Walker's work in the exhibition. Two other large paintings, "Horses at the Trough" and "Ploughing—ile d'Orleans" are included, the latter one of the artist's recent paintings. In "Horses at the Trough," his abilities as draughtsman and colorist are manifest. The horses in the picture are sturdy, rugged animals, true to the soil of the island.

In his smaller pictures, of which several are watercolors, one catches again the simplicity of the native life. One winter scene, "The Provincial Postman," in which the postman has stopped with his sleigh on the winter road and is delivering mail to the nearby farm, is particularly striking. There is a small and effective watercolor, entitled "Turkeys."

An unusual work of interest to students and picture-lovers is a single panel bearing, four studies—a lime kiln at moonrise, a man sawing wood, early morning and a group of calves.

Horatio Walker shows marked knowledge in depicting life on the land and in the bush. In choice of subjects he is open-minded and has no favored season. His range is wide—from noble oxen hauling ploughs, to sows and their litter slumbering in the shade; farmer engaged in the chores about the farms; the felling and hauling of trees; the arduous work of "making" firewood; sheep cropping pastures and flocks of turkeys on foraging. In those works where the element of piety enters he presents his subjects with a simplicity and directness that reveal sympathy and understanding. All these phases have for many years proved congenial to his brush and have contributed to his development in interpreting these aspects of life in rural Quebec.

Pictures by Horatio Walker
Shown at Scott's

It is strange, but it seems to be a fact that the work of Horatio Walker, a painter who, though born in Ontario, has lived and painted for about fifty years in this province, is less generally known in Montreal than that of several foreign painters. He has in the past, though not in recent years, sent pictures to Academy exhibitions, but to hardly any other exhibitions in the city, and the collection which is now being shown at Scott and Sons gallery on Drummond St., is understood to be the first to be brought here of work which is much better known in Toronto and New York and even in Europe.

The majority of these pictures are of scenes in this province and specially in the Isle of Orleans, where Mr. Walker has lived for many years, and they cover a period of nearly fifty years. The earliest of them are dated in the eighties and the latest of them in the present year, and it is interesting to notice how little change there has been in Mr. Walker's subjects or in his way of painting them in that long time. The most recent of the pictures are very light in tone and the same is true of one of the earliest, the watercolor of Ste. Famille, Isle of Orleans, a picture full of light, dated 1887.

All but a few of the pictures are landscapes, but landscapes with human interest, which is sometimes a little sentimental. The largest and most important work in the exhibition is essentially a figure subject, of a man and woman standing in prayer before a wayside cross, which is brightly lighted by the moon. The figures and the horse behind them are almost black against the moonlit sky and splashes of moonlight break the darkness of the foreground. There are also a few figure studies and two flower pictures, one in water color and the other in oil, and both very good.

Of the landscapes some of the smaller ones are among the best. A very good one is the "Frosty Morning," a pure landscape of a red sunrise seen through trees with hoarfrost on the grass in the foreground; another is "The Provincial Postman," a soft and simple picture of figures and an ox-cart on a snowy road. There is an attractive street scene at St. Petronville, with trees and snow, which is dated 1890, and it is interesting to compare it with the later picture of "Sous le Cap at Quebec."

Animals have an important place in many of Mr. Walker's works and, among animals, he has always had a particular liking for the pictorial value of pigs. The Art Association has a picture of pigs by him and even better is one of the largest and latest pictures in this exhibition in an orchard of flowering trees, a bright and cheerful picture. Cattle appear in several pictures; there is a very good study of a yoke of oxen, and another team is in the large "Ploughing—ile d'Orleans," a picture full of light with little difference of color between the soil, the oxen and the ploughmen. Other more interesting cattle pictures are the "Barnyard Corner," in which there are some pleasant farm buildings and "La Batture" in which the cows are in a wet meadow by the side of the river, an attractive study of moist atmosphere. "Horses at the Trough" is a large, pleasing and rather sentimental picture of a peaceful scene, and there are fine horses in several other pictures. One of the most notable things in the exhibition is a watercolor sketch of a flock of turkeys in a brown field and almost as good is another watercolor of a huddle of fowls under a hedge.

There are many other things worth seeing in this interesting collection, such as the two pictures of "Wood Gatherers" in Autumn and Winter, and the "Clearing of a Field," which is a study for the first of these, the sunny sky in "Autumn," the gay "Path Through the Woods," the soft sketch of a "Sandy Pitt" and the effects of moonrise in "Lime Burners" and "A Lock at Night."

The exhibition, which opened at the end of last week, is to remain open till the 28th of this month.

News of Art
Here and Abroad

A collection of paintings and drawings by a group of Montreal artists is being exhibited, by invitation, at the Queen's University, Kingston, on the 18th. The artists whose work is included in this exhibition are: R. W. Pilot, A.R.C.A., Lill, Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., Adair Hebert, A.R.C.A., H. Leslie Smith, Aleksander Bercovitch, Prudence Heward, T. R. MacDonald and Ernest Newman.

The Cornwall Art Association, organized this season, has been giving a series of exhibitions and concert. In January there was an exhibition of works by Canadian painters, lent by the National Gallery of Canada, in connection with which two lectures on Canadian paintings were given by Arthur Lismer, and in March a second collection of pictures, also lent by the National Gallery, was shown.

The storm about the mural decoration by Rivera in the Rockefeller Centre at New York, after dying down for a time, has lately come to life again. The owners of the building, who did not like the decoration, objected chiefly to the inclusion in it of a portrait of Lenin, and the picture was covered up with canvas for some months. At the end of that time the canvas was taken down and the destruction of the picture began, which started a discussion about the old question of the right of an owner to destroy or injure the work of an artist. The question is more easily discussed when the work of art is a portable object; it is rather another matter when it is part of a building and especially if the building is a place of business. In this case it is said that the decoration had to be removed to allow of some structural alterations to that part of the building and the owners claim that the feelings of the artist

Works of Pioneer Canadian Painter Preserve Conditions of Early Settlers' Days—Versatility Revealed

Good news to picture-lovers is the announcement that the exhibition of paintings by Cornelius Krieghoff, being held in the Lecture Hall and Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal, is to remain open to the public until April 22. This collection, shown through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, has drawn a large attendance, and is proving one of the most popular shows in recent years. It reveals this painter's art in its varied aspects and also indicates the treasures owned by collectors in Quebec and Ontario who have loaned their works by this pioneer painter.

Krieghoff occupies a place of high esteem with the connoisseurs of this province in that he found his most congenial subjects here and his brush has recorded for posterity phases of French-Canadian life that with the years are becoming more and more a memory. Recalling his period—1815 to 1872—the quality of his work is generally high, and it is a matter for congratulation that at a time when painters were a rarity in the Dominion he should have devoted his undoubted talents to recording the life about him instead of setting down subjects foreign to this land. While the precise, detailed and highly finished type of painting is of another day, Krieghoff, despite the careful attention paid to every part of his canvases, succeeds in imparting a good general effect. This is particularly true in the scenes of early pioneer life—clearings with rude cabins and out-buildings in hilly country. He is apt in the handling of spacious skies and in suggesting great distances. In the drawing of his horses, oxen and figures he is adequate and in the placing of his groups he is generally happy.

OF HISTORICAL VALUE.

As is inevitable in an exhibition of this kind, repetition of subject cannot be avoided—patrons wanted a certain type of picture and their demands were met. These works are invaluable in depicting the conditions of the painter's day—costumes of the period, the vehicles and types of harness employed, and in the incidental objects of a settler's home there is painstaking detail. In a province now scored with good roads and distance of small account with the advent of the automobile, these works in some regards are as true today as when they were painted. In some of the paintings the outdoor ovens are handy to the home and the chores of the settler remain little changed—the ice of stream and lake has to be chopped to let down the water bucket, wood has to be prepared for fuel and hauled from the lot, the odd deer is a welcome addition to the larder and streams yield fish. The most marked change is evident in some of the scenes off the beaten track, where Indians camp at portages—the introduction of store clothes and the "civilization" of that race having removed much that was picturesque in costume and mode of life. Then, too, the scenes of robust revelry outside country inns, with snowball fights, upset sleighs and exhilarated figures, undoubtedly true of the period, seem at this day of greater refinement and better taste a trifle boisterous. These works in which, according to the modern idea, the interest is scattered reveal a great amount of skill in arrangement and detail.

This show uncovers an aspect of Krieghoff's art not so commonly encountered—his talent as a portrait painter. One of John Budden, a friend and patron of the artist during his residence in Quebec, is a capital performance, and the more formal one of Dr. Arnoldi is a distinctly dignified work.

In his landscapes, generally with figures, Krieghoff is effective in arrangement and lighting. Besides his paintings of pioneer's cabins, he found congenial subjects in scenes of duck hunting, Indian encampments, log jams, Indians hunting moose and deer, Montorency Falls in winter, with citizens driving in their sleighs on the smooth river below the cataract; the passage of the mail-boat over icefloes opposite Quebec, drivers cheating toll-gate keepers of their fee, the old fort at Chambly before it fell into ruin, scenes at the portage. Indians in council, still life and figure subjects of an anecdotal nature.

SAW SERVICE IN FLORIDA.

Marius Barbeau, of the National Museum of Canada, who contributes the introduction to the catalogue, has been engaged on researches in connection with Krieghoff's life and sets Amsterdam, Holland, as the place of the painter's birth in 1815. He travelled through Europe as musician and painter, and landed in New York at the age of 22. He enlisted in the United States army, served in the Florida campaign against the Seminoles, and soon after 1840 settled in Longueville. He married a French-Canadian of that place, and had one daughter. He moved to Quebec in 1853, left for the West about 1867, and lived with his married daughter at Chicago till the time of his death in 1872.

Women Artists

Exhibit at Eaton's Gallery
Star April 18/34

Pictures by eight Canadian women, all of them people whose work is already well known, fill three galleries at Eaton's this week and next. Several of these ladies have two characteristics in common; they are lovers of sunshine and they have a distinct liking for boats, particularly gayly colored fishing boats, and the exhibitions as a whole derives a pleasant brightness from these.

Some of the best boats are to be seen in the pictures of Miriam R. Holland, who has a specially good group of Brittany fishing boats. Nearly all her pictures are of places on or near the sea coast, in the Maritime Provinces or in Cornwall, with wharves and houses seen in the pleasantest kind of weather, and there are a number of these; her landscapes are not quite so successful.

The most striking works by Phyllis M. Percival are some views of fields of corn and cabbages, etc.—nice color effects broadly painted with a good realism. Her largest picture here is "Winter thaw" a true and well planned study of a brook running between snow-covered banks; she has also two good pictures of "Blue Rocks" with broad and effective painting of sea and shore. The best of her boat pictures is one, strong in color and design, of fishing boats in Lunenburg harbor.

Two larger pictures by Rita Mount are "La Grande Cote" a fine, atmospheric landscape, and "Riviere aux Renards," which is rather similar and almost as good. There is some very good color in the marine called "North winds, Gaspe" and boats appear in an effective sketch of "Fishing boats, Barachois," seen in a mist.

The coast pictures of Mary Grant are rather unequal; two of the best of them are a happy study of surf breaking on rocks on the New Brunswick coast, and a picture of the Bathing Beach at Grand Manan. Jean Munro's pictures have a certain tenderness which makes them stand out less than many other pictures in the exhibition. Two of them are fairly large pictures; one of these is a view of a Cornish fishing town, the better is a view of a canal and bridge in Venice, seen in a pale and rather watery sunlight which is both pleasant and true. Wonders of New Art in New York

While artists in the United States have been suffering so severely from the depression that the Federal Government has had to take a hand in helping to make work for them, many people, who used not to be artists and perhaps are not artists even now, have been occupying their enforced leisure by trying their hands at painting, and some thousands of results have just been poured out on New York.

Of three exhibitions which have been opened in New York in the last few weeks the largest is that of the Salons of America, which occupies a great space in the Rockefeller Centre. This is a society which seceded some years ago from the Society of Independent Artists and its exhibition contains some 5,000 pictures by more than 1,500 artists and can probably claim to be the largest show of pictures in the world.

The Society of Independent Artists refused to hold its exhibition at the Rockefeller Centre this year, remembering what happened to Rivera's mural picture at that place and fearing censorship by the Rockefellerers. A photograph of this mural decoration is one of the exhibits. Though this show is not nearly so large as that of the Salons—it has a mere 1,234 works by 530 artists—it is otherwise as striking as an exhibition can be, on account of the color and design of its pictures and, still more, of the subjects chosen. One conspicuous picture is of John D. Rockefeller, Sr., and Diego Rivera shaking hands, each with a thumb to his nose; this is called "reconciliation." Many pictures have some reference to Hitler; one of Hitler and Einstein is called "The ignominy of the 20th century," and another in which both these men appear is called "The Nazi Whip." Yet another picture which must be a little remarkable is "Fascist salute to a nudist colony." One of the most modernistic works in the show is a piece of "sculpture" (?), called "El picador," which is a horse and its rider built up of stovepipe, steel wool and rubber tubing.

Exhibitors at the Independent show are of all kinds, from a Wall Street attorney to an up-state blacksmith. The Salons exhibition also has work by caretakers and elevator boys, but it has, too, pictures by a number of Academicians of the National Academy.

Yet a third of these startling art exhibitions is that of the Authors League of America, which is fitly described as "all wet," since all its pictures have something to do with the consumption of alcohol. There are pictures of speakeasies and saloons, but there are also a number of old pictures and prints showing good effect of winter atmosphere in the picture of St. James' Market.

There is very good drawing in the pastel landscapes and studies of trees by Winnifred D. Lewis and one of the best of them is of an old birch tree with branching trunks. The pictures of Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A., are typical of her work—views of familiar street scenes in Quebec and Montreal, painted in her well-known manner.

the evils of drink. It is not easy to say if the promotion of temperance or rejoicing at the repeal of prohibition are the motives of the picture call "Whoopie at Sloppy Joe's" and of another called "Vaudeville actor leaving his favorite bar," but the manager of the exhibition states that "we are neither for nor against, and equal prominence has been given to both sides."

Pictures by Jack Beder

Some works by a young Montreal painter are being shown, unfortunately in conditions of lighting which make some of them hard to see, at the Y.M.C.A. building on Mount Royal avenue. These works by Jack Beder are mostly oil sketches with a few drawings and, while they are unequal, there are many pieces of clever and successful work among them—things which are well worth exhibiting and give promise of still better work to come.

Many of the oil pictures are of Montreal street scenes, with plenty of variety in their subjects and the weather conditions, and Mr. Beder has shown good taste in his choice of views and in color and light that he has given to them. One of the best of these is the "Grey day" with a good effect of atmosphere, and the "Winter morning," of buildings on Metcalfe street standing against the sky is well seen and painted. There are some good sketches of the harbor and shipping, and "Old Quebec" is a good study of a street under snow. A water color street scene "Winter," is very soft and true.

The landscapes are fewer but some of them are just as good: "La Maison Fortin" and "Morning on Mount Royal" may be specially mentioned, and there is a very nice feeling in the slight sketch of an "Old Farm." The interior scenes and figure subjects are very unequal; of the latter a large drawing of a seated man is a fine piece of work; a study of a child's head is rather successful and, better still, is a strong study of a head of a "Young Indian." A study of a girl's head called "Sunlight" is a clever attempt at a difficult subject. The more outstanding interior pictures are the "Cafe scene," with a groupe of figures and "The duet," both good pieces of work.

ART GALLERIES GROWING

WE CONGRATULATE both the Toronto Art Gallery and the citizens of Toronto on the announcement that two large new rooms will immediately be added to the fine and useful structure which has been appended to the old Grange. They are needed and the Gallery will be able to put them to excellent use. The building of them will, it appears, be largely financed with government aid as a relief work; and we wonder whether it has occurred to the new Mayor of Montreal that something of the same kind could be done in the same way in his city. It would not, obviously, be in connection with the palatial but inexpansable building of the Montreal Art Association, which is fundamentally a species of rich men's club in the centre of the aristocratic residential area. But there is no reason why Montreal should not possess itself of a civic gallery, of less pretentious architecture, in a populous part of the city where it could serve the purposes of popular education as the Grange does and the present Montreal gallery can never do.

ART ASSOCIATION SPRING SHOW OPENS

Gazette April 19.
Private View Inaugurates
Exhibition Containing Over Five Hundred Works

DIVERSITY OF SUBJECTS

Entries Come From Artists
at Widely Distant Points
—General Effect of Collection Good

Greater interest shown in the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal by artists at widely different points brings plenty of variety to the 51st annual show which was inaugurated with a private view at the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street west, last night. Entries for this exhibition came from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan and the general quality of the work is encouraging. Over five hundred items are in the collection with, as usual, landscapes predominating.

Portraiture is worthily represented—Alphonse Jongers contributing four—Col. George Cantile in military uniform against a landscape background; Dr. Lionel Lindsay, Miss Jennie Webster, and J. E. Aldred. These subjects are painted with distinction. Lillias Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., shows "Portrait of Frada"—a girl in crimson, this color note being carried to the tinted fingernails. Her other oils are still-lives. Mrs. Adelaide Webster Donald has two works—"Jean in Brown" and a portrait of Miss Margaret Dorken. Adam Sherriff Scott signs three portraits, "Paul," "Alan Macnaughton" and "The Artist's Daughter"—the last a very spirited performance. "Portrait of Pianist, Sade Shapiro" is among the offerings of Aleksander Bercovitch. F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., has a portrait, "Mademoiselle Y.L.", which is a departure, as are two nudes of graceful form and pleasing color. He also shows a typical winter scene. C. de Guise-Hite has a self-portrait against a highly-colored background, and Henri Fabien has an arrangement in red—"Portrait of a Spanish Dancer." Stella Grier, A.R.C.A., shows a mother and child, and a portrait of Dr. J. Fleming Goodchild looking thoughtful in simple and dull surroundings. Edwin Holgate shows a "Portrait of A.E.S." and strongly painted nude bathers on a shore in "By the Lake." Ida M. Huddell has as a sister Miss Jessie Baillie, and Robert Mackay shows marked promise in his portrait of "Chinese Woman." Richard V. Major paints "Yvonne" in a cosy, home-like setting, and Kathleen Shackleton's skill as a portraitist in pastel is evidenced in "Lt.-Col. Walter Ray" and "Theodora." There are also good portrait drawings in the black and white section.

Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., shows an interesting painting of clouds in "The Lake" and Harold Beament shows sound drawing in "The Grey Barn." James E. Beckwith has freely handled watercolors, the smother of smoke being well suggested in "Factories." Archibald Browne, R.C.A., has rather sombre landscapes under the titles of "Tone Poems." Paul Caron, in fluid wash, has a group of four Quebec scenes with old buildings and figures. Alberta Cleland has snowscapes, and John F. Clymer has much gay color in his decorative work called, "Jarvanese Danc-ing Girls." Sound drawing and nice color mark the watercolors of A. Cunningham, and, besides a Paris scene, Georges Delfosse has a painting of old buildings. Charles De Belle, A.R.C.A., shows typical works in oil and pastel done with the usual delicacy. Alice Des Clayes, A.R.C.A., is effective in her "Ice Cutters on the St. Lawrence" and Berthe Des Clayes finds a harbor scene, old courtyard and calves congenial subjects.

Watercolor is competently handled by Arthur Drummond in "Perce Rock" and "Rocks at Perce." Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., shows his usual clean color and good design in his landscapes—"Spring" and "Autumn" being very true to season. Hortense M. Gordon, A.R.C.A., shows "In Port, Gloucester," and John F. Gordon, A.R.C.A., depicts a Maine fish wharf. J. L. Graham, A.R.C.A., finds congenial subjects at Bic and Murray Bay, and a surf scene on the Cape Breton coast has interested Mary Grant. Adrian Hebert, A.R.C.A., shows a winter scene with action—skaters and spectators on the lagoon in Lafontaine Park, which is clean in color and suggests a crisp sunny day. A. Y. Jackson shows two characteristic winter scenes and a of desolate hilly country, on "Labrador." Ronald Kerr has a values in his pastel called "March Sunshine," and Ruby Le-Boutillier, besides a carefully drawn glimpse of an old street in Quebec, shows nice arrangement and color in her glass bowl of daffodils and tulips. Winifred D. Lewis shows an advance in "Road to the Sugar Bush," and R. H. Lindsay pictures the glare of sun on snow in an oil called "The Old Farm." Jane C. Luke found a good subject in "Rockport Wharf," and Lorna Lomer Macaulay reveals skill with pastel in "On the St. Charles Road, Beaconsfield." Among the offerings of T. R. MacDonald, "Winter Street"—the doorway and windows of a shop is the most attractive. D. H. MacFarlane has a fresh watercolor done at Gaspe, and Betty May has a simple and satisfying view of fishing shacks at the same place.

H. Mabel May, A.R.C.A., sends three, of which "A Village Street" is the most engaging. David McGill has found Bala St. Paul fruitful of subjects, while Margaret McGill saw the picturesque in "Road to the Beach, Longueuil." Alfred E. Mickle, A.R.C.A., shows "A Fine Day, Charlevoix Co., P.Q." and Andre Morency employs fresh color in "Matinee, Mt. Royal." Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A., besides two sketches, has a vista of Ste. Cecile street, and Rita Mount shows her love for the Gaspe country. Jean Munro has a view of a city street and a view of wilder country in "The Road to Mount Tremblant." Frank L. Nicolet shows three effective watercolors and G. N. Norwell is decorative in "Autumn, Ottawa River." Elizabeth Styring Nutt, A.R.C.A., has an Old Country scene called "A Moorland Stream," and Phyllis M. Percival shows strong brushwork and bold color in a group that includes "Celery Field, St. Martin." Hal Ross Perrigard, A.R.C.A., sounds the historic note with "Montcalm's Headquarters, Quebec," and is equally effective in "Country Homestead." Leslie A. Perry shows sympathy with the Laurentian country in "North River, Mont. Rolland," and Pauline D. Redsell has a nice sense of light in her small work called "Snow."

Robert W. Pilot, A.R.C.A., exhibits three oils that demonstrate his skill as a painter of snow. "Church at Sault-aux-Recollets shows the twin-steeped building against a luminous sky with trees under snow and patches of open water in the foreground. "Mid-winter, Beaufort, P.Q."—buildings, brush and spruces under heavy snow is marked by fine values, and "House at Chambly, P.Q."—a view of the Cullen home—is fine in the arrangement of sunlight and shadow and the painting of the ice-filled Richelieu River seen through the trees of the garden.

Albert H. Robinson, R.C.A., finds pattern in "Boats in Ice," and Stanley Royle paints "Willows" on a bright winter day. Harry E. G. Ricketts shows some crisply-handled watercolors of winter scenes in the hills with, sometimes, an inclination to over-emphasize the blue of shadows on snow. Anne Savage has a strongly painted close-up called "The Plough," and the usual bold attack marks the Toronto scenes of Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A. Henry J. Simpkins reveals his usual skill in some large watercolors of Laurentian scenery in which the broad washes are admirably managed and the color is clean and transparent.

Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., has some surf scenes and a view of Sherbrooke street, looking east. George Thomson shows one landscape, "April in Muskoka," and Thurstan Topham has an old Quebec street in moonlight. E. M. B. Warren, R.B.A., has a watercolor of the interior of a cathedral in Brussels, and Homer Watson, R.C.A., sends a landscape called "Woodland Ford."

Others exhibiting include Phyllis C. Abbott, Mary B. Abraham, M. Alexander, F. D. Allison, Paul Andrews, Mary D. Bagley, E. Earl Bailly, Jackson H. ARCHITECTURAL SECTION

The exhibition of architectural work in this year smaller than usual due to the fact that so few new buildings have been erected recently. The exhibits present, however, an interesting picture of current trends in architectural design—particularly in residential work which forms the greater part of the display. Here are residences ranging from the conventional "styles" to the most striking modernism. Of the latter several are projected Montreal residences on steep mountain-side sites, to which the modernistic forms seem particularly adaptable. The few examples of commercial buildings shown are also "modern." The tradition of French Canada is successfully adopted in several small country houses and also for a large clubhouse in the Provincial capital.

Those exhibiting in this section are Barott & Blackader, James E. Beckwith, Randolph C. Betts, A.R.C.A., R. E. Bestrom, David R. Brown, H. W. Davis, E. A. Doucet, A. J. Galt Durnford, H. L. Savard, Shorey & Ritchie, Grattan D. Thompson, Frederick G. Todd, E. J. Turcott, P. Roy Wilson.

FINE MINIATURES BY JOSEF HILPERT

Gazette May 1/34

Toronto Artist Has Representative Collection in Eaton's Fine Art Galleries

A small but striking exhibition of miniatures by the Hungarian-Canadian painter, Josef Hilpert, of Toronto, opened yesterday in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company Limited of Montreal, and should interest Montreal art-lovers. Miniature painting is a specialized branch of art, and Hilpert has long been known as an expert in this line.

He paints his striking little portraits mostly on stone, with black onyx his favorite, leaving canvas and wood panels for whatever larger works he produces. He came to Canada from Hungary by way of Mexico. He has painted the ex-president Machado, now so much in the public limelight, and other members of the former Cuban cabinet.

In his exhibition at Eaton's are several examples of his delicate miniature portraits. The coloring is exquisite. With their backgrounds of black stone, the faces are almost alive, so keen is the detail, so true is the representation. Archbishop McNeil, Canon Cody, Sir William Murdoch and Col. Chisholm are some of the well-known men who greet the visitor from the walls of the gallery. The little portrait of Col. Chisholm brims with life, and is one of the most striking in the exhibition.

But Hilpert does not confine his miniatures to portraits. His little paintings of flowers and clusters of fruit are equally arresting to the eye, and are marvels of detail. Few of them are larger than four inches by three—some smaller—and yet there is reality in them, and delicate clear color. He has several of these still-life miniatures on exhibition.

One large painting is included in the show; that of Cardinal Villeneuve of Quebec, painted last year. The same detail that characterizes Hilpert's smaller work has gone into this. This portrait of the Prince of the Church, dressed in his red hat and robes, is an interesting study.

ART ASSOCIATION
CLOSED TO RE-OPEN

Edwin Holgate and Lillias Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A.
to Be in Charge

Under the auspices of the Art Association of Montreal, art classes are to open next autumn in the Montreal Art Gallery. Edwin Holgate will direct the Antique and Life drawing classes, and Mrs. Lillias Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., will have charge of Portrait painting and Still life. Criticisms will be given twice a week.

Edwin H. Holgate studied at the School of the Art Association of Montreal, under Miss Cleland and later under William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A. He won a scholarship for drawing about 1907. In 1910, on leaving High School, he devoted his full time to study under Mrs. Brymner.

Going to Paris in 1912 he studied under Castelnuovo and later under Simon and Menard. He exhibited at Salon of Societe des Artistes Francaises in 1914. Upon demobilization he returned to Paris in 1920 and studied under Milman. He exhibited at Salon d'Automne, Paris 1922.

Mr. Holgate returned to Canada in 1922 and for six years has been teaching wood-cut and engraving at the Ecole des Beaux Arts.

He has exhibited publicly in many Canadian and American cities and in London, Paris, the Hague, Ghent, Warsaw, Kovpo, Rio de Janeiro and at Wembley. A number of his drawings, paintings and wood-cuts are in the possession of the National Gallery at Ottawa, the Provincial Museum at Quebec, Hart House, the Hon. Vincent Massey, the civil museum at Le Havre, France, and the city of Sarnia.

Books he has illustrated include "Vielles Choses, Vieilles Gens," by Georges Bouchard; "Metropolitan Museum," by Robert Choquette; "Papiers de Musique," by Leo-Pol Morin.

He contracted for and carried out the decoration of the Totem Pole Room in the new wing of the Chateau Laurier, Ottawa.

Lillias Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., studied at Montreal Art Association Schools under William Brymner, R.C.A. She was awarded scholarships in Elementary and Life Classes and later studied under Alfred Wolmark in London and under Alexander Jacovleff in Paris. She exhibited in Paris Salon, in 1923, and was awarded Honorable Mention. Mrs. Newton was elected A.R.C.A. in 1923.

She exhibited at the Wembley Exhibition and at the Panama Pacific Exhibition, Los Angeles, 1925, and at the latter show she was awarded first Honorable Mention and a picture was purchased for the Los Angeles Museum. She is represented in collections of National Gallery, at Ottawa, Edmonton Museum and Calgary Museum. Her works have also been shown at the Canadian Exhibition, Luxembourg Museum, Paris, at Grand Central Galleries, New York, Corcoran Gallery, Washington, and at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. She held a "one-man" exhibition at Hart House, Toronto, in 1930. Her sitters include the Hon. Vincent and Mrs. Massey, Hon. A. S. Hardy, Speaker of the Senate; F. E. Meredith, K.C.; Lieut.-Col. G. S. Fifty-First Spring Exhibition of the Art Association

Star April 20/34

This year's Spring Exhibition, the fifty-first, of the Montreal Art Association was opened with the usual reception in the galleries on Thursday evening. The exhibition is, on the whole, distinctly less conservative than most of those which have preceded it. The older and more established artists are represented but there are not quite so many works by them as usual and several of them have broken new ground in the matter of subjects and in their manner of painting them. There is also a very good representation of younger and less known artists and there are some works which show modern or experimental tendencies. The hanging committee has done its difficult work well and there is much in the exhibition that is interesting and worth seeing.

Landscapes Predominate—
Fine Work by Local Artists.

From as far west as Saskatchewan and east to Nova Scotia, Canadian artists are exhibiting over 500 paintings at the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal. The exhibition was inaugurated with a private showing at the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street west, last night.

As usual, landscape predominate, but portraiture is also well represented. Distinctive of the former class, Harold Beament presents "The Grey Barn" in which sound drawing is combined with an excellent sense of contrast. Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., offers a painting of clouds in "The Lake", while James E. Beckwith has captured the force of our industrial age in "Factories", with the buildings shrouded in smoke.

Water color is well handled in "Perce Rock" and "Rocks at Perce", two studies by Arthur Drummond.

In a pastel called "March Sunshine" Donald Kerr reveals a fine sense of values.

Outstanding among the portraits is the work of Alphonse Jongers. Four of his paintings are on exhibition—Col. George Cantlie in military uniform; Dr. Lionel Lindsay, Miss Jennie Webster, and J. E. Aldred. Among the offerings of Aleksander Bercovitch is the "Portrait of a Pianist, Sade Shapiro".

A variety of etchings, drawings and design are also presented at the Spring Exhibition. Among these are attractive works in chalk, charcoal and pen and ink, besides linocuts, wood engravings and etchings. Among the contributors are: John J. Barry, Henri Belisle, H. Eric Bergman, Randolph C. Betts, Beatrice Clare, L. Clarke, C. de Guise-Hite, Oscar DeLall, Mary Gordon, Dunning, R. G. N. George, Joe. Hillenbrand, Jr., M. R. Holland, Nicholas Hornyansky, Evan Jones, E. May Kelly, Philip Peter Kieran, Lorna Lomer, Macaulay, A. A. Macdonald, Louis Muhlstok, Ernst Neumann, Lillias Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., A. M. Pattison, Tom Roberts, W. Ed. Schmidt, Felix Shea, Freda Pemberton Smith, Chas. Tulley, P. Roy Wilson, J. LeRoy Zwicker.

A sculpture section completes the exhibition.

EFFECTIVE WORK
BY ART STUDENTS

Gazette May 25/34
Exhibition Being Held at Marguerite Bourgeoys College

Interesting examples of drawing, painting, modelling and ceramics done by students and instructors of the Marguerite Bourgeoys College are on exhibition at the college, Westmount avenue. The display, which is open to the public, will continue until the end of this month.

Particularly effective work has been done by some of the students in water colors, posters and ceramics—the section devoted to the latter also including pewter, revealing a plasticity not commonly associated with that medium. Bas-reliefs and inlay of pewter and enamelled work have been executed with much skill, two or more very fine pieces being the work of one of the Sisters of the congregation who teaches in this department. Mrs. D. Breault, another instructor, has some interesting exhibits of pewter inlay in miniature landscapes on wood and enamel on pewter, also a set of blue and gold plates. Lillian Fainer exhibits some colorful painted china. Anne Marie Jarry, Jeanne Noiseaux and Therese Belanger are others whose work in this section is effective. Marguerite Lavoie has done some exquisite landscapes on small scale, and some very lovely tiles were shown by other exhibitors. Patterns in cement applied to pottery and painted are numerous.

Designs for mosaic and stained glass have captured the interest of several students, an unsigned one of much merit being the head of a Madonna with lilies.

Fine work in landscape has been done by H. Berard, who uses color boldly and draws vigorously in an impressive study, and by Andre Derome and N. J. Duncan, Francoise Leveille also shows herself to be a capable artist. P. Slade contributes some good posters and water colors. Rev. Sister Leonidas has a statue of St. Marie Bernard. In the section devoted to work by members of the faculty there are numerous realistic reliefs depicting scenes in the life of the Venerable Marguerite Bourgeoys.

EN HAUT, de gauche à droite: "The Artist's Daughter", toile d'Adam-Sherriff Scott; "Portrait d'une danseuse espagnole", par Henri Fabien; "In Russian Headdress", par Oscar de Lall; EN BAS, de gauche à droite, "Jos S.-Charles", buste par Laliberté; "Le Joueur de flûte", statuette par John Sloan; "Mlle M. Giguère", par Sylvia Daoust. (Clichés la "Presse").

Le 51^e Salon du Printemps

Un bon ensemble en peinture, mais rien de particulièrement remarquable cette fois. — Laliberté triomphe en sculpture. — Envahissement de l'aquarelle. — Miniatures.

Morte-saison pour les nôtres

Le 51^e Salon du Printemps a été inauguré, hier soir, à la Galerie des Arts. Excellente qualité d'ensemble, mais moins d'oeuvres qui "tranchent". Rien de transcendant, au fait. Les salons sont envahis par les pastels et les aquarelles et on a fait la place large aux miniatures. Le malheur veut qu'à part de la section sculpture, les Canadiens-français ne fassent pas aussi bonne figure que l'on voudrait. Quelques patriarches ont disparu; d'autres peintres "classés" se répètent, et c'est pourquoi il faut louer Coburn, cette année, des heureux efforts qu'il tente pour se renouveler. Le paysage déborde de toutes parts et le petit sujet achève de détrôner le grand. Voilà trop d'art de petit salon ou de boudoir pour une époque troublée comme la nôtre.

Eberlué par tant de joliesse inexpressive, je me demande pourquoi nos artistes ne seraient pas plus inquiets dans leurs oeuvres. Même les disciples de l'Ecole des Sept, auxquels on a fait une grande place, n'ont rien de particulier à dire. Tout est décor; où va la "vie"? Décidément la peinture, comme le monde, se perd faute de réflexion. C'est pire que le désarroi, c'est l'apathie. Et sortant de la Galerie des Arts, la tête en feu, pressé, hélas! de coucher à la vapeur quelques impressions, pourquoi me suis-je répété les vers d'Auguste Dorchain:

"Demain, le froid réel nous sépare
S'agit-il de nous enlever
S'agit-il de nous enlever
S'agit-il de nous enlever"

D'excellents nus

LES nus ne sont que quelques-uns mais ont le droit d'être remarqués. Coburn en a deux très blancs, qui plaisent. John-F. Clymer, dans "Japanese Dancing Girls" le tableau le plus frappant et le plus neuf du Salon probablement, à part d'agencer de riches tonalités décoratives, s'est montré très habile à modeler des nus exotiques, à la chair savoureuse, palpitante, lisse, d'un séduisant éclat d'ivoires. Dans "By the Lake" Edwin Holgate a brossé des nus d'un charme robuste, cuits au soleil; sa toile est remarquable.

PORTRAITS

Le tour des portraits ne réserve qu'un petit nombre de surprises et on constate l'absence de pièces aussi caractéristiques que l'an dernier.

nier. Voyons un peu par ordre alphabétique:

Alexander Bercovitch — "Sade Shapiro, pianiste". Inachevée délibérément gauche et qui pourtant intrigue et séduit à la longue par un quelque chose d'atmosphère rêveuse.

Alice-Ingis Carey — Une "Betty" suave et séduisante qui s'enfonce dans une atmosphère moirée. Plutôt entrevue que vue dans une vibration de teintes pâles.

F.-S. Coburn — "Mlle Y.-J." portrait sec sur fond désagréable.

Anthony Cooper — "Chinese Girl", d'un bleu reposant.

Charles de Belle — Dans une brume de rêve les mêmes grappes d'angelots et une gentille fillette qui deviendra grande si Dieu lui prête vie.

C. de Guise-Hite — Portrait d'artiste. Distinction dans l'élancé, mais trop d'élancé.

Oscar de Lall — "In Russian Head-dress", intelligente physionomie slave perdue dans le soyeux délicat des dentelles. Sur fond pâle. Une des oeuvres caractéristiques du Salon.

Mrs Adelaide-Webster Donald — Deux brunettes d'une douceur malade et qui se sentent un peu mal à l'aise.

Henri Fabien — "Portrait d'une danseuse espagnole", visage régulier, d'une belle rondeur, attitude calme et noble. L'artiste a rendu excellemment la soie de la robe, dont le rouge vif jette un éclat trop cru peut-être sur le tableau. A tout prendre, bien que ce soit l'une des meilleures toiles, trop de fini et de métier pour ce qu'il y a de sentiment et de poésie.

Stella Grier — Un Dr Fleming calme et monotone et une "Mère et enfant" rendue drôle par des sourires mécaniques qui défont la machine.

Edwin Holgate — "A. E. S." portrait bâti en blocs anguleux. Plus de souci des valeurs que du sujet.

Ida Huddell — Une tête d'Indienne jolie parce que pas fouillée, malheureusement, et une Miss Jessie qui ne doit pas rendre grand justice à l'original.

Mrs Knox Huffman — Deux petites esquisses qui ont le sens du moment psychologique.

Alphonse Jongers — Des portraits officiels, distingués. Pas autre chose, cette fois-ci. Très vivants, sans doute; on voit les personnages sans chercher à les comprendre ni à les pénétrer davantage. Le "colonel Cantile" est au naturel; "J.-E. Akred" a un peu conscience qu'il pose pour le Salon; le "Dr Lionel Lindsay" est trop beau garçon pour ses cheveux gris; "Miss Jennie Webster" est spirituelle et avertie dans sa douce bonhomie.

Charles Kelsey — "David attend Goliath". Fado adolescent, il n'a pas l'air de le savoir.

Robert Mackay — "Negro Boy", curieux, heurté, mais parlant.

Richard Major — "The Green Bottle". Idée originale; il se fut dégagé de la toile une séduction d'exotisme brillant si l'artiste avait voulu employer des tons chauds.

Lillias-Torrence Newton — "Fada", expressive synthèse. Une physionomie qui fait rêver comme elle rêve elle-même.

Louis Parent — "Evangéline" qui tricote. Je suis plus malheureux qu'elle à la voir.

Pourquoi si recroquevillée; a-t-elle peur de se frapper la tête contre le cadre du tableau?

Hugh-A. Peck — Une tête de jeune homme. Net, résolu. Un peu trop retouché.

Phyllis Percival — Une Indienne comme on les peignait autrefois. Sans rides. De l'expression, pourtant.

Mary Riddon — Portrait en tons de brique. Pas même laid.

Adam Sherriff Scott — "The Artist's Daughter", habillée pour la chasse, d'un joyeux naturel sans mystère. "Paul", visage de jeune homme qui respire l'équilibre, la santé, la noblesse. "Alan Macnaughton", visage vrai. Sherriff Scott ne montre pas cette fois des portraits-paysages en teintes claires, comme par le passé, et s'affilie davantage au genre officiel, lisse, à la convention, bien qu'il soit des meilleurs exposants au Salon actuel.

Marian Scott — Une tête en cubes.

Marjorie Smith — Encore le document humain chez les pauvres gens banals, mais ses toiles sont plus faibles que d'ordinaire. Si le naturalisme chez elle n'est pas torturé il devient dur quand même à force de banalité; banalité du sujet, "Enfance" montre d'une manière raide une poupée et un chien de laine qui traînent sur une chaise; "Maternité" présente une pauvre avec un enfant hébété, (comme on en voit, sans doute, mais est-ce à l'artiste à le dire?).

Mrs Agnes Warren — "Jeune fille en brun", juste aperçue, mais prenante. L'artiste a su avec art présenter en peu de trait, dans une ambiance floue, une physionomie qui dit quelque chose.

Paysages

ABONDANCE de paysages. Quelques bons. Peu d'excellents. Autant d'aquarelles et de pastels que d'huiles. Des faiblesses pleines les murs. Courage, ô mon âme et entreprenons une brève excursion, par ordre alphabétique encore.

Wilfrid Barnes — "The Lake", beaux espaces et ciel lointain.

Harold Beament — Poèmes sombres qui surprennent d'abord puis arrêtent le visiteur.

Aleksander Bercovitch — Une petite scène de rue moins parlante que d'habitude.

Andre Bieler — "Le Tabac", scène rude, mate, sans vie.

Archibald Browne, R. C. A. — "Tone Poems", où la lumière coule en reflets d'une rare finesse.

Paul Caron — Des vieux-Québec, d'un fini délicat.

Alberta Cleland — Paysages poudrés.

A. Cloutier — "A la Malbaie", toile éclairée, aux perspectives agréables.

John-F. Clymer — Deux paysages très décoratifs.

Coburn — Une route à la manière habituelle.

Fleurimond Constantineau — "La Croix du chemin", très jolie composition. Tons délicats. C'est comme

News of Art
In Montreal

Star April 25/34

Rene L. Kulbach has an exhibition, which is particularly well worth seeing, in the print room of the Montreal Art Association, of silhouettes, with a few linoleum prints. Though they are called silhouettes and are made in the usual way with black paper over white, they are not all silhouettes of the ordinary kind, — that is to say black figures on a white background. In some of them it is the background which is black and in all of them there are remarkable effects of form and lighting. A few of the best of them are of men at work, with excellent effects of action produced by the very simplest means. Most of these pictures, however, are of animals, of which Mr. Kulbach has made a special and evidently very successful study, and he has not only produced many very good illustrations of the animals and their movements but in some cases he has made delightful patterns and designs with them.

Adrien Hebert is showing at the Arts Club, Victoria St. a small collection of his pictures and drawings. The large drawings are especially good. Nearly all of them, both pictures and drawings, are of scenes in Montreal and its harbor, with ships and the people who work on them, by day and night. The harbor scenes are the most successful of the oil pictures and one or two of them have in them much of the harbor's peculiar atmosphere, but the drawings are better still.

The Art Association announces that art classes will be held in the studio of the Art Gallery on Sherbrooke St., beginning in the autumn of this year.

This school will be under the direction of Edwin Holgate and Lillian Torrance Newton.

Antique and life drawing classes will be held from 10 to 12 on five mornings a week, under Mr. Holgate's direction. Portrait painting and still life painting classes will be held on five afternoons a week from 2 till 4, under Mrs. Newton's direction. Criticisms will be given in each class; twice a week.

EXHIBITS WORKS

Gazette April 28/34
Silhouettes and Lino-cuts in Print Room of Art Gallery
Show Skill

Silhouettes and lino-cuts by Rene L. Kulbach make an interesting exhibition in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal where sixty of his works are attracting attention. The silhouettes are in no measure reminiscent of that old-time type when women in poke bonnets, or with hair "bunned" and netted, were shown in black profile on a white background. Mr. Kulbach's work is distinctly of today and in design, to meet the requirements of his medium, shows ingenuity and imagination.

Cut from black paper by scissors with blades of varying fineness these pictures generally follow a decorative form of arrangement. The artist has always to consider in composition those lines and strips that hold his subjects together. With the black paper for his objects and the white or grey boards on which his pictures are mounted his only tones, he, nevertheless, succeeds in suggesting atmosphere — this quality especially being present in "Before the Storm", a farmer ploughing beneath a heavy cloud which has begun to break in rain.

In the main, Mr. Kulbach is partial to animals — subjects to which he is sympathetic after much study in various zoos. The animals thus studied he has set in country natural to them. He shows marked ability in those silhouettes where action is dominant — antelopes, bears playing, panther on the prowl, deer attacked by wolves, a standing bear awaiting the onslaught of dogs, hovering geese, a panther and snake in combat, a mule-deer attacked by a cougar, and caribou about to lock antlers. All these works are very much alive. Other studies include terriers, collie, spaniels, colts, polar bear, zebras, moose, owl and penguins, to mention a few of the animals and birds that have proved congenial material. Other subjects found pictorially suitable are a wood-cutter, a team of horses pulling a load and a skier on a slope.

The items in this group of silhouettes indicate an amount of industry even after the design of the compositions had been decided on. The work calls for skill and makes big demands on patience — one false "snip" and the picture is ruined. Looking at this collection suggests that Mr. Kulbach would be at home in making designs for grille work — some of the compositions shown being in motif eminently suitable for the embellishment of fishing and hunting club houses.

The few examples on view of his skill as a print-maker from lino-cuts are generally satisfying — the treatment is broad and the composition effective. Save for a picture of a cat resenting the approach of two Scotch terriers, wild animals are the subjects — moose and deer. In the print entitled "Bears," the artist well suggests the bleakness of wooded country in winter and the lumbering bulk of a bear breaking the trail for the following cub. The exhibition remains on view until May 6.

Lofvengren, an old academician, bien construit, tout-à-fait selon la meilleure tradition. Les modèles de résidences vont du conventionnel au plus moderne; le style vieux-régime s'accommode bien encore aux maisons ou clubs de campagne. Joli, pratique, rien de nouveau.

L'art n'est pas mort. Il sommeille. Comme la Belle au Bois dormant, il attend qu'on le vienne réveiller. Il y a beaucoup de place chez nous pour ceux qui veulent venir en chantant les vers d'Auguste Dorchain: "Si l'Art se prostitue au sein de la matière, Si l'âme sous la forme est morte tout entière, Des créateurs divins si nul n'est resté, Viens, nous redisons seuls l'hymne de la vie."

Picture Should Be Planned, Not Improvised, Says
German Artist

ANNOT GIVES VIEWS

Portraits of Women Who Combine Marriage and Career Her Special Interest

Art is by no means a matter that depends entirely upon inspiration. It has its rules, and the painter must know them thoroughly before he attempts to touch brush to canvas. The result is that he is able to develop his own essential gifts and to express his individual experience by cultivated artistic means and solid craftsmanship.

This philosophy was expounded by a German artist who has achieved international recognition and who paid Montreal a visit at the week-end in connection with arrangements for a lecture tour next season. She is known by her first name, Annot, and came here after seeing her work exhibited at the Carnegie Institute in Pittsburgh, the Sterner Gallery in New York and at art museums in Brooklyn, Toledo and Cleveland.

Annot Kriger-Menzel Jacobl, to give her her full name, tall, with auburn hair and blue eyes, is a descendant of two artistic families, Norwegian on her mother's side and German on her father's. Her father was the nephew and adopted son of Adolf von Menzel, great German painter of the early nineteenth century. At the age of sixteen, Annot commenced drawing in the school of Associated Women Artists in Berlin. Later and for many years she painted under the tutelage of Lovis Corinth. After the war she married Rudolf Jacobl, a well-known artist in Germany. Together they spent several years studying in Italy and later in Paris.

In 1926, Annot began to exhibit and was invited to take part in such important salons as those of the Prussian Academy, the Great Berlin and the Berliner Secession, being the only woman member of the last named.

Her principal interest is in portrait work, as she believes that by this means the essential qualities of the individual are conveyed to the onlooker as the camera cannot reveal them. She is particularly interested in painting portraits of women who have combined marriage and a profession, her opinion being that in the portrait may be seen the way in which the mental development has been influenced by the profession and economic independence. She spoke of this in the course of an interview in the Windsor Hotel, showing photographs of portraits of Toni Oelfken, who conducts a progressive school in Berlin, and Kate Kruse, designer of dolls, who is seen in a painting with her seven children. The latter picture was shown by request at the Carnegie Institute exhibition, where it was given a place of honor.

Annot and her husband will open an art school at Westport, Conn., for the summer, and thereafter will found a school in New York. She has already lectured under the auspices of the New York board of education and the Child Study Association.

"My educational work," she said, "is founded on the conscious knowledge of the laws of artistic expression. There are, for instance, the laws of light, color and ornamentation. One must know the right proportion of each in a painting, and which is to be accentuated."

IMPROVISATION FORBIDDEN.

"These things," she continued, "were forgotten during the period of Naturalism — people improvised! I am teaching my students to do planned work. I do not allow any improvisation. And so they don't run the risk of having to alter their work or to destroy it."

"A picture that is well planned will always be a good painting, even if inspiration is lacking," Annot maintained.

"Every painting must be planned. Then the picture can be painted just as one would write down on paper something that has been memorized. We think that art is an exact science. But you must not attempt to influence the personal talent and tendencies of the artist. In Berlin they laughed at us when we taught geometry in our art school. But they saw that our pupils had their work exhibited six or eight months after."

Joseph Charlebois — De jolies enluminures.
Des miniatures en quantité, plusieurs fort gentilles, œuvres d'experts.
Statira Frame — Des paysages décoratifs.
T.-R. MacDonald — "Two-A-Day", ballerines et clown. Anecdote piquante et humaine.
Betty Maw — Compositions d'un hiératisme simple, très décoratives.
Leslie Smith — Un intérieur fort bien trouvé, qui mérite une mention spéciale.

Sculpture

LALIBERTE, pour nous reposer de ses sempiternelles figurines du terroir, est revenu cette année avec d'admirables bustes qui dominent de haut toute la section de sculpture. Sa tête de Jos. Saint-Charles plus jeune, que voilà une œuvre fièrement aristocratique, d'un caractère très raffiné, où rien ne manque. On voit ensuite l'hon. J.-A. Perrault, tout à fait naturel, les yeux perdus dans une idée intense. Revenant à la charge contre le machinisme qu'il n'a jamais aimé, Laliberte a conçu une originale composition intitulée "L'ère de la mécanique"; deux jolis petits nus tourmentés qu'écrase dans son étreinte d'acier un robot symbolique, fait de toutes sortes de choses; l'œuvre n'eût-elle pas été plus dégagée et plus significative si l'artiste eût simplement recouru aux bons offices d'un robot ordinaire, au lieu d'en imaginer un si compliqué.

Quelle grâce dans ce petit nu de Henri Bisson qu'il a coulé tout d'un élan poétique, avec une belle pureté de lignes. Il semble qu'elle va se soulever dans le désir qui l'emporte. Superbe petite pièce qui distingue particulièrement Henri Bisson dans le coin de la sculpture.

Alonzo Cinq-Mars a des médaillons de bronze d'une belle distinction, surtout cette tête de Charles Gill, vibrante de finesse et de poésie.

Zoltvany-Smith nous donne une petite Artémis noire, dégaie, dont la saine élégance et le mouvement assuré sont bien selon ce que l'on rêve de Diane la chasseresse.

D'un souple jet, lisse, uni, John Sloan a créé une jolie stylisation de "Joueur de flûte".

Voyez encore: un self-portrait de Guido Casini, clair, noble; un buste de ministre par Dorothy-Rhynas Coles en style ferme, consciencieux; une jolie "Réverie" de Maurice Dandis; une composition égyptienne et une "Monique" par Mme de Montigny-Giguère, qui ne manquent pas d'un certain idéal; une simple et vraie physionomie d'enfant (Marielle) par Mme de Montigny-Lafontaine; un honnête portrait d'E. H. par Eric Hannibal; une mélancolique tête de Juive, par A.-J. Segal; des plaquettes où George-E. Tremblay a décrit avec autant de charmante vérité Mlle C. C. et M. S. D. qu'il a mis de vide dans son projet de monument funéraire.

Chacune des trois pièces de Sylvia Daoust est de qualité. Sa tête de femme attire par un sourire fatigué; celle de L. D. est travaillée par une noble inquiétude; celle du bébé respire une ronde candeur. Pauline Johnson a su rendre avec une rare finesse de métier deux visages orientaux, troués, mangés de fatigue et de songes lointains. La "Cécile" de H.-McRae Miller est empreinte d'une séduisante ardeur. Alberto Zucca a modelé un buste délicat, qui ne manque pas d'élan. Le "Mûlière" de B. Malchi a sa vérité, mais il reste trop terre-à-terre. Attention aux grosses faces laides; le mâle au nez camus d'Ernst Neumann, par exemple, ou le gros nègre d'Orson Wheeler. Pour finir, un bon morceau d'Elzéar Soucy, mais pas plus caractéristique que ça.

Pas de grandes pièces ce printemps.

Dessins et gravures

DANS le petit salon réservé aux dessins et aux gravures on ne peut s'empêcher de remarquer les paysages délicats de John-J. Barry; le métier assez solide de Henri Bellisle dans "La menuiserie"; le joli mouvement d'une gravure sur bois d'Eric Bergman qui s'appelle "Oaks and Wind"; le fusain où Oscar de Lall nous donne un portrait très fouillé et très ressemblant de Fred. A. Lallemand; l'ardente tête de jeune fille dessinée par Joe Hillenbrand, jr.; l'intelligent petit portrait de bambin par M.-R. Holland; quelques physionomies mélancoliques et juifs-polonais de Louis Muhstokk; un franc et noble portrait par Lillias-Torrance Newton qui vaut d'être particulièrement remarqué. Les portraits de C. de Guise-Hite manquent de consistance. Nicholas Hornyansky a des pointes-sèches un peu à l'ancienne manière. W.-E. Schmidt allie un sens décoratif averti et du fin métier dans ses portraits d'animaux dessinés à la plume, tandis que les gravures de Félix Shea témoignent de ses qualités habituelles d'agréable rondeur dans la description des canards sauvages.

Architecture

L'ARCHITECTURE ne prend pas beaucoup de place cette année à l'exposition. On explique qu'il s'est dirigé peu d'édifices. L'art religieux n'est représenté que par des dessins de vitraux par Thomas-A.

de Paul Caron transposé en nature.
Léon — Un vieux-Montreal et souvenir de Paris. Oeuvres achevées.
Alice et Berthe Des Clayes — Des paysages raffinés qui sont parmi les meilleurs à l'exposition.
Paul-B. Earle — Gentilles études.
Roland Gissing — Ples baignés de lumière. De l'élan.
Adrien Hebert — La foule au Parc Lafontaine ressemble trop à la foule au Mont-Royal. Seconde version d'une toile qui a plu jadis.
A.-Y. Jackson — Paysages tricotés, tournés au poncif.
Evan Jones — Jolie évocation vénitienne.
Gwendolen Kyle — Tout petits paysages qui rutilent de joie.
John-M. Loggie — Un poème chantant où il n'y a que des lignes droites et un jeu de coloris.

Mabel May — Talent qui s'affermirait et se révèle toujours de plus en plus. Toiles éclairées, lourdes de valeurs poétiques.

Mabel McCulloch — Attrayante étude de verts moelleux dans une petite marine.

Rita Mount — Perspective et espace qui sont un charme.

Phyllis Percival et Miriam Holland, qui ont de bonnes choses à l'exposition Eaton dévoient au Salon "Hal-Ross Ferrigard" — "Country Homestead", toile pleine, poétique.

Robert Pilot — De gentilles choses et d'autres qui sentent le procédé.

Pauline-D. Redsell — Dans "Snow", la perspective agréable et originale d'une côte vue d'en bas.

Harry Ricketts — Des reflets bleus, des ciels translucides.

Stanley Royle — Paysage aéré, au bleu joli.

Peter Sheppard — Une bonne scène calme du Marché en novembre.

Henry Simpkins — Des aquarelles remarquables, pleines de nostalgie et de perspectives de montagnes.

Thursian Topham — Paysages-tapisserie.

Marjorie Tozer — L'artiste a capté la chaude lumière italienne dans un solide tableau.

Homer Watson — Du sous-Millet estompé.

P.-Roy Wilson — Neiges soyeuses.

Il faut aussi s'arrêter à trouver de jolies qualités aux œuvres des artistes suivants: Mary Abraham, F. Calhoun, Mary Bagley, Earl Bailly, Olga Bell, C.-H. Bruyère, St-Georges Burgoyne, F.-O. Call, Mona Cragg, Eleanor-Clinton Fiennes, Hortense Gordon (dont la marine mouchetée vibre), Mary Grant (dont la mer a du mouvement), R.-H. Lindsay, James MacGregor (ses beaux arbres après l'orage), Jean Maclean, Orval Madden (dont la cour de ferme est très nature et propre), Henry-L. Masson, David McGill (dans "Silver Lining"), G.-N. Norwell, Frank Panabaker (dont une marine fait penser au Russell plus clair), Gordon Pfeiffer, Eric Riordon ("Tranquillité, Haute Savoie", est un petit morceau classique), Charles Simpson (avec un de ses intelligents dessins colorés), Freda-Pemberton Smith (qui met du grain étonnant à son coloris), René Vautellet, R.-L. Wright, etc.

Natures-mortes

LES natures-mortes insignifiantes sont trop nombreuses. Aussi bien, quelle reposante surprise que celle de Jackson Barker, qui sait évoquer l'âme des choses dans toute la poésie d'un joli vase de Chine bleu, blotti dans du velours mauve. Par contraste et tout à côté, apparaît un fouillis indescriptible d'Aleksander Bercevitich; lignes gauchies, valeurs déformées, tons mêlés, on se croirait devant le pire enfouillage; c'est le coin pour rire. Joseph Guinta a mis plus de composition que de vie dans sa nature-morte à lui. Julius Kaplan fait preuve d'un métier délicat et de beaucoup de finesse dans une étude de porcelaines...

Fleurs

DE fleurs il n'en manque point. Où sont les plus brillantes? M. Alexander les fait tendres, colorées, vivantes; Lillian Hingston les peint délicatement; Ruby LeBoutillier en a de bien naturelles; Lillias-Torrance Newton leur demande de jolis effets décoratifs, (cf "White Roses, dans les tons verts); I.-E.-L. Ogilvy montre des narcisses d'une agréable clarté; B.-C. Richstone les a vues sèches...

Silhouettes-gravures

RENE-L. KULBACH expose à la Galerie des Arts d'ingénieuses silhouettes, où il joue avec adresse du noir sur le blanc ou du blanc dans le noir. Ce sont, comme conceptions, de véritables gravures sur bois. Quelques-unes, du reste, ont été transposées en lino-gravures.

Kulbach a le sens décoratif. Il sait découvrir des lignes sobres à la fois et pleines de mouvement. Plusieurs de ses silhouettes, dont le relief s'accroît derrière leur protection de cellophane, sont d'une élégante finesse. Toutes sont marquées au coin d'une sobriété de bon goût. Pas de surcharge, comme il convient.

L'animalier l'emporte chez Kulbach. Les binettes de petits chiens terriers sont finaudes, les chevreuils ont une grâce allée. L'illustration de certaine légende pour un volume quelconque présente de solides qualités de composition évocatrice.

THE WEEK'S REVIEW

Some Features Of the Spring Exhibition

The chief impression to be got at first sight of this year's spring exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal is that the exhibitors have been generally more enterprising this year than in any other recent year. This is not an exhibition in which the same painters show what seem to be the same pictures but a collection of new pictures, some of them by new people, with something of interest in the great majority of them.

Landscapes are, as usual, more numerous than pictures of any other sort, and there are many good ones. A few of the senior painters are among the exhibitors of them; Homer Watson has a large picture, more in his earlier than in his later manner, with more green than many of his recent pictures; Archibald Browne has two pictures, appropriately called Tone Poems,—rich color decorations. One of the most striking of the landscapes is George Thomson's "April in Muskoka," an excellent study of early spring coloring; Paul Earle has painted autumn and early spring in yellows and browns; Robert Pilot has some very good snow scenes; H. Ross Perriard has two striking and slightly formal views of mountain tops.

Women make a good showing among the landscape painters; H. Mabel May's "Village Street" is one of the best pictures that she has shown here, and Rita Mount, Phyllis M. Percival and Jean Munro are well represented. A. Y. Jackson's patterns in sunlight and Wilfred Barnes' "The Lake" are among the more noticeable landscapes; there are very pleasant effects of sunshine in the pictures of Renee Vautelet, Marjorie Tozer and Beryl Butler, and sadder tones in those of Harold Beament and C. Middleton Hope. F. D. Allison's rather freely painted view of Knarborough Bridge, James Shearer's study of a misty day, the colorations of G. N. Norwell, Andreancy and Gordon Pfeiffer, and Harding's picture of the Lauans are worth notice. There are many small pictures and sketches among which may be mentioned a wet scene by A. Bercovitch, a landscape by Mona Cragg and those by Betty Maw, Statira Frame, Mary Braman, Pauline Redsell, David McGill, H. Leslie Smith, R. L. Wright and J. Allan McCaffrey.

The sea makes comparatively little show this year, except as an incident in landscapes; there are however an attractive picture of "Ebb Tide" by F. O. Call and two very convincing studies of breaking waves by Charles Simpson, who also has a large picture, full of color, of an idealized Sherbrooke street. A picture of boats by Berthe Des Clayes and one of ships in dock by Peter Sheppard are also to be noticed.

Portraits, though not many, are conspicuous, but there is no severe row of business magnates or professors this year and most of the portraits are of women. One of the most striking is Alphonse Jonkers' "Miss Jennie Webster," in which the charm of the face balances some excess in detail in the uniform; a contrast to this is given by the slightly formal but very dignified simplicity of F. S. Coburn's "Mademoiselle Y. J. In Mr. Jongers' portrait of Col. George Cantlie the details of the uniform and the strong blue sky seem more important than the face. Stella Grier's portrait of Dr. Fleming Goodchild is strong and full of character; in her "Mother and child" a variety of colors is used in a way that makes the picture rather spotty and unrefined. Edwin Holgate has a fine and vigorous portrait of a violinist, Adam Sherriff Scott has a good head of a young man and an interesting portrait of his daughter; Lillias Torrance Newton's "Frada" is splendidly full of life but strangely cold in color. Mrs. Agnes Warren has two broad and simple portrait studies; the portraits by Mrs. Webster Donald and Jane C. Luke are ambitious and interesting. Other good portrait studies are by Charles Kelsey, Marion Bond and Hugh Peck; two heads of Chinese girls by Robert Mackay and Anthony Cooper, Jr. are worth notice; Henri Fabien's "Spanish dancer" is conspicuous from its rather uncomfortable color scheme of red and yellow. There are two of Charles De Belle's characteristic pictures of children, and good studies by Mary K. Riordan and Freda Pemberton Smith.

Three figure studies call for special mention. Two of these by F. S. Coburn are admirably direct and true; Edwin Holgate's splendidly drawn figures are combined with a landscape into a very effective decoration. Another good decorative composition with figures in it is John F. Clymer's "Javanese dancing girls."

Flower pictures are unusually few. Two of the best are by Margaret Richardson and Marian Scott and there are two strikingly good formalized decorations by Mrs. Torrance Newton. There is a very clever painting of still life by Julius Kaplan and an amusing picture of a doll and a toy dog by Marjorie Smith.

The water colors in the spring exhibition have been getting more numerous and better every year and this year there is a quite important collection of them. The hanging committee must have had some difficulty in placing them but they are well lighted. Excellent work is shown by James Beckwith, A. Cunningham, Hugh Robertson, Henry J. Simpkins, Harry Ricketts, John Humphries, P. Roy Wilson and Chas. Perrochet. Paul Caron adds to his collection of scenes of old Quebec, and other pictures by Edith Smith, Evan Jones, R. H. Lindsay, Ruby Le Boutillier, D. H. MacFarlane, Tom Roberts and R. A. Porteous hang on the same wall as one of the most interesting parts of the exhibition. Among the best of the pastel drawings are Kathleen Shackleton's "Perce Rock" and two by John S. Gordon.

The collection of prints and drawings is small but contains some good work. Among the best are some exceptionally good wood engravings by H. Eric Bergman, etchings by John J. Barry and L. Clark, color etchings by Nicholas Hornyansky and prints, by various processes, by Felix Shea, A. A. Macdonald, Evan Jones and Tom Roberts. There are good portrait drawings by Oscar De Laill, Freda Pemberton Smith, Lorna Lomer Macaulay and Lillias Torrance Newton.

Sculpture makes less show than usual and consists, for the most part, of respectable portrait busts. Two oriental heads by Pauline Johnson stand out from the rest by their good and broad modelling; there are also several good portraits by A. Laliberte, a well-modelled little figure by A. Zoltvany-Smith, a clever head by H. McRae Miller and good heads by B. Malchi, Sylvia Daoust and Dorothy Coles.

The architectural section of such an exhibition is of interest chiefly to architects and their clients. In the present case where there are drawings and photographs of recent buildings and proposed buildings and developments which show activity and originality.

WOMEN PAINTERS EXHIBITING WORK

Comprehensive Collection by Trio Attracting Attention at Scott's

Three Canadian women painters, Sarah Robertson, Prudence Howard and Isabel McLaughlin, opened an exhibition of their works yesterday in the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street. It should prove of interest to Montrealers as it presents a comprehensive collection of paintings from this trio.

The three artists go well together. They belong to the same school, and there is a similarity in technique and handling of color which is bright and vigorous.

Isabel McLaughlin exhibits several of her works. One, "The Nipissing Mine," ranks among the best in the show. It is a symphony in grey, well done and very pleasant to look at, and if the brighter pictures catch the eye first, it is to this work that the picture lover will return. Another of Miss McLaughlin's paintings, "Backyards," is also well handled and sound in color.

Of Sarah Robertson's work, a scene looking out from a window on to house tops and steeples is particularly striking. It is bright, cheerful and pleasing to the eye. Miss Robertson also exhibits several country scenes of Quebec, Ontario and Vermont.

Portraits and figures make up the greater part of Prudence Howard's contribution to the exhibition, and these are bold, clear paintings. Her "Egyptian Girl" is a good example of Miss Howard's method of figure-painting.

Extension Is Approved

Toronto, May 10.—The Toronto Board of Control has approved a proposal that the city, Ontario and Dominion Governments each contribute $7,500 under the Unemployment Relief Act for two new wings to the Toronto Art Gallery. The wings will cost $45,000 and $22,500 has been raised by private subscriptions.

Star May 2/34 News of Art Here and Abroad

Miniatures, painted in oils, by Joseph Hilpert are being shown at Eaton's gallery this week and next. Mr. Hilpert, who is Hungarian, had exhibited his work with much success in his own and other countries before coming to Canada; now he lives in Toronto. A portrait of the Ontario Chief Justice, Sir William Mulock, is one of the best of a series of portraits here, another good one is of Archbishop McNeil of Toronto and others, almost as good, are two very well known Torontonians, Canon Cody and Prof. A. T. Delury. In all of these the heads stand out against black backgrounds. There are also a number of portraits of women, which are larger and more conspicuous, if less effective as portraits. With these are some miniatures of flowers and still life which are as decorative as such very small pictures can be. The only big picture by Mr. Hilpert is a life-size, three-quarter length of Cardinal Villeneuve, which, if a little stiff and hard, has a certain dignity, and has good drawing with all the strong color of the Cardinal's robes.

One of the most important works of Italian art in England, Mantegna's great series of cartoons of the Triumph of Julius Caesar at Hampton Court, is now being shown again to the public after some necessary repairs. This, as well as the famous series of cartoons of New Testament history by Raphael, — now at South Kensington, — formed part of the great collection of works of art made by King Charles I, and were retained by the Commonwealth Government when the rest of the collection was sold by Cromwell's order; their great size may have made their sale difficult. The Mantegna cartoons used to hang in the palace at Hampton Court, but some years ago were removed to the old orangery, which suited them perfectly. It is reported LONDON, May 2.—(C. P.)—Twelve thousand works—more than ever before—have been submitted for the Royal Academy exhibition opening May 7. It promises to be an interesting show, the News Chronicle remarks, if the selection committee is kind, broadminded and shows a sense of humor.

The paper says: "Two of the most exciting exhibits will be a large portrait of Major Douglas, the economist, by Augustus John, whose work London has missed for some time, and a scale model of Liverpool's new Roman Catholic Cathedral, by Sir Edwin Lutyens, with 49 figures arranged around it. "A. J. Munnings, the horse painter, will probably arouse interest with his 'Trooper of the Scots Greys of 1800,' complete with top-hat, and a background of battle and smoke."

It has been found possible to repair them and put them into good condition without any repainting and they are now protected from injury by being completely sealed in layers of wax on both sides. For greater safety the orangery has been equipped with apparatus for the automatic control not only of temperature but of humidity; this is said to be the first apparatus of the kind to be installed in any European public gallery.

Another picture which is being very carefully protected just now is Whistler's portrait of his mother, which belongs to the French Government and usually hangs in the Luxembourg gallery. It was shown at Chicago last year, and is, at present, on tour of the United States; it arrived at Boston for exhibition last week and was received and escorted by heavy guard of police. The value put on it by the French Government is $1,000,000, which is far above the value put on any other picture painted so recently.

Star July 26/34 The Old Master

Sitting among my pictures
I hold in my hand my battered Claude Lorrain.
Bruised, and bloomed with scraps of molassic varnish;
Unrecognized, like a Venus rolled in the mud
Who seems to have lost the signs of eternal beauty.

I turn a strong light on the canvas,
Not hoping. The landscape brightens.
A brilliance stands out in the corner,
Above the clouds, above the stark and resolute Peak,
A marvellous blue, so tender, living, celestial,
So tremulous with the pearly intimations of sunrise,
That assuredly, Claude, you were "he who set the sun in the sky";
And you, Claude, saw that bit of the eternal beauty,
And left it that I too might find it
And ache, like you, to find it again in Eternity.

MONTREALER HONORED BY KING OF BELGIUM

Star May 15/34
Order Conferred on Alfred Faniel

The King of Belgium, Leopold III, has seen fit to honor a resident of Montreal for his artistic talents and his contribution to the world of art, in the person of Alfred Faniel who was this week created a Chevalier of the Order of Leopold II.

Chevalier Faniel is well known in Montreal, having resided here for the past 30 years. He is particularly well known in art circles through the exhibition of his works during exhibitions at the Art Gallery and the Royal Academy here.

His paintings may be seen in some of the larger churches in the city, notably the church of the Immaculate Conception on Papineau avenue, where several rural paintings have drawn much praise.

The works of Mr. Faniel are particularly effective in Canadian scenes and their true portrayal of Canadian life. His brush has worked on a variety of subjects emphasizing the versatility of his imagination.

Chevalier Faniel was born at Verviers, Belgium in 1879 and received his foundation in art studies at the well-known school of St. Luke. He then studied under the able direction of Carpentier and Dewitt at the Royal Academy of Liege where he won his laureate. He came to Canada in 1903. He is equally well known for his works in oil, pastel and watercolor and is considered one of the outstanding portrait painters of the day.

In 1908 he married Miss Georgette Beaudry, daughter of the late Georges-Olivier Beaudry, professor at the Royal Victoria College, Montreal.

CANADA SECURED PICTURE 'BARGAIN'

Gazette May 19/34
Saved $20,000 in Purchasing Historical Portraits Through Montrealer

(By The Canadian Press.)
Ottawa, May 17. — Canada appears to have saved $20,000 in purchasing the historical portrait of Wolfe, by Highmore, and the Earl of Durham, by Lawrence, according to a memorandum by Dr. A. G. Doughty, Dominion Archivist, tabled in the House of Commons today. The Highmore portrait of Wolfe, the only one known to have been painted from life, was offered for sale in London nearly six years ago for $60,000, subsequently reduced to $35,000. That of the Earl of Durham was offered for $30,000.

The Canadian Government acquired them through Ward C. Pitfield of Montreal for $45,000. When the Wolfe portrait came "on the market" in 1929 Dr. Doughty was asked by Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister, "what steps should be taken to procure it." It was then discovered that both portraits had been acquired by Mr. Pitfield, for approximately $50,000. In July, 1932, the present Government negotiated through Dr. Doughty for the sale of these historical masterpieces, and secured them for $45,000.

The terms of the sale called for payment of $3,000 on delivery of the pictures and payment of the remainder as funds became available. Installments were to be not less than $1,000 with final payment to be made on March 31, 1935, says a copy of the order-in-council attached to the memorandum.

VO MOSASAURS ARRIVE AT OTTAWA

OTTAWA, July 28.—(C. P.)—Skeletons of two prehistoric sea serpents, dug from clay beds near Morden, Man., by a party directed by C. M. Sternberg, of the National Museum of Canada have arrived in Ottawa. Mr. Sternberg will supervise the preparation of the two fossils for exhibition.

The larger of the two skeletons is probably the longest of which there is any record and measures 33 feet, although a large part of the tail is missing. The other mosasaur skeleton is 15 feet long and some of its tail is missing also.

Miniatures de Hilpert chez Eaton
Un portrait du cardinal Villeneuve. — L'architecture au McGill. — Gloire à Daumier.

Propos et rappels

JOSEF HILPERT, de Toronto, artiste d'origine hongroise qui séjourna jadis aussi au Cuba et au Mexique, expose chez Eaton une série de miniatures comme on en voit peu souvent. Il s'en est fait une spécialité et a tenu des expositions tant à l'étranger qu'ici. Se réservant pour les grands sujets l'usage de la toile ou du bois, il peint à l'huile sur de la pierre ou de la vitre teintée, préférablement l'onyx noir. Il obtient ainsi un relief intéressant.

Ses exemples de fleurs ont peut-être du charme dans leur minutie même, mais c'est tout, à mon avis. Ses portraits lilliputiens ont de quoi attirer bien davantage. Avec une netteté raffinée et d'une pâte très propre il campe dans une délicatesse un peu cireuse des visages de personnalités bien connues: Mgr McNeill, Canon Cody, Sir William Murdoch, le colonel Chrisholm. Au fait, bien que certaines de ces physionomies pétillent de vie, le coloris si délicat et la minutie du détail leur vont moins bien, ce me semble, qu'aux physionomies féminines, qui s'accrochent mieux du genre un peu précieux. Ici Hilpert est inégal: quelques visages moches, mais, par bonheur et tout à côté, une couple de figures qui sont de petites merveilles de charme comestique. Toutes ces miniatures ont quelques pouces de surface seulement, mais elles ressortissent dans leur cadre large.

Avec cela Josef Hilpert expose une grande toile, cette fois: le portrait du cardinal Villeneuve. Très digne. Très solennel. L'artiste a traité sa toile comme ses miniatures: elle est lisse, abondamment passée au vernis, travaillée au détail. C'est un premier défaut. Le coloris lui-même, très habile, ajoute par sa délicatesse à ce qui manque de vigueur. Visage et mains sont ceux d'un mannequin de cire; un joli mannequin, mais... Enfin, pour achever une idéalisation qui n'eût convenu qu'à une miniature, Hilpert a imaginé un arrière-plan de colonnades romaines où apparaît une statue de vestale symbolisant la Foi; pour quiconque a le sens des traditions catholiques un pareil arrière-plan à la vague manière de la Renaissance paraîtra sûrement incongru. A tout prendre, une intéressante miniature agrandie, mais pas un vrai portrait, et surtout pas un bon portrait du cardinal Villeneuve.

L'architecture au McGill
UNE centaine de dessins des élèves en architecture du McGill ont exposés à la Galerie des Arts, rue Sherbrooke ouest, jusqu'à dimanche. Quelques projets s'en tiennent encore aux grandes lignes conventionnelles, mais d'autres accusent des aspirations vers des formules neuves qui sachent allier la pratique à l'agréable.

A GAUCHE, "Frada", par Lillias-Torrence Newton, une expressive synthèse, au coloris hardi mais moins crû que ne peut le faire supposer la photo en noir et blanc; la physionomie est rêveuse. A DROITE, "Jeune fille en brun", de Mrs Agnes Warren, figure évoquée avec économie et à larges traits; figure parlante. (Clichés la "Presse").

On note, en particulier, des projets de musée provincial, d'édifices d'expositions, d'hôtel en pays tropical, de salles de danse, de villas d'été, de librairie collégiale. Toute une section est consacrée à l'héraldique.

L'exposition a une allure artistique faite de jeunesse, de rénovation, de largeur d'esprit, qui font honneur aux futurs architectes et témoignent qu'ils sont formés à très bonne école.

Daumier

DEUX expositions Daumier organisées à Paris par les soins des Musées Nationaux et de la Bibliothèque Nationale, l'une au Musée de l'Orangerie et l'autre à la Galerie Mazarine, retiennent d'autant plus l'attention, ce printemps, que l'atmosphère du scandale Stavisky prête souvent un sens aigu aux œuvres du grand satiriste. Voici, en bref, la substance de quelques notices qu'on lui consacre dans les quotidiens de Paris.

Daumier est populaire auprès des artistes et des critiques depuis plusieurs années. De nombreuses études lui ont été consacrées. Certaines de ses œuvres ont obtenu de forts prix dans les ventes artistiques. Les expositions actuelles disent les genres divers de Daumier, mais on y retrouve toujours l'abondance, la truculence et, si l'on peut dire, le "débordement" soit dans l'invention, soit dans la technique, soit dans l'attention. Ses contemporains, malheureusement, n'ont pas compris comme ceux d'aujourd'hui sa verve et son talent. Petit clerc d'huissier, commis de librairie, Daumier ne reçut guère d'instruction technique; il eut le don d'observation et apprit son métier en travaillant. Le secret de sa réussite, il faut le chercher dans les événements d'alors et l'ardeur de son âme. Le sens de l'humour chez cet artiste essentiellement peuple ne l'empêche pas d'être douloureux, dramatique. Les révolutions de 1848 et même de 1871 ont frappé son cœur. Il est humain au premier chef. Il eut le sens du vrai et s'inspira de la vie courante comme pas un. Ce fut un talent probe, désintéressé, sincère, auquel on pourrait à peine reprocher une tendance à "enlaidir" ses sujets pour mieux en accentuer le sens douloureusement humoristique.

M. Alfred Faniel

LA Belgique a récemment décoré du titre de chevalier de l'Ordre de Léopold II M. Alfred Faniel, dont le travail et le talent font honneur à la colonie belge de Montréal. Né à Verviers en 1879, il reçut sa formation artistique à l'Ecole S.-Luc et à l'Académie royale de Liège, et vint s'établir au Canada en 1903. Son œuvre a été nombreuse: décorations et tableaux d'églises, de théâtres, de résidences (v.g. le château Dufresne), portraits, scènes de genre, paysages. Il a le culte du coloris chaud.

Dans la vie privée M. Faniel est de la belle race des gentilhommes chrétiens. Il a de nombreux amis et a maintes fois mis son talent au service d'organisations charitables ou patriotiques.

Notules

UNE de nos chroniques d'il y a quelques mois passés a été traduite et publiée dans une revue allemande de Suisse. Un journal anglais d'Ottawa a cité récemment notre première appréciation sur les œuvres de Clarence Gagnon. D'élogieuses lettres nous sont parvenues de quelques personnes distinguées et d'architectes d'Europe à qui Dom Bellot avait fait parvenir certains compte-rendus parus dans la "Presse" de ses conférences à Montréal.

La revue parisienne "L'art Vivant", d'une toilette toujours impeccablement artistique, a consacré son dernier numéro à l'art russe d'autrefois et d'aujourd'hui. On y trouvera d'intéressantes révélations. Le numéro précédent avait rendu hommage à l'aviation.

A la Galerie des Arts se continuent le Salon du Printemps, l'exposition des silhouettes de René Kulbach et, aussi, pour une semaine cette fois, celle des projets des étudiants en architecture au McGill.

"Mother", le chef-d'œuvre de Whistler, fait actuellement le tour des Etats-Unis, entouré de grandes précautions et de beaucoup de soins. On sait que le gouvernement américain fait pour le Jour des mères une émission de timbres reproduisant le tableau si justement réputé.

Il s'est présenté pas moins de 12,000 sujets et tableaux pour le prochain Salon de l'Académie Royale à Londres. Reste à faire le choix.

PAINTERS AWARDED JESSIE DOW PRIZES

Gazette May 11/34
Robert W. Pilot, A.R.C.A., and Henry J. Simpkins, of Montreal, Recipients

Robert W. Pilot, A.R.C.A., and Henry J. Simpkins, both of Montreal, were yesterday awarded the Jessie Dow prizes for oils and watercolors, respectively. Both of these painters are well represented at the Spring Show of the Art Association of Montreal, which, incidentally, closes at 5 o'clock on Sunday, and it was from their works on exhibition that selection was made, the prizes being awarded under the conditions laid down by the donor, Miss Jessie Dow.

Mr. Pilot was awarded the prize for oils for his painting entitled "House at Chamby, P.Q."—a road deep in snow in sunlight and shadow and, on the right, a typical country house. This painting of the Cullen home is a work of fine values and is handled with strength and confidence. Beside the house are trees, through the lower branches of which can be seen the ice-covered Richelieu River.

Mr. Simpkins, who, incidentally, wins this prize for the second time, is an exponent of the watercolor medium according to the best traditions—free, full fluid "wash," the color clean and the white of the paper playing its important part in "Near Morin Heights," a winter scene with wooded hills reaching far into the background. The sky is "put in" with freedom and the handling of the lights and shadows is competent. It is a capital interpretation of Laurentian country at a beautiful season.

Prize-Winning Painter Tendered Dinner at Arts Club

Robert W. Pilot, A.R.C.A., was guest of honor at a special dinner held at The Arts Club, 2027 Victoria street, last night to celebrate Mr. Pilot's winning of the Jessie Dow prize for oil paintings for the second time. Chrystle Douglas, president of the club, presided and Emile Lemieux, representing the council, extended to Mr. Pilot the congratulations of his fellow members. Henry J. Simpkins, twice winner of the Jessie Dow prize for watercolors, was among the guests.

Works by Three Canadian Women
Star May 9/34

By ARTHUR LISMER, A.R.C.A.
Sarah Robertson — Prudence Heward — and Isobel MacLaughlin, are three young women painters who are exhibiting this month at Scott and Sons, on Drummond street.

To any who still have an idea that painting in Canada is a peculiarly masculine kind of pursuit, undertaken only by those hardy painters who can pack a canoe and a sketching outfit into the wilderness and bring home the bacon, in the shape of paintings of pine trees, rapids, glaciers, muskegs and snowy mountain peaks, there is another delusion shattered when they see the strength and design with a purpose that typifies this "three man" show. It is true in art as it is of other activities, the younger painters of Canada who are doing anything worthwhile these days are women, as well as men artists; although the adventuring is not entirely a bushwhacking sort of existence it has its forms of contribution to the design and fundamental qualities—that are more enduring than the literal ones, in painting).

Perhaps in the case of Montreal painters the origin of this independence can be traced to William Brymner who was a fine artist and a great teacher—in the fact that he had the wisdom to let his students express themselves. Toronto has not been so fortunate in this respect. Perhaps also there is the fact that from Montreal the artist is more easily introduced to fine and paintable country; whereas in Toronto the painters have had to journey far. It may even be due to the fact that Montreal is more stolidly academic and literal in point of view and that painters living there produce their strongly accented canvasses as a protest against the stolidness of the general run of purely masculine painting in Montreal.

Sarah Robertson is almost a veteran—although she won't like to see it put this way. She has the wisdom of experience, and the experience to change her wisdom into new and changing forms. There is one of her canvasses in the National Gallery of a little group sitting under the trees in an oval group composition that is a little masterpiece of character and quality of painting; and another in this exhibition of a wall and trees of a Sulpician Monastery that recalls Morrice a little and yet has something entirely beautiful of its own. Her Nuns in a Garden with the automaton like qualities of the sisters and the living luscious quality of the heaps of gourds and pumpkins that is simply alive with freshness and sure design. Her landscapes are living examples that nature is a source and not a standard, and she has the courage to create landscapes, and not copy them literally. They are adventurous and convincing statements that an artist only gets a fine design from nature if she brings that faculty to it.

Prudence Heward's canvasses are looked for at each exhibition and she rarely disappoints her admirers. There is a picture called "Rollande" belonging to the National Gallery collection—simple and direct—forceful and challenging, if you like, but it is also a mellow, rich theme expression of its simple environment and origin. This is not included in the exhibition at Scott's Gallery. But there is another of an Egyptian figure with a wild arrangement of hair—the body and face splendidly painted. Miss Heward is imitated, which may or may not be the sincerest form of flattery. A little girl in a pink frock holding a posy is one of the most childlike portraits that has been produced in Canada. It is

The exhibition for the month of May in the upstairs gallery at the McGill University Library is of a collection of large and small watercolor drawings of Indian birds and fishes, made at the beginning of the last century in Madras by Lady Elizabeth Gwillim, who died in 1807. They are exact illustrations and remarkably good work of their kind but their exactness makes their interest scientific rather than artistic. They are evidently of great value to bird lovers and students.

The hundredth anniversary of Whistler's birth is not being honored by any specially large exhibition of his works; his pictures are too scattered about the world to make this possible without much trouble and expense, though his portrait of his mother, from the Luxembourg Gallery in Paris is at present touring America. Some smaller exhibitions of his work are being held in London and there is a specially fine collection of his etchings, — which are considered by many people to be his best works, — in an exhibition at the Victoria and Albert Museum.

Work is just being begun on some important alterations and enlargements to the British Museum. One thing to be done is the building of a new gallery, specially designed, for the Elgin Marbles; this is one of Lord Duveen's many gifts to the national collections. Besides this, additional space is to be provided for the Egyptian collections, which will allow them to be better seen than at present. An addition to the Library is said to be intended to provide space for the books of the next sixty years.

The National Portrait Gallery in London has often in the past had difficulty in securing suitable portraits of people whose distinction entitled them to inclusion in the collection. In some cases only sketches, in others no portrait at all could be got. In future, provision is to be made to meet this difficulty by the commissioning of portraits of living people who are evidently distinguished enough to be given places in the gallery after they are dead.

entirely unsentimental, which is the only attitude towards child portraits that is worth anything, for children are so thoroughly natural themselves. Prudence Heward is a fine painter, a most exacting and particular draughtsman and a stimulating creator of fine design. Her landscapes avoid anything in the way of pretty textures or pictorial detail. They are concerned more with the structure and movement of the earth and tree forms, rather than with representations of the likeness of the scene.

The last of the trio of women painters is Isobel MacLaughlin of Toronto, whose work is not so familiar to Montrealers. She has painted widely in Ontario, in the north country, at Cobalt, in the mountains, and wherever a subject shows itself to be of interest to her. Miss MacLaughlin is perhaps the most modern of the trio in that her paintings are definitely subjective in motive and execution—a design is made of snowy roofs or trees and houses, or a shoreline of spruce and the depths of tangled bush country. The treatment is mostly a question of relationships of forms and colors to the design or pattern of her idea, and is carried out boldly and uncompromisingly.

All three are members of the "Canadian Group of Painters."

The excitement created by Stanley Spencer's pictures at Burlington House has more than justified my last week's epithet of "Enfant terrible." That well-known artist and writer Jan Gordon says in the Observer, "There can be little doubt that, compared with his earlier work, these later pictures are moving towards the edge of the incomprehensible." Frank Rutter, the Sunday Times critic, asks his readers if it is the unfortunate example of Blake that has persuaded so many artists of talent that bad drawing is a necessary preliminary to the expression of the spiritual in art?

The eulogies of another art critic, however, have evoked a "cri de coeur" from Frank Salisbury against all distorted vision and misrepresentation of Nature, and he will find many sympathizers among those who do not believe that fifty years hence public opinion will acclaim what Sir Reginald Blomfield calls "The hideous and unclear in modern Art."

Canada Secures Valuable Paintings at Big Saving

Historical Portraits of General Wolfe and Earl of Durham Acquired Through Ward C. Pitfield, of Montreal, for $45,000—Details of Deal Tabled in House

OTTAWA, May 18.—(C.P.)—Canada appears to have saved $20,000 in purchasing the historical portraits of Wolfe, by Highmore, and the Earl of Durham, by Lawrence, according to a memorandum by Dr. A. G. Doughty, Dominion Archivist, tabled in the House of Commons yesterday. The Highmore portrait of Wolfe, the only one known to have been painted from life, was offered for sale in London nearly six years ago for $60,000, subsequently reduced to $35,000. That of the Earl of Durham was offered for $30,000.

The Canadian Government acquired them through Ward C. Pitfield, of Montreal, for $45,000.

ON MARKET IN 1929

When the Wolfe portrait came "on the market" in 1929 Dr. Doughty was asked by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister, "what steps should be taken to procure it." It was then discovered that both portraits had been acquired by Mr. Pitfield, for approximately $50,000. In July 1932, the present Government negotiated through Dr. Doughty for the sale of these historical masterpieces, and secured them for $45,000.

The Order-in-Council was in the following terms: "The committee of the Privy Council have before them a report, dated June 30, 1932, from the Secretary of State, submitting: "That two historical portraits of very special interest to Canada have recently been offered for sale to the Government, namely:

"A portrait of James Wolfe, painted by Highmore, and a portrait of the Earl of Durham, painted by Thomas Lawrence.

"That the Highmore portrait is the only known portrait for which Wolfe gave a sitting, and that it remained in the possession of the family for whom it was painted until it was offered, some four years ago, for $12,000 sterling:

"That when the price subsequently was reduced to $7,000 sterling, the Governor-General of Canada and others became interested in the purchase of it for Canada, and the Secretary of State is informed that the Prime Minister of that day spoke to the Dominion Archivist in regard to its purchase by the Government:

"That, in the meantime, before a decision was reached, this portrait was purchased by Ward C. Pitfield, of Montreal:

"That the painting of the Earl of Durham is the portrait which hung in the Lambton Castle, the seat of the Durham family, and that it is a well-known picture:

"That this picture was also purchased by Ward C. Pitfield by cable at a time when other Canadians were prepared to make a very substantial offer for it:

NATIONAL ASSET

"That both these pictures would be a national asset:

"That the two portraits can now be obtained for the sum of $45,000 on the following conditions, namely:

"The payment of $3,000 on the delivery of the two pictures to the Public Archives and the payment of the balance as funds may be available for the purpose in instalments of not less than $1,000 each:

"The final payment to be made on or before the 31st day of March 1935, with interest at the rate of four per cent per annum on deferred payments.

"The committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, advise that the two pictures above mentioned be purchased from Ward C. Pitfield for $45,000 and that on the delivery of the pictures the sum of $3,000 be paid to him out of the vote of the Public Archives of Canada for the present fiscal year, and that the balance of $42,000 be paid as funds are available for that purpose, in instalments of $1,000 each, final payment to be completed on or before March 31, 1935, with interest, at the rate of four per cent per annum on deferred payments."

How the slender figure of General Wolfe, the intrepid but ill-fated conqueror of Canada, stalked down through the ages and influenced the appointment of a Canadian Government official was revealed today following an announcement in Parliament yesterday that the Government had paid $45,000 for the Highmore portrait of the General together with a portrait of the Earl of Durham.

"It occurs to me that the Wolfe portrait is largely responsible for my appointment as public archivist," said Dr. A. G. Doughty who is soon to retire from that post. He then told how, as an official of the Quebec Government, he was charged with the difficult task of determining the exact site of the battle of the Plains of Abraham after the original plans had been lost and incidentally found the owners of Wolfe's portrait and attracted the attention of the Dominion Government.

While he was joint librarian of the Quebec Legislature, he said, a discussion arose as to the renewal of the lease of the Plains of Abraham to the Dominion Government for a further 99 years for one dollar and as to the value of the land. Doubts arose as to the exact site.

The Prime Minister of Quebec, the late Hon. F. G. Marchand, instructed Mr. Doughty to lay aside all other work and ascertain the site of the battle, promising him the assistance of engineers and architects and any money required.

MARCHAND INSISTED

"I did not wish to embark on this task," said Mr. Doughty, but the Prime Minister insisted. I took my troubles to Monsignor Mathieu, late Bishop of Regina, and Abbe LaFlamme, rector of Laval University. Both offered to help me in every way.

The research for plans of the site were at first fruitless and he then began to assemble material for a book. "G. W. Parmelee agreed to collaborate and wrote the Life of Wolfe, and the Life of Montcalm. The first volume was written by Hon. Thomas Chapais," he said. "The work was completed in six volumes," he added.

Mr. Doughty has voluminous correspondence, filling many volumes, which was carried on in an effort to track the descendants of those who took part in the siege of Quebec.

"In the search for portraits I met the owner of the Highmore portrait who lived at Nancavalverne, Penzance, and correspondence ensued as the details of the origin of the picture were obtained," he stated. Dr. Doughty remarked that this was in 1900 and produced original letters dealing with the matter.

"During the progress of this work I received a letter from Lord Aberdeen, Governor-General, that the plans I was seeking of the siege of Quebec had been sent to Ottawa during the early part of the administration of the Marquis of Lansdowne," he remarked. Dr. Doughty came to Ottawa, but met with no success, as he was informed that the plans were not in Ottawa, or they had been destroyed by fire.

MINTO COMPLAINED

He described how one day in 1900 Lord Minto came to the Library in Quebec and said that he would return on the following day to see some plans of the citadel in order to identify a power magazine. "On the morning no plans were forthcoming, and the Governor-General said 'It is the same story everywhere. When I ask you for a document in Ottawa it cannot be found.'"

"The letters from Ottawa and England were shown to him by which he was convinced that at least I had tried to discover the plans," Dr. Doughty stated. "He asked for the letters and on his return, Sir Joseph Pope, after much labor, found a few in a cellar and with the aid of an old messenger 50 more were found, and finally several hundred came to light."

Dr. Doughty said that Lord Minto had the plans carefully put away and wrote the letter mentioned in his biography which led to the erection of the first Archives Building in Canada and to his own appointment as archivist.

Dr. Doughty considered it a remarkable circumstance that yesterday a man brought into the archives one of the original plans of Ottawa returned to Canada by Lord Lansdowne, which was thrown away or stolen nearly half a century ago.

"It is evident that the Wolfe picture and the plans were largely responsible for my appearance in Ottawa," he stated. "These plans are one of Canada's greatest assets although the archivist is a poor one."

The plans referred to decided the exact site of the battle of the Plains of Abraham which has since been marked for all time by the National Battlefields Commission.

The useful work which is done by the Montreal School of Arts and Trades can be seen from the exhibition of the work done in the past year by its students, which is being shown this week, closing tomorrow evening, at the Monument National. Drawing and modelling are the subjects taught in this section of the school and some good work, which gives evidence of sound training is shown by the classes in modelling. The drawings are for the most part from casts and the quality of the work done is of good quality, with some particularly good drawings. There is also some very good work in the small drawings and quick sketches done by members of the class for teachers. In architectural drawing some good work has been done in small and simple problems, there are a few excellent examples of lettering and some small paintings of still life. The school is evidently fulfilling its function of laying a sound groundwork for further training.

E. G. Brodie Brockwell, A.I.A.A., architect of the Montreal Tramways, has just been elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts of London. Mr. Brockwell has made some special studies of some of the older buildings of this province and has lately gathered some information about the use of thatch for roofs in French Canada, of which evidence is to be found at several places between Montreal and Quebec. The art of thatching, a rather difficult one, is dying out, even in England and Europe, and appears to have died out completely in this part of North America, where thatched houses may at one time have been common. Examples of such roofs are now scarce and little known. The thatches in question are made of a local blue grass hay; Canadian wheat straw seems to be too brittle to be used for thatching in England.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

Some one must surely have passed the word round to all the portrait painters that blue would be the fashionable color this spring. How else can one explain the unanimity with which they have clothed their sitters in this charming color?

Sickert has painted a tall narrow panel with a portrait of Sir James Dunn dressed in the inevitable blue, facing the world with an extremely truculent expression. The other portrait exhibited by this painter is a startling one of Fabia Drake as Lady Macbeth, looking like an old beggar woman. In Room I is a striking portrait by Augustus John of Major Douglas, that energetic advocate of monetary reform who has been lecturing in Canada. He, too, is dressed in a blue coat against a blue background. Gerald Kelly whose numbered portraits of his wife are so well-known has sent no "Jane XXX" this year, but a magnificent picture of that great scientist Sir Almroth Wright sitting in his laboratory in St. Mary's Hospital.

The portrait that will undoubtedly attract most attention is that of the artist James Pryde by his friend James Gunn, whose "Conversation Piece" of three famous writers last year was one of the Academy triumphs. This year Mr. Gunn's pre-eminence as a portrait painter is confirmed by three canvases: the magnificent full-length picture of Pryde, a portrait of Lord Lee of Fareham, in all the regalia of his Chancellor's robes, and a beautiful portrait of Mrs. Gerald Wellesley, dressed in black velvet with wide fur-trimmed sleeves, standing with folded hands before a wine-colored curtain.

The 1934 Academy will not be considered a very distinguished one, but there are many charming landscapes such as Algernon Newton's picture of West Wycombe Park, the seat of Sir John and Lady Dashwood; the landscapes by Arnesby Brown, and Stanley Royle's scenes painted in Nova Scotia.

The Royal Family, who usually suffer on these occasions, have come off rather well this year. The portrait of the King has the place of honor in the big gallery and Oswald Birley has painted him with all his usual skill. He has been even happier in his portrait of H.R.H. the Duchess of York, dressed in dark red velvet with a creamy frilled fichu she smiles out of the canvas with that eager expectant look that is one of her greatest charms. Cathleen Mann's portrait of Prince George (in blue-grey) manages to be attractive without showing much skill, but Simon Elwes has achieved a really lovely picture of H.R.H. the Princess Royal in riding kit.

The Academy seems to have vetoed modern distortions, for the newly elected Associate, Stanley Spencer, is the only 'Enfant Terrible' of the exhibition. Women artists seem more in a minority than usual, but the work shown is above the average. The distinction of the late Mrs. Swynnerton's pictures makes it dangerous for the artist whose work is hung near hers. Dame Laura Knight has sent a large canvas showing Mr. Lamorna Birch and his two children in a wood, an arresting picture full of atmosphere, a startling change from the static circus pictures one knows so well. Mrs. Dod Proctor, who has just been elected an A.R.A., has sent a recumbent nude figure recalling her famous "Morning" bought for the nation seven years ago, and other able women painters are Flora Lion, who shows portraits of Julius Olsson (in blue against a blue background) and a lively one of the Viscountess Selby; Ethel Gabain, Ethel Walker, Doris Zinkelsen, Joan Manning Sanders and Dorothea Sharp. The Chantrey Bequest has been used to buy five pictures for the Academy, two by Pissarro, a portrait of the artist's wife by Henry Lamb, "Horse Sale at the Barbican" by the late Robert P. Bevan, and "The Penitents Bench," a study of derelict old men in a Salvation Army Refuge by Archibald S. Hartwick.

I had no time in one brief visit to discover new favorites but brought away a grateful memory of the purity of line and color that always delight one in the pictures of W. Russell Flint.

EXHIBITIONS PLENTIFUL

There is a plethora of exhibitions this week. There is a show of Austrian arts and crafts in the Dorland Galleries, sponsored by the Austrian Ambassador who is inviting everyone to go to his country and see for themselves the treasures of which these are but samples. For the entertainment of his guests he provided a puppet show with a novel technique of figures manipulated from below with marvelously expressive gestures, created by Richard Teschner, the Viennese painter and etcher.

Across St. James's Park one found a more ephemeral exhibition in the halls of the Royal Horticultural Society, where Canadian garden lovers can feast their eyes each alternate Tuesday on a bewildering display of beauty, culminating in the great June show in Chelsea. This week the Rhododendron Association held their annual show with the usual gorgeous masses of bloom of every conceivable shade of color. But magnificent as these were, one could not help preferring the exquisite almost unbelievable flowers in the Vincent Square hall, where the Alpine Garden Society were holding their late spring show. Never have there been gentians of a more vivid blue, and the auriculas lovelier in their shades ranging from the deepest purple to delicate mauve.

Pictures of Mountains by Albert Meindl

News of Art From Abroad

A collection of about fifty pictures by an Austrian painter, Albert Meindl, is now being exhibited at the Continental Gallery, 1310 St. Catherine street west. Mr. Meindl, who has won high prizes and honors not only in his native city, Vienna, but in many other places in Europe, has done most of his work among mountains, either in Switzerland or in the Tirol, and much of it in the winter. The larger part of his pictures in this exhibition are of a kind that is familiar in Canada—studies of sunlight and shadow on big surfaces of snow, painted with truth and with a vividness and brilliancy which are all the more astonishing in view of the simplicity, and sometimes breadth, of the painting; and the strong effects of light and shade are not got by the surface qualities of the paint.

The varieties of color which snow can take under sunlight is the subject of many of these pictures, but among the more outstanding examples are the two big pictures "Midday Sun" and "Snow in June" and a smaller one, "The Little Church on the Hill"; the snow effects are heightened by contrast with buildings in "The End of the Road" and "The Lone Cabins";—two pictures of farm buildings in the mountains. Remarkable studies of the tender grays of shadows on snow are "Late Winter Afternoon" and the small "Ski Jump." There are also two very striking, and entirely true pictures of the glow of color of sunrise and sunset on snow covered mountains. Color is enriched by rocks and trees in some of the summer and autumn pictures, such as the green trees in "A Forest Corner," "The Path Through the Snow" and the little view of "The Dachstein," or the autumn reds and browns in "Solitude" and "Autumn in the Alps."

Fine effects of color, in which snow plays little if any part, are to be seen in two pictures of men ploughing in the mountains, in each of which there is the splendid red-

A commemorative exhibition of relics of Lafayette is now being shown in the new Maison Francaise in the Rockefeller Centre, New York. The collection includes portraits of Lafayette and of people with whom he was associated, particularly in America, personal belongings and pictures of scenes in his life. These have been lent for exhibition by a large number of owners, most of them American but with some European owners as well.

The recent buying of the manuscript of the New Testament, Codex Sinaiticus, for the British Museum aroused a storm of protest from people who thought it a waste of public money. It appears however that only little, if any, public money will have to be spent for the purpose. An appeal for subscriptions was made, appropriately by the Archbishop of Canterbury, who is, by right of office, a principal trustee of the British Museum, and he has now reported that more than £50,000, which was the Museum's share of the purchase price, has been received. He is appealing for still further subscriptions, particularly from churches, and hopes that the government may be relieved of all expense from public funds in connection with the purchase.

brown of a typical Tirolese horse. A small picture, "Evening,"—of a village street in grey twilight, is like all the other pictures in the exhibition, and there is strong color and very broad painting in one of the latest of Mr. Meindl's works, "Farmhouse in a rocky valley."

A few of the pictures were painted in Italy and are full of gay coloring. One of the best of these is "Village Road in Sicily," with a group of peasants with a cart, dokeys and goats; even better "Away for the Catch,"—fishing boats with patches of red on the sails against the play of sunrise light on an almost smooth sea. There are one or two other studies of the sea—one of the best of them a study of waves breaking on the shore in "Sunset Near Mentone."

Miss Marian Frost Deplores Lack of Civic Museum in Montreal

MUCH IS ADMIRER

Delegate From England Is Shocked by Admission Fee and Limited Hours of Art Gallery

As far her museums go, Montreal has the goods but no shop. The ordinary man in the street who wouldn't enter a museum if you asked him may not care very much about this, but when museum authorities from other cities and countries visit Montreal, they are, like Samuel Butler, very much shocked and tempted to exclaim, "O God, O Montreal!"

In this eclectic band is numbered Miss Marian Frost, museum emissary and authority extraordinary. She is England's representative and the only woman delegate to the American Museums Association's conference at Toronto, to be held next Tuesday. For the past two days she has been roaming about Montreal, alternately uttering cries of pleasure and throwing up her hands in horror.

"What, no civic centre?" she exclaimed to herself. Later she made the same observation to a number of people who blushing hung their heads. "Here you have a dozen museums cluttered around Montreal, some of them with a lot of fine stuff in them, and you don't provide a decent building for them?" she asked.

Well may Miss Frost go about demanding things like that. She is a Fellow of the Library Association, the first woman to receive the diploma of the Museums Association and likewise the first woman to be admitted to the council of the English Museums Association. In Worthing she is the director of the civic museum, library, art gallery and children's library. She is believed to know something about museums.

Even the Art Gallery on Sherbrooke street gave her pause. She was disgusted to find it had an admission charge and was only open at certain hours.

Landscapes of Tyrol, Swiss

Austria

Snow scenes by the Austrian painter Albert Meindl now being shown at Continental Galleries of Fine Arts, 1310 St. Catherine street west, formally introduce to Montreal picture-lovers the work of a talented artist. The collection, grouped under the apt title "The Poetry of Winter," is a comprehensive one that should excite interest in Montrealeers who, well in the van as connoisseurs of snow, will find refreshing these sparkling paintings of noble snowclad mountains, crystal-smothered trees and broad glittering reaches of Alpine meadows at varying hours. Meindl's pictures are well composed and his color is bright and clean. His skies, whether cloud-flecked or spacious expanses of varying blues, suggest the rare air of high altitudes, and the wind-carved drifts and the pattern of shadows play their decorative part. Throughout the fifty odd canvases there is no hint of hesitation—the painter aimed at a definite effect and has generally attained it. The handling of the paint is simple and fluid, the technique leaning towards the sleek in surface. There are a few departures from this method in scenes set at another season—among them houses at the base of massive mountains, and quaint buildings in an old narrow street in Vienna, two works in which the impasto is heavy, the handling robust and the tones rich. That he is not a one-season man is evident by some agricultural scenes in which the painting of the horses doing field duty shows sound anatomical knowledge. Further, where the human figure is introduced there is distinct life and movement. Other instances of his open-mindedness as to subject are shown in "Surf in the Gulf of Genoa," "A Village Road in Sicily," "In a Monastery Garden," and "Sunset Near Mentone." Interesting as these are, Meindl seems happier when he wanders abroad in his own land and clammers into high country.

THE POETRY OF WINTER

As most congenial sketching aids for Meindl have been the Alps of Austria and the Swiss Alps. Here he has found all needed to satisfy his search for the noble snowclad peaks and sheer above the timber-line have furnished all sorts of management of light and shadow on these peaks and in the valleys he shows himself a keen and practised observer. Effective, too, is he in depicting the sunlit wooded ranges above lake or sheltered valley. In the drawing of his trees he is precise without being photographic and his sheds and buildings look solid enough to stand the stiffest blow when blizzards rage. In these scenes he has found a wealth of paintable material—the quiet brook and snow-smothered trees, a team hauling logs, cabins almost buried under a load of glistening white, shadowed valleys beneath peaks flushed with rose—all that a nature alive to form and color requires for inspiration. The paintings shown express differing hours and varying moods and there is no hint of monotony. The spacious scale is "The End of the Road"—fence and snow-covered posts, a stretch of sunlit snow and a group of buildings backed by massive mountains aglitter under a blue sky in which thin clouds float. Simple in composition but very happy in arrangement is "The Little Church on the Hill"—the snowclad spired building on a rounded slope that stretches to cottages, backed by heights. The sky is an even blue, the shadows of more intense tone and the snowy expanse is broken by trampled paths. "Snow in June," a work of strong contrasts, is marked by the play of sunlight and shadow on distant peaks, while evergreens bar the middle distance beyond a foreground in deep shade. "The Passing Day"—a stream flowing between snowbanks under a grey sky, expresses solitude, and "The Lone Cabins" is aglow with sunlight after a heavy snowfall. "The Splendor of Nature," a work of generous scale, shows mountains in sunlight that illumines a wooded hillside. The valley is an expanse of drifted snow moulded and scored by winds. In "Vanguards of the Forest," pines laden with snow are the centre of interest, and in "Fairland," emphasis is given to young evergreens encrusted with snow. "The Road into the Forest," makes effective use of a fence which edges the road beyond a wayside shrine, and "The Forest Brook," might be a scene from Canada. "The Month of"—small icefloes in a stream —indicates the advent of warmer weather, and "The Approach of Spring," with its sun-flushed trees and grass showing at the edge of a patch of snow is true of the season. Parched grass showing between banks of broken snow tells of spring in "A Forest Corner." "Evening," a scene far removed from snowclad heights, is a glimpse of old snow-covered buildings in a quiet Vienna street, still old-fashioned enough to be content with gas lamps for illumination. This little canvas is lovely in values and its spirit expresses peace.

Albert Meindl was born in Vienna, June 20, 1891, studied at the Vienna Institute of Art and at the Imperial Academy. He added to his art education by travel in Switzerland, Italy, France and Holland. His art is highly regarded in Austria and his paintings are welcomed at the chief exhibitions held in Rome, Venice and Munich, to mention a few of the important art centres. He has been officially honored for his work.

ALLWARD'S DEATH REMAINS MYSTERY

Open Verdict Returned of English Coroner's Jury

LONDON, May 28.—(C.P. Cable).—An open verdict, was returned by the coroner's jury at Paddington today in an inquest on the death of John Allward, son of Walter Seymour Allward, Canadian sculptor, who came to his death in a fall from an apartment window at Dinard, France.

The coroner said there were many possibilities. Allward might have jumped out of the window in a sudden fit of depression, but there was no definite evidence.

It is unusual for an English coroner to hold an enquiry into a tragedy that happened abroad, but the coroner pointed out that apparently no inquest had been held at Dinard. The body was brought to England for cremation, and as a record of the case was attached to the coffin, the undertaker to whom the body was taken, reported it to the coroner.

Mrs. Adele Rogers, the principal witness, testified she had been in France with Allward, who was married but living apart from his wife. They visited Vimy Ridge, where the elder Allward had been working on the great Canadian war memorial, and then went to Dinard.

VERY SERIOUS

She said she knew nothing of what occurred on the evening of May 19, when Allward came to his death. He was found, clad in pyjamas, lying dead, beneath his bedroom window. She declared Allward had been quite sober and there had been no trouble, but that he was very nervous and excited "owing to a nervous heart."

A London doctor said there was no sign of disease of any organs. The coroner pointed out that Allward suffered from insomnia, being worried about his heart. He might have gone to bed and, finding himself unable to sleep, had gone to the window and fallen out, he suggested, or he might have jumped out in a sudden fit of depression owing to inability to sleep. Again, he might have been sleep-walking. In view of the fact there was insufficient evidence to show how he fell, he would return an open verdict, he said.

British Egyptologist States Local Collection Valuable One

McGill University has a very fine Egyptian collection, and Edward Macchell-Cox, who sailed this morning for Britain aboard the Cunarder Ascania, has spent the last several months arranging it.

"I can say that McGill has some very valuable museum pieces from Egypt, dating back as far as 4000 B.C., and some of the jewels are quite valuable," said Mr. Macchell-Cox, one of the best known interior decorators of England, who is an Egyptologist by avocation.

Mr. Macchell-Cox stated that the last eight months had been intermittently devoted to getting this museum arranged properly. The collection dates back to 4000 B.C., which is 1000 years before the Pyramids got under way.

Asked about hieroglyphics, Mr. Macchell-Cox said a McGill professor was busy translating those hieroglyphics.

"Do you believe the so-called curse that has followed Egyptologists like Carnarvon and Carter?"

"I do not—the ground there is alive with infection. It sounds as if they got fever or some infection."

"What about the story of the grain, sprouting after being in a mummy's band for ages?"

"All rot. Germination has gone from the grain centuries ago."

"You've been to Egypt often?"

"I volunteered the Star."

"Never in Egypt in my life," said the Egyptologist candidly. "I did all my studying about Egypt in the British museum."

The annual exhibition of work by the students of the School of Arts and Trades will be opened at the Monument National, St. Lawrence boulevard, tomorrow evening, Thursday, 7th, at 8 o'clock, and will remain open to the public till Thursday evening, 14th.

In view of the adverse conditions the annual report of the Art Association of Montreal for the year 1933, which has just been issued, must be considered a very good one. Membership has, of course, declined and the Association's revenue has been reduced, but all the activities of the Association have been kept up and carried on with success. The number of visitors to the galleries was considerably larger than in previous years, a fact which is largely due to the crowded attendance at the exhibition of the Van Horne collection.

The special exhibitions held in the galleries included the regular Spring Exhibition and that of the Royal Canadian Academy; the Van Horne collection was shown for three weeks, there was a representative collection of recent American water-colors and there were four "one man" shows in the print room. Six lectures on matters of art were given.

Many additions were made in the year to the Association's permanent collections. No pictures were bought but five, by J. C. Ibbotson, Boudin, the Hungarian painter, Janos Viski, Horne Russell and Suzor Cote, were given by Mrs. J. E. Gatehouse, Dr. Charles Winter, Ernest Alexander and Suzor Cote. Many additions were made to the collection of prints and drawings by purchase and gift. "Pure landscape, i.e., landscape without a hint of a human being anywhere around, is invariably uplifting, consoling, healing, and especially about this time of the year. It suggests the triumph and persistence of Nature, and man is immediately fortified by a contact with anything that seems to continue. Immortality is a vague hope that the innermost vanity of man perpetually clings to, but the recurring and tender greens that come upon the trees in the spring time are almost the only tokens of it that Nature vouchsafes to us."

"Consequently it does seem strange that landscapes had to wait so long before becoming a recognized and legitimate form of artistic expression. As you might suspect—knowing what you do of human nature—the first artists put themselves, and occasionally in extra generous moments, their friends, into their pictures; and it was only by accident and by degrees, and in an effort to lend, as Pooh-Bah once said, an air of "artistic verisimilitude to an otherwise bald and unconvincing narrative" that they thought to put some fragile little trees and funny little rocks into the backgrounds of the compositions where they themselves posed as saints. Little by little, and due to the urgings of complete outsiders (i.e. the first critics), more and more rocks and trees were introduced into the picture and finally, and only in comparatively modern times, the saints and heroes were left out altogether, and what we now call landscape painting came entirely into its own."—New York Sun.

Use of Quebec Woods for Cabinetmaking Shown at Technical School

NOTABLE WORKMANSHIP

Alphonse Belanger Stresses Development That Is Quite Possible With Native Products

The adaptability of the products of Province of Quebec forests to the making of high-grade furniture, is given a striking practical demonstration at the 21st annual exhibition of the Montreal Technical School, 200 Sherbrooke street west, which opened yesterday. Well over 1,000 exhibits are displayed.

In the cabinet-making exhibition is included an office furniture set in the most striking modern art designs made entirely by pupils from the plans of Jean Marie Gauvreau, head of the department. The set, which consists of a desk, book-case and several chairs, will be placed in the office of Alphonse Belanger, principal of the school, when the exhibition is over. It was constructed largely of Quebec wavy birch with bronze ornaments and maple leaf friezes in zebra-wood.

A dining-room set consisting of a table and six chairs designed for the Forest Products Commission of the Province of Quebec is another fine piece of workmanship. The chairs are made of Quebec red birch and the following Quebec woods were used for the manufacture of the table: Wavy red maple, birch, wild cherry, red oak, elm, ash, red birch, white birch, bird's eye maple, maple and butternut. The display of French style small furniture includes a large quantity of tables, tea-trays, etc. in a large variety of sizes and designs. Wild cherry, wavy red maple and birch are the woods that went into the making of these objects. A book-cabinet, telephone stand, radio and radiator cabinets, lamp-desk and music-cabinet are some of the pieces in the drawing-room set. They are made of zebra-wood and black walnut.

The remaining exhibits are distributed among the following departments: Machine shop, woodwork, smithy, electricity, foundry, construction and printing plant. Among the many exhibits of interest in these departments are a wrought-iron hall lamp, more than six feet high, and picturing a tree with a dragon coiled around it; wrought-iron lamp holders, chandeliers, fire tongs, wrought-iron gates, foot-stools, sewing cabinet, cedar chests and tables, wicker chairs, generators and a dynamo.

QUEBEC WOODS GOOD

Special stress was placed on the cabinet-making exhibit by Mr. Belanger. He explained that well-nigh all of the furniture for commercial purposes is manufactured with imported woods. Hitherto the properties of Province of Quebec and Canadian woods for furniture making were hardly known. Furniture made with local was nearly as good as that with foreign products and it could be manufactured as economically if all the discoveries of modern science were utilized and applied. This was precisely what the Montreal Technical School was endeavoring to do, he emphasized. He said that a wide market existed for furniture made of home products and he forecast that within 10 years much would be accomplished in developing the cabinet-making industry in the Province of Quebec.

The exhibition is schedule to remain open until June 23. It

Following the introduction of the English Librarians, the first general session of the convention came to an end and the delegates proceeded to the Art Association of Montreal to attend a reception tendered by the Department of Roads and Mines of the Province of Quebec, and the Mayor and City Council of Montreal. Details of this function will be found in another column.

RECEPTION AT GALLERIES

Delegates Guests of Province and City

Nearly 1,600 members of the American Librarians' Association last night ended the first day's activities of a week-long convention, by attending a reception held at the Art Galleries, Sherbrooke street west, following several study sessions at which problems confronting their profession were discussed over a wide range of angles.

Most of the delegates to the convention, of whom 1,560 had been registered throughout the day, attended the reception, at which they were welcomed by representatives of the provincial and city governments, as well as met by outstanding local followers of art.

Many of them accompanied by their wives, the delegates arrived at the Art Galleries shortly after ten o'clock last night, to be received by Emile Vaillancourt, special officer of the Quebec Tourist Council, on behalf of the provincial Government; by Ald. W. S. Weldon, on behalf of the city; and by A. Browning, chairman of the Art Galleries, on behalf of the association. They were then shown around the different salons of the gallery by leading local art enthusiasts, headed by Colonel V. Frid Bovey, director of extra-curricular relations for McGill University.

Refreshments were served during the tour of the galleries.

Any artist may send in any number of pictures, up to 50; all pictures must be framed and must measure not less than 14 inches by 16 inches. The name of the artist, title of the picture and price must be written plainly on the back of each picture. The decision of the committee of the galleries on the acceptance of any picture will be final.

Works of art must be delivered at the galleries and those which are unsold must be called for on or before September 1. The Eaton Co. will not be responsible for any damage or loss except by fire, and all pictures will be insured for half their selling prices. There are no charges except the usual commissions on sales.

Prizes For Art Teachers

The Council of the Royal Society of Arts, of London, offer to art teachers the following prizes for an essay on "Training Art Students for Industry and Commerce."

First prize: £50 ($250.00). Second prize: £10 ($50.00). Third prize: £5 ($25.00.)

The object of the Council in offering these prizes is to encourage art teachers to train their students in such a way that they will be fitted to take their places as designers or craftsmen in industry, and thus fulfil the principal object for which the schools of art were established.

Optimistic

NEW YORK, June 16.—(C.P.)—After a four months tour of the culture marts of Europe, Homer Schiff, Saint-Gaudens, who once defined art as akin to cirrhosis of the liver, thinks art is "coming up for air and a little sense."

As the Carnegie Institute director of fine arts, he had in his possession when he returned to Manhattan yesterday 250 canvasses for the annual Carnegie International Exhibition paintings, which opens in Pittsburgh in October.

His reasons for believing today's art less experimental, less insane and revealing greater craftsmanship. "The human impulse to decorate keeps on kicking—even in Austria."

"Italy is the most promising art centre in Europe."

"German art is more cheerful, but still neurotic and introspective."

"Spanish artists are feeling their oats."

"Artistically, the English are sitting pretty. Two or three years ago the Royal Academy tried to cater to the new idea in art. Today, it sits down on its breeches and likes it."

"Dutch painting is rather tight."

"The French, from our point of view, have lacked horse sense. Just now the horsey thing is in the ascendency."

Points From Letters

A. J. Livinson writes that one hardly realizes how small Montreal's halls and art galleries are until one travels and sees those in other places. We are out-dated and out-moded in these things. Can we not make up our minds to enter upon an era of building? He believes that the true public spirit traditional in Montreal is not yet dead.

Competitors must send in their essays not later than October 31st, 1934 to the Secretary, Royal Society of Arts, John St., Adelphi, London, W.C. 2, England.

The essays must not exceed 3,000 words in length. They must be typed and sent in under a motto or pseudonym, accompanied by a sealed envelope enclosing the author's name which must on no account be written on the essay. A breach of this regulation will result in disqualification.

The judges of the essays will be: Arthur Davis, A.R.A., F.R.I.B.A.; C. Geoffrey Holme, M.B.E., chairman of The Studio, Ltd.; (representing the council of the Royal Society of Arts); R. Radcliffe Carter, Secretary National Society of Art Masters; Charles Tennyson, C.M.G., Chairman, Industrial Art Committee, Federation of British Industries; Reginald R. The Gest Chinese Research Library

Libraries in the Western World devoted exclusively to books in the Chinese language are unlikely ever to be numerous. Of the most comprehensive collections today on the American Continent the Gest Chinese Research Library is second in number of volumes, and is comparable in the scope of its accessions to the Chinese Library of the Library of Congress (Washington, D.C.) which is the largest outside of China and Japan. Significant collections have been made at Harvard, Columbia, and the University of California. The collection deposited by Mr. Gest at McGill University, however, is the largest and most complete library of Chinese books in any University centre on the American Continent.

This collection is, as is well-known, now housed in attractive quarters in McGill University Redpath Library Building (McTavish street). The stacks of steel, on the lower of the two floors and the double steel shelving with glass doors on the mezzanine floor, the airy and spacious reading space, make an appropriate setting for the rows upon rows of Chinese books in covers of multi-colored Chinese textiles. Excellent photographs taken by Mr. Gest himself adorn the walls. These, together with the Chinese antiquities on the walls, in cases, etc., and the Chinese rugs on the floor, lend the room an intimate atmosphere.

The strategic nation Chinese in the Pacific Basin is Culture. China, its past and its present offer various fields of study and research in the culture and experience of a people whose continuous existence as a social and political entity is the longest and one of the richest of the nations of the modern world. A proper appraisal of the contributions of Chinese indigenous and largely independent culture to the literature and learning, the history and experience of the world should be included in the research programmes, of scholarships on this continent, such as art, chemistry, medicine, history, philosophy, and so on. The facilities of The Gest Chinese Research Library are available for students and scholars, oriental and occidental, in the field of Far Eastern Studies.

The library has steadily increased in the number of its Chinese volumes. The works bound in Chinese style are classified on the shelves according to the "Four Treasures" system of the Imperial Ch'ien-lung Library into four classes: 1. Classics; 2. History; 3. Philosophy, Science, Medicine, Encyclopaedias, etc. 4. Belles-lettres. The library contains more than 10,000 fasciculi of Buddhist sutras in print or manuscripts of the Sung, Yuan and Ming periods (A. D. 1232-1633), more than 500 Ming editions of non-Buddhist works, and more than fifty Palace or Imperial editions of the Ch'ing period. Besides rare editions it possesses the essentially important works in good editions in virtually all major fields of study. Definite emphasis has been placed upon the acquisition of dictionaries, catalogues, and encyclopaedias, and the collection is especially strong in historical and medical works, and in collective works of Belles-lettres.

In addition to the Additional Chinese language Works, Mr. Gest has accumulated more than a thousand books in western languages, as well as many pamphlets and issues of various periodicals. The books and periodicals in the "China" section of McGill University Library are shelved for convenience in quarters adjacent to the Gest collection, and all resources of the University Library are available to students working in Far Eastern subjects. Altogether, the contents and organization of the Gest Library enable the student to carry on serious and fruitful investigation in the main departments of Chinese civilization. Gazette 5.7.34.

MCGILL TAKES STEP

Abolishes Department of

APPOINTMENTS POSTED
Gazette 6.7.34.

Separate Department of Genetics Set Up With Prof.
C. Leonard Huskins as Head—Vacancies Filled

The first move in a new economy programme at McGill was instituted at a meeting of the board of governors of the university, held in the Canadian Pacific Railway board room at noon yesterday, when was decided to abolish the department of Chinese studies and to discontinue appropriations for the Gest Chinese Library after September 1 next.

Several important appointments were announced. Prof. W. H. Brittain, of Macdonald College, was appointed dean of the faculty of agriculture, succeeding to the post left vacant by Dr. G. S. H. Barton, who became deputy Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa about two years ago.

Dr. George W. Scarth, professor of botany, was named chairman of the department, replacing Prof. F. E. Lloyd. Dr. Lloyd was appointed emeritus professor of botany.

One important appointment involved the setting up of a new department. Dr. C. Leonard Huskins, hitherto associate professor of genetics, was promoted to the rank of full professor and named chairman of the department of genetics, a branch of study which formerly came under the jurisdiction of the department of botany. Dr. Huskins' appointment follows the recommendation of the university corporation that the department of genetics be separated from the department of botany.

No announcement was made about the principalship. "There is nothing to report," A. P. S. Glasco, bursar of the university and secretary to the board of governors, stated following the meeting.

The meeting was informed that the Neurological Institute is now completed and that Dr. Wilder G. Penfield, director of the department, is moving his offices into the new building. The formal opening will probably take place this fall but no definite decision has been reached as yet.

The secretary reported that sufficient money had been subscribed by friends of the school to assure the operation of the School for Graduate Nurses for another year. The governors approved of the continuance of the school under these conditions.

POST IS ABOLISHED.

The disappearance of the department of Chinese studies carries with it the abolition of the post of chairman of the department, a position held by Dr. Kiang Kang-hu. Dr. Kiang, who left McGill a little over a year ago on a year's leave of absence, is still in China and it is unlikely that he will return to Canada. Whether the Gest Chinese Library will remain housed in the Redpath Library, or be transferred elsewhere, is not known. At any rate no university funds will be available after September 1 for cataloguing or translation work.

E. W. Beatty, K.C., chancellor of the university, who presided, submitted a preliminary draft of the proposed revisions to the university statutes. A committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Brown, was appointed to study the proposals and make further recommendations. The findings of this committee will be reported to a future meeting of the governors.

Two resignations were accepted. The first was that of Dr. A. H. MacCordick, lecturer in medicine, who, it is understood, is retiring to his farm. The second was that of Dr. C. J. Tidmarsh, demonstrator in medicine and assistant demonstrator of pharmacology, who recently accepted a new post in Boston.

The governors approved of the nomination of Dr. P. D. Ross as representative on the board of governors of the Graduates' Society of McGill University for a period of three years.

APPOINTMENTS MADE.

Appointments, in addition to those already mentioned, were announced as follows:

Arnold Wainwright, K.C., emeritus professor in the faculty of law; Arnold Heeney, lecturer in municipal law; T. E. Roy, M.D., demonstrator in bacteriology, replacing the late Dr. W. W. Beattie, who lost his life in an automobile accident in England several months ago; Dean Ernest Brown, of the faculty of engineering, as the university's representative on the Corporation of Professional Engineers of Quebec; Prof. R. E. Jamieson, as the university's representative on the new sectional committee on steel construction of the Canadian Engineering Standards Association; four new members of the parasitology committee at Macdonald College, as follows: Dr. Lionel Stevenson, provincial zoologist of Ontario; S. P. Eagleson, secretary-treasurer of the National Research Council; Lt.-Col. Wilfrid Bovey, and T. Fred Ward, bursar, Macdonald College; H. D. Southam, D. Ped., lecturer in the department of education for the session, 1934-35; Stuart Hawkins, B. Arch., in the superintending engineer's department; James S. Baxter, M.D., lecturer in anatomy for the session, 1934-35, replacing Dr. John Beattie who resigned late last fall to take a position in England; E. J. Brodie, lecturer in plant pathology at Macdonald College, replacing Dr. Dorothy E. Newton, resigned; Miss E. K. Elderkin, lecturer in art and interior decoration in the school of household science and school for teachers, Macdonald College, replacing Miss Buzzell, resigned; Miss Blanche Stewart, kindergarten director in the practice school at Macdonald College, replacing Miss Freda Kruse, resigned; Miss Helen Cannell, as a teacher in the high school at Macdonald College, replacing Miss Catharine Seiveright, resigned.

PROMOTIONS RATIFIED.

The board of governors ratified a following promotions: F. R. ott, from associate professor to professor of civil law; W. L. G. am, from associate to professor of mathematics; A. H. S. from associate to professor of hematics; Gordon Pall, from lecturer to assistant professor of mathematics; H. E. Rawlinson, M.D., from lecturer to assistant professor of histology and embryology.

It was announced that in future lecturers with five or more years' service would be eligible for the university annuity plan whereby the university contributes an amount equal to five per cent. of employee's salary if the individual sets aside a similar amount towards an annuity contract. Hitherto, associate, assistant and full professors only were eligible.

Water-Colors 1934.
At Ottawa

A small collection of work by some Canadian painters in water color has just been put on exhibition at the National Gallery of Canada and will be circulated to various other art galleries in the Dominion.

Marius Barbeau of Ottawa says of it:

"Canada is becoming yearly more art-minded and shows its interest in the work of its own artists as it progresses. The small exhibitions traveling from coast to coast bring such stimulating response that the National Gallery is again sending this year a selection of water-colors, the initial show of which has just opened in Ottawa. Of the 40 pictures on display a certain number is just representational; but enough of them are inspired and creative to make the exhibition worth while. Our water-colorists have gone on progressing in familiar directions, like our oil painters, or have broken new ground, like Pegi Nicol, in 'The children's garden.' This young Ottawa artist has individuality and spontaneity. Her recent water-colors are refreshing, animated and colorful. They rank high and are in a class by themselves."

"Among landscape painters Carl Schaeffer characterizes a field rather neglected by most of our competent painters—rural Ontario. He admirably stylizes fields, trees and a farm house against rolling hills and a bold sky. Mr. and Mrs. Haworth's pictures stand out for the solidity and spontaneity of their masses and the sense of composition. The outlines are clear-cut, almost as in stained-glass windows; the colors are clean and cool. The solemn spirit and power of Georgian Bay haunt Frank Carmichael's 'Grace Lake,' but it breaks into sunny greens and beams with smiles in 'Church, Bancroft.' Casson remains true to himself in 'Road near Lloydstown,' which has vigor and depth, and a lively arrangement of road and trees. His 'Mill in Winter' shows him in a different mood, milder and more delicate, though in a winter scene."

Mr. Barbeau mentions with approval works—landscapes, figure and flower pictures,—by Joachim Gauthier, Goldammer, Grace Coombs, Dorothy Hoover, F. H. Bridgen, L. C. A. Panton, John Clymer, Walter Phillips of Winnipeg and Miriam Bowman, Frederick Cross, James Ditchmond and A. C. Leighton of Alberta, and ends by saying:

"Toronto again vastly predominates in this show, with 20 painters represented out of 28; and we regretfully notice the absence of some of our leading water-colorists, Ogilvy, Miss Carr, Comfort, Fortin and Humphrey. An effort should be made in future exhibitions to be more comprehensive of talent and accomplishment in the widely scattered parts of our country."

A bequest under the will of the late Henry B. W. Carmichael, M.D., has just been received by the Art Association of Montreal. It consists of a portrait of the late Bishop Carmichael, by John Colin Forbes, R.C.A., O.S.A., which has been hung with the Canadian pictures in the Lecture Room,—and a bust of a member of the Carmichael family, a plaster cast of which the marble original is at Trinity College, Dublin.

George Wm. Hill, Prominent Sculptor, Succumbs in 73rd Year

George William Hill, one of Canada's best known sculptors, whose statuary is to be found in most cities of the Dominion, died this morning at 5 o'clock at his home at 768 St. Catherine road, Outremont. He was in his 73rd year, and his death was due largely to his extreme vigor and activity which brought about an attack 10 days ago.

Born in Shipton, Que., in 1862, the son of G. T. Hill, a marble dealer, he found a stone cutter's chisel to be one of his earliest playthings, and from extreme youth became accustomed to the molding of stone into shapes dictated by his imagination.

STUDIED IN PARIS

The marble cutter's trade was too stereotyped a thing for him, and after education at St. Francis' College he left for Paris in 1889, and made his way there to the famous Academie Julien where he studied for four years.

Upon his return the former country boy competed with the best artists on this continent in submitting designs for memorial statues of great Canadians, one of his first efforts being a monument for Sir John A. Macdonald. In this he drew second place. Later, however, he was more successful and among the well-known works which he carried out are Queen Victoria's Jubilee Memorial on Dominion Square, the magnificent Strathcona Horse monument on the same square, the memorial to Sir Georges Etienne Cartier on Fletcher's Field, and the Nurses' Monument in the Hall of Fame at Ottawa.

LED ENERGETIC LIFE

Always shaping models of clay to the impress of his inspiration, busy in gardening or in his many activities Mr. Hill continued to lead a full and energetic life to his fatal illness. He had a country home at Beavans Lake which recently was one of his strong interests. His family and the simple pleasures of family life were most important to him.

Surviving are his widow, the former Elsie Annette Kent and three children. They are George R. Hill, Mrs. Norman D. Cass and Mrs. Eleanor M. Venning, Ph.D., all of this city.

The funeral will be held at 2 p.m. on Thursday from his home to the Mount Royal cemetery. The services will be taken by Rev. L. A. MacLean of Cote des Neiges United Church and Rev. Wm. McLean of Outremont Presbyterian Church.

Those who sailed were J. S. LeFort, Ottawa; J. D. Haies and R. Lajoie, Montreal; and L. Mainguy, Quebec—all architects; and J. C. Faucher, R. Chicoine and P. LeRoux of Montreal, and Maurice Gaudreau, of Quebec, decorators. They have prepared designs for a Jacques Cartier monument, medallions to be struck in honor of the occasion, and an arch to be built at Gaspé village for the festivals.

Designs have also been made for sails for Gaspé fishing boats which will sail out into the bay and welcome arriving delegates.

Decorative designs for the Jacques Cartier celebration which will be held at the Village of Gaspé on August 24 and 25, and which are being executed in Montreal at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, St. Urbain street, are now practically completed and most of them are in readiness for shipment. The eight young men who have been commissioned to execute the modelling, painting and architectural designing will leave by Monday for Gaspé, where they will undertake the final supervision of the work there.

In addition to making the designs for the decoration of the existing wharf at Gaspé, the plaster model for the bronze medallion which will be affixed to the Jacques Cartier Monument, the designs for the monument itself and for a Triumphant Arch which will be erected on the wharf, the artists have completed work on 200 sails which will be used on the small fishing boats which will take part in the ceremonies.

Samples of the designs for these sails are now hanging on the walls on the top floor of the Ecole des Beaux Arts. Twelve different devices have been used, representing the arms of the old provinces of France. The fishing boats which they will decorate will meet the S.S. Champlain and other ships which will arrive with the official delegates from France and Canada. These fishing boats will also stage a night pageant in the bay and special lighting arrangements have been made for each vessel by means of lanterns designed for the purpose.

At Gaspé much work yet remains to be done. The wharf, at the little village will be transformed into a regal landing through the use of wooden superstructures and stucco work. The Triumphant Arch, for which designs have been made here, will be decorated with shields bearing the arms of the provinces of old France on one side and the arms of Canada and its provinces on the other.

MANY STREAMERS MADE.

As part of the work of designing and decorating it has been necessary to make many large streamers upon which are fleurs-de-lis and other symbolical designs, and many small pennants which are for the most part in plain colors. In addition to the hundreds of streamers, banners and pennants, over 1,000 flags are being loaned by the Federal Government.

The Jacques Cartier Monument will be temporarily executed in wood and plaster and will be later replaced by a granite monument. It will stand on the left of the 30 foot monolithic cross, which will form the centre of the group on the hill above the wharf. On the right will be the War Memorial which is now finished and in position.

Those who have been at work in the Ecole des Beaux Arts are: John Serge LeFort, of Ottawa; J. David Des Haies and Rodolphe Lajoie, of Montreal; and Lucien Mainguy, of Quebec; who are the architects. Jean Charles Faucher, Rene Chicoine and Paul Leroux, of Montreal and Maurice Gaudreau, of Quebec, decorators.

EXHIBITION PRESENTED BY VACATION SCHOOLS

Skill in Handicrafts Shown by Pupils

Surprising skill in the various branches of handicrafts by pupils attending the Daily Vacation Schools, particularly in basket and wicker weaving, fret-work, sewing and raffia work, was evidenced at the annual exhibition of the school, held yesterday afternoon in the Coronation building, Bishop street.

In a preliminary report submitted by Mrs. C. B. Walsh, superintendent of the schools, it was shown that attendance this year, totalling 4,323 boys and girls, ranging from the kindergarten age to 15 years, was well over that of last year. It was pointed out that the children distinctly prefer utilizing their time usefully rather than spend it on the streets, and are enthusiastic in their work. Other instruction includes guidance in the choice of literature, religious and hygienic teaching. Medical attention is given to the children while attending classes, and milk and buns are provided for the younger children.

The Daily Vacation Schools, operating as a play school during the summer vacation, has been established for 21 years, and is supported by the Financial Federation.

COMMOTION OVER PAINTING BY GIRL

"Disgraceful," Says Judge; "Splendid Piece of Art," Business Man

(By The Associated Press.)

Gloucester, Mass., August 7.—The girl artist insisted it was just a "mood," a District Court judge called it "disgraceful," while the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce saw only a "splendid piece of art."

When Miss Anna Neumark, youthful Boston artist, put her nude "composition" in a jeweller's window here, she thought it might fetch $35. Tonight her friends said she wouldn't part with it for ten times that amount.

Judge William J. Hatch, who first noticed the drawing in Blanchard's Jewellery store, denied today that he had suggested the police ought to do something about it, but he did admit he thought it was "disgraceful."

It was the judge who allegedly told Alderman Weston U. Friend about it and Friend in turn told Lawrence J. Hart, secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, that it might be just as well if the picture were removed from public gaze.

Hart, who vigorously resented a suggestion that the controversy and the opening of the second annual Cape Ann art festival here this week was anything but sheer coincidence, defended the picture but said he had followed Friend's suggestion.

Taken to the Chamber of Commerce Building, the picture was photographed by every newspaper cameraman who could reach the scene.

The picture shows two girls recumbent on a crimson, or perhaps it is a maroon, background. Above them towers a naked man. And that's all there is to it.

Newspapermen suggested the male figure might have been intended to be an ape-man and Miss Neumark generously conceded, it might be so, only, she added, "it's all the way you look at it."

Noted Canadian Artist Dissatisfied With Treatment at C.N.E. Exhibition

TORONTO, Aug. 10.—(C.P.)—Dissatisfied at what he described as a "family compact" governing choice of paintings hung in the Canadian National Exhibition Art Gallery, John Russell, widely known artist of Toronto, Hamilton and Paris, France, whose nude studies at times have provoked comment at the Exhibition, has decided not to exhibit in the Art Gallery. He will lease the entire mezzanine floor of the automotive building, it was indicated, where he will exhibit his paintings.

Mrs. J. Ashworth-Camm, secretary to the artist, said today Mr. Russell is "highly dissatisfied with the treatment he has received at the Exhibition."

"Last year," she said, "they wouldn't hang his two big nudes and threw out six of his paintings. As Mr. Russell says, nothing original is ever exhibited at the C.N.E. Art Gallery. No artist of distinction is ever brought over. It's just a family gathering of the O.S.A. (Ontario Society of Artists) and Mr. Russell is dissatisfied with the whole arrangement."

TARRYTOWN, N.Y., Aug. 31.—(A. P.)—A young unnaturalized Russian was arrested today after he had ruined with flaming acid the ironic mural of the United States New Deal, hung here in the exhibit of the Westchester Institute of Fine Arts.

The man gave his name as John Thompson, 26, the Bronx, N.Y. He said his only reason for attacking the lampoon painting, "Nightmare of 1934," was to efface the portion which caricatured Mrs. Roosevelt. He was held on a charge of malicious mischief.

The picture was burned by naptha flames in three places and will not be rehung, it was announced.

Hobby Saves Couple From Going On Dole

Husband Uses Knowledge of Art When Business Fails

By JOSEPH E. THOMPSON

HE is just an itinerant artist out to paint the town—but not to "paint the town red." He is painting the Metropolis, or at least the most interesting spots from the artist's viewpoint, in blending daubs of oil colors as he turns out admirable replicas of the various scenes on small canvases.

He has no studio and frequents no art galleries. His studio is wherever he plants his easel and opens his box of paints. His art gallery is the nearest spot on grass, clay or pavement where he can display his works without disturbing anyone. About a dozen of them are always on display as he whistles a gay tune softly while turning out one more canvas of some historic or ancient building or some beautiful scene of nature in old Montreal.

HE is Joseph Jutras, 40-year-old painter, who turned his hobby into a means of earning a living when he and his wife found themselves facing the world with 15 cents between them seven years ago following the crash of his $50,000 perfume business.

Dressed shabbily but neatly he can be seen any fine day at some spot on the island, whistling or humming a gay tune to himself and greeting each passer-by with a wistful smile when they stop to admire his artistic efforts.

THE hardluck story in the background of this poor but cheerful wielder of the brush, which, unlike most others' today, is only indirectly affected by the economic conditions of the past five years, is tinged with romance—the efforts of a young couple, who once tasted fortune, to eke out an existence.

Joseph Jutras was born here in Montreal, the son of poor parents. When 15 years of age he had managed to save $45 from his earnings doing odd jobs. He entered partnership with another young man and they started a small perfume manufacturing and selling business.

Fortune smiled on them as they worked diligently and the business grew into a $50,000 proposition.

THEN seven years ago the company began to fail. Banks gave loans but later had to close down on the perfume business and after the bankruptcy was cleared up Joseph Jutras found he had managed to scrap a mere $55. Two weeks later he and his young wife had 15 cents left.

Something had to be done and he remembered his hobby, oil painting and sketching. On a certain Saturday he set out with a number of canvases he had finished and set up his easel at Phillips square. He finished the day with $22 in his pocket.

He has continued since then and says that some weeks the sales of his works show good returns while in other weeks Montrealers seem to forget their admiration for art.

He also often visits the local court houses and other public places where he sketches important figures in the life of Montreal. He manages to realize small sums from the sales of these sketches.

Premier R. B. Bennett Attends Opening Ceremonies in Saint John — New Provincial Museum Dedicated

SAINT JOHN, Aug. 16. — (C.P.) — Under brilliant sunshine, New Brunswick today launched its 150th birthday party commencing with enactment of the ancient and colorful ceremony of trooping the color by the red-coated Saint John Fusiliers, Prime Minister R. B. Bennett and a distinguished assembly of native sons taking the salute.

Mayor J. W. Brittain and Mrs. Brittain, on behalf of the city, presented new colors emblazoned with the battle honors of two campaigns, the South African and Great War. The killed pipe band of Toronto's 48th Highlanders united with the Fusiliers band to furnish martial airs throughout the ceremony. Right Rev. John A. Richardson, Bishop of Fredericton, consecrated the new colors.

HUGE CROWD

Thousands gathered about Barracks Green to witness the ceremony when the battle-scarred colors presented to the regiment by the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York in 1901 were ceremoniously encased and marched to the rear. The new colors bore the double battle honors granted for the South African War and the 10 battle honors won in the Great War.

Hon. Murray MacLaren, Minister of Pensions and National Health, New Brunswick's representative in the Dominion Cabinet, entertained the distinguished visitors at a luncheon after which the new Provincial Museum was dedicated in the main event of the two-day program. At the function the chief address was delivered by the Canadian Prime Minister.

FITTING MONUMENT.

The museum, said to be one of the finest buildings of its type in the world, contains relics of the early days and was held out by the various speakers as a fitting monument to New Brunswick's progress since it was officially made a province of British North America on August 16, 1784.

The Provincial and municipal governments will tender the visitors a banquet tonight. Tomorrow the program will continue with dedication of historic sites, band concerts, sports and social events and other functions.

Mr. Bennett will leave to return to Ottawa tomorrow afternoon. He was accompanied from the capital by his sister, Mrs. W. D. Herridge, wife of the Canadian Minister to Washington, and by R. K. Finlayson, his chief private secretary.

Mural, Financed By Federal Funds, Shows President and Ministers

(By The Canadian Press)

New York, August 28. — The New York Times says that a mural oil painting financed by federal relief funds and satirizing the Roosevelt Administration was placed today in the permanent exhibit of the Westchester galleries of the Westchester Institute of Fine Arts.

The artist, employed as a relief worker by the Public Works Administration, signed himself "Jere Miah II", the newspaper said, and the president of the institute, Charles A. Birch-Field, would not disclose his name. Birch-Field said the artist demanded that his identity be guarded.

The Times says the painting is eight feet by four and combines the skill of a cartoonist, caricaturist and painter.

President Roosevelt is depicted speaking into a series of microphones, holding the shaft of one with his right hand and a fishing line from which dangles a large fish with his left hand. There is a crown on his head.

On his left stands Mrs. Roosevelt wearing an evening dress and a paper crown. From her left hand drops a mass of papers.

Playing cards, all deuces, are scattered before the President on a table. There are also two dolls, one a woman shown in the act of tossing a paper man into a wastebasket and the other a youth tossing a paper woman into a wastebasket.

A figure which The Times said represents Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau is juggling money. He wears a clown's suit. Behind him suppliant hands reach up from a pool of water.

Secretary Wallace of Agriculture is represented trying to strangle Ceres, goddess of the harvest, and Secretary Frances Perkins of the Labor Department as performing a balancing act with William Green, head of the American Federation of Labor.

An officer is stripping "Mr. Citizen" of his shirt. His home and possessions already are in a wastebasket. "Uncle Sam" hangs from a cross. Vultures hover over all.

Birch-Field said his organization does not subscribe to the doctrine depicted. It is a school of fine arts opened last spring, privately supported.

Professor Alford will arrive here in October to take over his new duties. At present he is lecturer at the Courtauld Institute of Art, and also is teaching post-graduate students in the London Institute of Education.

The University has been contemplating the establishment of a department of fine art for several years. President Cody visited England last June, and on his recommendation Professor Alford was appointed to the post.

MR. RUSSELL SNAPS HIS FINGERS

Aug. 25

MR. JOHN RUSSELL, a son of Canada, late of Paris, now in Toronto, is a painter of international repute. He paints governors, prime ministers, college presidents and such, and when the Hon. George Howard Ferguson's picture, which adorns the grand staircase at Queen's Park, needed a new vest the other day it was John Russell who was called in to do the job.

Mr. Russell painted in a new vest and charged a thousand dollars for it which is the record price for fancy vests in that part of the country.

In fact, the O.S.A., of which Mr. Russell is not a member, took umbrage at so much money for a mere vest when they had a hard time to paint anything that would buy them a new suit of clothes and set about, as Mr. Russell alleges, to circumvent his activities.

In a way Mr. Russell's fame is bound up with clothing of one cut or another.

When he paints a prime minister in full panoply and gets five thousand dollars for it, or a new vest for a statesman at a thousand dollars, or a young lady without any clothes at all which he sells for twenty-five thousand dollars to a theatre owner who desires to elevate the public taste in Australia, he does things which the O.S.A. severely reprobates.

The young lady, who is now rounding off her career naked and unashamed in far-off Australia, was exhibited by Mr. Russell at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto three years ago, where she incurred the gravest censure from the moral reformers of that fair city who visited her en masse and then came back single and on the quiet to be sure they had not overlooked any of the horrid details.

This did Mr. Russell no harm.

The more they railed, the more they shuddered, the more they threw up their hands, the higher soared the lady's price, until the Australian connoisseur put an end to the bidding for her beauty unadorned by naming a sum which Mr. Russell could not refuse.

* * * * *

AS WE SAID before, the lady did Mr. Russell no harm but she certainly put the O.S.A.'s nose out of joint, causing them to wreak a deadly vengeance.

The O.S.A., as the reader is probably aware, is the arbiter of destiny in Ontario.

That is to say it selects the pictures which form the art exhibit at the Toronto Fair, and its Hanging Committee decides where the pictures are to be hung.

Every artist, of course, wants his picture on a reasonable level with the eye and if it isn't he is peeved.

Last year the O.S.A. "skied" Mr. Russell whose pain and surprise were such that this year he has rented a whole floor in one of the C.N.E. buildings, so the O.S.A. cannot butt in and spoil his color effects.

Mr. Russell calls the O.S.A. a Family Compact.

Others speak of it in even more opprobrious terms.

Both may be quite wrong.

Meanwhile the Group of Seven continues to flourish like a green bay tree.

Their works are favorably displayed.

Since the Group was heard from last they have acquired a European reputation.

When some of their more naive productions were placed on view in London a while ago they attracted great attention from the public and much praise from the art critics who had got it into their heads some way or other that they had been painted by the Indians.

CANADIAN ARTIST GROUP IS SCORED

Gazette Sept. 5

Representative of Academie des Beaux Arts, Paris, Says Paintings Unnatural

(By The Canadian Press.)

Toronto, September 4.—George Leroux, official representative of the Academie des Beaux Arts, Paris, France, today criticized the paintings by Canadian artists who originally comprised the "Group of Seven" during a visit to the Canadian National Exhibition Art Gallery. The French artist said the paintings were unnatural and lacked the spirit of love.

The "Group of Seven" went out of existence February 20, 1933, and the body known as the Canadian Group of Painters took its place which has 28 members, including the original members of the "Group of Seven."

Nature, he said, was the great essential in painting. "Art springs from the heart and not from the head, so that love is the second essential. Then comes intellect and lastly, the picture that is painted for money."

He declared the styles of the group pictures may have something of the mind but to me the pictures I have seen have little else.

George Thompson's landscape, "Ice in Spring, Georgian Bay," brought unstinted praise from the French artist and he also admired Franz Johnson's painting of a Canadian scene, "Beyond the Law."

A. Y. Jackson, Toronto member of the group, in commenting on Leroux's criticism said French artists and art critics were "inclined to be somewhat provincial in judging paintings not based on the French school." It was Mr. Jackson's opinion the group pictures were "much closer to nature than that of the American school which is founded on French art."

He said paintings of Lawren Harris and Arthur Lisner, group members, were "as different as the poles." Their research work, however, was derived from the same material—a Canadian background.

Charles Comfort, another member of the group, said Leroux was doubtless speaking from the "characteristic point of view of the French painter."

Explorer Carries Weird Secrets to Grave After Fall From Hotel

CHICAGO, Sept. 14.—(U.P.)—Dr. Berthold Laufer, who penetrated the lore of forgotten centuries to obtain Asiatic mysticisms known to few men of the Western world, carried his weird secrets into death today.

The 59-year-old anthropologist and curator of the Field Museum leaped or plunged from an upper floor of the fashionable Edgewater Beach Hotel after scribbling a note to his stepson to "be a good boy and take care of your mother."

The stepson, Ormond Hampton, said that the scientist had been active until a month ago when he underwent an operation for chest ailment.

A native of Cologne, Germany, Dr. Laufer learned from the natives of Madagascar and the Lamas of Tibet strange tales of magic, primitive ceremonials and myths. Vanished generations gave to him secrets intended only for primitive descendants.

But deep as his understanding of strange men and stranger things ran, Dr. Laufer discussed them rarely, his colleagues said. Only a meagre part of his discoveries were recorded.

He appeared in recent years to have grown wistful in all his knowledge, they added.

Dr. Laufer was educated at the University of Berlin, the Berlin Seminary for Oriental Languages and the University of Leipzig. He came to the United States in 1898.

After leading several expeditions to Siberia, China, Saghalin Island and other remote places, he became connected with Field Museum in 1908. Seven years later he was made curator of anthropology.

Water Colors From Scotland At Art Gallery

Last year a collection, more or less representative, of water colors by Canadian painters was sent for exhibition in Edinburgh and was afterwards sent on tour for exhibition in other places in Great Britain. It is, in part, in return for this that the Royal Scottish Society of Painters in Water Colors, in co-operation with the National Gallery of Canada, has sent over a big collection of works by its members for exhibition; these pictures are now being shown in the big downstairs gallery of the Art Association of Montreal and are to remain there for the rest of this month.

Though there are few very conspicuous pictures, this is a collection which represents well the work which is being done in a specially British kind of art by Scottish and other painters. Sir H. Hughes-Stanton, one of the best known of the painters, is not very well represented but there is an excellent example by Russell Flint—of figures on a sea-shore in bright sunlight, which shows his almost mysterious skill in the use of water colors. Figure pictures are few, but A. Reginald Smith's crowded Fish Market is a good piece of work, as is Frederic Whiting's "Girl with ponies" in a broad, slightly crude way, and James Wright's "Court-yard in Anstruther" which is rather formal but interesting. Laelia Cockburn's "Home Yard" is particularly good both as a painting and as a study of animals.

A notable feature of this exhibition is the variety of ways of using water color that are shown in it. Muirhead Bone, best known as a black-and-white draughtsman, has a very good, slightly tinted drawing of a Spanish market-place and D. Murray Smith shows a drawing with very little color of a Buckinghamshire roadway. Two strikingly good examples of water color painting, and two of the best pictures in the collection are David West's sea picture of "Grey sunset, Moray Firth," and Martin Hardie's mountain valley, very simply and surely painted,—"In the Jura." There are a number of specimens of pure, clean use of the medium; two very good ones, painted chiefly in greys and browns, are by A. E. Borthwick, the President of the Society and others in which much effect is got with very simple means are Alex. Macpherson's picture of Le Puy, two by Agnes Sim, of St. Germain and Zurich and M. V. MacGeorge's view of St. Andrews. Simplicity and directness of the same kind are to be seen in Alexander Paterson's "Scots Border Valley," in Alex. N. Whitelaw's "Old Mill, Conway Valley," and in Alan Ian Ronald's "Four doors."

There are several flower pictures. John M. Alken's "Roses" is a very remarkable piece of painting and there is clever work in Agnes Raeburn's "Pansies." Plenty of variety of method is shown in James Kay's "Moonlight, River Clyde,"—an odd study of steamers and sky,—Robert Eadie's good architectural pictures, George Graham's hard and precise "Seahouses" and "Lulworth Cove" and Andrew Gamley's very misty view of Edinburgh, with, as extremes, John E. Aitken's careful and rather Victorian pictures of Holland and R. Scott Irvine's broad and thoroughly modern landscape patterns.

News of Art In Canada

An exhibition of prints by three Canadian engravers will be shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal, for two weeks beginning September 29. There will be etchings by Woodruff K. Akroyd, color prints by Leonard Hutchinson, and wood-cuts by W. F. G. Godfrey,—three Ontario artists.

A very big mural decoration by a Montreal painter was a conspicuous feature of this year's Toronto Exhibition. This picture, called "Canada builds a great nation," thirty-five feet long and nine feet high, is the work of the Swiss-Canadian painter, Carl Mangold, and was painted for Canadian Industries, Ltd. It is a great panorama in which 26 typical figures stand out against a background representing industrial and agricultural activities. Mining, farming, aviation, smelting and chemical work, steel construction, hunting and trapping, railway work and shipping are among the kinds of work shown in the picture as typical of the development of Canada.

Elusive Honors Fall On Heads Over Which They Have Long
Hovered

(From Kenneth Wells' Point of View)

Montreal is generous. Three Canadian artists were elected to the Royal Canadian Academy on the occasion of the recent meeting of that august body in Montreal a week ago, and all three were Torontonians. That this should be, with the majority of the voting members present of Montreal and French Canada, is a pleasant surprise. It might well become a pleasant tradition replacing that unpleasant tradition which has it that no woman shall become an academican and which has been surmounted but twice in the history of the academy. Whether it does or not is in the hands of Toronto. Next year the academy meets here. Next year Toronto and Ontario members will be in the majority. Will they return the Montreal compliment? Will French-Canadian artists fill the honor role?—R.S.V.P.

Since the seven-day tumult occasioned by the election of Marion Long as an academican, the first woman to receive such an honor in 53 years, but not the first to deserve it, has died down, Toronto has had time to realize that two more of its artists have received belated recognition and have been accorded the same honor. Many quite well informed Toronto people realized, for the first time, and with something of a shock, that Fred S. Haines, for some years past curator of the Art Gallery of Toronto, and more recently principal of the Ontario College of Art and past president of the Ontario Society of Artists, was not an academican, but merely associate. With the same feeling of surprise they learned that Kenneth Forbes, for long considered one of this country's ablest academic portrait painters, was also merely an associate. News of the appointment of these two artists was received with a "Well, it's about time"—as becomes the bestowal of honors past due.

For the benefit of those who do not know: Frederick Stanley Haines was born in Meaford, Ont., the son of George Haines and Martha Smith, on the 31st of March, 1879. He studied at the Central Ontario School of Art under G. A. Reid and Crulck-shanks, and at the Academy of Fine Art, Antwerp, Belgium. In 1896 he came to Toronto, and in 1900 married Bertha A. M. Morehouse. His one child, a daughter, is now Mrs. G. I. Hoover, and herself a painter.

Kenneth Forbes is that almost non-existent creature in the Canadian art world, the son of a son of an artist. Forbes was born in Toronto some 40 years ago, and was educated in local schools and at Westmount, Montreal. His art education he received in England and Scotland, and for a time attended the famous Slade School, then at the height of its powers. He served in the Great War, was wounded, and is one of the few Canadians to win prizes abroad for his art, which, it might be explained, includes boxing as well as painting. Forbes is the son of the late J. Colin Forbes, R.C.A., of Montreal, and is married to Jean Edgell, daughter of Col. Arnold Edgell, who was Lord Kitchener's chief engineer during the Indian campaigns. Mrs. Forbes is herself a painter of ability.

Like most Canadian art organizations, of royal charter, or otherwise, the Royal Canadian Academy is as remarkable for those it admits to its sacred list as those it excludes. When one considers some of the painters who have these many years past been proudly signing "R.C.A." after their names, it becomes a matter for some wonder as to why and how Archibald Barnes was left out in the cold with his mere "O.S.A., R.P., R.C.I. and R.I." so long. This painter, fit to rank with Forbes, John Russell—who incidentally is neither O.S.A., A.R.C.A., or R.C.A.—or any other painter in Canada of his time and attitude, has since a week ago become "A.R.C.A." To suggest that justice will not be done his ability until he is honored with the rank of full academican is to suggest no more than the obvious. Of W. J. Phillips, Winnipeg, also elected an associate, this column knows too little to warrant comment.

It does not seem impossible that a thousand years from now, our great grandchildren's great - great - great-grandchildren are likely to come upon James Blomfield in the flesh, and him painting a bit of small town Ontario and chuckling merrily to himself over the blindness of other painters who pass such things by in favor of the rocks and black flies of Georgian Bay. For, James Blomfield, neither in his attitude towards life, art, or himself, ever grows old. For all his grey hair he is a lad at heart, and if propriety permitted would be quite capable of taking off his shoes and socks and hop-skippping it down the country roads to the old swimming holes, mills, broken bridges and secluded pools he loves to discover and paint. If this seems hard to believe, it is recommended that the unbeliever go to Eaton's College street, where Blomfield is showing his water colors, made of just such bits of rural Ontario, and not only have the burden of unbelief removed from him, but be made young again himself.

LOCAL SCULPTOR WINS AWARD

Montreal Herald Sept. 8/24

Competing with leaders in their line of sculpture in the Dominion, Allan Cameron, 561 Victoria avenue, St. Lambert, was declared winner of the $1,000 competition for the Begg Memorial Fountain to be erected at Orillia, Ontario, within a short time. Composed of a group of a mother, kneeling, with a child resting against her and holding an urn, the Memorial Fountain to be erected in the city park, will be finished in granite. Completion of the memorial is nearing at the Iberville, Quebec, works.

The late Ralph Begg, of New York, but born in the Ontario town, left a bequest of $5,000 in his will for the erection of a memorial to his mother:

To Somebody's Mother,
In Memory of My Mother,
Emily M. Begg.
Dedicated by Ralph Begg.

Although planned to be of bronze, the memorial will be finished in light durable stone. Barre and Stanstead granite will compose the figures and the base.

Mr. Cameron was born in Chicago in 1905 and came to Canada with his parents in 1912. He studied at the Beaux Arts School in Montreal and the Art Institute of Chicago with the European artist Albin Polasek. He has exhibited at the National Gallery, and the Montreal Art Association.

Trapper-Artist Leaves North To Continue Art Studies Here

Star Sept. 8/34

FORSAKING his beloved north country for a time, one of the north's most skillful trappers will make the "woods near Montreal" his habitat this winter and further his studies in art in the eastern metropolis.

The young trapper-artist is Rene "Slim" Richard, who for the past seven years has attracted the attention of French and Canadian painters with his pictures of nature as he found it on canoe journeys and trapping trips.

"I will build a cabin in the woods near Montreal," Richard said, pointing out he prefers the wilderness to city life. He is not even well known as a painter in his own province, but Richard's work is described by Clarence Gagnon, noted Canadian artist, and by the head of the Luxembourg galleries in Paris, as possessing perhaps the greatest talent that ever came out of Canada.

Richard was born in Switzerland, came to Quebec as a baby and received his elementary education at Montreal. With his mother and father he came West 21 years ago. His father operates a general store and trading post in Cold Lake settlement.

Always interested in art, young Richard longed to study in Paris. With this in mind he left his brushes behind and journeyed into the far North-West, where he spent three years earning enough to take him to the French capital. He trapped white fox on the barrens near the shore of the western Arctic ocean east of Aklavik. During these three years he learned the pangs of hunger and the bitter cold of the barren lands.

Then in 1927 he went to France and studied for three years. It was there he came in contact with Clarence Gagnon. On his return to Canada he spent four years in northern Manitoba mining camps painting whenever possible and then came home for the summer before starting east.

Monument by Montrealeers

Orillia, Ont., October 26.—The Begg Memorial Fountain is being erected in Couchiching Park here as a tribute from Ralph Begg to his mother. The fountain, made by Allan A. Cameron, of Montreal, is carved in granite and shows a mother with a child on her lap pouring water from an urn. The figures were carved by George Tremblay, of Montreal.

WATER COLORS BY SCOTTISH PAINTERS

Gazette Sept. 19/34

Loan Exhibition at Art Gallery Shows Talent of Many Artists

FLINT'S WORK ON VIEW

'Four on a Beach' Outstanding Example—Moorland and Street Scenes of Scotland Included

The exhibition of Scottish water colors now showing at the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street, under the auspices of the National Gallery of Canada and through the co-operation of the Art Association of Montreal, is important for two reasons: first, because it presents the work of the front-ranking Scottish water colorists of the day, and secondly, because it is a continuation of Empire reciprocity in the realm of art.

The exhibition came to Canada last year from the Royal Scottish Society of Painters in Water Colors. Its appearance in Montreal has aroused considerable enthusiasm among art lovers, and large numbers of people have attended the gallery each day since the opening.

As an example of the work of the Scottish water colorists, the show is superb. On the whole the works included deal with the Scottish scene, from the quaint streets of highland villages to the great, sweeping moorlands, and the visitor can find delight in practically every one of the 116 paintings strung around the walls.

The most important work, is that by the celebrated water colorist, W. Russell Flint, which he has named, "Four on a Beach." Numerous prints of this water color have been seen in Montreal. The picture of the four figures on the beach is a familiar one, but seeing the original is an experience. The life which Flint has painted in his figures, the shadows and the footprints on the sands, the shades of light and color, and the infinite grace of the entire picture spell beauty. The work is comparatively large, and it stands out in an exhibition of fine water color.

MOORLAND DEPICTED.

Flint is accompanied by the best exponents of art in water color that Scotland can produce. Opposite his "Four on a Beach" is a large painting by R. B. Nisbet of a magnificent moorland scene, in front of which the visitor cannot help but linger.

Two paintings by Robert Little demand attention. One depicts Porte St. Croix, Bruges, lost in a bluish mist, with a hazy moon vainly trying to peer through, and the dark outline of a fortress in the background. It is a fine water color, strikingly different in treatment from the others in the show. His other picture, "Loch Lomond, Winter," is done in somewhat the same manner.

Patrick Downie has one, "On Grenock Moor, Uplands of the Clyde," that is a rhapsody of fine color, and another, "A Breeze on the River Clyde," which follows well.

"The Terminus" by Robert Eadie is one of the best interiors in the show. In detail and effect it stands out conspicuously. Animal life has its place in two pictures by Laelia A. Cockburn, "Berger d'Alsace" and "The Home Yard," both interesting and commanding instant attention.

R. Scott Irvine, in two works, presents his colorful touch in outdoor scenes; modern and bright. Refreshing are two, by Frederic Whiting, "March Wind" and "Girl with Ponies."

The scope of the exhibition is wide, and should be seen. The art of painting in water color is here depicted in the finest manner, and the exhibition is a tribute to the talent of Scottish painters in this branch.

NAMES OF PAINTERS.

Besides those already mentioned, the following have works on display, many of which could command many lines of appreciation by themselves: John M. Aiken, John E. Aiken, Robert W. A GOOD JOURNALIST PASSES.

In the death of Melvin Ormond Hammond in Toronto at the age of 58 that city loses a good resident and Canada a patriotic citizen. "Mel" Hammond had a long career in journalism, in which he filled many parts, always with credit. He was an all-round newspaper man, having been connected with The Globe since 1895, whose staff he joined after a short period as a clerk in a savings company. His first duties on the newspaper were as a reporter; he then served in turn as parliamentary correspondent, magazine and literary editor, city editor, financial editor and editorial writer. He wrote with authority on many subjects, being particularly interested in art and sculpture, and his contributions were welcomed by periodicals in Canada and the United States. Mr. Hammond was a native of Ontario, having been born at Clarkson in 1876, and was educated in the public school there and in the Oakville High School. A good son of Ontario, he at the same time knew and admired the people of all the other provinces, and never tired of preaching true Canadianism. It was his practice in his holidays to visit various sections of the Dominion, frequently coming to Quebec. The Lower St. Lawrence was a favorite section for him and he found many friends in the villages, where the independence, industry and religious attitude of the inhabitants captured his fancy. One of his recreations was amateur photography and some of his pictures were reproduced in his books, for he was an author as well as journalist. His "Canadian Footprints" is an historical series of happy sketches, some with a Montreal setting. Other works that came from his facile pen were, "Confederation and Its Leaders" and "Painting and Sculpture in Canada." Melvin Hammond was blessed with sound common sense and was generally proficient in his chosen calling. He was a kindly and friendly man whose passing will be sincerely regretted by his colleagues on the press, by men in public life, and by Canadians in every walk who had the pleasure of his acquaintance.

LITERARY EDITOR DIES

M. O. Hammond Known as Historian and Photographer

Toronto, October 7. — Melvin Ormond Hammond, journalist and member of The Globe editorial staff here, died tonight. He was 58 years of age. He was literary editor and was prominent in literary circles.

Although he had not been in good health, Mr. Hammond's condition had not given alarm. He suffered a sunstroke while holidaying in August but made recovery. He was not strong enough to return to his duties at The Globe, however, and last Tuesday he suffered a relapse.

When he first joined The Globe he became political writer in Ottawa and Washington. Later he took over the duties of literary editor and gave valued assistance to young Canadian authors. He was an historian and his books "Confederation and Its Leaders," and "Canadian Footprints" gained wide recognition.

He was interested in Canadian art and only a few years ago he published a book "Painting and Sculpture in Canada." Mr. Hammond was also an enthusiastic photographer and his works hang in a number of galleries.

He was born in 1876 at Clarkson, Ont., near Toronto, a descendant of United Empire Loyalists.

Miss Helen Norton Presents Painting by Horatio Walker

A fine example of the work of Horatio Walker, R.C.A., N.A., entitled "Horses At The Trough," painted in 1910, has been presented to the Art Association of Montreal by the generosity of Miss Helen Norton, of Coaticook, Que. Horatio Walker, still active with his brush at 76 years, has a wide following of admirers both here and in the United States, and few of the noted galleries and private collections in the United States lack examples of his work. Although he was born in Ontario, he has lived and painted in this province for the past 50 years, and makes his home on the Island of Orleans.

In "Horses At The Trough," his abilities as a draughtsman and colorist are manifest. The horses in the picture are sturdy rugged animals true to the soil and rural life of the Island of Orleans.

This picture shown at the 17th International Biennial Exhibition held in Venice in 1930 under the joint auspices of the Grand Central Art Galleries and the American Federation of Arts, will add greatly to the importance of the Canadian collection of the Art Association of Montreal.

ART OF CARILLON LATELY RESTORED
Gazette Oct. 17/34

History Traced by Percival Price, Campanologist of Peace Tower

Necessity for watchfulness against invasion in the Low Countries, which resulted in the building of towers, gave rise to the art of the carillon. It was shown by Percival Price, the Dominion campanologist, who is heard in Ottawa from the Peace Tower, in a lecture given yesterday at the opening meeting of the Women's Art Society, in Steveson Hall.

Mr. Price showed lantern slides of towers in Belgium and Holland and explained the mechanism of the carillon and the manner in which it is played from the keyboard, the keys being struck with the clenched fist and the feet.

The first bells were placed in the towers to give warning of attack, of floods, of the closing of the gates of the city and of fire. As cities grew rich, they accumulated numbers of bells, and as guilds were formed, the bells also tolled the hours for the workers. Gradually the bell founders improved the tone of their bells, which were then made to play melodies by a clock-work mechanism, and in time they played harmonies, being specially well tuned by a process that was a carefully kept secret.

Organs at first were played from great wooden keyboards pounded by the fists. When the newer type of organ keyboard was devised, the older ones were discarded and generally stored in the towers, and later the idea of using these to play the carillon was seized upon. In a carillon, Mr. Price pointed out, the bells are stationary, they cannot be swung because of the strain the movement would place upon the fabric of the tower.

About the time of the French Revolution, Holland lost more than half its 500 bells, it having been discovered how to separate the copper and tin of which they are made. With the passing of the old bell founders, the art declined. About 1890, an English clergyman developed the principle of tuning bells, and it is from his efforts to obtain bells of good tone that the art of the carillon has been revived.

Overtones in a bell are more pronounced than in any other instrument, and unless the bell is tuned, those overtones are discordant, said Mr. Price. The first carillon to be sent abroad was ordered by Chester Massey for the Metropolitan Church in Toronto. The instrument at Ottawa followed the European idea of a State medium for art. Mr. Price regretted that automatic playing mechanisms have not been installed on this continent.

Mr. Price followed his lecture with a short piano recital of carillon music, including in it a piece of his own composition.

Mrs. W. A. Gifford, who presided, referred to the fact that Mr. Price had won the Pulitzer Prize recently for his "St. Lawrence" Symphony.

EXPERTS AT ODDS OVER OLD PAINTING

Oct. 16/34
Ottawa Antique Dealer Sued by Montreal Man For $500

OTTAWA, Oct. 16. — (C.P.) — County Court Judge Francis L. Smiley is confronted with the question of deciding whether or not a painting of "The Chudlach Mountains" is the original work from the brush of Kreighoff, famed as a painter of early Canadian life.

Experts were not in accord when the picture was exhibited in court today. C. Marius Barbeau, well-known student of early Canadian life and ethnologist at the National Museum, expressed the opinion that the painting was not genuine. Dr. A. G. Doughty, Dominion archivist, told the court no one could decide whether or not the painting was authentic.

The plaintiff in the action, Lieut. Col. T. W. McDowell, V.C., Montreal, contends representations made to him at the time of the sale of the genuineness of the painting were false. He paid $500 for the picture and an Alphonse Bouchard rug which also was not genuine, but had been renewed at one end. Lieut. Col. McDowell stated to the Court. He sues for the return of the $500 paid and offers to return the painting and the rug for his money.

E. W. Marshall, local antique dealer, who sold the picture and the rug to Lieut. Col. McDowell, told the judge that although he believed the picture to be a genuine one by Kreighoff when making the sale, he did not guarantee its authenticity. Marshall maintained his representations to Lieut. Col. McDowell were made in good faith on information he thought reliable.

The case is continuing this afternoon.

MUCH TALENT IS SHOWN

J. Murray Gibbon Traces History of Movement and Praises Native Skill of Settlers Here

About 3,000 exhibits are on view at the annual exhibition and prize competition of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, which opened on Saturday afternoon in the Galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, 1379 Sherbrooke street west. Work was on a higher quality level and there was an increase in pottery, bookbinding and metalwork exhibits, officials of the show pointed out. There are groups of exhibits from the various Canadian provinces.

The work on display is divided into the following main classes: weaving, hooked rugs, batik, wrought iron, woodwork, pottery, leatherwork, jewellery, embroidery, models, boat models, patchwork quilts, catalogue and braided rugs. In addition displays of weaving, wood carving and book binding are given by expert craftsmen.

The exhibition was officially opened by J. Murray Gibbon, president of the Canadian Authors League, in the presence of a large attendance, including many distinguished persons, among them Mrs. J. E. Perrault, wife of the Minister of Mines and Highways, and O. A. Beriau, provincial director of handicrafts. Col. Wilfrid Bovey, president of the guild, in introducing Mr. Gibbon said that most of the exhibits came from the Province of Quebec. He praised the work being done by Mr. Beriau and his associates for the development of handicrafts in the province. Col. Bovey declared that Mr. Gibbon was nationally known as a connoisseur of handicraft work and he recalled that no one in Canada had done more to emphasize the connection that exists between handicrafts and folksongs than he had by organizing festivals of both arts.

Mr. Gibbon spoke in part as follows:

GUILD 50 YEARS OLD.

"It is my privilege today to introduce to you an exhibition of Canadian handicrafts, the beauty and variety of which speak for themselves. But it may be apropos to remind you that the year 1884 is the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation in London of the Art Workers Guild, an institution which had a very great influence in reviving the interest in handicraft as opposed to the machine-made product. The Art Workers Guild, established in 1884, resulted from the propaganda of William Morris, a poet, printer, architect, illuminator and craftsman, who led the revolt against the art of the machine age which had dominated England in the preceding 50 years. William Morris found his inspiration in mediaeval art. If he had been less of a Londoner and had travelled, for instance, through Central Europe, he would have realized that it was not necessary to go back to the Middle Ages to find examples of handicrafts. He would have found handicraft very much alive in the peasant art of Europe, which had maintained the traditions of bygone generations undisturbed by the deadly precision of the factory and the machine, just as in music the folksong preserves the old modes and is not cast in the modern major and minor keys.

"In this matter of handicraft tradition, we in Canada are particularly fortunate for we have brought to our shores the peasant artists of Europe, who have come here to escape from political and economic oppression. We have in Canada 400,000 Ukrainians, 200,000 Scandinavians, 100,000 Hungarians, large contingents of Russians, Yugoslavs, Czechoslovaks, Rumanians, Italians, Greeks, etc., a number of whom have brought with them skill in spinning, weaving, embroidery, carving, etc. In addition the French-Canadians of the country districts of the Province of Quebec have preserved the tradition of handicraft brought to this country by their ancestors. The native Indian population is also wonderfully expert in handicrafts. In this exhibition you will find specimens of the work of many racial groups and it should help us to realize the culture of the various races now being blended into the Canadian nation.

QUALITY IS EVIDENT.

"There is a quality and charm, an individuality and character about handicrafts that makes it well worth keeping alive. I dare say the factory hands who help to manufacture machine-made goods are just as human as the habitants or country folk whose homespun or rugs or embroideries you may handle, but their humanity has been obliterated in transit. Personally, when I see a piece of homespun, the tune of some old folksong is apt to come to mind, perhaps through association of ideas, as I have so often heard women singing at the loom. In an exhibition such as this there are probably floating around us, if we could only hear them, the ghosts of a thousand folksongs, sung as they worked by the spinners, weavers, rug-makers, embroiders and wood-carvers whose handicrafts we see."

Among the many present were Col. and Mrs. Gerald Birks, Lady Roddick, H. B. Walker, Dr. W. D. Lighthall and Mrs. Lighthall, Miss Alice Lighthall, chairman of the committee in charge of the exhibition; Dr. G. R. Lomer, Mrs. L. C. Malcolm, secretary of the guild; Leo Cox, Sir Frank and Lady Hudson, J. C. Bonar and L. G. Barnard.

WINTER PLANS LAID BY ARTISTS' GROUP

John Greene Pierce Elected President and New Activities Arranged

John Greene Pierce was elected president of the Independent Art Association at the annual meeting held last week at the Central Y.M.C.A. Plans were laid for the coming winter and it was decided that the scope of activities would be somewhat enlarged in view of growing interest displayed by members.

Other officers named were: First vice-president, Dr. Nathan Freedman; second vice-president, R. Sharps; honorary secretary-treasurer, Miss N. Low; executive committees: Reception, S. B. Wilson and Mrs. R. G. Burgoyne; exhibition and hanging, Mr. Van der Vliet; membership, C. Tulley and Jack Mander; publicity, Mr. French and Eddie Cannon; lectures and programme, D. Pavitt and J. O'C. Lynch; honorary auditor, Orson Wheeler.

Plans were made for the exhibition of Art to be shown in a special group at the National Produced in Canada Exhibition at the Sun Life Building, November 7 to 17. It was decided to invite artists and craftsmen of allied arts and of recognized merit, though not regular members, to exhibit their work, thus broadening the scope of the association's activities.

A new feature which should also prove of interest to Montreal artists will be a regular weekly open forum sketch class for members, under qualified supervision. It is also hoped to establish permanent Studio Club headquarters with a lounge room where small exhibitions may be held at regular intervals.

Any artist or craftsman who is interested, may inquire by telephone of the secretary, at Fitzroy 9870.

M. A. Fortin's Pictures At Eaton's Galleries

The first one-man exhibition of the season at the gallery of the Eaton Company is of a small collection of oil pictures by the Montreal painter, M. A. Fortin. In these pictures, which are in his very characteristic manner, he has translated facts into his own language, with an interesting mixture of naturalism and formalism, and has painted bold color decorations which need a large room for their showing. The subjects are for the most part scenes in Montreal or in France, and most of them have Mr. Fortin's customary hard outlines, strong contrasts of color and light, and heavy, mountainous clouds. Some of the French pictures are among the best here and outstanding ones are of a bridge over the Rhone and of a harbour on the Mediterranean coast, in both of which there is more realism than in most of the pictures. An effect rather like the texture of tapestry appears in some of these pictures, notably in a large one of a cottage among trees at Ste. Rose and in a view of some buildings at Rouen. There is something of this quality too in the big still life of a fruit-stall, a strong piece of color decoration. The only figure subject is the odd but interesting "La pourvoyeuse," an adaptation of a picture by Chardin.

Next week there will be an additional exhibition at these galleries, of works by Charles Simpson, R.C.A. Among these will be a number of his pictures of cities in the United States.

JOHN CONSTABLE'S PICTURES ON VIEW

Gazette Oct. 23/34
Included in Cooling Collection Shown at Johnson Art Galleries

Four Constables occupy a place of prime importance in the collection of paintings brought to Montreal by J. H. Cooling, of the Cooling Galleries Limited, London, now on view in the Johnson Art Galleries, Limited, 1340 St. Catherine street, west. Other works shown include examples by men of the British and Continental schools, there being variety enough in subject and technique to meet different tastes. Barring the big national and more important private collections, it is not a common happening to find four Constables together, especially awaiting acquisition by the discerning picture-lover. Such treasures are usually closely held by their fortunate owners and are not available to collectors. Then, too, there is sometimes the question of authenticity. In the present case, Mr. Cooling secured the four sketches from the George Hilditch Collection, which family acquired them from Miss Constable, the painter's daughter, and had them in their possession until they came into the market.

John Constable, R.A. thoroughly English to the core in his love of his homeland's countryside, shows himself on familiar and congenial ground in these small works which are direct and spontaneous in treatment and reveal the main angles of his art—landscape with or without figures and buildings set amidst noble trees.

"Landscape," which crystallizes the quiet charm of rural England, is simple in its elements—a fence and open gate, stretch of meadow with distant cattle, higher rolling country in the background and over all a typical summer sky with clouds that move. It is a vivid impression set down with decision.

"The Artist's Home"—the building at Hampstead in which he lived many years and in the neighborhood of which he found a congenial sketching ground—is a work of lovely values. The building, of simple and rather severe design, is set among trees fronted by a field in which sheep graze.

"Carting Hay" is a breezy work—a corner of a field with figures loading a cart. The painting is direct and the sketch is true to place and season.

"Cloudland" shows a stretch of darkening country with nature in an angry mood. The sky is filled with massive clouds which have already begun to break in rain. It is a dramatic moment swiftly seized and confidently recorded.

This group of works—simple records of the painter's search for knowledge of nature in varying moods—express the artist at his happiest. They are sketches done at top-heat and have a vitality that sometimes is missing in some of the so-called "important" works of all painters. Here in country he knew so well he is enjoying himself—setting down impressions without thought of patron or dealer; in short, being himself.

These sketches are rich in those qualities, which, with the years, are convincing the critic and connoisseur that John Constable must ever rank in the van of landscape painters.

The art of George Morland is represented by "The Rescue"—two figures, near a damaged boat, at the base of a cliff, giving aid to a man in heavy surf.

For those who like detail and high finish there is a fine, typical example of T. Sidney Cooper, R.A., cattle in a shed in which the light and shade are well handled. This work was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1870. More free in touch is "The Rehearsal" by J. Seymour Lucas, R.A.—a woman in blue at a spinnet while three instrumentalists, sit near by. "On Guard" by Ernest Crofts, R.A., shows a halberdier standing before the steps of a creeper-covered home at dusk. "The Quiet Lane," a pastel by Henri Le Sidaner, is marked by the subtle values which are typical of this painter's work in oil. The design is effective and the subdued tones admirably handled. By Mark Fisher, R.A., is "Cattle Grazing," which is a typical, broadly-painted, glimpse of English meadowland, and "Loading Hay," B. Priestman, R.A., is represented by "Cattle in the Fens"—a landscape drenched with silvery light, and there are typical works by B. W. Leader, R.A.

Two outstanding examples of modern water color are by W. Russell Flint, R.A. Both are bathing pools with figures set among trees and show the certainty of touch, pleasing color and capital manipulation of the medium which mark this painter's work.

The 87 items on view include works by some of the leading painters in the British Isles and on the continent.

BUST OF DR. BULLER WILL BE UNVEILED

Late Great Ophthalmologist to Be Honored at Royal Victoria Hospital

A bust of the late Dr. Frank Buller, the first modern ophthalmologist to establish himself in Canada, will be unveiled in the Royal Victoria Hospital on Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The bust is the work of Dr. Tait Mackenzie, eminent Canadian sculptor. Dr. W. Gordon M. Byers will speak on Dr. Buller's life and work.

Dr. Frank Buller was born on May 4, 1844, on a farm near Cobourg, Ontario, the fifth child of Charles George Buller and of Frances E. Boucher. At the age of 12 the boy moved with his family to Iowa. Four years later he was taken into the home of his mother's brother, Judge Boucher, at Peterboro, Ontario. Here he attended the grammar-school, and during the summer holidays learned dispensing and "made himself generally useful" in the offices of Dr. Burnham, a leading practitioner of his day. He graduated from Rolfe's Medical School, Toronto, in 1868, and, after spending a year in general practice in Michigan to add to his funds, proceeded to Europe for special work in connection with the eye and ear. Altogether he spent about seven years abroad studying in Germany with the illustrious von Graefe, Virchow, Helmholtz and in England under Bowman, Crichton and Hutchinson. Having passed the examination for membership in the Royal College of Surgeons, Dr. Buller was appointed house-surgeon at the Royal London (Moorfield's) Ophthalmic Hospital.

In 1876 he began practice in Montreal. He established the first ophthalmic clinic at the Montreal General Hospital. The value of his clinical teaching and the importance of ophthalmology as a branch of the medical curriculum were recognized by an appointment to the first chair of ophthalmology of McGill University, which was founded in 1883. In 1885, Dr. Buller resigned his position at the General Hospital to take charge of the ophthalmic clinic at the new Royal Victoria Hospital, and this post, with the appointment at the university and numerous charitable institutions, he held until his death, on October 1905, from pernicious anaemia.

Dr. Buller was the first modern ophthalmologist to establish himself in Canada. He had the whole country to himself, and soon acquired a practice and a reputation that could hardly again fall to the lot of any man in the Dominion.

Potter's Wheel in Handicrafts Show

Star Oct. 26/34

At the time when primitive races took clay from the river banks and fashioned it into rude vessels for daily use down to the present when objects of great beauty as well as of usefulness are produced, is a long period, but the basic principle remains much the same—the moulding of clay. A demonstration of this is one of the most fascinating activities at the exhibition of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild now being held in the galleries of the Art Association, and a group is always gathered around the spot where a potter is working, shaping on his wheel articles of various shapes and sizes.

The wheel, big lumps of clay—taken from the excavation for the Y.M.C.A.—a pail of water with which to keep the clay plastic, form the equipment, under the skilled hands of the potter. Men, women and children looked on yesterday as the potter threw a lump of moist clay on the disk, while the wheel turned by his assistant spun rapidly at first, then more slowly, as the potter shaped and moulded the clay, drawing it up into a tall narrow vase, flattening it into a bowl, smoothing the surface or marking it in circles, widening the rim or pinching it into scallops. This glorified form of making "mud pies" delighted the children, and one little girl tried her hand at it but found it "not so easy as it looked."

Near the potter's wheel is an exhibit of pottery from four of the provinces. One can turn from the wheel where the modelling in the raw clay is going on and see in the case articles as completed by the firing and coloring. Three of the exhibitors are boys in the Griffintown Club, taught by the potter, C. H. Eardley, who learned his art in the potteries in Staffordshire.

'THE DEAD CHRIST' NOW ON VIEW HERE

Gazette Oct. 30/34

Outstanding Painting by J. J. Henner Among Those at Scott's Galleries

Ranked importantly among the fine paintings of modern times, and certainly one of the greatest works from the brush of this particular artist, "The Dead Christ" by J. J. Henner is on exhibition here for the first time in the galleries of Wm. Scott and Sons, Drummond street.

The painting, brought to Montreal by Harry Wallis, remained in the artist's possession for several years and during that time was never seen by the public. It was later included in a private collection in the Old Country, and is now on the market for the first time. It is one of Henner's best paintings, done during the middle period of his long life. He lived from 1828 to 1905.

This remarkable religious work shows the figure of Christ lying on a bed of cloth, after His body was removed from the Cross on Calvary. At His side kneel three mourning women; one—presumably Mary Magdalene—bowed in grief at His feet, her glowing red-gold hair falling in confusion over His limbs. Mary the Mother and Martha kneel at the back, looking down at the dead face.

It is beautifully painted. There is the sense of death, yet also the sense of spiritual life about the picture. The Christ lies with head raised a little, as though looking into the eyes of the two women. The wounds on His body have been covered with cloth by the mourners. Vivid is the face of Martha as she looks forward over the body of Her Master, and the grief-stricken figure of Mary Magdalene is eloquent with the beauty and feeling of the work.

In addition to this painting by Henner, Scott's has on exhibition a number of works from brushes of celebrated artists. Included are pictures by Wm. Shayer, Sr., B. de Hoog, E. B. Hurt, H. Harpignes, F. P. TerMeulen, Sir D. Y. Cameron.

The exhibition, for Henner's painting of "The Dead Christ" alone, offers a treat for art lovers, and together with the other works on display is worth long and unburied inspection.

Toronto Painter Represented by Snow Scenes in Watson Art Galleries

Capable Summer Landscapes Included in Pictures by Artist Who Finds Winter Congenial Season

Winter scenes, with a sprinkling of landscapes done in the season of full leaf, by Franz Johnston, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., on view in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, reveal this Toronto painter's love of light. These works, thoroughly Canadian in spirit, show the practised hand allied with knowledge of what goes to make an attractive picture. In composition the paintings are engaging and the color is agreeable.

Mr. Johnston has found his subjects at varying hours and in differing types of landscape. "Lengthening Shadows"—hilly bush country with trappers and their toboggans travelling through deep snow, is an interpretation of that brief period at sun-down in winter when long shadows throw a tracery on the snow. "Northern Snow" is marked by a good impression of broken snow flecked by sunlight that dapples noble snow-clad spruces. "Halcyon Morning", highly successful in the decorative arrangement of the snow-covered branches of a big tree, reveals a nice sense of values in the painting of a distant mountain. Distinctly happy is the placing of the bare trees on a ridge against a cloudy sky in "Windswept", and familiarity with his subject is shown in "Sunglow"—sun-flushed distant bush and a log cabin in a clearing. That problems do not dismay Mr. Johnston is evident by his effort to set down the elusive, beauty of Northern Lights. In his effective painting the artist shows these points of light playing on the sky above the timbered edge of a stream.

Strong sunlight and shadow mark "Sunlit Silence"—timberland where the drifted snow has settled in cones on stick and stump. "The Silent Valley" is an effective theme in greys, with distant rolling wooded hills and a man with his dog-team crossing open country. The flush of sunlight on snow-clad spruces is well suggested in "Golden Afterglow," and of a later hour is "On the North Trail" where a trapper is urging his dog-team across an expanse growing sombre with the fall of night.

"Snow Symphony" shows a hunter with rifle approaching dense bush, and "The Approach of Spring" well suggests the season of thaw in the treatment of the thinning snow on landscape and rutted road. "The Gate" is effective in arrangement with its tall trees touched by sunlight that glows on the gate. "The Snowbound Stream" well suggests the glitter of sunlight on snow, the shadows and the movement of the water, between snowy banks, being confidently put in. "The Golden Dome"—a rounded snowbank in sunlight and shadow is an attractive composition, especially effective being the subtle values in the broken snow in the foreground.

Of a warmer season are "A Woodland Wall"—trees in full leaf on a hillside; "The Edge of the Forest" an arrangement of sunlight and shadow in timbered country, and "Midsummer" in which blue water washes a stony beach near a clump of trees.

Franz Johnston, who was born in Toronto, June 19, 1888, turned his artistic taste first to designing jewellery and later studied painting in New York and Philadelphia. He has made many trips to Algoma for pictorial subjects and for three years was principal of the Winnipeg School of Art. During the war he was commissioned to paint records of the Royal Flying Corps. He was elected a member of the Ontario Society of Artists in 1920, in which year he was elected an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts.

Mr. Johnston is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by five works—"A Northern Night", "The Guardian of the Gorge", "The Magic Pool", "The Fire Swept, Algoma" and "The Fire Ranger."

Dr. W. Gordon M. Byers Pays Tribute to Former Teacher—Canadian and U.S. Doctors Attend

The memory of the late Dr. Frank Buller, the first Canadian ophthalmologist with true scientific outlook to establish himself in Canada, was fittingly honored on Saturday afternoon when a bust of the noted physician by the well-known Canadian sculptor, Dr. Tait Mackenzie, was unveiled in the Royal Victoria Hospital by Mrs. Buller before a notable gathering of Canadian and American medical men. The bust is a gift of Dr. Buller's wife and three children to the hospital where he was chief ophthalmological for 10 years, from 1895 to 1905. In addition to a large number of prominent local doctors there was also present a delegation of six representatives from the council of the American Ophthalmological Society. Dr. Tait Mackenzie was also present.

The bust bears the inscription:

TRIBUTE OF DISCIPLE

Dr. W. Gordon M. Byers, doctor Buller's successor as head of the hospital's ophthalmological department, spoke in part as follows of his achievements:

We are met within the Royal Victoria Hospital to dedicate a memorial to Frank Buller; and it is fitting that his disciple and successor should set forth the reasons why his memory should be gratefully honored.

"Dr. Buller was one of the world's foremost practitioners of medicine and surgery in diseases of the eye. He was qualified in the highest degree by nature for his calling; and in his training he imposed upon himself technical and professional requirements that must be regarded as ideal in the education of a specialist.

"In addition to a myriad of people who consulted him privately, Dr. Buller had as the first oculist to the Montreal General Hospital and later as the first oculist to the Royal Victoria Hospital the care of an even larger number of public patients. Those who served under him know best with what skill and entire lack of discrimination he ministered to the sick poor. Of silver and gold Dr. Buller gained little but in higher terms his gratuitous services place him among the foremost benefactors of his country.

HELD MCGILL CHAIR

"Dr. Buller was the first occupant of the chair of ophthalmology founded at McGill University in 1883. He was an excellent teacher, clear and concise in presentation, and generations of students gained under him a knowledge of ophthalmology that helped to complete the thorough clinical training for which the McGill Medical School has always been famous.

"Dr. Buller, a Canadian, was the first ophthalmologist with the scientific outlook to establish himself in Canada. During an extremely arduous life he made, at the sacrifice of health and leisure, 76 contributions to the literature of ophthalmology. Of several innovations for the betterment of practice, one at least, which has been of inestimable value in the prevention of blindness, will bear his name to the end of time.

"Dr. Buller's place in medical history lies in the galaxy of men whose work marks the culmination in our own time of the renaissance of ophthalmology. He was a man of rare quality, who embodied all that was best in the English characters. He was courageous, persevering, humane, just and conscientious. In his duty to the public and to the institutions which he served, he knew no compromise, and one feels that his last, and perhaps greatest, claim to remembrance rests in the cherished traditions of the high ethical standards which he set and maintained."

The late DR. FRANK BULLER, in his lifetime Canada's most distinguished ophthalmologist, to whose memory a permanent memorial, a bust by Dr. Tait Mackenzie, will be unveiled in the Royal Victoria Hospital this afternoon.

Works by C. W. Simpson 30. At Eaton's Galleries

An exhibition, opened this week in Eaton's art galleries, of works by Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., covers the walls of two of the galleries. One of these galleries is given over to a collection of studies, in pen and water color, of American cities, from Montreal to New Orleans and from Pittsburgh to San Francisco. These are idealized portraits of places in which Mr. Simpson has found beauties where some people would least expect them. New Orleans and San Francisco have charms which anyone can see and Mr. Simpson has made the most of them, but the effects of light and color which he has got in Chicago and Pittsburgh are much more surprising; but, if surprising, they are convincing and people who have never been able to see those cities in that way may well wish that they could. The skyscrapers of Chicago are made to show how well they can reflect light and the smoke of Pittsburgh is all there in color without its ugliness. The pictures also show the amazing contrasts which are to be seen in growing cities. Some scenes of Montreal and Toronto are there to serve as a key and guide to the others.

The other gallery contains oil pictures and sketches. Two of the more striking of the few larger pictures are a view of Montreal from St. Helen's Island and a group of schooners in "Broken Ice." Among the smaller sketches, some sea-shore studies of water and sky, and particularly some of waves breaking on rocks, stand out. In the others there are a variety of subjects—Quebec farm houses, rivers, snow scenes, autumn tints—but in all of them the real subjects are the light and the colors which it produces, and the places and the things in them are almost used only as accessories to the effects of light.

This exhibition is to remain open for two weeks. The pictures by M. A. Fortin, in the third gallery, remain till the end of the present week.

Missing Painting Restored to Church

Southampton—It has been discovered that a picture which disappeared from the Church of St. Mary, Southampton, many years ago and was later found in a second-hand shop and is now to be restored to the church is the work of the Spanish painter Joanes (Vicente Juan Macip, 1523-79).

The picture disappeared many years ago. Later George Parker, who died last November, bought two pictures which attracted his attention in a second-hand shop. One was a begrimed canvas showing the Annunciation. In 1921 he sold this picture to an American for £100, but the buyer never claimed his purchase. Mr. Parker advertised extensively for the buyer, and right up to the time of his death tried to trace him but failed. Mr. Parker left both pictures to Miss B. Harding, who had looked after him.

Miss Harding knew that it was his wish that if the picture of the Annunciation was not claimed it should be returned to St. Mary's, it having been discovered that it was once that church's property. She has offered it to the church and also offered to have it restored at her own expense. It was during the work of restoration that the artist's name was discovered. The painting is on a canvas 7ft. by 5ft.

appearance at a little after five o'clock, when the majority of spectators had departed. Mr. Bovey, Mrs. James Pegg, honorary president of the guild; Dr. R. Tait Mackenzie, president of the Ottawa Valley branch, and others, received him.

The mayor apologized for his tardiness, made a hurried tour of the exhibits, but made no speech.

Books on Art

Star Nov. 3/34

Art and, still more, interest in art are coming into their own as a necessary part of education and, at the same time more consideration is being given to the difficulties of the elementary school teacher who has to teach this with other subjects. Any course in art teaching that is to be of use for younger children must be not too much of a burden for the teacher, must be practical and must have enough diversity to keep the children's attention alive. These needs seem to have been well recognized in a series of School Art Books which have just been published by the Renouf Publishing Company of Montreal, for the use of Canadian school children. They have been prepared by an editorial committee of Clarence V. Frayn, as chairman; Miss Maud Bellis, Miss W. M. Buzzell and Prof. H. F. Armstrong.

This series provides a separate book for each school grade; the set received ends at the seventh grade, after which an intelligent child, who has gone through this course, should be fit for a more specialized kind of art teaching. It is intended, as a preface to each book says, that "the books of this series shall be owned by the pupils so that the contents may be handy for reference at any time and prove an interesting incentive to study." The same preface, which is full of sound advice as to the use of the course, points out that the teacher need not be a trained artist, but should be interested in art. Each book contains thirty lessons, which can and should be taken not merely as directions for lessons as, still more, suggestions of ideas, which should be welcomed by the teachers.

Variety of interest is well provided for in these books and should be enough to keep the attention of any child. Each book contains a number of pictures, of recognized merit, with suggestions for their study and, at the same time, there are practical lessons which are thoroughly practical. For the earliest grades there are such things as the making of doll's furniture, and drawing which is not too unlike the sort of thing that a child might do on its own account. Each book leads on to the next, through studies of form and color, up to the last book which includes the elements of perspective and the use of shadows. The course, properly used, should be of good service in producing not so much artists as, what is more important, people who have some understanding of the nature of art and appreciation of it.

Van Gogh's Life Story

LUST FOR LIFE. The Novel of Vincent Van Gogh. By Irving Stone. Longmans, Green and Company, Toronto. $2.50.

In this reader's opinion, biography-novels are a mistake. Neither fact nor fiction, they proclaim their illegitimacy on every page—barred, almost by definition, from being either first-rate novels or first-rate biographies.

Irving Stone's resurrection of Vincent Van Gogh proves the rule; whether or not it is an exception is a matter of opinion. It certainly has all the advantages. Capably written, based on a life which was undoubtedly dramatic, it is an absorbing and profoundly moving book. One is led to suspect that its fatal drawback is not the author's fault, but inherent in the nature of the work.

That drawback is that Vincent Van Gogh, as portrayed in "Lust for Life," is not quite a living character. He is a sort of zombie. From the recorded facts of Van Gogh's brief and sensational career, the writer has conceived an idea—a good one, too. But this ideal Van Gogh does not quite harmonize with the real Van Gogh; periodically, the reader feels that the hero is stepping out of character. The cold facts of Van Gogh's own life almost, but not quite, harmonize with the character of Mr. Stone's Van Gogh.

All this, however, is a personal opinion—and a presumptuous one at that. Biography-novels have a wide following, if one may judge by the spate of them in recent years, and this is certainly one of the best of its kind. Mr. Stone opens his narrative with Vincent's 22nd year; the future painter is then a clerk in the London branch of his uncle's art firm.

Crossed in love, young Van Gogh drops the art business and goes into a bookshop. Then he studies for the ministry. Failing in his examinations, he turns evangelist; spends a winter in a Belgian mining district, and takes Christ's gospel too literally. When his ecclesiastical superiors discover that he has actually been giving his salary to the poor, living in a miner's hut and holding divine service in an abandoned barn, they cast him off. Another failure.

It is after his excommunication from the ministry that he discovers his own genius as an artist. The rest of the book traces his terrific battle against poverty, against criticism, against his own shortcomings and ignorance of drawing; the story reaches a well-sustained climax with the account of his residence at Arles, doing his best work while he tottered on the brink of the madness that finally claimed him. The notorious incident of Van Gogh's cutting off his own ear, to please the prostitute whom he loved, is excellently done.

Descending to sentimentality once or twice, the book as a whole is well written and interesting. Its chief source is the collection, recently published, of Van Gogh's letters to his brother Theo.

MURAL PLACED ON DISPLAY AT SHOW

Mangold's Painting of Canadian Industry and Agriculture Vigorous Work

Carl Mangold's mural painting of Canadian industry and agriculture, exhibited this year by Canadian Industries, Limited, at the Canadian National Exhibition, Toronto, has been brought to Montreal and will be shown, starting tomorrow, at the Produced-in-Canada show in the Sun Life Building.

The large mural with its striking color effects aroused great interest at the Toronto show and has been given attention by artists and art critics in the United States and England. The mural was painted by Mangold at his Montreal studio, and was completed in two months.

It is a vivid and striking work, painted with a fierce tempo of activity. Against a background of industrial and agricultural scenes, 26 figures portray the various branches of human endeavor in Canada. Stream-lined airplanes zoom out of the sky. A powerful locomotive seems to be thundering across the canvas. A mine shaft, grain elevators, aviation hangars, the steelwork of a skyscraper, industrial plants and so on, are vividly depicted. From the northwest to the sea, the mural takes one through the heart of Canada, throws out her throbbing industry in vivid colors and strong figures.

The canvas is 35 feet in length and nine feet in depth. The artist, Carl Mangold, is of Swiss birth, and for the past five years has made his home in Canada. The mural has been placed at the south end of the Produced-in-Canada Exhibition in the Sun Life Building.

GIANT MURAL WORK WILL BE DISPLAYED

"Canada Builds a Great Nation" Title of Special C.I.L. Canvas

Particularly suitable for the Produced in Canada Exhibition opening in the Sun Life Building next Wednesday is the great mural painting, "Canada Builds a Great Nation," which will feature the exhibit of Canadian Industries Limited. The work of a Montreal artist, Carl Mangold, the giant canvas gives a realistic and comprehensive picture of Canada at work and covers the whole field of commerce, manufacturing and agriculture. Labor and capital are shown working together in the task of nation building.

Shown once before in Canada, the mural completed late last summer was viewed by close to a million people at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto and so, impressive was the public reaction to the picture the sponsors decided that it should be shown at the Montreal exhibition.

Devoted as it is to the development of Canadian commerce and manufacture the mural provides a fitting and natural accompaniment for an exhibition that is concentrated on the display of Canadian-made products. Principal object of the exhibition is to increase interest in, and demand for, Canada's own goods and the Mangold canvas gives in one sweeping picture a vivid impression of what increased interest means to Canada's workers in factories and on the land.

Installation of the C.I.L. exhibit is now being completed. In addition to the mural an elaborate exhibit will demonstrate the extensive part that Canadian Industries Limited is taking in the development of Canadian business in factory, mine and field.

RECORDS OF TRAVEL

Shows Marked Ability in Seizing Picturesque Essentials—Light and Atmosphere Well Suggested

Oils and tinted drawings by Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., of Montreal, make a colorful display in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. These works, which are attracting a large attendance of picture-lovers, reveal this artist's skill in suggesting light and atmosphere and his flair for selecting interesting material.

Mr. Simpson's drawings, which represent wide travel, have been done with reproduction in view and in these he shows a fine sense of distance when setting down city vistas. Many of these works have been reproduced in United States publications where they won high praise.

In these drawings Mr. Simpson has been happy in capturing the character of the buildings. This has been attained without the slavish copying of every tiny detail, but by deftly noting essentials and keeping the impression broad and free. Thus he has set down characteristic bits about San Francisco—"Above the Golden Gate," "Market Street," a glimpse of Chinatown; "The Alamo, San Antonio," an expanse of buildings and bridged river at Pittsburgh, the Ghetto in the same city, picturesque spots in New Orleans, skyscrapers and railroad yards in Chicago, the imposing Parliament Buildings at Victoria, B.C., the spacious vista of Portage Avenue, Winnipeg, Toronto's waterfront, and, at home, Bonsecours Market and the since demolished Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul, Dorchester street.

This group, which occupies one gallery, has much that warrants close study.

SOME EFFECTIVE OILS.

The oils, which include some large canvases that have been shown at the Art Association galleries here, are marked by engaging color—especially in the smaller works which has been directly painted on the spot when the impression was keen. In this group there are "Log Cabin, Mirabel, Que.," "October, Lachute," with stream and glowing bush; "St. Octave, Que.," "The De Cavalier House"—old wooden structure with woman in garden. Ice and water figure in the atmospheric "Spring Morning" and the approach of winter is well suggested in "First Snow, Montreal River," with farm houses on the bank of the winding stream.

Of larger scale are "Broken Ice" with moored schooners and a horse and wagon on the wharf; "Montreal Harbor from St. Helen's Island," and "The Hillside" with its snowy banks, stream and noble trees.

Among other works there are three spontaneously treated marines—"The Afterglow," "Surf" and "The Golden Pathway."

Private Showing Reveals Fewer Figure Studies Ex-

WATERCOLORS INCREASE

Many Montreal Artists Re-

By GUY E. RHOADES.
(Canadian Press Staff Writer.)

Toronto, November 2.—The 55th annual exhibition of paintings, watercolors and color prints of the Royal Canadian Academy opened tonight with a private showing at the Art Gallery of Toronto with 234 pictures on the walls, most of them landscapes or seascapes.

Fewer figure studies are shown this year than in other recent shows, although portraits and still lifes are numerous. There is evidence of growing interest in watercolors and increasing expertness in their handling.

Most spectacular of the figure studies is that of Edwin Holgate of Montreal entitled "By The Lake," showing two women drying in the sun on the rocks of a northern lake after a swim in the blue water.

Dorothy Steven of Toronto, whose candid nudes excited interest in recent shows, has done an about-turn with a portrait of a white-haired old woman in a black lace dress with a black choker, sitting against a background of wallpaper with a colossal pattern. She calls it "The Mauve Decade."

Marion Long of Toronto is represented by her "Mexican Dancer," almost full length study of a full-breasted young woman in a close-fitting red dress, bathed in golden light, while Franklin Arbuckle shows a finely-drawn "Jennifer" removing a robe among alders near a bathing beach.

R. S. Hewton of Glen Miller, Ont., scores with "Marie," dark-haired, olive-skinned and clad in a flame colored dress, sitting on a stone beside a picket fence with her back to the sea and the cliffs in the distance.

Allan Barr of Toronto shows two fine still life, "The Silver Jug" and "Flower Piece" in which he exhibits great skill in depicting on canvas the glint and color of polished silver and glass. Mrs. Florence Proctor of Toronto has a gaudily-colored still life with artificial lilies rising from a glass bowl of yellowish liquid, set on a table with a robin's egg blue cloth beside a glass plate of colored glass globes and a conch shell.

SIMPSON HAS SEASCAPE.

Charles W. Simpson, of Montreal, is represented by a fine seascape called "On The Beach," showing a vast expanse of sand and rock on which bathers sport or rest under a hot, hazy sky. Among other seascapes is "Caribbean Clouds," by Percy Nobbs of Westmount, Que., a finely executed watercolor of purplish sea with a small sail on the horizon and a hazy sky across which drift great banks of cumulus cloud.

Landscapes include Fred Haines' "Wood Interior" of giant gnarled trees with tangled branches bathed in sunlight or sinking into deep shadows. L. A. C. Pantou's "Wind-song" shows dwarfed trees blowing in the wind atop a rocky rise under a glowering sky.

Frank Hennessey, of Ottawa, has a finely drawn group of snow-covered rocks protruding from gray water of a partly frozen river. Light catches the numerous facets of the rock and snow and is reflected in the water.

Competence in handling light and shade is shown by Elizabeth M. Nutt of Halifax in her "Sanctuary," a quiet garden scene over which lies sunlight sifting through trees and falling dappled on the grass and garden walk.

Arthur Lismer, back from his African trip, is represented by only one picture, his "Impressions of Basutoland," showing almost bare, brownish hills, rolling upward and burned by a furious sun.

A flame colored sunset reflected against a bare hill in the background lends a sombre note to A. J. Casson's "Mill Town" of little wooden houses touched by the slanting rays of the sun and throwing long dark shadows across the street.

Of historical interest is the big picture of the Parliament Buildings at Ottawa painted by R. A. Pilot of Montreal from a point on the road below Major Hill Park. Color vibrates in the "Corpus Christi Sunday" of Joseph Dreany of Toronto, with its white surpliced procession along a street lined with houses in need of paint. Beneath a huge hill in the background rises the little village church.

Liking for simple country is shown in the "Paysage, Temiscouata County" of Mary Mack, of Cornwall, Ont., a little watercolor landscape of bright green fields fading into darker trees in the middle distance with a river beyond and dark blue hills in the extreme background.

Among the portraits is Archibald Barnes' brilliant study of "Master Joe Wright," a small boy about five years old with dark hair and eyes, wearing a white shirt open at the neck and sitting confidently against a background of gray clouds.

E. Wyly Grier, president of the Academy, has fine portraits of Edward Johnson, tenor, G. A. Morrow and Davidson Harman. Notable also "Frad," portrait of a blonde in an old rose dress by Lillas Newton of Montreal.

Fewer Figures Appear In R.C.A. Show At Toronto

Landscapes, Seascapes Predominate in 234 Works Exhibited; Increasing Attention to Water-Color Medium Indicated; Portraits Numerous

TORONTO, Nov. 3.—(C. P.)—The 55th annual exhibition of paintings, watercolors and color prints of the Royal Canadian Academy opened last night with a private showing at the Art Gallery of Toronto with 234 pictures on the walls, most of them landscapes or seascapes.

Fewer figure studies are shown this year than in other recent shows, although portraits and still lifes are numerous. There is evidence of growing interest in watercolors and increasing expertness in their handling.

Most spectacular of the figure studies is that of Edwin Holgate, of Montreal, entitled "By The Lake," showing two women drying in the sun on the rocks of a Northern lake after a swim in the blue water.

OUTSTANDING FIGURES

Dorothy Steven, of Toronto, whose candid nudes excited interest in recent shows, has done an about-turn with a portrait of a white-haired old woman in a black lace dress with a black choker, sitting against a background of wallpaper with a colossal pattern. She calls it "The Mauve Decade."

CANADIAN ARTISTS HONORED BY R.C.A.

Elected to Full Membership
—Edwin Holgate Associate

OFFICERS RE-ELECTED

Other Painters Honored Are Britton, Hewton, Palmer,
Brigden, Heming, Hennessey and Pantou

Nine Canadian painters, including two Montrealeers, were honored on Saturday by the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts at its annual meeting held in Toronto, where the 55th exhibition is being held.

The Montrealeers are Robert W. Pilot, who was made Academician, and Edwin Holgate, who was elected an Associate of the R.C.A.

The other elections are three Associates to full Academicianship—Harry Britton, Toronto; R. S. Hewton, formerly of Montreal and now of Glen Miller, Ont., and H. S. Palmer, Toronto.

Outside of Montreal, the new Associates include F. H. Brigden, Toronto; Arthur Heming, Toronto; Frank Hennessey, Ottawa, and L. A. C. Pantou, Toronto.

R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., of Montreal, was born in Newfoundland and on coming to Montreal studied at the Schools of the Art Association of Montreal and under the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A. He saw war service in France and since his return has been a regular exhibitor at the shows of the Art Association of Montreal and the Royal Canadian Academy. He has found his most congenial sketching grounds in the ports and coves of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, about Quebec and at Chambly.

He is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa and many private collections. Besides being an accomplished painter he has made many capital etchings. He has twice won the Jessie Dow Prize for oils at the Art Gallery exhibitions. His exhibitions in the Watson Art Galleries, Montreal, have done much to increase the number of admirers of his work.

Edwin H. Holgate, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, was born at Allandale, Ont., and studied art under the late William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., at the Art Association schools and later in France under Castelnuovo, Simon, Menard and Milman. He exhibits at the leading exhibitions in Canada and the United States, and paintings and engravings by him are in National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, Provincial Museum, Quebec, Hart House, Toronto, and in the collection of the Hon. Vincent Massey. He saw war service in France. Mr. Holgate is an instructor at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Montreal, and will soon direct classes at the Art Association of Montreal.

Harry Britton, R.C.A., of Toronto, was born at Cambridge, England, and studied in Toronto under the late F. McGillivray Knowles, R.C.A., and at Heatherley's and the London Art School in England. He is partial to marines and port scenes, and, in late years, has done some effective winter scenes in watercolor. He was elected A.R.C.A. in 1907. He is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

Randolph S. Hewton, R.C.A., was born at Megantic, Que., and studied at the Art Association of Montreal under the late William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., and later at the Julian Academy, Paris. He was elected A.R.C.A. in 1921, and before leaving Montreal was principal of the Schools of the Art Association of Montreal. He is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

Herbert S. Palmer, R.C.A., of Toronto, was born in that city and studied at the Central Ontario School of Art, Toronto, and under Frederick Challenger, R.C.A., and J. W. Beatty, R.C.A. He was elected a member of the Ontario Society of Artists in 1909, and A.R.C.A. in 1915. He is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

F. H. Brigden, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, was born in London, England, and came to Canada in 1873. He studied at the Ontario School of Art and was elected a member of the Ontario Society of Artists in 1898, later being its president. He is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

Arthur Heming, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, was born in Paris, Ont., and studied in Hamilton, New York and London. He is well known as an illustrator of tales and articles dealing with the Canadian northland. His paintings in color have attracted attention in recent years and he has recently held a successful exhibition of his work in England.

Frank Hennessey, A.R.C.A., of Ottawa, was born in that city 40 years ago. Is self-taught in art. He is an artist on the staff of the Department of Agriculture. Of late years his work has been straight landscape, with the Gatineau Hills proving a congenial sketching ground. He is a member of the Ontario Society of Artists. He is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa and the Mappin Gallery, Sheffield, England.

Lawrence A. C. Pantou, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, is a landscape painter whose work is almost monochromatic, with a tendency to browns. He is president of the Ontario Society of Artists, and in the present R.C.A. show in Toronto is represented by "Windsong" and "The Mill-pool, Cheltenham."

The election of officers of the Royal Canadian Academy resulted in the re-election of E. Wyly Grier, R.C.A., Toronto, as president; W. S. Maxwell, R.C.A., Montreal, as vice-president; Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., Montreal, as treasurer, and E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., Montreal, as secretary.

Arthur Heming, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, was born in Paris, Ont., and studied in Hamilton, New York and London. Following the meeting, the annual dinner was held at the Toronto Club, when Duncan McArthur, deputy Minister of Education of Ontario, and Professor John Alford, of the Chair of Fine Arts, University of Toronto, and formerly of the Courtauld Institute, London, made addresses.

WOMAN WINS BEST MAPLE LEAF PRIZE

Gazette Nov. 8/34
Mrs. A. A. Adams, Oak Bay
Mills, Que., Submits Finest Specimen

Mrs. A. A. Adams, of Oak Bay Mills, Que., has been awarded first prize in the Most Beautiful Maple Leaf competition conducted this year by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways. More than ten thousand leaves were submitted in this contest, and the first place award was only finally made after most rigorous inspection and study of form and color combinations on the part of the judges. Of extraordinary beauty, and showing the brilliant coloring that only a Canadian autumn can produce, the leaf submitted by Mrs. Adams is of such beauty as to command the close attention of all who see it.

The judges ran into real difficulty in the effort to select leaves for the second and third prizes, and finally, as a matter of fairness, awarded second honors to two different leaves, eliminating the third place award. Mrs. Guy H. Humphrey, of Hampton, King's County, N.B., and Marshall I. White, of Milton West, Ont., won the second prizes.

The judging in the Most Beautiful Maple Leaf phase of the competition was sponsored by the Royal Canadian Academy. The judges were F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., of Montreal; Charles W. Jeffreys, R.C.A., of Toronto; W. J. Phillips, R.C.A., of Winnipeg; and F. S. Challenger, R.C.A., of Toronto. The judges found the level of coloring and general perfection was extremely high, so much indeed that some hundreds of leaves were selected, mounted in panels, and during coming weeks will be on exhibition in railway stations stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Montrealeers and visitors to the Produced in Canada exhibition can obtain an early view of this remarkable collection, as it is now one of the special displays at the exhibition.

The largest leaf phase of the competition was won this year by Richard Chambers, of 169 West Pender St., Vancouver. The leaf submitted by Mr. Chambers has an area of 226½ square inches, and is therefore 4½ inches larger than the prize winning leaf submitted by Angus McMonnies, of Courtenay, B.C. This leaf has an area of 213½ square inches.

C. B. Brown, chief engineer of the Canadian National Railways, and J. M. R. Fairbairn, chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, were the judges in this phase of the competition.

The nation-wide interest taken in the competition is illustrated by the fact that leaves were submitted from every province in the Dominion, and the sense of beauty and coloring enjoyed by Canadians was equally well illustrated by the high standard established by the actions of leaves submitted to judges.

La vue poignante du "Christ Mort"

La Presse Oct. 31, 1934.

Un tableau saisissant du peintre J.-J. Henner exposé pour la première fois à Montréal. — Quelques leçons dont Marc-Aurèle Fortin paraît avoir tiré profit en France.

La vie artistique renaît

LES visiteurs se rendent nombreux ces jours-ci aux galeries Scott, à l'ombre du Ritz-Carlton, et restent saisis et recueillis dès l'entrée du salon, à la vue du "Christ mort" de J.-J. Henner exposé, pour ainsi dire, en chapelle ardente. Les groupes se forment pour le contempler en silence. Le contraste des murmures étouffés est poignant pour quiconque arrive de l'activité fiévreuse du dehors.

Le Christ mort repose sur un drap qui le recouvre à peine, la chair d'une blancheur cadavérique, tandis que de l'ombre au-dessus de lui deux figures pathétiques de pleureuses fixent Sa tête à demi penchée, comme soutenue par une main invisible, et qui va peut-être s'animer. Une troisième figure est enfoncée dans une masse de cheveux roux aux pieds du divin Maître.

La composition n'est pas précisément neuve; les poses sont celles de plusieurs Saints Sépultres à plus de personnages. Le contraste de tons entre pour beaucoup dans l'effet du tableau; cette coloration toute blanche, cadavérique, que l'on peut reprocher à plusieurs autres portraits de Henner a ici sa raison d'être. La morne clarté du cadavre nu, tout entouré d'ombres savamment ménagées d'où se projettent à peine des figures pâles et comme distantes, dans un soupçon de voile bleu ou safrané, donne une expressive unité au spectacle. Tout décor disparaît pour mettre le sujet en évidence. La toile est bien composée, bien centrée. Autant qu'à son habileté habituelle à fixer des variations de clair-obscur, y laissant intervenir en toute discrétion un petit jeu de coloris, Henner doit la grandeur de son "Christ Mort" à la manière suffisamment floue dont il a traité les personnages de la scène. Il ne s'est pas payé le réalisme d'une leçon d'anatomie sur le cadavre divin; de même que les muscles la chair est pour ainsi dire oubliée, les rondeurs estompées dans des teintes mates. Les physiologies sont un peu imprécises, comme dans le rêve ou l'émotion; et cela les rend expressives. On sent une présence dans le tableau. C'est comme devant le cadavre d'un être cher; on s'imaginerait qu'il va se ranimer, remuer un peu, parler peut-être; la mort vraie ressemble tant au sommeil. On ne veut pas parler tout haut; "il" entendrait sans doute.

Il faut donc pardonner à Henner d'avoir donné au Christ un thorax trop bombé et pas assez anatomique, je crois, pour ce que sa toile est lourde de pensée. Même ici vous trouverez encore ces cheveux roux si chers au cœur de Henner; il ne pouvait imaginer mieux pour Madeleine, affaissée aux pieds du cadavre et qui montre une coiffure très soignée. C'est un "grand" tableau. L'artiste (qui vécut, on le sait, de 1828 à 1905) paraît l'avoir eu lui-même en affection; il l'a gardé chez lui longtemps. Restée ensuite dans une collection privée d'Europe, la toile n'apparaît sur le marché que pour la première fois, emportée d'Angleterre par l'expert Harry Wallis. Les connaisseurs anglais la considèrent comme un chef-d'œuvre et le catalogue officiel l'évalue à pas moins de quatre mille dollars.

Au regard du catholique (et en cette opinion personnelle vous pouvez, si le cœur vous en dit, ne pas abonder en mon sens), j'ose me demander s'il ne faudrait pas attendre mieux du sujet. Supposons pour un instant que nous intitillions la toile: "Les femmes pleurant un mort" ou "Le cadavre du supplicié", etc., etc., ou quelque chose de profane, il n'y aurait rien à changer au tableau pour qu'il reste émouvant, pathétique, mais non plus ou très peu religieux. Je m'empresse d'ajouter, cependant, qu'à cette épreuve sévère beaucoup de chefs-d'œuvre du genre religieux ne résisteraient pas eux-mêmes. Notre esprit latin s'accommode avec un certain mésaise du protestantisme un

Notules

DEUX chefs-d'œuvre de Rembrandt, "Lisant la Bible" et "Portrait d'un gentilhomme", sont disparus de la résidence de lord Peel, à Hampshire, nous apprend un cablogramme de Londres ces jours-ci.

Le réputé peintre hollandais Isaac Israëls, dont l'art s'apparentait à l'impressionnisme français, est mort ce mois-ci à La-Haye des suites d'un accident d'automobile. Il avait 69 ans.

Ernest Board, 57 ans, peintre de fresques, est mort le 26 octobre à Albury, Surrey, en Angleterre. Sa toile murale la plus connue est à Bristol et représente le départ de Bristol de Jean et Sébastien Cabot pour leur premier voyage de découverte.

Miss Helen Norton, de Coaticook, a fait don à la Galerie des Arts de la toile de Horatio Walker intitulée "Chevaux au labour", peinte en 1910 et honorée à l'Exposition internationale de Venise en 1930 sous les auspices de la Grand Central Art Galleries de l'American Federation of Arts. Horatio Walker a maintenant 76 ans et peint toujours ses charmantes paysanneries orléanaises. "Chevaux au labour" a été reproduit et analysé dans la "Presse" du 12 avril 1934, à l'occasion d'une exposition chez Scott.

Le jeune paralytique Earl Bailey, de Lunenburg, N.-E., qui peint en tenant le pinceau dans sa bouche, a eu l'honneur, le 26 octobre, d'apprendre que deux de ses toiles ont été admises à figurer à l'Exposition des Beaux-Arts de la Pennsylvania Academy, de réputation internationale. Nous avons consacré un article illustré à Bailey en novembre 1932.

Le vernissage du Salon d'automne a lieu aujourd'hui au Grand Palais de Paris. Des milliers de personnes s'y sont rendues. Les critiques autorisées trouvent à l'ensemble une tendance marquée vers un conservatisme éloigné des crises des "ismes" exotiques d'après-guerre.

Expositions

EN vue aux galeries Johnson, rue Ste-Catherine ouest, une collection anglaise des Cooling Galleries de Londres. Quatre paysages authentiques de Constable figurent dans l'exposition.

De nouveaux icarts ont fait leur apparition dans le studio de la Gravure Française, 1240 rue Union (carré Phillips), chambre 422, édifice Old Birks. M. H.-Y. Guillois aime surtout montrer ces jours-ci, avant que la demande populaire se les arrache, "Fleur de Lys", une belle étude de tons, "Rêve d'été", une composition aérienne et joyeuse, et particulièrement "Mélodie", qui représente quatre femmes (de ces femmes de rêve) engagées spirituellement dans un concert de salon.

Aux galeries Watson, rue Sherbrooke ouest, jusqu'au 10 novembre, exposition de paysages de Franz Johnston, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., amant de la lumière.

Chez Eaton exposition des dessins colorisés de Charles-W. Simpson, dont la "Presse" est heureuse de publier souvent des exemples en page-frontispice de sa rotogravure. Esquisses rapides et claires qui évoquent joliment des coins de villes canadiennes.

L'exposition annuelle de la Canadian Handicrafts Guild à la Galerie des Arts dure jusqu'au 4 novembre.

peu froid en art comme ailleurs; il aime voir dans le Fils de l'Homme le Fils de Dieu, et dans la mort du Christ le commencement de sa victoire sur la Mort... Néanmoins, le "Christ Mort", de Henner, est un "grand" tableau.

Les nuages de Fortin

L'EXPOSITION Marc-Aurèle Fortin aux galeries Eaton intéresse surtout par trois ou quatre toiles qui font voir quelles leçons il aura prises en France, durant son récent séjour à la faveur d'un petit héritage. Malgré ses naïvetés de dessin et son exubérance de coloris appliqué sans beaucoup de reliefs, Marc-Aurèle Fortin nous a paru un moment capable, — oh ! inconsciemment sans doute ! — de représenter ici un aspect intéressant de l'impressionnisme. Et cela eût aidé d'une certaine façon à l'aération de notre atmosphère artistique. Mais il se mit à se répéter et semblait résolu à n'être plus toujours que le même Fortin, lorsque soudain...

... l'appel au voyage et des ciels nouveaux, et peut-être le commencement d'un autre Marc-Aurèle Fortin... L'ancien Fortin, vous le connaissez déjà pour l'avoir vu dans maintes expositions. Il n'est pas jusqu'à la fameuse toile-ronçon, coupée en deux, qu'il ne ramène à chaque exposition pour faire tressaillir au fond de la tombe les manes du bandit Thouin alias Lépine. Sujets de faubourg (ô Hochelaga !), très souvent quelconques, peints avec un vif mélange de couleurs mais d'une touche sèche et sans profondeur, en superpositions, dans une atmosphère rendue lourde par des masses de nuages. Il lui arrivera même des naïvetés de composition comme de couper un tableau en deux par une ligne de mur mal placée. Tout cela reste pourtant direct et sincère.

Je préfère maintenant me tourner vers quelques paysages peints en France. Une vue de Rouen et "Port des pêcheurs, Côte d'Azur", s'ils restent encombrés comme les autres tableaux de Fortin, révèlent par ailleurs une tendance marquée à mieux faire valoir l'effet décoratif des couleurs vives en cherchant des commentements de relief. Une nature-morte perd à la surcharge des détails les qualités qu'on eût voulu y trouver. Mais "Vieux pont, Vallée du Rhône" me paraît du nouveau et du meilleur Fortin: des bleus et des verts limpides, un coloris liquide, qui repose du coloris crayeux trop familier à l'ancien Fortin, des tons chantants; imaginez simplement que l'artiste n'eût pas gâté ce paysage de joyeuse clarté en l'écrasant de ses habituels nuages en massifs. Si d'avoir vu des ciels nouveaux pouvait seulement inciter Marc-Aurèle à renouveler les firmaments dans ses toiles. Tels nuages s'admettent parfois pour tels effets. Mais toujours les nuages pommeles, ho! ho! C'est assurément l'un des secrets du paysagiste vrai que de savoir donner à ses nuages même les plus lourds une apparence de légèreté. La faiblesse de Fortin en ce domaine jette un gros "nuage" sur ses oeuvres.

Felix Shea's Woodcuts

At Art Association

The current exhibition in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal is of woodcuts and linoleum cuts by Felix Shea. They are good examples of Mr. Shea's work, — portraits and pictures of birds. Some of them are just studies of birds, mostly ducks and geese, but in some of the best of these the birds with their natural surroundings have been used to make good decorative patterns. In many of the cuts there is an admirable economy of means, — cuts made up chiefly of black shadows with high lights just enough to indicate or suggest form. One of the best of all the cuts in the exhibition is one of this kind, of a boy playing the violoncello, and another in which the same method is used with good decorative effect is of a nude figure. The same use of masses of shadow with only essential touches of light is very successful in the portraits which make an interesting row. These are of people well known in Montreal and Mr. Shea has shown only the most necessary and telling features of their faces in a way that makes the portraits good character studies which, sometimes, are just not caricatures.

Pictures and Sketches

By Gordon E. Pfeiffer

Some vivid pictures and sketches by Gordon E. Pfeiffer are now on view in two of the galleries at Eatons. They show the province of Quebec and its life in many aspects in a number of small oil sketches and a few larger and more finished pictures, all of which make the most of the country's strong colouring. There are many typical Quebec houses, carts and sleighs and, in some of his pictures, Mr. Pfeiffer has chosen subjects rather of the kind that Krieghoff used to paint, though he has treated them in a very different and much more modern fashion. The pure landscapes are, however, more striking and several of them are views of the Saguenay country in unfamiliar conditions; one of the largest shows the hills round Cape Trinity under autumn reds and there are other notable views of that district. A subject which has been used in several pictures is the effect of strongly coloured foliage standing out against black or dark grey hills. One of the most successful of the pictures, — one which is quite unlike most of the others, — is of boats in Quebec harbour in a sunset light; another which stands out is of sunlight falling on snow in an old sugar bush, a good effect of light. The smaller sketches are for the most part broadly painted suggestions of color, and one of a red maple tree standing against a group of characteristic Quebec cottages is conspicuous.

Montreal Artist Reveals Skill as Etcher and Painter in Watercolor

RECORDS OF CITY'S PAST

Some Prints Deal With Old-time Scenes—Continent and Canada Yield Subjects Shown at Scott's

Interesting variety is revealed in the etchings and watercolors by Herbert Raine, R.C.A., of Montreal, on view in the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, 1490 Drummond street. Mr. Raine, long known as an etcher of high attainments, evidently finds the watercolor medium much to his liking and his use of it according to the best tradition—the transparent wash and omission of bodycolor, save in one instance where a tinted paper made it unavoidable.

As an etcher this artist's work remains as strong and engaging as ever, and there are prints in this section of the exhibition which will excite the covetous. Particularly does this apply to those pictorial records of bits of Montreal now gone or, as is inevitable in the sweep of progress, are endangered. The prints, which total 46, deal with widely scattered spots—Montreal, Quebec, the Rockies, Nova Scotia, England, France and Belgium.

PRINTS OF MONTREAL

Two plates of recent date in the Montreal set are "The Convent of Villa Maria, Monklands, Montreal" where the dignified architecture of this historic building is well realized and the foreground enlivened by Sisters and their charges wandering on the wooded lawn; and "Old Courtyard, St. Vincent street, Evening" in which the last rays of sunlight gleam on the side of an old building. "Notre Dame from the River" introduces the old Government building in Place Royale, and the parish church, as seen from St. James street, is the subject of another print. Bonsecours church and market have not been overlooked, and "Convent, Marie Bourgeois, Verdun" with its happily placed group of nuns is another attractive print of historical interest. "Place Youville, Montreal" shows the commemorative obelisk, the Harbor Office and distant grain elevators, and a much-changed section is shown in "Cote street and Bank of Montreal"—a view looking south with the since demolished saloon and the two trees that transformed the yard into a "beer garden." "Corner of Cote and Craig streets," shows the old German beer garden saloon and adjacent dilapidated buildings. These two prints recall the days when the offerings of the Theatre Royal, just up the street, were regarded as often quite "naughty."

Quebec has yielded good material—a front view of the ancient church of Notre Dame des Victoires, with fountain, figures and a caleche; the noble lines of the Customs House as seen from the side, with three planes overhead; the front of the Basilica viewed through a screen of trees; Champ-plain Market with a group of figures; Quebec as seen from Lévis; a steep street and irregular buildings observed from the Ramparts; and a quaint building at the corner of Hebert and Ste. Famille streets to mention some of them.

Of this province, too, are cottages and road at St. Fereol; a bit of Beupre; and Metis Beach with an osprey aloft spotting food in the calm water edged by rocks.

Nova Scotia inspires a print of fine atmospheric qualities—"A Misty Day, Chester"—with moored fishing craft, waterside buildings and horse and cart on wharf, and of this province are "Aspetogan from Chester," and "Silver Birch and Aspetogan" in which the water stretches from the wooded foreground to the distant mountain which is the highest in Nova Scotia.

CONTINENTAL SUBJECTS

Of the Continental series are the abandoned church at Heule, Belgium, with a brook cutting a meadow in which a woman tends cows; the impressive architecture and soaring tower of the Cathedral at Courtrai, Belgium; two fine interiors—"Church of St. Michael, Ghent" and "Notre Dame, Lamballe, Brittany." Dol in Brittany has furnished good material, and, across the Channel, Exeter yields a fine subject in the print called "Corner of West Street and Step-cote Hill."

One print of the Rockies excites the taste for more, for Mr. Raine has in moderate compass convincingly suggested the bulk and majesty of the mountain that towers above Lake O'Hara. This is in every respect a fine print—big in feeling, broad in effect and admirable in the handling of receding planes.

The watercolors are distinctly cheerful in spirit, with the painter out to capture atmospheric effects—the sun through a fog bank at Metis Beach; the gleam of sunlight water on a calm day at St. Luce, P.Q. where church and buildings make a good composition; Metis Beach at twilight, with stretch of water beneath a band of purple cloud. "A Perfect Day, Metis Beach" shows the watery expanse backed by sun-touched billowy clouds that throw reflections in vertical strips. This locale has been rich in pictorial material which the painter did not overlook at different hours and in varying weather—Light House Point, Boule Rock, Mount Misery, Cow Rock, and many beach scenes in which rocks and evergreens play their part show sound judgment in selection of subject matter and convincing interpretation.

Of the Laurentian district are Devil River, St. Jovite, and a glimpse of Lac Oulmet, both of which are broad and spontaneous.

This exhibition, according to present plans, closes November 16.

PORTRAIT OF SHAW MISSED R.A. SHOW

Gazette Nov. 10/34

G. B. S. Relates Incident in Opening Exhibit of John Collier's Work

London. — Bernard Shaw opened an exhibition of Paintings in Little by the late John Collier at the Arlington Gallery, Old Bond Street, where one of the pictures is of Mr. Shaw himself.

"John Collier," said Mr. Shaw, "could draw with a fishing rod. I never met or heard of any other artist who could do that. He did it on the ground that you should draw a thing from the distance at which it was to be looked at."

"No other man," he continued, "would have thought of doing it with a fishing rod, but I assure you my portrait was drawn with a fishing rod, and that is a sample of the sort of facility and practicalness that he had."

"The portrait went to the Academy and found its natural place on the line. Everything was going beautifully, when a distinguished Academician—whose name I forget—came in at the last moment. He saw the portrait and said, 'Take that damn thing away, we don't want any b—y beavers.'"

"Accordingly the picture was not hung in that exhibition."

"Supposing Mussolini, or Hitler, or Stalin had done that, all the papers would be full of a denunciation of the infringement of the dignity of art and the liberty of the individual. But here nobody says anything about it," Mr. Shaw added.

It was a standing problem outside the Royal Academy why it was that John Collier was not a very distinguished ornament of the Royal Academy. He was a man of outstanding talent and amazing craftsmanship, he said.

It was one of the peculiar things about being an artist that you could make a merit of your own deficiency, and declare that the things you could not do were not art.

"Whistler," he said, "made a tremendous amount of capital by denouncing the things he could not do. In this country we seldom looked at pictures. Instead, we read books or newspaper articles about them."

POWERFUL MARINES SEEN AT MORGAN'S

W. St. Thomas Smith,
A.R.C.A., Shows High Qualities as Watercolorist

BRITISH ISLES SCENES

St. Thomas Artist Has Found Congenial Material in Fishing Villages and Open Sea

Watercolors by W. St. Thomas Smith, A.R.C.A., of St. Thomas, Ont., are drawing picture-lovers to the fifth floor of the store of Henry Morgan & Co., Limited. Here, attractively hung, are over 70 works by an artist long identified with the watercolor medium. His method of broad handling with fully-charged brush gives many of these paintings a strength usually associated with oils.

This painter, who was born at Belfast, Ireland, and came to Canada at an early age, admits to no training under a master and all he knows, which is considerable, he has discovered for himself by study direct from nature. Keen observation coupled with industry won him an important place in Canada as a watercolorist so that the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts elected him an Associate of that body in 1902.

Those who over a long period of years have made it an agreeable duty to "take in" picture exhibitions will recall some splendidly constructed autumn landscapes from his brush as well as paintings in which threatening skies were capably suggested. For a period the rush of brook in flood interested him and he was singularly successful in catching the effect of broken water. This skill is evident in many of the watercolors now on view, but now he takes the spectator to the sea.

Mr. St. Thomas Smith knows the sea in both calm and boisterous moods and he knows how to record his impressions. Here is no niggling timidity—he tackles the most difficult subjects with a confidence born of experience.

SOME GOOD MARINES.

The heave of wave and hiss of spray are well suggested in "Stormy Sea, Achill Island, Ireland." There is nothing half-hearted about the variety of weather depicted. "Storm on the English Channel" is another engaging work with fishing boat, a distant steamer and cliffs almost obscured by the mirk of lowering clouds. "Orkney Fishermen Going Out to Sea" is marked by less tempestuous weather and a sky that glows red on the horizon. "On the Thames, London" shows that even barges and a tug can be attractive subjects in the right atmosphere.

The paintings of sea scenes with the fishing fleets going out or coming in are many and he has found his subjects on the Irish and Scottish and English coasts. Effective, too, are his transcriptions of quiet havens with steam trawlers and boats moored near quays, backed by modest houses. The painted sails of Venetian boats supply one good subject.

Ireland has also given him subjects of a different sort—the blue of water in the bogs where the peat has been cut. The fuel piled in heaps to dry add to the decorative line of these landscapes which usually include some noble blue mountain about which mists float. There are Irish landscapes in which women drive sheep, and the picturesque fishing villages have not been overlooked.

Of Canada, there is one autumn landscape—maples in vivid leaf near a roadside ditch. This work catches the spirit of the fall season.

The exhibition is in all respects an interesting one, if only to show how watercolor boldly handled can "carry." In treatment these pictures look simplicity itself, but this impression can only be conveyed by one who has attained this sense of spontaneity after years of patient study and practice.

Work of Herbert Raine Nov. At Scott's Galleries

There are both etchings and water-color drawings in the collection of work by Herbert Raine, R.C.A., which now covers the walls of W. Scott and Son's large gallery. The water-colors make the largest and the best group of work in this medium that Mr. Raine has shown in Montreal; they are admirable examples of the pure and simple use of water color and are delightful studies of the many variations of light and color which are to be found by those who can see them, on the lower St. Lawrence. All but two or three of these pictures were painted at Metis. A particularly good one of a wooded stream in the Laurentians is one of the exceptions. In the others—there are about thirty of them—it is not so much the views which are different as the conditions of time and weather in which they have been seen. There are, in point of fact, two views which have been painted five or six times each, with complete and surprising difference between the resulting pictures. Atmosphere is the principal subject of all these drawings and they have the quality of fresh air which water-color gives better than any other medium.

The etchings, more numerous than the water-colors, have the delicacy with which most people are familiar in Mr. Raine's work and there are some dry-points which are much stronger in their general effect of lights and shadows. Most of the places shown in them are in Montreal or Quebec, but there are others in Nova Scotia, France and Belgium. The Custom House at Quebec, a convent at Verdun, a Nova Scotian harbor and groups of Brittany fishermen and women have provided some of the best of the subjects.

The Independent Art Society's Exhibition

Holding no exhibition of its own this year, the Independent Art Society has a small collection of work by its members included in the Produced in Canada Exhibition at the Sun Life Building. A few of the works shown are by well known exhibitors but most of them are by people whose pictures are seldom seen here. Adrien Hebert has some Montreal scenes and Thurston Topham shows two pictures of moonlight. Among the more notable of the oil pictures are a landscape by Lorne Bouchard, a Saguenay view built up of rather formal patterns by John Loggie, a landscape and a flower picture by Belle Richstone, a simplified landscape, with pleasant color, by Maurice La Belle, a picture of a brook and trees by Jordanus vander Vliet, who has also a good landscape pen drawing, and two street scenes by Agnes Lefort and John Pepper. Among the water-colors there are a good drawing, almost in monochrome, by D. A. J. Pavitt, a picture of a group of farm buildings and another landscape by H. Jackson Barker and a small flower picture by Leslie Coppold. The few pieces of sculpture include a bust of J. Murray Gibbon by Henri Hebert, a very good head of a Chinese by Pauline Johnson and a well modelled, life-sized figure of a girl by Orson Wheeler.

ARTISTS PRAISE WORK OF CHILDREN

Gazette Nov. 14/34
International Exhibition of Efforts of Children Under 12 Held at N.Y.

NEW YORK, Nov. 14—(A. P.)—Famous artists flocked last night to view the water-colors and crayons painted by children under 12 in the International Exhibition at Rockefeller Centre.

"It's marvellous," commented Miguel Covarrubias, noted Mexican caricaturist. "Much better than the average professional show."

Jonas Lie, landscape painter, and president of the National Academy of Design, stayed to admire almost until closing time.

Also among the audience were a group of psychologists who shook their heads solemnly and tried to interpret the impulses behind the more gruesome pictures—a man hanging from a gallows, depicted by an Irish boy; headless bodies in pools of blood in war scenes, painted by Chinese boys; the funerals pictured in the Mexican group.

DIFFERENCES NATIONAL.

Educationists studied the youthful artistry for a record of life in many lands. German children chose gay Christmas scenes for their subjects. Trucks, tractors and factories figured largely in the Russian section. Wholly improbably birds were drawn by the children of Tunisia. Palestine sent pictures of biblical stories.

Nothing attracted as much attention or caused so much amusement among all types in the audience as the painting of a seven-year-old American Indian. Using a sheet of brown wrapping paper, simple water colors and decidedly comic technique, the artist has pictured three Redskins, scantily clad, chasing each other across the desert.

NEW YORK MUSEUM CURATOR IS DEAD

NEW YORK, Nov. 17—(Star Special)—Bryson Burroughs, curator of paintings at the Metropolitan Museum since 1907 and associated with the museum since 1906, died yesterday at his home in this city. GORDON E. PFEIFFER SHOWS PAINTINGS

Gazette Nov. 15/34
Quebec Artist Finds Landscapes of This Province Congenial Material

ALL SEASONS TREATED

Canvases at Eaton's Fine Art Galleries Also Depict Activities of Farmer and Woodsman

Quebec landscapes have absorbed the entire attention of Gordon E. Pfeiffer whose paintings are on view in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal.

This exhibition—the second "one-man" show to be held in Montreal by this Quebec artist—shows progress in handling and growing confidence, and much of the work reveals a distinct advance.

The dominant characteristic of Mr. Pfeiffer's painting is boldness. There is generally bigness in design and he is uniformly successful in importing solidity to his hills and mountains, a quality he succeeds in suggesting in his structures. The farmhouses and barns of his canvases are evidently built to stand the stress of autumn gales and winter blizzards. His painting of the human figure is adequate for the purpose, since its introduction is only incidental, and the same applies to his horses and oxen. He has a decided feeling for atmosphere and his color sense is sound.

Mr. Pfeiffer is primarily a painter of the Quebec scene and he finds all seasons attractive. The exhibition reveals industry and a genuine effort to express himself in a sanely individual way. Some of the larger paintings are a trifle overpowering in their bold statement and reveal passages where what was essayed did not quite "come off." In the smaller works there is a more even quality and a greater sense of spontaneity.

SOME LARGE WORKS.

Among the big works are "Spring, St. Urbain"—hills, road and sleigh at a season which suggests thaw; "Ste. Famille, Winter," with the quaint church and cluster of buildings of this spot on the Island of Orleans, the river and distant mountains; "Cape Trinity" with the bold rocky headland in sunlight and rolling wooded hills banded with shadow in the distance; "The Basilica, Quebec," where a religious procession passes near the entrance; "North Shore Village, St. Simeon," with a fence-edged road that leads to the buildings about the church, with hills and the St. Lawrence River in the background; "Storm Coming"—an angry sky above massive mountains above meadows where hay is being loaded into ox-drawn carts; "Lac Jacques Cartier," where the water and distant hills are seen through a screen of trees in the foreground; "Le Four Abandonne"—thin snow on rolling country dipping to a tree-edged lake, hills, clad with trees that catch the rosy glow of the sun, that are backed by massive mountains, and, in the foreground the old open-air oven with its shelter of dilapidated planks. Nearby is a gnarled bare tree which, with artistic licence, the painter could have omitted without disturbing the design. "Le Quatrieme Rang," is very much off the beaten track, with its house, outbuildings and oven, hills and mountains and a general atmosphere suggesting that farming here is a struggle with nature.

Of winter activity in the woods there are "Pines in Winter" with a logging team and a woodsman following with an axe; and "Yarding"—a horse, led by a running man, hauling a single log through the snow while two men work nearby. "After Snow" is marked by trees under a blanket of white near a river with open ice. "Old Sugar Bush," a work of good atmosphere, shows a man emptying a sap bucket while a horse with sleigh bearing a barrel stands nearby. This painting well suggests the milder atmosphere of a sunny day in spring.

"Schooners in November Ice, Quebec," is good in composition, with the craft under sail amid floes of thin ice. In the distance the ferryboat is making a passage, and in the background is the Citadel, Chateau Frontenac and the tower of Laval University. There are good values in this canvas which was painted at sunset.

Of the smaller works, the painter has found congenial subjects at St. Hilarion, with its spruce-dotted pasture, church and rain-squall; "Winter Road to Beaufort"; "Sunny Morning, October," with sun-glow on a house, a man in a cart and pumpkins supplying a gay color note; "Blacksmith Shop, Winter," with boys playing with a sledge; "Bishop Laval's Mill, 16th Century," and several glimpses of landscape in autumn.

EFFECTS OF GREEK ART FOUND WIDELY

Genius and Form Can Be Traced Down Through Ages, Says Walter Pach

Gazette Nov. 15

The genius and form of ancient art—the classical school of Greece—has shown itself down through the ages in the paintings and works of sculpture conceived by those who came later, Walter Pach, American art critic, stated last night at a meeting of the Art Association of Montreal, held in the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street.

He dealt mainly with the romantic school of art, tracing its beginning with David and carrying on to the start of the impressionistic period. To prove his point that classic form continued with the romanticists, Mr. Pach showed on the screen a picture of a Greek bronze done in the early days of the Christian era. Side by side with it he showed a painting of a nude by Bayre, one of the followers of the romantic school. The form and drawing of both figures was almost identical. He declared that Bayre could not possibly have copied from the Greek statue, as it was unearthed some time after he painted his figure of the nude.

Mr. Pach reviewed the entire era of romantic art. He stated that Goya, the Spanish painter, influenced to a considerable extent the work of that leader of the romantic school, Delacroix. He showed reproductions of paintings by Goya, by David and by Delacroix, and also those of the other members of the romantic school in France and England.

In the Frenchman, Rude, he saw the development of the human romantic art, with Rude's dramatic, forceful paintings of the spirit of the French revolution. Artists, he stated, began to paint people that had never before appeared on canvas, as the French peasant and the laborer at his work.

He returned to John Constable to demonstrate, through that artist's moving paintings, one of the purest forms of romantic art.

"No art," Mr. Pach declared, "is purely classical, or purely romantic. There is something of the other in each." In the romantic school he saw the breaking forth into a new life, with a sense of adventure, of new worlds to conquer, of romance and life.

Dr. J. W. A. Hickson was in the chair.

COUNTRY MIRRORED IN EARLY PAINTING

Gazette Nov. 21/34
Few Masterpieces in French

Regime Pictures, But Culture Portrayed

Although painting in Canada produced few if any masterpieces during the French regime, in the many works of this period still extant was to be found a faithful picture of the mentality and the culture of the first inhabitants of the country, Gerard Morisset, honorary attache of the Louvre Museum, said at a lecture meeting of l'Alliance Francaise de Montreal in the Ritz Carlton Hotel last evening.

By far the greater part of the works produced during the 17th and 18th centuries was of a religious character, the speaker remarked. He explained that this was to be expected since the increase in population entailed the construction of additional churches, chapels, hospitals, monasteries and schools. It was natural for the well-to-do to think of decorating these buildings before acquiring paintings for their own homes. Bishops, governors, intendants, wealthy citizens and even kings of France presented paintings to these various institutions. Notwithstanding the large quantity of paintings produced in New France many works had to be purchased in France, so great was the local need.

Ernest Tetreau, president of the society, paid a warm tribute of esteem to the memory of Paul Seurot, prominent French citizen who died a few days ago. Mr. Seurot was a member of the board of administration of l'Alliance Francaise.

SHOWS SKILFUL WOODCUTS

Gazette Nov. 16/34

Montreal Artist Shows Facility in Black and White and Tint

GROUP OF PORTRAITS

Intimate Knowledge Shown in Depicting Ducks and Activities of Those Who Hunt Them

Woodcuts and linocuts by Felix Shea make an interesting exhibition in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal, where the prints will remain on view until November 25.

This Montreal artist, who is a capable exponent of the art of the woodcut, shows good draughtsmanship and an effective sense of the decorative. His balance of lights and darks is usually well arranged.

An attractive section of the collection is a series of portraits which reveal considerable skill in seizing the telling lines—the essential element in a woodcut, since rendering the characteristics that make the likeness depends on line and mass without the employment of half tones. The subjects of these portraits are well placed and, considering their size, the blocks show skill in cutting.

Mr. Shea is most engaging when he goes into the open air for his subjects—scenes that the duck hunter must know by heart. To depict ducks on the wing is no easy task, but Mr. Shea does not let that deter him, with the result much study has led to the production of such prints as "Surprise Flight"—three ducks above water as seen through a screen of reeds; "Frightened Ducks," where six birds have just left the water which is still agitated as the last ascends; "Early Flight," in which four ducks wing against a broken sky, their bodies flushed by the light of dawn, and "Pitching In"—a duck dropping to reed-fringed water.

DUCK HUNTER'S MEMORIES

Prints that will recall to hunters moments of the less cheering kind, are "Late Start," done with tints from three blocks, in which a man setting out with decoys is startled by ducks on the wing—part of a potential "bag" gone beyond recall; and "Putting Out Decoys," in which in the breaking dawn a man poles a boat laden with counterfeit birds to a clump of reeds. It is a print that suggests the hour when everything is damp and cold, and the wind is far from tropical—the sort of morning when even the most case-hardened wonder why they swapped warm blankets for a stretch of grey water and a dismal sky. In arrangement and spirit it is one of the most effective prints in the show.

Birds of another kind are shown in the print of gulls against heavy, broken clouds, and there is a pretty natural print of a snipe. Canada goose, with its striking plumage, is not overlooked and geese of the barnyard variety obligingly make an attractive pattern. There are also some small prints of ducks feeding.

Scenes of Montreal are shown—"Dufferin Terrace," and Place Royale, looking north, which introduces the old Government building, the twin towers of Notre Dame Church and the striking lines of the Aldred Buildings.

Then, too, there is a nude resting comfortably on the grass, and, distinctly more formal but cosier, there is "Fire Place, Lucerne"—now the Seignior.

Two decorations—ducks in flight in oil reveal good design and uminous color.

Incidental to the show, is a display of three linocuts, as used for one of the color prints displayed, and the tools used in the cutting of these and of the wood blocks.

Question of Genuineness Left Open by Judgment Given at Ottawa

(By The Canadian Press)

Ottawa, November 27—The question as to whether a painting in the possession of T. W. MacDowell, of Montreal, was a genuine Krieghoff, was left open by a judgment handed down in county court by Judge F. L. Smiley today. MacDowell thought it was not a genuine Krieghoff and brought action against E. W. Marshall, of Ottawa, from whom he had purchased the painting.

In dismissing the action with costs, Judge Smiley stated that the plaintiff had not proven that the picture in question was not a genuine Krieghoff, and, moreover, he was not satisfied that a warranty as to its authenticity had been given.

On July 27, 1933, MacDowell purchased from the firm of E. W. Marshall a painting alleged to be the work of Cornelius Krieghoff, famous painter of Canadian scenes. The original price asked was $350 but it was purchased jointly with a rug priced at $250 for $500. When the lump purchase was made it was specified by the dealer that the price of the rug was to be $250; or, in other words, the painting was being sold for $250.

"I am forced to find that while doubt may have been cast on the genuineness or authenticity of the picture, the evidence is not conclusive and does not enable me to say that it is not genuine," Judge Smiley stated in a written judgment.

"As to the allegation as to whether or not a warranty was given, I find that the plaintiff has not satisfied the onus of proof. If I am right in this decision, then the action should be dismissed. If I am wrong then it is necessary to deal further with the allegation that the picture is not genuine. In that respect, I do not believe the plaintiff has satisfied the onus of proof."

"Experts called by the plaintiff gave it as their opinion that the picture was not a genuine Krieghoff, but they do admit that it is very similar to the paintings of Krieghoff, has some of Krieghoff's characteristics and that parts are reminiscent of Krieghoff. It was shown that in his later years Krieghoff dashed off 'pot boilers' and perhaps this was one of them."

"At one time the picture came under observation of Dr. (A. G.) Doughty and he was inclined to purchase it as a genuine Krieghoff for the archives."

"It was thought that the Chud-Hach Mountains (the subject of the picture) were somewhere in Quebec but it was found that there were no such mountains in Canada and so Dr. Doughty did not purchase the picture."

"Dr. Doughty, who has purchased many similar pictures, stated emphatically that no person, expert or not, would be able to tell if the picture were not a genuine Krieghoff."

The guarantee given by the Marshall firm to Mr. MacDowell stated: "To the best of our knowledge we attribute the painting of Chud-Hach Mountains to C. Krieghoff and believe the same to be original."

Trip of French Mission to Jacques Cartier Celebrations Will Be Depicted

(Canadian Press Cable.)

Paris, November 29 (Via Havas).—Films depicting the trip of the French Mission to Canada this summer for the fourth centenary of Jacques Cartier's voyage of discovery up the St. Lawrence River will be shown tomorrow evening in the large amphitheatre of the Sorbonne.

Among those who will speak will be Hon. Philippe Roy, Canadian Minister to France; Henry Bordeaux, French academician; Paul Marchandeau, Minister of Commerce, and M. Contenet, president of the Paris Municipal Council.

Commenting on the trip today, Henry Bordeaux, who represented the French Academy on the Canadian mission, said it was a profound emotion for any Frenchman from the Old World to find himself in the New World, in Canada, and discover language, race, tradition and faith had been retained there. Even the folk songs remained, he said.

He expressed a hope that the French Academy would award to the three French speaking universities of Canada medals for the French language and to the two superior orders of the Ursulines and the Sisters of Notre Dame, both women's orders which from the beginning of French colonization taught French in Canada.

"To maintain its language and culture Canada has need of the sympathy and friendship of France," he declared. "On the other hand, Canada serves by its force and by its belief in the strength of the family, as an example to us."

EIGHT CROSSES BARED ON ST. SOPHIA WALLS

Byzantine Art Works
Found in Moslem Mosque

ISTANBUL, Nov. 22.—(Special Cable to The Star and N. Y. Herald-Tribune Copyright)—Prof. Thomas Whittemore, American archaeologist, yesterday revealed to the world eight magnificent Byzantine crosses which had been hidden by plaster for hundreds of years in the arches of the Mosque of St. Sophia.

Prof. Whittemore, who is president of the Byzantine Institute of America, has been engaged for the last three years in uncovering the hidden treasures of Byzantine mosaics which adorn the entrance of this famous Christian church, built by the Emperor Justinian in 537. The eight crosses now disclosed are vividly colored on a gold background. Part of his time Prof. Whittemore has spent in cleaning the magnificent marbles on the walls of St. Sophia of the fine Turkish plaster which has covered them.

Prof. Whittemore has now finished his work for the winter and will return to carry it on next spring.

The Turkish conquest of 1453 converted the Justinian church into a mosque and many of the mosaics were then concealed behind plaster, so it is nearly 500 years that these treasures of Byzantine art have been lost to the world. Mustapha Kemal, president of the Turkish Republic, flouting tradition, ordered the mosaics uncovered.

Landscapes by Two Painters At Eaton's

Marius Hubert Robert, whose works, in oil and water color, are now being shown in two of the Eaton Co.'s galleries, had a small exhibition at the Art Association rather more than two years ago. The pictures which he showed then were of places in France and Palestine and were full of rich and brilliant color. He is now living in Toronto and the pictures at Eaton's are mostly of places all across Canada, from Nova Scotia and Gaspe to British Columbia, and fine coloring is still a characteristic of his work. The works in one of the galleries are oil pictures and some of them are of French scenes and are evidently older than the others. They are broadly and freely painted and the color and lighting of the Canadian pictures makes them stand out from the others. The water colors, in the other gallery are illustrations of places and events in Canada; many of them appear to have been made for reproduction in print and have a certain hardness which suits that purpose. They are, in some cases, more successful as illustrations than as pictures and they show a number of typical Canadian scenes and events. Among them are good records of a stampede at Calgary, an Indian encampment, sailing on Toronto Bay and other scenes of the kind.

In a smaller gallery at Eaton's there are now about forty small sketches in water color by Lincoln Morris of Montreal. They are slight and suggestive sketches and some of the slightest are among the best of them. There are particularly good suggestions of light and atmosphere in a view of Yarenes, with the church standing out between the stormy sky and river, in the autumn browns in the Road at Ville LaSalle, in the view of a tug in the mist in Early Morning, Lake St. Louis, in a view of Repentigny and another from Vercheres; and there is good color in a scene in the Laurentian foothills and in a landscape of big trees on a hillside.

ATTRACTIVE WORKS BY HUBERT-ROBERT

Much-Travelled Painter Exhibits at Eaton's Fine Art Galleries

enes in Europe and Canada Capably Done in Both Oils and Water-colors

Paintings in oil and watercolor by Marius Hubert-Robert, being shown in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, make an engaging collection and reveal this much-travelled artist, as a worshipper of sunlight technically equipped to render his impressions with confidence. He is particularly happy in the works that deal with intense light such as "A Canadian Farm," with its barns, silo, cattle and trees; "Quebec Chicken Farm," where there are masses of white fowl, trees, fence, barns and a laden ox-cart; "Landscape near Brome," in which horses rest near a stream, edged by trees in autumn leaf; "Huntsville Harbor"—a bit of the quay with steamer and a stretch of water; "Cove at Percé," quite familiar as a bit favored by painters, but interesting in the arrangement of the boats on the sand and the nets drying; and "Oxen Team, Rivière du Loup." Less intense in glare, as becomes the autumn season, is "The Heights of Parry Sound" where the vista reveals trees, shores and islands.

SOME EUROPEAN SCENES.

"Fishermen in Brittany" gives the painter scope for color in the vari-colored sails of the shipping at the wharf, on which members of the crew are congregated. In this group, too, is "Mediterranean Fishing Fleet" where the sunlight is intense, the sails gay and the water aglow with reflections. "Mont St. Michel" is quieter in tone, with the massive buildings above the calm water. Nice in the arrangement of sunlight and shadow is "Street in Perigord"—an old doorway with woman feeding chickens in a narrow street bridged by a shadowed arch. "Honfleur, Normandy," with its quiet waterway, bridge, quayside buildings and distant church, suggests the approach of evening and there is a sense of quiet in "Concarneau"—a building with clock-tower and shipping under a calm sky.

Exhibitions In Montreal

An important exhibition of French painting by Impressionists and modern artists will open at W. Scott and Sons' galleries on Drummond St., next Saturday, December 1st at 3 o'clock. The exhibition, which is arranged in conjunction with Alan Reid and Lefevre, Ltd., of London, is of picked examples of some of modern French painters. There will be in it five pictures by Renoir and three by Cézanne. Among the other painters, who will be represented by one picture each, are Manet, Degas, Monet, Sisley, and Pissarro and of later painters, Van Gogh, Gauguin, Picasso, Matisse, Odilon Redon and Derain.

An exhibition of oil pictures by Rita Mount of Montreal will be opened in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal this afternoon. It will remain open till Sunday, December 16th.

Sketches by F. L. Brooks

A number of sketches, in oil, water color and monochrome,—there are more than a hundred of them,—by Frank Leonard Brooks, are being shown at present at the Coffee House, 1191 Union avenue. It is a very interesting collection, though the place is not very well suited for seeing them. The larger, and better part of them are sketches in water color, or pen and brush drawings in brown. Many of them are of places in London and particularly in Chelsea, and in them Mr. Brooks shows that he knows and understands the atmosphere of London and appreciates the beauties which are to be found in London mists and fogs. There are excellent suggestions of this in the views of the Thames, in Chelsea Reach, and in Fog, Battersea Bridge as well as in a view of

As a watercolorist Mr. Hubert-Robert is a believer in clear "washy" color—a fact that was evident in a collection of Continental scenes shown by him a few years ago in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal. This method of handling the medium is still his practice in a group of Canadian subjects which include: "Port of Vancouver," spacious in feeling; "Logging in Quebec,"—men at work on a brook stream; "A Laurentian Lake"—hunters on shore and in canoe with many evidences of success in the chase; "St. Lawrence at Quebec," "Docking, Niagara-on-the-Lake" and "Toronto Waterfront" in which the painter's skill in painting shipping is evident; a rural scene with church and hay-makers on the Isle of Orleans "The Evangeline Well" and the Parliament Buildings at Victoria to mention a few of many attractive items.

ACADEMY EXPELS ARTIST FOR COPYING

NEW YORK, Dec. 11.—(Star Special)—Stephen Bransgrove, Australian painter, winner of the Ellen Speyer prize for 1933, has been expelled from associate membership in the National Academy of Design for "conduct considered prejudicial to the Academy." A resolution of expulsion was passed unanimously by the Academy's council at a special meeting on December 3. The resolution accused Bransgrove of copying the works of other artists and exhibiting them as his own. One of the paintings alleged to have been copied won the Ellen Speyer prize and attracted such favorable attention that Bransgrove was proposed for associate membership in the Academy and was elected at the spring meeting in 1934.

A. Y. Jackson's Pictures at Watson Gallery

The collection of works by A. Y. Jackson which is now being shown at the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke street, contains about thirty pictures and small sketches which are thoroughly representative of his more recent work. They show a preference for mountains and hilly country, most of them are of autumn or winter scenes and there is, of course, an abundance of snow. Many people will prefer the more naturalistic sketches, some of which are very true and brilliant, but the larger pictures are more characteristic of Mr. Jackson, with their strong masses and more or less formal patterns, some of which take him rather far from Nature. There are some striking effects and contrasts of color and, as usual with Mr. Jackson, some remarkable painting of sunlight on snow; and color and pattern together give many of the pictures a great decorative value. A large sketch of a scene in Labrador shows a bleak and bare country, of which the hardness seems to have got even into the clouds and a notable picture among the more realistic ones is of roofs at Murray Bay seen through falling snow. These pictures, as is the way with Mr. Jackson's work, give one something to think, and perhaps to wonder, about, whether one likes them or not.

A dark street with a brightly lighted shop-front. There are some charming studies of English country scenes and of places in France and Spain and in all of them the atmosphere plays an important part. Apart from their own merits the sketches should please the many people who know and like the places which are shown in them. A few prints, of wood or linoleum cuts are also in the exhibition. The oil sketches are broadly, even roughly painted and are not so good as the others.

Ellen Terry's Letters For British Museum

London.—Bernard Shaw has presented to the British Museum the letters received by him from Ellen Terry. Selections from the correspondence were published in book form three years ago under the editorship of Miss Christopher St. John and aroused wide interest. While the originals of Mr. Shaw's side of the correspondence are believed now to be in America, the letters to him from Ellen Terry will shortly be available to students, with the exception of a small proportion where references to living people make it undesirable for them to be seen yet. Mr. Shaw explained that it was only due to the feelings of some of the persons referred to that the passages concerned will not be made public at present. "They were not included in the published volume of letters," he said, "for the same reason."

The Trustees of the British Museum also received as a gift from J. Wheeler Williams, some manuscripts of Thomas Jefferson Hogg, the friend of Shelley, including autograph notes by the poet in a criticism of his friend's play, a letter from Mrs. Shelley to Mrs. Hogg, and a painting of the yacht Don Juan, in which Shelley was drowned. Mr. Williams's sister, Mrs. A. Saxton Snell, has added to these a carpenter's account for repairs to the fatal yacht and the great part of Hogg's manuscript of his Life of Shelley. A fragment attributed to Claire Clairmont (Shelley's sister-in-law and mother of Byron's daughter, Allegra, forms part of the gift.

Viscount Esher, who has recently presented to the Bodleian, through the Friends of the National Libraries, nine of the "pre-First Editions" by famous writers which were exposed this summer as forgeries, has given the British Museum (again through the Friends of the National Libraries) eleven of these now celebrated productions, which were not in the Museum's collection.

A sheet of lead inscribed in Latin with a curse, found in excavations in Telegraph-street, Moorgate, has been presented by Mr. G. F. Lawrence, and Dr. C. Davies Sherborn has given other objects from the same site, among them a rare type of brooch made from bronze wire (second century B.C.), a bronze and an iron stylus of Roman times, and a bone Saxon pin with a perforated disc head from about the tenth century A.D.

"At Home"

The annual New Year "At Home" of the Art Association of Montreal will take place on the afternoon of New Year's Day from four to six o'clock. Mr. H. B. Walker, president of the Association, will receive the guests assisted by Dr. C. F. Martin, vice-president, and members of the council.

FRENCH PAINTINGS ON VIEW AT SCOTT'S

Gazette Dec. 3/34
Fine Examples by Members of Impressionist and Modern Schools Shown

INTERESTING ART PERIOD

Collection From London Includes Six Works by Renoir Showing Development Between 1872 and 1910

Interesting alike to the connoisseur and the student is the exhibition of French paintings on view in the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, 1490 Drummond street. Aptly entitled "The Impressionists and Modern Artists," the collection provides a survey of painting at one of the most interesting periods of its development. The fight for recognition by the Impressionists is relatively recent enough not to call for comment save, in passing, it might be said that, viewing the beautiful product of the brushes of the best of this school, the wonder is why they could not be appraised at their high worth without delay and bickering, and as for the so-called "moderns" the critics are still divided in opinion, though the entry of their work into the permanent national collections in galleries directed by officials of unquestioned insight and probity—a Cézanne now hangs in the National Gallery, London—prove that the performances of this group warrant and are receiving serious, if tardy, consideration.

The present exhibition, which has been organized in conjunction with Alex. Reid & Lefevre, Limited, of London, shows the Impressionists and Post Impressionists of the nineteenth century, and brings the twentieth century school right up to date, displaying an example of all the outstanding men of what is known the world over as the "Ecole de Paris."

Competent critics in Europe and in the United States have called Cézanne and Renoir the two Pillars of the Temple of nineteenth century French painting. Perhaps Renoir finishes off the great tradition of painting that was begun in Italy in the sixteenth century, while Cézanne opens up a new era which was developed in the twentieth century by Picasso.

SIX RENOIRS SHOWN.

Here are on view six Renoirs of different periods, the earliest being "La Seine à Chatou," done about 1872. It is painted in the pure Impressionist technique and is full of delicious and tender tones. As the title suggests, the scene is the swiftly flowing river beloved of Parisians, and the glitter from the sky in the water is handled in masterly manner. It is not only the canvas of a poet but of one born to be a painter. For a contrast there is "Les Lilacs," painted about 1910, when Renoir was about seventy years of age. Another interesting picture is "Le Pigeonnier de Bellevue," a subject much painted by Cézanne, which shows the artist in a new development of his technique and color.

Cézanne is well represented by "Portrait du Fils de l'Artiste," painted about 1888 in one of his grandest moods. It is a picture of great dignity and recalls to some that other master, of the seventeenth century, Rembrandt. Some European critics have put the Cézanne on the same level, and as warrant for this view point to the fact that his work hangs in practically every important public gallery in Europe and the United States. It was only recently that the new director of The National Gallery in London, England, placed the first Cézanne on the walls of that gallery, which is usually called the greatest collection of masterpieces.

An accomplished artist, whose works are not often shown in Canada, is Georges Seurat, who, with Cézanne, is one of the leaders of the Post Impressionists and has had a great influence on twentieth century French painting. There is only one example of his very limited output in the exhibition, but it is of the pointilliste and last period of the artist. The work of this man has helped the twentieth century painters with their design. The glittering sky and sea are broken by darker houses and small sailing boats, and the horizontal and upright lines skillfully used give their architectural structure to his work.

There are, too, paintings by Sisley, Degas, Monet, Manet, Pissarro, Gauguin, Lautrec, and that other great figure, Van Gogh, whose works have always caused controversy and argument whenever they are shown in a new place for the first time, but they have found honorable places in some of the greatest public galleries.

The twentieth century is well represented by Picasso, Matisse, Derain, among others, and the link between the Post Impressionists and the Moderns is made by the two elderly and sensitive men, Bonnard and Vuillard. "Le Chandelier" is probably the best picture which Vuillard ever painted and has been favorably compared to this artist's picture in the Tate bought by the late Sir Hugh Lane and presented by him to that gallery many years ago. The exquisite colors of pink, blue, gold and brown could only be put together by a Frenchman of impeccable taste.

Among the items of this important collection is a beautiful painting of flowers by Fantin-Latour. The metal pot is filled with small and lovely blooms grouped tightly and is painted lusciously in the very best manner of this man who belonged to neither the Impressionists nor the Romantics.

The exhibition furnishes the opportunity of seeing paintings lovely in their own right, and interesting in that they are by members of groups of which the late Roger Fry, discerning critic and ardent sympathizer, wrote so sincerely—that the French Impressionist and Post Impressionist painters belong to one of the really great creative periods and their works would be included among the world's masterpieces.

NEW MUSEUM WILL BE READY IN MARCH

Gazette Nov. 30
Work Under Way on Building Which Will Display Canadian Art and Sculpture

Construction work on Montreal's new museum will be completed and all interior settings arranged by about March 1, 1935, when it will be opened to the public. The site of the new museum, which will be primarily for the display of art work and sculpture in wax of religious subjects and those dealing with Canadian history, is at the northwest corner of Queen Mary Road and Cote des Neiges Road, where excavating has already been started by the contractors, Heroux and Robert, Limited. The building will be patterned after the Musée Grévin, of Paris, France, and is being constructed by Musée Catholique, Incorporee, recently incorporated under provincial charter by Dr. Victor Morin, well known notary and life-long student of numismatics. The building will cost about $30,000 and will stand not far away from the St. Joseph's Oratory.

Interviewed at his office yesterday, Dr. Morin stated that the capitalization of the new museum corporation has been largely subscribed in France. The enterprise is an entirely private one and will fill a need in Montreal in respect to this class of museum. Those wishing to subscribe towards the project may still do so as a limited amount of capital is still available to Canadians.

Ludger and Paul M. Lemieux, the architects for the building, have drawn plans in such a way as to permit additional storeys being constructed, but for the present it will consist only of the ground floor, which will contain most of the exhibits, and the first floor on which a few displays will be arranged.

A consignment of wax models and paintings depicting early Christian life in the catacombs of old Rome have already been received. These will constitute the first exhibition at the museum and they will be arranged by Albert and Robert Tancredi, well known artists, as soon as the progress of building construction will permit. The former is a sculptor and has volunteered to arrange the wax figures, while the latter artist will see to the painting of suitable backgrounds.

Groups will be arranged in such a way as to depict life-like scenes and the painted backgrounds will give perspective to the settings. Another section of the museum will be devoted to the display of paintings of religious and historical subjects and it is believed that the museum may eventually become a national centre for this class of art.

Dr. Morin stated that a nominal admission will be made, as at the Musée Grévin in Paris, but that the objectives of the corporation are educational and that special days will be arranged so that school children may visit the museum.

Parson Painters Exhibit

London.—The Society of Parson Painters maintains a creditable average level of merit, and some of the better known members seem to improve on previous work. As represented at Walker's Galleries, 118, New Bond street, there is more intimate study of the influence of light and air, and design and draughtsmanship are surer.

These virtues are noted especially in the grey tones of "Rye" (43), by the Dean of Westminster; the "Bass Rock" (26), by the Rev. Arthur A. Cowan; the decoratively treated "Barges by Sheppey" (32), by the Rev. William B. Monahan; the airy "Cornfield" (49), by the Rev. Claude Terry; in the drawings of the Rev. Sam Spencer (57), the Rev. J. H. Darby (75), Canon A. J. Robertson (89), and the Rev. C. E. Pratt (94), while the Rev. B. S. Lombard has a very dramatic impression of a "Sunset on St. Petersburg in Winter" (106).

The sincerely observed Tree Studies by Archdeacon Lonsdale Ragg are an attractive feature of the collection.

ACKSON SHOWS SCENES OF WINTER

MANY QUEBEC SUBJECTS

Country in Laurentians and Along Lower St. Lawrence
Has Inspired Interesting
Group of Pictures

A. Y. Jackson, of Toronto, who has long been closely identified with the Group of Seven—by reason of the increase in adherents now the Canadian Group of Painters—is showing a collection of oils in the Watson Fine Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west.

The show, which is attracting a good deal of attention, is of a nature to win friends for this Canadian painter who has taken an independent stand on art matters and worked hard to promote and develop the so-called modern school of painting in Canada. Some paintings there are that irritate by reason of lapses in color—works that, to the conservative picture-lover at least, prompt the query, "Why? Accepting the direct, brusque attack and the emphasis of forms to fall into the patterns characteristic of the 'school,' there are occasional works that in the handling of cloud formations and in the use of unusual color are perplexing.

CHARACTERISTIC IN STYLE.

Characteristics of style generally associated with Mr. Jackson's paintings are more evident in the larger works on view. Here the importance of pattern is stressed, sometimes in a manner that is a bit obvious as in "St. Lawrence, Early Spring" where the treatment of the rolling country is strongly emphasized. "St. Urbain"—houses, barns and a church in a spacious snowy landscape with distant hills seen under a sky disturbing in color. Houses and fences with a band of river and distant shore are the pictorial elements of "Les Eboulements," and blue hills of odd shape dominate houses and barns in "Winter, Baie St. Paul." A man works at the wood pile in the painting entitled "St. Tite des Caps," a winter scene good in arrangement, and there are lovely values in the jumble of buildings in "La Malbaie"—snow-covered roofs, a church and distant river with two sleighs, under falling snow. This work convincingly suggests the closing of a grey, winter day. A souvenir of Mr. Jackson's voyage into the Canadian arctic is seen in the "Eskimos of Pangnirtung"—two figures and a dog near a tent on a forbidding shore with massive barren rocky hills in the background.

"Quebec Village," with its church and buildings, fence and man driving a sleigh loaded with firewood is distinctly of this province, and "A Northern Lake" is a work that is wholly satisfying—a noble wooded hill aglow with autumn hues beneath a calm blue sky, and in the foreground a row of bare dying birches that throw shadows on the thin snow-covered ice edging the cold water that mirrors the distant hill. It is a painting that has captured the majesty of the Northland at the season of crisp days and chilly nights.

ATTRACTIVE SMALL WORKS.

It is in the smaller works that Mr. Jackson makes his strongest appeal to the lover of pictures who on canvas or panel looks for an impression of nature that has been part of his visual experience, and in this group there are a number of works capital in design and engaging in color. The suggestion of rough, make-shift buildings and rutted road is convincingly expressed in "Street in Cobalt," and in its subtle values of grey a distinctly satisfying work is "Old House, St. Urbain," with its snow-loaded roof and snow-drifted French-Canadian Barn—a typical rambling structure in a field, backed by a bold, wooded hill, is a convincing transcript of a bright winter day. "Laurentian Hills"—two old barns beneath a snowy rise, and beyond a stretch of wooded and cleared country reaching to a range of blue hills, is an interpretation of Canadian winter that is true to place and season. "The White Barn," a winter scene, with the farm building and adjuncts gleaming in the sunlight that flushes a near-by tree and the drifted snow, is another vivid impression. "Winter Morning" is admirable in its suggestion of space—barns and houses in a landscape that rises to a distant hill, and in the road a horse and sleigh, and "Evening, Les Eboulements," with its barns and distant mountains, is a work of delicate harmonies that suggests the swift approach of night. "Western Islands," an interpretation of another season, is an attractive composition of few elements—red rocks from which rise the bare stumps of two trees and a spacious stretch of blue water. Hinting at the grimness of country in Algoma is "Lake"—wooded hillside and water in autumn. "Fish Houses, Breton," a work restful in its shows a group of non-descript buildings on rocks and edging a cove with a boat at mooring.

Modern French Painters At Scott's

An exhibition, held earlier this year at the Art Association of Montreal, gave a general view of the French painting of the nineteenth century, but stopped short of the most modern work. A collection of pictures, brought together by Messrs. Reid and Lefevre of London, and now being shown in the galleries of W. Scott and Sons on Drummond St., overlaps the former exhibition in respect of a few painters and brings French painting nearly up to the present date. It is called an exhibition of French Paintings by the Impressionists and Modern Artists.

The painters whose work is being shown are divided in the catalogue into Impressionists, Post-Impressionists and Moderns. Work by men of the first two classes has been seen here, if in no great quantity, and all the painters in these classes who are represented in this exhibition were also represented in the spring. The work of the moderns is therefore the most interesting part of this collection since most of it is quite new to Montreal. It must be said that none of the pictures are of the latest or most extreme type; the exhibition is rather an introduction to the most modern French painting and, while much of it may prove indigestible to the more conservative, there are stout radicals, even in Montreal, who will be disappointed by its moderation.

Of the painters whose work has not been shown here before, there is Modigliani, by whom there is a portrait of the American painter, Morgan Russell, — probably very truthful but decidedly a caricature, which suggests that the painter had not much respect for his subject. One may doubt if caricature should be done on quite so large a scale, but the picture is very conservative for Modigliani. Raoul Dufy's "Cacino de Nice" will trouble many people; it is a brush drawing in heavy black outline with color almost as an accessory and much indefiniteness of detail, but it is a picture with much suggestion of truth. There are some still life pictures which need trouble no one. Vuillard's excellent "Le chandelier," Pierre Bonnard's good study of sunlight on a table spread out-of-doors, and Derain's less interesting picture of fruit. A sketch by Odilon Redon of geraniums is brilliant and much more successful than his larger, and rather sticky, picture of flowers. There is a broadly painted sketch of flowers by Picasso which does not represent his work very well. A scene of white houses in a village street by Utrillo is simple and truthful and its drawing is quite normal, unlike much of his later work. Even simpler, and full of color, is the one small example of Matisse, which represents him well, but not in his latest manner. One small picture by Henri Rousseau, — Le douanier, — is here, — so simple as to be childish.

Work by the other painters in the present catalogue has been seen here before and a few of the pictures were in the exhibition which was held in March. There are three good examples of Cezanne, and a fine landscape of Martinique by Gauguin which, since it is one of his earlier works and much more naturalistic than his Tahitian pictures, will not satisfy his keener admirers. Van Gogh's "Les Oliviers" is a good example of his painting but not one of the best.

Renoir is represented by six pictures, among which are a good early landscape, a happy portrait of a little boy and a flower picture, "Les Lilas," which is very cool in its color for a picture painted in the last ten years of his life. There are two excellent drawings by Toulouse-Lautrec, a characteristic drawing of a dancer by Degas and a very typical work by Seurat. A landscape by Camille Pissarro is full of sunlight; the landscapes by Monet and Sisley just represent them, without doing them justice. The only work by Manet is a small sketch of flowers in a glass jar, in which he seems to have become so interested in the glass that he forgot the flowers. There is a very good flower picture by Fantin-Latour, who was of the same time but not of the same school as the other men whose work is here.

Autumn And Spring Scenes

In the studio of Miss Berthe Des Claves, at 1158 Beaver Hall Square, there is now being shown a collection of recent work by herself and her two sisters, Miss Alice and Miss Gertrude Des Claves. Most of the pictures and sketches are her own and very many of them are scenes of autumn in Canada. Autumn this year has been rather kind, in its way, to painters; its colours were very good and it lasted longer than usual. Miss Des Claves has brought a lot of it back to her studio, where its red and yellows spread brightness and cheerfulness. The autumn colors even outshine those of the pictures of spring in this exhibition. The pictures and sketches, large and small, and many of them in pastel, have mostly been made in this province, though there are a few of places in Nova Scotia, with some very characteristic sailing boats. By Miss Alice Des Claves there are some excellent horses; big plough horses and several groups of Dartmoor ponies in their native scenery. A few portraits and portrait studies by Miss Gertrude Des Claves complete the exhibition.

Pictures by Rita Mount

The walls of the print room of the Art Association of Montreal are covered at present by an exhibition of oil pictures and sketches by Miss Rita Mount. Conspicuous are many studies of sailing boats, which Miss Mount understands and paints so well. They have been painted in many conditions and in all of them the boats are good, though, since many of them are sketches which have been painted as they were seen, their grouping does not always make good pictorial composition. There are a number of bright and sunny landscapes, some of the best of them of places on the sea coast, with very good effects of colors in the hills and the water. Some pictures of the Rocky Mountains, most of them in the neighborhood of Banff are very fresh and pleasant and show much of the brightness and hardness of the mountains. A few sketches made in the city are attractive but not very striking, and are less successful than the pictures of the sea coast and its boats, which are more particularly in Miss Mount's own territory.

The Women's Art Society

The annual exhibition of work by the members of the Women's Art Society of Montreal is now being held in one of Eaton's Galleries, where thirty-one members show between seventy and eighty pictures in oil, water color and pastel. A few of the members are painters whose work is fairly well known, but most of them are amateurs whose pictures are not generally seen in exhibitions. Flower pictures take an important place in this exhibition and among the more notable works of this kind are those by Mrs. Lilian Hingston, Mrs. Mary L. Dunning, Annie B. Powles, Avril Manby, Elsie F. Fairbrother, Mrs. Elizabeth Mitchell and Mrs. E. G. Richardson. Portraits and figure subjects are few, but there are an interesting portrait of a man by Mrs. Pierce and four studies, with some character of the same Chinese girl, by Mrs. Beatrice Long, Mrs. A. L. Allan, Norah Smyth and Mrs. E. G. Richardson. There are some successful landscape sketches in water color and oil, some of the more striking being those by Jean Kyle, Ruth Henshaw, Marjorie Allan, Ida Beck and Margaret C. Thompson. Work of some interest is also exhibited by Mrs. John Allan, Ida M. Huddell, S. Ashton Phillips, Jean Baillie, Mrs. M. E. Dingle, Margaret Sanborn, Violet Robertson, E. J. Macfarlane, Mrs. Allan Turner, F. W. Sweeney, Mrs. Jane Luke, Ethel Derrick, Mrs. Annie Pringle, Mrs. Karl H. Forbes, and Mrs. Winifred Lewis.

IS RICH IN VARIETY

Landscapes Predominate,
With Flower Pieces and Portraits Rounding Out an Interesting Collection

Interest in the exhibition of paintings by members of the Women's Art Society of Montreal has drawn a large attendance to the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and already the little scarlet stars signifying sales have begun to appear. The work, for the most part done for the pure love of it without an eye to the market, is up to the standard of past years, and there can be no complaint on the ground of variety of subjects. Here will be found no daring experiments in color or treatment. Without repression of individuality, there seems to be no inclination to produce paintings that are other than comely and readily understood. There are, as is inevitable, uneven spots in the show, but, at that, there is throughout evidence of a sincerity that is highly commendable.

Marjorie Allan shows good design and confident brushwork in "The Road Turns"—a house, trees and roadway—a subject that, despite its small compass, is "big" in feeling. Mrs. Ann Low Allan reveals versatility in a portrait of a Chinese girl—"A Daughter of China," in which care has been bestowed on the painting of her rich garment, and in a group of landscapes, among them the effective "Black Lake," with its house, water and clouds. Jean Baillie has not been abashed by the problem of painting vapour swirling about noble mountains in "White Mists at Cap L'Aigle," and Ida Beck in her pastel portrait of a young woman, has used the delicate chalks with good effect. In her watercolors, "Autumn, Mount Royal" and "Bride Path" she displays a free washy treatment and engaging color. Mrs. Mary L. Dunning has a soundly painted work in "Marigolds," and Elsie F. Fairbrother is sympathetic to such blooms as daffodils and irises.

Mrs. Karl H. Forbes has painted a bit of characteristic scenery in "Quiet Afternoon, Laurentians," with its water and spruces, and Ruth Henshaw shows an effective watercolor called "Perce Rock."

GOOD FLOWER PIECES.

Mrs. Lilian Hingston exhibits "Dahlias" and "Roses," which strengthen the position she is winning as a painter of flowers. She succeeds in capturing the essential characteristics of the blooms she portrays, shows a good decorative sense in their arrangement and takes no liberties with color.

Ida M. Huddell, who shows landscapes, is distinctly happy in "A Country Road"—houses and a twin-towered church, and Mrs. Winifred D. Lewis has an ambitious pastel in "Road to the Sugar Bush," a snow scene with birches, bush and a rutted road. Trees and water are the pictorial elements of "Indiana, Autumn," by Mrs. Jane C. Luke, who yearly shows advance in investing her landscapes with light and atmosphere. These qualities especially mark "New England, Summer," Mrs. Beatrice M. Long, besides a portrait of a Chinese girl, has imparted dignity to her profile portrait of an Indian, called "A Daughter of the Creeks." Avril Manby has a sincere work in "Sweet Peas," the blooms being arranged in an old green ginger jar, and E. J. Macfarlane, presents a capital bit of painting in the carts and old buildings of "St. Ives, Cornwall."

Mrs. Elizabeth Mitchell has a freely treated and nicely arranged work in "Jar and Gladioli," and Mrs. J. Pierce shows capable brushwork in "A Detective Story Portrait"—a man evidently engrossed in a "thriller." Mrs. Annie Pringle has recorded a picturesque bit in "The Turn of the Road." Violet Robertson manifests a solid touch in her snow scene called "Orange House," with its hills and blue shadows, and, in pastel, sets down a glimpse of the North River winding between snowclad hills. The locale suggests that alluring stretch from Piedmont northwards. Mrs. E. G. Richardson shows a practised hand in her painting "Zinnias," and has also found a congenial sitter in "Miss Woo." This portrait is a distinctly good bit of painting.

There is spirit and movement to sea beating in on rocks in "The Rock-bound Coast of Maine," a watercolor by Margaret C. Thompson, and Miriam Holland shows her usual happy selection of subject, sound drawing and good tone in a harbor scene, and in the old buildings edging a village street.

Other contributing works that go to add interest to this collection are Mrs. John Allan, Ethel Derrick, Mrs. M. E. Dingle, Jean Kyle, S. Ashton Phillips, Annie B. Powles, Margaret Sanborn, F. W. Sweeney, Norah Smyth, Mrs. Allan Turner. These paintings remain on view until Saturday.

OLD WORLD BEAUTY SHOWN IN POSTERS

Colorful Exhibition Opens
Today in Windsor Station
Concourse

Beauty spots and places of interest and history in twenty-one countries over four continents are represented in the display of posters that frame the Windsor station concourse in a blaze of color from the Osborne street entrance to the St. Antoine street elevator exit and which are on exhibition there from today until December 16. They illustrate countries touched by the three cruises of the Canadian Pacific steamships, the world cruise and West Indies cruises of the Empress of Britain, the five-in-one cruise of the Empress of Australia to the Mediterranean, East Africa, South Africa, South America, and West Indies, and the Norwegians fjords cruise next summer.

Mountains, rivers, valleys, land and sea scenes, the remains of ancient Empires in the form of temples, monuments and ruined cities, flourishing modern cities whose history goes far back into the past, peoples and costumes, the widest possible range of countries and climates, all this and much more is reproduced in the posters.

The countries shown include Norway with Midnight Sun scenery and mountains and fjords; Holland, with famous churches and Royal Castles and its landscape reclaimed from the sea; Tunisia, with the white cities and palms of Africa; Italy, with its noble lakes and great cities, Milan, Palermo, Naples, Rome and Venice; France and the Riviera, with its luxurious resorts and its Roman remains; Greece, with its great relics of an old civilization; Egypt, illustrated by warriors from the Soudan; India, with its Oriental splendor of cities and palaces and a great poster of the Mogul Emperor receiving an embassy; Ceylon, the Malay States, Java, China, the Philippines, Hawaii, South Africa, showing the Victoria Falls, more than a mile wide, and the mysterious City of Zimbabwe, the Bahamas, Jamaica and Brazil and Argentina.

FRENCH ACADEMY AT TERCENTENARY

"Immortals" Attend Celebration in Green and Gold Uniforms

Paris, June 17—(C. P. Havas)—France's "40 Immortals" today began the celebration of the tercentenary of the French Academy, of which they make up the current membership.

The Academy, membership in which is France's highest official honor to her intellectuals, was founded in 1635 by Armand du Plessis, Cardinal Richelieu, Prime Minister of Louis XIII.

Resplendent in their green and gold-braided uniforms, the members of the Academy and numerous representatives of foreign governments attended mass in the chapel of the Sorbonne, built under Richelieu's direction. The countess de la Rochefoucauld, nee Richelieu, represented the Richelieu family.

Five recently-elected members of the Academy who have not yet been formally received by that body attended. They were: Marshal Franchet D'Esperey, Leon Benard, Andre Bellesort, Claude Farrere and Jacques Bainville. Jean Cardinal Verdier, Archbishop of Paris, celebrated the Mass.

The members of the Academy and foreign representatives then were received at the Elysee by President Albert Lebrun.

A special historical exposition was inaugurated in the National Library. It included the original letters patent of the Academy. The document is a large sheet of parchment bearing the royal seal on green wax with green and red ribbons.

Other documents on view are the letters of Honore de Balzac and Charles Baudelaire, announcing their candidacy, and the manuscript of "The Immortal," the novel which was made between Al-

OUTSTANDING ARTISTS

Pissarro, Sisley and Jong-kind Are Impressionists Represented—Worthy Works
by Dutch School

Choice paintings by leading members of the Dutch and French schools from the galleries of E. J.
van Wisselingh & Company, of Amsterdam, brought to Canada by P. C. Ellers, are on view in the Johnson Art Galleries, Limited, 1340 St. Catherine street west, and, as usual, there are many items in the collection that excite covetousness.

In every way worthy is the Dutch group which ranges from the quiet home interiors by Neuhuys to the vivid Eastern impressions of Bauer.
Here is to be seen the work of painters who found everyday scenes about them subjects worth recording—honest, direct transcriptions of things seen without straining after effects, but invested with a simple dignity and quality that explain the hold that the painters of this school have on the picture-lover.

Bosboom, in both oils and watercolor, is shown as accomplished draughtsman and sympathetic col-orist in two church interiors, a glimpse of the Town Hall at Hat-tum, Holland, and "In the Stable."
In all he reveals skill in the massing of his lights and shadows and his happy faculty in placing correctly the incidental figures.

P. J. C. Gabriel, whose restful subjects mean more and more on closer acquaintance, finds beauty in a mill near a stream, is attracted by old buildings, trees and a ditch, and reveals noble design in "Peat Making"—a stretch of water with wheeling gulls and in a moored boat at the edge of the bog a man works with a long handled spade digging the submerged fuel. The distant water catches the shimmer of the sun, and the spit of land, part grass-covered and part without its layer of turf, is fine in tone.

THE BROTHERS MARIS.

Jacob Maris, who knew all about mills, riverside towns and the rapid shift of clouds and sunlight, is represented by "The Three Mills," and, among others, "View of Dordrecht, Holland." The latter is marked by billowy clouds in light and shadow above a cluster of buildings and a sun-flushed church tower. William Maris, a gifted brother, signs a landscape with willows, called "Cattle in the Meadow."

Mauve, besides a winter sunset, reveals the sense of good composition and distinguished color in "Woodcutters"—vertical trees and distant bush after a fall of snow.
Grooten, whose work now seldom comes into the market, shows how to handle the green of trees in full leaf. This watercolor, called "Near the Farm, Ewyskshoeve," is powerfully painted—buildings seen through trees, fowl foraging in the grass and a man digging near a pile of fallen branches. The effect of sunlight and air is convincingly presented.

Weissenbruch is here with three works that indicate versatility—
"Polder Landscape," with a man in a boat; "Cattle on the Stream," a water-edged meadow, reeds, and three cows, with a sky filled with silver-edged clouds—a work of fine values and "juicy" touch; and "On the Beach of Scheveningen." The last-named, simple in subject and seemingly simple in treatment—sand, a figure, gentle waves and vast distance.

Jongkind, the Impressionist, signs
"Winter Scene with Skaters," in which the chill atmosphere is well suggested, and Breitner, in a capital "washy" watercolor shows his ability to suggest essentials. This work—a man shoeing a horse outside a farrier's shop, while two men watch another animal awaiting its turn, has its note of humor in the two children and their dog watching the blacksmith at his task.

Neuhuys has interiors with figures, effectively lighted and handled with the touch which indicates the born painter. Mothers and their children are his subjects, and his children are true to age and type.
In all of these works there is a satisfying harmony of tones. There is beauty in a few square inches of grey wall.

Marius A. J. Bauer, who early in life heard and heeded the call of the East, is capably represented in two media. In oils there is the impression of vivid sunlight and moving mounted figures in "A Moroccan Fortress." The citadel gleams in the intense light and the sun-baked plain stretching to its massive walls seems to shimmer in the heat. In "Blind Beggar"—a whiterobed figure with staff stands in the shadow of buildings, while below him in the background are the domes and buildings of Jerusalem.
"A Festival Day at Delhi," shows the imposing bulk of a building, while the foreground is filled with horsemen. "Natives Bathing, Ceylon," is a fine atmospheric impression—a stream edged with luxuriant growth, elephants on the distant shore, a boat and figures in the continued

stream, and on the near shore figures in attitudes of rest. An earlier work in oil is "A Castle at Constantinople"—a massive building beyond an old tree which throws its shadow on a dismounted horseman.

In the French group there is a low-toned landscape by Daubigny;
a reed pen drawing by Fantin-Latour, whose appreciation of lovely color is shown in an oil—Night withdrawing as Day comes in;
Monticelli in two manners—a blond rolling landscape, and a richer-toned canvas with jewel-like values in the garments of the figures—
"Moses and the Daughters of Pharaoh."

Boudin, besides a beach scene with buildings at Trouville, shows another side of his art in a village fete in Brittany where there is a mass of peasant girls in their quaint black and white costumes backed by buildings and trees. Troyon is shown in a less heavy-handed work —a crisp water color of trees near a brook in which a white cow stands. By Utrillo is "La Porte de Ville" massive in design and characteristic in brushwork.

Pissarro at two periods is here—
"Le Pont-neuf a Paris," the noble stream, bridge and buildings as seen under delicate sunlight, and
"Au Bord de la Seine a Pont Marly," painted in 1871 when putting down color as he saw it was his chief concern and the broken color of the Impressionists had not been adopted. This canvas is full of air—buildings with red roofs edge the moving water and over all is a summer sky with moving clouds.

Boats and figures at the shore are mirrored in the stream.

There is one work by Sisley, called "Summer Morning." It is one of the finest works by this member of the Impressionists that has been shown in Canada for many years. In it the sunlight glows on the noble tree and on the bank where a woman bends to pick a bloom. There is a distant house and a tall wall throws a marvellously transparent shadow on the path. It is an outstanding example.

Works of Dutch And French Painters

Star
12.12.34.

The Johnson Galleries on St. Catherine street are now receiving their annual visit of pictures brought to Canada from E. J. van Wisselingh and Co. of Amsterdam.
The present exhibition contains work, pictures in oil and water color and etchings, by some eight modern French and seventeen Dutch artists. Among the French pictures are an excellent landscape, "Matin d'ete," which is a good example of the work of Sisley, a striking picture of the gate of a French town by Utrillo, not in his latest manner, —a picture, full of light and air, of Paris and another picture which represent the work of Pissarro. An admirable landscape by Monticelli has been shown here before, but another and even better example of his work, a group of women by a brook under trees, called "Moise et les filles de Pharaon," is new. There are three good pictures by Boudin;
two of scenes on the shore at Trouville and a third of a village festival in Brittany, with a pattern made of the white caps of peasant women. A small water color landscape sketch by Troyon is particularly good and there are a good Daubigny and two small studies of figure subjects which illustrate the less familiar side of the work of Fantin-Latour.

The modern Dutch school is well represented in this collection. By Marius Bauer there are a number of pictures and etchings; a water color sketch of men bathing in a river in Ceylon is a striking one, and there is an interesting arrangement of color in "At the source."
Several pictures by Jacob Maris are here; a big view of Dordrecht is one of the best of them; and several by Bosboom, among them two very good water colors, of interiors of a stable and of a Dutch town-hall. A brilliant little water color of horses by G. H. Breitner and a water color sketch by Mauve are also to be noticed. Many other modern Dutch painters are represented, among them, Josef Israels, Willem Maris, Weissenbruch, Tholen, Neu-huys, Gabriel, Jongkind and others.

The Arts Club Exhibition

The exhibitions which are held from time to time of work by members of the Arts Club provide news of what is being done by a number of the most active workers in Montreal, and the annual Christmas exhibition, which has just been opened in the club's gallery on Victoria street, is as good as others which have gone before it. There are pictures in oil and water color, drawings and prints; most of the pictures are small and some of them are modestly described in the catalogue as merely sketches. Conspicuous among the larger pictures is one by Paul Earle, in which there is a very interesting effect of light distant, and shaded foreground. "At

continued

sunrise." A similar effect is used, in a quite different manner in J. M.
Miller's view of Beaupre. A striking sketch is the "Old barn," one of several by Frank Downey and there is an interesting study, in browns, of still life among the pictures of G. C. Adams. A view of a snowy street, and a hilly landscape,
"The Carter's Home" are two of the best of the sketches by R. H. Lindsay, and there is a good study of a sky in Tom Galside's "Petite Riviere." Thurston Topham shows a pleasant oil sketch, an effective landscape in water color and some successful little line cuts.

Water colors continue to grow in importance in these exhibitions. In this one there are a number of strong and broadly painted views of docks and machinery by James Beckwith, some more precise ones by A. Cloutier, and others, rather slighter, by Leslie Smith. Other members whose work is shown are Felix Shea, Adrien Hebert, Guy
Brock, D. H. MacFarlane, David McGill, Emile Lemieux, Hugh Peck and F. T. Kallin.

News of Art In Montreal

The Continental Gallery on St.
Catherine St. has brought to Montreal the works of several Austrian painters whose pictures had not before been seen here. At present there are in the gallery two landscapes, closely finished pictures by a Viennese painter, Anton Filkuka, of much fame in his own country, particularly as a painter of portraits and figure subjects. There are also in this gallery a number of good works by British painters, past and present. Notable among them are several works by Lee Hankey and specially a strong, if not pretty, half length of a girl with a shawl and a pleasant view of an Italian town.
Other British pictures of interest are —a small picture of a girl feeding a horse by Lucy Kemp Welch, a great student of horses, a brilliant picture of two sailors by A. D. McCormick, a sketch of a harvest field by W. D.
Mackay, landscapes by the two Farquharsons, Joseph and David, and one by B. W. Leader.

At Eaton's gallery a small exhibition was opened this week of work by George Shirley Simpson.
These are pictures and sketches in oil and pastel. Some of the few larger ones, of flowers and still life are among the best, both as pictures and as paintings. Of the landscape sketches the most successful are some of snow scenes, in town and country, particularly one or two of hills under snow.

The lectures to be given this season at the Art Association of Montreal will mostly deal with principles and aspects of modern methods in art. The next lecture, which will be given next Wednesday evening, December 19, will be by Edward Howard Griggs on "Race,
Epoch and Artist as Forces behind Art." In January Jerre Abbott will lecture on "Traditional aspects of twentieth century painting"; in February Prof. John Alford, formerly of the Courtauld Institute in London and recently appointed to a professorship in the University of Toronto, will speak on "Modern tendencies in art." In March Dr. Hans Tietze is to lecture on "European painting in 1910."

DIONNE CHILDREN INSPIRE SCULPTOR

Quintuple Birth Theme of Crucifix by Melville
Jack

HAMILTON, Dec. 11.—(Star Special.) — Dionne sisters, famed quintuplets of the Ontario hinterlands, may be immortalized as a divine challenge to exponents of birth control by the interpretation of their birth as sculptured in an oak crucifix by three guild carvers in their studio here.

Designed to serve as a prayer icon, the daring yet seraphic ensemble portrays the living Christ upon the Cross endowing life upon five happy-faced cherubs depicted as emerging on tiny wings from the heavenly background within the quadrants of the Cross.

It will be given to the Dionnes at Christmas to be erected in the little Dionne home, in the memorial hospital where Dr. A. R. Dufos is medical guardian, or in a wayside shrine where pilgrims in the future may revere the miracle it represents.

Melville Jack conceived the design. He is an artist in his own profession, that of wood sculptor, but his artistry is a family trait. His elder brother, Richard Jack, Royal Academician, is noted for his portraits of King George and Queen
Mary and many eminent Canadians.
Robert Cruickshanks laminated the oak for the icon, and David Miller, veteran Scottish carver, did the sculpturing.

No attempt was made to portray the facial characteristics of the Dionne sisters. The cherubs symbolize their birth by Divine Grace, the artist explained.

He said that the theme was suggested by dissertations against birth control delivered by Bishop J. T.
McNally, prominent Roman Catholic dignitary.

"I thought the birth of the quintuplets should be interpreted as a Divine challenge to the modern trend, I toyed with the idea, finally sketched a rough design, and David Miller caught the theme in his carving. As the cherubs took form, we decided there was only one place for the crucifix—Corbeil—and that it should be erected there as a permanent reminder of the spiritual significance of their birth," said Mr.
Jack.

The three guildsmen are Protestants, but much of their work has been done in Catholic edifices. They admit that the theme of their creation is radical and provocative of controversy, but they say that they are interested only in its mystic symbolism.

Photography
At the Art Association

A Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art is something new. It is the name given to a particularly good collection of photographs, which has been got together by the National Gallery of Canada, with help from the Camera Club of Ottawa, and is being sent round Canada for exhibition; at present it is to be seen in one of the upper galleries of the Art Association of Montreal. The exhibition is to be welcomed as showing a great deal of good work in photography and, further, showing how much work of this is being done in Canada. At same time the collection is truly international and especially American since more than half of the exhibit live in the United States and more than a quarter of them in Canada. The European photographs are few but mostly good.

The right of photography to be considered an art and not merely a craft depends chiefly on the choice which the photographer makes of subject, position and lighting; after that he can omit some of the detail in the subject which he does not want in his picture, and he can do something by combining two or more photographs. There are in this exhibition many examples of good photography, used to make attractive portraits of people or places, street scenes, views among mountains and others. There are others in which effects of atmosphere have been caught, several good photographs of falling snow and one of Venusian seen through mist. Several very successful photographs are of animals; one of a black cat against a dark background is one of the best things in the exhibition, as a picture and as a work of photography; others, good but more literal, are of a pair of cart-horses and of a toad. Some of the happiest effects must have been got more or less by chance; a particularly good one is of two candles, one burning and the other just blown out and smoking; others are of a mass of storm clouds, and of a seagull flying against a cloudy sky.

Among the most interesting pictures in the collection are some of those in which use has been made of the patterns of light and shadow made by common objects and by buildings, some of which have little beauty of their own. A very effective use of an arched stairway is made in "Half Way Down" by Walter Meyers; the curve of a roadway makes a good pattern in "Visitors Arrive" by D. Pease; tall office windows are cleverly used in "The Temple of Mammon" by Johan Helder of Ottawa. Striking patterns made by light and shade on the walls of grain elevators and similar buildings have been observed and recorded by Russell King of St. Lambert and J. Vanderpant of Vancouver. Other interesting effects of this kind are got from pieces of machinery, from the wheels of a cart, from the shadow of a trombone on a white wall in "Music" by Johan Helder and from that of a flower-vase in "The Curving Shadow" by Rowena Brownell. There is a clever use of shadow in "Monuments to Science"—the shadow of a statue against a tall building. A good pattern is made by a log-boom in "Boat Towing Logs" by Margaret Bourke-White, and figure compositions are similarly, if less successfully used by H. Richardson Cremer.

Pictures made from arranged subjects or by double printing or similar methods are generally less effective. In "The Soul of the Dance" by H. F. Kells of Ottawa, the dancer is seen against an enlargement of her own head, but this adds little if anything to the value of a remarkably good figure study. The little figure in a candle flame in "Spirit of the Flame" by J. R. Macdonald of Toronto shows ingenuity and not much else, and much the same is true of the arrangement of a repeated portrait as the "Queen of Spades". H. F. Kells' "Death of Cleopatra" is conspicuous among the arranged subjects; it has taken a setting of scenery and six models to make it and the result does not seem worth all this.

ART FORM DEFINED BY SPIRIT OF TIME

Racial and Epochal Trends Traced by Dr. Edward Howard Griggs

Though the personality of the artist moulds the art form, the expression is moulded through the epoch and the epoch through the race. This is the invariable factor in the creation of great art, in the opinion of Edward Howard Griggs, Ph.D., who addressed members of the Art Association of Montreal at the Art Gallery last night.

Dr. Griggs is head of the department of philosophy at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the author of "The New Humanism," "Philosophy of Art," "Self Culture Through the Vocation," and numerous other books dealing with literature, philosophy, art, education and ethics. He previously occupied chairs at the University of Indiana and at Stanford.

"Art is limitation," said the lecturer. It is the imposition of this limitation upon the wealth of artistic material by which the artist reveals his personality. "What he sees depends upon what he is—and no two persons see alike."

The speaker illustrated the effect of personality on art by choosing contrasting examples from equivalent times and fields and showed the results of conditioning by early life, experience, character and training.

Behind the artist was the inescapable spirit of his times, the "Zeitgeist," that influenced. Whether it was in opposition, as in the case of Emerson, or in sympathy, as in that of Leonardo da Vinci, this was a predominant factor, said the speaker. Da Vinci, "the most myriad-minded man in the history of the world" was the supreme example of the height of his times.

The epoch, believed Dr. Griggs, was the high-point of the race. The art of Greece reached its zenith with its civilization and took the form of sculpture, the form nearest in relation to the civilization. In the Italian Renaissance the predominant art was painting, which expressed best the return to materialism. The rise of the warlike Norsemen was ultimately reflected in the rise of German music.

The Elizabethan epoch in England saw the emergence of great drama that held all the moral sense that has become the essence of English people. This, said Dr. Griggs is something fundamental and can be found all through English drama and poetry from Beowulf to Tennyson and will remain as the heritage of the Anglo-Saxon.

The speaker was introduced by H. B. Walker, president of the Art Association.

News of Art
In Montreal

The landscapes by Tom Stone, O. S. A., which are now being shown in one of the galleries at Eaton's, are typically Canadian pictures of typical Canadian scenes. Some of them are so typical that they suggest that Mr. Stone has not yet quite found himself and falls into imitating other painters. Winter and autumn are the times of year when most of the pictures have been painted, and Mr. Stone shows some skill in the handling of snow and of the effect of sunlight on it. Rivers, lakes and mountains are the subjects which he has painted, well chosen and painted in a way which is sometimes successful and at other times very promising. There are some good studies of the spring break-up of the Gatineau River, and effective little pictures of Maligne Lake, Mount Robson, the Pickanock River, Muskoka in winter, and many other attractive places.

A lecture will be given at the Art Association of Montreal this evening at 8:15, by Edward Griggs, on "Race, Epoch, and Artist as Forces behind Art."

A small collection of sketches and pictures by the American painter, Walter Pach, who recently lectured here, is being shown in the Print Room of the Art Association.

Prints in Colour

Christmas is the time of year when color printing is in its glory. Christmas cards, Christmas numbers and many other uses spread color prints everywhere at this season, and every one with any memory can see the enormous strides which have been made in color printing processes in recent years. Christmas cards often were in the past, and sometimes are even now, atrocities of bad design and poor printing, but methods of printing have progressed so far that painters of ability and eminence have taken to designing Christmas cards.

As good, or even better, are many of the all-year-round color prints, those which stand entirely on their own merits. Their excellence depends in some cases on the ways which have been adopted in designing for color printing and in others on the perfection of methods of reproducing pictures in color. Many of the best modern color prints employ the oldest of methods,—the method of printing from blocks, used by the Chinese and Japanese before printing from type was invented in Europe, and some of the artists who design such prints, and often cut and print their own work, have evidently been inspired by Japanese work. A great quantity of very fine work of this kind is being produced in Europe and America.

The first of the very good color reproductions were made by Germans, at Munich and Vienna, and some of the best work is still done in those places, though much of the British and American work is quite equal to it. In their zeal for perfection some of the German printers even used embossing dies to reproduce even the brush marks in oil paintings. A great deal of the most effective modern color printing is done in reproducing work in water color and it has reached an extraordinary degree of exactness. There are reproductions, for example, of the work of so delicate a painter as Russell Flint, which can only with some difficulty be distinguished from originals; and the same is true of the work of many other painters. And so color printing, whether as original work or as reproduction, by providing good pictures at cheap prices, has become the most truly democratic branch of art.

Formation of Maritime Association Being Planned

Ottawa, January 29.—Early formation of a Maritime Art Association is expected by Walter H. Abell, art professor of Acadia University, Wolfville, N.S., who is in Ottawa making arrangements for loan collections for paintings from the National Gallery here. Appreciation of the fine arts will be promoted by the association through exhibitions and lectures. A number of colleges and art societies already have indicated their willingness to join.

An organization meeting will be held in the near future, probably at Saint John, N.B., in February.

Tentative plans already have been made to bring the travelling Canadian art exhibition to the Maritimes in the spring.

Meritorious Canadian Work Shown With Examples by European Experts

What the camera can do when an artist selects the material and "shoots" is evidenced in the collection of prints on view in the Art Association of Montreal. This collection of the Canadian International Association of Photographic Art comes from the National Gallery of Canada, Eric Brown, the gallery director, writing the foreword to the catalogue in which he says, in part:

"No form of artistic expression has made greater advances in recent years than photography. The pictorialist, after a long sojourn in the wilderness of complete subservience to his medium, has at last wakened up to the fact that he is its master and that even without the complete freedom of the painter or draughtsman to use nature as his keynote, he can draw from nature's visible storehouse such abundant wealth of design, form and character as will supply most of his artistic needs, and the result is modern photography."

The exhibition is an interesting one. There are a number of beautiful subjects that will attract attention—Marcus Adams's print of H.R.H. Princess Margaret Rose of York, Venetian scenes by Iugre Barbieri, and by Murray Barford; "Miss Sandra" by Dorothy Wilding; H. R. Cremer's profile of a lovely woman in "Serenity"; Harold G. Swahn's "Water Lily," and H. W. Wagner's "Harmony"—a winter scene, to mention a few.

There are, too, subjects in which the nude has been treated with discretion and delicacy, and some prints with that quality generally known as "human interest," among them Helen Farrell's "Hesitation," a print of an alert squirrel distinctly in doubt; "Connaissance"—two cats rubbing noses on a broken fence, by Erno Vadas; Oliver Berg's gleaming black cat in the print called "Concentration," and J. W. McFarlane's "Popeye"—a noble frog.

Of unusual interest are the examples by Canadians who acquit themselves nobly in company with the best English and European exponents. A. S. Archer, Toronto, has a fine print in "A Pair of Candles"—one lighted and the other just extinguished, the band of waving smoke being lovely in form. H. Colley Foster, Toronto, has a fine architectural fragment in "Fan Vaulting," and W. F. Haehnel, Toronto, has an effective print in "Patience of the Waves." Two white horses feature "Workmates" by C. M. Johnston, Ottawa; and H. F. Kells, Ottawa, shows skill in "Blizzard," and imagination and good taste in "Soul of the Dance"—a study of the nude. There is good decorative arrangement in "Tiddlywinks" by Bruce Metcalfe, Weston, Ont., and a note of quiet humor in "The Little Lieutenant" by John Morris, Toronto. Among the three prints by G. Nakash, Montreal, is a portrait of the Rev. F. W. Norwood. J. Vanderpant, Vancouver, is effective in prints where simple forms in sunlight and shadow make effective pattern—"Concrete Power," "The Window" and "Corrugated Design," the last-named being particularly striking.

The prints on view total 177.

THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

Star Dec. 26/34

Time and Place As Influences On Artists

The relation of works of art to the personality of the men who made them and to the times and places in which they made was the subject of a lecture which Dr. Edward Howard Griggs gave to the Art Association of Montreal last week. Dr. Griggs, treating his subject very broadly, did not put forward any new facts but set himself rather to arrange and expound facts which are generally known. While he dealt more or less with all branches of art he gave special attention to poetry and drama, as being specially English arts, and set himself to show that Shakespeare, for example, though not "for an age but for all time," was of his age, and claimed that it was possible, by careful study of Shakespeare's works, to reconstruct the life and character of the writer. He took no account of the artist as a man born before his time, as some artists have supposed themselves to be, and maintained that, while a work of art represents the personality of the artist, that personality is a product of the place and time in which the artist lived. He illustrated his views by comparisons of the work of poets, painters and composers of different countries and periods. The lecture owed as much to the style and fluency of the lecturer as to the interest of his subject.

News of Art In Montreal

The next lecture at the Art Association of Montreal will be on Monday evening, January 7th. The lecturer will be Jere Abbott and his subject will be "Traditional aspects of twentieth century painting."

Art classes are now open at the Young Women's Hebrew Association. They include classes in drawing, painting, modelling and handicrafts. The drawing and painting classes are under the direction of Alexander Bercovitch and those in modelling are directed by Charles Faimele. There are senior classes and junior classes for children. The registration of students is already large.

LADY LAVERY, AGED 47, DIES AT LONDON HOME

Artist's Wife Noted For Great Beauty

LONDON, Jan. 4.—(A. P.)—Lady Lavery, wife of Sir John Lavery, famous British painter, died at their home in London last night, it was announced today.

She was 47 years old. Lady Lavery was noted for her great beauty and often posed for her husband, who always said she was the best model he ever had. She herself was a painter of some talent.

Lady Lavery had been ill ever since she underwent an operation some months ago. Sir John had been at her bedside for weeks.

Lady Lavery is the former Hazel Martyn, daughter of Edward Jenner Martyn, of Chicago, and was the widow of Edward Livingston Trudeau, of New York.

The president and committee of the Art Association of Montreal are holding a preview for members this afternoon of the exhibition arranged by the courtesy of the Carnegie Corporation of New York, of contemporary paintings by artists of the United States and an exhibition of contemporary American prints lent by E. Weyhe and Company of New York.

A Museum of Forgeries

Forgeries take a quite conspicuous place in many of our great art collections; it is fairly safe to say that there is no big museum in the world which has not, or at any rate has not had forgeries among the original works in its cases. This fact is now being suitably recognized by the British Museum, with a plan to give a room to the exhibition of a collection of forgeries of works of art or objects of antiquity. The museum in its time has undoubtedly been caught, like every other, and has been offered and has rejected forgeries in abundance, though the cases in which its chiefs have been taken in are not among the most famous of their kind. One of the most famous cases is that of the crown or tiara of an ancient Scythian king, which was bought some years ago by the Louvre and was exhibited as a valuable possession till it was found that the artist who had made it was still living in Paris. It appears that the artist in this case was not to be considered a forger, since he made the tiara as an original work and it was an astute man of business who saw a chance of taking in the Louvre authorities, and succeeded.

There have been many other objects which were made as original works and converted into forgeries, but apart from that, the making of forgeries is a fairly big business in some places in Europe. An Englishman, who is interested and expert in old Italian bronzes, was looking for such things in Italy not long ago and happened into a workshop in which a fine and quite new bronze of the fifteenth or sixteenth century was in process of being cast; no doubt that bronze is now to be seen in some museum. There are many places where similar additions to antiquity are being made, but their owners are generally more careful to keep out strangers.

The British Museum gallery of forgeries, when it is opened, will serve two good purposes. It will serve to warn and educate collectors. It will also probably exhibit some very good pieces of work, of which the only fault is that they pretend to be what they are not. A forgery which will deceive the experts of the great has to be the work of a good artist and a good craftsman. There have been able artists and craftsmen who found that they could only sell their work by attributing it to well known names, and some of the blame for the existence of forgeries of works of art must fall on the people who put high values on works of particular men or periods and can not recognize the merits of work by less known artists. When the British Museum, or any other museum has made its collection of forgeries, that collection will, pretty certainly, contain many things that are well worth seeing, and there will probably be still unrecognized forgeries in the museum's main collections.

OLD PISTOLS COME UNDER POLICE EYE

CURATORS IN QUANDARY

Antiques Dating Back to 1650 May Be Involved—
Many Could Still Be Dangerous

Picture a twentieth century Dick Turpin dashing up to Montreal museums to get an old flintlock pistol, only to be confronted by curators with the daring cry: "No! They're all registered with the Provincial Police!"

Four metropolitan museums—the McCord National Museum, McGill University's Redpath Museum, devoted to ethnological displays; the Chateau de Ramezay and the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal—are in a quandary as result of an edict which went out from offices of Maurice Lalonde, District Chief of the Provincial Police, yesterday to the effect that they too must register under federal laws all pistols and revolvers—no matter how old—in their possession.

E. Lionel Judah, curator of McGill Museums, revealed that within the near future he would confer with Chief Lalonde on the subject. He told The Gazette: "Of course, we are glad to comply with federal laws; I do not want McGill University to be a leverage for people who want to break the law. But must we register, too, old, time-worn flint and steel lock pistols?"

In certain cases, he emphasized, old flint locks could not possibly be converted into weapons; but in others, caps could be put in them—"and they would thus become very, very dangerous weapons." But would modern banditti dare enter steel-vaulted banks armed with a wheel lock pistol to confront clerks and gendarmes armed with rapid-firing Colt or Smith and Wesson automatics?

Within collections of old firearms in museums at McGill University there are from 100 to 150 very old pistols, it is understood. They include chiselled Italian daggers of 1650, with bell-nosed barrels eight inches in length and with a 14 bore; German wheel lock military pistols used by the Reiters; 16th and 17th century metal haft Edinburgh pistols used by the Highlanders; wheel lock, flint lock, pepper boxes and percussion locks used by soldiery in the early days of Canadian history, and primitive muzzle-loaders of the United States. The Art Association of Montreal has within its Sherbrooke street galleries a treasured collection of beautiful old pistols, while within the walls of the ancient Chateau de Ramezay are to be found from 12 to 20 very old pistols used by British and French troops in the days when Montreal was Ville Marie and when Wolfe's Highlanders chased the Sieur de Montcalm and his Fleur de Lys troops from the Plains of Abraham.

PUZZLED OVER RULINGS.

Mr. Judah admitted that he was puzzled as to just how these old weapons would be registered with the Provincial Police; he had been queried on that very subject by the Art Association of Montreal, he admitted. Miss Anna Dowd, curator of the Chateau de Ramezay, expressed surprise at the decree from Chief Lalonde's offices—"but I suppose we'll have to register them."

It is understood that ever since the new amendment to Canada's Criminal Code came into effect with the advent of January 1 requiring registration of "all revolvers and pistols," Chief Lalonde's offices have been swamped with demands for registration papers from users of modern fire-arms—bank employees, offices, persons licensed last year to carry revolvers, etc. Some 3,000 registration forms have already been sought, it was revealed yesterday.

War veterans or families possessing trophies of the Great War such as German field revolvers must register these, it is understood.

And don't forget that rusty old flint-lock with the broken trigger hanging over the mantelpiece!

GIFT OF PORCELAIN

Eighty Pieces in Collection at Art Gallery

The Art Association of Montreal has recently received a fine collection of English porcelain from Mrs. Margaret Fountaine Brown of London, England, in memory of her mother, the late Mrs. Mary Watson of Bute House, Montreal.

Bute House, well-known to Montrealers as one of the best young ladies schools about 1885, was situated on the south-east corner of Sherbrooke street west, and the corner of McGill College avenue, where Strathcona Hall is now situated. There are about eighty pieces in the collection.

PAINTER'S REALITY NOT LIKE LAYMAN'S

Gazette Jan. 8/35

Critics of Ultra-Modern Art

Given Partial Answer by Jere Abbott

What, after all, is reality?

Jere Abbott, director of the Smith College Museum of Art at Northampton, Mass., posed that question before members of the Art Association of Montreal last night, in dealing with the more extreme forms of 20th century art and their content.

The eye, he stated, had become accustomed to certain things in painting. It looked at a particular work of art; it was pleased because the painting reminded it of something—it was real. On the other hand, in many cases, the eye viewed a modern cubistic painting with the immediate reaction: "Why, it's absurd! It isn't real. I never saw such a thing."

Mr. Abbott had his answer ready. He threw on the screen several lantern slides of modern abstract paintings, apparently meaningless and apparently without reality. "And now," he stated, "I will show you photographs from real life, and they, surely, should be simple to understand." His first photograph would have been a perfect abstract painting. It was, however, a photograph looking up a flight of stairs. His second was a view from a bridge—again it might have been a modern painting. The third was the last and the best. It depicted, according to the eye, a quiet June day, with billowy white clouds in the skies and trees dotting the landscape.

"This," said Mr. Abbott, "seems quite easy to understand. It reminds you of a quiet summer day in the country. You can see the tall, mighty trees before your eyes. But what is reality? In this photograph you are really looking at ground being blown up by dynamite in the western part of this continent. The trees are the eruption of earth. Reality? Well—"

The individual needs to know the history of 20th century painting to understand it, Mr. Abbott stated. He must first know the story of its progression, and then break the eye from its trained expectancy of certain things in art.

The lecturer followed the progression of painting through several periods to its abstract end-points. He illustrated his talk with a series of lantern slides.

Dr. J. W. A. Hickson was in the chair. The meeting was held in Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street.

(Canadian Press Cable.)
London, January 6.—Cecil Aldin, the well known artist, died today. He won wide recognition for his drawings of dogs. He was 64 years of age.

BRITISH ART SHOW OPENS AT OTTAWA

Jan. 4/35. Star.
Collection Representative of Contemporary Artists on Exhibition

OTTAWA, Jan. 4.—(C. P.)—Catholicity of expression, embracing all the academic and modern tradition in art, yet the whole stamped with a restraint, or an insularity if you will, which divides it from similar American or European work, mark the exhibition of contemporary British painting which was opened here last night, in the absence of the Governor-General, by Lady Bessborough, at a reception in the National Gallery of Canada.

The paintings, 86 in number, which have been brought from Great Britain by the National Gallery, will form a travelling collection to be circulated among the principal cities of Canada during the coming year.

ALL SCHOOLS SEEN

This loan exhibition is genuinely representative of art in the United Kingdom today. The Academy is included, and so are the young men and the experimentalists, those who like geometry in design, or those who prefer stimulus from the novel patterns of dream symbolism.

One sees a half century of art history in three rooms. The romantic figure groups that were of the days of Burne-Jones and Rossetti survive in a picture like "Persephone" by Harry Morley. The subdued, linear designs of Whistler continue in the work of James Pryde and the delights of the impressionist palette are justly conveyed in the canvases of James McBeay.

The Scottish are much to the fore for Glasgow, in the 20th century has been the home of many conscious Modernists. The influence of Post-Impressionism has been strong in the North, and, true to the historic predictions of their race, J. B. Ferguson and S. J. Peploe have sought in spiration in the scenery of France which they have depicted in planes of pure color, a technique adapted directly from the French master Cezanne.

MODERNIST TOUCH STRONG

The English have come even further into the present. Many of them have concentrated on the decorative use of color. An expressive line that unites broad patches of brilliant reds and blues is possessed by Matthew Smith. Vanessa Bell and Duncan Grant have, from the French Modernists, adapted much but they have also created much that is original to themselves. Duncan Grant, in his decorative compositions, uses a heavy impasto, a green that is as lush as English grass, and in his landscape, "The Farm Pond, near Firle, Sussex," has obtained an amazing quality of recession.

John Nash, who loves the English countryside with a sober, unchanging love, has two pictures, in flat pattern and clear line, glimpses of Somerset scenery. His straight, clean draughtsmanship reminds one slightly that he is a brother of Paul Nash, the painter with the fertile brain, and who here turns from geometry in the landscape, "Rye Marshes," to a gentle rearrangement of objects, "Siren," done in a super-realist fashion.

The most facile of all British artists, Augustus John, has on exhibition his well-known portrait of Sir Robert Borden, and also a still life, "Cyclamen," a canvas that brilliantly demonstrates John's consummate virtuosity.

Pastels by
F. Hennessey
At Eaton's

A very admirable simplicity of method is one of the outstanding and most attractive features of the pictures by Frank Hennessey, A.R.C.A., which are now being shown in Eaton's galleries. All of them are Canadian landscapes and almost all of them are in pastel, and they are full of color which in many cases suggested more than actually given.

In some of these pictures there are fine blues of water and distant hills; one view in the Gatineau Hills is a good example; in some others there are gay color effects, as in the excellent study of a harvest field at evening, the picture of Big Whitefish Lake, with its lights on the water and rocks, and in two bigger pictures of autumn yellows and reds in the Gatineau valley. But even more striking than these are the many pictures in which very little positive color is used and a great deal of color effect got with the use chiefly of browns, greys and white.

There are a number of good studies of broken surfaces of snow and some very skillful contrasts of the whites of snow and sky in the picture of a church in a wide snow covered valley, in the "Field in March," in "Evening at Eagle Depot," in which the snow on the ground and on the roofs and the sky are all white with their own qualities, and in many others. The little picture called "A day in Spring" is a very good study of patches of snow among trees on a half bare hill-side, and a delightful picture, "Evening light," is of a little river between grassy banks, which seems to be full of color. Others in which simplicity is especially successful are "The Lakeside" and "Logging Mill," while "Abandoned camp," "Logging dam" and "The skidway" have rather more detail but never more than the picture needs. There are nearly sixty pictures in the collection with something good in all of them.

The Old Art
And the New

The earnest student of the newer methods in all arts must often be troubled by the fact that the champions of these methods are so much inclined to offer excuses rather than reasons for their faith. Mr. Jere Abbott, who lectured to the Art Association of Montreal on Monday evening, is the director of the Smith College Museum at Northampton, Mass., and was formerly at the head of the Modern Museum in New York, and, with an evidently robust faith, he treated the question of new methods boldly. He started by posing two questions—"Why is there so much dissension about painting in the twentieth century?" and "Why is visual unintelligibility so annoying?"—he held that auditory unintelligibility is less annoying, which must be considered doubtful. He certainly discussed his two questions, even if he did not give any conclusive answers to them.

Mr. Abbott's subject was called "Traditional aspects of Twentieth Century Painting," and he made it his business to try to appease the dissensions and abate the annoyance, which are produced by some modern painting, by pointing out that everything in it can be shown to be of the same kind as things which were done in the past. Old Chinese pictures, with their distinctive principles of perspective, pictures by Mantegna, fabulous animals by Jerome Bosch, and many other older works were called into service and compared with modern works. The question of reality, which many people can not find in modern work, was illustrated by photographs of staircases and bridges taken from unusual view-points and other photographs. Mr. Abbott did in point of fact show that even modern abstractions can be proved to differ more in degree than in kind from much old and accepted work.

As a survey of its subject the lecture left little or nothing to be desired, but what Mr. Abbott succeeded in making clear was that there is no very good reason why a modern painter should not paint abstractions or other mysteries if he chooses to do so, and that a parallel can be found in older art of many countries. But this, while it may be a perfectly valid excuse, does not seem to be a convincing reason why some of the newest pictures should be painted.

News of Art
In Montreal

An exhibition of American art is to be opened at the Art Association of Montreal next Saturday afternoon, January 12th, and a preview for members will be held on Friday evening.

The exhibition is in two sections. One of these is called Contemporary Paintings by Artists of the United States, and the pictures in this have been selected by a committee appointed by the Carnegie Foundation. The other section is of Contemporary American Prints, and has been gathered by E. Weyhe and Co., of New York. In both sections there is work by some of the younger and less conventional artists and the exhibition is understood to represent some of the newest kinds of American art. The collection is being circulated among the principal Canadian art galleries by the National Gallery of Canada.

An exhibition of Canadian water colours by Henry Simpkins will be shown at the Watson Art Galleries, Sherbrooke St., W., for two weeks from next Saturday, Jan. 12th.

The photographs in the Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art, which were recently shown at the Art Association, have been removed to the galleries of Henry Morgan and Co., where they will be shown for about a week.

Museum Curator Asks Citizens Not to Destroy Pistols in Their Homes

REGISTRATION PROBLEM

Loss of Valuable Relics Feared in View of Dislike of Many to Be Involved in Red Tape

Don't destroy your old pistols and revolvers—send them to E. Lionel Judah, secretary of the Museums Committee of McGill University.

This plea was addressed yesterday to Montrealers who are contemplating disposing of their ancient weapons because it is too much trouble to register them with the Provincial authorities.

Mr. Judah, who was found in his office fondly fingering a 150-year-old double-barrelled, self-priming, flint-lock pistol, made by Derringer in Cornhill, London, England, admitted that he was also seeking the co-operation of Chief Maurice Lalonde, of the Provincial Police, and Fernand Dufresne, head of the Montreal Police Department.

"This pistol," Mr. Judah said, referring to the one in his hand, "was sent to me by L. A. Renaud, of the Chateau de Ramezay. If other Montrealers will do likewise, McGill University will be glad to register them and place them in its museums."

"You know," he smiled, "I am now in the rogues' gallery! I have had to take out a permit to carry a revolver, in case the police should find me carrying around a rusty, century-old flint-lock. So, I've had my photograph taken, and I've been finger-printed. Now that that is over, I'm busy registering all our museum pistols, guns and other weapons."

ASKS FOR CO-OPERATION.

To prove that he was anxious to add to McGill's collection of weapons, Mr. Judah exhibited a copy of a letter which he has sent to Chief Lalonde, reading as follows:

"I understand that there are many people who wish to have their pistols and revolvers destroyed, and I would very much like to know whether it would be possible for you to suggest that these weapons be presented to the Museum here at McGill University. We are trying to make a collection of the various types of pistols and revolvers. You can readily understand that, with the present amendment to the Criminal Code coming into effect, in a few years it will be very difficult to get a representative collection of this sort of thing. I would, therefore, ask your co-operation in this matter."

He said that a similar letter would go forward to Director Dufresne, of the municipal police.

A Lecturer
On Art and Education

The place of art in everyday life and more particularly its function in modern education will be the theme of a series of addresses to be delivered this winter by J. F. Barton, headmaster of the Bristol Grammar School, England. Mr. Barton will reach Canada this month and will travel across the Dominion for the National Gallery of Canada, which last year arranged a similar tour by W. G. Constable, who was then director of the Courtauld Institute of Art in London.

"I am going to Canada with two aims, in general, in mind," said Mr. Barton, discussing his forthcoming tour. "The first is to indicate in my addresses the meaning of art and its broad application to the purposes of life, or, more simply, the place of art in everyday life. The second is to stress the function of art in modern education and, I hope, to be able to point out in concrete

National Gallery Trustees in Annual Report Recommend Permanent Building

(By The Canadian Press.)

Ottawa, January 20.—Reporting that interest in art in Canada is at its highest point in history, the trustees of the National Gallery of Canada in their annual report emphasize the necessity of providing a permanent building for the gallery "which would safeguard the National Art treasures and form a monument on Canadian art."

The report of the trustees was signed by H. S. Southam, of Ottawa, chairman, and presented to the House of Commons Friday by Minister of Public Works, H. A. Stewart.

The trustees declare "such a building would at the same time permit the exhibition of the Canadian war memorials collection, which is now in its 15th year of storage, while the interest in the deeds and events it illustrates are still acutely remembered by the public."

Canada lags behind the other Dominions in respect to a gallery building, the trustees say, and that Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have all recognized the importance of the arts by building national institutions for their housing, teaching and study.

Jan. 7/35 THE NEW PISTOL LAW

THE NEW Dominion law regarding the possession of firearms has caused a good deal of confusion in the public mind, as witness the predicament of those in charge of the city's museums, who do not know whether or not they should register antique firearms in their possession.

While the law in this respect has yet to be defined, it may be as well to restate the broad effect of the newly-adopted amendments to the criminal law.

Under the law as it now stands, no person in Canada may lawfully possess a pistol or revolver unless it has been registered with the police; and, except in his home or place of business, no person may carry a firearm capable of concealment, or convey it in any vehicle of which he is in control or of which he is an occupant, without a police permit.

Sentence of five years in prison awaits the violator.

The stipulated penalty for other crimes is increased by not less than two years if a gun is found on the offender when arrested.

While organized crime has not yet evolved to the terrific efficiency attained in the United States, lawless raiders in speedy cars have made sporadic appearances.

By the new law, Canada is taking early action to halt a growing menace.

One effect will be that any shooting gangsters who are discouraged by the prospect of an intensified campaign against crime in the United States will think twice before contemplating emigration to Canada.

Montreal Artist Shows Excellent Watercolors in Watson Art Galleries

VARIED SUBJECTS SHOWN

Good Draughtsmanship and Sound Color Sense and Vigorous Treatment Revealed in Works Displayed

Henry Simpkins, of Montreal, who last year was awarded the Jessie Dow Prize for watercolors, is holding his first "one-man" show in this city at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. A regular exhibitor during the past few years at the spring shows of the Art Association of Montreal, Mr. Simpkins has a chance on the present occasion of displaying a greater variety of subjects and revealing an impressive command over this difficult medium. Around half a hundred works are on view and throughout a high standard is set.

This young painter handles watercolor with vigor and decision, and his work is in the best tradition—fluid washes of clean transparent color laid on with freedom and left alone. In his winter landscapes the heavy paper is left white and the effect of snow is thereby attained with a crispness and sparkle that would be impossible with white paint. In fact, throughout all the works there is an absence of body color, save where in the very nature of the colors used there is now and then a suggestion of the opaque. This treatment of the medium leads to the avoidance of muddiness and results in work that is decisive and clean.

HAPPY IN SELECTION.

In the selection of his subjects Mr. Simpkins is usually happy. He is not concerned with distorting nature to make a pattern. Beyond a perfectly legitimate elimination of non-essentials and simplification in design the scene seen is the scene painted, and the collection on view indicates that Canadian subjects are distinctly congenial and have been interpreted with sympathy. Viewing these works strengthens the conviction that here is a worker in watercolor who faces a promising future.

To even those who have, as it were, "dabbled" in watercolor there will come the realization that the seeming simplicity of these paintings hides a lot of hard work—selection, arrangement, attainment of harmonies and control of fluid washes, yet in none is there a hint of labor. In effect they are clean, crisp and spontaneous—masses of color put in with a broad touch, without fussiness and niggling detail. The values are just and the forms right, for, without insistence, the drawing is there. Mr. Simpkins shows courage in electing to work in a medium which, strangely, is appreciated chiefly by the discerning connoisseur and collector, but it is clear that he is sympathetic to it, and it is encouraging to note that both in Canada and in the United States its importance is becoming more generally recognized.

There is a refreshing variety about the examples shown—the painter's brush has been busy in many places and in varying seasons. There is a crisp impression of carriages awaiting fares in "The Cab Stand, Sherbrooke Street," and another Montreal "bit" is a view of the City Hall, Nelson's column and umbrella-sheltered carts in Jacques Cartier Square. Of Quebec there are "Sous le Cap," showing the narrow thoroughfare and old buildings, with a line of washing out to dry; and "Lower Town"—houses in sunlight and shadow beneath the buildings on the heights. Trees in sunlight fringe the arched bridge in "Old Mill, Ste. Therese," and quaint houses and old willows at Ste. Therese make pattern with their shadows in "Early Morning." "The Camp"—two tents set among birches splashed with sunlight excite a desire for the chance to live that way, and "The Farm Yard," with its barn and foraging fowl, is sunlit and warm.

Fox River has proved a fruitful sketching ground, where the shacks, carts and boats have supplied good material. In this group are "The Beach," and "The Little Bridge." From Gaspe, too, are some capital items—"Windy Day," and a large painting of men working at tables on the beach gutting fish.

LURE OF LAURENTIANS.

The Laurentians have another sympathetic interpreter in Mr. Simpkins who has found beauty in many places. A lovely limpid sky marks "Sundown near Piedmont," and the majesty of the hills is well suggested in "Twilight, Rouge River," with its barns, ploughed land and high banks edging the stream. Bark Lake is shown beneath a spacious sky in which storm clouds gather, and rolling, cultivated country is shown in

"Arundel Valley." Noble elms tower above a haycart in the sunny "Late Afternoon, Arundel," and a motorboat disturbs the water in "The Narrows, Bark Lake." Wooded rocky shores in sunlight and shadow edge the blue water in "The Gorge, Rouge River," and the force of that stream is shown in the tumble of white water below the rocks, on which lumbermen are picking out stranded logs, in the work entitled "Logging, Rouge River." From this country come "Mirror Lake, Montfort," "Habitant Homestead," "Late Fall, Rouge River," "The Falls, Labelle," "St. Mary's Falls, Montfort," "Evening, Deer Lake," and "Expectation"—an angler standing on a rock trying his luck in a lake backed by rolling hills.

Equally effective is the painter when he tackles a wood interior, and he touches a high point in "A Summer Glade"—a deer and fawn amidst trees in sunlight and shadow. It is a very real impression and suggests to the spectator that he has suddenly "come on" this scene. Another wood interior that urges an immediate inspection of the fly book is "Trout Water"—trees, rocks and patches of white water that look highly promising.

The hills in winter—that season of unblemished loveliness when the absence of foliage reveals a hundred unsuspected notches and gullies, have made strong appeal to Mr. Simpkins, and his industry is evident in some fine examples of the Laurentian area. "After a Snowfall, Morin Heights"—a cluster of spruces under snow is a true impression of a sunny winter day. The snow clings to the foliage of the evergreens in odd shapes and overhead is a clear sky of lovely blue. Range on range of wooded hills flushed by the sun make an attractive scene of "Early Morning, Morin Heights," and sunlit birches and spruce with distant hills are the pictorial elements of "February Afternoon, near Morin Heights." Shacks, barrels and men at work, with a team of horses and trees throwing blue shadows on the snow make a good composition of "The Sugar Camp."

Henry Simpkins, who was born in Winnipeg, studied at the Winnipeg School of Art, and, in 1928, went to England and France on a tour of study. He returned to Montreal in 1930 and commenced to exhibit here and in Ottawa and Toronto. He is a member of the Canadian Society of Water Color Painters.

According to present plans the exhibition will close January 23.

J. E. Barton, English Authority, Finds Change in Present Century

The idea behind art education is not to create geniuses but to promote intelligent interest in the aesthetic side of life, J. E. Barton, of Bristol, England, internationally-known authority on art, stated Tuesday night in an interview here.

Mr. Barton was met by reporters on the platform of Montreal West station, where he switched from the Empress of Australia boat special to the Ottawa train. He will tour Canada under the auspices of the National Gallery of Canada, in accordance with the Gallery's policy of spreading art education and appreciation in Canada. He speaks in Ottawa tomorrow, and in Montreal on Friday before the Art Association of Montreal.

There is a difference between the art of today and that of the 19th century, when art and industry were completely divorced. At that time art was nice but not necessary. Today it is something bound-up with everyday life.

As an example of art in industry, Mr. Barton drew attention to the modern automobile. The introduction of art into car design, he stated, had not only made the automobile easier to look at, but also easier to sell.

"The business man, who is apt to say he knows nothing about art, is the one who is really creating it in this present-day world of ours," Mr. Barton told his interviewers.

The English art authority has done distinguished work for the British Broadcasting Company, and while in Canada will deliver several brief addresses over the network of the Canadian Radio Commission.

JAMES E. BARTON, internationally known British art authority and headmaster of the Bristol Grammar School, will arrive in Montreal from Ottawa this evening to lecture at 8:15 p.m., before the Art Association of Montreal on "The Gothic Age in England."

Ottawa Citizen, Nov. 7/34

Contemporary U.S. Painting Shown At National Gallery

CHARACTERISTIC of the country whence it sprang is the exhibition of contemporary paintings by artists of the United States which was opened at the National Gallery yesterday afternoon. It is vigorous and purposeful, diversified and contrasting, and also a little garish and chaotic. It strongly reflects what has been called "the American scene," and that scene being so wide and dissimilar, the canvases themselves are wide in subject and dissimilar in ideas and treatment.

This sense of diversity in aim and feeling is the first thing that impresses the visitor. There is no sense of unity or nationalism in the exhibition such as one finds in a Canadian show. This is probably in its favor, and yet there is missing an element that robs it of distinction as a whole. There is no lack of technical achievement nor of vital ideas, however. There is the "will to paint" written over a large part of the show, and very many examples of talent that has something to say and that says it without effort. The trouble with other works, however, is that they are well enough done but somehow do not rise above a struggling immaturity.

THERE are sharp influences visible in a good many of the paintings, and these influences are modern French. Derivative trends are especially evident in the work of the younger artists, and Cezanne, Matisse, Pissarro and Gauguin are the spiritual fathers of many of the items, some very striking, on display. The older painters are more "American" in their solidity and strength.

Americans go in much for realism in their figure studies, and this is a stimulating characteristic of the present exhibition. There are also tendencies to what the more moderate onlookers will describe as freakishness, but whatever the right view of these is, there is nothing downright blatant. In landscape work there is not a great deal that reveals freshness of view, and in this field Canada can show to decided advantage. Yet one or two artists stand out for their sense of color and atmosphere.

A TOUR through the half dozen galleries which contain the two hundred pieces (including the special exhibition of prints) will reveal a score of striking efforts. Leon Kroll's "Barbara" is a thing of quiet and rhythmic beauty. In the same room is John Carroll's "Reclining Figure," a startling conception with psychological overtones and abstract qualities. This will be denounced and defended. Umberto Romano's "Psyche and the Sculpture" is a work of strange implications and unusual treatment.

There are several nudes, and the outstanding one is Bernard Karfoff's "Seated Nude," a capably contrived figure with a superb head and masterly line arrangement. Katherine Schmidt's "Eve" is an echo of Renoir, in which the Renoir roundness is attained but not the Renoir radiance. Yasuo Kuniyoshi's famous "Circus Ball Rider" is here, though close inspection does not quite fulfil expectations. Eugene Speicher's "Cowboy" is in this artist's best manner—firm and competent and finely organized. The modern touch is found in Marguerite Zorach's "Old Mrs. Smith," a fine characterization even though its style is somewhat radical.

Paul Sample's "Barber Shop" is a pleasing item, nor should John Sloan's "Drying Their Hair," Lauren Ford's child study, "The Big Parade," Guy Pene du Bois's "Chanticleer," and Thomas Benton's racy "Missouri Musicians" be overlooked.

AMONG the comparatively few landscapes, Georgina Klitgaard's "Spring Morning" discloses itself as about the finest in the collection. Its color is sensitive, the composition skilful, and the whole conception is carried out with vitality and sureness. Stefan Hirsch's "Mexico" is vivid and perfectly suggests that country even to one who has never been there. Jonas Lie's "Returning Sardinians" is notable as from the able brush of a well-known painter.

Luigi Lucioni's "Arrangement of Light" is decorative in an original sense and is so appealingly painted that it stands out among the still lifes. Another expert work is Dorothy Varian's "Still Life With Duck," notable for its effective color arrangement.

THE EXHIBITION of contemporary American prints being held in connection with the exhibition of paintings is a stimulating collection and well worth study. Again there is the same diversity of mood and subject and the same vigor and directness. This display of prints comes from Messrs. E. Weyhe and Company of New York.

For the paintings, the National Gallery is indebted to the Carnegie Corporation of New York, which appointed a committee to select the works included. It is an exhibition, therefore, chosen by competent hands and representative in scope. After the opening exhibition in Ottawa, the collection will move to other cities in Canada and eventually will tour the British Empire.

PAINTINGS OF SEA BY GEORGE G. FOX

Gazette Jan. 31/35
Exhibition at Scott's Reveals Skill in Depicting Water in Varying Moods

If there is any melancholy in the thought that George G. Fox never had a one-man show in his lifetime, there is certainly no melancholy in the paintings that hang on the walls of the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, 1490 Drummond street, in the one-man show that came after his death. George Fox was a Montreal business man who painted for relaxation and who, when he was freed from the cares of business, turned to his hobby with an even greater zest. Yet, for all that painting was an escape, there is little of the amateur to be seen in his canvases.

George Fox loved the sea and he painted it in full sunlight and in fog, in its boisterous moods and when calm reigned. As painting that has for its purpose the recognition and celebration of a well-liked scene, this painting is successful. To see it, must bring nostalgia to people who know the Atlantic shore, especially to those who have an affection for Grand Manan—woody rocks and boats softened by the tints of early morning fog; racy seas churning white after storm; the tide, full and complacent in the cove; glassy green waves, caught as they rise in the sun, before they collapse and go frothing to shore; spume flying; the meeting of sky and water. There are a few small sketches of boats and houses; bright spots, some of them, but the painter was happier repeating the motion and color of the unquiet ocean.

The show will be on view until Friday of next week, when it gives place to the work of Dorothy Stevens of Toronto. Another current show at Scott's is a small group of distinguished water-colors by Russell, Sir D. J. Cameron and McBey.

BRITISH LECTURER AT ART ASSOCIATION

Star Jan. 19/35
Gothic Architecture Is Praised In Address

Hailing the 13th century gothic construction period as "an age of spiritual awakening," J. E. Barton, art lecturer of the British Broadcasting Corporation, made a staunch defence of this type of architecture against many criticisms levelled at it from time to time, before the Art Association of Montreal, last night.

In the course of a profusely illustrated lecture, he explained the technical advantages of the gothic style, particularly in regard to vaulting and disposed of the erroneous theory that England's cathedrals and those of other European countries had been built by gangs of roving workmen, by showing two cathedrals completed at the same time, thus rendering their construction by the same people impossible.

Lincoln, Gloucester and Exeter were freely used by the speaker, in explaining to his audience the development of the various features of gothic art, such as bosses, traceries and windows, following the original acceptance of the great, powerful printed frames which had made possible so many improvements, especially in ecclesiastical construction.

PAINTINGS ON VIEW

Select Collection Being Shown in Print Room

A selection of paintings from the collection of Dr. and Mrs. John L. Todd has been lent to the Art Association of Montreal during their residence abroad. The paintings which are now on view in the Print Room are examples of Maris, Corot, Lhermitte, Fantin-Latour, F. Roybet, Henri Harpignies, Monticelli, Mauve, J. Pettie, Jose Weiss, Diaz, Th. de Bock, Marchetti, Constable, Troyon and Van Marcke.

S. Minister Gratified That Canada And His Country Are Joining In Another Interest

Distinguished Gathering at National Gallery of Canada For Formal Opening of Display of Contemporary American Painting. Chairman of Board Warmly Thanks Those Who Made Exhibition Possible.

Warm satisfaction that the United States and Canada are joining in yet another interest, that of art, was expressed by Hon. Warren Delano Robbins, United States minister, in formally opening the exhibition of contemporary American painting at the National Gallery of Canada yesterday afternoon. The exhibition, which is on loan from the Carnegie Corporation of New York during a tour of the British dominions, will continue at the Gallery for the ensuing month.

H. S. Southam, chairman of the board of trustees, welcomed Mr. Robbins and a large and distinguished company for the opening of the exhibition. Voicing the hope of the board that the exhibition will give Canadians an opportunity to discover artistic trends in the United States and compare them with those in Canada, Mr. Southam extended the hearty appreciation of the board to Hon. Hugh A. Stewart, K.C., minister of public works, who was present, for his continued sympathy with the work of the Gallery which operates under that department of government.

Among those present for the opening were Mrs. Robbins, Mrs. Stewart, Mrs. Southam, Sir George and Lady Perley, Lady Pope, Hon. I. M. Tokugawa, Japanese minister, Hon. Raymond Brugere, French minister, Eric Brown, director, and H. O. McCurry, assistant director.

Happy Brotherhood.

"I am very happy to assist at the opening of the exhibition of contemporary American painting which is here today as a loan by the Carnegie Corporation," Mr. Robbins began. "It has been my joy to visit this lovely Gallery on several occasions and to admire quietly and at my leisure the beautiful collection that you have here."

"I feel that there is a brotherhood among artists and those artists who have mastered their subjects in Italy, Spain, France and in the Americas, feel that they have amongst them an understanding," Mr. Robbins continued. "It seems to me that this understanding, this brotherhood is happy and healthy and the fact that the Carnegie Corporation is sending this very fine collection of paintings to Canada will be worth while."

"I have seen many of the paintings done by your Canadians: Kriehoff, Paul Kane, Paul Peel, Tom Thompson, Ernest Fosbery and Franklin Brownell, who, strange to say, was an old Massachusetts man and from my home town in New Bedford. You have something in your art in Canada which appeals to me and something which one does not find in all countries. There is that simplicity, virility and purity in your painting, which, I think, represents the people of Canada."

"This is not a moment for speech-making," Mr. Robbins concluded

Formally Opens Display Of American Painting

HON. WARREN D. ROBBINS, U.S. Minister to Canada.

"It is merely a moment for giving thanks that the two countries are joining in another interest—that of art. This is merely an occasion for me to declare open this exposition and to give you my heartiest good wishes."

Deeply Grateful.

Mr. Southam extended a welcome, on behalf of the board of administration of the Gallery, to all present. He predicted that the exhibition, depending on one's approach to it, would prove interesting, stimulating, amazing, and he thanked the Carnegie Corporation, under Mr. F. P. Keppel, its distinguished president, for having selected the pictures and having underwritten the entire expenses of the exhibition tour throughout the British dominions. "This exhibition is just another evidence of the co-operation extended by the Carnegie Corporation to the board for which we are deeply grateful," he added.

"There is no doubt this exhibition will reveal two facts," Mr. Southam went on. "First that contemporary American painting is definitely modernistic, so called, and second that contemporary painting in Canada which we consider modernistic is more conservative and, perhaps, old fashioned in comparison."

Mr. Southam thanked Mr. and Mrs. Stewart and Sir George and Lady Perley for their presence and interest in the Gallery.

Tea was later served on the second floor of the Gallery, the long buffet tables being effectively adorned with crystal vases containing yellow chrysanthemums.

American Pictures And Prints

In this country, or at least in this part of it, we see far more of the work of European painters than of those who live just to the south of us, and we know generally very little of what they are doing. It was therefore a wise idea for the National Gallery of Canada to get for circulation in the Dominion a collection of pictures which represents the newest American painting and this is now being shown at the Art Association of Montreal. That it is representative is fairly guaranteed by the manner of its selection, by a committee appointed by the Carnegie Corporation of New York, and by the fact that plans are being made for showing it in other British dominions.

As the catalogue shows, about one-quarter of the contributors to this exhibition were born outside of the United States, but nearly all of them had training in America. There is, however, nothing which indicates the existence of any American school of painting; the diversity and inequality of the work is remarkable, even when one allows for the fact that 99 painters is a large number to represent any country. A great many of the pictures are evident imitations of the work of other, generally French, painters, and there are several attempts, not too successful, to follow Renoir and Cezanne; there is one example of Japanese and one apparently of Persian influence.

There is not a large number of outstandingly good pictures, and some of the best known painters, such as Jonas Lie and Rokwell Kent are represented, but not by the best of their work. The exhibition is unlike most Canadian exhibitions in the relative scarcity of landscapes, and most of the best pictures are portraits or figure subjects, among which are to be found examples of realism and of some other isms, including even cubism. Of several of the nudes and other figure subjects it would be hard to say if the painting or the models are the uglier, and there are signs here and there of a truly modern cultivation of ugliness for its own sake.

The prints, which are exhibited downstairs in the print room, have been chosen by Messrs. E. Weyhe & Co., of New York, and are evidently as representative as the pictures upstairs. There are a hundred of them in a variety of processes, with lithography predominating. There are works by many of the best American artists, many of them are very good, while others are surprising or eccentric, and the whole collection is well worth seeing.

Canadian and West Indian Landscapes

Harold Beament has at the Continental Galleries on St. Catherine street the best exhibition of his work that he has given here. The pictures, most of them landscapes, have been painted in the West Indies and in Canada, and the West Indian scenes are particularly attractive partly perhaps because they are less familiar. A big picture of bright sunlight and shadow on a group of figures, "Sponge Trimmers, Nassau," is one of the best things in the exhibition, and just as good are "Among the Banyans," of figures and tree trunks in strong sunshine, and "Puerto Rican Arrangement," a gay picture of hills and a valley in greens and yellows. Having seen the light in the West Indies, Mr. Beament seems to have brought some of it back with him for the enrichment of his Canadian landscapes. There is some fine light and color in "Smoky Dusk, Rouge River Valley," in "From a Hilltop, Otter Lake," in "Spring Morning" and "Afternoon, Otter Lake." In contrast with these, "Pearly Light, Autumn" is a delicate pattern in yellows and greys. "Silvery Winter" is a striking effect in greys and white, and "Coastal Rhythm" is mostly in greys. Among the best of the pictures of winter are "Covered Bridge, Laurentians," "Winter Stillness," a study of snow and brown trees, and "Spring Ice." There are some interesting studies of heads and a number of good, small sketches.

ART OF WOOD CUT TO BE ILLUSTRATED

The Women's Art Society meets in Stevenson Hall on Tuesday morning, January 22, at 11 o'clock, when the lecturer will be Miss Kathleen M. Fenwick. Her subject "Wood Cuts and Wood Engraving" will be illustrated with lantern slides. Miss Fenwick has been for seven years with the department of prints and engravings in the National Gallery at Ottawa. Before coming to Canada from England she was on the staff of Goldsmith's College, University of London. She studied in London, Paris, and Florence, and made a special study of prints and drawings at the British Museum and the Victoria and Albert Mu-

A Show of Water Colours By H. Simpkins

Water color painting, happily, continues to progress in Canada. The work of Henry Simpkins, formerly of Winnipeg, has been conspicuous among the good work in several recent exhibitions here, and a collection of his water colors, which is now being shown at the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke St., gives a good opportunity of appreciating it. The pictures in this collection are all of scenes in Eastern Canada,—in the Laurentians and in Gaspé and are as remarkable for their charm as pictures as for the sureness and directness of their painting. There are a few large ones, of a size which is generally too big for water colour, but two of these are particularly good ones,—a beautiful piece of quiet evening colour in "Twilight, Rouge River" and a fine effect of light and space in a view over snow-covered hills at Morin Heights. There are many other good things in the exhibition—an excellent sunset at Piedmont, some very pleasant street corners in Quebec, Montreal and Ste. Therese, a study of drifting mist against a hillside at Mont St. Pierre, a picture of boats and houses at Fox River, and a Habitant Homestead full of quiet, rich colour, which help to make up an unusually attractive collection.

Pictures of Dancers by Henri Fabien

Exhibitions in which figure pictures are the chief feature are unusual here; an exhibition of this kind, of work by Henri Fabien of Ottawa, is now on view in the gallery of W. Scott and Sons on Drummond street. In his search for good figure subjects Mr. Fabien has found them among dancers, and nearly all of the pictures in this exhibition are of dancers, still young enough to be slim and light, in stage dresses and dancing poses. They have given him opportunities for much excellent drawing and painting, though the painting is, in some cases, so exact and careful as to produce a certain stiffness. The largest of them is the picture of a nude dancer which was shown at the Spring Exhibition, and there are many smaller ones which are admirable studies of pose and balance. A small nude figure is remarkable for its painting of flesh and draperies, and two larger nudes have skillful and interesting contrasts of red fire light and whiter light to show off the truth of their drawing and modelling.

There are a few landscapes in the exhibition, a pleasant interior of a habitation house, a few very good, small flower pictures and two particularly good pictures of fruit, but the figure pictures are both more interesting and more important.

News of Art In Canada

A lecture will be given at the Art Association of Montreal next Friday evening, January 18th, at 8.15, by J. E. Barton, Art Lecturer of the British Broadcasting Corporation, who is making a lecture tour in Canada for the National Gallery of Canada. He will speak on "The Gothic Age in England," a subject on which he is considered to be an authority.

The Cooling Galleries of London are holding an exhibition at the Johnson Art Galleries, St. Catherine street, of pictures, chiefly by British artists of the nineteenth century, with some examples of the work of European and Canadian painters. Among the many painters represented are W. Collins, W. Mulready, E. W. Cooke, Sir James Linton, Yeend King, Leonard Richmond, Dudley Hardy, Sir David Murray, and C. Napier Hemy. Attendance at this exhibition last Saturday is said to have beaten all records, for density, in the history of Montreal art shows.

Three works by modern French painters have just been bought by the Toronto Art Gallery. These are a head of a child, "Portrait de Claude," by Renoir, a landscape, "La Seine a Chatou," by Renoir, and a still life, "La Table Garnie," by Pierre Bonnard. These pictures were all in the exhibition of modern French pictures which was held recently here at Scott's galleries.

GOTHIC PERIOD IN BUILDING DEFENDED

Gazette Jan. 19/35 J. E. Barton, English Art

Lecturer, Finds 13th Century Golden Age

ILLUSTRATES ASSERTION

Puts Building Specimens on Screen to Support Contention Masons of England Were Inspired

Attacking the prevalent legend that Gothic architecture is of "feverish," over-decorative nature, J. E. Barton, art lecturer of the British Broadcasting Corporation, praised 13th century Gothic art as the expression of "an age of spiritual awakening" in northern countries in an address to the Art Association of Montreal last night. His lecture, profusely illustrated with lantern slides, opened a tour which Mr. Barton is making through Canadian and American cities. Misconceptions of the Gothic arise, in his opinion, from later examples which, on the Continent especially, tend to "cleverness" in decorative schemes. He quoted the words of a critic: "English Gothic architecture ended in a cucumber frame; Continental Gothic in a wedding cake."

Mr. Barton concerned himself with England, and several pictures of Tudor masonry showed what was meant by the "cucumber frame" metaphor—tracery designs had by 1500 become formal, dignified and completely uninspired. A few views of French and Flemish cathedrals illustrated, at the same time, the "wedding cake" development.

But the speaker's selection of photographs of 13th century English buildings bore out his claim that this was the Golden Age of English masonry. He began by showing specimens of 12th century churches—the Romanesque style, borrowed directly from Rome and, in England, usually the work of Norman architects in monastic buildings. The Roman arch was the distinguishing feature here.

In sharp contrast were the buildings erected less than a century later—pointed arches, lofty central vaults with the tension ingeniously converged at single points and supported by arrangements of buttresses, were the outstanding features of "a whole new world in both structural and decorative design." The new fashion was observable not only in cathedrals but even in small parish churches, a few of which survive. In some cathedrals, notably Lincoln, both types exist side by side—the change had been effected while the great buildings were being completed.

ARCH CHANGED TREN

An engineering innovation, he pointed out, was directly responsible for the new design. The pointed arch, and all other distinguishing characteristics of the Gothic, sprang from the discovery of practicable means for erecting a high central vault, or fireproof lining, in ecclesiastical buildings. Romanesque arches were heavy, cemented masses; it was possible to vault aisles, but the high arch over the nave presented insuperable engineering difficulties. With the discovery of the Gothic arch and the consequent possibility of erecting powerful frameworks, this problem was solved. The Gothic vault was built on the plan of an umbrella, and so contrived as to throw the strain only at certain points.

Then, by a long series of detailed views taken in such famous cathedrals as Gloucester, Exeter and Lincoln, the speaker proceeded to show the gradual development of Gothic incidentals—window structures, traceries, carved bosses and the like.

He stressed the fact that while the Romanesque buildings had been the work of a small monastic group, Gothic architecture was the result of communal effort. In no age before or since had there been such numbers of British masons capable of following a general design with such individual skill. He exploded the myth that 13th century buildings were chiefly the work of "travelling gangs" of masons, by showing two cathedrals finished simultaneously. Each was a perfect example of a different type of work, and the time factor made it obvious that different masons had been responsible for that work.

MORGAN TO SELL SIX OLD MASTERS

Portraits Among Those to Go

NEW YORK, Jan. 29—(U.P.)—John Pierpont Morgan has begun to dispose of some of his priceless art treasures. Charles R. Henschel, president of Knoedler Galleries, last night announced he was handling sale of six paintings from the Morgan collection. They are valued at $1,500,000.

Among the six are the famous "Anne of Austria" by Peter Paul Rubens and Chirlandajo's "Giovanna Tornabuoni." The latter alone is worth $500,000 according to connoisseurs. There are two Franz Hals portraits, Sir Thomas Lawson's portrait of Lady Elizabeth Farren and Fra Lippo Lippi's "St. Lawrence Enthroned."

The Metropolitan Museum of New York announced last night it had purchased "Anne of Austria" and "St. Lawrence Enthroned." The amount paid was not mentioned.

The Trustees of the National Gallery of Canada have issued invitations for an exhibition of British posters on Friday, February 8, from four to six o'clock at the National Gallery. The exhibition will be opened by Sir Francis Floud, British High Commissioner.

SIX MORGAN PAINTINGS SOLD FOR $1,500,000

E. Ford Said Buyer of One at "Less Than $500,000"

NEW YORK, Jan. 31—(A. P.)—Within a few weeks after they were put on the market, six paintings from the collection of J. P. Morgan have been sold for approximately $1,500,000, it was disclosed yesterday.

Two of the paintings were acquired by the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and four by private collectors whose identity was kept secret.

It was authoritatively reported in art circles, however, that Edsel Ford, son of the automobile magnate, had purchased what was described as the cream of the Morgan collection—"Portrait of Giovanna Tornabuoni" by Ghirlandajo for "less than $500,000."

ART OF WOODCUT IS REVIVED TODAY

Development Since Fifteenth Century Described By Miss K. Fenwick
Gazette Jan. 23

Woodcuts and wood engravings from those of the fifteenth century to such contemporary examples as the illustrations of George Bernard Shaw's "Black Girl in Search of God," were discussed by Miss Kathleen Fenwick, of the department of prints and engravings of the National Gallery, Ottawa, when she gave an illustrated lecture on their history at a meeting of the Women's Art Society held yesterday in Stevenson Hall.

Miss Fenwick pointed out that the woodcut was the earliest form of illustration. The first of these were of religious subjects, and later were grouped with movable print and reproduced on paper. Some early woodcuts were of playing cards, made and sold by the monks, and gambling became so common that it was prohibited by law.

The "Poor Man's Bible" made for poor priests, and consisting entirely of woodcuts, was described by Miss Fenwick. Woodcuts were used to point morals, as in the case of two produced at the time of the "black death," shown on the screen, intended to teach the lesson of dying in a state of grace and thereby routing the evil spirits pictured as lying in wait for the soul.

Use of a metal plate instead of a wood block was illustrated by a picture of St. Christopher.

Some of the finest and richest cuts ever made, the design by an artist and the cutting done by another artist, were shown, Miss Fenwick stating that Venice was the centre of the art, and later Spain, followed by France.

With the invention of copper plate engraving, the art of the woodcut was forced into the background and had died out in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Later came a time when the woodcut was worked across the grain instead of following it, and gave a finer engraving.

Modern work in woodcuts, including that of William Blake, Eric Gill, Paul Nash and Edwin Holgate, was depicted on the screen, with the comment by Miss Fenwick that the woodcut has come into its own again.

Mrs. W. A. Gifford, the president, opened the meeting and Mrs. D. S. Higginson introduced the speaker, who was thanked by Mrs. A. Dunton.

Revival of Old Art Shown to Art Society

A revival of the art of the woodcut is taking place, and there are some excellent examples of modern work, Miss Kathleen Fenwick told members of the Women's Art Society when she addressed them yesterday in Stevenson Hall. Miss Fenwick, who is with the department of prints and engravings in the National Gallery, Ottawa, discussed the history and art of wood cuts and wood engravings, illustrating her lecture with a number of interesting lantern slides.

The wood cut, dating from the fifteenth century, was the earliest form of illustration, the lecturer pointed out. Religious subjects were the first inspiration, and a collection of such wood cuts formed the "poor man's Bible" for those who could not read. Woodcuts were later used to point morals. On the other hand, some early wood cuts were used to make playing cards, until this form of gambling was prohibited.

Some of the finest and richest cuts ever made, the design by an artist and the cutting done by another artist, were shown, Miss Fenwick stating that Venice was the centre of the art, and later Spain followed by France.

With the invention of copper plate engraving, the art of the wood cut was forced into the background and had died out in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, until its recent revival.

Modern work in wood cuts, including that of William Blake, Eric Gill, Paul Nash and Edwin Holgate, was shown on the screen.

Mrs. W. A. Gifford, the president, opened the meeting and Mrs. D. S. Higginson introduced the speaker, who was thanked by Mrs. R. A. Dunton.

LECTURE SERIES ON LEISURE TIME USE

Gazette Jan. 24/35
Comprehensive Course to Be Conducted at Y.M.C.A. for City Districts

Courses in recreational, social and cultural leadership in four districts of Montreal will be inaugurated this evening at the Central Y.M.C.A., and will continue during a period of seven weeks. The courses are planned to help club and group leaders, officers of young peoples' societies, social workers, school teachers, parents, and all others interested in the constructive use of leisure. The Y.M.C.A. is initiating and sponsoring the project, remarked Wm. R. Cook, of the National Council Y.M.C.A. of Canada, who has been brought here from Toronto to organize and direct the courses.

The courses will include such activities as, informal group and party games and stunts for all sorts of places and occasions; handicrafts, demonstrations of working in wood, metals, leather, weaving, etc.; table games from many lands; and how to make and use them; community singing, song leading, folk songs; art appreciation, self-expression, use of art galleries, and other resources; social mixers—ice breakers—singing games; square dances, and elementary folk dance; drama, how to select plays for amateur players, how to put on skits, play reading; music, how to listen, the making of primitive musical instruments, music resources of the city; story telling, books and reading, the use of libraries.

Addresses and lectures will be given on such subjects as, "The Principles of Leadership," "Place and Purposes of Recreation," "How to Plan Programmes," "How to Use Local Resources," etc.

Mr. Cook in his opening address on "Recreation and the Need of Leaders" will speak on the increase in leisure time, which creates a community problem, and in order to deal with it effectively trained group leadership is needed.

The courses have been planned in consultation with the following, and others, who will act as lecturers or directors of activities: William Bowie, executive director of the Parks and Playgrounds Association; William R. Cook, of the National Council Y.M.C.A.; Miss Jesse Herriott, physical director for women, McGill University; Edwin H. Holgate, art instructor; Harold Eustace Key, conductor of the Mendelssohn Choir of Montreal; J. C. Lang, director of physical education of the Protestant Board of School Commissioners; Miss Alice Lighthall, chairman of the exhibition committee, Canadian Handicrafts Guild; Miss Violet McEwen, librarian of the Children's Library; Miss Hilda Suddes, honorary instructor, English folk dancing class, extra-mural department, McGill University; Cecil West, assistant director of the Montreal Repertory Theatre.

There will be four series of courses, one for the Maisonneuve district, one for the Mount Royal avenue district, one for the central and western district, and one for the northern district of Montreal. Each, explained Mr. Cook, will have one session during the course in the Art Gallery, through the courtesy of the Art Association of Montreal.

Marines by George Fox At Scott's

The many admirers of the work of the late George Fox will find very much to please them and something even to surprise them in the exhibition of his pictures which he now being shown at Scott's gallery on Drummond street. He was for many years a regular contributor to Montreal exhibitions, but many of the pictures which are now at Scott's seem never to have been shown to the public before, and they give a quite new idea of his power as a painter and particularly as a marine painter; they put him on all counts, except quantity of work, among the best marine painters that there have been in this country.

Most of the pictures in this exhibition, and all the most important of them are sea-shore pictures. Some of them are small but very good sketches of boats and harbors; several are studies of sea fog, but these, except for one of a harbor mouth with the sun showing through fog, are not among the best of the exhibits. The shore pictures, of sea, waves and rocks, stand out above these, and some of them are larger than the more modest canvasses which Mr. Fox was in the habit of exhibiting. The largest of them is a splendid view of a calm sea and a rocky coast which is quite admirable in its arrangement of light and color. There are delightful pieces of color in many of the others, and, with these, some astonishingly true and pictorial studies of breakers and surf and of the rush and swirl of waves among rocks.

The pictures reveal a side of Mr. Fox's painting which must have been better known to his friends than to the public, but that is by no means the only reason why the exhibition is well worth seeing.

THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

Water Colours By Three Scotsmen

Some water colors, few but unusually good, are to be seen at present at Scott's galleries on Drummond street. Their painters are three Scotsmen, of whom one, Russell Flint, has done most of his work in England; the others are Sir D. Y. Cameron and James McBey, whose fame rests on their painting of Scottish scenery. Every one knows Russell Flint's work, either as originals or as reproductions, but his figure subjects are much more familiar than the pictures of mountains in the Highlands which are here. There are also an admirable sketch of the Piazza of St. Mark at Venice and one of a girl in Spanish dress, "Carmona posing," painted in a drier technique, which is quite unlike Mr. Flint's usual manner but makes a striking effect of the play of light on the dress.

Sir David Cameron's water colors include an excellent sketch of a French farm, but most of them are of Scottish scenery, of the kind that he has so often painted in his oil pictures. These fairly slight but delightfully simple and direct sketches may be studies for oil pictures and are quite as interesting as many of his more finished works.

The work of James McBey has been less seen here than that of the other two painters. The drawings in this exhibition are Scottish scenes in pen drawing with light washes of color. The complete simplicity of the method is one of the great charms of the drawings; there is not an unnecessary touch in them and one can seldom see so much effect of color and atmosphere got with such slight means.

Gothic Art In England

There is no lack of descriptions of the gothic buildings of Europe, but there always seems to be room for another, especially when it is as good as the lecture which Mr. J. E. Barton gave to the Art Association of Montreal at the end of last week. Mr. Barton, who has lectured on art for the British Broadcasting Corporation, has been brought to visit this country by the National Gallery of Canada, and his lecture last week was quite one of the best that has been given to the Art Association in many years.

In its descriptive part Mr. Barton's lecture had the advantage of an abundance of very good lantern slides to illustrate it, so many that it was not much of a lecture as an exhibition of pictures of gothic art with a continuous commentary. The pictures, since the subject of the lecture was "Gothic Art in England" were chiefly of English cathedrals and churches, but there were a few French examples for comparison as well as pictures of other forms of gothic art, in woodwork, metal and painting.

Mr. Barton's remarks were all excellent as description, but they went beyond that and provided explanation of the origin and development of gothic design. He set himself to destroy the, rather common, belief that Gothic art is a sort of decoration applied to indifferent surfaces, even, as in some modern examples, a skin used to hide structural steelwork. He based his explanations all through his lecture on the structural methods of gothic builders, and showed how architecture in the middle ages began with construction and proceeded to its decay as a misused method of construction. Three special examples were used by him to illustrate his lecture, — the Angel Choir at Lincoln, the Chapter House at Southwell and the Choir at Gloucester, and these were described and illustrated in some detail, though many other buildings were mentioned and shown on the screen.

New Portraits And Old Prints

Canadian history and geography are well illustrated in an exhibition, which has just been opened in the galleries of the T. Eaton Co., of Canadian prints, with a few drawings and some old maps and plans. The events shown in them are mostly of the earlier part of the nineteenth century, the scenes are in Eastern Canada, from Winnipeg to the Atlantic, though most of them, as might be expected, are in Quebec and Montreal. One Quebec series gives interesting and sometimes amusing views of garrison life in Quebec, and there are a number of prints relating to Wolfe's siege of Quebec. There is a fine early view of Toronto and a good collection of views of Niagara Falls, from different view-points and at different dates. Some of the prints are after well known historical pictures of battles and other events. The collection, which is a fairly large one, contains some rare specimens and a few books in early editions.

In another of the galleries at Eaton's there are some portraits in oil and pastel by Miss F. Bechman. The pastel portraits of children are some of the best of these, and a picture of a girl in a black dress stands out among the larger ones. They strike one as being true and faithful portraits. Also by Miss Bechman are some interesting copies of portraits, in London galleries, by Vandyck, Andrea del Sarto, Goya and Sargent.

Pictures by T. R. MacDonald

Some portraits, pictures of still life and landscape sketches by T. R. MacDonald, one of the younger Montreal painters, are now being shown at the Arts Club on University St. The still life pictures are the best of these and several of them are very good; the portraits, which show promise of better things to come, are evidently good portraits though rather hard, and are cleanly painted. A striking one, and one of the most severe, is "The House-keeper," a well painted picture of a woman in a white dress; two portraits of men are good in their drawing, but less good in colour; the best painted and the most solid of the portraits is one called "Pauline" of a woman in a black shawl, which has some very good qualities. A picture of a dancer resting and a sort of caricature of a burlesque show are less true to life. The landscape sketches are interesting and there are some good ones of Montreal streets.

cellent as description, but they went beyond that and provided explanation of the origin and development of gothic design. He set himself to destroy the, rather common, belief that Gothic art is a sort of decoration applied to indifferent surfaces, even, as in some modern examples, a skin used to hide structural steelwork. AUCTIONING KIPLING PRESS FILES TODAY

Copies of Allahabad Papers, True 'First Editions', for Sale in London

London, July 2.—(P)—The true "first editions" of Rudyard Kipling—yellowing files of newspapers—will go on auction here tomorrow.

The lots offered for sale are 72 crimson, buckram-bound volumes of issues of the Allahabad newspaper "Pioneer" and 208 issues of "The Week's News" of Allahabad in which stories like "Plain Tales from the Hills" first saw the light.

"I wish we could buy them," Col. Cecil Bailey, secretary of the Kipling Society, said. "I suppose the prices fetched will run into three figures, and we are poor,—one can't do much on a $2.50 annual subscription."

Literary experts and members of the Kipling Society will turn up at the sale in full force. To the latter, attendance will be an act of devotion, for the 1,832 daily issues of the "Pioneer" covering the period from 1885 to 1890 and "The Week's News" issues covering 1888-91 show Kipling as the literary apprentice.

In all, collectors will buy nearly 200 columns of Kipling stories of which the greater part are unsigned.

It was while working on the "Pioneer" that Kipling wrote "Soldiers Three," "Wee Willie Winkie," "The Phantom Rickshaw," and the "City of Dreadful Night."

Many of the poems published in these two papers have never been reprinted. They did not even get into the famed "Wheeler's Indian Railway Library," as did the stories.

Column after column of his "Pioneer" stories Kipling wrote when hardly out of his teens—he was born in 1865. His career as a newspaperman ended in 1890 when his writings had started selling freely.

MRS. PRATT LEFT $5,000,000 FUND

Former Sherbrooke Girl is Chief Beneficiary in $6,000,000 Estate

NEW YORK, Jan. 31.—(C.P.)—A trust fund of $5,000,000 for his wife, a former Sherbrooke girl, and cash bequests to relatives in Sherbrooke are included in the will of George D. Pratt, former Conservation Commissioner of New York State, who died at his home at Glen Cove recently. The will disposes specifically of more than $6,000,000, though the estate may be larger.

The widow is the former Vera Amherst Hale of Sherbrooke, Que. At her death the fund will pass to Mr. Pratt's three sons and one daughter. The widow also receives $250,000 in cash, household effects and certain works of art.

Among the recipients of cash bequests of $25,000 each are four sisters-in-law and one brother-in-law, all of Sherbrooke. They are: Gladys Hale, Mary S. Atkinson, Cecilia Skelton, Alice McCrear and Forbes Hale.

John Robinson, jr., of Newcastle, N.B., receives a similar $25,000 bequest for "faithful services" as superintendent of Mr. Pratt's summer camp at Holmes Lake, N.B. The camp itself is bequeathed to the widow.

Large Wall Paintings By Hogarth At "Bart's"

Gazette Jan. 26/35

London—For more than 40 years two large wall paintings by Hogarth of very considerable importance have remained practically unknown on the staircase of the Great Hall of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, writes the art critic of the Morning Post.

Public ignorance of their origin and high quality was excusable mainly owing to the fact that they were almost wholly covered with cloister brown paint, and six coats of opaque varnish, each layer having apparently been applied by incompetent restorers who at various times had tried to brighten the pictures.

Fortunately wiser counsel prevailed, and the authorities at St. Bartholomew's decided to make one more attempt to restore the famous wall decorations. Under the direct personal supervision of Sir Alec Martin, of Christie's, and Secretary of the National Art-Collection Fund, the paintings have been cleaned and restored by G. Clark, his two sons and nephew, and the cost has been generously defrayed by Lord Bearsted and Lord Duveen. I saw the pictures before their restoration began, and thought that great courage and greater skill were essential for the difficult task which Messrs. Clark had undertaken. But this firm has fully justified the confidence of those who commissioned them. They are not among the much-boomed picture doctors, but all are highly accomplished craftsmen, and deserve the warmest praise.

The subjects of the pictures are "The Pool of Bethesda" (29 ft. 3 in. by 13 ft. 8 in.) and "The Good Samaritan" (16 ft. 9 in. by 13 ft. 8 in.); the three sketches below the pictures represent "Rahere Asleep and Dreaming," "His Reception of Gifts and Beginning of Building the Hospital" and "A Patient carried on a stretcher, tended by two brethren of Saint Bartholomew."

The series were painted by Hogarth in memory of his birth near the Hospital, and were presented by him to the Governors in 1737. He himself was then made a Governor. The pictures hold a peculiar place in Hogarth's oeuvre, and their genesis, as told by himself, ought to be given. In a letter without date he says:

"Before I had done anything of much consequence in this walk (i.e., painting and engraving modern subjects), I entertained some hopes of succeeding in what the offers in books call the great style of history painting; so that without having done a stroke of this grand business before, I quitted small portraits and familiar conversations, and, with a smile at my own temerity, commenced history painting, and on the great staircase at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, painted two Scripture stories, The Pool of Bethesda and The Good Samaritan, with figures seven feet high.

"These I presented to the Charity and thought they might serve as a specimen to show that, were there an inclination in England for encouraging historical pictures, such a first essay might prove the painting of them more easily attainable than is generally imagined.

"But as religion, the great promoter of this style in other countries, rejected it in England, I was unwilling to sink into a portrait manufacturer; and still ambitious of being singular, dropped all expectations of advantage from that source, and returned to the pursuit of my former dealings with the public at large."

Before this adventure in the "Grand Style," which he pretended to dislike, Hogarth had produced two masterpieces, "The Harlot's Progress," and "The Rake's Progress," although he says in the above letter he had not done "anything of much consequence."

In the "Pool of Bethesda" we see that he was well acquainted with the "black masters" which he satirized. The "Pool" is almost wholly based on their method. There are imitations of Murillo; indeed, the figures of Christ and the man reclining in front of him are reversed versions of the figures in a well known painting by the Spanish master, which was sold at Christie's in July, 1933, and now belongs to Mr. Owen Hugh Smith, of Hill street.

Then there are imitations of El Greco, Veronese, Rubens; and of Vandyck's horse in "The Good Samaritan." The only Hogarthian characterization is displayed in the two figures on the spectator's extreme left in "The Pool of Bethesda."

Nevertheless, the pictures are of extraordinary merit. The rhythms and color schemes of both works move in pictorial relationship, and the general design has a certain monumental nobility. Yet, it is well that Hogarth returned to his former pursuits and gave us paintings such as the great "Marriage à la mode" series of "Modern Occurrences in High Life."

The Prime Minister and Sir Maurice Hankey have seen the paintings, and both express their pleasure at the successful restoration of Hogarth's splendid works.

Sailing Ships Old and New by Montague Dawson

The attraction of sailing ships and of pictures of them never fails, perhaps because a sailing ship is one of the very few man-made things which can seem to have a life of its own; and the life, as well as the form, of ships is what Montague Dawson always manages to get into his pictures of them. The ships which appear in the exhibition of his work at the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke street are both ancient and modern; several of them are entirely convincing reconstructions of ships of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.—Henry Hudson's ship, "The Half-Moon," is one of them,—and there are ships, both English and French of the eighteenth century, men-of-war and modern merchantmen. The simple lines and the suggestion of speed in several pictures of racing yachts make good contrast with the masses of the bigger ships.

The seas on which the ships float in Mr. Dawson's pictures are always as full of life as the ships themselves. For the most part the pictures are of deep water and in the present collection the seas are fairly rough. There are some quieter seas in the yacht-racing pictures, and in one of them the yellow colour of shallow water in the Solent. As a good sailor of experience, Mr. Dawson does not fail to give his ships the sails which fit the weather, sea and sky, without letting accuracy interfere with pictorial design. Effects of light are interesting in several of these pictures, particularly of sunrises and sunsets; they give some fine colour to the pictures and, in some of them, a rather dramatic quality.

The exhibition which is truly representative of Mr. Dawson's recent work, is to be open till February 16th.

News of Art In Canada

A collection of porcelain, mostly English with a few French or other European pieces, has just become the property by gift of the Art Association of Montreal. There are about eighty pieces in the collection, which has been given by Mrs. Margaret Fountaine Brown in memory of her mother, Mrs. Mary Watson, of Bute House, Montreal. Mrs. Watson is remembered by many elder Montrealers, some of whom were pupils at her school at Bute House, which stood on Sherbrooke Street, at the corner of McGill College Avenue on the site now occupied by Strathcona Hall.

The last day for sending in exhibits for the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association is Monday, March 11th. The exhibition will open on Thursday, March 21st, and will remain open till April 14th.

The annual report of the Trustees of the National Gallery of Canada for the year 1933-4, which has been published, shows only few major additions to the national collections in the year. The only new oil pictures were two by Dutch painters of the 17th century, one of which was given to the gallery by the National Art Collections Fund of Great Britain, which has progressed so much that it is now able to help overseas galleries and museums as well as those at home. The National Gallery also acquired about 120 new prints and drawings in the year.

An important function of the National Gallery, — the arranging of travelling exhibitions, — showed considerable development in the year. Eleven collections, of very various kinds, were shown, first at Ottawa and then at other cities, and nine cities received exhibitions. Three of the collections in the report were shown in Montreal.

The Trustees repeat their annual appeal for a proper building for the National Gallery, to replace its present very inadequate housing.

CANADA'S MILLET PAINTING NOT FAKE

"Oedipus" Considered One of Best and Earliest Works of Artist

OTTAWA, Jan. 31.—(Star Special by Staff Correspondent)—The Millet picture owned by the National Gallery of Canada here is not one of the fakes which, Millet's grandson has revealed, were perpetrated. The Gallery has only one, "Oedipus," but it is considered one of the best and also one of the earliest of the great artist, French experts who have seen it declare that it ought to be in the Louvre.

The picture now in the Ottawa Gallery was accepted and hung in the Paris Salon in 1847, two years after Millet arrived in Paris. His first contribution a year before had been rejected. The second one was a re-painting of it. It was also displayed at the Millet memorial exhibition there in 1887.

SAYS FAKES IN BRITAIN
BARBIZON, France, Jan. 31.—(U.P.)—Jean Charles Millet, on trial for fraud, was proud last night that he and Paul Cazot, an artist, had been able to bamboozle scores of American and English art collectors by selling them faked masterpieces.

The grandson of the master, Jean Francois Millet, boasted in an interview here on the scene of the original Millet paintings of the last century, that numerous fakes were hung with pride as genuine in scores of museums throughout the world — but chiefly in the United States and the British Isles.

Millet pointed with pride to the facts, as he sees it, that these fakes done by Cazot are not necessarily inferior to the pictures painted by his grandfather, or other masters.

"I never sold a fake in all France," Millet bragged, "but disposed of great numbers in Britain, many of which eventually reached America. We sold originals in some cases, but mostly retouched originals or copies — and what the dealers did with them certainly was none of our business."

"I know, for example, that the Edinburgh Museum bought as an original a painting of 'The Bottler,' which was one of our copies — and it is still hanging in Edinburgh. Many others are floating around, such as the miniature, 'Man with a Hoe,' and 'Church of Grenville,' both signed 'Millet.'"

"Cazot," Millet said, "is merely a good house-painter with an unusual gift for retouching and giving pictures quality and age. He has copied Millets, Corots, Boudins, Sisleys and other works by the masters which hang today in the best galleries."

Millet is busy preparing final evidence to prove that the "Basket-Weaver in a Red Bonnet," basis for his trial for fraud, is a "real original," and thus gain acquittal. He then intends to force the London buyer to pay the remaining 150,000 francs (about $9,900) he says is still due him on its sale.

Painters in Paris Try New Ways

It is some time since a group of artists in New York offered their works for exchange for goods and services which they needed, instead of money which they could not get. The plan met with some success but seems to have come to an end. In Paris, on the other hand, the idea has now been taken up by some of the least known painters and, according to reports, a fairly brisk trade is being done. A live pig in exchange for a painting of the nude is one transaction reported—perhaps it was a pink pig; a sculptor got a pair of rubber boots in barter for a statue of a monkey. More important is the case of the plumber, who took pictures—presumably more than one—as payment for fitting up a bathroom.

Another line of sales activity had led to the fitting up of a train—Train Exposition des Artistes—for showing the works of unknown painters. This has been done by the Confederation of Intellectual Workers. Eight freight cars were painted white, red and blue outside, and lined with gunny sacking as a suitable background for pictures; visitors enter at one end of the train and pass through to the other. The first exhibition contained 304 pictures, which were shown first at a Paris station and then sent on tour through France. A critic says of them that they are "not great art, but good for a railway station."

News of Art In Montreal

There are now to be seen in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal some pictures selected from the collection of Dr. and Mrs. J. L. Todd, of Montreal, who are at present residing abroad and have kindly lent these pictures to the Association. There are more than twenty works and they include two very good examples of Matthew Maris, two of Diaz and excellent pictures by Daubigny, Willem Maris, Mauve and other modern painters.

The exhibition of pictures by the late George Fox at Scott's gallery on Drummond St., remains open till the end of this week. It will be followed by an exhibition by three Toronto women artists,—portraits in pastel and oil, etchings and nudes Dorothy Stevens, A.R.C.A., S.A., and sculpture by Frances Ring, A.R.C.A., and Florence Le, A.R.C.A. This exhibition is to be opened with a private view on Monday.

Exhibitions In London

An exhibition, chiefly of portraits, by Miss Kathleen Shackleton, whose work is known to every one in Montreal and Quebec, was opened in London in January. An important part of the collection is of French-Canadian types, many of which were drawn by Miss Shackleton, at the suggestion of the Quebec Government, in connection with the Jacques Cartier celebrations last summer. The portraits, which are in pastel or crayon, include members of the celebration committee, French-Canadian types and some of older lumbermen; there are also a number of landscapes of the Gaspé peninsula, which belong to the Provincial Department of Highways. There are other landscapes and portrait studies of French, Indian and Irish fishermen from Perce.

The critic of the Times finds that "Miss Shackleton has a keen sense of character, both human and landscape, she draws with expression, if not very firmly, her landscape composition is good and the restraint of her colouring can not be too highly praised."

A bill now before Parliament will allow the British National Collections, and particularly the National Gallery to lend works, or at least works by British artists, for exhibition outside of the country. It was felt that some action of the kind was needed after the loans made by foreign countries to the big exhibitions held at Burlington House in recent years. The Italian and French governments, in particular, were very generous in sending some of their most valuable art treasures for exhibition in London, and the new bill will make it possible for the British government to return the compliment, even if only to a limited extent.

The exhibition of Art in Industry, which is now open in the galleries of the Royal Academy at Burlington House has aroused plenty of comment, not all very complimentary. There are old things and new in applied art and even a lot of examples of the art of advertising, in

COLLECTION OF ART BOUGHT FOR NATION

Gazette Jan. 26/35
Two Museums Jointly Acquire Eumorfopoulos Oriental Treasures for £100,000

London—The world-famous collection of Chinese and Far Eastern works of art made by George Eumorfopoulos has been acquired jointly by the British Museum and the Victoria and Albert Museum. This collection, which is one of the most, if not the most, extensive of its kind, is at the same time celebrated throughout the world for the quality and rarity of the specimens which it contains. Sculptures, metal-work, jades, gold, silver, glass, ivories, lacquer, paintings, and pottery and porcelain are all included; indeed, whole groups are represented, of which the national collections until now have contained few specimens or none.

The total price for which the collection is offered is £100,000, which is admitted by competent experts to be far below the price which it would fetch if put up to public auction. By the lowness of the price asked, the owner is in effect making a considerable gift to the nation.

Loans of certain specimens will also in due course be available for leading provincial museums.

Towards the initial payment very helpful contributions have been received from the National Art-Collection Fund, Sir Percival David, and the Universities' China Committee. But to secure the remainder of the collection further payments will have to be made.

Towards these all members of the public who appreciate the beauty and historical import of Oriental art are invited to contribute according to their means.

Such contributions may be sent to the Director of either the British Museum or the Victoria and Albert Museum, or through the National Art-Collection Fund, and will be gratefully acknowledged.

George Eumorfopoulos, who until his retirement on August 31 last was Vice-President of Messrs. Ralli Brothers, was then believed to be the oldest member of the Baltic Exchange, with which he had been associated since 1880.

Apart from his prosperous activities in the city, Mr. Eumorfopoulos is a man of rare taste who, during his long life, has not been able to resist beauty, whether it was beauty of form or color, or of both combined in monumental design.

Monetary value has not lessened or increased his desire for a fine piece of porcelain or bronze, or a painting from a rock temple in the Orient.

If any masterpiece appealed to him it was his from the moment his eyes communicated the secret of its beauty. He is an ideal collector—one may assume that he will continue to acquire the things of beauty that are a joy for ever.

There have been many such collectors in England—Mr. Eumorfopoulos is one of the greatest—and like some of the others he has been a generous contributor to our national art institutions.

One of his most important benefactions—it was first publicly announced in the Morning Post—was the gift to the British Museum of the incomparable frescoes of "Three Bodhisattvas," found in a cave temple in Shansi, south of Peking.

In June, 1932, he allowed the public to see his treasures at his home, No. 7 Chelsea Embankment, in aid of the China Flood Relief Commission.

Portraits and Sculpture by Three Women

Portraits of children can generally be counted on as an attraction in any exhibition of pictures, and children have an important place in the exhibition of work by Dorothy Stevens, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., of Toronto, which is now being shown at Scott's gallery on Drummond street. There are some sixteen portraits and most of them, and all the portraits of children, are in pastel. They are convincing as portraits and they have the charm which belongs to pictures of children and, at the same time they are decidedly pictures, with a decorative value, and not merely portrait sketches. One of the best of them in arrangement and color is of a little boy in a blue suit, "John Rykert"; the portrait of "Peggy Armour" in a white, embroidered dress is another particularly good one and those of "Jane Ann Rees" and "Auguste Bolte" are attractive as portraits and as studies in tones of white. The treatment of whites and pale colors in many of these pictures is most interesting; one very good example is in the oil portrait of Mrs. Elliot, in which the dress, the fur, and the background are all white. Of the portraits of older people, the pastel of Mrs. H. J. Burden is specially successful in its color and its sense of life, and that of Mrs. H. L. Allward, in a black dress is almost as good. The large oil portrait of Mrs. Douglas Ridout, a seated figure in front of a Chinese screen is one of the most striking and decorative pictures in the exhibition.

The few nudes in the exhibition are perhaps even better than the portraits. The largest of them, "Siesta" is excellent in drawing and modelling and the figure stands out against a happy contrast of yellows and whites. "The Venetian blind" has a graceful figure in an interesting study of reflected lights. Two oil pictures and two pastel studies of West Indian Negroes are remarkably good.

The etchings by Dorothy Stevens which are shown are few but they include an excellent portrait of Prof. Pelham Edgar, of Toronto, and several fine studies of shipyards and munition factories.

* * *

In the same gallery a few pieces of sculpture by two other Toronto artists, Frances Loring, A.R.C.A., and Florence Wyle, A.R.C.A., are being shown, and there is, in them, an interesting contrast between the clever modelling and detail of Miss Wyle's work and the stronger composition of Miss Loring's. All these pieces are small; the two largest are a fine figure of a girl carrying a large fish, dignified in pose and simple in the treatment of detail, by Miss Loring, and a delightful garden figure of a dancing child by Miss Wyle. There is good composition in all Miss Loring's works, the graceful "Dream," the "Lamia" and the well constructed and expressive kneeling figure called "Grief." A quite small torso of a girl, by Miss Wyle, is an admirable piece of modelling and is one of the best of all the pieces of sculpture. Her portrait bust, a decorative head and a little head of a baby are also excellent.

MILLET AND ARTIST CONVICTED OF FRAUD

Feb. 27/35 Faked Paintings Case Concludes in France

FONTAINEBLEAU, France, Feb. 27.—(U. P.)—Jean Charles Millet, grandson of the famous painter, and Paul Cazot, an artist, were found guilty today of selling fraudulently a faked Millet painting, "Winnower in Red Bonnet."

Millet and Cazot were sentenced to six months in prison and fined 500 francs ($31). Cazot, a brilliant painter "gone wrong," was the author of the fakes, which were said to be as good as the originals and capable of fooling almost any expert. His wife was given a suspended sentence of one month.

Some of the fakes are in museums abroad and various art curators have been worrying over the genuineness of their treasures. During the trial, Millet contended he was not guilty as he had sold none of the fakes in France, but only to English and Americans, who "will buy anything."

Millet and Cazot were ordered to pay the court charges and refund to Roger Michaud, French transport magnate, 100,000 francs ($7,925) which he paid for the "Winnower."

News of Art In Montreal

An exhibition of water colors by A. J. Casson, A.R.C.A., will be opened in the picture galleries of the T. Eaton Company next Monday, Feb. 18.

Wall Painting In America

Mural painting is making amazing progress in the United States and there is now a Mural Painters' Society, which has just opened an exhibition in New York. Buildings of all sorts have been and are being decorated with paintings and a big series of such paintings has been made in the Congressional Library at Washington.

It is clearly right that the painters of mural decorations should form a society of their own, since their work calls for special qualities which are quite distinct from the painting of other pictures. Mural pictures must be essentially decorations and they must fit into and even become part of the buildings in which they are put. The artists who make them have, in many cases, felt obliged to go back to much older painters for methods and, sometimes for the choice of subjects. There is quite a tendency to make pictures of this kind not only tell stories but even be instructive,—not constructive, and in some of the most modern of them subject is allowed to get the better of decorative value. In a review of the exhibition, Royal Cortissoz quotes the remark of a painter, "I hate those paintings representing fisheries and manufactures presenting a pianola to the fine art."

While the growth of mural painting is a most satisfactory fact for painters, there is also the architect's side of the question to be considered. There are many mural paintings which kill the effect of the architecture in which they are placed and the architect certainly has some rights to be considered. A blank wall is often not a bad thing in itself and, if it is an essential part of the architect's design, he surely has a right to object to its being covered with pattern and colour or, at least, to have some say in the choice of its decoration. It must be remembered that the architect was there first and that his work is likely to last much longer than that of the painter.

CARICATURES FORM INTERESTING SHOW

Gazette Feb. 28/35

Prominent Personalities Figure in Collection of Work by M. L. Schwartz

Prominent personalities figure in a collection of caricatures by M. L. Schwartz being shown in the 5th-floor gallery of the store of Henry Morgan & Co., Limited. Mr. Schwartz, by birth a Montrealer, for some time employed his pen as caricaturist on a French afternoon newspaper, with special regard to sports events.

The show is interesting, in that caricatures have seldom been solely the subject of a public exhibition in Montreal before, but the artist has not always been happy in his likenesses. More elimination of unimportant details, a deeper search for the essential, "telling" line and less emphasis on over-exaggeration would in most cases have made the subjects more like the average person's knowledge of them—for by contact or photographs none of them is unknown.

Mr. Schwartz with his pen has covered a wide range as regards the personalities which have excited his fancy—Lauder, Andrew Mellon, Kreisler, Cantor, Paderewski, Arnold Bennett, Kipling, Eugene O'Neill, Arliss, Dempsey, Babe Ruth, Darrow, George Jean Nathan, Bernard Shaw, Mussolini, and from nearer at home, Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Hon. L. A. Taschereau, E. W. Beatty, Stephen Leacock, Rt. Hon. R. L. Borden, Rt. Hon. R. B. Bennett and Chief Justice R. A. E. Greenshields, to mention a few.

WARMTH OF SOUTH IN PAINTER'S SHOW

Representative Work of Dorothy Stevens on View at Scott Galleries

Montrealers who cannot get rid of the rest of the winter by going to California or to the West Indies, will do well to visit the art galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street, during the next fortnight. An exhibition of the work of Dorothy Stevens, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., of Toronto, was opened yesterday at a private showing, and those who saw it received vicariously something of the warmth of the south. There is, for instance, the painting of the two colored nudes in the pineapple field, and there is the graceful Negro girl shading her eyes from the sun. She stands, darkly glowing, against a well-arranged and refreshing pattern of broad green banana leaves. It is interesting, by the way, to compare this canvas, which has been loaned by the Toronto Art Gallery, with the original sketch, in pastel.

"Well-arranged" is a description that applies to Miss Stevens' work as a whole. She keeps her high spirits well in control and there is nothing slapdash about her work, either in color or design. Yet it remains flexible and warm and alive. She paints proficently, especially in her nudes, whether they be the children of the tropics or the fair-skinned women of Canada. The figure in "Siesta"—probably the most accomplished canvas in the room—lying outstretched, with knees raised, and seen from above, is beautifully observed and modelled, and unerringly placed; the figure is the thing and the background is in harmony with it. Another striking nude is "The Venetian Blind," so called from its background of sunlight stripes.

The nudes are, however, only a small part of the exhibition. Most of the show is devoted to portraits, four in oils, and 12 in pastel. Miss Stevens has been particularly successful with children; she believes —and she proves—that the medium is well suited for portraits of alert little boys, like Augustus Bolte; serious little girls like Jane Anne Rees, and appealing, tender little figures of the age of John Rykert.

There is a third Dorothy Stevens in the show, and that is Dorothy Stevens the etcher. The nudes are arresting, if not spectacular, and the pastel portraits are numerous, but neither must be allowed to put the eight etchings under a bushel. Miss Stevens has won distinction in this field. The wistful pickaninny sitting self-consciously in the straight-backed chair may be a reminder of the painter who does child portraits so sympathetically, but her shipbuilding, airplane building and shell factory scenes, some of which were done for the Canadian War Records, are executed with a vigorous organization of detail and with a hard objectivity that might have been expected from the pastellist.

Associated with Miss Stevens in this exhibition are two other Toronto women, Frances Loring, A.R.C.A., S.S.C., and Florence Wyle, A.R.C.A., S.S.C., the sculptors. In spite of the sculpture show now current in Toronto, they are both well represented, though with smaller pieces. Outstanding in this group are Miss Loring's imaginative "Dream Within a Dream," and her sturdy, somewhat formalized, "Girl with Fish." Miss Wyle's struggling "Rebirth" and her "Madonna" in simple and happy rhythms.

Miss Dorothy Stevens, A.R.C.A. (Mrs. R. de Bruno-Austin), of Toronto, is opening her exhibition of portraits and etchings at the Scott Galleries, Drummond street, this afternoon with a private view, when tea will be served. Miss Stevens is the guest of Mrs. Stanley Johnston.

Declares Many Works of Corot in U.S. Faked

Star March 3/35

New York, March 3.—Many paintings by Corot in American collections and museums, Dr. George de Cornell, director of the Fine Arts Guild of America, declared tonight, are copies put out by groups of art swindlers in Paris.

Many Modiglianis, some Monets and a few Manets and Pissarros also are the work of obscure copyists who turn out fake masterpieces, Dr. de Cornell asserted.

"They say that out of 3,000 Corots, 2,000 are in the United States and England—only Corot never painted 3,000 pictures," Dr. de Cornell said.

Dr. de Cornell described the group headed by Jean Charles Millet, who recently received a six months' prison sentence in France, as the chief but only one of many similar groups selling copies of masterpieces as originals. Millet is the grandson of the famous painter, Jean Francois Millet.

The amazing charge that when the world famous painting of Mona Lisa was stolen from the Louvre, five copies were sold to American millionaires as the original painting for "around $300,000 apiece" was also made by Dr. de Cornell.

19TH CENTURY ART TERMED ABNORMAL

Gazette Feb. 16/35
Was Inspired by Special Set of Circumstances, Prof.
Alford Says

The art of the nineteenth century which even yet most people supposed was the normal kind of art was, in reality, a most abnormal kind of art, Prof. John Alford, of the University of Toronto, told last night's meeting of the Art Association of Montreal in giving an illustrated lecture on "Modern Trends in Art."

It was abnormal, he pointed out, in the sense that it was due to a most unusual set of conditions, and because it fulfilled only a very small part of the functions that art usually has been called upon to fulfill.

The lecturer pointed out that the special circumstance which dominated the whole outlook of the nineteenth century, and continued to dominate the outlook of today though the conditions were changing, and the outlook was changing, was the individual revolution, and the enormous growth in numbers and ascendancy of an industrialized city population. During the preceding 300 to 400 years the art of Europe had been shaped by a well-defined set of ideals, not simply or primarily moral ideals, but by a plan of living, social, cultural and artistic of which the dominant ideas were those of the landed aristocracy brought up in the classical tradition of "humane letters."

Continuing, he said that nobody would claim that the industrial city embodied or expressed any ideal or theory of a way of life other than that of individual opportunism in the accretion of wealth. The making of things became merely a matter of business, of wholesale manufacturing and profitable marketing, and that applied to houses as much as to crockery or chairs. In short, the first result of the introduction of machinery and industrial methods was a wholesale slaughter of the old traditions and the old significance of beautiful making.

The natural instinct of anybody with any feeling for beauty was to fly from it, and people fled. Some fled from industrial ugliness to Florence or Venice and the French Riviera; those who could not leave fled to sentiment and romance. That implied that people fled from the real world to an imaginary one where emotions were freer, and art became essentially emotional and sensational and intellectually and morally lazy.

Signs of the romantic attitude to art, Prof. Alford said, were paintings of "rustic sentiment" and, in part, the work of Millet and Landseer which he contrasted with Botticelli and Giorgione.

Turning to the more recent trend, that of impressions, the lecturer asserted that here they were in the main stream of positive painting. The impressionists turned their backs for good and all on the romance of the past. The development of this trend was illustrated by the works of Manet, Renoir, Degas, Pissarro and Cézanne.

Dr. C. F. Martin, vice-president, introduced the lecturer.

Artist Discusses Principles on Which Art of Ages Has Been Based

Highlights in the history of the development of art, through painting, were touched on last night by Miss Annie Savage, Montreal artist, of the staff of Baron Byng High School, in an illustrated lecture on "The Understanding of the Arts," delivered to the leadership groups of the Maisonneuve, Mount Royal-Rosemount, and North Branch Y.M.C.A. districts of the Montreal Y.M.C.A. Recreational Institutes in the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street. Col. Gerald W. Birks, president of the Montreal Y.M.C.A., was in the chair, and the groups were welcomed by H. B. Walker, president of the Art Association of Montreal.

In studying art in all its branches, said Miss Savage, the main principles were the same, and the essence of art was simplicity. Through an understanding of these principles one had the key, so to speak, to the greatest works of art of all ages. Commencing with Egypt, of 20 centuries ago, she traced the contributions of the various nations to the art of painting up to the present day, concluding with the work of several painters who had laid the foundations for a distinctly Canadian school of painting.

From Egypt, with its beautiful temple walls at Thebes came force, and strength, and simplicity—an adaptation of art to needs. Greece, with its beautifully tapering columns of the Parthenon liberated the spirit and inspired charm and romance in its painters. Rome, however, was not much interested in anything outside of the material and contributed little to art, apart from the Coliseum, which was simple, solid, and practical. The Byzantine civilization gave brilliant decoration and masses of color.

From Italy came Giotto, whose spirit of simplicity and directness gave a new birth to the fresco school. Germany's characteristic was realism. German painters carried landscapes a step beyond Giotto. They were the discoverers of oil colors. Holland's gift to painting was the peace and quiet of horizontal and vertical lines.

Spain produced three of the greatest masters of painting — Velasquez, realist, portraying a sombre and sinister Spain; Goya, revolutionist, almost brutal in his appalling scenes of war; and El Greco, the great creative artist who is recognized today as the prophet of modern art. England, said Miss Savage, was the mother country of the landscape school.

Turning to Canada's painters, she emphasized the work of Kreighoff, who specialized in early French-Canadian life; J. W. Morrice, Tom Thomson, A. Y. Jackson, J. E. H. MacDonald and Lawren Harris, as attesting the fact that modern painting in Canada had reached the point where the actual life of the country was being translated.

William R. Cook, of the national council of the Y.M.C.A., Toronto, also spoke, and demonstrations in block printing were given by Felix Shea and in sculpture by O. S. Wheeler.

Attraction in "Peasant Materials" Being Realized, Members of Handicrafts Guild Are Told

Handicrafts are playing a greater part in Canadian life, both rural and urban, than they have played since the renaissance of the movement, according to reports from all over Canada which were read at the annual meeting of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, held at headquarters, 2019 Peel street, yesterday.

Lieut.-Col. Wilfrid Bovey was elected president of the Guild for 1935. Mrs. W. Oliver Smith was elected first vice-president and Mrs. N. K. Laflamme second vice-president. Other officers elected were: Honorary president, Mrs. James Peck; honorary vice-presidents, Miss M. M. Phillips and Mrs. W. D. Lighthall; honorary legal advisers, Dr. W. D. Lighthall, K.C., and Brooke Claxton; honorary notary, H. E. Herschorn; and honorary librarian, Miss Adele Languedoc.

In his annual report, Lieut.-Col. Bovey, the president, said, in part, that the realization had come very clearly that country life must develop an economic system of its own. "For a hundred years," he elaborated, "we had lived in an industrial epoch, our whole outlook was based on city life, and the ideal of the country child was to get to the city." Now a change was seen and it was very plain that a great number of our people would never live in cities at all.

As a result of this realization the belief had arisen that there should be a change in the education of country children. Their minds must so be trained, he added, that rural life would be for them a full life and that they could get every possible advantage out of it. "To put the matter another way, rural life itself can provide a real basis of education," said Lieut.-Col. Bovey, "and I need hardly say that in any such educational system as this, country arts and crafts must have a place."

Turning to the handicrafts movement's economic interests, the president reported that fashion makers had at last listened and had seen the attraction of country stuffs—"peasant materials," as they called them. "We know that the next few years will see an increasing use of linens and tweeds, and I hope that our shops will be able to profit from the situation," he said. "I am quite sure that craft workers in general will benefit, because we shall not only have a market for country tweeds and linens, but renewed interest in wrought iron, woodwork and hooked rugs. It is because I am quite sure of this that I am going to recommend a very direct effort on the part of the Guild to forward all these new activities."

FOREIGN COMPETITION.

The lodging of a formal complaint with representatives of the Dominion Government against the competition of cheap foreign imitations was reported by him, as well as the fact that the name of the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett headed the list of new life members.

Highlights of reports from various parts of the country follow:

MacLure Selanders, secretary of the Saint John, N.B., Board of Trade, was meeting with a great deal of encouragement from the New Brunswick Government in his efforts to interest them in further development of the crafts in that province.

Miss Lillian Burke, of Cape Breton, announced a great deal of progress and the tenth anniversary of the revival of Cape Breton home industries which had been organized about 40 years previously by Mrs. Alexander Graham Bell.

The Alberta provincial committee reported that the Fine Arts Division of the Department of Extension, University of Alberta, working under the Carnegie grant, had asked it to assemble a travelling Loan Exhibition of Handicrafts to be shown at 28 centres in the south of the province. This was to be under the direction of Dr. W. C. Carpenter of the Institute of Technology and Art, Calgary, with Major F. H. Norbury, Edmonton, as lecturer. Already northern points in the province were sending in requests to the committee that they too might take advantage of the exhibition.

The Winnipeg branch reported an endeavor to extend the interest in Indian work.

The Extension Department of St. Francis Xavier University wrote of widespread requests for information about looms, weaving, vegetable dyes, etc., and of the desire of many to weave fine cloths and plaids.

The Mount Allison Handicraft Guild reported a steady increase in sales of such items as handblocked Christmas cards and seals, jewelry, beaten and etched copper, and bags.

The Charlotte County Cottage Craft noted the prevailing fashion for tweeds and homespun.

Water Colors

By A. J. Casson
At Eaton's

Quebec Scenes

By a Native
Painter

The collection of water colors by A. J. Casson, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, which is being shown in one of Eaton's galleries, gives a more complete idea of his work than the few examples which have been exhibited here from time to time. They are rather unequal, not so much in their painting as in the choice of subject and composition, but in all of them there is a clean and sure use of water color and an admirable simplicity of form. In many of them there is also a very good planning of color; the "Northern Ontario Farm," with its red hillside and shadowy foreground is one of these; a country road in spring greens is another, and there is an excellent contrast of greens and distant blues in "The Hayfield Gate," one of the most satisfactory pictures in the exhibition. Another good piece of color is in the red walls and white roofs of "The Housetops," and there are others in several scenes of lakes in Ontario.

A picture, chiefly of snow and clouds, "The Winter Road," is a good example of the sort of rather formal pattern which Mr. Casson makes of his landscapes. In one or two cases the pattern of the clouds is a little too strong for the landscape below it, and the formal treatment of water is not always so successful as it is with hills and trees. There is good atmosphere and color in a small sketch "In the Caledon Hills"; "Afternoon on Lake Muskoka" is more naturalistic than most of the other drawings and has a happy effect of sunlight on the hills; a birds-eye view of buildings and people in "The Village Church" is clever and amusing.

A quite small exhibition which is now open at the Gwynne Studios, 2058 Victoria street, shows the scenery of this province from a rather new point of view. Quebec landscapes and village scenes by Quebec painters of training and experience abound; these pictures are by Miss Yvonne Bolduc, of Baie St. Paul, who has passed her life, not yet a long one, in that village and has seen little, if anything, of other places or of the work of other painters. Her pictures give the hills, houses and people of the province as they appear to an untrained, native eye, and her painting of them shows a rather surprising sense of what can be done with paint. There is no picture making about them; they are faithful records of things seen; but the choice of subject and view-point show a distinct sense of what makes a good picture. The best of them are oil pictures; in pastel, which she has taken up more recently, she is less successful.

One of the largest and latest, of Rang St. Croix, is a good picture of a snowy valley with scattered houses, and a good effect of distance. There are very good blue distances in several of the pictures, notably in a well chosen view of Baie St. Paul, in which there is a pleasant contrast with the greens on the houses and the shadows in the snow, in a picture of Moulin Bouchard, with some good and characteristic houses in the middle distance, and in a small pastel "Postillon Remi," with a fine red sleigh in the foreground. Good drawing and placing of figures in a night scene, "Avant

The Passing Years

Gazette Feb. 19/35
From The Gazette of Twenty-five Years Ago, Sat., Feb., 19, 1910.

Mr. A. E. Thibault, formerly registrar for the County of Montcalm, was sworn in yesterday before Mr. Justice Delorimier as deputy registrar for Montreal.

Port Arthur, Ont.—Two Italians were killed at Duck Lake on construction work on the National Transcontinental Railway on the 10th. They met death when the powder house exploded. This makes over two hundred railway laborers who have been killed so far along the national railway.

The Art Association yesterday closed a deal for the sale of its building on Phillips Square and the way is now clear to proceed with plans for the new art galleries, which will be erected on the old Holton property on Sherbrooke street. For the old gallery the association received the large sum of $275,000, which works out at about $29 a square foot on a land valuation only. The property has an area of 9,800 square feet, with frontages on both St. Catherine street and Phillips Square. The purchaser is Mr. James H. Maher, contractor.

DUDLEY WARD DEAD
HERE IN 56TH YEAR
Gazette Feb. 25/35

Native of England Made Reputation for Himself as Artist in Canada

Following an illness of over a year, William Burnett Dudley Ward, artist, died at his residence, 2089 Ile Visitation, yesterday morning. He was in his 56th year.

Mr. Ward was born in Turnbitch, Derbyshire, England, on April 19, 1879, and came to Canada about 25 years ago. He had made his home in Montreal for the last 11 years. During this time he was employed by several local firms as a commercial artist, including The Gazette Printing Company, Ltd., the Montreal Lithographing Company, and Batten, Ltd. He also worked for the Rolf Clark Lithographing Company, of Toronto.

One of Mr. Ward's paintings, "Fairy Sleep," is in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, and he exhibited from time to time at the Ontario and Montreal exhibitions.

Surviving are the widow, formerly Dorothy Goldsmith, a son, Jack Donald, and a daughter, Dorothy Warren.

The funeral will be held at the William Wray chapel, University street, tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock. Interment will be in Mount Royal cemetery.

Of Doubtful Masterpieces

(S. C., in The Scotsman.)

An unhappy case which is at present before the Courts in France, where a grandson of the artist Millet is under trial in connection with the supposed forgery of pictures purporting to be by his grandfather, has reawakened the interest which is always aroused by such disclosures. The affair has a local interest in so far as one picture is concerned. A study for the picture "The Haybinders" in the Thomy-Thierry collection of the Louvre, was for some years in the Scottish National Gallery but was removed as soon as its doubtful character became evident, and, while it is no longer in the possession of the Gallery, it is one of the works figuring in the inquiry in France. It is sometimes difficult to draw a line between these works, which are deliberate fakes or forgeries produced with the wilful intention of defrauding an unwary public, and the cases of mistaken or doubtful attribution, where the work of one artist may pass as that of another through some similarity of treatment or character, but in which the attribution is made in perfect good faith or through accident.

Judges happen in the very inner shrine of Law and Justice. For many years the portraits of two Judges, each masquerading under the title and dignities of the other, looked down on the advocates in Parliament Hall. By some mischance they had been interchanged in their frames, unnoticed until the request for a photograph of one of the pictures produced a print which would not fit other representations of the man, and a hunt through the Hall, where his portrait was known to be, found him under another designation.

Again, the "Portrait of a Young Man" in the Scottish National Gallery has been attributed at various times to Rembrandt, Lievens, Dow, Paulus, Bor, Solomon Koninck, and is at present catalogued under Ferdinand Bol, which is probably right. This is a case where the picture certainly derives from the Rembrandt school but may be by any one of his followers, and opinions differ as to which is the most likely.

Other pictures in the Gallery which were at one time called Rembrandt have had their attributions changed within recent times, in each case as the result of new information which threw further light on the pictures. In such circumstances there is always a margin for differences of opinion as to the artist where the age and "genuineness" of the picture is never in doubt. The faked Old Master is usually not difficult to detect. The faked modern picture is less easily identified. It is interesting to note that the doubtful character of "The Haybinders" was established as the result of independent investigation quite apart from the alleged confession of the forger.

It is generally believed

Use of that X-rays can, in some X-Rays mysterious way, establish the authenticity of a picture. This is far from the truth. The X-ray negative gives only a shadow record of the thickness of the various layers of paint, or rather their resistance to the penetration of the ray, and, of course, a simultaneous record of the same qualities in the support on which the picture is painted, whether canvas or panel. Certain pigments have more resistance than others. Many of the modern synthetic colors have little or no resistance under normal conditions of use and fail to give a record, but the X-ray is helpful in revealing unexpected thickness of paint which may not be visible on the surface, and so reveals alterations or overpaintings, as well as changes in the structure of the picture or its supports.

The picture "Verdonck," by Hals, in the Scottish National Gallery, is an outstanding example of this form of investigation. Originally entitled "The Toper," the figure had a velvet cap and held a wine-glass. Chemical analysis showed that the cap differed in age and medium from other parts of the picture. X-ray showed the hair complete underneath the cap, and an unrecognisable object in the hand. A contemporary engraving which always had been described as "after a lost original by Hals" gave the necessary clue, and the restoration of the picture to its original state by the removal of the hat and wine-glass, made possible by the difference in the medium, was only a nice problem in chemistry.

X-ray is constantly used, and today it is seldom that any picture of importance is restored or treated in any way without such examination. Results can sometimes be surprising. One landscape in the Scottish National Gallery is painted on top of a complete still-life with a basket of fruit and flowers. In the identification of fakes, X-rays can be helpful, as when a supposed Dutch picture of the seventeenth century on panel was found to have a modern screw nail in the panel under the paint, and not at a place where there had been a repair.

Much the most valuable form of examination is by micro-chemical analysis, in which minute fragments of pigments or a cross-section of the picture from a puncture through paint, ground and support made with a sharpened-off hypodermic needle are subjected to analysis under the microscope. Certain pigments came into use at certain periods, so by analysis it can be established whether a picture contains only those pigments known at its supposed period. The discovery of cobalt blue in a Primitive would be regarded as more than suspicious. Not only so, but the mediums binding the pigments can be examined and in many cases dated. Certain dried oils can be dated to within narrow limits up to an age of about a hundred years. On a recent test an expert chemist dated a detached fragment of paint to within two and a half years of the known date of the picture, which was about forty years old.

was desired. A paper edging had been pasted round the stretcher to make a neat finish to the relined canvas. This was soaked off, and it was found that small fragments of newspaper had stuck to the relining mixture on the edges of the stretcher. Each fragment of newspaper was carefully removed, and on one was found the notice of a first performance of a play. The language was French and a little investigation in Paris gave the date of the play's first appearance in the year that had been suggested as the approximate date of the painting, while a further microscopic examination revealed that the canvas had been relined before the picture was painted.

In the case of "The Haybinders," the picture did not arouse suspicion, as

It was supposed to be only a preliminary trial for the well-known picture in the Louvre, and slight differences were easily acceptable as alterations in the later and finished work. Not only so, but, purchased from the grandson of the artist, by an art dealer and connoisseur who was a friend of the family and a recognized authority on the Barbizon school, the picture was accompanied by letters and correspondence from various members of the artist's family, in whose possession it had been, including a certified photograph of a will in which the picture was mentioned—a completely credible series of documents which had all the appearance of reliability, and, if otherwise than genuine, they are surely unique in the whole history of art frauds. When doubts arose, the picture was subjected to scientific analysis of the most rigorous character, and after a visit to France, where specimens of pigments were examined not only on pictures but on the palette kept in the artist's studio at Barbizon and on his painting stool, on which he wiped his brushes, the cumulative evidence against the picture was so damning that it passed out of the possession of the Gallery about five years ago.

It is seldom that the forger can avoid making a blunder of some kind, although he may know enough to circumvent the rough and ready tests of the workshop, but with the resources of modern chemistry at command he can usually be detected. Ultra-violet light and infra-red photography are pressed into service, and the microscopic examination of the picture surface helps in the general scrutiny. Professor Laurie's methods of comparison of brushwork and surface characteristics by means of direct photographic records on an enlarged scale have their own particular application. Many galleries and museums, both in this country and abroad, now have elaborately equipped laboratories, where the scientist is a ready collaborator with the art expert.

At times the identification of a fraud may turn on Sherlock Holmesian observation. A few years ago a picture attributed to a particular artist came under suspicion. The picture had been relined, a common device, as it renders the back of the original canvas unget-at-able. X-ray revealed nothing. Chemical analysis placed the date of the paint as too recent for the artist, but some confirmation

YVONNE BOLDUC
SHOWS PAINTINGS

Native of Baie St. Paul Is Self-taught Artist of Promise

Artistic talent is revealed in the paintings of Yvonne Bolduc, a young French-Canadian whose work is being exhibited, beginning tomorrow, at 2027 Victoria street. Miss Bolduc who has only been painting for three years hails from Baie St. Paul, where she has lived all her life.

Miss Bolduc started by designing rugs for her sister. On the advice of a Montreal society woman she turned her attention to oil and canvas. She is untaught and until last year, had never seen an original painting.

It is only natural that her ideas are at present considerably ahead of her ability to put them into satisfactory form and color. Experienced artists who attended a private showing yesterday, had criticisms to make, but they were also full of praise.

Miss Bolduc's pictures are painted on oilcloth and shingle board. She has an uncanny sense of grouping and a really fine sense of line. Her conception and use of color is as yet undeveloped except that on occasion she brings off effects that would do credit to a trained artist.

Moreover, Miss Bolduc conveys a real conception of the terrain she paints. She portrays the Lower St. Lawrence country as she sees it, without any trace of the well worn and stereotyped methods which have become traditionally associated with the Quebec Christmas card. This lends a freshness to her work that is often startling.

There are about thirty pictures on exhibition. They portray various phases of habitation life as seen, not by a visitor, but by one of the people.

Modern Tendencies In Painting

A certain tone of apology is far too usual with lecturers who set out to explain modern art to less enlightened people. There was, happily, nothing of this kind in the lecture which was given last week to the Art Association of Montreal by Professor John Alford, of Toronto, and formerly of the Courtauld Institute in London. He, as is the custom on such occasions, traced the development of painting—he had not time enough to deal with other forms of art—from fairly early time nearly up to the present, but, unfortunately, he had only just got to Maget and a few later painters when he found that it was time to stop, so that, having introduced his subject, he was unable to develop it. The lecture gave in consequence an impression of being a prologue to a lecture which was not delivered.

Modern trends in painting made the subject which Mr. Alford had taken and he made it his purpose, so far as he went, to show the effect on art of the industrial revolution and the ugliness which it introduced into modern life. The painting of the later eighteenth and nineteenth centuries was, as he saw it, an effort to find a refuge from factory chimneys, smoke, working class dwellings and other new atrocities, and he showed some pictures of English towns to make his meaning clear. In this way he accounted for a large proportion of the historical and costume pictures and the landscapes which filled nineteenth century exhibitions. He hardly got much further than this, but he seemed to be prepared to show an acceptance of modern surroundings, and the adoption of them as subjects, by painters, when his lecture had to come to an end. It was regrettable that he had not time enough to show, as he apparently intended, the reaction from a reaction which is given as an explanation of some of the curiosities of modern painting. H.P.B.

Water-Color Painting of Local Artist On Exhibit at Galleries

Water-color painting does not always receive the attention it deserves. It seldom shouts aloud and it never spreads itself over large fields. If it is mixed with an exhibit of the more robust oils—as it never should be—it is drowned out; too often it is relegated to the print rooms, as a sort of appendage to the big shows, and is forgotten; when it stands alone, it is frequently ignored. Some of this is, of course, due to the medium itself, but most of its singing small must be blamed on the painters. Watercolors need not be sentimental and wishy-washy. Outstanding men have demonstrated that there can be authority in them; such painters as Charles Comfort of Toronto, for example; his "Young Canadian" and his portrait of the violinist Chuhaldin, could hold their own in any exhibition.

James E. Beckwith, of Montreal, whose show at the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street, opened Saturday, is not a painter in oils who has taken to water-colors. He began with architecture, but he has shaken free of the restrictions which such beginnings so often imply. Indeed, flexibility is his greatest strength. Instead of building on a framework of pencil drawing, as many do, or using the pen, he goes directly to the paper with swift, sure brush-strokes and achieves not only freedom, but virility and spontaneity as well. Often, too, his color is rich and warm, as in the portrait study "Portia," which has a bigness and a daring that reminds one of some of the modern Germans; and a luminosity, as in the broken cloudy sky in his "Fishermen."

The much-abused word "Impressionistic" must be applied to many of Mr. Beckwith's works, whether they be subjects like "Processionale Exotique," with its gay pattern, his operating theatre studies, his industrial sketches, or landscapes like "Across the River," which has a little feeling of David Milne in the use of color spots on white.

He is intrigued by industrial subjects and his technique stands him in good stead as he sets down such things as tapping in the foundry, machines, forges, barges. Montrealers should value his series of harbor scenes, all sturdily alive.

AGED ARTIST ANGRY AS SUCCESS COMES

Gazette March 14/35
World Laughed 40 Years and Now Eilshemius Vents Spleen

By ELENORE KELLOGG.
(Associated Press Staff Writer.)
New York, March 13. — Louis Eilshemius, whom the art world laughed at for more than 40 years, was still bitter today though a painting of his family hangs, by invitation, in the exhibition of the National Academy of Design.

"I've been so mad all these years that when the invitation came at last, it was nothing," he said. "I knew I deserved it. The artist is the best critic."

"The academy rejected fine paintings of mine in the past. They rejected Blakelock, too, and after he was dead, they hung him. It's stiflingly silly."

A gray-bearded invalid of 74, crapped in a steamer rug, Eilshemius looked around the room where he spends his day—an old-fashioned room crowded with furniture, books, paintings, the family coat of arms and photographs of his ancestors.

"Not a soul comes to see me from the outside world," he lamented. "A few artists come, but nobody else, I'm here alone. The academy didn't even invite me personally to send that painting, they invited my dealer."

"I never got as much as $60 for a painting in my life," he said. "The art dealer gets it all. They pay me almost nothing and sell the pictures for $2,000. Why don't museums and collectors come right to the artist?"

Eilshemius described himself as a romanticist in painting. "Real art is romance and emotion and imagination. A painting like a photograph is not art. You must put something of yourself into it."

Modern art? the old man snorted. "These modern abstractions are ridiculous rot. I could paint one of those in five minutes."

GOOD AUTUMN SCENES

Artist Also Finds Winter
Congenial Season and Baie
St. Paul a Happy Sketching Ground

J. W. Beatty, R.C.A., of Toronto, shows his skill as a painter of Canadian scenery in a collection of his work on view in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. Capable draughtsman, a sound colorist, facile in the handling of oils and evidently a believer in a direct, sincere interpretation of nature as it appears, Mr. Beatty is in the forefront of Canadian landscape painters. It is an engaging show that reveals the artist as a man who finds all seasons to his liking, though, from the point of view of color, autumn makes strong appeal, while the winter scenes give greater opportunity for subtlety in values.

The art of Mr. Beatty, which is worthily represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, has many admirers in Montreal where, over a long period of years, he has been a contributor to the Royal Canadian Academy exhibitions. In fact, some of the larger works now exhibited have been hung here before. In this group must be mentioned two: "Brooks Falls, Magnetawan River,"—water breaking in foam beneath a bridge, the torrent boiling over a rocky bed in the shadowed foreground; and "Wood Interior, near Port Hope," with noble trees, rock, sun-splashed ground and in the distance beyond the clearing a distant blue hill. Impressive in its sense of bulk and joyous in the riot of its vivid tones is "The Mountain"—a noble rounded wooded hill beneath a sunny sky. The trees in autumn leaf make a bold blaze of color, while below in a meadow path between high banks a man drives cows. There is a fine transparent quality to the shadow that bands the middle distance. "The New Roof, Parry Sound," with its vivid hill in the background and the sunlight playing on the barn roof and scaffold employed in its construction, is another bold interpretation of strong light. Beneath trees near the building is a woman carrying buckets, accompanied by a girl. "The Red Canoe, Magnetawan" is effective in the treatment of the waving reeds in the foreground and the autumn-hued foliage of the wooded distant hills towards which the two paddlers are headed. "At Petite Riviere,"—a group of old houses backed by open water with distant hilly shore, is a freely handed winter scene of sound qualities.

FINE SMALLER WORKS.

The group of smaller works—sketches done with directness while the impression was fresh, touch a very high level. In most of them there is a refreshing economy of means, the values are fine and, as in all his works, the selection of scene is distinctly happy. Convincing in its impression of a stormy evening is "A Side Road, Burks Falls"—a pathway between trees in autumn leaf, beneath a cloudy sky that threatens rain. "Easter Time, Kearney, Ont.," has good pattern in the sinuous stream that flows between ice and snow, the background being screened by a row of birches. Of a more clement season is "Old Bridge, Port Hope"—the wooden structure spanning wooded banks being seen from the riverbed beneath. Maples thrive and flaunt their vivid livery in "Near Burks Falls," and gay foliage frames the foreground edging the water in "Clam Lake, Parry Sound District."

Spacious in feeling and satisfying in its delicate values is "Early Spring, Kearney, Ont.," with its snow and ice that stretches to a distant wooded hill, backed by rosy clouds. The impression of strong sunlight is well conveyed in "Farmhouse, Kearney, Ont.,"—the old snow-clad building, backed by dark spruces, having a rather abandoned air. The shadow of the fence makes pattern on the snow.

Some capital subjects come from Baie St. Paul—"The Mill," the wooden building with its tall smokestack, backed by a noble hill and, in the foreground ice and open water, is a faithful transcript; "March" with its old houses and distant hills is true to season, and several other winter scenes in this group are very definitely of Quebec province.

It is from all angles a distinctly interesting and refreshing show.

GREAT ART IS BORN OUT OF EXPERIENCE

Gazette March 13/35
Dr. H. D. Brunt Analyzes Theory of Tragedy Before Literary Group

Expressing the view that "art is one of man's ways of organizing and interpreting his experience" Dr. H. D. Brunt, professor of English at Macdonald College, discussed three factors to be considered in any tragedy, in addressing the St. James Literary Society last night on "The Theory of Tragedy in Art."

The factors were, first the man to whom the happening occurred; second, the artist who expressed that experience in some artistic form; and third, the onlooker or listener, or the audience.

"To the protagonist in this tragedy there is but one solution—oblivion," Dr. Brunt continued. "It is not a tragedy if he has a hope of ultimate success—heaven or Valhalla. It is only when the sufferer who feels this futility is himself the artist that he can transcend his own sense of futility and turn it into the stuff of which great art is made."

The lecturer went on to depict the second factor, the artist. "He is the spectator of this grand but futile struggle. What does it all mean? Is futility the last word? What shall the artist do with this experience, how shall he organize and interpret it?"

"Out of all this struggle, this failure, this sense of futility religion offers a heaven, take it who will. But art offers something more heroic, out of the very material, the raw material of that tragic experience, that group of tragic experiences, the very tragedy of mankind itself with its blood-stained pages of history. Out of that despair the artist creates a statue of Laocoon a Dead March in Saul, a play of Oedipus Rex, a King Lear, a St. Joan—out of mankind's agony he makes imperishable artistic shapes and forms that remain when the protagonist and the artist have passed away."

Dr. Brunt said that lastly there was the onlooker, the audience. "What does the tragic in art mean to us? The best answer is still that of Aristotle—his katharsis, to purge the passions with pity and horror. We needs must love the highest when we see it, and as we look and listen there comes to us from novel, poem and play, from statue and picture, the sense of the grandeur of that struggle, that a struggle is worth while, a great respect for mankind, a great pity. In the presence of the artistic presentation of that struggle and catastrophe we admire, revere, love, pity, are ennobled."

The speaker was thanked on the motion of John Shearer, seconded by J. B. Thomson and replied to the discussion which followed his address.

C. B. James, president, who was in the chair, announced that Dr. J. A. Nutter, J. B. Thomson, himself and F. L. P. Anderson, secretary, would form a committee to prepare a slate of officers for the annual meeting to be held in a fortnight's time. He requested nominations from the members.

A New High for Paintings.

To the Editor of The Gazette:
Sir, — One of the most interesting cultural developments of the past five years has been steadily increasing interest in art. This has been true of almost the entire world, for we hear of exhibitions in New York and London where such enormous crowds gathered to see the pictures, that police were needed to control them. The private collector is also strongly to the fore, and in New York, London and Paris the sales-rooms have witnessed the keenest competition to acquire the works of art offered. The result has been such as to necessitate an even wider search for the fine paintings so eagerly sought for. The Soviet Government has been approached, and a few pictures from the famous Hermitage collection at Leningrad have recently found their way into the United States.

Up to 1929 the highest price ever paid for a painting was $750,000 for Gainsborough's "Blue Boy," but this year a new high record for the price of a painting was made when a sum upwards of $1,150,000 was paid for Raphael's "Madonna of the House of Alba" by a collector in Washington. Another interesting event was the decision of Mr. J. P. Morgan to sell six of his paintings, and so keen were buyers to obtain them that the sum of $1,500,000 was raised for them within fifteen days, one buyer actually sending an aeroplane six hundred miles to get a photograph of one of them. It is of course difficult to account for this great renaissance in the love of art, except, perhaps, that as life becomes more mechanized man's innate love of beauty finds expression through the medium of art. Someone has said that, "art is a new religion." But, whatever it is, there never was a greater interest in it than now.

J. E. Beckwith's Water Colors At Scott's

Another representative of the rapid, and very welcome, advance of water colour painting in Canada, James E. Beckwith, has a collection of his work on view at Scott's gallery on Drummond St. One of the attractions of Mr. Beckwith's drawings is the apparent ease with which he does them and gets an immense amount of suggestion out of a few lines and strokes. They are also distinguished by their subjects, most of which are industrial scenes, inside and outside of factories, and views of the harbour with its ships, barges, cranes and elevators. One of the best of them is a picture in black and white of a locomotive in a snow-covered railway yard, another is of a factory building with bright red tanks on its roof. Among the best of the harbour pictures are one of barges lying at a wharf with a big sand-heap as background, one of barges in dock, and a good piece of colour in a sailing yacht hauled up on shore.

Of other subjects there is a delightful simplicity and completeness in a study of clothes hanging on a line in a backyard, a good portrait study, an effective sketch of a rocky shore with a fisherman standing out against a big cloudy sky, and two scenes in hospital operating theatres, in which the white clothes of surgeons and nurses are interestingly used.

Mr. Beckwith's charcoal drawings are just as good and done with the same freedom as his water colours. A very good one is of a night scene with figures standing under the light of a street lamp and there are similarly good contrasts of light and shade in a drawing of a man working at oxy-hydrogen welding and another of a boxing ring under an overhead light in the middle of a large building full of people. There is a great sense of space in these and in a factory interior, with machinery indicated by a few lines in the middle of a steamy and smoky atmosphere.

New Work by C. E. de Belle

A severe illness at the end of last summer made only a short interruption in the work of Charles de Belle, A.R.C.A., and his studio is full of new pictures, most of them made—or since the autumn, which have not yet been exhibited. A large part of them are pictures and sketches of scenery among woods and lakes in the wilder part of Ontario, and that rather desolate country of rocks and trees has inspired some of the best of Mr. de Belle's work,—painted in a new mood and with more freedom and breadth than most of his former work. The difference is noticeable in a number of pictures, of town and country under snow, in which there is much color, in spite of the prevailing white. These are nearly all pastels, as are some excellent studies of snowstorms, with the air full of falling snow, and many of them are larger as well as stronger than similar studies which Mr. de Belle has made in the past.

Even more striking than these are some oil sketches of the Ontario country, made in early and middle autumn. They show the sadness more than the brilliancy of Canadian autumn but, though the gayer reds and yellows are absent, they are full of color and the browns, greens and blues give a remarkable impression of the beauty and mystery which are to be found in the woods by those who can see them. These sketches by themselves make a group unlike anything that Mr. de Belle has ever shown in Montreal. With these there are a number of figure subjects,—groups of children in Mr. de Belle's manner and a very dignified Madonna,—a face with the figure merely suggested by the faintly visible white draperies.

Exhibitions In Montreal

An exhibition of caricatures by M. L. Schwartz is opening tomorrow at Morgan's. There are about eighty caricatures of people well known in Canada, the United States and European countries — the President and Mrs. Roosevelt are among them. This is the first exhibition of his work that Mr. Schwartz has ever given.

In the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal an exhibition of water colors and sketches of foreign and Laurentian subjects by Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., F.R.I. B.A., will open next Saturday, March 2, and will remain on view till Sunday, March 17.

Better Light for Old Masters In National Gallery Planned

Gazette March 2/35
London.—In the National Gallery, Trafalgar Square, an experimental system of lighting, designed for the better display of the pictures, is to be put into operation on March 8.

This announcement was made by Mr. Ormsby-Gore, speaking at the annual dinner at the Trocadero of the Illuminating Engineering Society. He acknowledged the generosity of the great lighting firms who had come forward to undertake the lighting of many famous buildings at their own expense.

Floodlighting was still in its infancy, and there was still a great deal to be learned. There was very much more in it than the mere flooding of a facade or a garden with intense light. Direction, reflection, intensity and color all had to be carefully considered.

Mr. Ormsby-Gore then made the statement regarding the possibility that Westminster Hall may be floodlighted for the Royal Jubilee celebrations.

In spite of the critics, floodlighting, he considered, was going to develop, and to play an increasing part in times of national celebration and thanksgiving.

There was another strong argument for floodlighting—people had more time to look at buildings in the evenings, and floodlighting enabled them to do so. People noticed a fine building and its architectural design as it stood out against the night.

There was another form of lighting which presented its own special problems—the lighting of our picture galleries and museums.

"My department has just completed a new installation of electric lighting at Trafalgar Square. It is now three years ago since a committee was appointed by the director and trustees of the National Gallery to lay down the principles which, in their view, should govern the new lighting of the galleries at Trafalgar Square.

"The first was the adequate illumination of the pictures; the second a minimum amount of light on the floor and upper portions of the ceiling in order to reduce the effects of reflection of spectators and other objects in the glass of the pictures. By this contrast effect, and by using opaque masks and shades, we have found it possible to light the pictures adequately without using very high intensity lamps, and so to reduce dazzle.

"There may, of course, be criticism of the dimness of the galleries. We have, too, to face the difficulty that artificial light sources must be contained in the building and are not at the relatively infinite distance of natural daylight, so that it is not yet possible to reproduce the general diffuseness of natural daylight.

"There is another most fascinating side to the lighting of picture galleries to which I hope your attention will be increasingly directed, and that is the question of lighting and color.

"We have still a great deal to do before the pictures in our galleries can be visited at any time of the day and seen in their true coloring in spite of the vagaries of natural lighting.

"I look forward with great interest to the experimental opening of the National Gallery on March 8. I hope that soon after that occasion we shall be ready to enable the general public to visit our National Gallery on certain evenings each week and view its wonderful contents by electric light."

THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

Living British
Painters at the Art Gallery

Star March 13/35

It is quite certain that, here in Canada, we do not know as much as we might about the work that is being done by artists in other countries and it is good that exhibitions of representative work from other countries should be given here, if possible. If this is to be done, it is clearly a useful function to be performed by the National Gallery of Canada, and the gallery must be given credit for the desire to give such exhibitions. Unfortunately it is very doubtful if it is possible to make such exhibitions truly representative; artists and owners may be excused if they are reluctant to let some of their best pictures be sent on a tour of Canada lasting several months, and good intentions of the National Gallery are bound to end in such results as the exhibition of Contemporary British Painting, which is now being shown in the lecture room of the Art Association.

Sixty-four living painters have pictures in the collection, and most of the men whose work is best known over here are represented in the catalogue, though hardly on the walls. A small picture of Venice by Brangwyn—probably a study for something bigger—is typically full of sails, masts, big anchors and color; Sir John Lavery's "St. Patrick's Purgatory"—a sea shore crowded with figures, is moderately interesting; Augustus John has a rather good flower picture, but his portrait of Sir Robert Borden does justice to neither; the one picture by James Pryde is characteristic but quite unimportant. A portrait by Gerald F. Kelly is good in a commonplace way; two pictures of Italy by Sir D. Y. Cameron are good, but are not the best work of his that has been seen here; by Mr. Sickert are "Les loges," one of his imitations of Degas, and a strange sketch of a singer in a blue light. The work of Sir George Clausen, Arnesby Brown, and Sir W. Rothenstein is represented, but not well.

A striking but ugly portrait of Jeno Lener, the violinist, is by James McBey, who has a pleasant little landscape, "In Provence," a good study of sunlight. In R. G. Eves' portrait of Thomas Hardy, the subject is much more interesting than the picture. Other portrait studies of some interest are by Ethel Gabain, Neville Lewis, Dod Procter and E. Barnard Lintott. Some of the better pictures in the exhibition are Sydney Lee's Venetian house, William Nicholson's flower picture and sketch of a hayrick, Walter Russell's "The estuary," John Nash's picture of autumn flowers, Alan Beeton's rather precise "Interlude," a small portrait of a girl, and Duncan Grant's "Farm Pond" in Sussex, with its vivid and rather harsh colouring,—his big "Toilet of Venus" is remarkable chiefly for ugliness of surface and colour. Algernon Newton's "London from Buckingham Palace" is a resuscitation of 18th century painting, in the manner of Samuel Scott. There are also a number of pleasant or interesting sketches by Roger Fry, Oliver Hall, Nadia Benois, E. Beatrice Bland and Eve Kirk. A quite unprofessional painter, Lady Patricia Ramsay, makes as good a showing as most of the others.

There are only a few pictures by painters whose aim seems to be to get something original, or unusual, at all costs, but they help in giving such entertainment as the exhibition affords. Conspicuous among them is William Roberts' "Sun bathing," an intriguing arrangement of bare, red arms and legs, of uncertain ownership, phonograph records and bottled beer.—Edward Wadsworth's strange balancing feat of sea fauna and nautical tackle, and Charles Ginner's "Stratford on Avon," which is only distinguished by the way in which the paint is put on to produce a surface like a hook rug. Paul Nash's "Rye Marshes," looking like a design for fortifying the English coast, is a milder example of originality.

All these things do little to relieve the general insignificance of the exhibition. A preface to the catalogue, by Professor Constable of the Courtauld Institute, ends by saying that "a remarkable development in British painting may well be expected," but the evidence of it is not shown here.

News of Art
In Montreal

A hopeful report of the affairs of the Art Association of Montreal was given by Mr. H. B. Walker, the President of the Association, to the annual general meeting, which was held last week. There was some decline in the attendance of the public and the financial position of the Association still presents difficulties but membership, after declining for some years, began to go up again last year, which gives good grounds for hoping for better things in the future. Other reports presented to the meeting were also fairly encouraging. Owing to the generosity of friends of the Association the collections in both the picture galleries and the museum continue to grow and several valuable additions have been made.

An illustrated lecture will be given to the Art Association next Monday evening, March 18th, at 8.15, by Dr. Hans Tietze, of the University of Vienna, on "European painting in 1810."

An exhibition of oil pictures by David B. Milne, of Toronto, will be opened at Scott's galleries, Drummond St., next Monday, March 21st, and will remain open for two weeks. Mr. Milne, who was born in Ontario, was trained and has spent much of his time in the United States. He was one of the New York painters whose work was shown in the great Armories Exhibition in New York, by the side of some of the foremost European painters, in 1913. He has for years been given a high standing among American painters. Most of his recent work has been done in Canada, in the Timagami and Muskoka districts.

The annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association will be opened with the usual private view for members on the evening of Thursday, March 21st.

Pictures by Ernest Gerrish

An exhibition of work in water color and body color by a painter rather new to Montreal, Ernest Gerrish, is being held at the Gwynne Studios, 2027 Victoria street. Most of Mr. Gerrish's previous work has been in miniature painting and traces of this experience are to be seen in some of the detail of several of these little pictures. Among the best of them are several views, outside and inside, of a charming and typical old Quebec house near Montreal; the interior of the old kitchen is one of the most attractive of them. A studio interior is also very interesting. A taste for color is shown in several pictures of sunsets and sunrises,—one of a liner at sea and another of a 17th century ship in the middle of colors and reflections in the sky and the sea. A picture of fishing smacks tied up in an English harbor has very pleasant color and tone, as has another of a fishing smack at sea. Interesting studies of unusual effects of light are a picture of a liner entering New York harbor at dawn, and "London at war," a view across the Thames at night, with clouds of smoke and the beams of searchlights. There are also some simple and successful little sketches of snow in the Laurentians.

ART ASSOCIATION
INVITES VISITORSStar March 9/35
Annual Report Shows Decline in Attendance
At Galleries

An invitation to the public of Montreal to pay more frequent visits to the galleries on Sherbrooke Street West and make use of the cultural benefits placed at the disposal of the population was extended by Miss Ethel M. Pinkerton, secretary, at the 73rd annual meeting of the Art Association of Montreal, held in the reading room of the Art Galleries yesterday. H. B. Walker was re-elected to the presidency.

In her report, which was read by Arthur Browning, M.A., the secretary said there was no reason why unemployed persons with a sense of cultural values should not visit the galleries. There was a decline in the attendance figures, and this presented a situation with which even the art centres of Europe had to cope.

"Even in the Old Country, it is the same," she added. "Some are inclined to blame the moving pictures, but if it is the moving pictures I might say that our pictures move as often here, what with 16 exhibitions a year. It is not as if the visitors always saw the same thing; the portraits are changed."

BRIGHT PROSPECTS

The presidential report was featured by a statement that "continued improvement is looked for with a reasonable degree of confidence, despite the difficult problems remaining to be solved, and it is to be hoped that the rising tide of prosperity may soon be reflected in a more liberal support of the association."

"The income," he stated, "was insufficient to provide for its very moderate requirements—a situation from which there is no immediate relief in sight, though the prospect of better times appears brighter. It is generally admitted that substantial improvement has been made towards economic recovery."

In his ways and means report, Mr. Browning urged further use of the building which, he said, had been given as a legacy to the people of Montreal by a few wealthy, public-spirited citizens of a past generation. "There is not a dollar of debt upon the building," he reminded, "and all we ask for from the subscribers and the public is their co-operation in supplying sufficient funds for the proper maintenance and efficient operation of the galleries."

DONATIONS ACKNOWLEDGED

In acknowledging the gift donations, he made special mention of the Archdeacon of Lewes, who though not connected with Montreal, enriched the museum with the presentation of two wine glasses, the only ones of their kind in the world. While in Montreal, the Archdeacon paid a visit to the galleries one day and manifested so great an interest in the building that, being an authority on glass, he sent along the two wine glasses. The gift was all the more significant due to the fact he did not belong to Montreal, but was a stranger passing through the city. His act was considered a generous example and one which, it is hoped, will bear fruit.

Other gifts acknowledged were the "Horse at the Trough" donated by Miss Helen Norton; a portrait of "The Right James Carmichael, Fourth Anglican Bishop of Montreal," a bequest of H. B. W. Carmichael, M.D.; "Reclining Figure" and "Study of Nude Figure" bequests of Mrs. William Brymner.

A deficit of $4,053.71 was disclosed in the financial statement, operating costs exceeding by that amount the total income of the year which from all sources totalled $19,915.35. Considerable satisfaction was found in the increase of membership which during the past year was the greatest since 1931. There are now 1,426 members as against 1,328 the previous year. This still represents a shrinkage from 1928 when membership reached a peak of 1,740.

OFFICERS RE-ELECTED

No change occurred in the slate of officers, those of 1934 being re-elected. They are Hon. president, Lord Atholstan; president, H. B. Walker; vice-presidents, C. F. Martin, M.D., LL.D.; C. W. Colby, Ph.D., LL.D.; hon. treasurer, W. B. Blackader, and secretary, Miss Ethel M. Pinkerton. The council is composed of Arthur Browning, M.A.; T. S. Gillespie, Elwood B. Hosmer, R. P. Jellett, J. W. Last year was a lean one for the Art Association of Montreal, as it was for a great many other organizations, according to the reports presented at the 73rd annual meeting, yesterday. The income totalled $19,915, as against expenditures of $23,968, which meant a deficit of $4,053. But, as the honorary treasurer, W. B. Blackader, pointed out, there was one bright spot in 1934—the membership showed an increase of 98 over 1933, now numbering 1426. The association has hopes of getting back to the 1928 figure, 1,740.

The president, H. B. Walker, pleaded for donations, of even the smallest denominations, and regretted that the gallery was not used more by the general public. He referred to the exhibitions of last year. Mr. Walker paid hearty tribute to the National Gallery of Canada, for its valuable service in sending around collections, and thanked the citizens who had made gifts to the association. In speaking of the lectures, he referred particularly to that on Italian art given by Signor Eugenio G. Croizat.

Gifts included a new screen, donated by H. W. Molson, and the following paintings: "Horses at the Trough," Horatio Walker, given by Helen Norton; a portrait of Rt. Rev. James Carmichael, fourth Anglican Bishop of Montreal, J. Colin Forbes, by H. B. W. Carmichael, M.D.; two of William Brymner's figures, by Mrs. Brymner. Dr. Carmichael also gave a portrait bust of Surgeon Richard Carmichael of Dublin. A number of engravings and prints were added.

$10,000 ACKNOWLEDGED.

The treasurer reported the gift of approximately $10,000 in the will of the late Miss Mary Kathleen Oakes, in memory of her niece, Miss Vivian Crawford Harris.

Mr. Walker referred with satisfaction to the success of the senior art classes under Edwin Holgate, A.R.C.A., and Lillias Torrence Newton, A.R.C.A.

On behalf of F. Cleveland Morgan, who was not present, Arthur Browning presented the report of the museum committee. Acknowledgement was made of a number of important gifts, including some pieces of Persian pottery from the 12th and 13th centuries, and a rare mosque lamp, by Harry A. Norton; 78 pieces of rare porcelain, by Mrs. Fountaine Brown, Eastbourne, England, in memory of her mother, Mrs. Mary Watson, formerly of Montreal; and a rare type of English wine-glass, 1760, by the Archdeacon of Lewes, England, who had been a visitor to the museum and who had admired the collection. Miss Molson made possible the purchase of some antique Quebec furniture.

OFFICERS RE-ELECTED.

The meeting elected Mrs. Fountaine Brown a Fellow.

The officers were re-elected, as follows: Honorary president, Rt. Hon. Lord Atholstan; president, H. B. Walker; vice-presidents, C. F. Martin, M.D., LL.D., C. W. Colby, Ph.D., LL.D.; honorary treasurer, W. B. Blackader. The following were chosen as members of the council for three years: Arthur Browning, M.A., T. S. Gillespie, Elwood B. Hosmer, R. P. London—There is to be a new sort of artists' "Academy"—in the lounges of the Prince of Wales Theatre, W.

Gordon Courtney, manager of the theatre, is proposing to exhibit the works of unknown artists who, through lack of funds or any chance of exhibiting in West End galleries, cannot show their works to the public. A "sending-in-day" will be arranged at which a distinguished Hanging Committee will choose the works.

Well-known artists who have consented to act as patrons of this and succeeding exhibitions include the Marchioness of Queensberry, Sir William Llewellyn, Sir John Lavery, Dame Laura Knight, and Jacob Epstein, Alfred Praga, and C. R. W. Nevinson have already consented to serve on the Hanging Committee.

The exhibition will be open daily to the public, free of charge, between 10 a.m. and 1 p.m., after which it will be open only to patrons of the theatre.

Pictures by J. W. Beatty At Eaton's

An exhibition at Eaton's gallery of oil pictures by J. W. Beatty, R.C.A.,—the first collection of his work that has been brought here, at any rate for some years,—shows him once again as an open-minded painter, with a wide taste in his choice of subjects and in his ways of treating them, and as a thoroughly Canadian painter. The pictures in this exhibition are all Canadian landscapes, painted in all seasons, though the color of the autumn pictures makes them stand out among the others.

The larger pictures have some very decorative composition, even if this occasionally gives them a certain theatrical quality. The big "Wood Interior" is a good example of this and could be made into a design for a fine stage setting; the several smaller Wood Interiors have less of this with more freedom, and there is a particularly good one with a strong light seen between darker trees. The Magnetawan River and the district around Kearney, Ontario, have given Mr. Beatty some of the best of his pictures, both big and small; the large, peaceful river scene of "The Red Canoe" is one of these; the tumbling water and dark rocks in front of red trees at Brooks' Falls is another outstanding one. There is fine decoration too in the splashes of bright color in "The New Roof" and "The Mountain, Burk's Falls," with the striking contrast of its cool green foreground.

The smaller pictures, of which there are thirty or more, are evidently, in some cases, sketches for bigger pictures, and there are many good things among them. A few have autumn reds, but some of the best of them are snow scenes, which look rather subdued in the company in which they are hung, but have, all the same, much very attractive color in them. "Thaw, Kearney" is an excellent study in greys and browns, there are more good greys in "Winter Afternoon, Kearney," a very true and effective pink evening light on snow in "March, Baie St. Paul," and a happy contrast of lights in "Road at Beaver Lake"; and many others are just as interesting in their several ways.

An Exhibition Of Caricatures

About eighty caricatures by an artist not yet known in Montreal, Maurice L. Schwarz, are now being shown in the picture gallery of Henry Morgan, Ltd.—the first exhibition of his work that has been given in Canada. Mr. Schwarz has travelled the world and seen many celebrities, and these drawings are the result of some of his observations of them. Many of them have the right quality of caricature,—they have suitable exaggeration and are quite recognizable. Bernard Shaw and Gabriele D'Annunzio lend themselves well to the treatment; Arnold Bennett and Wallace Beery have features which exaggeration does not disguise, and these have provided some of the best of Mr. Schwarz's subjects. In the case of Gandhi it is sometimes hard to distinguish a portrait from a caricature. Mr. Schwarz has made his task more difficult in most cases by drawing only the heads of his subjects.

A number of Canadians appear in the collection. Chief Justice Green-shields comes out well; the representations of Mr. Taschereau and Mr. Edgar Rhodes are less successful. Some people have features which seem to give the caricaturist little chance of doing much with them; Sir Robert Borden and Professor Leacock seem to be among these; they can only be the subjects of more or less successful portraits, unless accessories are used to help out the result. Mr. Mackenzie King comes apparently into the same class.

The American caricatures are headed by President and Mrs. Roosevelt, which are not among the happiest of Mr. Schwarz's drawings. Very much better are the heads of Paul Whiteman, Amelia Earhart and Texas Guinan. Others of the more successful things in the collection are the impressions of Einstein, of Mme. Galli-Curci, of King Alfonso and of Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., all of whom have something more or less distinctive on which to hang caricature.

Water Colors Of America And Europe

Sunlight and strong color are always to be found in plenty in the water colors of Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., and the collection of them which is now being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal, with as much in them of these as ever, is a most comforting antidote to the present spring color, whatever it may be, of Montreal. And this is specially true of his larger drawings, rather unusual both in size and shape for water colors. There is lots of most cheerful color among which forms are sometimes only suggested, but very clearly suggested.

As in other exhibitions of Mr. Jones' work, some of the best of the effects come from Italy; an enormous Roman arch over a road near Naples is one of the best of all these pictures; a Venetian fishing-boat, with a painted sail which fills most of the picture, is another. Several drawings come from England and Wales; one of the Dartmoor country is a good picture and also very true in its wet and heavy atmosphere and there are similar qualities in the distant Welsh mountains, seen past the ruins of Harlech Castle. Of the largest Canadian landscapes one of the very best is the juicy green picture of sunlight at Lake Macdonald.

There are, on one of the screens, a collection of small color studies in which there are figures of dancers and groups of figures, which are of much interest, but some of the best things in the exhibition are the nearly seventy small sketches made in the neighborhood of Lake Macdonald. These are notes of effects of color and light and many of them show the same places seen at different times of day and under different conditions of weather. They make a quite delightful collection and they show, in a most striking way, the immense range of possibilities which Canadian scenery can give to a painter.

News of Art In Montreal

The last day for sending in works for the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal is next Monday, March 11.

The annual general meeting of the members of the Art Association will be held next Friday afternoon, March 8, at 5 o'clock.

An important exhibition of pictures by British painters will be opened in the galleries of the Art Association tomorrow, Thursday, 7th. This is one of the collections brought together and circulated in the Dominion by the National Gallery of Canada. It represents the work of most of the best known British painters of the present time, and includes works by Frank Brangwyn, Augustus John, Sir D. Y. Cameron, Lady Patricia Ramsay, James McBey, Sir John Lavery, John Nish, Paul Nish, Sir George Clairson, Richard Sickert, Sidney Lee, Sir William Rothenstein, Roger Fry, C. E. Nevins, Sir Charles Holmes, Clare Leighton, Walter Russell and other living painters.

BRITISH PAINTERS' WORKS ARE SHOWN

Representative Examples

In his foreword to the catalogue of contemporary British painting which opened yesterday in the Lecture Hall of the Art Association of Montreal, W. G. Constable, of the University of London, says: "...modern architecture and interior decoration become more and more unsuitable for the ordinary type of easel picture. On the other hand, steel and concrete with their constructional consequences, provide ample wall space eminently suitable for treatment by the painter on boldly decorative lines. Such treatment is taking two forms: either purely abstract to harmonize with the geometrical style of the modern building; or the use of strictly contemporary themes, either figure or landscape, when a subject painting is desired..."

From this standpoint, "contemporary" is the last word that should be applied to this show. To begin with, there are too many old-timers. Important as they may be in the history of British painting, there is nothing contemporary in men like Cameron, Clausen, Holmes, Lee, Rothenstein, Sickert, Brown. English atmosphere, yes; charming, doubtless; but they have nothing to do with steel and concrete, and the surge of this post-war world leaves them in a back-water. Even such figures as Lavery—what has his St. Patrick's Purgatory to do with 1935?—and John—his Borden portrait was done in 1919—belong to the past.

Closer to our era come men like Duncan Grant, the Nashes, Ethelbert White, Matthew Smith, Nevins, Edward Wadsworth and William Roberts. If the exhibition had started with them and moved off to the younger painters it might have been called "contemporary" with some justification. The whole thing would have been clarified if the word had been used in the strictest sense and not in the sense of painters still working. Of course the show might have been less popular, particularly with those who go to see it out of sentiment. Innocuous as the collection is, there was some disappointment yesterday—this sort of thing is not English—and there were some snickers. But not over the old-timers.

QUIETNESS CHARACTERISTIC

One thing all the painters have in common—the English temperament, probably—is their quietness. High spirits do show here and there, but not too frequently. Duncan Grant has them. His "Oysters," a still life, is not highly colored, but it is painted with good solid gusto; his rough "Toilet of Venus" is really a mural, which might fit into a modern decorative scheme; his "Farm Pond" is almost too sumptuous. Matthew Smith's "Aix en Provence" is a racy, nearly roaring, color attack; his flower piece is very much alive. Edward Wolfe, in "Towards Tarifa" is spirited enough, but he runs thin and a little panicky. No one, of course, has more exuberance than Frank Brangwyn; to his own undoing, for Brangwyn rushes into vulgarity. Vulgarity framed like a coffin in black and gold. To the modernist, there is more satisfaction in the Pechstein-like "Trippers" of J. D. Fergusson, and the "Sun Bathing" by William Roberts. At least the point of view is different in the latter, with its human beings like statues carved out of wood, its solid shadows, its pattern of stiff limbs; it has a humor and a cynicism that give it a modern approach.

One is not just sure what Paul Nash "means" by his "Siren." But all meaning aside, it is a gratifying arrangement in green and red-brown of a window and a tree with a nest in it and a sort of figure-head. The difference between modern and conventional is seen through comparison with the painting next to it. William Nicholson's "Sweet Sultan" is also an arrangement—flowers in a vase and a lace handkerchief at one end of a black marble fireplace—but beside the Nash, it is cheap and sentimental. "Siren" is frankly artificial, and there is something modern about that, too.

Just how modern, is another question, for in some of their work, painters like the Nashes, Frances Hodgkins and Edward Wadsworth live in a little exclusive world of their own. While they do not in the least paint like Victorians, they have a primness, an artificiality, that makes one think of the drawing rooms of another era. Strange as it may seem, there are aspects of the fusty antimacassar period that are not out of character with our times. There is something more, though, in the angles of Paul Nash's "Rye Marshes," in its dry blue and tan; in John Nash's beautiful "Autumn," with its carefully placed bouquet on the sill of a window that looks out over a wheatfield; there is something in Wadsworth's carefully pyramided seaweed and shells that approaches surrealisme.

SOMETHING FOR ALL

This is as close as the exhibition, which was arranged in co-operation with the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, comes to Mr. Constable's pure abstractions, and unless the Grant Venus be taken as such, there is nothing in "boldly decorative lines." Ethelbert White is decorative, but he is delicate and graceful rather than bold; and Harry Morley belongs to the Pre-Raphaelites.

For those who cannot go as far as the Nashes and their individual way of looking at things, and who have outgrown the Clausens and the Camerons, there are the in-betweens, like Vanessa Bell, Roger Fry and Lucien Pissarro. There are few genre paintings, touching the workaday world, the outstanding one being Henry Lamb's "Cottage Interior." And there are always the portraits. It is interesting to know what Thomas Hardy looked like; and Augustus John cannot be ignored. His Borden portrait is painted swiftly and surely, and his cyclamen is as fresh and soontaneous as some of the more recent works are self-conscious and artificial.

DISTANT SCENES IN WATER COLOR SHOW

Exhibition by Hugh G. Jones
Presents Views of France,
Italy and Britain

The next best thing to going abroad is to read about the far, enchanting places, or to look at pictures of them. For the coming two weeks, Montrealeers who go into the print room at the Art Gallery may enjoy the latter pleasure. In his exhibition of water colors, Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., F.R.I.B.A., whisks them away out of bleak March on a sort of Cook's Tour of the Riviera, Italy and one or two odd corners of Britain.

Who would not go to Venice?—broad sails looming up out of a streaked early morning sky; barges on the Grand Canal, floating on their wobbling, colored reflections; a pattern of prows, loads of vegetables, arches, people, steps. Or Taormina?—crowded design of ruins and hills; Capo St. Andrea, with its sickle sweep of land sweeping out from the terrace into the purple and green sea. There is Sorrento, with sails drying in the sun; and a tall Roman arch near Naples; a village fountain somewhere along the Riviera; a patch-work hill in Picardy. In Britain—Tormadoc Bay in Wales, an ancient castle, water, hills and fields; the hills and clouds of Dartmoor; a picturesque cottage in Wiltshire.

To look at Mr. Jones's paintings is essentially to go somewhere. As a delighted lady in the Gallery, yesterday, said: "So real!" There is nothing to stand between the traveller and the place; no worrying "point of view," no struggle for individual expression; no experiments. One feels that the painter is interested in what Eric Newton calls "the human vision"; that he is charmed with the places themselves, with their romance and color. He sets down so faithfully what he sees that his pictures would not fight with the letterpress of a book that was designed to attract travellers to Europe. This is not to say, however, that they are pitched in a high key; they are not blatant or in the least poster-like.

Mr. Jones works proficiently and with assurance, using broad free washes and achieving a solidity that is not always associated with the medium. This is particularly noticeable in the square towers of Pincio and the Riviera, and in the landscape done near Venice, with its towers standing solidly against the massive dark hills and the brooding clouds. Atmosphere, in the literal as well as the figurative sense, intrigues him. The sketches of Lake Macdonald consist of a series of moods; weather, if you like; clear water, shadows and reflections, shifting clouds, changing light.

In addition to the larger pictures, there are a great many thumbnail sketches, mostly moments of Lake Macdonald.

The exhibition will be open until Sunday, March 17.

This famous building, all that remains of the old Palace of Whitehall, has for long been a centre of Imperial associations. On the Naval side, visitors will see a complete Review of the Fleet in Miniature, and a series of models depicting the developments of battleships in the past twenty-five years, from the original Dreadnought to the Nelson of today. Particularly interesting will be a complete set of pictures of the men-of-war in which His Majesty served when a naval officer.

Another unique exhibit will be a forty-foot diorama depicting "The Mechanized Army of Today in Miniature," with all the units from headquarters to the fighting front. A section devoted to aviation will show the progress in service aircraft during a quarter of a century, with scale models of the most notable types.

Visitors will also be able to see a number of relics and exhibits presented to the Museum by Their Majesties the King and Queen and other members of the Royal family.

New York Art Corporation
Claims $30,000 Insurance
Following Local Fire

Testifying in the Superior Court as to the value of oil paintings said to have been damaged by fire, and for which the New York Art Corporation is seeking $30,000 under an insurance policy issued by the American Home Fire Insurance Company of New York, John J. Cusack, art dealer, yesterday characterized as a "frame-up" statements he is alleged to have made in a previous court action that the paintings suffered no damage in the fire.

The paintings are claimed by the plaintiff corporation to have been worth $89,000, originals of old masters. They were in Mr. Cusack's apartment at 1530 Bernard avenue west, Outremont, when the fire occurred in 1932. Mr. Cusack was testifying regarding amount of damage to the paintings when Senator C. P. Beaubien, K.C., attorney for the fire insurance company, sought to attack his credibility by pointing to apparently contradictory testimony rendered by him in another case over the paintings.

This previous case hinged on the validity of transfer of right of claim from Cusack to the New York Art Corporation, and Senator Beaubien read from a deposition said to have been made by Cusack to the effect that the paintings had not been harmed at all by the fire. "They tried to get me to commit perjury," said Mr. Cusack. "It was a camouflage."

READY TO GO LIMIT.

"That's going pretty far," warned Senator Beaubien.

"I'll go the limit," replied Mr. Cusack heatedly.

It was explained to the court by Henry Weinfield, K.C., attorney for the art corporation, that in 1932 his client had sold to Cusack nine paintings for $45,000 on the understanding that if they were not disposed of by him within a year they would be returned. He was required to insure the paintings. While they were in the art dealer's possession, the fire occurred and the paintings were damaged to the extent of $30,000, and suit was taken to recover.

Genuineness of the paintings was questioned by the insurance company, said Senator Beaubien in explaining the company's stand in refusing to pay indemnity. And they were not damaged in the fire, as alleged by plaintiff, he said.

Amplifying his stand, Senator Beaubien explained to Mr. Justice Wilfrid Mercier who is hearing the case, that the policy is invalid because false representations had been made that the paintings were formerly the property of the Royal Family of Greece and had hung in the National Palace. The paintings are not old masters and are not even copies of the originals, it was submitted. They were estimated to have a value of only $9,000.

OWNERSHIP DENIED.

A further ground in refusal to pay indemnity is that Cusack allegedly told the insurance company he was owner of the paintings when as a matter of fact they were in his possession under a conditional sale. The insurance company also contends there was collusion between Cusack and the art corporation in that the transfer of claim from Cusack to the corporation was made with the stipulation that the art dealer was to receive 20 per cent. of any amount which might be paid by the insurance company. This stipulation amounted to promotion of litigation on a commission basis and is therefore illegal, it was asserted.

Asked by Senator Beaubien whether on his arrival at his apartment after the fire he did not notice something peculiar, Mr. Cusack agreed emphatically that he did, because the apartment was fireproof for the paintings and no one ever smoked in it.

Further hearing is continuing today, with another four days scheduled to be taken up by the case.

Among the works of art said to have been included in the collection and damaged by the fire were "The Holy Family," by Salembeni, valued at $3,000; "Ecce Homo" by Ferrari, valued at a like sum; "Madonna and Child" by an unknown, valued at $20,000.

Associated with Mr. Weinfield is Henry Chauvin, K.C., and Samuel Rudenko. E. Gaddois, K.C., is associated with Senator Beaubien.

Shadowed in New Painting Movements

1910 FIXED AS KEY YEAR

Cubists and Expressionists
Then Made First Appearance, Prof. Hans Tietze, Vienna, Notes

"The European crisis had its forerunner in art," Prof. Hans Tietze, of Vienna, told a large audience of the Montreal Art Association, last night, in a lecture on "European Painting in 1910." Products which were sometimes suspected of frivolity or craziness or imposture, he said, speaking chiefly of Cubism and Expressionism, were revealed to be tragic documents of the European spirit just before the outbreak of the World War. "By their sensitiveness, which in one way is their professional quality, the artists foresaw the impending catastrophe. Once more art revealed itself the most delicate seismograph for the most intimate movements in the life of nations."

Why 1910 particularly? "It is surprising to note," said Prof. Tietze, "to what a degree the various artistic movements, although, of course, existing before and after, were concentrated in this year, which for the student of art assumes a character of fatality. I feel the year 1910 to be a symbolic focus of far-reaching artistic powers." It was in 1910 that the first cubists made their appearance — Picasso, Braque, Derain and others showing paintings in the Paris Salon d'Automne, in which the natural appearance of things were obviously and consciously deformed, in reaction against impressionism; it was in 1910 that Kirchner, Nolde, Schmitt-Rottuff and other young German expressionists formed "The Bridge"; that Kokoschka and others in Vienna showed efforts in the same direction; that the futurists of Italy, Marinetti, Severini, Prampolini, made their first turbulent manifestations; that the Russian painter Kandinsky published his book "The Spiritual Principle in Art," which contained the complete programme of what was afterwards called "absolute painting"—painting based on pure relations of forms and colors without the slightest regard for the natural appearance of objects.

DEVELOPMENT TRACED.

As he outlined the development of Cubism from French rationalism and of Expressionism from German feeling and irrationalism, influenced, on the one hand, by Cezanne and on the other, by van Gogh, and told of their rebellion against Impressionism, with its desire to reproduce the visible world and its aim at the cosmopolitan style, Prof. Tietze presented a series of remarkably fine slides, illustrating the characteristics of all schools. By reproduction of Gothic sculpture and mediaeval paintings, he also brought home to the audience the fact that the expressionists, sacrificing beauty to spiritual values, were not opposed to the real essence of art, but only to a certain interpretation of it. They and the cubists wished to deliver art from its isolation and to make of it an instrument of essential human needs.

The excitement and nervousness of those pre-war days had given way to a seeking for quiet and rest, the speaker concluded. The painters had found that there was something in tradition, after all. Art today was easier of access. But 1910 was no blind alley, and the modern form, the return to new classicism or naturalism, could only be explained by the fact that it had passed through Expressionism and Cubism.

Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, who introduced him, referred to the fact that Prof. Tietze had been for 25 years Professor of Art at the University of Vienna and had been given work of re-organizing the museum of Austria after the war.

One-man Show at Scott's Brings Out Artist's Individual Style

SUCCESSES ARE RECENT

Not Really Canadian Painter,
But One Born in Canada
Who Has Worked in Out of Way Places

One of the most individual painters in the history of Canadian art is David B. Milne, whose one-man show opened at the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street, yesterday. Indeed, to those who have learned to see their Canada in terms of men like Tom Thomson, Arthur Lismer, A. Y. Jackson and J. E. H. McDonald, he is not a Canadian painter at all. He is a painter. He was born in Canada and he works in our hills and woods, but he never gives us any sense of celebrating the Canadian scene; on the contrary, his delicate landscapes might have been painted anywhere; the fact is, he is impelled by an inner vision, by an individual philosophy and by the need to resolve individual problems. For years, he has lived his own life in little out-of-the-way places of Ontario, unmoved alike by the surge of the world outside and the development of art in his own country. It is only lately that he has come much to public notice, and his recent successes in Toronto and elsewhere are highly gratifying to all believers in the integrity of the artist.

At first glance, many will find Milne's canvases puzzling. Gallery visitors are frequently irritated, even affronted, by them, in the way that people have of being annoyed with the unusual. But the first impression is not only of strangeness but of authority. And the best of it is, these paintings are not obvious; they are the sort that grow: the more one looks at them, the better one likes them. What seems, on the first impact, to be a jumble of lines, sorts itself out into receding hills; a litter of twists reveals itself as a fallen tree and a tangle of driftwood on the beach; but, more than that, pattern develops, for Milne is not very much concerned with whether he is painting a little village at the bottom of a great empty sky, or water lilies and glass bottles, or even a paper bag or a crumpled comic supplement.

Milne works from the line, and a nervous, spontaneous line it is, and then washes in his color. His palette is meagre. It is quite in keeping with his ideas that there should be nothing sumptuous about his color or the way he lays it on, or that there should be little solidity in his forms. Sometimes he scarcely seems to visit the canvas at all, as if he said to himself: "Impressions are fleeting, always changing: why build up forms rigidly, as if they were eternal? Why be dogmatic? Look! the storm is over. The clouds are hurrying across the hills. There is a wan glimmer and a passing reflection in the pool. Quick! Let us catch them!" The moment, yes; but something else remains; a quiet melody, scarcely heard, on this beach; a serenity, in these hills; a grace, a delicacy, in these wisps of trees, in these white flowers.

SINCERITY NOT DOUBTED.

Milne likes white, and black, and the contrasts and separations wrought by black and white. Too much, sometimes, for comfort. How daring he is, filling up the foreground with a huge chimney and the angle of a house! A block of lifeless black. The contrast makes the spotted violets and greens behind the obstacle dance with a greater liveliness, but surely the cost is too great.

Some have said Milne is tricky; he has even been accused of evading the painter's problems; but there is no doubting his sincerity, and he is preoccupied with his own problems. And he has his own individual contribution to make to Canadian painting, a contribution as refreshing as it is valuable.

R.H.A.

Witness said that as the paintings now appeared in court, ranged about the walls, he could not see damage. One painting, however, that of Madame Malbran and reputed to be by Baron Gerard, the witness testified had a mark on the lady's bosom, a tear of the canvas.

The charge of conspiracy was made by Mr. Weinfield while he was examining Lucien Bernier, fire adjuster. He said that part of the plaintiff corporation's case was that there was conspiracy between one Schofield, official of the insurance company, and Cusack. On suggestion of Mr. Justice Wilfrid Mercier, the charge will be raised later during hearing of the case.

To examine into Grandperrin's competence to testify as an art expert, Senator C. P. Beaubien, K.C., acting for the defendant insurance company, asked him to name the school of painting in which the "Holy Family" belongs. Witness named the Venetian school which, he said, was characterized by religious subjects. Asked to name some painters of that school, witness obliged with a lengthy list.

"Not bad," murmured Senator Beaubien, approvingly. "And Leonardo da Vinci?"

"I would put him in the Florentine school," said Mr. Grandperrin.

Did Mr. Grandperrin know there were three Salimbis? Witness shrugged. If the "Holy Family" in court were painted by the great Salimbis, its value would be enhanced? Undoubtedly, said witness. Did he know if the painting exhibited were authentic? Witness admitted he had no way of knowing.

Lack of damage also seemed apparent to the witness as regards "Gentilhomme," reputedly by Maratta, "Ecce Homo," reputedly by Ferrari, "St. Cecilia," reputedly by Della Porta.

The court waited in silence for about a quarter hour pending arrival of Edward Young, broker, to testify for the plaintiffs. He was at the time of the fire a neighbor of Cusack's. The court remarked that because he was delaying the case, Mr. Young would qualify as a lawyer. It was explained that, being a broker, he was delayed because of the stock market, which closed at three o'clock. Mr. Weinfield observed he didn't know that such things as stocks existed these days.

FIRE STORY TOLD

Mr. Young testified that when he was appraised of the fire, he telephoned for the fire reels and then rushed to pour three buckets of water on a blazing sofa, which was in the salon where the pictures were hanging. Overhead was the "Holy Family." The smoke was quite thick, he said.

Maurice Cusack, 17-year-old son of the art dealer, described the fire and smoke in the salon. He threw glasses of water on the flames, he said. The fire reels arrived in a few minutes.

Lucien Bernier, fire adjuster connected with the Canadian Fire Adjusting Company, asserted that the paintings were damaged, because there was no fire yet which did not cause damage. Asked by Senator Beaubien whether, in the face of testimony of art experts that there was no damage, he persisted in saying the paintings had been injured, witness reiterated emphatically that he did. Senator Beaubien pointed out that the surface of the painting of the "Holy Family," which witness said was damaged, would not absorb smoke or effects of the fire, and asked him whether he, as an adjuster, was competent to judge alleged damage.

At this point, His Lordship rose, for the hour was after the usual lunch time adjournment, and walked out with his judicial hat on while question and answer were still being put. The case is continuing today.

Testimony by an art expert called to establish damage to the paintings that they actually suffered none, and charge of conspiracy involving an official of the insurance company, featured yesterday's session of the Superior Court case in which the New York Art Corporation is seeking $30,000 from the American Home Fire Insurance Company.

The paintings, said to be old masters and alleged to have been damaged in a fire which broke out in the Outremont apartment of J. J. Cusack, art dealer, were valued by the plaintiff corporation at at least $100,000. Indemnity is now sought almost on the full amount of insurance.

Georges Grandperrin, artist summoned by the plaintiff to testify as to damage of the paintings, was unable to say that they had suffered any actual damage. "The Holy Family," reputedly by Salimbis, which a previous witness had estimated to be worth from $30,000 to $100,000, Mr. Grandperrin said looked undamaged to him.

So contrary did his testimony seem to Henry Weinfield, K.C., lawyer for the art corporation, that he referred to the witness as an "adverse witness," though summoned by himself. Mr. Weinfield confronted him with a written statement purported to be signed by the witness and asked him how he reconciled his verbal testimony yesterday with what he had written establishing the amount of damage suffered by the paintings.

Art at the Opening of The Century

One of the most surprising exhibitions that has been seen here in recent times is that which is being shown at Scott's on Drummond street, of works by David B. Milne. According to all usually accepted rules and customs of painting Mr. Milne's work is undoubtedly bad; but he is not concerned with any accepted ideas on the subject and has worked out a method of his own which, in many of his pictures, produces astonishing results.

Form seems to interest Mr. Milne very little and surface even less; what he has painted in most of his pictures is the general effect of light and atmosphere in open spaces, sometimes in the country and sometimes over the roof-tops of a small town. The light is got with large areas of white, on which heavy black outlines are combined with mere dabs of color, which in some cases are merely suggestions. One of the surprising things about these pictures is the amount of color which is suggested, but the method has the evident fault that it leaves a great deal to the spectator, and it is hardly likely that most of the people who look at the pictures will be bothered to exercise their imaginations to the necessary extent. At a close view much of this work gives little but chaos and ugliness; from the right distance it falls into place, light appears, lumps in the sky become clouds and the pictures assume form and color.

The use which Mr. Milne makes of blacks and leaden greys is rather disconcerting; he puts blacks into landscapes where no one else would use them; yet his black rocks and trees and black waters somehow fit into his scheme. There is, however, a black foreground in a picture of Six Mile Lake which hardly represents anything in nature. An interior, painted largely in very dark grey, is strangely effective from the right view-point, but Mr. Milne's outdoor scenes are generally much more satisfying than his interiors or still life pictures.

Mr. Milne's method is clearly his own and is not copied from any one else. Most well-trained painters will observe that he can not or will not paint, but, for all that, he sees things which are worth painting and paints them with a technique which appears to be childish but must have been fully developed to get the effects that he wants. His way of painting is his own and he is able to make good use of it; he has imitated no one else and his work does not call for imitation by others.

Landscapes by Ruth Dingle

A collection of small pictures by Miss Ruth M. Dingle, makes a very pleasant exhibition at the Coffee House, 1191 Union Avenue. Nearly all of them are oil pictures, some of them painted out of doors, and records of facts rather than compositions, but good ones and full of color. They show places all over Canada, from Victoria to Nova Scotia, and there are some excellent Quebec landscapes. Most of them, however, and some of the best are of mountains and lakes, and Miss Dingle has been remarkably successful in the difficult business of painting mountains. There are a number of good mountains in the exhibition, most of them from Jasper Park or thereabouts, and some fine crags in the Tonquin Valley. Other very satisfying pictures are of places on Ontario Lakes, among them Canoe Lake—Tom Thomson's lake. For the most part the pictures have been painted in the summer; snow, except on mountain tops, is comparatively scarce in them, and in most of them there is gay color, with sunlight and blue skies. Two exceptions, which are both good pictures, show an approaching snowstorm in the Laurentians and a sea fog on the Nova Scotian coast. Two pictures in water color and tempera are particularly good—views of Maligne Lake, full of color, a little formal in design and decorative. A group of decorative medieval costumes is interesting.

in Court

Expert evidence on the effects of a fire on a group of paintings for which the New York Art Corporation is seeking damages of $30,000 under a fire insurance policy, from the American Home Fire Insurance Company, of New York, was resumed before Mr. Justice Mercier in the Superior Court today.

George Grandperrin, Montreal artist, admitted that he had made a report following the fire in the apartment of J. J. Cusack, in which he stated that the damage appeared to be serious, although he could not be absolutely certain on the point. At that time, he explained, the paintings were covered with a fine ash from the smoke. As they now appeared in the court, he said, with the smoke cleared off, there appeared to him to be no damage.

As to his valuation of the damage, he said that he had based his earlier figures on the assumption that the pictures in question were the authentic old masters, claimed by the plaintiff. Personally he had no means of knowing positively whether they were authentic or not. The hearing is continuing.

Hearing of the case in which the New York Art Corporation is seeking $30,000 from the American Home Fire Insurance Company for damage said to have been caused by six paintings in a fire, came to an abrupt halt yesterday in Superior Court as Mr. Justice Wilfrid Mercier called off proceedings until the pictures are produced in court this morning.

During the morning yesterday the court was being treated to a detailed description of the value of the paintings, claimed to be old masters, and of the amount of damage caused them in the fire which occurred at Outremont in the home of J. J. Cusack, art dealer, when His Lordship, after looking at photographs of the paintings, agreed they should be produced "in the flesh" and ordered their appearance in court this morning. There was adjournment during the afternoon awaiting their production.

The motion asking that the pictures be produced was presented by the insurance company, and said: "Whereas the plaintiff, the New York Art Corporation, is claiming in virtue of a transfer of an insurance claim by one J. J. Cusack in favor of the plaintiff, damages allegedly suffered in a fire by some paintings described in the declaration in this case; and whereas the six paintings alleged to have been damaged have not been produced in court and that it is in the interest of justice and of the parties that the plaintiff be ordered to produce instantaneously the paintings claimed damaged; and whereas the defendants, in accord with the judgment granting the motion and ordering the pictures to be produced at 10.15 this morning.

ART RESTORER HEARD.

Prior to the adjournment testimony was given by Albert Thompson of 120 Claremont avenue, who described himself as an art restorer.

He identified photographs of pictures he had examined at the Cusack home after the fire. From a memorandum in pencil he gave details of titles and names of the artists.

Dealing with original values of the paintings, Mr. Thompson said at Old Masters have no actual value in that they sell for what they would fetch in London. There is no market in Montreal.

One picture, entitled the "Holy Family," claimed to have been worth 9,000, was now said to be a complete loss. Damage was caused, the rest was told, by smoke and heat.

Hearing was resumed before Mr. Justice Mercier in the Supreme Court today of the claim for $30,000 by the New York Art Corporation against the American Home Fire Insurance Company, as damages alleged to have been caused to a group of paintings in the course of a fire in the Outremont apartment of John J. Cusack.

Called as a witness for the plaintiff company, George Delfosse, well-known Canadian artist, stated that he had gone to see the display of paintings in the apartment of Cusack previous to the fire. Subsequently, after the fire, he had visited the place in company with Henri Prost, artist, and had examined the paintings for possible damage. It was his opinion, he said, that the pictures had decreased in value to the extent of $30,000.

Testimony of Henri Prost, summoned as an art expert to establish the value of paintings and extent of damage sustained in the Outremont home of J. J. Cusack, art dealer, with efforts of the defence to discredit his testimony, were among the highlights of the case in the Superior Court yesterday in which the New York Art Corporation is seeking $30,000 from the American Home Fire Insurance Company.

With cross-examination of Mr. Prost by Senator C. P. Beaubien, K.C., for the insurance company, still unfinished, Mr. Justice Wilfrid Mercier adjourned further hearing to Monday.

A painting of the Holy Family said to be by Salimbeni Mr. Prost valued at from $30,000 to $100,000 prior to the fire. After the fire the oil was retouched, giving it a newer appearance and making it lose its appearance of antiquity so that the picture is now worthless, he said. The loss because of fire he estimated at 100 per cent.

To attack his competence to judge the paintings, Senator Beaubien asked Mr. Prost to outline his art training and his work. It developed he had studied at the Beaux Arts School in Lyons, France, and had done decorating work here such as in the Palestre du Nationale, the school hall of St. Sacrement, and the church at Montebello. Asked by Mr. Beaubien if he knew which of three paintings of the "Holy Family" by Salimbeni was the one figuring in the litigation, witness replied he did not.

PAINTINGS IN COURT

Following judgment of Mr. Justice Mercier on Tuesday, the paintings were brought to court yesterday to serve as exhibits. They were ordered produced at 10.15 in the morning but at noon only four had made their appearance, and the court would not sit until all six had been produced. As His Lordship explained smilingly, it was necessary that the "corpus delicti" be at hand before hearing would commence.

With the paintings came a large number of experts summoned by both sides of the case and a crowd of curious lawyers and the general public to get a look at the works of art.

The pictures ranged about the court room walls for purposes of the case, and their attributed painters, were the Holy Family, by Salimbeni, insured for $11,000; Madame Malibran, by Baron Gerard, insured for $7,500; Primitif, by an unknown, painted on plaster; Saint Cecile, by Barthelemy Della Porta; Ecce Homo, by Ferrarri; and Gentilhomme, by Maratta.

Among the art experts summoned to give testimony were Georges Parrain, Henri Prost and Georges Delfosse, all of Montreal; Richard Offner, professor of the history of art of New York University; Dr. Frank Muller, of New York; Alphonse Jongers and Sidney Carter, of Montreal, and C. R. Hazen, chemical expert.

Cover Wide Range

Reproductions of masterpieces of landscape and figure painting by artists of Europe, Japan and China—covering a period from the days of Pompeii to the modern work of Van Gogh, Cezanne, Augustus John and others are on view in the Arts Club, Victoria street and will continue until April 19.

All prints are color reproductions produced by photo-mechanical processes and many of them are the size of the original paintings. They show the remarkable advance in productive color printing achieved since the days of Chromos which were the pride of early Victorians.

Many of the great printers of today are represented by selected examples in which colors, textures and the sense of reality are such as deceive one into believing they are the originals and not copies.

The exhibition affords an unusual opportunity to inspect the work of some of the best printers in Great Britain, France, Germany and Austria and it is interesting to record that the British work is the equal of any shown.

Apart from the quality of these prints, the show also reveals how much appropriate framing adds to the beauty of pictures.

The prints are from the collections of Sidney Carter, W. Scott & Sons, The Johnson Arts Galleries and W. S. Maxwell.

W.H. MITCHELL DIES

Noted Scottish Author and Artist Once Resided in Montreal

Word was received from London yesterday of the death at Braintree, Essex, of William Hutton Mitchell, widely-known Scottish author and artist, who, from 1926 to 1931 was a resident of Montreal. He was in his 64th year.

Mr. Mitchell, during his residence here, held a number of successful exhibitions at local galleries showing his various spring exhibitions of the association of Montreal Royal Canadian Academy, specialized on landscape paintings of the year and congenial material in the tian country north of Montreal in the Habitant scene. So draughtsmanship, his works also marked by good arrangement and agreeable color.

Born in Dundee, Scotland, son of the Rev. Peter Mitchell, tor of Blairgowrie, Mr. Mitchell educated at the Dundee High School and later studied art at Healey's Art School in London at Julian's Ateliers in Paris. For years he was on the staff of Illustrated News, the London Bystander and the Sketch, during the Great War was correspondent of The Graphic.

He was the author of two novels, "The Deviations of Diana," published in 1920, and "The Forth Man," published in 1930, both of which won success in Canada.

During his stay in Montreal, he was recognized as one of the most able of visiting painters, and his oils are now included in the collection of many a prominent resident of the metropolis. He lectured here upon many occasions, particularly on art and literature and before the Canadian Authors' Association and the Arts and Letters Club.

In his early days in London, when he first had a studio, he roomed with Ramsay MacDonald, Prime Minister of Great Britain today, and ever remained his close friend.

He was a member of the Savage Club, London; the Pen and Pencil Club, the National Sporting Club of England, and the famed Fabian Society.

He was known as the distinguished illustrator of the first edition of Charles Dickens' "A Child's History of England," published by Chapman and Hall in 1888-90.

Mr. Mitchell is survived by four sons, Alan and Bruce Mitchell, of Montreal; Alec Mitchell, of Australia; and Donald Mitchell, of England. He is also survived by daughter of his second marriage, Annette Joy Mitchell.

VISIT TO CHRISTIE'S

No one who wants to keep in touch with the Art world can afford to omit frequent visits to Christie's Galleries in King street, St. James' Square, and they are, moreover, among the most interesting places in London in which to pass an idle hour.

Here one may see cheek by jowl the most incongruous things and meditate on the turn of fortune's wheel that brings an extraordinary collection of family portraits to the auction room.

I wandered in there yesterday, and was struck by the amazingly bad condition of most of the old pictures. Perhaps the high prices charged by expert restorers has something to do with it. The general impression on first entering was that a lot of second-rate pictures were being cleared out from private collections. It needed the catalogue to make one realize that these dirty, cloudy canvases were the work of such masters as Zoffany, Reynolds, Mabuse, Raeburn, Bronzino, Lawrence, Brouwer, Rembrandt, Rubens, Alan, Ramsay, Kneller, Lely, Hoppner and many others.

As I foretold, Miss Caroline Seaforth, the author of "Glory Jam," has followed her first great success with another novel that will rival its predecessor, "More than Kind" is a witty story of a lovely young thing who manages to combine the possession of a mind of pristine, pellucid clarity with a quick-witted capacity for amusing repartee which much more sophisticated people might well envy. The author has the unusual gift of creating novel unhackneyed characters that are yet convincingly alive. She makes her readers feel that it they haven't happened to meet similar people that is only their bad luck. The book is published by Messrs. Gollancz, 14 Henrietta street, W.C. 1.

Plenty of variety marks the Fifty-second Annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, which opened with a private view in the west Sherbrooke street galleries last night. There is no evidence that Art is on the wane—in all departments the exhibits total 423, the result of a discreet winnowing of the 1,080 items submitted. The jury of selection faced a difficult task and, certainly, there is ample evidence of open minds. On the walls will be found something to excite the interest of widely divergent tastes. There are pictures that will appeal to those who believe that the aim of a painter is to simulate Nature as viewed through normal eyes, and there are also works that will be welcome to those who argue that the farther the painter keeps away from Nature the better. In the main, the average of work is up to normal, there is evidence of much sincere industry and the general impression is that it is a "lively" show.

Something of a departure is shown by F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., in a life-size portrait of "La Danseuse Carlotta"—a work capably handled, well posed and attractive in the treatment of the green dress. This painter, besides a nude, shows typical winter scenes with logging teams, being particularly effective with "March Snow"—a team in a narrow tote-road edged by evergreens laden with snow. Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., shows his usual confident handling of paint in "Point Levis"—river, distant blue hills and church and buildings, and in the more dramatic "Clearing Weather," with meadow, strip of water and noble, darkened hill beneath lowering clouds. H. Mabel May, A.R.C.A., is represented by typical works, boldly painted and characteristic in design, among them being the vigorous "Melting Snow" with its buildings, water, trees and distant hills. Hal Ross Perrigard, A.R.C.A., shows works of fresh color, one of particular interest here being "Old Hay Market," at the foot of Inspector street. Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, shows steamers at a wharf in "Laid Up," and "La Pastourelle"—a pastel of a girl, by A. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., bears evidence of being an early work. Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., shows careful observation in his treatment of clouds which move above very inviting landscapes with distant hills and hints of lake and brook. Among his works are "Over the Valley," "Summer Shower" and "Summer Sunset," the last-named being very true of the hour.

In "Winter, La Malbaie," Albert H. Robinson, R.C.A., has a work of good pattern and clean color, the spruce-dotted rounded hills, above the house-lined road, with sleigh, ice and bits of open water and bare trees being set down with vigor.

GOOD TONAL VALUES.

R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., has an atmospheric impression in "Low Tide, Chateau Richer, P.Q.," with group of buildings dominated by the church, patches of grass and mud on which rests a boat and in the distance a blue headland and water. Overhead clouds are breaking and there is a fragment of a rainbow. His other canvas, "March Thaw, Beupre, P.Q.," is a work of fine tone—river with broken ice, a high snowy bank, poplars and an old house. In the handling of the subtle values of white and grey it is wholly satisfying.

Apparently shunning the decoratively treated birches, misty moon and water of earlier years, Archibald Brown, R.C.A., of Lancaster, Ont., shows a solidly painted hilly landscape called "The Golden Cloud," and Homer Watson, R.C.A., of Doon, Ont., sends two oils—"Under the Trees at Caledon" being marked by a sense of solidity in the trees, but disturbing in technique and lacking the clean color that used to mark his landscapes. George Thomson, O.S.A., of Owen Sound, Ont., in "Reflected Sunlight" paints a winding stream, trees in autumn leaf and a sunny sky filled with clouds. Adam Sherriff Scott shows skill in the composition of his historical picture, "Frontenac at Cataragui"—the Governor with his staff ranged before Indians in audience, with barges and canoes in the background. Elizabeth Styring Nutt, A.R.C.A., of Halifax, has an old-world garden with statue, peacock and flowers in "Sanctuary," and Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., in "Place Jacques Cartier" shows the Nelson Monument, dome of Bonsecours Market and grain elevators, while in the foreground figures move in the shade of the trees fronting the old Court House.

"West Indian Laundry"—colored women washing clothes in a stream, distant cottages, tropical trees and heat, is the most important offering of Harold Beament, who also shows his ability to paint a winter scene in "Covered Bridge." G. S. Bagley brings a decorative touch to the handling of the rocky shore past which two men sail, in his oil called "Labrador Shore." Aleksander Bercovitch displays his usual strong handling of paint in three works—"The Negro Girl," "Ninel, the Little Grandmother," and "The Artist's Family"—the last-named showing a marked advance. Andre Bieler groups figures in a garden handling material in his big canvas entitled "The Pink Wool," and Jack Beder in his large oil called "And by Night They Resume Their Existence" shows a dimly lighted drinking place, with pianist, young men and women chatting and refreshing themselves at table, with, in the foreground, a youth who has "passed out." It is an ambitious offering, shows courage and, despite lack of subtlety in values, is bold and effective. Gordon E. Pfeiffer, of Quebec, in "October Wind, Upper Saguenay," paints high shore and hills, boats under sail and trees bent before the blast. A. Leslie Perry manifests his characteristic serious approach to landscape in his scene of hills, trees, ice and water in "Spring on the North River," and Eric Riordon reveals skill in painting snow-clad mountain peaks in scenes from Switzerland and the Austrian Tyrol. Thurstan Topham still studies the problems of night in "Moonlight, Montreal from La Prairie," and sun-splashed buildings and trees have occupied Phyllis M. Percival in her confidently painted oil called "Shadows, Victoria Street." Jean Munro finds congenial subjects at Lac Tremblant and at Cap a L'Aigle, and Rita Mount gives a good impression of sea, shore, roads and houses as seen from a height in "Three Sisters, L'Echouerie," and suggests chill and discomfort in "Winter Day." David McGill shows four works that reveal a good sense of atmosphere. He has found congenial material in scattered places—"Evening Glow, Quebec," "Early Spring, Vertu Road," "Low Tide, Bic," and "Autumn Evening, Ste. Petronille, Isle of Orleans."

MANY PORTRAITS SHOWN.

Portraiture is a growing section and contains much meritorious work. Alphonse Jongers is represented by a portrait of Ward C. Pittfield, which is handled in his usual confident manner, and Lillias Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., has two works—George Hogg, ex-mayor of Westmount, and a large, impressive portrait of F. E. Meredith, K.C., LL.D. By Kenneth K. Forbes, R.C.A., of Toronto, is a portrait of Mrs. Jules Timmins. Done in his usual finished manner, with careful attention to the surface of fabrics, well placed and discreet in the brighter color notes—a green fan and green curtain—it is certain to appeal to many. By Simone Denechoud is a portrait of Mme. Adrien Duranleau, and Moira Drummond signs a portrait of Mrs. J. A. D. McCurdy. "Helena" is from the capable brush of Stella Grier, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, and Miriam R. Holland does a pastel portrait of Mrs. A. D. Skelton, of Ottawa. Chief Judge G. Perrault is the subject by Frank Iacurto, and Margaret McGill has a portrait of David McGill, Jr. By Adam Sherriff Scott there is a portrait of Mrs. L. Shklar, while portraits are the subjects of miniatures by Mrs. Gladys F. Elrod, Mrs. A. G. Hodgins, Mrs. Louie K. Raynsford, Margaret W. Richardson, Margaret J. Sanborn, Evelyn R. Smith, and Catherine Van Tuyl.

There seems to be a marked trend towards flower paintings and in this sphere of artistic activity attractive work is shown by Melita Aitken, of Victoria, B.C., with peonies and also Hibiscus of Hawaii. Tiger-lilies and peonies are the offering of Mrs. Mina Alexander, while tulips have interested W. R. Allen. F. O. Call, of Lennoxville, sends Japanese peonies, and Hazel M. Caverhill finds beauty in "Tulips from Kay's Garden." Sally Hereford, of Ottawa, does gladioli and geranium in pastel, and Lillian Hingston has a well arranged and capably painted variety of spring flowers. Jean M. Maclean shows peonies, and delphinium and nasturtiums have attracted Christian McKiel, of Sackville, N.B. Tulips and daffodils are the offering of Campbelline R. Moodie, of Ottawa, and by Mrs. John Ogilvy is "Still Life and Roses." A. M. Shaw, of Halifax, sends flower studies and "Spring Flowers" is from the brush of Frances B. Sweeney. Capital in drawing and delicate in color is "Campanula"—a design by Ruby Le Boutillier, while Margaret Clare has a painting of trilliums, and Elizabeth Mitchell is effective in her spray of yellow roses.

MANY GOOD WATERCOLORS.

Watercolor as a medium is being more resorted to and the section devoted to this art is one of the strongest in years. In almost all the work there is a tendency to handle this medium in bold summary fashion—clean washes of crisp color. In this group there are many accomplished painters—Henry J. Simpkins who, finding the Laurentian country much to his liking, reveals the beauties of snow-laden spruces in "Winter's Blanket," sun rays on distant hills, fronted by rolling wooded snowy country, in "Changing Weather," and the pattern made by shadows on snow in a landscape with farmhouses, called "Evening Shadows." All these works are marked by sound drawing, good tone and free treatment. Hugh G. Jones gives strength to this section with two Venetian scenes, capably composed and handled with confidence. James E. Beckwith has two good atmospheric snowscapes—"The Mountain," with buildings and a snowy waste stretching to a distant ridge, and "Farm." Paul Caron sends four—"Early Spring, Bale St. Paul," with its rolling country and distant peaks being nice in tone, while the familiar horse and sleigh are present in "Champlain Street, Quebec," and in "Old Courts, Craig Street, East, Montreal." Lorne Holland Bouchard successfully suggests spaciousness in her winter landscape with farmhouses, called "Second Range, Douglstown, Gaspe," and K. L. de Conde shows a free touch and good drawing in "Early Snow" and "Late Afternoon, Morin Heights." G. N. Norwell shows landscapes with his usual decorative handling, and Harry E. G. Rickets has a winter landscape with strong lights and shadows in "Mid-Winter Brightness, Morin Heights." William Rigg has imparted rush and turmoil to his waterfall in hilly country, called "Laurentian River." By Rudolf von Elsterman is "Early Nocturne, Lac Superieur," with a clouds breaking above distant hills and the lakeshore and the end of the island in shadow. A. V. Coverley-Price, of Ottawa, reveals the practised hand in "Mosque by Moonlight, Egypt," and "In an Andean Village, Peru," Andre Lapine, A.R.C.A., in his group exhibits his habitual skill in painting horses.

Star April 3 Sketches and Pictures by Maurice Cullen

A collection of work by the late Maurice Cullen which, with a few larger, finished pictures, contains a quantity of the personal sketches, which he did not exhibit, is being shown at the Watson Art Galleries in Sherbrooke St. The sketches are the more interesting part of the exhibition, since they will bring to many people a new view of Mr. Cullen's work.

A few of them are fairly large and might be called pictures until they are compared with the more finished works which are with them. One of these,—one of the most striking things in the collection,—is a view of sunset looking up the St. Lawrence over Wolfe's Cove, evidently quickly painted but entirely complete in its values of light and color, and a beautiful little picture. Another fine color sketch is of a group of big trees on the shore at Beupre; still more a picture than a sketch is a winter scene, looking across Dominion Square to St. George's Church, a wonderful study of snow and mist in an evening light. A pastel view from Northmount is admirable for the play of light in the distance; another sketch, near the same place in Autumn, is full of lively browns, yellows and greens. Two others of the larger sketches, with richness of coloring, are of Ste. Irene and of a rocky shore on the Brittany coast.

The small sketches were painted in many places; a few are snow peaks in the Rockies; one is of Paris,—the river and a bridge, with lights shining in the houses against a grey evening sky,—rather unlike Mr. Cullen's usual manner of painting. Also unusual is a quick sketch of a wharf in Newfoundland, with figures just dashed in. There are also some of the sketches which Mr. Cullen made in France in the War,—studies of ruins and desolation, tumbled-down farms, dug-outs and tents,—very interesting records of the places and of the painter.

Most of the smaller sketches were evidently first studies for larger pictures, some of which, unfortunately, seem never to have been painted. In spite of their size several of them convey almost as much as the bigger pictures. There is one of late afternoon at Lac Tremblant, a study of grey and brown hills and reflections, which is a wonderful example of saying much with the simplest means. Rather similar is one of the Heron Pool, Cache River,—a peaceful picture of late summer, which has little color but suggests much. A harvest field, with a diversity of yellows, of grain in the foreground, and of trees on the hill behind, and a tiny snow sketch, painted near Chicoutimi, very simple and brilliant, stand out among many good things.

Pictures of Flowers by Clara Hagarty

Flower painting is a branch of art which never loses its attractions for painters or for the public; much of it is done in Canada and is to be seen at every exhibition. A collection of work by one of the best of Canadian flower painters, Clara Hagarty, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., of Toronto, is now being shown in Eaton's gallery. As in former exhibitions by the same painter there are flowers of all kinds and many of the pictures are accurate studies or portraits; but the present collection seems even better than former ones and it contains many pictures in which ornamental effect is quite as important as truth. There are a number in which white or light colored flowers are shown against white or light backgrounds with very happy results.

Some of the best of these pictures are "Heavenly Blue," of pale blue convolvulus, broadly and simply painted, another of very pale yellow roses against a white backing, a larger and very decorative picture of white roses in front of blue and white tiles, and a very good one of white trilliums in a white jar. One of the most striking of all the pictures is "Iris in Ireland," in which white or pale yellow irises are backed by a view of blue distant hills.

Spring Exhibition Of Art Association Opened On Thursday Star March 22/35

The fifty-second spring exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, which was opened on Thursday evening with the usual reception and private view, gives little en- couragement to the people who like to find each exhibition inferior to those of former years. It is, on the whole, one of the best of recent years; the portraits, if not very numerous, are interesting, the land- scape painters have seen the world more cheerfully than in some former seasons, there are a number of good flower pictures. Water color, which has been making great pro- gress for some years, makes a further stride in this exhibition; works of sculpture are as numerous and quite as good as they have been for many years. While the whole number of works shown is about the same as in other years, the hanging committee have distributed them in such a way that there is no appear- ance of crowding and everything can be well seen. There are not a few outstanding works and the whole exhibition makes a pleasant impression.

The exhibitors of pictures in oil, water color and pastel in this year's exhibition are: Archibald Browne, R.C.A.; F. S. Coburn, R.C.A.; Ken- neth Forbes, R.C.A.; Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A.; R. W. Pilot, R.C.A.; Albert Robinson, R.C.A.; A. Some Pictures In the Spring Exhibition star

There are several portraits which stand out in this year's Spring Ex- hibition at the Art Association. One of these is Lillian Torrance Newton's large portrait of F. E. Meredith, a picture of great dignity, with very clever treatment of black robes; the face is strangely dark in tone, but this evidently helps the composition of the picture. F. S. Coburn's "La danseuse Carlotta" not only looks like a good portrait, but is highly decorative both in line and colour; Adam Sherriff Scott's portrait of Mrs. Shklar is a good picture in a slightly formal way and there is more life in his excellent study of a girl in red, "The studio visitor." Aleksander Bercovitch's group of his family is full of life and character and is much the best of his three portraits; Alphonse Jongs' portrait of Ward Pittfield is painted with his usual skill, and there is much clever painting, with a certain hardness, in Kenneth Forbes' portrait of Mrs. Jules Timmins. The portrait by Henri Fabien would seem to be good as a portrait, if it is not very in- teresting as a picture. An excellent pastel study of a girl by Suzor-Cote is in the water colour room and there are some good sketches of heads and other portrait studies by Frank Panabaker, Paul Andrew, Mrs. J. B. Pringle, Ernestine Knopf, Margaret Harvey, R. W. Major and Margaret McGill, a good Negro's head by Medard Raymond and a girl's figure in water colour by C. W. Kelsey.

Harold Beament's "West Indian Laundry," a group of Negro women on a river bank, has lots of light colour and movement, and the landscape is as good as the figures; two very pleasant and lively groups of peasant girls are by J. Sulyok de Papp; Jack Beder's group of people in a cafe is large and ambitious and contains some good study of char- acter.

Many interesting landscapes have come to this exhibition. Two good examples of Homer Watson's work have his characteristic and rather sad colouring, but gay colouring is rather the rule this year. There is plenty of colour in Archibald Browne's large mountain picture, one of the best that he has shown in recent years; there is cheerful colour in Albert Robinson's "Winter, La Malbaie," fine greens and blues in Paul Earle's "Point Lewis," and pale autumn colours in George Thom- son's very true "Reflected sunlight." Mabel May's "Castle of Industry" and "Melting snow" are two of the best of her recent pictures and among three pictures by Phyllis M. Percival is a very good study of sun- light and shade in a Montreal street. R. W. Pilot's "March thaw, Beaufort" has excellent painting of wet snow. Among other landscapes to be noted are those by Rita Mount, Alice Des Clayes and Jean Munro. Lorna Lomer Macaulay's "Ste Genevieve," Thurston Topham's moonlight pictures, Wilfred Barnes' skies, G. T. Slater's little Scottish loch, G. S. Bagley's "Labrador Shore," Edith Harding's "March thaw," Norman K. Hay's "Rock formation," Eric Riordon's Alpine mountains and atmosphere and St. G. Burgoyne's large snow scene. There are good sketches, rather than pictures by Tom Hall, H. L. Masson, Gwendolyn Sait, D. A. J. Pavitt and Alfred Mickle, and a good sea pic- ture by Renee Vautelet.

Water colours have taken an in- creasingly important place in these exhibitions for several years and this year they are, if no better than last year, about as good. James E. Beck- with has two very good, broadly painted landscapes; his nude is an interesting study, but not entirely successful; three big drawings by Henry J. Simpkins are very clever, if not quite of his best. Some admir- able drawings of town scenes are the best of Andre Lapine's work here, while Paul Caron, with some of his town pictures, has a particularly good open landscape of the hills near Baie St. Paul. There are good atmosphere and tone in Alex. J. Musgrove's "October," and fine colour in Hal Ross Perrigard's bright red door sur- rounded by green and in D. Mary Bagley's "The Derelict, Tadousac." A large and clever drawing by Lorne Holland Bouchard, an interior of a nearly empty room by H. Hood, Frederick Cross' "Wild Geese," the drawings of Tom Roberts, Valentine Fanshaw, John Humphries, Harry E. G. Ricketts and K. L. de Conde, and sketches by Peggy Shaw and Arline Genereux are among the best of the water colours.

There is rather more than the usual abundance of flower pictures this year and most of them are more than usually good; the hanging com- mittee have grouped a number of them together on one wall with good effect. Among the more outstanding ones are an excellent decoration of white tulips against a blue drapery by Hazel M. Caverhill, Mabel May's "Study in Rose and Green," Mrs. John Ogilvy's study of glass and roses, A. M. Shaw's water colours and Mrs. D. S. Ryshpan's wild flow- ers. Others of the many good flower pictures are those by Lillian Hingston, Melita Aitken, Mrs. Mina Alexander, Kenneth H. Holmden, Gertrude V. Fleming, Sally Here- ford, Elizabeth Mitchell, Ruby Le Boutillier and Margaret Clare. P. H. Tacon's much magnified tulip is more curious than pleasing.

Successful studies of still life are by Emaline Keefer, Paul Andrew and T. R. Macdonald. There is some clever handling of lighting in R. B. Partridge's "Interior," and a remarkable effect of perspective and space in Norman Bethune's view of an operating theatre.

Miniatures can hardly be seen to the best advantage in an exhibition of this kind, but there are some good ones in the small collection which is shown. The more notable ones are those of Mrs. Louie K. Raynsford, Evelyn R. Smith, Margaret W. Richardson, Catherine Van Tuyl, Mrs. Gladys F. Elrod, Margaret J. Sanborn and Mrs. A. G. Hodgins.

VIEW OF ART A New Guild Of Artists

Commercial artists have become so numerous and are so necessary that they have found it desirable to get together for mutual support and the exchange of information. A Guild of Canadian Commercial Artists was formed in Toronto some time ago and a Montreal branch of this Guild has just been founded. The inauguration of this new branch took place at the beginning of March, with a well attended meeting at which James Crockart was elected president, and W. G. Finch, a former member of the Toronto chapter, vice- president.

The Guild is publishing a small monthly magazine, The Guild Artist, of which the March issue is number 3. It contains a variety of articles by members, some practical, some amusing, which indicate a lively activity in the Guild. Acknowledgements are made in it to the Canadian Society of Graphic Arts in Toronto for the assistance which it has given to the Guild.

Color Prints Shown in Two Exhibitions

Star April 11, 1935

At the Arts Club on Victoria street there are being shown till April 19th a number of examples of the printed color reproductions of pictures of many styles and times. The exhibition, which is called Color Prints produced by Photo-Mechanical Methods, shows very well the extraordinary fidelity of reproduction which is now almost a commonplace of printing, no longer in one or two places only, but in nearly every country where good printing is done.

Work of this kind, and of astonishing quality, had been done in Germany and Austria for years before the war and was being done by a few printers in England. The German reproductions which are in this exhibition are mostly of works by modern painters and these replicas of pictures by Renoir, Van Gogh, Cezanne, Utrillo and a few newer German painters, miss very little, if anything, that is in the originals. The most striking of the Austrian prints which are shown reproduce old Russian ikons and seem to be very exact.

The work of Italian color printers is not generally so well known; the few which are in this exhibition are remarkably true and complete reproductions of Italian pictures by Botticelli, Ghirlandajo and others. A few Italian pictures are also among the English reproductions—Medici Society prints—but the English prints cover a wide field; there are many English pictures, in oil and water color, old and modern—works by Reynolds and Bonington, and by Brangwyn, Russel Flint, Augustus John and other painters. There are also some reproductions of old English color prints and some excellent ones of Chinese and Japanese paintings—some of them made for the British Museum.

The exhibits are not only of interest as examples of modern printing but, hung as they are in the Arts Club, they give a great idea of the value of color prints as room decorations.

Another application of color printing is to be seen in the lecture room of the Art Association of Montreal, in an exhibition, arranged and brought to Canada by the National Gallery of Canada, of the pictures with which the British railway companies have for some time adorned their stations. The use of the poster, as a means by which a painter could get his work seen by a very large public, originated in France and was adopted in England at least thirty years ago, and has received much support from the railways in recent years. Nearly every British station has now a good art gallery to occupy people who are waiting for trains, generally of places of beauty or interest which may be reached by train. The conditions obviously allow of good picture making, but demand something which will catch the eye, which is done in many ways.

Among the more or less naturalistic pictures, a broadly painted and full-colored landscape of Epping Forest by Jacob Epstein is notable; Fred Taylor's view of Richmond in Yorkshire has fine rich greens, Duncan Grant's picture of St. Ives is an amusing view through the arch of a bridge. The rather diagrammatic style of some modern painting lends itself well to work of this kind. Paul Nash's "Rye Marshes" is a reproduction of a picture which was here in the British Exhibition a few weeks ago; Tom Purvis' scene of the Yorkshire coast is remarkable by its strong primary colors, and Edgar Ainsworth has made a telling pattern of a view of Gordale Scar. Modern work of another kind is shown in the abstractions of McKnight Kauffer and Eve Kirk. John Mansbridge's Tulips and Cedric Morris' garden scene depend for their attraction on color.

Caricature lends itself well to poster work and there are a few very good examples of such work, quite different in their ways. Drake Brookshaw's clever impression of a running cricketer is one of the best of these; Roy Meldrum's diagram of Hyde Park, with life guards, nursemaids, etc. is another and a third is Doris Zinkelsen's fantastic picture of Edward 1st at Berwick on Tweed. This exhibition will continue till Tuesday, April 23rd.

CANVAS MAY BE ORIGINAL Gazette April 23 W. J. Southam Has Painting Marked "Greuze"

Hamilton, Ont., April 22.—W. J. Southam, publisher, may have an original Greuze painting which he purchased three years ago in a small antique shop at Palm Beach, Fla. Recently he decided to make an investigation as to its history and worth.

Through his brother, H. S. Southam, chairman of the board of the National Art Gallery at Ottawa, Mr. Southam learned that the name Greuze appeared on the back in addition to the marking "£130,000." Ossip L. Linde, internationally known artist, examined the painting today and said he was satisfied it was not a copy.

John Russell, noted Toronto artist, is to view the picture tomorrow. Some of the paintings of Jean Baptiste Greuze, French Immortal who died in 1805, have sold in recent years for as much as $130,000.

FLOWER PAINTINGS BY CLARA HAGARTY Gazette April 11

Toronto Artist Shows Good Work in Eaton Fine
Art Galleries

Flower paintings by Clara S. Hagarty, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., make a gay showing in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and reveal this Toronto painter as a sound colorist. Her drawing at all times is competent, and she shows skill in the arrangement of her material. The observation manifest in the painting of the varied blooms is also evident in the treatment of still-life items—figurines and porcelain birds—introduced into some of the paintings, besides the capital rendering of the containers in which the flowers are displayed.

There is refreshing freedom to her touch, her shadows are luminous, and the suggestion of atmosphere is convincing. Her color is true, subtleties of tone are handled with marked ability and the simplicity of her composition is engaging.

In a gallery full of attractive works there is ample evidence that this painter thoroughly understands her subjects and has been content to paint them as they are, the patterns attained by the arrangement of the blooms in jug or bowl being sufficiently decorative without studied planning.

Cleverly managed is the shadow in "White Blossoms"—daisies in a bowl, and the blue glass is a nice color note in "Creamy Roses." Red and yellow roses are the blooms featured in "The Italian Jar," and a porcelain duck is an incidental bit in the work called "Pale Peonies."

There is bold, glowing color in the painting of zinnias, arranged in a copper jug, and a springtime note is sounded in "Tulips and Trilliums." Wider variety is evident in "A July Bunch," with its peonies, Canterbury bells, sweet william and larkspur, and ample opportunities for color harmonies are evident in "Phlox and Petunias." There are also some good paintings of white and yellow chrysanthemums, and a distinctly decorative work is "Iris in Ireland," where beyond the rank of yellow blooms are mountains of varying blues against a golden sky.

JESSIE DOW PRIZES ARE NOW AWARDED

Gazette April 13.
Harold Beament, of Montreal, and Andre Lapine,
A.R.C.A., Toronto, Winners

Awards of the Jessie Dow prizes for oil and watercolors were made yesterday afternoon for works being shown in the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal.

The prize for oils goes to Harold Beament, of Montreal, for his winter landscape called "Covered Bridge." This canvas shows a typical north country structure, bridging a partly-frozen stream, in the glow of late afternoon.

The prize for watercolors went to Andre Lapine, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, for his painting of a fence-edged road, a noble tree and a pile of logs, entitled "The Lane." Incidentally, Mr. Lapine was awarded this prize for watercolors in 1920.

Both painters are well represented by meritorious works at this exhibition, which will close at five o'clock on Sunday afternoon.

The conditions of the award stipulate that no painter may win it more than twice, and that they may not be awarded to the same painters two years in succession.

PRIZES AWARDED AT ART EXHIBITION

The Jessie Dow prizes for oils and watercolors on view at the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal were awarded yesterday to Harold Beament, of Montreal, and Andre Lapine, A.R.C.A., Toronto.

Harold Beament won his prize for his oil painting entitled "Covered Bridge," depicting a typically north country structure bridging a partly frozen stream in the glow of late afternoon.

Mr. Lapine, who also won the award for watercolors in 1920, won this year's prize with his painting entitled "The Lane," and showing a fence-edged road with a noble tree and a pile of logs.

Advertising Works Arrest Attention, Create Curiosity and Desire—Interesting
Design

The exhibition of British posters now on view in the Lecture Hall of the Art Association, Sherbrooke street, through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, is an important postscript to the show of contemporary British paintings seen here last month. There need be no apology for using the word "important" in reference to commercial art, even leaving aside all questions of buying and selling. At its best, it has gone beyond the stage of portraying a mustard tin, label faithfully reproduced, when it sets out to sell mustard; it is more concerned with arresting the attention, of creating curiosity and desire; it has become subtle and aesthetic. It is important, too, because it is alive, much more alive than a great deal of painting, and because it is practised by some of the best artists of the day.

Indeed, some of Great Britain's most distinguished painters are represented in this show, a number of whom were seen in the other exhibition, and some who should have been. One of the outstanding canvases, Paul Nash's "Rye Marshes," is reproduced here as an advertisement for motor oil. Other important artists are Frank Dobson, John Armstrong, Jacob Epstein, Duncan Grant, A. K. and Doris Zinkelsen and E. McKnight Kauffer.

One is struck first perhaps, by the flexibility of the British advertiser, by the apparent paradox, for instance of selling gasoline by displaying a bed of gorgeous flowers and simply saying: "Gardeners prefer . . ." But the flowers attract the eye, and the paradox intrigues, and whether the rider in the London tube is a gardener or not, he reads the name of the product, he "gets the message."

Pictures From Holland At Johnson's

Star April 18/35
At the Johnson Art Galleries, St. Catherine St., there is now being shown an exhibition of work by nineteenth and twentieth century Dutch and French painters, brought to Canada from the galleries of van Wisselingh and Company of Amsterdam. It is not a very large collection but contains some very good examples of several well-known painters.

The most conspicuous picture is a big and striking example of the work of James Maris, a view of Dordrecht from the river, on a grey day; another of the most interesting works in the exhibition is one of the smallest—a beautiful little piece of figure painting, a study of a half draped woman by J. F. Millet. A view of Paris, looking over the Seine with the Pont Royal in the foreground, by Camille Pissarro, is a very good example of his work and has a truly Parisian atmosphere; a good contrast to it is a London picture, of Trafalgar Square and the National Gallery, under snow on a dark winter evening, by the Dutch etcher, William Witsen. Matthew Maris is represented by "The Bride," a single figure covered by a white veil, a surprising and characteristic piece of painting.

Notable among the landscapes is one by Monticelli, — a fairly large one in Monticelli's earlier but not earliest manner; gaily colored, full of strong light and shade, with figures which suggest some of his later pictures. There is beautiful light and space in a view of marshy land in Holland, which is the best of six pictures by P. J. Gabriel, and rich greens in two small landscapes by Poggenbeek, especially in an excellent woodland scene in the Forest of Fontainebleau. A large water color, "On the beach" by Weissenbruch, is a fine picture of a cloud, with a very simple foreground. There are two good works by Boudin, one a crowd of figures at a festival in Brittany, the other, a fairly late work, of an open bay with waves breaking on rocks, more free and atmospheric than much of his earlier work.

There are two very good examples of the work of Bosboom, one early and one late, interestingly different in the manner of their painting; a good study of shadows in a stable by Mauve, and two very good examples of Neuhuys. By M. J. Bauer there are eight pictures of Eastern and African scenes, — "In the desert," with sketched in figures is a very interesting one,—and, even better, a number of his drawings, travel sketches and biblical drawings, which say much in very slight means.

be the first—is the pictorial quality of the British poster. There is a danger here, for to be a good picture is not necessarily to be a good poster, and many of these are good pictures at the expense of the true poster characteristics. No one who saw the original of "Rye Marshes," would have had any idea that it was a poster. The same might be said of Jacob Epstein's "Epping Forest" and of a number of other landscapes, though some of them fall between two stools; are too slight to be important paintings and not dramatic enough to be arresting posters.

Some of this is because of the product advertised—travel—and, because of the sentimental and literary interest in the country-side that prevails in Great Britain. But glamor can be suggested by simplicity, boldness and originality. Edgar Ainsworth has the originality in his stylizations, though he might be bolder; Rosemary and Clifford Ellis give a thrilling invitation to Heath with their big owl, and there is no staying away from the Zoo once you have caught sight of O. Zingher's ring-tailed lemur. You cannot avoid catching sight of that lemur and he stamps his shape on your memory. Then there is the most successful poster artist of all, E. McKnight Kauffer. He sees and thinks in terms of the new art, and is not satisfied simply to paint a picture and leave it to the advertiser to print the lettering around it; with him, lettering is, as it should be in the poster, an integral part of the design.

Sculpture and Prints at the Art Gallery

The sculpture exhibits in the spring show at the Art Association are, as is generally the case, mostly portrait busts. Among the few exceptions are a well modelled small figure of a girl by Orson Wheeler and another, about life size, of a young girl, "Innocence" by Henri Bisson. Elzeaz Soucy's little "Madonna and Child" is a good piece of wood carving. Two portrait heads, not in the round, are Alice Nolin's very good relief bronze and G. E. Tremblay's relief of Prof. J. B. Dubois. Four busts are outstanding: A. Laliberte's strong and monumental "Jean Rivard," Pauline Johnson's free and very expressive "Raymonde," Dinah Lauterman's very lifelike portrait of the late Dr. Maxwell Lauterman, and a head full of character of an old man by Prudence Dawes. A striking bust, with its miniature reproduction are by A. Suzor-Cote, by whom there is also a small and characteristic figure "The Village Tanner." There is life and character in the "Masque Orientale" by Doris M. Judah, who also shows a good portrait study "Etudiante." Guido Casini's bust of Miss Pia Brigid, a strong sketch by A. Zucca, Zilha Cluse's "Mona," Sylvia Daoust's "Tete de jeune fille," Ernst Neumann's head of a girl and A. J. Segal's portrait study are other busts worth notice.

The prints and drawings make a small but good collection, which probably gets far less notice from visitors than any other part of the exhibition. Among the more notable of the etchings are one of a fishing village by Nicholas Hornayansky, who has also an excellent color aquatint of Quebec, Woodruff K. Aykroyd's Westminster Bridge in the rain, and P. Roy Wilson's bridge at Cordova. Peggy Clarke's dry points and wash drawing of children are clever and amusing. Ernst Neumann's Lithograph "Unemployed" is a good character study; there are good and simple block prints by Woldemor Neufeld and Katherine Urquhart and several successful color prints by Leonard Hutchinson. Rene Kulbach shows two of his line cuts of animals and a cut-out design.

Conspicuous among the drawings is a finely designed illumination by Charlebois, though it is catalogued among the paintings. The large charcoal drawings by Adrien Hobert and James Beckwith, Randolph Betts' bookplate and R. A. Hanks' humorous botany are other drawings worth noting. There are some portrait heads, of which those by Marjorie Borden, R. B. Partridge, Beatrice Lennie, Mr. Corinne Maillet and Freda Pemberton Smith may be noticed.

Water colours have taken an increasingly important place in these exhibitions for several years and this year they are, if no better than last year, about as good. James E. Beck with has two very good, broadly painted landscapes; his nude is an interesting study, but not entirely successful; three big drawings by Henry J. Simpkins are very clever, if not quite of his best. Some admirable drawings of town scenes are the best of Andre Lapine's work here, while Paul Caron, with some of his pictures, has a particularly good landscape of the hills near Baie d'Uxville. There are good atmosphere in Alex. J. Musgrove's "Winter," and fine colour in Hal Perry's bright red door surrounded by green and in D. Mary Bagley's "The Derelict, Tadousac." A large and clever drawing by Lorne Holland Bouchard, an interior of a nearly empty room by H. Hood, Frederick Cross' "Wild Geese," the drawings of Tom Roberts, Valentine Fanshaw, John Humphries, Harry E. G. Ricketts and K. L. de Conde, and sketches by Peggy Shaw and Arline Genereux are among the best of the water colours.

There is rather more than the usual abundance of flower pictures this year and most of them are more than usually good; the hanging committee have grouped a number of them together on one wall with good effect. Among the more outstanding ones are an excellent decoration of white tulips against a blue drapery by Hazel M. Caverhill, Mabel May's "Study in Rose and Green," Mrs. John Ogilvy's study of glass and roses, A. M. Shaw's water colours and Mrs. D. S. Ryshpan's wild flowers. Others of the many good flower pictures are those by Lillian Hingston, Melita Aitken, Mrs. Mina Alexander, Kenneth H. Holmden, Gertrude V. Fleming, Sally Hereford, Elizabeth Mitchell, Ruby Le Boutillier and Margaret Clare. P. H. Tacon's much magnified tulip is more curious than pleasing.

Successful studies of still life are by Enaime Keefer, Paul Andrew and T. R. Macdonald. There is some clever handling of lighting in R. B. Partridge's "Interior," and a remarkable effect of perspective and space in Norman Bethune's view of an operating theatre. Miniatures can hardly be seen to the best advantage in an exhibition of this kind, but there are some good ones in the small collection which is shown. The more notable ones are those of Mrs. Louie K. Raynsford, Evelyn R. Smith, Margaret W. Richardson, Catherine Van Tuyl, Mrs. Gladys F. Elrod, Margaret J. Sanborn and Mrs. A. G. Hodgins.

A New Guild Of Artists

Commercial artists have become so numerous and are so necessary that they have found it desirable to get together for mutual support and the exchange of information. A Guild of Canadian Commercial Artists was formed in Toronto some time ago and a Montreal branch of this Guild has just been founded. The inauguration of this new branch took place at the beginning of March, with a well attended meeting at which James Crockart was elected president, and W. G. Finch, a former member of the Toronto chapter, vice-president.

The Guild is publishing a small monthly magazine, The Guild Artist, of which the March issue is number 3. It contains a variety of articles by members, some practical, some amusing, which indicate a lively activity in the Guild. Acknowledgements are made in it to the Canadian Society of Graphic Arts in Toronto for the assistance which it has given to the Guild.

CULLEN PAINTINGS REMAIN ON VIEW

Exhibition of Small Pictures of Laurentians Extended for One Week

Small paintings by the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., being exhibited in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, are drawing a steady attendance of picture-lovers, and the red stars that dot the frames show that the discerning find in these works all the qualities of good design, fine color and vigorous brushwork that characterize this painter's larger canvases, and are adding to their collections.

It is from all angles a refreshing exhibition. The paintings are permeated with the bracing air of the outdoors in rugged places—comely scenes honestly interpreted by a painter sympathetic to a stretch of north country that almost seemed "made" for his brush. Along the North River, the Devil, the Cache and about Lac Tremblant abounded subjects that Cullen loved to paint, and it is the collector's gain that the artist found this congenial region when he was master of his art. He knew what would make a picture and his technical equipment enabled him to do his material justice.

Seemingly so simple in their bold, broad treatment, these small paintings are the essence of a matured art. The confident handling of form and the rightness of values in these vivid, summary and spontaneous impressions have behind them years of patient study and work.

The country that inspired Cullen will soon be calling to the city-bound lover of the North, who can paddle the waters this artist has so faithfully painted—stretches of the Cache, Lac Tremblant, the Devil and North rivers—see the noble bulk of Mont Tremblant deepen from indigo blue to black under the darkening sky, hear froggy choirs in reedy ponds and sniff that most perfect union of scents—the smoke of a driftwood fire and frying bacon.

Those to whom "going to the country" means the Laurentians will find much to interest and impress them in this exhibition, and those with intimate knowledge of this country will realize how completely Cullen captured the spirit, time and place of the region.

Activities of 41st Season
Reviewed and Officers Elected

Members of the Women's Art Society brought to a close a year of achievement and satisfaction in the various departments, at the 41st annual meeting held yesterday afternoon in Stevenson Hall.

Enrolment totals 361, it was reported by Mrs. George W. Plow, honorary recording secretary, in the annual report. There had been some resignations, but 31 new members were added and a number also had been accepted for next season.

A review of the president's course, the morning art course under the convenship of Mrs. D. S. Higginson and the poetry and drama course convened by Miss Mary S. Saxe was given, and mention also was made of the four enjoyable recitals arranged by Mrs. Alexander Murray, the annual tea, the members' day programme and the studio day. Tabulation of the data regarding the history of the society, under the convenship of the archives by Mrs. J. J. Louson, was stated to be making steady progress.

Grants were made during the year as follows: To the Art Association, $50; Montreal Children's Library, $50; Montreal Orchestra, $50, and the Canadian Handicrafts Guild's educational class, $15.

Mrs. R. R. Thompson reported for the studio, speaking of the high appreciation in which the members held Mrs. Lillian Torrance Newton, R.C.A., as a teacher and critic of their work. At the spring exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, eight studio members and several members of the society had pictures on view. A member, Mrs. Phyllis Percival, had a picture accepted for the Royal Canadian Academy exhibition in Toronto in November. This was one of 75 selected for a collection to tour Canada for nine months. Mrs. Thompson referred to the success which attended the annual exhibition of the studio.

The library report was given by Miss Ethelwyn Bennet, who stated that 354 books had been taken out during the season. Several volumes had been added to the collection.

Miss Hay Browne reported as convener of the soldiers' fund, stating that the usual weekly visits had been made to the Military Hospital at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, when cigarettes, tobacco, cards, magazines, etc., were distributed, also special gifts at holidays. She also told of entertainment provided for ex-service men at the Veterans' Shops and the Canadian Legion branches in Verdun and Rosemount. At the annual donation tea 190 lbs. of candy, 1,400 cigarettes and $130 in cash were received. High tribute to the memory of Nursing Sister Katherine Barden, R.R.C. of the Military Hospital, was paid in the report. The annual appeal resulted in receipts of $278. Total receipts were $675, and a balance of $250 remained for the summer work. Acknowledgement of donations made by women's organizations and business firms was made.

Miss J. S. Eveleigh, honorary treasurer, reported that the society's receipts were $3,615 and disbursements $2,754, leaving a balance of $861.

The following were elected: President, Mrs. W. A. Gifford; first vice-president, Mrs. C. L. Schofield; second vice-president, Miss Mary S. Saxe; honorary recording secretary, Mrs. G. W. Plow; honorary corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. C. Beswick; honorary treasurer, Miss J. S. Eveleigh; executive committee—Miss Ethelwyn Bennet, Mrs. G. S. Dingle, Mrs. R. M. Mitchell, Mrs. G. D. Pratt, Mrs. C. A. Richardson, Mrs. G. Maxwell Sinn and Mrs. R. R. Thompson.

CHILDREN'S PAINTING EXHIBIT IN TORONTO

TORONTO, April 24.—(C.P.)—Hundreds of persons crowded the Toronto Art Gallery yesterday to see a "touring" international exhibit of children's paintings, gathered from 40 countries. The art work was accomplished by children from six to 14 years old.

The exhibit was formally opened by Hon. Vincent Massey, former Canadian Minister to Washington, who said the development in appreciation evinced by the child pictures was of even greater importance than the possibility that the endeavors would produce professional artists.

"If it continues," he said, "we may look with confidence to countries built by people who have learned to think well in their formative period."

CULLEN SKETCHES NOW ON EXHIBITION

Exhibition Reveals How Closely Artist Kept to Pictorial Records

VARIETY OF SCENES

Laurentians, Rockies, Quebec and Montreal Supply Subjects at Watson Art Galleries

Viewing the collection of personal sketches by the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., on view in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, serves to emphasize the loss Canadian art suffered in his passing slightly over a year ago. These panels from his studio—certainly the last work of this type and scale available—reveal much that will be of value to the student, as well as charming the discerning connoisseur.

These sketches, highly regarded by the painter as records of effects done on the spot for use in more "important" works, are eminently satisfying. His skill in handling tone and catching atmosphere are here in abundance and even in the smaller studies there is the sense of bigness. In them all there are sound design, lovely harmonies and that bold, fluid handling that looks simplicity itself. The offering of these works presents the opportunity, which yearly becomes more rare, of adding a Cullen to even the most modest collection of Canadian art. About a competent sketch there is refreshing freedom and abandon. The initial vivid impression is captured and set down at fever-heat. There is boldness in attack, form and mass are brushed in with a directness and force that tell the story in the frankest possible manner, and when to these qualities is added fine color the result is a desire to possess a group of them.

KEPT CLOSE TO NATURE.

In the main, these studies are of Laurentian scenery where, in his late years, he painted his finest work. Besides being straightforward pictorial records of beautiful country, these sketches show how close Cullen kept to Nature and how he refrained from liberties when interpreting these scenes on a larger scale. In the exhibition there are large canvases and the smaller sketches from which they were painted, and comparison reveals little change between the two. There is a painting of snow and frost at St. Margaret—rushing water, snow-capped boulders, trees under snow, a distant hill and a cloudy sky, which reveals how completely he seized the scene when he brushed the sketch and how little, beyond more emphasis to forms, he departed from it.

Interesting, too, are two panels—"Spring Sunshine," and "Autumn, St. Margaret." In these Cullen chose the same viewpoint at two seasons. In the former, the high bank and distant ridge show sun-lit snow, while water boils down between river and rafted ice at a bend of the North River. In the latter, the trees along the stream glow in gay dress and, at the bend, the water tumbles in foam beneath the wooded hill.

Three little sketches that suggest the silent places are "The Frog Pond, Cache River"—hill, bush, a band of ruddy reeds and a timbered point; "The Heron Pool, Cache River," with its dark hill, grass and reeds and the bare limbs of dead trees rooted in bog and water. The water suggests the odd foraging trout if grass and ooze only permitted approach for a cast. The third sketch is "The Palisades, Lac Tremblant." Majestic and solemn is Mont Tremblant, backed by clouds, rising above the darkening water of the lake, which mirrors its noble form. It is a scene that is impressive and "big" on a few square inches of board. Of this region, too, is the lovely harmony of blues—"Misty Morning, Lac Tremblant," with its mellow sky above the distant mountain, from which vapor is rising. Mont Tremblant and a glimpse of lake is, in another sketch, seen through a screen of spruce and birches, and "Old Bridge"—a virile sketch of subtle values—is the structure at the lower end of Lac Tremblant where, having lost its identity in the lake, the Cache River tumbles down a rocky fall to eventually join the Devil. This old bridge, backed by a rounded hill based by bush, rises on its wooden piers above ice and open water. The atmosphere well suggests the moisture of a spring day.
