LAURENTIAN LOVELINESS. In this group is "The Devil River, near St. Jovite"—distant hills, open country and steep banks, through which the river winds, a work that can be compared with the large canvas of the same scene. "Autumn in the Laurentians" is a bit of vivid color—birches and maples edging water cluttered with fallen timber. "At Piedmont" shows the sinuous North River flowing beneath the old wooden bridge, rolling fields and the distant mountain rosy in the afternoon sun. Farther up this river are typical bits in which the rounded bulk of "Baldy" rises above bush and stream, while this mountain, flushed with sunlight, figures in a sketch of rushing water and bush in sunlight and shadow in "The Bent Tree, North River." In "Early The Devil River," with its row of spruces, shack and distant hill, the water in the foreground convincingly suggests chill, and miles from here the artist did the satisfying sketch of a snowclad bluff sheltering a farmhouse, glimpse of the Saguenay, high banks and distant mountains, called "Near Chicoutimi." Sketches there are of scenes in the Rockies, as well as canvases of these noble peaks, done when, for a brief spell, Cullen tore himself away from the Laurentians.

It is an interesting exhibition which is not confined purely to sketches. Many canvases from Cullen's brush are on view—scenes done abroad, about Quebec and below, Montreal scenes—St. George's Church at nightfall, and one of the Basilica with sleighs on Windsor street—and many other works which the lover of Cullen's art will be happy to see again.

According to present plans, the exhibition will be held until April 15.

The Annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal opened at a reception which was held on the evening of March 21st. Mr. Herbert Walker received, assisted by his daughter, Mrs. George Marler, who looked very charming and lovely in a long flowing dress of the palest shade of grey.

Moirra Drummond, who exhibited three paintings, was dressed in white satin and was walking about accompanied by Mr. F. S. Coburn; they were having a most animated discussion on the subject of the works of art displayed. Mrs. J. D. McCurdy was there, and as her portrait, painted by Moira, was hung in the exhibition, it was quite evident to see how very cleverly the picture portrayed her likeness. Margaret Harvey, another young artist, was looking very happy as a painting of hers had been hung. Mr. and Mrs. P. F. Mathias, accompanied by their daintily pretty daughter Harriett, were present and also Dr. and Mrs. Goodall with their beautiful and talented daughter Shirley. Mr. and Mrs. Eric Reford, the latter wearing a lovely gown of white lace, were admiring the pictures and Betty Robertson and her fiancé, Dick Bolton, were also very interested in the exhibition. Mrs. Henri Vautelet, who is such a gifted and clever member of Montreal society, looked smart in black. Two oil paintings by her were on exhibit, which proves that art is just another of her many talents. The Gallery, apart from being just what its name implies, provides an atmosphere of dignity and grandeur for such a reception.

When one stands at the bottom of the broad stairway and watches the throng moving up and down, the women in their many-coloured evening gowns which trail over the marble stairs, the men in formal evening dress, and the whole stately setting of the picture, one feels that it is indeed a pity that Montreal is not afforded more opportunities of witnessing such scenes.

Standard, April 20 Famous Home To Be Sold At Auction

Estate Of J. K. L. Ross, Built
By His Father On Peel Street
To Go Under Hammer

One by one the famous old estates of Montreal's central uptown district, a district around upper Peel street that used to be one of the most exclusive on the island, are disappearing.

Probably the largest of those remaining, that belonging to Commander J. K. L. Ross, noted yachtsman and former turf king, is the latest to be on the point of disappearing as an order from the Superior Court has given permission for this old house and spacious grounds to go under the hammer on the afternoon of May 9. The Standard learned today. The estate will be sold at auction by the House of Browne, Limited.

The residence, which has been the home of the Rosses for over half a century, was constructed by the late James Ross, wealthy coal baron, and at the time of its erection was considered one of the finest houses in the Dominion of Canada.

J. K. L. Ross, who was not only a famous sportsman, but was known in the art world for his fine collection of rare paintings, inherited this property from his father.

He immediately began to remodel the building and is said to have spent more than a quarter of a million dollars in addition, including the splendid Ross Art Gallery.

It was one of the centres of the society of the metropolis, and, even today, bereft of its furnishings, one is impressed by the grandeur of the interior decorations.

Large paneled halls with grand staircases greet today's visitor. The drawing room and the ball room are still masterpieces of the decorator's art, and the ghosts of the belles of earlier days still seem to haunt these rooms.

In the art gallery its more recently paneled walls made an ideal setting for pictures which were hung there and which were said to be valued in the millions.

The dining room with its large area and perfect color scheme makes it easy to visualize the banquets held within its walls.

The size of the house itself with the addition made to it by Commander Ross is 52' x 78'. The whole estate takes in 92,775 feet, as much ground as the old High School property had which was also situated on Peel street. The Mount Royal Hotel only takes up part of that old school land. There is a frontage of the Ross property on Peel street of 241 feet.

In the main residence there are ten bedrooms for residents and ten for servants, while another 14 bedrooms for servants are to be found above the stables, or outbuildings. Four suites on the second floor each have their bathrooms.

The auctioneers have agreed to open the buildings to the public every afternoon for one week prior to the sale.

News of Art In Montreal

Something unusual in the way of pictures may now be seen at the Coffee House, 1191 Union Avenue. These works, which combine painting with sculpture, are by Peter Wedin. They are small panels of soft wood, knife-carved in low relief and painted in light and gay colours. The wood-cutting gives them firm and simplified drawing and they are quite decorative and amusing. Most of them are of figures or groups of figures; the few landscapes are less good. For the most part they are of scenes and people in Sweden, with some of Nova Scotia and a few of Quebec. There are family groups and scenes of farm life, Quebec ox-carts and sleighs and some Indians, complete with feathers, tepees and canoes. Some of them are frankly comic and there is a hint of caricature in even the more serious ones. A particularly good one is of a procession of people at a railway station and there are some good domestic scenes. A few oil pictures by Mr. Wedin show pleasant places in Sweden, but they are not so successful as the carved panels.

Two busts by A. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A.,—one life-size the other a miniature,—which were among the works of sculpture in the recent Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, were labelled in the catalogue as "Bust of Mrs. S. C." It should have been stated that they were portraits of the sculptor's wife, Mrs. Mathilde Suzor-Cote.

The annual exhibition of work by students of the School of Architecture of McGill University, is to be held in the Learmont Gallery on the upper floor of the Art Association from April 27 to May 5th.

Two British Artists Raise Furor When R.A. Rejects Their Pictures

Gazette (Canadian Press Cable), April 26/35

London, April 25.—Two prominent artists, Homerville Hague and Stanley Spencer, raised no end of a row today following a notification that some of their pictures had been rejected by the Royal Academy.

Hague said he was "sick and tired" of having his offerings rejected by the Academy for the last 18 years—despite the fact he has painted more portraits of royalty than any other living artist.

Spencer, Associate of the Royal Academy, was equally wrathful since the Academy had accepted only three of five paintings he submitted, turning the other two down. They took direct action. Spencer resigned from the Academy and demanded the return of all five pictures, saying: "I'll hold my own exhibition. I shall never agree to my works being submitted to a jury of other artists."

Hague claimed that his 1935 picture of a band playing in the Friary Court of St. James's Palace was rejected "purely from spite." He marched off to the Marlborough street police station to get a summons against the Royal Academy selection committee to show cause why his picture had been refused, and vowed he would bring them to court.

The latter irate artist, who first exhibited in the R.A. in 1895, has painted portraits of Queen Victoria, King George, Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald and other notables. Once he made a 12-hour speech in Hyde Park against the panel by Epstein which raised such a controversy some time ago.

Spencer is the well-known painter whose remarkable picture, "Resurrection" caused so much argument when Sir Joseph Duveen presented it to the Tate Gallery.

He maintains that as an Associate member he is entitled to have all five of his offerings hung in this year's exhibition, which opens on Jubilee day, May 6, without any further question.

The two Spencerian pictures rejected are "St. Francis and the Birds" and "The Lovers."

"I know there is a clique which does not like my allegorical style," says Spencer, "but I was dumbfounded when I was asked to withdraw these two, which I consider the better of the five. What made it more galling was the statement of the council, that they do not think these works are of advantage to my reputation or the influence of the Academy."

"It is sheer effrontery for these self-appointed dictators. I paint as I am inspired. They want nice lines and perfectly proportioned figures. That is not my view of creative art."

Sir William Llewellyn, president of the Royal Academy, says the pictures were rejected under rules which Spencer must be aware are often exercised.

JUBILEE FEATURES AT MCGILL MUSEUM

Special Exhibit Relating to "Sixty Years of British Rule in Canada"

Exhibits commemorating the Silver Jubilee of His Majesty King George V., and outlining "Sixty Years of British Rule in Canada (1807—1867)," are now on display in the McCord National Museum, Sherbrooke street west. The museum is open on week-day afternoons from two to five o'clock, and on Sundays and holidays from 2.30 to five o'clock. Admission is free.

The exhibits, arranged by Mrs. F. C. Warren, curator of the museum, present a striking picture of life in the Dominion during the early and middle parts of the 19th Century, and of the historic events immediately before and after the accession to the Throne of King George V. in 1910.

The large display picturing "Sixty Years of British Rule" deals with the period which ended with Confederation. It is the third of a series arranged for the particular benefit of Montreal's school children, but should be of interest to every Canadian. Relics of the War of 1812 are the first things which catch the eye of the visitor. Then there are documents relative to the union of the North West Company with the Hudson's Bay Company in 1821.

A section of the exhibit is devoted to the Rebellion of 1837, and several water colors by James Duncan, depicting Montreal in 1832, are

ARCHITECTURAL DISPLAY April 29 Work of McGill Students is on Exhibition

Scores of sketches exemplifying the work of undergraduates in McGill University's school of architecture went on display in the gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, on Saturday. The annual exhibition of students' work will remain on public view until Sunday.

The designs and drawings present a striking picture of the varied character of the training received at McGill by the budding architects. One section of the display, for instance, is devoted to stained glass windows and wrought iron work. Town planning is not forgotten and there are a number of drawings showing plans for housing schemes, and designs for a combination town hall, court house, police and fire station.

Other sketches reveal that the McGill students learn how to design country churches, museums, college and seminary buildings, French-Canadian furniture, apartment houses, public buildings, and various types of private dwellings and residences.

Belgian Crystal Exhibit

A display of rare Belgian crystal will be formally opened by the Consul-General of Belgium at 3 o'clock this afternoon, in the Fourth Floor Galleries of Henry Morgan and Company, Limited, St. Catherine street. on view. Also included in the display is chinaware loaned by Dr. T. H. Clark, of McGill University, as well as hair and metal jewellery, ice-skates, and articles of clothing relating to the period. Two girls' figures costumed in the mode of 1850-61 are to be seen and there is also a doll which was dressed in 1852.

CAMERA'S ARTISTIC QUALITIES PRAISED

Lines and Patterns
Is Stressed

The artistic possibilities of the camera were outlined and praised by George Nakash, prominent Armenian-born artist, in his address on "The Art and Psychology of Portrait Photography," at the weekly luncheon meeting of the Lions Club at the Mount Royal Hotel yesterday.

There were very few persons who realized that the camera had artistic possibilities and that in the hands of an artist the lens was a means of artistic expression comparable to the brush and the pigment of the painter, Mr. Nakash said. Instead of drawing with a pencil or painting with a brush the photographer used light as his medium. On this all-important factor of his art he could exercise personal control at every step in his work, from the moment the film was exposed to the time the print was finished.

Nature—and as a consequence imagination—was the prime requisite in an artist's makeup. Imagination made it possible for him to visualize his portrait in advance and his aims were impossible of achievement unless he could do this. Then came love and that was because true art sprang from the heart and not from the head, he believed. Intellect, Mr. Nakash subordinated to both these assets in the artist's equipment.

"The artistic potentialities of the camera depend entirely upon the imagination, the natural capacity, the knowledge, skill and technical training of the photographer. If he possesses these qualities he can make his camera produce what he wants."

He challenged the theory held by some persons that because the camera was a machine its product was necessarily mechanical. He knew that it was fashionable for some artists to put their stamp of disapproval on a painting by branding it as "photographic." He believed this argument was just as ridiculous as to affirm that piano music was mechanical because the instrument was itself a mechanical device. It all depended on the user. The same camera which in artistic hands was made to yield a masterpiece of artistic value could also be used to photograph a shoe for commercial purposes.

OFTEN IN COMMONPLACE.

Mr. Nakash then turned to a discussion of the qualities that stamped pictures as art products. The extent to which a picture was worthy of being considered an artistic achievement depended upon the truth with which its author suggested through his work the impressions he received at the time of production.

"The merit of a picture may lie in an interesting arrangement of light and shade, a pleasing sweep of line, or a satisfying and well composed pattern of decorative shapes and masses," he said. "Whether or not the subject of the picture is beautiful is not important, for it is possible to make an interesting and beautiful picture of a subject that is not in itself beautiful. Unless we understand what a picture is, we cannot make one. Truth and beauty are closely connected, and those of us who are sensitive to beauty, often find much of it in ordinary, commonplace objects and scenes."

DEPENDS ON KNOWLEDGE.

"The photographer has to depend upon his knowledge even more sometimes than a painter, because a painter has the power to make his picture interesting by means of color, an attraction that the photographer cannot use to the same extent. The outstanding characteristic of photography, the quality that distinguishes it from drawing, painting, etching, or any other art is the ability of the lens and the sensitized film to record infinitely delicate and subtle gradation of tones. This is where photography is supreme. On account of this power it holds a place among the fine arts."

He displayed some of his own portraits, several of them having won high recognition in American exhibits. He was introduced by Robert Duncan and thanked by Emile Asselin. Emile Gour, tenor, sang, accompanied by Percy French. George Mooney presided.

RUSSIAN PAINTINGS ON EXHIBIT IN CITY

Gazette May 18/35

WIDE RANGE OF SUBJECTS

Drama of New Russia Is Brought Out in Graphic Section—Collection Is Important

There are several ways of approaching the exhibition of Soviet art which opened to the public yesterday in the sixth floor galleries of Henry Morgan & Company, Limited, and to view these fifty paintings and nearly 200 drawings, prints, lithographs and other black-and-whites is to be confronted by an onslaught of clamoring questions. Should they be considered merely on their merits as pictures? Should they rather be looked at in the light of the Revolution and as the products of a new world? (In other words, should they be viewed historically?) Or should they be approached from the geographical standpoint?

The answer is, of course, that they must be examined from all angles. Whatever the angle, the sum of impressions is: They are important, and they are exciting. As the public of Montreal walks into the Morgan galleries between now and the first of June, preconceived notions of Soviet Russia must be shed on every side. Strange as it seems to those who know anything about it, there are people who imagine today's Russia to be a land made up of primitive peasants and industrial workers, whose art, if they had any, would be limited to childish daubings and scratchings. There are others who fondly believe that the Russian artist is a sort of slave forced to put down, stroke for stroke, exactly as the Communist Party orders him. It cannot be denied that there has been ground for the latter assumption. In the first enthusiasm, the Soviets were jealous of their programme, religiously jealous, and they could see no other function for the artist than that of creating propaganda. But with the dissolution of the Association of Revolutionary Artists this policy was abandoned. In answer to the first group of critics, the present exhibition demonstrates the highest standards of art as art—in observation, imagination, technique, even to the point, in some, of sophistication, these works need no apology. The answer to the second group is to be found in the wide, free range of subjects and treatment.

REVOLUTIONARY SCENES.

There are a few revolutionary scenes, a few pictures that might be looked upon as propaganda—they are not necessarily the best, some of them are good examples of the invalidity of propaganda as art—but for the most part the artists reflect the Revolution merely because it happens to be their condition of life. Apart altogether from what one's political theories may be, the fact remains that while a great many artists of the western world have turned in on their own private souls, to paint abstractions and busy themselves with other subjective forms, the Soviet painters are objectively painting what they see around them. It may be industrial and farming activities—although there are surprisingly few such subjects among the paintings—it may be children's nurseries, parks of recreation, building operations, sports, groups of bathers, men's faces, women's bodies, or the old-fashioned landscape. Whatever it is, they all have characteristics in common—freshness, spontaneity, free style, happiness, health.

Such characteristics are not new in painting, though it is something that artists across a vast territory, from northern Arkhangel to oriental Samarkand, should have an outlook in common, and it is too early to expect that the Revolution should have given the world an original painting style, but those characteristics have been provided with a new impetus and the trend is significant. If the styles in this show are not essentially revolutionary, neither could they be called essentially Russian. They are closer to Europe or America than to the old Russia of the bylinas, of Sadko, or the ikons.

Some might even be called academic. One of the surprises in the show is Bubnov's "Raided by the White Guards." Bubnov is one of the youngest painters in the group, yet he has given us a canvas that is akin to the sentimental Victorian anecdotes. There is even one pretty landscape, Grabar's "Springtime." Nissky's "Seascape" is the closest thing to a modern "art for art's sake" esoteric, but it does not quite come off. There are a number of frankly "pictorial" canvases, such as Kolmakova's "Winter Sport," Kashina's "Collective Farm Nursery" and Korotkova's "Frontier Guard Patrols."

More important than these, to the believer in the modern focus, are Peter Williams' robust portraits, Shevchenko's beautiful "Fruit Seller, Batura," Pimenov's glowing "The Bath," Saryan's "Erivan," Kashina's lively water colors and the powerful mural designs by Deyneka.

GRAPHIC ARTS SECTION.

The graphic arts section is by no means an appendage; it is an important show in itself. While many of the works are illustrations for the classics and even foreign books, most of these black-and-whites bring out the drama of the new Russia. Of particular note are Kasyan's Dnyeprostroy scenes, Kravchenko's designs, and the stark "Civil War Funeral" by Sokolov-Skalya. Whether they be satires, swift impressions or careful recordings of facts, the black-and-whites are extremely skilful and trenchant. The exhibition was brought to this side of the Atlantic by the Pennsylvania Museum of Art and the American Russian Institute and is being circulated by the College Art Association. It is made available to this city by a committee of Montreal painters, writers and members of the Friends of the Soviet Union.

R. H. A.

Unique Exhibition of Soviet Art is Opened

Shrewd and vigorous draughtsmanship are the striking qualities of revolutionary Russia's pictorial art to judge from pictures now on exhibition at Henry Morgans'.

The collection, first of its kind shown in Canada, was brought to America under the auspices of the Pennsylvania Museum of Art and has drawn interested comment in several cities south of the border. It will be on show here until June 1.

Oil paintings, water colors, etchings and black and white work are included.

The etchings and black and white drawings are far more impressive than the oils, daring and often brilliant use of line and design holding the attention of the visitor. Here, indeed, would seem to be the true field of the Soviet pictorial artist.

Revolutionary daring has certainly not been carried into the studio of the worker in oils, for the canvases on display are conventionally, even timidly handled. They lack inspiration. This is even so of the avowedly propagandist paintings, which suggest magazine cover or art school work.

Typically Russian in conception and handling of color are two or three impressionist of sun-baked, Oriental featured peasants.

A curious touch was lent to yesterday's opening by the presence of several members of the local Russian emigre colony, who showed avid interest in these works of the new Russia.

Art of the Soviet to Be

In an exhibition which will open in the gallery of Henry Morgan and Company, Limited, on Friday, Montrealers will have an opportunity to see something of the development of painting and graphic art in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in the past few years. The show, which consists of 50 paintings and 189 drawings, engravings and designs, includes the work of some of the outstanding Soviet artists of today. It was brought to this side of the Atlantic by the Pennsylvania Museum of Art and the American Russian Institute for Cultural Relations with the Soviet Union, and is being circulated by the College Art Association. It comes to Montreal as the result of efforts of a committee of painters, art critics and others, consisting of Miss Martha Allan, Robert Ayre, H. P. Bell, E. R. Bertrand, Harold Beament, Andre Bieler, Ernest Cormier, Edwin Holgate, Henri Girard, Henri Hebert, Adrien Hebert, Miss Prudence Heward, John Lyman, Carl Mangold, Miss Mabel May, Louis Muhstock, Ernest Neumann, Mrs. L. Torrance Newton, Mrs. Frank R. Scott, A. Bercovitch, and members of the Friends of the Soviet Union. The exhibition will be in Montreal until June 1, when it is expected it will be sent to Ottawa and Toronto.

Ces neuf études de pysionomie dues au pinceau de Mlle Florence Bryson, élève de M. Edwin Holgate et de Mme Lillian Torrance Newton, à l'école de l'Art Association, lui ont valu le premier prix Reford pour la peinture. Plusieurs prix ont été accordés aux élèves des autres sections, et leurs oeuvres sont exposées au Lecture Hall. ARTIST BOUND WHILE PAINTINGS DESTROYED

N.Y. Outrage Laid to Nazi Sympathizers

NEW YORK, May 17—(A.P.)—Michael Califano, 43-year-old artist, told police last night that three unidentified men entered his studio late yesterday, bound him to a steam pipe and slashed between 25 and 30 paintings, one of which he valued at $10,000.

Suffering from cuts, bruises and nervous shock, Califano told his story from a hospital bed. Police said the artist's son, Victor, laid the vandalism to Nazi sympathizers.

The artist said he was in his studio when the three men entered, and told him they wanted to buy a post card reproduction of one of his works. The post cards depict Professor Albert Einstein, Adolf Hitler, a Storm Trooper and a bloody dagger clutched in a heavy hand. The original of the post card is entitled "Ignominy of the 20th Century."

As he turned away from the men, he said, he was seized and bound. One of the men then slashed the canvases, he told police.

GOBELIN TAPESTRIES ARE SOLD FOR $22,000

Late Mrs. Whitelaw Reid

PURCHASE, N.Y., May 17—(Star Special)—The pair of Gobelin tapestries which for many years hung upon the panelled wall of the great library in Ophir Hall, home of the late Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, were sold yesterday for $22,000 at the sixth session of the public sale of Mrs. Reid's art treasures and furnishings, held here under the management of the American Art Association-Anderson Art Galleries, Inc.

The auctioning of the Gobelin hangings climaxed a day which brought greater crowds, more keenly competitive bidding and higher prices than at any time since the sale began on Tuesday. During the afternoon a Chippendale needlepoint ettee went for $2,600, and a set of four Charles II chairs which once belonged to William Penn, were sold for $1,600. The day's total proceeds were $75,102.50, bringing to $127,252.50 the total for the sale thus far.

The Reid tapestries formed part of the series woven for the palace of Fontainebleau by order of Colbert. Taken from a suite of twelve cartoons executed about 1525 by the famous tapestry designer, Bernard van Orley, a pupil of Raphael, the full series consisted of twelve hunting scenes each representing a month of the year. The Ophir Hall tapestries depicted April and September.

HONOR MEMORY OF GEO. B. ALLISON

May 9, 1935

A beautiful stained glass window, depicting Christ blessing the children, was dedicated to the memory of the late George B. Allison, many years a prominent Westmount resident and Montreal business man, last Sunday morning in Westmount Park church.

Presentation of the window was made by Mrs. Allison and the service of dedication was conducted by the minister, Rev. J. Laval Smith. The window is the work of a local artist, C. W. Kelsey.

Art of Art Montreal

The Guild of Commercial Artists

The Montreal chapter of the Guild of Canadian Commercial Artists is now fully organized and functioning in the interests of the Commercial Art profession and those businesses of which this profession is an integral part. The recently elected slate of executives assures this new body a successful start on its ambitious career.

The officers elected are:—President, James Crockett; Vice-president, A. C. Valentine; Secretary, Mona Craig; Treasurer, E. Fancott; Director of Publicity, W. Finch; Advisory Council, C. W. Simpson, R.C.A., Hal Ross Perigard, A.R.C.A., Felix Shea, A. Cloutier, F. Holland, J. Wilson, C. Fainmel, C. S. McIntosh, and A. Holmes.

The Guild is founded on a constitution of high purpose summarized as follows:—

"The new organization recognizes only that phase of Art that has a use and a practical purpose necessary to commerce and economic progress. Thus Guild members must, of necessity, be artists practised, not only in technical and imaginative skill, but also of a kind adaptable to the limitations of commercial demands.

"The Guild, through its educational program and periodical exhibitions aspires to securing a more profound respect for a profession rapidly maturing. By the same token it seeks to create a new and appreciative understanding of the finesse required to successfully inject into austere commercialism the refining and illuminative influence of Art."

Further information can be obtained by calling Mr. E. Fancott, L.A. 9494.

The Art of Mickey Mouse And Walt Disney

All the world knows Mickey Mouse in motion, and every one can recognize in his pictures a new and a very good form of art. An exhibition of Walt Disney's drawings and cartoons, which is now being shown in Eaton's Art Gallery, gives some further ideas of the work which goes into making the one kind of film that is always a joy to see. One can see in them how good the drawings are and that Mickey in still life can be as funny as when he is moving.

The pictures which are shown are both in black and white and in color; some of those in black and white are perhaps studies or suggestions for films, but are excellent comic pictures, caricatures which are full of ideas and character. A large part of the exhibition is made up of what are evidently the materials actually used in making the films, and they give a clear idea of how the work is done. A film of this kind takes some nine or ten thousand drawings, but some of the labor is saved by painting moving parts, figures and so on, on sheets of celluloid, which can be moved and changed in front of a standing picture of the background. There are many sets of these, with figures and parts of figures on one or more celluloid sheets, one above the other against a background, which is sometimes a single scene, and sometimes a panorama, before which the figures can be moved.

Since nearly every one likes to see how things are done, how the machine works, this display of practical material has an interest of its own. But that is only one side of the exhibition, and the humor and the many other good points of these drawings are things worth seeing on their own account.

The exhibition is to be open till Saturday, May 25th.

COLOR PRINTS AT ART GALLERY gazette May 10/35 Exponents of Wood-block and Linocut in England Well Represented SKILL AND ORIGINALITY

Exhibition Arranged With National Gallery of Canada
Includes Aquatints, Monotypes and Lithographs

Modern color prints brighten the walls of the Lecture Hall of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, the exhibition being made possible through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa. The show is certain to attract attention, though, generally speaking, on the score of beauty it falls short of the collection of Viennese, Swiss, English and Canadian examples displayed in this hall in 1929, and the extensive range of prints by Austrian artists that occupied these walls in 1929. In the main, greater space is given to the work of men and women developing this medium in England, and there is plenty of evidence that the bulk of them are out to explore to the limit the possibilities of this mode of artistic expression. The color print, from linocut or wood-block, making its appeal through its design and the pattern of its hues, demands of the artist originality and ingenuity, and many of the proofs show that these qualities are not lacking. To anyone who has "had a shot" at doing a linocut—even a modest black and white—it will be obvious that some of the seemingly simple designs were evolved only after a good deal of careful and thoughtful planning.

VARIETY IN SUBJECTS.

There is variety in the prints on view and in the artists' approach to their subjects. Some have contented themselves with the purely representational, while others by the simplification and exaggeration of forms have made intriguing patterns. In the former class may be mentioned "Lulworth Cove," with its fine arrangement of sea, rocks and chalk cliffs, by A. Rigden Read; Eric Slater's "Seaford Head" and "A Sussex Hill" which, at a distance, have the appearance of watercolors; the competently handled "Peonies," "Roses" and "Still Life with Fruit" by Yoshijiro Urushibara—prints marked by good design and attractive color; the "Red Cuckullin Hills, Skye," by Stanley R. Wilson, which in color well bears out the title; the prints of flowers by W. Hardman, and the aquatints of ducks by Winifred Austin. The Viennese artist Hans Frank, too, is effective with two small prints of deer, in which the greys are fine.

Those exponents of the color wood block and linocut who aim at supplying bits of gay color on decorative lines show cleverness, energy and industry. Sybil Andrews suggests action in her severely simplified figures in "The Giant Cable"—men unwinding a drum, and in "Sledge-hammers," while in her monotype she reveals glowing color in "Bricks Drying." Anne Clarke reveals an effective decorative sense in "Slamming Cats" and "Seahorses," while Claude Flight is spirited in "Speed, London Bus." W. Greengrass has made effective use of the colored stripes of the players' sweaters in "Rugby" and the scarlet of the uniforms of the Life Guards in "The King's Horses." Janina Konarska shows "Ski-ing," and Eileen Mayo in her print called "Turkish Bath" suggests that the women, having skipped their diet, are taking other means of reducing. George Nicholson's "Pigs" is not without a sense of humor, and Viola Paterson invests her "Ballet Dancers" with solid qualities.

Pattern is the main concern of Cyril E. Power in "The Tube Train," "The Examination Room" and "The Eight," while he displays a robust touch in his monotype entitled "Gasometers." Ethel Spowers makes wheeling gulls give pattern in "The Plough," and C. L. Yonge presents nice arrangement in the bird print called "Toucans." Sports events interest Lil Tschudi, who touches a high point in "Ice Hockey"—a group of players bending over the puck. Elizabeth Spurr contributes stenciled monotypes—"Girl with Parrot" and "Nigger and Parrot"—which lack grace and are far from agreeable in color. Clarice Moffat has a very human document in her monotype called "The Upper Circle"—uncomely women intent on watching a play. It is good in arrangement and broad in handling.

Other items of interest include lithographs by Pierre Bonnard—"From a Window in Montmartre" and "Boulevard de Clichy"; Edouard Vuillard with "Cafe Pigalle" and "The Black Dress"; Marie Laurencin, with an etching entitled "Joueuse de Mandolin," a work in characteristic vein, and James Piton with a lithograph of nudes called "Toilet."

Private View of the Academy this morning was even more crowded than usual. Contrary to expectation many people wore black, among them Lady Oxford and Asquith, Mrs. Ulick Verney, Miss Marie Tempest, Dame Rachel Crowley, Lady Weir, and Lady Pentland. Lady Alexander as usual made up for this sombre note by being ultra brilliant and this year in a burst of patriotism she wore a scarlet Dolly-Vardenish hat with paradise plumes, a scarlet and white frock and a short-sleeved dark blue coat. Among the well-known people I happened to see in the crowd were Lady Charnwood, Lord Salisbury, Lady Horne, Sir Laurence and Lady Guillemard, Lady Swaythling, Mrs. Belloc Lowndes, Lady Emmott, Mrs. Eleanor Glyn and her daughter Lady Davson, Mrs. Wilfred Ashley, The Dean of Westminster, Lady (Edgar) Bonham Carter, and Mrs. Anstruther.

The Academy this year is very true to type. There are few "modern" pictures, most of the canvases are small and there is a noteworthy absence of the class of painting that ignores draughtsmanship and technique. In fact those critics who prefer painters who know both how to draw and how to produce a lovely quality of paint will note with satisfaction the number of canvases where still-life, diaphanous materials, and effects of nature are reproduced with the startling verisimilitude of the old masters.

It is essentially a portrait Academy. Richard Sickert, Augustus John and Glyn Philpot will probably carry off the chief honors with Gerald Kelly, Walter Russell, Gerald Brookhurst, E. Gabain, Simon Elwes and A. K. Lawrence following closely after them. The "picture of the year" is said to be the Sickert portrait of Lord Castle-rosse, a study in wine-color.

If Augustus John chose to paint excellent likenesses of Lord David Cecil, Lord Conway of Allington and Miss Thelma Cazalet, M.P., and do an admirable sanguine sketch of James Joyce, one can only regret that he should paint a portrait of that eminent Canadian Professor J. C. McLennan, D.Sc., F.R.S., which so little resembles the sitter. This mistake is certainly not made in Alphonse Jongers' able portrait of Lt.-Col. George Cantlie, D.S.O., which is hung in Room IV. Other works of Canadian interest is a bronze head by the young Canadian sculptress, Miss Sally Ryan, a portrait of a skier by Richard Jack, R.A., and a delightful portrait labelled "Young Canada", of a girl in winter sports clothes by the same painter, and a portrait of W. Perkins Bull by Walter Russell. In the Architectural room is the beautiful design for a proposed new church of St. James' in Vancouver, by A. Gilbert Scott. A graceful and ingenious combination of ancient and modern.

I missed the clever work of James Gunn. Peter Scott had sent only one of his bird paintings, a flight of Barnacle Geese in April; no one person should have as many gifts as that young man!

Miss Kate Oliver's portrait study of the two little daughters of Col. Douglas Lyall Grant reminded one of her past successes and will probably make many young mothers and fathers decide to let his understanding artist perpetuate their children's grace. Miss Flora Lion had sent two of her always competent portraits. Among the most likeable landscapes were those of Oliver Hall, Sydney Lee, (rather reminiscent of Le Sidaner), Sir George Clausen and Charles Oppenheimer.

St. Andrew's Honors Memory of Sir John Abbott

(Special to The Gazette.)

Lachute, May 19.—An important step in the advancement of the Historical Society of Argenteuil was taken at a public meeting held in Lachute Auditorium Saturday evening when representatives from many sections of the county were present and sanctioned a resolution for establishing a museum in St. Andrew's to be known as the Abbott Memorial Museum. The museum will honor the memory of Sir John Abbott who for 17 years represented Argenteuil in the Legislature and in June of 1891 had the distinction of being honored by appointment from the Crown as Prime Minister and because of his consistent and capable administration was knighted by the Queen on May 24, 1892. The society now numbers about 225 members with Dr. B. N. Wales of St. Andrew's as president. Addresses were delivered by Mrs. A. Kains, ex-president of the Historical Society of Ottawa; Rev. Father Brosseau, of Grenville, and Archibald Kains. Vocal selections were contributed by Mrs. K. McQuat, Mrs. C. Duncan and Mrs. R. A. Giles and Messrs. Owen and Douglas Todd. Presentations of antique relics from the museum from C. F. James, J. Fournier and Mr. Crooks were acknowledged.

MUSEUM PLANNED FOR ST. ANDREW'S

LACHUTE, May 21.—(Star Special)—Citizens of Argenteuil County showed their approval of the plan for building a museum in St. Andrew's, to be known as the Abbott Memorial Museum in commemoration of Sir John Abbott, at a public meeting held here Saturday evening. The museum is an undertaking of the Historical Society of Argenteuil.

MONA LISA GIVEN IN MISTAKE

Gazette May 21, 1935
Famous Painting in Louvre Declared to Be Portrait of Isabella d'Este

(By The Associated Press.)

Yellow Springs, Ohio, May 20.—For 400 years the woman with the enigmatic smile who posed for the famous painting, "Mona Lisa," has been falsely identified, Professor Raymond S. Stiles asserted today.

Dr. Stiles, professor of aesthetics at Antioch College, said he has proof from 12 years of research in the life of Leonardo da Vinci that the woman was Isabella d'Este, the Marchioness of Mantua.

Reference books are incorrect, Dr. Stiles said, in identifying the model for Leonardo's masterpiece as Madonna Lisa, Neapolitan wife of Zanoki, or Francesco del Giocondo.

Giorgio Vasari, an Italian writer, made the original error 40 years after the death of Leonardo in 1519, the professor explained. He made the error in copying a manuscript by Gaddiano, a Florentine, "and everyone since then has carried the error along," Dr. Stiles said.

Estimating the value of the painting, which now hangs in the Louvre, as "about a million dollars," the professor said. "Until now the painting has been one of more or less a mythical person. Now one begins to understand why the Mona Lisa has always been so popular. It is the portrait of one of the noblest and most perfect women of the Renaissance."

The professor's identification of the model for Leonardo was obtained easily, he said.

Examining Leonardo's writings, Dr. Stiles found no mention of Madonna Lisa but only the statement that Leonardo painted a portrait of her husband, Piero Francesco. From Leonardo's writings, he established that the famous artist made the profile drawings of Isabella, Marchioness of Mantua, who was the wife of Marquis Gonzaga, whose "victory" at Fornovo over the forces of Charles VIII., is considered the first modern battle between nations.

Dr. Stiles said he found the profile studies of Isabella on a medal by Christopher Romano in the Imperial Museum in Vienna and impressed on Leonardo's signet ring. He withheld announcement of his discovery of the true identity of the "Mona Lisa" until more recent studies enabled him to identify the statue of Isabella in the Berlin Museum.

Frederick Hutchison Named to American Academy

Frederick W. Hutchison, the Canadian landscape painter who has resided for many years in New York City, has been distinguished by election to full membership in the National Academy of Design, a much coveted honor and the highest attainable award in the field of art in the United States. He was elected an associate member in 1922.

Last year, Mr. Hutchison was elected to life membership in the National Arts Club, and he was recently elected to the office of vice-president of the Salmagundi Club in New York. During the current year, his beautiful canvas, "Before Mass. St. Urban," won the Samuel T. Shaw Purchase Prize in the Salmagundi Annual Oil Exhibition.

Frederick W. Hutchison, N.A., was born in Montreal, March 14, 1879. He studied under the late William Brynmor, C.M.G., R.C.A., in the schools of the Art Association of Montreal, and under William M. Chase in New York, then going to France for further study under Benjamin Constant and Jean Paul Laurens. He went to the United States in 1905, becoming a naturalized citizen in 1915.

Epstein Calls Royal Academy 'Blockheads' Gazette May 20

London, May 19.—Jacob Epstein, distinguished sculptor, has angrily turned in his resignation from the Royal Academy, branding its members "a company of blockheads."

Sir William Llewellyn, president of the Academy, had declined to sign an appeal for the preservation of 18 Epstein statues on the premises of the new London quarters of the Rhodesian Government, which it wanted moved.

"It is not an Academy affair," the Express quoted Sir William as saying.

"Not their affair?" angrily exclaimed Epstein yesterday. "What on earth is the affair of the Royal Academy? Is it not their duty to prevent artists from being insulted and their works defiled?"

"The Royal Academy is simply a smug company of businessmen, and I want no association with such a company of blockheads."

Water Colors of Quiet Coun-

at Scott's

Since Wordsworth wrote his sonnet about the encroaching world, the world has accumulated about it with a clamor and a persistence which would have driven the quietest of his wits, had he lived after the twentieth century. Yet, the world of automobiles and filling stations and the never-faltering march of time, there are still spared to us the quietest of his wits, had he lived after the twentieth century. Yet, the world of automobiles and filling stations and the never-faltering march of time, there are still spared to us the quietest of his wits, had he lived after the twentieth century. Yet, the world of automobiles and filling stations and the never-faltering march of time, there are still spared to us the quietest of his wits, had he lived after the twentieth century.

Here we have such quiet things as cows in a field, or pigs; hens and a haystack; a horse and sleigh standing at the door of a stone house; a man ploughing with a team of oxen; moonlight; autumn. They are water colors and quite small pictures, but they have a freedom of brushwork, a richness of texture and a glow of color that carry them far beyond their size and the limitations of their medium. What color there is in that haystack, what life in that crawling moonlit sky over Quebec, what a sense of distance in those ploughed fields! How wonderfully Horatio Walker evokes weather! All the seasons are here and they are all keenly felt. One of the happiest is that little ploughing scene, with its long horizontals and its rhythm as easy as breathing. There is a fresh blue sky with clouds, a glint of color on an ox's back, another on the cottage roof, but not much else except soil and enough quick green to show that the earth is breaking into spring. "Pigs on the Batture" is a delightful little painting. To most people, the pig is an unromantic creature, but Horatio Walker has brought him into his own. In another, several cows stand by a fence seeking shelter from a spring shower you can almost feel; in a third, the winter cold creeps in over the autumn day; in a fourth, a trapper and his dogs come across the snow. There are no novelties, no surprises—just a life quietly lived, years of observation, and accurate, poignant painting.

Professor Richard Offner,
New York, Heard in Insurance Suit

OPINION IS CHALLENGED
Counsel for Claimants Produces Earlier Certificate by Witness Attesting Value of Pictures

Paintings allegedly damaged by fire in the Outremont home of J. J. Cusack, art dealer, for which the New York Art Corporation is seeking $80,000 indemnity from the American Home Fire Insurance Company, are genuine Italian works but they cannot be attributed to old masters, Richard Offner, professor of the history of art of New York University, testified in the Superior Court yesterday.

Asked to give a money value to the six paintings, one of which is claimed by Cusack to be worth $100,000, Professor Offner said that value could not be definitely assigned, as in the case of canned goods or patent medicines, but in his opinion the paintings were not very valuable, and he gave figures of minimum and maximum amounts far below those set by the owners.

Prof. Offner testified as to the genuineness of the paintings, the period in which he would date them, and their condition and value, the whole under objection by Henry Weinfield, K.C., counsel for the claimants, who exhibited a report signed by the witness in 1928 which, he asserted, spoke for itself.

Mr. Justice Mercier heard Prof. Offner yesterday because the latter is bound for Europe. The case was adjourned following his testimony, to June 4.

Prof. Offner said that the condition of the paintings was the same as in 1928, and that the fire of 1932 did not harm them at all. When asked to value the paintings, witness said:

"There is no absolute or final way of judging paintings on the basis of period or attribution to certain painters. I make this preliminary statement because the ultimate way of judging pictures is by their artistic or aesthetic value in the opinion of an expert, and on such a basis I can guess what they will fetch on open market."

CERTAINTY IMPOSSIBLE.

"I cannot establish with absolute certainty the category they belong to, judged by the usual standards of what constitutes a category. I have a clear idea of the artistic values of the paintings and I can put a fair monetary value upon them." Referring to a work entitled "Holy Family," reputedly by Salimbeni, the witness said that there were five artists by that name, and in his opinion none of them could be associated with the painting in the suit, as it was of altogether a different style.

Qualifying his money estimate by saying that though the paintings were genuine, their value was greatly questionable and their attribution to old masters doubtful or impossible, Prof. Offner proceeded to value the paintings from $250 to $500, another at $750, another, the Holy Family, from $3,000 to $3,500.

Mr. Justice Mercier: "Is the Holy Family the most valuable of the lot?"

Prof. Offner: "It is the least bad of the lot."

Cross-examined by Mr. Weinfield Prof. Offner admitted that he is not an artist, though he has painted; that he has no works hanging in art galleries, that he is not a dealer in paintings and that he had never done restorative work, though he knew its function and method of operation.

The witness said he had issued his certificate attesting to the genuineness and period and value of the paintings on pressure, and had given only a qualified certificate.

Mr. Weinfield: "For how much more would you have given a complete certificate?"

Prof. Offner: "I consider the question outrageous." He repeated that in his opinion the paintings were not damaged by fire or water or smoke.

THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART
Star May 22, 1935

Exhibition
Of the Art of Soviet Russia

With many conflicting stories of the state of art in Soviet Russia, a few scattered specimens of the work done by the artists have been seen here from time to time; there is now an exhibition on the sixth floor at Henry Morgan and Co.'s which gives a comparatively complete idea of the art which has been produced in Russia in recent years. It can be said, without hesitation, that it is an exhibition of works of art and not in any way of political propaganda, and that it shows the beginnings of what may become a new and quite interesting school of art.

Though the artists whose work is shown may form a new school, they are not all young; nearly half of the seventy-six people who contribute are of middle age or older and many of them must have been painting before the war. All seem to have made a new start since the revolution, in method quite as much as in choice of subjects. Generally speaking, these Russians appear to have set themselves to avoid imitation of the modern ideas of other countries, though some of them have in their work a sort of primitive simplicity or even crudity which is not confined to Russia.

The works of graphic art,—drawings and prints,—are not only much more numerous but more important than the oil pictures in this exhibition. There are fifty oil pictures among which a very few stand out. One of these is Eugene Katzman's fine study, full of life and character, of a farm woman and her son; Peter Williams' portrait,—of heroic size,—of a stage director has a kind of strength with its oddities of drawing and perspective; Semen Pavlov's "Old Petrograd" is a good pattern of black tree trunks with a background of old houses. There is dignity in Katherine Zernava's portrait study of an old woman, and a suggestion of French impressionism in Olga Kolmakova's "Winter sport,"—lifelike figures of girls on skis in a snowy atmosphere. Alexander Deyneka's mural designs are interesting as compositions and drawings; his "Rest" has a quaint simplicity of composition. As compositions, Paul Kuznetsov's picture of "building operations at Erivan" is crude but rather effective as illustration; Viktor Midler's "Sailors' swimming contest," has a primitiveness which is almost comic.

Among the water colours, three of shipbuilding by A. A. Shovkunenko stand out, broadly painted sketches which are at the same time good pictures; some studies of horses by M. Dobrov and some miniature drawings of horses in movement by Valentin Kurdov are interesting. There are many good drawings,—in pen and wash, in charcoal and in other mediums, some of them designs for book illustrations. Those by D. N. Kardovsky, D. Shmarinov, N. N. Kupreyanov, M. S. Rodionov, B. Dekhterev and S. V. Gerasimov deserve special notice, and there are two very effective landscape drawings by G. S. Vereysky and P. I. Lvov. Some large woodcuts of industrial scenes by V. Kasyan are fine composition of figures in active movement; a lithograph by I. Sokoloff has some of the same quality. A clean-lined etching of a group of boats by Anatol Suvorov and some portrait wood engravings by P. Pavlov and I. N. Pavlov are some of the other good things in a very interesting collection.

One of the outstanding figures in musical circles was lost to Montreal in the death last night of Mrs. Alexander Murray, of Murray avenue, Westmount, after an illness lasting only a few days. Besides her gifts as a musician, particularly as a pianist, Mrs. Murray was noted as a classical student and for her knowledge of modern languages.

Two of the outstanding cultural societies of this city had known Mrs. Murray as their president, the Ladies' Morning Musical Club and the Women's Art Society. She had continued to take a leading part in their activities and for several years past had been the convener of the music committee of the Women's Art Society, for which programmes of high standard were provided by her discriminating taste.

Mrs. Murray was a daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Macdonald Bridges. Her husband, Alexander Murray, who died about thirty years ago, was a son of William Murray, who called his country estate "Westmount," from which the large city that afterwards grew up about it took its name.

Arrangements for the funeral service had not been made last night, but are expected to be completed today.

News of Art
In Montreal

This year's exhibition of the Independent Art Society is on a very small scale and is being held at the Coffee House on Union Avenue, where the pictures are not too well seen. There is no work in the exhibition that is either large or very ambitious, and most of the pictures are water colors. The principal works in oil are a group of sketches by V. Shebaeff, — a good study of a stormy sky, some sketches of horses, one of a balcony and another of a bridge which are quite interesting. A water color by Frederick G. Cross of horses fording a river has good values of light and color. There are some of Miss Alice des Claves' water colors of Dartmouth and its ponies, and a good pastel sketch of a snowy landscape by Miss Berthe des Claves. Some harbor scenes by Charles Perrochet, a picture of a Chinese porcelain figure by Doris Robertson and a water color of storm clouds over mountains are some of the more notable things in this little collection of works, none of which have any labels by which they can be identified.

A class in landscape study, — in composition as well as in sketching, is to be held this summer near Lake Oulmet, Saint Jovite, under the direction of John Lyman and Harold Beament. Both elementary students and more advanced painters are taken into consideration. The classes are to go on from July 2nd till September 10th. Mr. Lyman, who studied in Paris, and Mr. Beament, the winner of this year's Jessie Dow Prize at the Spring Exhibition, are teachers of experience.

A very attractive collection of Japanese woodcut prints is now being shown at the Arts Club. They are of the end of the best period of such work, at the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries, and among them are works by Hokusai, Hiroshige, the first Toyokuni, Kunisada and others of the more famous Japanese print makers.

Montrealers will be interested to know that Frederick W. Hutchison, the Canadian landscape painter who has resided for many years in New York City, has been distinguished by election to full membership in the National Academy of Design, a much coveted honor and the highest attainable award in the field of art in the United States. He was elected an associate member of the National Academy in 1922.

Over a period of years, Mr. Hutchison's work has steadily developed and has been followed with keen interest and has received high commendation by those competent to judge of its conspicuous merits. Last year Mr. Hutchison was elected to life membership in the National Arts Club and during the current year his beautiful canvas "Before Mass, St. Urbain" won the Samuel T. Shaw Purchase Prize in the Salmagundi Annual Oil Exhibition. Mr. Hutchison has recently been elected to the office of the vice-presidency of the Salmagundi Club in New York City.

Art Contest Entries
On View

The discovery of a promising young artist gifted with natural talent and creative ability to a high degree, was the outstanding feature of an art contest conducted under the auspices of the Loyola Sociological Society at 1126 Drummond street. The work, which instantly drew the attention of the judge and art critics, was painted by Leslie Coppold, an 18-year-old boy and was entitled "The Stone Crusher, depicting a local scene."

Declaring that the society had "caught a genius," the judge of the contest, Sherriff Scott, paid high tribute to Coppold's effort, especially the color work, which he felt was worthy of an experienced artist.

Contest entries are now on exhibition at the society's headquarters, and will remain open to the public until August 31.

Prizes were awarded as follows:
Class A—Montreal scene in color, any medium; first prize $15 to "Stone Crusher," by Leslie Coppold; second prize $5, to "Benoit Street," by Charles Tulley; honorable mention to "Winter in the Mountains," by Uintah Lindstrom and to "Harbor, Montreal," by Jordanus Van der Vliet.

Class B—Portrait or figure drawing in color; first prize $10 to "Negro," by Medard Raymond; second prize $5, to "Habitant," by Mrs. Norah Ferguson; honorable mention to "Portrait Study," by Cynthia F. Chisnall.

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS GIVEN TO SERVICE OF ART RECORDED BY MONTREAL ASSOCIATION

With the well-bred decorum befitting the '60's when it came into being, the Art Association of Montreal without display has slipped into its 76th year. To be precise, April 23 was its 75th birthday, and since 1860, when it was founded, its development through seasons fair and foul has been on a scale that must have been a dim vision to the group of Montrealers who met on January 20 of that year and decided that the time had come when something organized and permanent could be instituted for the development of art in Montreal. Interest in matters artistic, however, was alive in the city years before. In fact the forerunner of the Art Association of today was the Montreal Society formed in 1847. This body consisted of Andrew Morris, president; James Duncan, treasurer, and T. Howden, secretary, the artist members including Cornelius Krieghoff, M. Somerville, W. F. Wilson and W. Sawyer. This society organized a loan exhibit in Bonaventure Hall, and later showed their work from time to time.

A second loan exhibition was later held in the rooms of the Mercantile Library Association, the hibition in 1870, and in the following year 12 Bonaventure street, west of Victoria square, was the home of the usual yearly exhibition. A notable loan exhibition was also held in Windsor Hall, in 1878, with Sir Francis Hincks as president.

The next move was for a permanent home worthy of the aims of the association and the building on Phillips Square, designed in part by J. W. Hopkins and A. T. Taylor, was erected, a move made possible by a bequest of $8,000 by Benajah Gibb, vice-president of the association from 1864 to 1865.

This bequest, which also included a collection of pictures and bronzes, was recorded on a bronze tablet in the hall of this building which read, in part:

"This Art Gallery owes its existence to the liberality of Benajah Gibb, Esq., who died in this City on the 1st June, 1877. By his Will he devised and bequeathed to the Art Association the land on which this building stands; $8,000 in money; over 90 Oil Paintings, and eight valuable Bronzes."

Upon receipt of this bequest the Council proceeded immediately to the erection of what was called the "Old Gallery," with rooms and shops below, and by aid of private subscriptions were enabled to complete the building.

The ceremony of the inauguration by the Marquis of Lorne of this gallery, which displayed a loan exhibition of pictures, as recorded in lery in which we are assembled, and to have erected a building large enough to exhibit to advantage many other pictures besides those belonging to the bequest.

"If I were disposed to accept the criticisms of some artists I should be inclined to endorse the opinion I have heard expressed among them, that one of the few wants of this country is a proper appreciation and countenance of art, but the meeting here today to inaugurate what I hope will be the reign of art in Montreal enables me to disprove such an assertion."

"We may look forward to the time when the influence of such associations as yours may be expected to spread until we have, what they formerly had in Italy, namely, such a love of art that, as was the case with the great painter Correggio, our Canadian artists may be allowed to wander over the land scot free of expense, because the hotel-keepers will only be too happy to allow them to pay their bills by the painting of some small portrait or of some sign for 'mine host!' Why should we not soon be able to point to a Canadian school of painting, for in the appreciation of many branches of art and in proficiency in science Canada may favorably compare with any country."

"To pass to our present prospects, I think we can show we have good promise, not only of having an excellent local exhibition, but that we may, in the course of time, look forward to the day when there may be a general art union in the country, and when I or some more fortunate successor may be called upon to open the first exhibition of a Royal Canadian Academy to be held each year in one of the capitals of our several Provinces."

After declaring the building open, His Excellency and Her Royal Highness shook hands with the president and members of the committee, after which they made a short survey of the Gallery, prior to taking their departure.

The reception committee was composed of the Hon. Mr. Justice Mackay, president; the Hon. Thomas Ryan, vice-president; R. W. Shepherd, treasurer, and Peter Redpath.

The hope expressed by the Marquis of Lorne was not, incidentally, vain for in the following year the Royal Canadian Academy was formed, with H.R.H. Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll and His Grace the Duke of Argyll the Founders.

In its new building the Art Association developed, so that in 1893 was completed an addition to the Old Gallery, containing a fine picture gallery, commodious rooms for the Antique and Life Classes, and a library and reading room built entirely by private subscription.

OPENED BY LORD ABERDEEN

The formal opening of this portion of the building was performed by Lord Aberdeen. The Gazette of November 30, 1893, records the event, in part, as follows:

"The new wing of the Montreal Art Association's building was formally opened last evening by His Excellency Lord Aberdeen. The ceremony in itself was a very simple function, but it proved thoroughly enjoyable to the large gathering present. The Governor-General, Lady Aberdeen and suite did not arrive until after 9 o'clock, but for fully an hour previous people poured into the building and, after divesting themselves of their wraps, congregated in the old gallery, where they examined the permanent exhibit of paintings and stood around in groups engaged in conversation. It was a most representative gathering of Montreal society, and the spectacle was a brilliant and pleasing one. As to the names of those who were there, it would be impossible to give a list, unless one had a complete directory of Montreal's four hundred, or, to be more accurate, thousand at least."

"When the Governor-General and suite arrived they were received by the president and directors in the reading room. A few minutes later the orchestra struck up 'God Save the Queen,' and Sir Donald Smith was seen ascending the stairs, escorting Lord Aberdeen, Lady Aberdeen following under the escort of Mr. R. B. Angus. Then came Their Excellencies' suite and the directors of the association. When Their Excellencies had taken their seats on a raised dais at the western end of the old gallery and silence had been obtained, Sir Donald stepped forward and read an address to His Excellency on behalf of the association."

Sir Donald outlined that the association had been formed on January 20, 1860, and incorporated in April of the same year. The objects of the association were then set forth, and reference made to the bequest of Mr. Gibb and others. Classes had been formed shortly after the opening of the building in 1879. Sixteen loan exhibitions had been held, besides the annual ones, while a valuable permanent collection had been donated by the late Mr. J. Tempest. They were now to open a new building, which would give improved class rooms and an additional gallery for exhibition purposes. . . . Reference was made to the connection between art and industrial education, and a hope was expressed that something should be done in this direction in Canada, which would have the effect of spreading a love of art and beautifying manufacture. He recalled, in a few remarks supplementing the address, the opening of the building fourteen years before by Lord Lorne, and pointed out that the association had been singularly fortunate in the countenance the association had received from the representatives of Her Majesty, and it was under great obligations to Their Excellencies for consenting to become its patrons.

LORD ABERDEEN'S REPLY.

Lord Aberdeen, in replying, said in part: "I fully appreciate the loyalty and the courtesy which has prompted you, Sir Donald, and your colleagues of this Art Association to present this greeting and welcome to Her Majesty's representative. You have spoken, Sir Donald, in very kindly terms of the visit of Lady Aberdeen and myself on this occasion—the occasion of the opening of the new wing of the Art gallery; but I cannot help wishing to remind you that we, on our part, are undoubtedly indebted to this association for the opportunity which you are giving us of performing what is not only a privilege but a duty, under the most pleasing circumstances. I mean the duty of making ourselves acquainted by all means in our power with all that pertains to the culture and development of this Dominion. (Applause.) Undoubtedly, this association is to be much valued for promoting education in this respect. I think, Sir Donald, many years ago there was a controversy between two distinguished gentlemen as to whether the existence of a Democratic system in a country was favorable to the development of art. This is a topic on which a great deal might be said, but on which I shall not enter tonight. But whatever opinions may be held on that subject we may all say with satisfaction that so far as regards the colonies of Great Britain—which may be said to be eminently Democratic—in all these colonies there is no want of appreciation of art in the fullest respect, and this is more particularly the case in regard to Canada. (Cheers.) . . . And on this occasion I think we ought to refer gratefully to the services rendered by Sir Donald Smith and the Art Association of Montreal for the watchful care taken by them in the work of culture and art. . . . (Applause.)"

Referring to the use of art in Canada from a practical point of view, Lord Aberdeen said: ". . . and this reminds me that under the auspices of an emigration society in London there was some time ago an exhibition of Canadian pictures by Canadian artists, and these represented the advantages of Canada as an opening for energetic and industrious emigrants. For instance, there were harvest scenes and orchards and so forth, and it was, I think, a very good idea to adopt. . . . But apart from the utilitarian side of the question we must not forget that general culture itself affords a claim for an association of this sort. A special responsibility attaches to the guardians of art. Therefore we may rejoice that those who have the management of this institution are so well qualified for such a position. Like all good things, art is capable of misuse. Just as there may be cant in religion there may be cant in art when dramatic or pictorial art is used in a manner not calculated to refine, but in the opposite direction. (Applause.) Therefore we may well rejoice when art is conducted in the manner in which it is conducted in this place. . . . We may well look forward to the growth of a Canadian school of art; there are the germs we may hope already. I notice that a large number of the loan collection are of the Dutch school; and why does it stand so high? Because those who painted were satisfied to take their inspiration from their own country. (Hear, hear.) And certainly you may get inspiration from this country if it was obtained from Holland. (Applause.)"

"There is another point to be remembered. They took care that a good painting was bought and retained in the country (hear, hear), and I am glad to think that Montreal is well represented by patrons of art. (Applause.)"

"You have with justice attributed to Lady Aberdeen keen appreciation and sympathy with the work of art, and for myself may I say that having seen many of the rooms of my old home in Scotland decorated by the products of her brush and pencil I can certainly understand the benefit of the products of art in the home. (Loud applause.)"

After declaring the new gallery open, Their Excellencies headed the guests into the new wing and viewed the exhibits.

On this occasion the president, Sir Donald Smith—later Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal—was accompanied by E. B. Green-shields, vice-president, and Robert Lindsay, secretary of the Association.

The completion of this building gave impetus to the Art School in charge of William Brymner, R.C.A. and there was a steady increase in the size of the classes. Gifts of pictures, too, came to the galleries—in 1890 John W. Tempest had left Mechanics' Institute of today, when 317 pictures were on show.

Then it was felt that the time had arrived for the establishment on regular grounds of an artistic institution, with the result that on April 23, 1860, the Art Association of Montreal was incorporated, the Act reading:

"Whereas the Rt. Rev. Francis Fulford, Lord Bishop of Montreal; the Rev. William T. Leach, and William H. A. Davies, Thomas D. King and John Leeming, Esquires, and others have by petition set forth that they and others have lately formed themselves into an Association for the encouragement of the Fine Arts, by means of the establishment and maintenance, in so far as they may be found practicable, of a Gallery or Galleries of Art and the establishment of a School of Design in the City of Montreal. . . ."

REGULAR EXHIBITIONS HELD.

From that time on annual exhibitions were of regular occurrence. On February 11, 1864, it was opened with a musical programme when the conductor, Dr. James Peck, provided a valse composed expressly for the occasion. In the following year there was a marked increase in the number of exhibits in the show in Mechanics' Hall, when engravings and examples of photography were included.

In 1867 an exhibition of work by members of the Montreal Sketching Club was the feature. Another loan exhibition was held in the following year and a show by the Society of Canadian Artists on December 23, 1868, foreshadowed the Royal Canadian Academy of several years later. H.R.H. Prince Arthur was the patron of the ex-

The Gazette of May 27, 1879, follows

"By eight o'clock, throngs of ladies and gentlemen, the elite of Montreal, came pouring in, the toilettes of many of the ladies being noticeable for their tasteful elegance. About 9 o'clock His Excellency the Governor-General and Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise arrived, attended by Major and Mrs. DeWinton, and were escorted by the President of the Association to the dais."

In his address the president, the Hon. Mr. Justice Mackay, said, in part:

"Although the want of a permanent Gallery has long been felt, probably no step would have been taken, for some time to come, to erect such a building in Montreal, had it not been for the late Mr. Benajah Gibb's munificent bequest, and the prompt action which he imposed upon us. In addition to his very valuable collection of paintings and several bronzes he gave and bequeathed to the Association in trust for the citizens of Montreal, the ground upon which our building stands, and eight thousand dollars in money. Ours is believed to be the first building erected in the Dominion wholly for Fine Art purposes."

His Excellency in his response said in part: "I think Montreal can be honestly and warmly congratulated not only upon the possession of a collection which will go far to making her Art Gallery one of the most notable of her institutions, but on having succeeded in getting possession of funds enough at a time which is certainly by no means peculiarly propitious for the gathering of money, to give a home to this collection in the Galerosity which virtually made the acquisition of the property a handsome donation to the Art Association of Montreal.

At the annual meeting held on March 11, Dr. F. J. Shepherd, the president, announced that the purchase price of the property was in the region of $70,000. The building on Phillips Square had been sold for $275,000.

In June, 1910, in a competition restricted to three architects, Edward and W. S. Maxwell were chosen architects for the new Art Gallery, the members of the Art Association council being satisfied with the decision of Edmund M. Wheelwright, of Boston, consulting architect. Work was started at once and by the autumn of 1911 the building was roofed and the interior appointments commenced. At that time a topic of interest was the four fluted columns for the front of the building which were at that date the longest marble monoliths in Canada—32 feet long, three feet six inches at the base and each weighing 27 tons. In their transportation from Iverville, Que., where they were finished, there were problems—Sherbrooke street was "up" for the laying of a sewer, the thoroughfare being virtually narrowed to half its ordinary width. However, this was managed without mishap.

BY DUKE OF CONNAUGHT

It was on December 9, 1912, that the new building of the Art Association, Sherbrooke street west, was opened by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught in the presence of two thousand members and guests. As on previous occasions when vice-royalty had honored the association at formal inaugurations, the galleries displayed a loan exhibition of paintings from local private collections on a scale which made the show at the initial function on Phillips Square in 1879 seem modest indeed. Montreal picture-lovers sent the cream of their works, and outstanding examples of the British, French, Dutch, Spanish and Italian schools filled the galleries from the Dummond, Van Horne, Ross, Angus and Gardner collections, besides choice items from collections of more modest size.

On this occasion, although the royal party was not expected to arrive until ten o'clock, the guests commenced to arrive soon after seven o'clock, the queue of carriages and automobiles stretching from the handsome building to far past Mountain street.

The interior of the building was decorated with palms and ferns, the copper banisters of the wide marble staircase was twined with bay leaves, and immediately at the head of the staircase was a dais with three seats.

It was promptly at ten o'clock that the strains of the National Anthem by the band of the 5th Royal Highlanders of Canada, under Bandmaster Anthony, announced the arrival of the royal party, who were received at the head of the canopied stairway from the street by Mr. F. V. Meredith, vice-president of the Art Association, in the absence of Mr. James Ross, the president, then in the West Indies.

Here the council of the Art Association were presented, those present being Mr. J. B. Learmont, Dr. Gardner, Mr. Hugh Paton, Mr. C. J. Fleet, Mr. H. S. Holt, Mr. A. Baumgarten, and Mr. William Brymner, P.R.C.A.

A few minutes later their Royal Highnesses were escorted up the staircase, their progress being followed by hundreds of guests who craned over the marble railings. H.R.H. the Duchess of Connaught and the Princess Patricia took their seats on the dais, but the Duke remained standing while Mr. H. V. Meredith, in a brief speech, expressed on behalf of the association, the sense of high honor conferred by royalty opening the new building.

Mr. Meredith, after briefly touching on the founding and aims and objects of the Art Association, said, in part:

"During the fifty-two years of its existence the Art Association has steadily held its course, solely supported by donations from private sources, in its endeavor to fulfill the objects for which it was incorporated; and in this it has been successful beyond the anticipations of its founders.

"And may it please Your Royal Highness, now that the association has been enabled by the aid of generous donations and the magnificent gift of its president, Mr. James Ross, to erect these new galleries and schools, and has taken one of the most important steps in its history; and it is urged to still greater effort by the interest and encouragement which Your Royal Highness evinces by graciously honoring it on this notable occasion. "We now humbly pray that Your Royal Highness may be pleased to declare this building open, and to dedicate it to its uses."

THE DUKE'S REPLY.

In reply the Duke of Connaught said: "Mr. Meredith, ladies and gentlemen.—It is scarcely necessary for me to assure you of the pleasure it has given me to accept your invitation to inaugurate your new building; for you must be well aware that the Duchess, the Princess and myself are always happy to help any movement which tends to strengthen the position of art in Canada.

"Your association may look back with satisfaction on its past history, and may feel today its work has reached an important point on the road which the initiators of the association mapped out for themselves and their successors.

"You have here a dignified and handsome building, filled with the cream of the fine collections whose treasures have been so generously placed at your disposal.

"Such an exhibition is of great educational value to the city, accustoming the eye of those who visit it to real beauty of color and of form, and weaning them from the meretricious class of painting which too often masquerades as art.

"By thus educating the artist's taste of a people, they are gradually led to feel the need of beauty in their surroundings, and the improvement in artistic sense manifests itself in a demand for grace, beauty, and congruity in their gardens, their homes and their furniture.

"In a country like Canada, where nearly everyone works hard, there is a tendency to forget the value and pleasure of beautiful surroundings, and exhibitions such as this will help to stimulate the sense of what is beautiful, and to remind people that much may be done, and at little expense to make their cities and their homes pleasing to the eye without abating an atom of practical utility.

"I congratulate Montreal on the public spirit of those who have come forward with the donations which have made your work possible, and I am glad that you have mentioned the generosity of my friend, Mr. James Ross, your president, to whom the association owes so much.

"I now have much pleasure in declaring this building open and in dedicating the new Galleries and Schools of the Art Association of Montreal, to the encouragement of art and to the artistic education of the students who will study here."

Presentation was made on behalf of the Art Association of a bouquet of orchids to the Duchess, American beauties to the Princess and bouquets of Taft roses to Miss Pelly, lady-in-waiting to H.R.H. the Duchess of Connaught, and Miss Adam, lady-in-waiting to the Princess Patricia.

The royal party then made a tour of the galleries. Mr. H. V. Meredith, escorting the Duke of Connaught, Mr. R. B. Angus the Duchess, Mr. H. S. Holt the Princess Patricia, Mr. William Brymner, P.R.C.A., Miss Adam, and Mr. J. B. Abbott, secretary of the association, Miss Pelly.

It was more than a hurried glance that the royal party took in their visit to the six galleries hung with the best examples of various schools, their advent being heralded by their aide-de-camps, Captain Buller, Captain Bulkeley, Major Worthington and Mr. Arthur Sladen, the Duke's private secretary.

It was eleven o'clock by the time the round of the galleries had been completed, and the royal party descended to the supper room in the following order: H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught with Mrs. H. V. Meredith, the Duchess of Connaught with Mr. H. V. Meredith, the Princess Patricia with Mr. R. B. Angus, Miss Adam with Mr. J. B. Abbott, and Miss Pelly with Mr. H. S. Holt. Following refreshments the royal party took their departure, the band of the 5th Royal Highlanders of Canada playing them out.

Of those figuring in the inauguration ceremony H. V. Meredith was to become Sir Vincent Meredith, Bart., and president of the Association from 1914 to 1916, and H. S. Holt, Sir Herbert Holt, J. B. Abbott, named secretary in 1901, retired in 1924 due to failing health.

KEPT TRUE TO AIMS

Since being established on Sherbrooke street in this fireproof building, the Association has kept true to the aims of the founders 75 years ago. The permanent collection contains 646 paintings of all schools, many of the examples being the envy of galleries in other cities. By purchase, gift and bea valuable collection of paintings and $70,000 as a trust fund for the purchase of pictures, and in 1909 the fine Learmont collection was received. Another substantial bequest was $50,000 by Miss Catherine Orkney.

With these gifts and the lending of masterpieces for special exhibitions came more responsibility and not a little anxiety—the building was non-fireproof and insurance rates were high. A new building to adequately house these treasures was considered.

NEW SITE PURCHASED

In February, 1910, it was announced that the new Art Association building would occupy the old Holton property at the corner of Ontario avenue and Sherbrooke street, Senator Robert Mackay, the owner of the land, showing a gen-quest, pictures have been added, among the gifts being pictures and other items by the second Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal and members of his family in 1926. Several important loan exhibitions have been held, the last Spring Exhibition was the 52nd and alternate years the Royal Canadian Academy show is held in these galleries. There have been, too, memorial exhibitions of the work of William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., James Morrice, R.C.A., Helen McNicoll, and of the collections of the late Dr. William Gardner and Dr. F. J. Shepherd. The Canadian Handicrafts Guild has held its annual exhibitions here, and drawings by students of the School of Architecture of McGill University are shown annually.

The cordial relations that exist between the Art Association and the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, have brought many interesting exhibits to the local galleries—contemporary British paintings, Scottish watercolors and prints from abroad.

There has been increased interest in the Museum, organized in 1916, where the exhibits are of a nature to be helpful to the art student.

The lecture course by experts on various phases of art is an educational feature of the Association's work.

Interest in art matters is increased by the activities of this Association, one of its most important moves being opening, in 1922, the galleries to the public on Sunday, although this action meant sacrificing the Orkney bequest of $50,000, which was transferred to the Verdun Protestant Hospital. While the peak of the membership was touched in 1929 with 1,770, the situation, despite these worrying times, is far from discouraging.

It was in January 1921 that William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., in the thirty-fifth year of his directorship of the Art Classes of the Art Association of Montreal, resigned that post due to illness. In the years that Mr. Brymner directed the art classes there had been steady growth. Fresh from study in Paris in 1885, Mr. Brymner was painting at Glacier, in the Canadian Rockies, when he was asked to accept directorship of the schools. Robert Harris, R.C.A., leaving the post for a period in England, recommended Mr. Brymner as his successor. He entered on his duties on October 11, 1886. Elected an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy on his return from Europe, Mr. Brymner in the year that he was appointed director of the Art Association classes was made a full member of the R.C.A.

When Mr. Brymner became associated with the schools, then in the old gallery building in Phillips Square, drawing from the antique and from life were the only two classes. The attendance was about 10. The classes he left in April, 1921, totalled 98 students, to the classes of thirty-five years before being added painting classes, composition classes, and a little class, the latter being composed of students unable, through attendance at schools, to take the regular Art Association classes. Through the schools under his guidance passed students who are leaders in Canadian painting today. As painter and instructor Mr. Brymner stood for the moderate element in art, and his influence in this respect was wide.

In 1909 he was elected president of the Royal Canadian Academy, succeeding Robert Harris, resigning, through illness, this post in 1918. On January 1, 1916, he was honored with the title of Companion of St. Michael and St. George, being the third Canadian artist to be so honored, the others being Robert Harris, R.C.A., painter, and the Montreal sculptor Philippe Hebert, R.C.A.

A reunion of past and present pupils marked the formal departure of Mr. Brymner on April 26. In the course of the tea held at the Art Gallery, Miss Alberta Cleland, instructor of the junior elementary classes, on behalf of the class, presented to Mr. Brymner a purse of gold, and Miss Dorothy Coles presented a bouquet of roses and iris to Mrs. Brymner. Accompanying the purse was an illuminated scroll, the work of a member of the class, Mr. David Macfarlane, on which the names of those who had subscribed were inscribed.

The scroll bore the inscription: "To William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., with affection and appreciation from those whom he has taught and inspired as Director of the Art Association during the past thirty-five years."

"Art for art's sake, but in that Art, The true, the beautiful, the good, Traced from a throbbing human heart, Shall tint that sky, that field, that wood."

Mr. Brymner, who with Mrs. Brymner went to France, died in England on June 18, 1925, as he was about to return to Canada.

After the departure of Mr. Brymner, Randolph Hewton, A.R.C.A., conducted a class until business called him from the city. In 1924 it was decided to suspend the senior and junior life classes and continue only the junior and commercial classes. A year later the Art Association in conjunction with the Royal Canadian Academy conducted a life class under E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., and these continued for several years. Last autumn the senior art classes were re-established under the direction of Edwin H. Holgate, A.R.C.A., and Lillian Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A.

STATUE IS PRESENTED TO CITY May 27/35 Gazette Gift of Italian Colony Meant to Cement Friendship With Canada

EARLY RECORD RECALLED

Navigator Considered Early Link Between Britain and Italy—Mayor Houde Gives Thanks for City

In the presence of representatives of the federal, provincial and city governments, the Royal Italian consuls in Ottawa and Montreal, members of the local consular corps, distinguished Italian citizens of Montreal and thousands of spectators, a bronze statue of John Cabot, explorer and navigator, was presented to Montreal on Saturday. The presentation was made at a colorful ceremony in Western Park, Atwater avenue, where Commandatore G. H. Catelli, dean of the Italian colony here, in offering the statue to the city, expressed the wish that it might serve as a binding tie between Canadian citizens of English, French and Italian descent.

"I thank the Italian citizens in the name of the City of Montreal for the gift of this beautiful monument," Mayor Camillien Houde said in thanking Mr. Catelli. "Not only will it bind closer citizens of Italian, French and English descent but also inhabitants of Italy and of Canada."

The unveiling ceremony was performed under a blazing sun and the small public square was afire with the showy colours of flags and uniforms of cadets and soldiers setting off in sharp contrast the severe silk hats and morning coats of the officials. After the dedication ceremony proper was over and the crowd had started to file out, Italian patriotic societies and cadets remained to be inspected by Luigi Petrucci, Italian Royal Consul General in Ottawa, the principal speaker of the afternoon. He was greeted with the Fascist salute and resounding shouts.

In the name of Mussolini and Italy, Commandatore Petrucci signalled out how Italy, the genius of which had extended to all branches of human activity up through the ages, had also won renown in the realm of exploration and discovery. The appeal of the unknown, the mystery of adventure—both, in the Middle Ages, had sent out Italian navigators and seamen under the flag of Italy; they included Marco Polo who had revealed to Europe the immensity of Asia, and who had directed commerce of his day to a land of amazing riches, as well as Christopher Columbus, John Cabot, Giovanni Da Verazzano, Amerigo Vespucci, the "discoverers of the New World."

HARDY ADVENTURERS.

From time immemorial, Italians had been hardy maritime venturers. Mr. Petrucci stressed the great nations built up during the 13th, 14th and 15th centuries—England, France, Spain and Portugal—borrowed from Italy their knowledge of navigation to operate, too, their vast sailing fleets. Thus long before his famed discovery, Columbus was in Portugal; Cabot was in England in 1484, and Da Verazzano was in France; from their knowledge, those countries culled a wealth of information which enabled their sailors later to undertake discoveries on their own.

He recalled that it was the mirage of a route to India via the Occident that sent Columbus and Cabot out on their famed adventures; Cabot discovered Newfoundland, and was cheered by England and King Henry VII.—he was the first European sailor to reach the shores of North America!

"Thus," said Mr. Petrucci, "in the name of John Cabot, at the service of the King of England, Henry VII., and forerunner of Jacques Cartier and Champlain and the others who opened up this blessed land, Canada, to European civilization, we see united the image of three great nations which today, still, march at the head of humanity: Italy, Great Britain and France."

In the monument in Montreal, he said, should be seen the reincarnation of that spirit of friendship which centres around French, English and Italian Canadians in the Dominion, linking anew their civil bonds of communal rights and aspirations.

"I formulate one wish," he concluded. "It is that the erection of this handsome monument be the principle of recognition which all North America owes to John Cabot."

VOYAGES RECALLED

In presenting the monument Commandatore Catelli recalled briefly the voyages of discovery of the great Italian navigator which had been undertaken thanks to the patronage of Henry VII.

The monument, a handsome piece of sculpture, is the work of the local Italian artist, Guido Casini, and was cast in Florence. The aged discoverer rests on a stone base. On three of the six faces of the base is repeated in Italian, French and English, the dedication "To Giovanni Caboto from the Italian citizens of Canada." On the remaining sides are bas-reliefs representing great events in the discoverer's life. In turn, he is shown receiving letters patent from Henry VII. in London, on March 5, 1496; sailing from Bristol on May 2, 1497; arriving in Cape Breton on June 24, 1497, planting the Venetian flag and taking possession of the land in the name of Henry VII. of England.

Others present included Hon. Alfred Duranleau, Minister of Marine; Hon. Honore Mercier, Provincial Minister of Lands and Forests; Mgr. J. Conrad Chaumont, Vicar General, representing Mgr. Georges Gauthier, Bishop Coadjutor of Montreal; Rene Turck, Consul General of France; Ludwig Kempff, Consul General of Germany; Brig. W. W. P. Gibsons, M.C., D.S.O., officer commanding military district No. 4; Ald. J. M. Savignac, president of the Executive Committee; Ald. Leo J. McKenna, Ald. George S. Layton, Ald. Ovide Taillefer, Dr. W. MAY RENAME PARK

Probability that the park in which his statue was unveiled will be named after John Cabot was envisaged by Mayor Camillien Houde, C.B.E., at the brilliant banquet and ball held in the Windsor Hotel by the Italian Colony at night. High tributes were paid to Italy, called "the cradle of Western civilization," by Hon. Wesley Frost, United States consul-general in Montreal, and to Italian seamen and navigators.

Balbo's epochal mass flight to Canada in 1933 also is to be recognized, according to Mayor Dr. J. Clarence Webster, of Shediac, N.B., where the Italian aviators first touched Canadian land. Dr. Webster emphasized his determination to have a monument erected there to mark the event.

A feature of the proceedings was the warm tribute of the Lord Mayor and citizens of Bristol, England, whence Cabot sailed, which was conveyed by F. E. W. Saunders, formerly of that city, who also pointed out that he was a member of a Masonic lodge in Bristol, named after the Cabots.

Cav. Giuseppe A. Brigidi, Royal Italian Consul, Montreal, presided over a gathering which represented the consular corps of Ottawa and Montreal, the provincial government, the civic government, the universities and business and commercial life of the city.

Frederick Hutchison Named to American Academy

Frederick W. Hutchison, the Canadian landscape painter who has resided for many years in New York City, has been distinguished by election to full membership in the National Academy of Design, a much coveted honor and the highest attainable award in the field of art in the United States. He was elected an associate member in 1922.

Last year, Mr. Hutchison was elected to life membership in the National Arts Club, and he was recently elected to the office of vice-president of the Salmagundi Club in New York. During the current year, his beautiful canvas, "Before Mass. St. Urbain," won the Samuel T. Shaw Purchase Prize in the Salmagundi Annual Oil Exhibition.

Frederick W. Hutchison, N.A., was born in Montreal, March 14, 1879. He studied under the late William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., in the schools of the Art Association of Montreal, and under William M. Chase in New York, then going to France for further study under Benjamin Constant and Jean Paul Laurens. He went to the United States in 1905, becoming a naturalized citizen in 1915.

PRESIDES AT OPENING

COL. WILFRID BOVEY, president of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, who presided at the opening of the Guild's annual exhibition on board the Athenia yesterday.

A complete lay-out of the Quebec highway system, and an amazingly detailed pictorial description of the natural resources of the country, its wealth of forest, lake and stream, its dairy lands, its hunting grounds, and the national parks and numerous pleasure resorts which dot the province. Every page is an education, and those who desire to know as well as to see the many advantages which the province of Quebec enjoys, might learn much that is important within the pages of this finely conceived brochure.

Illustrations at the foot of every map section tell their own story of the advantages enjoyed in that particular area. Proceeding from the west, for example, one notes the manufacturing interests of middle Ontario, the scenic beauties of the Thousand Isles district, the fruit farms and dairy lands of the Ontario-Quebec border; and the home province provides a never-ending variety of pictures of activities and pastimes including hunting, boating, exploring, logging, skiing and fishing, besides suggesting the vast scenic and historical wealth which lies along the river and in the hinterland.

ART EXPERT GIVES EVIDENCE IN COURT

Defence evidence was resumed this morning before Mr. Justice Mercier in the Superior Court in the action in which the New York Art Corporation is suing the American Home Fire Insurance Company for $30,000, under a fire insurance policy on a group of paintings. The defence case opened yesterday with Edmond Dyonnet, secretary of the Royal Canadian Academy of Art, on the stand and this morning Alphonse Jongeres, artist, was called.

The hearing is continuing.

Influence of Guild Spreading Across Country, Dr. Mac-Millan Says in Opening
Exhibition

Every sale of an imitation hooked rug in Canada is doing harm to the Province of Prince Edward Island, which relies—to a certain extent—on profits from the sale of genuine handicrafts, Hon. W. J. P. MacMillan, Premier of that province and president of the P.E.I. branch of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, declared yesterday afternoon as he officially opened the three-day exhibition of the Guild aboard the S.S. Athenia, in the port of Montreal.

"I do not believe that I speak only for the country people in Prince Edward Island," Prime Minister MacMillan continued. "I know that I speak also for those of the other Maritime provinces and Quebec when I say that we are astonished and hurt beyond words to find old established firms dealing in goods of this kind. Obviously, I cannot say who they are, but I do say this, that we shall do everything we can to prevent this very unfair competition with our country people. We have stood quite enough as it is, but this is a little too much."

The speaker said that he was glad of the opportunity to emphasize the importance of the work of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, that its influence had spread from one end of Canada to the other.

WIDE WORK VARIETY.

Speaking of the work of the Guild, he continued: "You will see as you go through this exhibition that its activities extend to every part of Canada, that they include work in wool and linen, in iron and brass and copper, in wood, in clay, in paper. They are growing so fast that the guild itself can hardly keep track of them; in this province for instance, there are more than 50,000 hand looms and I do not know how many spinning wheels. This is evidence not of a fad, but of a great movement, a swing towards rural life, towards a more leisurely and a more pleasant existence."

"The Government of Quebec has supported the movement here: My own Government has aided it as much as possible in Prince Edward Island; the University of Alberta in the West, Mount Allison and St. Francis Xavier in the east, have joined actively in the work. Handicrafts are playing a great part in the rural economics of Canada. They are also playing a part in the culture of Canada. For this work has a cultural value, these arts are real arts, as you will see when you walk through this exhibition. There is no gulf fixed between these expressions of artistic feeling and those of any artists, the difference is one of training and of method. In due course I shall expect to see handicrafts taking their place in the curriculum of rural schools and I think it will be a good thing when they do."

"I want you to observe one thing in particular, the quality of the products presented. A recent criticism suggested that these goods were sub-standard—I only ask you to look at them. I ask you to observe that the domestic hand-spun hand-woven tweeds of Canada are actually better than those of Scotland, our only difficulty is that we cannot get enough of them. I ask you to look at the woodwork and iron work, at the toys and furniture, at the hand-woven textiles, the jewellery and pottery, and then to say whether this new Canadian activity, the renaissance of an old activity which like the Phoenix has come to a new and active life, is not something deserving all our support."

BEAUTIFUL DISPLAY.

Exhibits include a bewildering and beautiful variety of rugs, blankets, scarves, bags, linens, tweeds, homespun, objects of art, beautiful curiosities, models, pottery and pictures. Among the exhibits is a rug made by a Cape Breton woman from a design by R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., of Montreal, for presentation to His Majesty the King.

There are more practical, saleable articles in the exhibition this year. Some of the new developments are silver jewellery—Canadian stones, such as Manitoba rose quartz; juniper carving and Indian style weaving from Alberta; fine pottery, and Indian quill work, and so forth.

Col. Wilfrid Bovey, president of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, who presided at yesterday's opening ceremony, presented Hon. Dr. MacMillan with a slate disk made by the Indians of the Queen Charlotte Islands off the coast of British Columbia.

Other Tokens of Esteem Presented on His Retirement from McGill

On the eve of his retirement as Macdonald Professor of Physics, director of the department, and Dean of the Faculty of Graduate Studies and Research at McGill University, which is effective today, Dr. A. S. Eve, M.A., D.Sc., LL.D. (Queen's), LL.D. (McGill), F.R.S.C., F.R.S., was honored by the members of the staff of the university at a tea in the library of the Macdonald physics building yesterday afternoon.

Dr. Eve, who has been appointed emeritus Professor of Physics, and Mrs. Eve, will sail from Montreal at 10 o'clock this morning for Glasgow. When he was asked by The Gazette if he intended to make his home in the British Isles, Dr. Eve replied: "I have no plans—but I can tell you this: I have purchased return tickets!"

At yesterday afternoon's gathering, Dean Percy E. Corbett, of the faculty of law, acting on behalf of Dean Eve's colleagues and friends, presented him with a purse, a golf bag, and a pipe. He also unveiled a portrait of the retiring dean, painted by Edwin H. Holgate, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, and an enlarged framed photograph. The photograph will be hung immediately in the physics building.

while the portrait will remain in the possession of Dr. Eve during his lifetime, after which it will revert to the university.

In making the presentation, Dean Corbett referred feelingly to the affection and esteem in which Dr. Eve is held by colleagues and friends at the university, and wished him many happy years of retirement. In reply, Dr. Eve expressed his appreciation of the gifts bestowed upon him and his thanks for the many kindnesses of his McGill and Montreal friends during his 32 years on the staff of the University.

Gazette June 4/35

Head of the Royal Canadian Academy, an exclusive body of 40 members, and past president of the Ontario Society of Artists, Edmond Wyly Grier was honored with a Knight Bachelorhood in the King's list. The noted Toronto portrait painter was included for his outstanding contribution to Canadian art.

Mr. Grier exhibited in the Royal Academy as far back as 1886 and three years earlier a Grier canvas was shown in the Salon, Paris. Since 1894 he has worked steadily in Canada, chiefly on portraits, and has taken a leading part in organization work among artists.

Born in Melbourne, Australia, 63 years ago, Mr. Grier was educated in England and at Upper Canada College, Toronto. He studied under Alphonse Legros at the Slade School in London, at the Julian Academy in Paris, and at the Scuola Libera in Rome. Many of his early paintings were done at St. Ives, England.

The Ukiyoe school, which, literally translated, means "The Transient World of Daily Life" began early in the 17th century, and, breaking away from the classical school of painting, introduced a style which, if plebeian, achieved much distinction of design and decorative beauty. It is usually classified under five periods. The first was led by Matabei (1577-1650) and, at the end of it prints in two colours (1742) and in three colours (1755) began to appear. In the second period, from 1764 on, Harunobu and his followers developed a greater naturalism and a wider range of colours in pictures of aristocratic ladies' young lovers, teahouse beauties and actors. The third period is considered to be that in which the art of the colour print reached its fullest development. The principal artist was Kiyonaga.

The fourth period, dominated by the work of Utamaro, Yeishi and Toyokuni, brought greater freedom, inventiveness and fine craftsmanship which contradicted the attribution of "decadence" which is sometimes given to this period. In the fifth and last period the outstanding artists were Hokusai and Hiroshige; human figures play a less important part in the prints of this period, but these two were among the greatest landscape artists that the world has ever known.

This exhibition is open to the public daily, except Saturday, from 10 to 12 a.m., and from 3 to 5 p.m.

CATACOMBS REPRODUCED

Persecution of Early Christians in Rome Depicted in Wax—Biblical Scenes
Are Shown

With a large group of distinguished guests in attendance the Musee Catholique Canadien, located at the corner of Queen Mary and Cote des Neiges roads, which its sponsors claim to be a worthy rival of such world renowned wax museums at the Tussaud Museum in London and the Grevin Museum in Paris, was officially opened yesterday afternoon.

The guests were received in the entrance hall, impressive through its size and massiveness. There they were addressed by Victor Morin, president of the administrative board of the Chateau de Ramezay, who explained the origin and the purpose of the enterprise and gave much information concerning its contents.

He explained that the originator of the project had been Albert Chartier, sculptor, statuary expert at the Grevin Museum and a graduate of the School of Fine Arts of Paris. While travelling in this country Mr. Chartier had been profoundly impressed by the deep religious and patriotic character of the population. This led him to plan the establishment in Montreal of a wax museum which would follow the most commendable features of the best wax museums in Europe and would have an essentially religious and national character. The greater part of the capital was raised among Catholic residents of France, who contributed to the undertaking in a spirit of religious and artistic enthusiasm, Mr. Morin said.

To co-operate with him Mr. Chartier chose Robert Tancrede, one of the best known among young French landscape painters and an architect as well, and assigned to him the task of painting the frescoes and of completing the interior decoration.

REALISTIC EFFECTS.

"Nothing in Mr. Chartier's conception offends the aesthetic sense of the spectator and all the scenes which have been executed after long and serious historical studies are at once artistic and realistic," Mr. Morin said. "The actors have a moving personality due to the life-like expression of their faces and to the archeological precision of details of costume and of frescoes and lapidary inscriptions copied on the spot in Rome. There are about 100 personages and 500 feet of statue-gallery."

A large-scale reproduction of the catacombs of St. Calixte in Rome as they stood at the time of the persecutions carried out by Roman emperors occupy the first story of the building. Among the scenes represented are a baptism, a wedding and a burial. The larger and most impressive scene is that which shows with uncommon realism the martyrdom of early Christians in the Roman Circus. This scene attracts and retains the attention by the impression of space, of vastness it conveys. In the foreground are shown several persons, obviously members of the same family, the mother with a babe in arms. The mingled expression of terror and of calm resignation in their faces as they watch a lion tearing a victim to pieces, while a short distance away another beast strolls leisurely away with a piece of human flesh still hanging from its blood-stained mouth, is unforgettable. In the distance are seen a group of crucified Christians and in the background the blood-thirsty crowds in the tiers.

Biblical scenes depicted include the birth of Christ, the flight to Egypt, St. Joseph's workshop, the death of St. Joseph. Other scenes of religious and historical interest represented are those of the Pope blessing a crowd, Katherine Tekakwitha praying before a small altar erected on the shores of the St. Lawrence, the arrival of Jacques Cartier, Jeanne Mance caring for the sick. More scenes will be added later.

FINE BUILDING RAISED.

The building was designed by Paul M. Lemieux, a local graduate of the School of Fine Arts of Paris. It has a frontage of 175 feet on Queen Mary road. The entrance is arcade-shaped and is decorated with a sculptured frieze representing a maple leaf. Two large stained-glass windows in two different shades of yellow throw a warm and cheerful glow in the vast entrance hall. The building is capped by a lintel. On either side of the door and at each end of the structure on the Queen Mary road side large statues have been placed and they are so disposed as to give the impression that they serve as props for the crowning lintel.

Among those present yesterday were Rene Turck, Consul-General of France in Montreal; Ald. Leon Trepanier, representing His Worship Mayor Houde; Ald. Leo McKenna, Telesphore Brassard, Rodolphe Bedard, Mgr. J. M. LePailleur, rector of the Church of the Nativity; Edmond Montet, Guy Vanier, Alfred Laliberte and Robert Rumilly.

From Our Readers Gazette May 27/35

A Secretary of Arts?

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—We have had occasion during the last few years to refer to the universal and growing interest in Art. We have mentioned the enormous crowds that thronged the various exhibitions held in London, New York, and Paris. It is one of the signs of our changing world that the really significant things of life are being winnowed from the chaff. Art is older than religion, and is a need deep in the soul of man, and he is now finding it a solace and an inspiration, a permanence in a world of flux. Our conferees to the south are becoming more art conscious month by month. They have built and opened eleven new art galleries during the past four years. They are taking the matter so seriously that there is a proposal now pending in Congress to form a new government department with a "Secretary of Arts." The secretary would be a member of the President's cabinet. Some of the clauses in the bill, and the language leading to their enactment, are really worth recording. We in Canada might do well to find inspiration for ourselves in the following: "Progress in science, art and literature in all their forms, by the people of the United States, has been made with such enlargement of scope and with such strides that American cultural development has reached such a dignified and stable stage as to warrant the creation of a new department of the government." Then follow these ideal reasons for recognition of art by the government: "Whereas, in the opinion of the best informed men and women of the United States, 'man shall not live by bread alone,' and that there is more to life and living than the solely material things of existence, and that visions, without which the people perish, and beauty and ideals, are as essential to the promotion of the general welfare as are the things of substance."

Who expected to read this in a bill before Congress: "Whereas, visions and ideals are practically expressed through the medium of art in painting, sculpture, etc. Whereas, as the ancient Greeks made beautiful the most common articles of daily use, so, in the last two decades the American people have demanded the application of art, that is, art in its sense of beautification, to the most common articles of daily use, and the ugly forms have been discarded for new and beautiful structures, that at least partly satisfy the growing artistic consciousness of the American people," etc. The bill is so well sponsored, there is little doubt that in a short time the United States will recognize the essential importance of art to a higher conception of living, that there will be created the office of "Secretary of Arts."

In Canada the private citizen is showing a decided and growing interest in all that pertains to art, but it will apparently be a long time before such a trend crystallizes to the extent of reaching parliament. But new life-values are being evolved in our consciousness, and we are discovering that art is a verity that never disillusion, and that "beauty is truth." Fortunately, Montreal is already rich in art treasures, and our Art Gallery is ready to respond to public demands. Our National Gallery is awake to the new renaissance, and several important travelling exhibitions have been shown in the principal cities. We are sharing in the world movement towards "the things that are more excellent." It is all to the good. But when shall we have a "Secretary of Arts?"

A Note on Japanese Color Prints

In connection with the exhibition of Japanese colour prints, which is now being held at the Arts Club, Victoria St., a note, summarized below, has been written for the Club by W. S. Maxwell, who is the owner of many fine prints which are in the exhibition. "In the production of a Japanese colour print, the artist first made the outline, or key design, with a brush, using Chinese ink, on thin semi-transparent paper. This was handed to the Engraver who, pasting it, face downwards to secure the necessary reversal, on a plank-wise block of soft cherry wood, proceeded to cut away all the wood except that covered by the artist's design. The result was a key-block of the forthcoming series; from proofs of this a further series of blocks was cut, the final stage being one for each separate colour to be employed. At this stage, the third person of the trio takes up the work, namely, the printer. He brushed his water colour to which was added a little rice paste, on the block.

"Dampened paper, made from mulberry tree bark, was laid on the block, and the impression obtained by rubbing with a 'baren' (a circular flat paid of twisted fibre enclosed in a sheaf of bamboo leaf). The same procedure was repeated with the other color blocks.

"Japanese prints have the signature of the Artist; the names of the Engraver and Printer do not appear.

WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

Old and New Students of The Beaux-Arts Star June 5/35

The Ecole des Beaux-Arts of Montreal has just opened its annual exhibition of the year's work of its present students and at the same time it has an exhibition of work done by some of its past students. Together, these two shows give a good idea not only of the work which the school has done for its pupils but also of the sort of effect that this work has produced for the people of Montreal.

Work by present students takes up rather less space than in former exhibitions; it has perhaps been picked rather more carefully and consequently shows a better quality. There are the usual drawings from the antique and paintings from the life, with good work among them, and a few quick sketches from living models which show ability. The work in modelling is much of it very successful; there are a number of good busts, particularly in the series of competition portraits of an old man with a beard. The department of engraving which has shown good work in past years continues to progress and there are some excellent prints in the small collection which is shown.

The more practical side of art training is even more conspicuous than before in this year's exhibition. The architectural school is as important as ever and there are some fine drawings of big schemes for such things as a big Casino, a church and attached buildings on a hill-top, and a Bourse de Commerce; there are also some very sound designs for more attainable things such as villages churches and branch banks. Decorative designing is quite well shown in its applications to textiles, metal work, stained glass and other materials, but most striking is a collection of posters, some of which are highly successful both in decorative qualities and in their attraction as advertisements.

The exhibition of the work of past students, which is in one of the ground-floor galleries, with the catalogue which accompanies it, give a most useful summary of what the school has done in the twelve years of its existence, during ten of which it has been under its present director, Charles Maillard. The catalogue records the successes which have been achieved by some of the past students, as painters and draughtsmen, but still more as architects and designers of decorative work. The work of many of these students is now well known in other exhibitions; in this collection there are, among the oil pictures, good portraits by Rose Dionne, Rolande Sicotte, Maurice Raymond, Frederica Beckman, Jacques Barry and Thelma Carter, and landscapes by Fleurimond Constantineau and Paul Beaulieu. Other good things are Simone Hudon's water colors and drawings, drawings by Francesco Jacurto and Armand Filion and prints by Ernst Newmann. The works of sculpture are, as usual in Montreal exhibitions, mostly portrait busts and there are some particularly good ones by Sylvia Daoust, Alice Nolin and Armand Filion. Art in its practical applications is also to be seen in this collection. There are architectural drawings and photographs, drawings for illustrations and costume designs. With these are a number of designs for furniture and interior decorations, including some for linoleum, and several pieces of furniture designed by past students. Some excellent pieces of furniture are exhibited by Jean Crevier and Maurice Germain and some admirable work in wrought iron by Gilles Beaugrand.

PAINTING ENDANGERED

Nearly Falls From Easel and Is Ordered Replaced in Frame—Expert Heard on Fire Damage

With 11 days allotted it on the roll of the Superior Court—up to the end of the June term—Mr. Justice Wilfrid Mercier yesterday resumed hearing of the case in which the New York Art Corporation is suing the American Home Fire Insurance Company for $30,000 for damage allegedly sustained by reputed old masters in a fire in the Outremont home of J. J. Cusack, art dealer.

Evidence adduced yesterday was pretty much the same as that heard at previous sittings. An art expert, summoned by the plaintiff corporation, testified that the paintings, one of which is said to be worth $100,000, were damaged by fire, water and smoke, and counsel for the defendant insurance company sought to show that no damage had been suffered at all.

Tempo of the hearing was somewhat heightened when Mrs. Cusack insisted on interpellating from her seat in the court room, until asked to refrain by the judge; the art expert, Raoul Barbin, proved rather hard of hearing, and his replies could not be heard by Senator C. P. Beaubien, K.C., for the insurance company, who kept protesting he could not hear until Mr. Justice Mercier asked him to step in front of the witness; and one painting, the "Holy Family," reputedly by Salimbeni, which had been removed from its frame and perched on an easel, almost toppled to the floor when the easel's legs buckled and several pairs of clutching hands, artistic and otherwise, made a wild grab to catch the canvas. His Lordship directed that it be replaced in its frame for the hearing today.

DAMAGE IS QUERIED.

On pointing out cracks in the canvas of the "Holy Family" which he thought had been caused by water and smoke, Mr. Barbin was asked whether it was not possible that during 300 years the painting had been subject to varying degrees of temperature and exposed many times, and thus had developed the markings? Witness said they looked as if they might have been caused by the fire.

The interpellations from the art dealer's wife were made to point out the position of the canvases on the wall of the salon when a sofa in the room caught fire; and she protested against testimony by Mr. Barbin being cut short by further questions before he had finished what he was saying. Their rights had to be protected, she reiterated spiritedly.

TEXT BOOK CRITICIZED Nova Scotia Work on Civiliza- tion called 'Guesswork'

The association brought its convention to a close last night with its annual dinner, presided over by the Very Rev. Olivier Maurault, P.S.S., Rector of the University of Montreal and newly-elected president of the association.

The Rt. Rev. J. C. Chaumont, V.G., representing His Excellency the Coadjutor Archbishop of Montreal extended his congratulations on the Canadian Catholic Historical Association's work and the success of their convention. The encouragement and stimulation of interest in historic church research was a noble endeavor, he told the delegates. He recalled the early planting of the cross in Canada, and saw in the members of the association the apostles of a new age, handing on the knowledge of the church to others, making its glorious history better known, and themselves writing a page into its vivid story.

The Rt. Rev. Alexander MacDonald, D.D., Bishop of Hebron, took as the subject of his address the text-book, placed in the hands of Nova Scotia school children, "The Story of Civilization," based on the Darwinian hypothesis. He catalogued at length the difference between instinct and reason, man and beast, and developed the spirituality of the soul, which he called the real missing link in Darwin.

The book purported to be based on science, he said, but was only crude guesswork and anything but expert knowledge. The evidence was only a few fossilized molars and skulls plus a disbelieved in scripture. Man was shown to be the end-product of the amoeba, but still after centuries there was the long line of amoeba and polyp unchanged from its original state, still reproducing by fissure and unable to arrive at any other stage. He warned his audience of the dangers of the book.

MUSEUM IS PRAISED.

Father Maurault thanked the gathering for electing him president general of the association, and regretted the absence of the Hon. F. R. Latchford, retiring president, who was unable to attend through illness. He hoped that the next annual meeting of the convention might be held in Quebec, which would offer innumerable points of interest to the delegates. He recommended to their interest the new Catholic museum erected opposite St. Joseph's Oratory; while it was not a Chateau de Ramezay nor the Sulpician archives, it was a popular museum of the Madame Tussaud sort and offered many interesting features touching on the history of the Catholic Church.

At the head table were the Very Rev. Thomas J. McMahon, S.J., rector of Loyola College; Dr. J. F. Kenney, the Rev. Edward Kelly, the Rt. Rev. Alexander MacDonald, D.D., the Rev. G. J. McShane, P.S.S., D.D., Ph.D., the Rt. Rev. D. R. MacDonald, D.D.

ART DEALER GIVEN SECRECY PRIVILEGE

Gazette June 6/35

Judge Allows Him to With- hold Names of His Clients

The principle of "professional secrecy" was sanctioned as regards art dealers by Mr. Justice Wilfrid Mercier in the Superior Court yesterday.

During hearing of the case in which the New York Art Corporation is suing the American Home Fire Insurance Company for $30,000 damage allegedly suffered by six paintings, Christy Catsaros, co-director of the art corporation, refused to divulge all the names of persons from whom he had purchased the canvases in Greece.

Rendering testimony as to when the paintings, reputedly old masters, were brought to this side, and from whom they were purchased and for how much, Catsaros revealed the names of some of his vendors, and the price he paid in drachmas, but balked at divulging other names. And Mr. Justice Mercier maintained his refusal.

The law provides immunity to doctors and lawyers for refusal to testify on the witness stand, and jurisprudence has accorded the same right to priests. Newspapermen are often given the right to refuse to testify, though this is in the discretion of the judge. In New York recently a reporter went to jail for contempt of court rather than testify as to his source of information.

Another director of the plaintiff art corporation, Athanasios Grivakis, testified that after the paintings had arrived in America they were sent to Philadelphia to Professor Farina for restoration. Over $3,000 was spent on the paintings in this work. They were then deposited for safe keeping in the Lincoln Safety Deposit Company in New York.

He said that splashes and other markings on a work entitled the "Holy Family," reputedly by Salimbeni and valued by J. J. Cusack, art dealer in whose home the paintings were when the fire occurred, at $100,000, had appeared on the canvas only after the fire, and were not visible before.

Further hearing is continuing today.

Sickert Resigns From Academy In Fuss About Epstein's Statues

Gazette June 8th, 1935

London.—Renouncing membership in the Royal Academy seems to be growing a habit. Causes for it differ—the rejection of a painting by the jury of selection or the failure of the ancient and honorable institution, which voted the member his letters with the prestige they bring to the recipient's standing, to take up cudgels in matters that, in the academy's opinion, should be participated in only after careful consideration.

Now Jacob Epstein, recognized in some spheres as an outstanding sculptor, but who has also produced works that have aroused antagonism among lovers of the beautiful, has a grievance and Richard Sickert, R.A., the painter, has resigned from the Academy.

The trouble has arisen over the 18 statues executed by Epstein for the British Medical Association headquarters, now the premises of the Southern Rhodesian Government, who consider the statues "unsuitable," and intend to remove them from Agar House, Strand.

Sir William Llewellyn, president of the Academy, and the Council, have declined to sign an appeal for their preservation.

Sickert, who is 74 years old, has taken his action as a protest against the "inaction" of the Royal Academy.

Sir William Llewellyn, president of the Royal Academy, according to the Morning Post, stated that he had written to Mr. Sickert asking him to withdraw his resignation, explaining that he had "clearly acted under a misunderstanding."

Sir William stated that he declined to sign the appeal for the preservation of the statues because he did not wish to appear to commit his colleagues as a body without consulting them.

Mr. Sickert, who was elected an

R.A. in March last year, giving his view, said: "I am not reconsidering my decision. There is nothing to reconsider. I do not see how there can be any misunderstanding. I am no longer a member of the Academy. There is no ill-feeling in the matter."

"The Academy," he stated, "ought to have summoned an emergency meeting and sent a request asking to be allowed to make a representation to the King on the subject. But they did not do so."

"It is not the president's fault. I am very fond of him and all my colleagues, who have been most extraordinarily kind to me, but sloppy sentimentality does not enter into it."

Epstein, commenting on Sickert's action, said: "I have not heard personally from Mr. Sickert. He has taken this step entirely on his own, and I may say I am gratified at his championship."

Further, Epstein doesn't want to be elected a member of the R.A. Speaking on this point the sculptor, whose name was put up for the academy ten years ago, said:

"I never gave it a thought until the other day when the Council declared that it was no business of theirs whether the statues were pulled down or not."

"When I realized that their intentions are not to foster art or artists I felt that I should dissociate myself from them entirely."

Since Mr. Epstein's outburst, the secretary of the Royal Academy of Arts has issued this statement: "Mr. Epstein was nominated with his consent as a candidate for associateship of the Academy in 1925. As he was not re-nominated as required by the rules after seven years, his candidature lapsed in 1932, and his name has not been on the list for elections since that date."

RARE ART EXHIBITION MAY BE SEEN IN STORE

Henry Birks & Sons Open Colonnade

In appearance more like a museum of modern and ancient art than like part of a store, the Colonnade was opened yesterday as an addition to the ground floor display space of Henry M. Birks & Sons', St. Catherine street shop.

Rare porcelains and pottery from all parts of the world, statuary in the alabaster of Italy and in the tinted bronze and ivory of the modern German, F. Preiss, the creamy new Moorcroft ware of England, and the new aluminum alloys in handwrought shapes are all shown there.

The Chinese room in the Colonnade is devoted entirely to objects of art from the former Celestial Empire and includes much carved jade and quartz as well as both original pieces and reproductions of the classical porcelain vases of China.

Another room is fitted up for the display of 500 sample dinner ware plates sent by makers of porcelain from all over the world, some of which, with gold ornamentation and hand-painted scenes are worth over $700 a dozen.

Another room, suitably furnished in heavy Georgian style, as a dining room, is intended for the display of old and valuable silver.

Modern French glass, museum pieces of Royal Crown Derby ware and valuable Dresden china figures make up the greater part of the rest of the exhibit.

RACEY CARTOONS GO TO UNIVERSITY

Star June 8/35
Original Drawings to Hang on Walls of McGill
Library

Several of the original drawings by Arthur G. Racey, cartoonist of The Montreal Star, which have been reproduced in many parts of the world, are to find a permanent home on the walls of McGill University Library. Gerhard R. Lomer, M.A., Ph.D., McGill librarian, asked Mr. Racey for the donation of a number of his original drawings, assuring him that they would be in good company, for on the library walls are an original drawing by Du Maurier, two original sketches by Ruskin, and others by artists of Punch.

The selection made by Mr. Racey covers a wide field dealing with science, literature, art and with topical subjects and matters of empire interest. Of particular interest to McGill are three cartoons dealing with the University—one recording the centennial celebrations of the university, in which a female figure holding a large bowl of "Centennial Punch," and surrounded by a table laden with various kinds of food, each bearing the name of some function taking place at that time, is saying "Alma Mater is ready for the home-coming of her boys and girls." Another is a cartoon of convocation, with "Knowledge" handing to a student his parchment with the admonition "And now, my son, your real education commences." The Racey drawing published on the death of Sir Arthur Currie, entitled "A Nation Mourning," in which two allegorical figures typify the world-wide regret at the passing of the soldier-principal, has also been included in the collection.

MAN'S BEST FRIEND

The original of a cartoon that has been reproduced and hung in many libraries on both sides of the Atlantic, entitled "Man's Best Friend," is among the drawings donated. It pictures a figure reclining on a book floating through the air, with the caption "A Magic carpet within reach of all, that will transport one to any realm as fancy wills."

Other drawings that the McGill library will house, will be one typifying Speed, another showing the modern St. George of Science facing the great dragon of Cancer, and a third cartooning the slaughter of Canada's wild bird life with automatic guns, in which a Canada Goose and a wild duck find themselves in the Ornithological Museum as company for the extinct Dodo. Then there is one created following the publication of "recent osteological discoveries of fragments of the earliest genuine remains of human sapiens" in which the cartoonist shows the burying of turkey bones by a dog, their discovery years later by diggers, and the fearsome animal built up from a single drumstick by a member of the pre-historical research society. This will no doubt cause many a chuckle among the research workers of the university.

"The shrinking world" tells in picture the difference that the radio has made to the home. It shows a winged figure carrying a globe to the householder who remarks "I used to think it was such a large and mysterious world."

The imposing figure of the British lion guarding a scintillating crown, was Mr. Racey's conception of the Empire's observance of the King's Silver Jubilee, and his widely-reproduced drawing of the British lion at the base of a marble tablet on which is being inscribed "August, 1932. The Imperial Economic Conference is brought to a successful issue at Ottawa, Can. . . ." recording the completion of the Ottawa agreements are also included in the collection.

AT AUTHORS CONVENTION

All these original drawings were, with some others, on exhibition at the annual meeting of the Canadian Authors Association at the Mount Royal Hotel, before being sent to McGill University, and aroused considerable interest.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Racey's grandfather, Dr. John Racey, M.D., was one of the first surgeons to lecture at the Medical School of McGill University. It is recorded in the minutes of the first meeting of the Governors of McGill that Dr. John Racey was appointed lecturer in anatomy, physiology and surgery, and behind this appointment is an interesting story. A bequest had been made to McGill on condition that lectures on surgery and anatomy be given before a specified time. Dr. William Caldwell, Dr. Racey and another doctor whose name is not recorded, started these lectures and saved the bequest which was the foundation of the Medical School. In 1833 Dr. Racey was appointed to the chair of obstetrics. The original manuscript of his first lectures on surgery are at present in the possession of Arthur G. Racey, and will, in due time, find their way into the keeping of McGill University.

Several more Racey cartoons of general interest will be given to McGill University later on, to complete a series covering many phases of public interest over a series of years.

Pictures by Albert Meindl Of Vienna

The collection of work by the Austrian painter, Albert Meindl, which is being shown at the Continental Galleries on St. Catherine street, is the second which has been brought here. Like the former exhibition, this one consists mainly of mountain landscapes, but there are in this one three figure pictures which are striking and interesting even if it is not easy to find beauty in them. They are story-telling pictures, in which the stories or morals seem to be more important than anything else, though it is balanced by boldness of design and painting. Two other pictures which are not landscapes are one of fishing boats on the Lake of Como, full of gay color in the water and the sails of the boats, and one, with splendid greens and blues, of breakers near Capri.

The mountain pictures are mostly winter scenes or scenes above the snow line, and in many of them there are the vivid effects of light and shade which are loved by many eastern European painters. Some of the smaller sketches and pictures are more broadly painted and might pass for Canadian landscapes. A big picture of an ice-jam on the Danube is one of the best things in the exhibition and might quite well be taken for a scene on the St. Lawrence. A few pictures of the mountains add to the cheerfulness of the exhibition. There are also some quite small and attractive landscapes which are more miniature pictures than sketches.

Drawings and Decorations By Students

The Montreal School of Interior Decoration is showing a small collection of work done by its students at 1411 Crescent St. This consists chiefly of designs for fairly simple rooms, and the drawings include studies of tonal values, color schemes and drawings of details. The students whose work is shown are in the earlier stages of their training so that, while there are no very elaborate schemes, the designs keep for the most part near to traditional styles, without striving for striking originality; at the same time there are modern touches and the designs are suited to modern conditions. They show some good planning and good understanding of scale and color of materials.

The annual exhibition of work by students of the School of Arts and Trades, at the Monument National, is now open. The work of the drawing classes which, as usual, occupies most of the space, is just as good as ever and many of the exhibits have clean drawing and show a good sense of form. The drawings shown come from all the four districts in which the classes are held and from both day and night classes. In the highest class for free-hand drawing the first prize is divided between E. F. Smith and Rene Leger, the second prize is won by Selma Steine and the third by Roger Marc-Aurele. Honorable mention has been well earned by many other students. In architectural drawing the prizes for the three years are won by Raymond Valentine, Roland Jutras and E. F. Smith. Some good drawings of simple and familiar objects have been done by the class for school teachers. Some of the work done by the modelling class is remarkably good, as it has been in former years. The prizes in the highest class are won by Mlle M. J. Turcotte, first, and Harry Mendell, second, with honorable mention to other students.

LONG ART HEARING NOW NEARING END

A lengthy hearing in the Superior Court in the case in which the New York Art Corporation is suing the American Home Fire Assurance Company for $30,000 is nearing completion, it was indicated in the court today. If the present rate of progress is maintained, the defence case will probably close today and a short rebuttal will follow tomorrow, it is stated. Mr. Justice Mercier, presiding judge, will then proceed to hear argument.

On the stand this morning Richard Schofield, manager of the defendant company, recounted the circumstances under which the insurance policy was issued by his company on the group of paintings, to which damage of $30,000 is claimed by the plaintiff company to have been caused by fire.

The Arts Club Has Summer Exhibition

This year's summer exhibition at the Arts Club, Victoria street, is not quite like any exhibition that the club has held for several years. Former summer exhibitions have consisted largely of small pictures and sketches by members of the club, this time the committee has asked for pictures of more importance and has invited several painters who are not members of the club to exhibit. The result is a collection in which all the pictures have a distinct interest of their own and an arrangement which allows the pictures to be seen to more advantage than usual.

Landscapes, of course, predominate, but there are three portraits which stand out; Mrs. Newton's picture of a young girl, rather oddly placed on its canvas, and Edwin Holgate's study of a Canadian man have breadth and spirit which give them more life than Alphonse Jongers' realistic study of a lady, and the three pictures make an interesting contrast of ideas.

The many pictures of country and town have variety enough among them to fit any taste. Some of the more conspicuous of them are a luscious green river shore by Paul Earle, Charles Simpson's group of boats lying in broken ice, a very good sketch of a stream and a boat by A. Sherriff Scott, Thurston Topham's study in blue and white of rapids by moonlight, and A. Cloutier's gay valley among hills. A pattern of yellows on grays in an autumn study by Harold Beament, a good effect of lighting in F. Lemieux's picture of a shack among trees, the truly European atmosphere in Eric Riordon's picture of an Alpine valley and a striking stormy sky in D. McGill's river scene, are other matters of interest. A picture of horsed sleighs by F. S. Coburn, a village scene by Leslie Smith, a still life by T. R. Macdonald and a flower picture by Mabel May are among the other things in a good collection.

Water colors are few; a clever study of snow-laden trees by H. Simpkins is not quite of his best work; J. Beckwith's drawing of a boat at a wharf has breadth and vigor, but there is more care for form in W. S. Maxwell's peaceful drawing of a similar subject.

A group of the illustrations which Aubrey Beardsley made for Oscar Wilde's "Salome" is also being shown at the club.

G. S. LEMASNIE DIES HERE IN 60TH YEAR

Gazette June 14/35

Funeral of Distinguished Artist and Designer to Be Held This Morning

Funeral services for Gamble Sheridan Lemasnle, distinguished artist and designer who died Wednesday in his 60th year, will take place privately at eleven o'clock this morning with the Ven. Archdeacon Gower-Rees officiating.

Mr. Lemasnle came of distinguished British stock, his mother belonging to the family of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the English dramatist. Born in Surrey, England, he was educated in the Merchant Adventurers' School of Bristol, England, and in the art schools of that city and of South Kensington. His talents developing rapidly, he was appointed master of design in the Bristol School of Art at an early age, later serving in a similar capacity at the Liverpool School of Art.

In 1900, at the height of his reputation, he came to Canada at the invitation of the well-known firm of Castle and Sons, in charge of their federal and municipal contracts for interior decoration. Of late years he practised privately, his services being contracted for by the leading architectural firms of Canada.

A man of unusually wide culture in the fields of art and literature, his demise is regarded as a great loss to the art world of the Dominion.

Women's Work

CANADA OUTGROWING PIONEER AGE IN ART

Cultural Progress Viewed By National Council

TORONTO, June 12 — (C.P.) — "The era of pioneer work has practically passed for Canada," said the report of Miss Elizabeth S. Nutt, Halifax, convener of the arts and letters committee, to the National Council of Women today. "Canada is also so far advanced in her industrial and manufacturing life experience that the cultural era has naturally risen well above the horizon."

The first art exhibit in British North America was held more than 100 years ago in Halifax. Art exhibits are now plentiful throughout Canada, the report said. His Excellency the Governor-General in founding the drama festival has given fresh impetus to the drama.

Music also had found a secure place among Canadians, and a distinctive national note "is now found in both the prose and verse of Canadian writers."

"Growth in every department and an increasing interest in fine arts and letters is the chief good which has come out of the depression," said the report of the Vancouver convener. For Manitoba "reports show the development of practical trends." Sixteen nationalities are represented at the Winnipeg Handicraft Guild. The largest musical festival in the Empire was held in April, with 1350 entries.

An arts and crafts exhibition and handicrafts hobby show were New Westminster's features of the year. Moose Jaw held an exhibition of Indian art. Saskatoon Local Council "are to be congratulated on their activity in cultural lines; valuable Indian research has been continued." Home grown flax is being woven into home made linens.

Interest is increasing in the treasures of the Ontario Museum, Miss Nutt's report said. Toronto was particularly active in art, literature, drama and music. Kingston "reports an ever increasing art consciousness."

The Maritime provinces have formed an association for educating the public by regular exhibitions and lectures. A summer school in painting is an extension of the N. S. College of Art. West Algoma Council reports "the little theatre movement has been most active."

IN CIVIC LIFE

Need of a dignified and colorful ceremony each year for the young men and women coming of age, to make them "realize their duty and responsibility to their community and country" was recommended today in a report on citizenship by Mrs. A. J. Holman, convener, Niagara Falls. From all parts of Canada, Mrs. Holman reported, came word of activity in civic and educational life.

Edmonton, with a woman elected to the school board, had a working committee of seven keeping in touch with civic affairs. Twelve members form the citizenship committee in Moose Jaw and a study group was formed. Women are on the school board and city council. In New Westminster an unemployment office organized by the citizenship committee found positions for 170 persons.

Women have been elected to a number of civic bodies in Regina, while in Saskatoon plans are being made for a committee to arrange public ceremonies for reception of naturalization papers. In Victoria and Vancouver, the latter with a study group forming, women are serving on municipal bodies.

Niagara Falls and Hamilton reported increasing number of women in civic positions, while for the first time a woman was elected to the Ottawa Collegiate board. At the Halifax meetings discussion was heard on a proposed civic ceremony for those reaching their majority. In Yarmouth, N.S., the committee looked after lighting of parks, and attention was drawn by this body to untidy premises. In Truro, N.S., where an adult study class was formed, an annual honor prize was established for the county academy girl student who gave promise of the best future life of citizenship.

Retirement of Tom Graydon, for nearly 50 years an employee of McGill University and at one time one of the most noted trainers of athletic teams on this continent, is the subject of an article by Dr. Fred J. Tees, in the Summer number of The McGill News, quarterly publication of the Graduates' Society of McGill University, published today. In the article "Retirement of Tom Graydon," Dr. Tees writes as follows:

The retirement of a devoted employee of McGill after nearly fifty years of faithful service merits more than a passing reference. By the time this issue is in the press, "Tom" Graydon will have is an account from an old Annual of one such day:

"The scene on the grand-stand in the afternoon was especially brilliant. The ladies and students were decked in plenty with McGill ribbon and flowers emblematic of Old McGill. During the progress of the games in the afternoon Lord Strathcona, our greatly respected Chancellor, accompanied by Principal Peterson, made his appearance on the grounds. His arrival was the signal for prolonged and hearty cheering from the entire stand, waving of handkerchiefs, hats and abundance of ribbon. Lord Strathcona watched the games with great interest, congratulating successful competitors, while the committee had the distinction of being introduced to him individually."

The entire day was devoted to the games, with heats and certain field events in the morning, including throwing the cricket ball and kicking the football. The finals were reserved for the afternoon. Bicycle races added to the excitement with their thrills and spills.

In 1899, the first intercollegiate Track Meet was held resulting in a McGill victory. This was followed by a succession of wins, McGill establishing a predominance which is still maintained. The names of Percival Molson, after whom the new Stadium was named, of John Morrow, and of Jim Gaskill will be recalled in connection with these early triumphs. In the development of these athletes "Tom" had an active part.

In 1901 came the visit of the Oxford-Cambridge Track Team prior to their meet with Yale and Harvard. They carried on their training on the McGill Campus under Tom's watchful supervision.

A frequent visitor to the groundsman in those days was Sir William Macdonald, who in the course of his walks through the college grounds would often stop for a chat to get first hand news from Tom as to the progress of the university.

Shortly before the war, Graydon was transferred to the workshops department as foreman, continuing to give oversight to the condition of the grounds in general. Later he became assistant superintendent necessitating a general supervision of the college properties, including the care of the famous old trees, on the avenue and elsewhere, for which he had a special fondness.

These changes in his duties naturally drew him from the athletic life of the college, although at the request of the track team he was permitted to continue his coaching for a period. He thus became less intimately connected with the student life at the university, so that later generations of undergraduates have been less familiar with his part in the development of sports at McGill.

He continued, however, to find opportunities for frequent visits to the Stadium, to size up the new recruits for track and football teams, and would often be seen surrounded by a group of old grads recalling old times, and the doughty deeds of other days.

This spring his health failed him, forcing his retirement. Many of us wish that he could be induced to give a series of reminiscences out of his great store. It is reported that Dr. Lamb has persuaded him to this.

Meanwhile hordes of old grads will inevitably picture "Tom" when they think back to days on the old campus, and will join in hoping that he may be long spared to greet them when they revisit "our dear old Mother McGill."

severed his active connection with the university. Born in Dublin in 1866, he grew up to be a noted athlete. As a member of the Havigton Harriers, an amateur club in his home city, he competed in various Irish meets, travelling widely. His favorite events were the 100, 220, 440 and broad jump, in all of which he was outstanding.

Arriving in Montreal in the fall of 1887, he secured employment almost immediately in the old Medical Building as a member of the janitor's staff under the celebrated Cook. Two years later he transferred to the Chemistry Laboratory under Dr. "Bobby" Rutan.

In 1891, when the new grounds and athletics committee was appointed by Corporation he became groundsman, working under Prof. C. H. McLeod, affectionately known as "Bunt," the energetic secretary of the committee. This appointment gave him opportunity to devote his talents to the aid of the young athletes of the college and for years he trained the members of the track, rugby and hockey teams, a task greatly to his liking. His chief interest and success, however, centred in the track team.

A familiar figure in his groundsman's uniform, "Tom" was known to the entire student body. The watchful guardian of college property against the pranks of roaming schoolboys, he was regarded by them with a wholesome terror. Sports Day at the University, dating back to 1873, was a picturesque function in these days. Many will recall the elaborate engraved cards of invitation which were issued to the favored, and which money could not buy. Here

Authorities Puzzled at Decline of Attendance at London Museums

London.—Are Londoners "going scientific"? Museum attendance suggests it, for figures indicate that visitors to view the collections of paintings are falling off.

This change in taste was revealed at the annual meeting of the National Art-Collections Fund, when, according to The Times, Sir Robert Witt, in a review of outstanding events in the period covered by the report, referred to what he called a disquieting decline in the number of visitors to the London museums. The attendance at the National Gallery, he said, had fallen from 669,000 in 1928 to 531,000 in 1934 or over 20 per cent. That at the Tate Gallery in the same period had fallen from 349,000 to 262,000, and that at the Wallace Collection from 131,000 to 75,000. The figures at the British Museum had remained approximately stationary, while those at the Victoria and Albert Museum had declined from 937,000 to 810,000. On the other hand, the attendances at the Science Museum had increased from 900,000 to 1,142,000. In view of the efforts that had been made of late years to add to the accessibility, the interest, and the popularity of the national museums, the figures were disappointing but should only make those in authority redouble their efforts to ensure that the great capital value of the national art treasures should be so managed as to return to the public, which provided it, a greater and more widely spread dividend.

When questions on the report were invited a member of the society suggested that the reason why attendances at the British Museum had declined was that the museum was the dullist in Europe. There was nothing to encourage visitors to look at a single object. He also complained of the absence of comfortable seats in the museum, and of the "sordid" refreshment room.

The Chairman said he could not agree with some of these comments, but he would see that they were forwarded to the proper quarters.

Lord Halifax, who seconded adoption of the report, said that as President of the Board of Education, he had an indirect interest in all museums because of the increasing use that was made of them for educational purposes, and therefore he was impressed by the value of the work done by the Fund for them. More directly his Department was concerned with the Victoria and Albert Museum in the direct line of succession to the old Science and Art Department, and the list of benefactions by the Fund to that museum was long. The most important of recent gifts included the early seventeenth-century bed valence woven at the famous Sheldon factory, and the outstanding acquisition of the year before the Great Bed of Ware, towards the purchase of which the Fund gave £2,000. He sincerely hoped that the public would follow the example of the Fund and come generously to the assistance of the museums in securing unrivalled treasures for the nation.

Lord Halifax also thanked Mr. Eumorfopoulos for the offer he had made to the Government of the finest objects in his collection of Chinese works of art at a price which was but a fraction of what they cost him or of their value. The 400 objects selected from the collection would be divided between the British Museum and the Victoria and Albert Museum, and through the latter would be lent to provincial museums until some day, as every one hoped, they came together again in a central museum devoted to the art of the East.

Sir Robert Witt, who presided, announced that the Fund had purchased at the Heseltine sale a drawing by Corot, "Flora. Rue de l'Hotel de Ville 110," the right and proper place for which they thought should be the British Museum. The drawing, for which £400 was paid, was on view at the meeting.

SOME DEPARTURES MADE

Anecdotal Pictures and Landscapes of Broader Technique on View at Continental Galleries

Albert Meindl, the Viennese painter whose work was introduced to Montrealers by the Continental Galleries of Fine Art, 1310 St. Catherine street west, last year, is again holding a "one man" show there with a collection of pictures that are varied and interesting.

While the majority of the examples shown deal with Alpine uplands under snow at varying hours, done with facility and finish, there are other paintings that reveal this artist as a man of imagination who is equally accomplished in a technique that is robust and broad. These qualities are evident in three anecdotal pictures which are marked by a melancholy little suspected in viewing his snowscapes which display his obvious love for the beautiful in nature. "Her Calvary" shows a bent old woman on whose back lies a heavy cross, above which are recumbent figures—three dear ones that death has taken from her. It is a rather morbid theme. In "Longing for the Spring that is forever gone," a woman, looking far from being the picture of health, sits patiently near a window, through the pane of which can be seen a sparrow on a snow-laden bough. Whether she is grieving for the Spring of her youth, which has certainly passed, or is obsessed with the idea that she won't live to see the Spring to come—and her color certainly seems to suggest the chance is remote—is not very clear. It is all very depressing. In "Vision" there is nothing obscure—a man at a table ignores the fact that the clock in the steeple has probably struck more than one, and he won't go home while the lure of cards and a pot of beer hold him in thrall. But between gulps he has a conscience and he can still see—not pink elephants, but four pink chubby baby arms outstretched in appeal.

All these works are painted with vigor and personify types that are handled with understanding, but they can't be called gay.

TECHNIQUE IS BROADER

As a foil to the painter's "blues" there is, done with a direct, juicy touch, "Village in Salzburg Mountains"—all sunlight and fresh air, with its rough, rutted road, leading to distant green hills, edged by buildings in sunlight and shadow. Trees are in fresh leaf and the water in the ditch and ruts catches the blue of the sky. Virile, too, in the strength of its brushwork is "Ice Jam on the Danube"—a scene on the outskirts of Vienna with a vast expanse of hummocked ice stretching to the opposite shore which is lined with buildings and smoking stacks. In the distance is a bridge and hills, while in the foreground is a strip of open blue water that swirls past a rotting wooden barrier. It is a painting that has force and sound color. "Majestic Mountains," done in like direct manner, is well designed and boldly painted—a group of rocky peaks in sunlight and shadow above a snow-covered meadow with evergreens, and "Mountain Village under Snow" is a spontaneous impression of an old church with quaint spire, houses and wood-piles, laden with snow on a day that is becoming overcast.

As departures in subject may be mentioned the marine, "Breakers near Capri," and "Fishing Boats at Daybreak, Lake Como."

In the scenes of wide vistas of snow-laden country with ranges of distant peaks, Meindl's habitual cleverness is shown in the effective balance of lights and shadows and the effective placing of houses and huts. "Still Waters" has noble mountains and wooded shores that are reflected in the open water, and "Solitude," with its houses and stretch of country to noble mountains is impressive. Another imposing landscape is "Glorious Nature"—miles of snowy country, distant mountains and tracks in the foreground. Snowy peaks are flushed a lovely rose in "Enchanted World," and vapor swirls in the hollows of snowy mountains in "Above the Clouds."

In this group which reveals the painter on familiar ground there are many works that will attract the picture-lover—"The Brook," "In Snow Land," "White Desert," "Man and Giant," "Falling Shadows," and "My Homeland," to mention a few.

Albert Meindl, who has an established reputation in Europe, was born in Vienna, June 20, 1891.

This exhibition remains open until June 22.

ART CASE HEARING EVIDENCE IS ENDED

Gazette June 14/35
Dollar Bill Features Prominently in Action Seeking $30,000 for Fire Damages

A one-dollar bill which was assertedly given for release of all claim against the insurance company featured yesterday's Superior Court hearing of the case in which the New York Art Corporation is seeking $30,000 from the American Home Fire Insurance Company for damage to paintings in a fire.

The dollar note, marked by initials, was accepted and the release admittedly signed by J. J. Cusack, art dealer who had the paintings insured, but, the court was told, he had been informed that the same group of people associated with the art corporation was involved in a claim for damage to paintings in an explosion in Philadelphia against the same insurance company, and the claim arising from the Montreal fire would not stand.

Charges of fraud and conspiracy filled the air at the hearing, and R. E. Schofield, local manager of the American Home Fire Insurance Company, averred that he had been asked $10,000 for testimony to be used in the Philadelphia case.

With this inartistic turn to the art case which has been before Mr. Justice Mercier for some time past, the taking of evidence was concluded and this morning will commence formal argument by lawyers engaged in the case. Henry Weinfield, K.C., acting for the art corporation, will start his argument first, to be followed by Senator C. P. Beaubien, K.C., and Emile Gadbois, K.C., for the insurance company. The argument is expected to take about two days.

Painted Crucifixion Scene In Large Cave

Glasgow.—Mr. Archibald Mackinnon, who painted the representation of the Crucifixion on the wall of a cave on Davaar Island, Argyllshire, died recently at Nantwich on his 85th birthday. Last summer, Mr. Mackinnon, who had lived on Nantwich for more than half a century, revisited Campbelltown, his native town, to restore the painting, after having seen a photograph which showed him that his work was fading.

The existence of the painting, according to the Glasgow Herald, was first revealed publicly in 1877, when two men from Campbelltown came on it in the innermost wall of a large cave while they were exploring Davaar Island. They spread the news, and for days groups of people crossed the strip of sand which joins the island to the mainland at low water to see it. Its fame attracted visitors from all parts of the world.

For years the origin of the painting remained unknown, until Mr. Mackinnon disclosed that the work was his. He explained that the inspiration came to him in his sleep. Rising at three in the morning, he walked the three miles to the cave and there began the picture, on which he worked for weeks in the early morning until it was completed.

MUSEUM LECTURE-TOURS

School-Children to Be Shown
McGill Displays

What promises to be a source of utmost value in visual training and knowledge for Montreal school-children begins next week at the McCord Museum with the opening of a new series of lectures and tests in Canadian history, accompanied by special exhibits. The lectures are adapted to the course covered by any particular school class. The tests are optional.

During the couple of years these organized lecture-tours of the museum have been in operation, approximately 3,000 Montreal school-children have had the opportunity of fortifying their lessons in the school-room with the visual instruction obtained at the museum, a practice which, it is agreed, assists the teacher in her work and also provides much more vivid impressions on the child's mind than oral teaching can.

The series now arranged by the extension committee of McGill University extends to June of next year, and is divided into six parts covering the history of Canada from the incursions of the Vikings to 1867. The first in the series deals with the early explorers of the coasts of Canada, 1492 to 1611. Models of ships, prints of early charts, historical records and pictures, as well as a collection of implements found on the site of an Indian village of among the exhibits

DEFENCE CLAIMS FRAUD

Declares False Representations
Were Used to Secure Policy on Paintings in Issue

Charges that their witnesses were tampered with and bought by the other side were made by counsel for the New York Art Corporation in the Superior Court yesterday as final argument was heard by Mr. Justice Mercier in the case in which the American Home Fire Insurance Company is sued for damage allegedly caused a group of six paintings.

Unfolding a "love feast" involving allegations of fraud, conspiracy, seizure and counter-suit, Henry Weinfield, K.C., counsel for the art corporation, charged that because the insurance company is rich and was able to pay more, witnesses he had relied upon to testify as to the damage suffered by the reputed old masters in the Outremont home of J.J. Cusack had gone back on their written expert opinion of the paintings given before the insurance policy was issued.

Prior to the issue of the policy, G. Grandparrain of the Ecole des Beaux Arts in Montreal and Prof. Offner of New York University had each written a detailed expert report on the group of paintings, establishing their authenticity and value, said Mr. Weinfield. But when they were placed in the witness box to testify, Offner belittled their value and doubted their authenticity, and Grandparrain asserted he was not an expert.

APPEAL TO COURT.

"What," Mr. Weinfield demanded, "happened in the interval? I ask Your Lordship to use your imagination. What made them change their minds?"

The policy issued by the company on the paintings was through the instrumentality of its agent, one Bougie, and was a value policy, said the lawyer. Appraisal of the paintings was agreed upon and a value set. They were in possession of Cusack, the art dealer, under a form of conditional sale; the policy was issued in his name but paid for by the art corporation.

After the fire, the local manager of the insurance company, R. E. Schofield, suggested arbitration. Mr. Weinfield continued. In the meantime a seizure of the paintings had been made by Cusack's creditors. The art corporation paid the debts and the seizure was lifted. He was asked to give up the canvases but refused, so the corporation threatened Cusack with a seizure in revindication.

"Then," said counsel, "the love feast starts." Cusack tried to get the insurance company to settle, said Mr. Weinfield. But Schofield told him that the claim was fraudulent because owners of the art corporation were involved in another claim arising out of explosion in Philadelphia against the same company. Cusack then received one dollar from Schofield and signed a release. He also started an action to have his transfer of claim to the art corporation set aside on the ground of intimidation. And he testified that he was offered $10,000 by Schofield for testimony in the Philadelphia case. Throughout the proceedings, said Mr. Weinfield, Schofield was in bad faith, and in all the transactions between Cusack and the insurance company the New York Art Corporation, merely owners of the paintings, were left standing to one side.

CONFLICT OF EVIDENCE

Emphasizing that the policy issued by the company was valid and binding, Mr. Weinfield then dealt with alleged damage to the paintings. He asserted that some of the experts had testified that smoke, fire, heat and water would damage the paintings, though he admitted that those called by the company testified differently—"the experts swear black and white." The $30,000 figure sought as damages was Cusack's, counsel said; he said that it was not claimed they were entitled to that sum, but asked the court to estimate an amount to compensate for the damage.

Denial that Bougie acted as agent for the insurance company was made by Emilien Gadbois, K.C., who with Senator C. P. Beaubien, K.C., represented the defendant company. He acted rather as Cusack's agent, he averred, and pointed out that Cusack had referred to him as such.

False representations were made to the company to have the policy issued, Mr. Gadbois continued. An exaggerated value had been set upon the paintings, and this falsehood was according to law sufficient to invalidate the policy. And there was further fraud in estimation of the extent of damage suffered by the canvases, he said.

Senator Beaubien reiterated there was no trace of damage by the fire and pointed out that after 300 years, the age of the paintings, they would of necessity be affected. Restoration they had undergone some nine years ago had deteriorated, and he recalled that experts had testified that "absolutely no damage" had been suffered, such testimony having been given even by the plaintiff's own experts.

The court was asked to consider the value set upon the paintings, up to $200,000 according to Cusack, with that set upon them by Prof. Offner, who was sought by the Art Corporation as expert witness, of $5,000.

Mr. Justice Mercier reserved judgment, asking that authorities be filed. The paintings involved, and their reputed artists, are "Holy Family," by Salimbeni; "Gentleman," by Maratta; "Madame Mallbran," by Baron Gerard; "Ecce Homo," by Ferrarri; Primitive; and "Saint Cecilia," by Della Porta.

YOUNG ARTIST HAS WORKS ON DISPLAY

McLennan Travelling Scholar Shows First Fruits of Year in Europe

First fruits of Harry Mayerovitch's wanderings about Europe as McLennan Travelling Scholar of the McGill School of Architecture are now on view in the print room of the Art Association and may be seen up to and including next Sunday. The young artist is presented in two aspects: first, as the architect, proficient, painstaking, matter-of-fact, who measures and makes careful drawings and plans of a church or an ornate flagstaff in Sweden, or a detail of Michel Angelo; and second, the happy traveller with imagination, a sense of humor, a left pen and quick brush, who jots down his impressions.

The northern sketches, such as the Royal Palace and the Town Hall in Stockholm, are in cold tints, and a little formal (though not labored), as if the painter felt repressed in those latitudes. But when he goes to the south, he breaks away from the restraints both of environment and architectural training. He uses the pen with a hasty scribble and spots his colors in, not exuberantly, but spontaneously. The result, especially in such drawings as the square in Rome, the Lyzantine church in Athens, the church in Fiesole, the old city gate in Florence, the market place in Athens, the Campanile in Capri, the Istanbul cafe, with its human group under the tree, is fresh and almost haphazard, yet quite definite. Old buildings, gates and fountains take on personalities that have more than a touch of the droll.

CONVENTIONALISM IN PAINTING

Sir.—The exhibition recently opened at the School of Fine Arts, St. Urbain street, by the Hon. Athanase David is well worth a visit and reflects credit on the efforts of the Provincial Secretary, the Director-General of Fine Arts and the Director of the School. To those who presented prizes, particularly the Consul for France, and to all pupils, former and present, praise must also be given for much-needed impetus and collaboration.

However, one must draw attention to certain malign influences. The ideas of certain misguided persons that are particularly noticeable elsewhere appear to find support here. The "conventionalists" who have been the bane of American and Canadian elementary school art classes seem to have acquired of late unchallenged dominance even in university circles.

It would take too long here to dissent upon the deficiencies of their teaching and the utter absurdity of their disastrous inartistic theories. One need only witness their utter inability to paint nudes. There is an anatomic chart on exhibition at the school of Fine Arts this week that is witness to the futility of attempting to "conventionalise" the human body. In sculptures we must observe certain ideals of measurement, but this is an entirely different matter from painting. Design is important in sculpture, in architecture and also in painting, but its treatment is most unhappy, as the results show, when there is an absence of reality.

THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

Records of The Cartier Celebration

Georges Leroux, a former holder of the Prix de Rome and a painter and illustrator of high standing in Paris, was one of the distinguished company which visited Canada last summer to take part in the Jacques Cartier celebrations at Gaspé and Quebec. A number of the drawings, in pen and wash, which he made on the way over and at various places in this country are now being exhibited by Morency Freres, 458 St. Catherine St., East, and they have plenty of interest, both as drawings and as records of important occasions. Several of them have been reproduced in "L'Illustration" of Paris.

Scenes on the way over to Canada on the Champlain come first, and there are several good drawings, with a little caricature in them, of groups and incidents on board ship. Pictures of the doings at Gaspé include good studies of habitants and Micmacs, others are of the journey up the St. Lawrence and of ceremonies at Quebec and Montreal. A view of New York in fog and portraits are also in the collection.

Sketches by A Travelling Architect

In the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal there is now being shown, until the 23rd of this month, a small collection of drawings and water colours by Harry Mayerovitch, made in many places in Europe, from Scandinavia to Constantinople. Mr. Mayerovitch was the McLennan Travelling Scholar of the McGill School of Architecture for the year 1933, and some of the drawings which are shown are strictly architectural drawings of buildings in Sweden, and his other drawings are of more general interest. These are quite slight sketches,—some of them just traveller's notes made by the way,—but some of the slightest of them are among the best. They are in pencil, pen, water colour and pastel and they show many kinds of places and people,—streets, buildings, gardens, boats and groups of figures. There is some excellent, free drawing in them, and some good touches of colour, and all are good sketches of things worth sketching. A few figure studies are good, if less striking than the other drawings.

Landscapes In Pastel

Miss Meta E. Mischpeter has a collection of little pictures in oil and pastel on exhibition at the Coffee House, 1191 Union avenue, where they are to remain till the end of the month. She has shown work in the Art Association's Spring Exhibition and at other exhibitions in Eastern Canada. The pictures in the present collection are very unequal. Some of the mountain scenes are among the best of them and the pastels are generally better than the oil pictures; there are good ideas in the way of composition and colour but the handling is sometimes very uncertain. Among the most successful are some views in which mountains and figures are shown in silhouette or in half light against sunset skies.

—June 26/35

An informal Summer Exhibition of work by local painters was opened in Eaton's galleries last week and is to continue till the first week in August. All Montreal painters have been invited to contribute to this, the only condition that they have to observe being that pictures, when framed, must be of a size not less than 16 inches by 14. The pictures will be changed from time to time in the course of the exhibition.

An exhibition of this kind finds space for work by older painters and gives some of the younger and less known painters chances of showing their work to the public. Examples of both kinds are in the collection with which this exhibition opens. There are fine sky studies in two landscapes by Wilfrid Barnes, pleasant country sketches by Clark Middleton Hope, a good effect of lighting in a studio interior and a large drawing of a girl's head by R. B. Partridge, characteristic little pictures of wharves, boats and old buildings by Miriam Holland, two sketches made in this province by Georges Delfosse, and some sunny landscapes, particularly one of autumn yellow in the Kentucky hills, by Jane C. Luke. Some small and pleasant Laurentian landscapes are by Miss B. C. Richstone, winter landscapes by J. M. Donnell, an oil sketch by Sam Bornstein, two water colors, of attractive color and tone, by John Humphries, pastels by Saul

Frigelman and good woodcuts by Joe Hillenbrand.

Works of art, of which the values and current prices resisted depression much better than those of many, or most, other kinds of property, are showing some very distinct signs of recovery. Some very high prices were paid at sales of works of art in New York last season, and one of these prices—$840,000 for an "Adoration of the Magi" by Botticelli, may be above all previously recorded prices for such sales. It is at any rate well ahead of the price—$750,000—paid for Gainsborough's "Blue Boy," in 1929. High prices are not confined to the United States; large amounts have been spent at sales in Paris and London, and, this week, some big prices are being paid for the miniatures of the J. P. Morgan collection at Christie's. This happy state of things does not concern the works of old masters alone. At this year's Royal Academy exhibition in London, which is open from May till the beginning of August, 244 pictures have already been sold for prices amounting to over $50,000, according to a recent report.

The men who buy and sell works of art in New York are gentlemen of some importance in the world of art and in all countries. But it is evident that many of the objects which pass through their hands are second-hand articles; dealers in second-hand goods have to be licensed in New York and there is only one kind of license for all of them. The law dealing with the matter makes no distinction between the kind of articles which are bought or sold—whether they be pictures by Rembrandt or mere junk—and the dealers are all licensed as junk dealers. It must surely be something of a shock to Lord Duveen, for example, to find that he is, in the eye of the law, a junk dealer.

LORD DUVEEN BUYS FAMOUS MINIATURE Star June 25/35 J. P. Morgan Collection Being Sold in London

LONDON, June 25 — (A.P.) — J. Pierpont Morgan had about $125,000 more cash on hand today as a result of the first day's sale of his $2,000,000 collection of miniatures at Christie's auction rooms.

With an almost imperceptible inclination of his head, Lord Duveen outdistanced all bidders for the gem of the collection, Hans Holbein's "Portrait of Mrs. Pemberton," painted on the back of a playing card during the reign of Henry VIII. He paid 5,900 guineas (about $39,600) for the miniature. When asked what he intended to do with it, Lord Duveen laughingly replied, "I have bought it for stock."

The historic "Armada Jewel" was bought for 2,700 guineas, nearly $4,000 more than Morgan paid for it, by a representative of Lord Wakefield, who underwrote the purchase for the National Art Collection Fund. It will be placed in the Victoria and Albert Museum.

The jewel was given by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Thomas Heneage in gratitude for England's deliverance from the Spanish Armada.

COMMERCIAL ART SHOW

Wide Variety of Technique in Current Exhibit

A wide variety of technique, embracing all branches of commercial illustration, is to be seen at the first exhibition of the newly-formed Guild of Canadian Commercial Artists, now on view at 1180 Union avenue. The exhibition is open to members and art buyers from 10 to 12 a.m., and from 2 to 4 o'clock every afternoon until next Wednesday.

Departing from the time-honored system of exhibiting originals, many of the exhibits are in proof form, permitting unbiased judgment on their merits as commercial illustrations. Particular attention has been given in many cases to layout and composition. Brilliant, almost modern, color effects are contracted with the more sombre effects produced by crayon and pencil for black and white reproduction.

The exhibition has been sponsored by the commercial artists with the object of acquainting the public and particularly buyers of commercial art with the wide variety and high standard of such work available in Montreal.

MONTREAL'S SCULPTOR'S WORK June 29/35

To be unveiled in Couchiching Beach Park, Orillia, Ontario, on Dominion Day, the above statue was erected in memory of Mrs. Alexander Begg, wife of the historian of British Columbia, by her son, the late Ralph Begg. Allan A. Cameron, of Montreal, inset, is the sculptor.

Keen Bidding at Art Sales Recalled Boom Years With $900,000 Total

London—One of the most encouraging signs of improving conditions was the prices fetched at art sales, which, in some respects, recalled the boom of a few years ago. The week ended with a total sum realized of at least £180,000. Outstanding sales held in London were:

Joel pictures, silver and furniture, at Christie's, £81,364; other properties from these rooms, £20,000.

A picture collection at Sotheby's, £14,000, and hundredweights of old silver articles, £16,000.

Christie's large gallery was uncomfortably crowded for the sale of the late S. B. Joel's collection of early English pictures removed from his London residence. Considering that Mr. Joel bought at the time when American competition for works of art was at its highest, the sale definitely showed that the market is always ready to absorb the best works.

Fifty-four pictures realized a total of £66,420.

The highest figure paid was £12,075, by Lord Duveen, for John Hoppner's beautiful portrait of his wife Phoebe, which was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1737. The picture was originally in the collection of the artist's son. He sold it for a few pounds to the family of J. H. B. Christie, and in the latter's sale it changed hands for £9,765.

Other sales, compared with figures paid when last the pictures were offered, were:

Hoppner's "The Hurdy Gurdy Player": £5,040 (Barbizon House)—£7,927 in 1910.

Hoppner's portrait of "Lady Mary Greville": £1,365 (Pawsey and Payne)—£8,190 in 1902.

Lawrence's portrait of "Miss Emily de Visne": £2,975 (Gooden and Fox)—£1,102 in 1904.

Morland's "The Public House Door": £1,390 (Barbizon House)—£1,785 in 1911.

"The Carrier's Stable": £1,470 (Barbizon House)—£1,155 in 1902.

"The Bull Inn": £1,417 10s.—£861 in 1902.

Romney's portrait of Lady Hamilton as a "Welsh Girl": £5,460 (Barbizon House)—£2,205 in 1892.

Romney's "Cassandra": £1,260 (Wade)—£8,925 in 1929.

A portrait of Miss Boone and Master Boone, for which Romney was paid £75, sold for £3,675 (F. Howard).

Gainsborough's portrait of the children of Dr. Risse Charleton, of Bath, changed hands at £3,465 (Vicars); and Raeburn's Mrs. Lumsden, £1,365 (Barbizon House).

At the end of the Joel sale 70 pictures from other sources were offered, and brought a total of £12,338. Raeburn's portrait of Mrs. John Pattison, of Kelvingrove, Glasgow, realised £2,100 (Barbizon House) as against £5,080 in the Sedelmeyer sale, Paris, 1906.

From The-Gazette of Twenty-five Years Ago, Friday July 22, 1910.

When the Papal Legate, Cardinal Vannutelli, arrives at Father Point on his way to Montreal for the Eucharistic Congress, he will be met by the chief pastor of the Diocese of Montreal, Archbishop Bruchesi, who will journey down from the city in view of the unique occasion. The Cardinal Legate will be a passenger on the C.P.R. liner Empress of Ireland, which leaves Liverpool on August 26 and is due at Quebec on September 1.

The old Carsley property on St. James street will be converted into a hotel and restaurant. The building will be subject to Freeman's Limited and the hotel will have 130 rooms.

It has been decided by the committee appointed some time since, and composed of Hon. L. J. Forget, James Ross, R. B. Angus and David Morrice, for the construction of the new Art Gallery on the Holton property, Sherbrooke street west, to ask for enlarged plans for a bigger building. The structure is to cost $300,000.

PAYS VISIT TO MCGILL

Dr. de la Rue, French Geologist, Looks Over Museums

En route from St. Pierre and Miquelon to the New Hebrides, where he will conduct geological and ethnological research for the National Museum of Paris, France, Dr. Aubert de la Rue, noted French geologist, visited the museums at McGill University yesterday and spent some time examining the New Hebrides collections.

The visitor, who was accompanied by his wife, was shown over the McGill museums by Col. Wilfrid Bovey and E. Lionel Judah, secretary of the museums committee of the university.

Pictures For Hire Scheme In London

London—These are the days of efforts to rationalize the distributing end of what has been called "this business, art," writes the critic of The Times. The hire purchase system of deferred payments, which, though it was known to exist in practice, was first publicly announced as a regular policy by Messrs. Arthur Tooth and Sons, is already a commonplace, and now, at 56, Brook Street, under the title of Picture Hire, Limited, this has been extended in a special direction.

A subscriber pays 10s a year, which entitles him to take out any number of pictures during the year, keeping them indefinitely or changing them as often as he likes, provided that he keeps each for a period of less than a month at a time. As will be seen, this is an application to pictures of what has long been done with books; a circulating library instead of a circulating library.

But the scheme does not end with hire, but merges into hire-purchase and purchase outright. Charges for hire are made monthly on a scale representing 2 per cent. of the picture's value per month. If a member on the 10s a year subscription basis decides to buy a picture within six months of his first taking it, he may deduct from its price the amount he has already paid in rent. He may then either buy it outright or continue paying for it at a rate of 10 per cent. per month.

The scheme, which is to be conducted by Derek Rawnsley and Anthony Squire, son of the author and critic, will start with a stock of several hundred works, ranging in value from £5 to £500, and over 100 painters and sculptors have undertaken to keep up the supply. The names of John Armstrong, Eric Gill, Dame Laura Knight, A.R.A., Henry Moore, Glyn Philpot, R.A., and Rex Whistler, taken at random from the alphabetical list, will be enough to suggest both the quality and the catholicity of the selection.

TWO PAINTINGS FOR MEMORIALS

In memory of the late Mrs. Blanche E. Hutchison, Miss Isabel C. McCaw has presented two paintings by noted artists to McGill University and the Royal Victoria Hospital. A "Shore Scene" by the celebrated Scots painter John Thomson of Duddingston will be hung in the Ross Memorial Pavilion and a "Canal and Bridge Scene" by the well-known Dutch artist W. B. Tholen will be hung in the McGill Medical Building.

These paintings were the property of the late Mrs. Hutchison and were left in her will to Miss McCaw. In her lifetime Mrs. Hutchison was keenly interested in both institutions mentioned. She provided funds to carry on at McGill research work in infantile paralysis by Dr. Maurice Brodie who succeeded recently in discovering a serum which it is hoped will conquer that disease. By her will Mrs. Hutchison left the residue of her estate to McGill University to establish a research fund in medicine.

MEMORIAL IS UNVEILED Fountain Designed by Allan Cameron, of Montreal

Orillia, Ont., July 2.—The Begg memorial fountain was unveiled at Couchiching Beach Park here yesterday by Mrs. Emma Begg Travis, of Chappaqua, N.Y., a daughter of the late Mrs. Alexander Begg, in whose memory the fountain was erected. The fountain was formally given to the town by Roderick Begg, of New York, a brother of the donor, the late Ralph Begg, and was accepted on behalf of the town by Mayor J. B. Johnston. Judge M. E. Tudhope, of Brockville, a close friend of the family, gave the dedicatory address.

Out of 57 designs submitted, that of Allan Cameron, of Montreal, was accepted. The fountain, executed in granite, represents a mother with a child upon her knees.

VALUABLE OIL PAINTING

Jobless Man Pays 30 Cents, Refuses $100 Offer

Ottawa, July 2.—An oil painting purchased by Albert McGuire, unemployed carpenter, at an auction sale for 30 cents, may be worth many times the purchase price, it was learned today.

McGuire said he had received an offer of $100 for the painting entitled "The Sands by the Sea," by Charles Warren Eaton, United States artist, which he had refused. In the meantime he is endeavoring to trace the origin of the picture and have it valued.

COMMERCIAL ART IS PLACED ON DISPLAY

Gazette First Guild Exhibition Shows Advertising Skill and Ingenuity 1935.

Pictorially, the ways of appealing to the public to buy pickles, dress fabrics, and summer holidays, are legion. Many of them are demonstrated at the first exhibition of the new Guild of Canadian Commercial Artists, now being seen at 1180 Union avenue. The show represents skill and ingenuity—though nothing surprisingly new—and a great deal of activity. There are newspaper and catalogue fashions, travel folders, labels, show cards, posters, letterheads, menus, programmes, designs for window displays, and some drawings and magazine illustrations as well. Most of them are in proof or in the form of the finished product, printed and busy in their work of selling: the appeal of the exhibition is to the advertiser rather than to the general public, and it is a good opportunity for the man with something to sell to see how the commercial artists of Montreal are equipped to help him.

Avis S. Fyshe has some delicate examples of lettering and illuminating; in contrast, are the cartoons of Eddy Prevost; "Fainnel" presents mustard and salad dressing realistically and shows some more impressionistic work, for the benefit of fabrics; Mona Cragg has a way with children, and Tom Hall, a way with wild animals in action; thumbnail sketches in whimsical style are among the exhibits of Edmund Fancott and Kenn Foucar. P. A. Mahdoubian designs exhibits and "Zucca" carves heads for displays; quite by themselves are the murals and illustrations, in the antique Russian style, by Valentin Shabaef. Prominent among the drawings and illustrations are those of Ernest Newmann, A. C. Valentine, James Crockett—who has a striking poster of Quebec—and Bert Caldwell, Cloutier and Felix O'Shea are well represented, and Thurston Topham and Harry Leslie Smith show interior designs for night clubs, beauty parlors and the like.

MONTREAL LOSES DISTINCTION IN ART

Rotterdam Expert Voices Opinion On Visit To Star City 6.7.35

Montreal, once an art centre of this continent, where fine pictures and sculptures were appreciated and valued, no longer holds this distinction. The values of objects of art have been forgotten. Europeans should now come here and buy back their old masterpieces for they would get them at low prices.

These are the opinions of E. P. van Huet, Rotterdam businessman and amateur of paintings, who is visiting Montreal, and last night was interviewed by The Star at the home of Dr. F. W. Gilday, 1238 Bishop street.

"You have neither the desire nor the money to buy more objects of art," he told the reporter. "Here is not the place to sell. Here is the place to buy the old masterpieces to take them back where they belong."

LOSS TO CITY

"And yet," he said, "it would be a loss to Montreal if that came about. For the great paintings are worth having even from a material point of view alone. Think of how many people come each year to Munich to see the Art galleries there. Think of how other collections will attract tourists."

There is a far greater and far more general appreciation of art in Europe than there is on this continent. Disputation about the Old Masters, about their style of work and the authenticity of certain pictures is far more frequent in general conversation than it is here, according to Mr. van Huet.

"In the Netherlands there is an association of art lovers known as the Rembrandt Circle," he said. "Each year they raise money. Sometimes it is as much as $50,000. The fund exists for the purpose of buying back the masterpieces of our national painters which now are held abroad."

FEW COLLECTIONS

Mr. van Huet declared that it was shameful to see a city as large as Montreal, with so few public collections of art.

"Your Art gallery here," he said, "has barely enough money to pay the expenses of keeping open. It has practically no money to buy more works. Any small city in Europe will have a better show."

Mr. van Huet, though an art lover by avocation, is the representative of R. Smith and Co., a Rotterdam firm of candy manufacturers.

The first general impression one must receive on seeing the exhibits is of the individuality of the artists, many of whom are unemployed, and the bulk of whom are "juniors." The sole adjudicator, A. Sherrif Scott, had no easy task in choosing the prize-winners, for different persons might have chosen differently for various reasons.

There are 80 exhibits on view, including a few by non-competing artists, and the oils and water-colors are pretty evenly divided, with a few samples of modelling and wood-carving to give the exhibition variety. Technically and artistically, Leslie Coppold's "Stone Crusher" has arresting merit, and was awarded first prize in the class for Montreal scenes in color. An admirably well-drawn scene, "Benoit Street," won second award for Charles Tulley.

Uintah Lindstrom and Jordanus Van der Vlist received honorable mention for their exhibits, "Winter in the Mountains" and "Montreal Harbor," respectively. In this class, the work of Vern Lynn, in at least two of his paintings, stand out as works of merit, the one titled "Reverie" in particular.

A striking head of a negro by Medard Raymond, which revealed careful modelling and excellent color treatment, won for him the premier award in the class for portrait or figure drawing in color. Mrs. Norah Ferguson, with a fine head of a habitant, won the second prize in a class which was keenly competitive; and Cynthia F. Chisnell, for her portrait of "Old MacDonald," received honorable mention. Robert Sharps entered a portrait having much feeling.

Viola Cameron was again in the prize list this year, this time in the clay-modelling class which she won with "Head of a Child," a finely-executed head by an artist who should go a long way, judging from her brief experience. In this class John Mellor's aims at realism with his masks, should attract attention.

In the wood-carving class, E. F. Ford was very rightly awarded the first prize for his scale model of the American frigate "Swallow." This prize was awarded by Mrs. P. A. Thomson, Mrs. Chisnell donating the clay-modelling prize, and the society awarding the prizes in all other classes.

Quite a large number of the exhibits will prove of more than ordinary interest, the spiritual values of H. H. Latter's "Cross at Eventide"; Viateur Lapiere's portrait after the cubist manner; the many fine water colors in particular such as those of Ethel Derrick, Sydney Cornwall, Gwendolyn Sait and Beatrice Long's glorious "Golden Shadows," to mention but a few.

The exhibition is open until August 31.

KEEN COMPETITION OVER ART CONTEST

Gazette July 24th 1935 High Standard Achieved in Loyola Sociological Society Exhibits

Opinions may vary as to the order of merit in the exhibits of the fourth annual art contest of the Loyola Sociological Society, now on view by courtesy of the Catholic Social Service Guild, at 1126 Drummond street, but there will be little hesitation in praising the general excellence of all the competitors, even those who may have experimented the most daringly.

PAINTS PRAIRIE FLOWERS

Artist to Exhibit Canadian Pictures in England

Regina.—(P)—Winnifred Walker, internationally known painter of wild flowers, while on a tour through Saskatchewan put on canvas the colorful blooms which grow on the prairie. Later in the year the paintings will be exhibited in England.

She has been awarded medals at exhibitions held in London, Paris, Philadelphia and Ghent, and her pictures have been hung in Paris salons and the Royal Academy in London. Miss Walker is the official artist for the Royal Horticultural Society in London.

"I was simply drunk with delight," said Miss Walker, "when I went into the Yosemite valley in California before coming here and found so many flowers that have never been painted before." She painted 150 varieties in California after her arrival there in March. She said that her prize is a picture of a blood-red fornix.

"I painted 120 different kinds of Canadian wild flowers from Montreal to Vancouver when I was here in 1928," the visiting artist said. "Canadian flowers have a remarkable beauty and grow very well in England. Lady Byng has a Canadian garden in which she grows dozens of different kinds of Canadian flowers and shrubs. I have been asked to paint it."

A horticultural artist must have a wide knowledge of botany and Miss Walker explained very often she can tell the species of a flower by merely rubbing the foliage or a petal between her fingers. "My pictures must be exact reproductions of the flowers, for size, color and distinctive markings so they can be recognized by flower growers for what they are," she said.

THE MUSEUMS OF MONTREAL.

The age-old trait of humanity which is illustrated by the scriptural dictum that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country, and in the homely adage that hills are green that are far away, finds exemplification in the fact that all too few Montrealers are fully acquainted with the cultural advantages and pleasures of the intellect placed at their disposal in the form of nearly a score of museums containing exhibits covering a wide range of art, literature, history, science, invention, commerce and industry. Foremost on the list, of course, come the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal on Sherbrooke street, which house a comprehensive and valuable collection of paintings and other works, including many particularly fine examples of the French and Dutch schools. McGill University boasts of no fewer than ten museums or museum collections—the David Ross McCord National, with a large and constantly growing assemblage of Canadiana; the Redpath, with its geological, paleontological, mineralogical and zoological exhibits; the Ethnological, tracing the development of various races, which is located in the Medical Building, where also are to be found the Anatomical Museum, the Medical Museum and the Museum of Hygiene; the Library Museum in the Redpath Library, which tells the history of manuscripts and bookmaking; the Architectural, in the Engineering Building; the Botanical, in the Biological Building, and the Museum of Economic Geology in the Mining and Chemistry Building. Some of these are of purely technical concern, but most hold a fascinating interest for children and adults alike.

The Chateau de Ramezay, itself a rare museum piece in its architecture and its associations, is a treasure house of relics recalling the French and earlier British regimes in Canada and the events, conditions and personages of the nineteenth century. The Commercial and Industrial Museum at 540 LaGauchetiere street east, practically unknown to the dwellers in the west end of the city, has a main floor and a series of glass-floored galleries filled with models of industrial processes and with specimens of animal, mineral and vegetable products, manufactured or in their native state, including a number of collections presented by foreign governments. On the twentieth floor of the Beaver Hall Building of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada is a permanent exhibition depicting the history of the telephone, now nearing the sixtieth anniversary of its creation. The latest addition to the list of museums, and the one possibly holding the greatest popular appeal, is the Canadian Catholic Museum at the intersection of Cote des Neiges and Queen Mary roads, where in a setting which strikingly reproduces the Catacombs of Rome are displayed a series of life-size and life-like wax-work groups, betokening artistic skill in both conception and execution, and illustrating the early history of Christianity, while in another section are scenes from French pioneer days in Canada.

With one or two exceptions, where a nominal fee is asked, all these interesting and instructive collections are open to the public daily without charge, and the visitor is well repaid for the time devoted to viewing them.

Mrs. Gertrude Massey, the painter, in her amusing book "Kings, Commoners and Me", tells us that she knows a sculptor who was doing a medallion portrait of a boy's head in profile. When the mother came to see the portrait she said it was perfect, then added, "but where is his other ear?" This is something like the idea that about the moon, the rest of him was there although it wasn't visible. Mrs. Massey herself seems to have owed much of her early success in her profession to Royalty. One of the illustrations in her books is a miniature of the Prince of Wales's dog Peter. Somebody had recommended her to the Prince (afterwards Edward VII) for the work, and the prince was so pleased with the result that he sent for the artist, who eventually made miniatures of the Royal children. A day came when she was at Balmoral and asked one of the equerries if he could get her visit announced in the Court Circular. He said he thought it might be done as far as he could see, but enquired what good would it do her?

"Apart from the honor, half the Americans in London will want me to paint their portraits," she replied.

He laughed, and said he would ask about it. Next morning her name appeared in the Court Circular.

She got on very well with the grandchildren. She never saw the Princess Mary with a doll in her arms; she was always playing with boys' tops, and joining in boys' games. Have you ever noticed that in a family consisting of one boy and a large number of girls, the boy is usually a bit of an ass? While in the case of one girl and a number of brothers, the girl is almost invariably a good sort? Prince Edward, as she called him in those days, came in one day when he was seven, with his knee badly cut and full of gravel as the result of a fall from a bicycle, and they had quite a job to get the dirt out of the wounds. He sat on the chair gripping either side with his hands, his teeth clenched, and firmly determined to keep back the tears. He looked up at her and she said: "Well, you are brave." With almost a sob he replied, "Men don't cry, Mrs. Massey." But after a short pause, he added, "But I don't think I'll sit for my portrait just now."

Her first visit to Balmoral was after the death of Queen Victoria, and everything was still as it had been in her time. She loved her Highland home and she was very fond of plaids, for the bedroom into which Mrs. Massey was shown contained materials in at least eleven different kinds of tartan. Bed-hangings, carpet, curtains, screen, chair-covers, cushions, etc., one and all made from the tartans of various clans. After the exquisite taste of Queen Alexandra's rooms at Sandringham it was rather a shock. Imagine the sensations of a chameleon suddenly introduced to such a place, and told to get busy!

She had some difficult jobs occasionally. One was to work on a portrait of Queen Victoria, using a snapshot taken by Queen Alexandra some three years previously. In it her late Majesty wore a most unbecoming hat which threw all the upper part of her face into shadow. She was to "take off the hat and put a cap on, then turn the face round a little more." She was to paint Prince Edward from the life, but to portray him as five instead of seven years old. Queen Alexandra assumed the pose in which she had sketched Queen Victoria, so that the boy could stand at her knee. "How do you want me to look, Mrs. Massey?" he asked. "Two years younger, please." He thought that was a splendid joke, and so did the Queen, who remarked, "a great number of people want to look like that."

This miniature she took to Windsor Castle on the anniversary of the death of Queen Victoria, thinking Queen Alexandra would like to have it on that day. Her husband happened to glance at the Royal Standard at the masthead which looked like a small pocket handkerchief. He remarked to one of the policemen, "I would have thought they could have afforded to have a decent-sized standard here." "Yes, sir," they could" was the reply. "But if they hoisted the big standard in this wind, it would be blown to pieces in twenty minutes. They hoist a small one when the wind is high. I have seen three destroyed in the same day, sometimes they cannot hoist one at all."

The Throne Room at Buckingham Palace has a grille similar to the one in the House of Commons and one day when there was a drawing-room Mrs. Massey had permission to go there and take notes. Thinking that two heads were better than one she wired to her husband to come at once to the Palace and ask for the grille. He arrived before she had left the Queen's room and she found him in the corridor. He seemed to be a bit dazed and took the telegram out of his pocket and showed it to her. It read: "come at once to Buckingham Palace bring your sketch book and ask for the grille." The Post Office evidently thought his wife couldn't spell and the poor man had hurried off without any dinner.

After the operation for appendicitis had been performed on King Edward VII little Prince Edward was taken to see his grandfather when he was convalescent. He was told to be very quiet and to stay only for a few minutes. The invalid was in bed, and a hospital nurse standing by his bed; the Prince tiptoed in and kissed the King, and after a few minutes' conversation he left the room. Outside in the passage he halted abruptly, and said in a most disappointed tone of voice: "They didn't show me the baby."

MODEL OF ELECTRIC CLOCK TO BE SHOWN

Copy of Dow Timepiece, Now Under Construction, Going to C.N. Exhibition

A model of the Dow electric clock, the timepiece now under construction in Montreal which will be, when completed, the largest in the world, is being displayed at the Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto this year, it was announced yesterday.

The original clock, which is being erected on the roof of the Dow Brewery here, is supported in a superstructure of triangular shape and has three dials, each 60 feet in diameter. It will be visible for miles. The mechanism, of electric pendulum driven type, is especially designed to withstand the rigors of Canadian winters. Reserve power is provided to 96 times normal capacity, to overcome wind resistance, sleet and snow. Accuracy is assured by a pul-syn-etic master clock, located in the building and connected with the observatory at McGill University.

Weight of the clock mechanism is approximately 15 tons. Each of the minute hands is 30 feet long and weighs 2,500 pounds; hour hands are 20 feet long and weigh 1,500 pounds. To cover the dials and steel structure, about 40,000 square feet of porcelain enamel will be required. The electric control and the main clock mechanism are housed in a plate-glass-enclosed room; the pendulum is kept in motion by a series of 24 magnets.

Despite the giant proportions of the mechanism, it is built with such precision that less than 1-12th horsepower will be required to operate the movement during normal weather conditions.

Provision is made for a carillon, also elevators to conduct visitors to observation towers.

TO MOVE BANK PLAQUES

Ancient Decorations Will Be Preserved

Four terra-cotta plaques that came out of England 116 years ago to serve as decorations on the facade of the Bank of Montreal's original premises erected in 1819, are being removed with the permission of the Federal Government, from the doorway of the present General Post Office on St. James street west.

These ancient plaques, believed to have been made from designs executed by the famous ceramist, John Flaxman, are panels in bas-relief emblematic of agriculture, manufacturing, arts and commerce. The present General Post Office site was for nearly 30 years occupied by the chief office of the Bank of Montreal until the present edifice was erected in 1847.

The building then was sold and some years later was demolished to give room to its present purposes. Fortunately, in the demolitions, the plaques were saved and now, after 88 years they are once again to find resting place in the head office of the Bank of Montreal, whose executives attach to them a considerable historical and sentimental value.

FOUR PLAQUES SHOWN BY ART ASSOCIATION

Used in First Bank Building

Visitors to the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal will be interested in four relief plaques on exhibition which have been loaned by the Bank of Montreal. These terra cotta plaques are executed in high relief, the designs of which are attributed to John Flaxman, the British sculptor (1755-1826), whose monuments to Nelson, Howe, Reynolds and other notables of the 18th and 19th centuries, are among the outstanding memorials in English Abbeys and Cathedrals.

The plaques, emblematic of Agriculture, Transportation, Arts and Crafts, and Commerce are 3 feet 10 inches in width, and 2 feet 4 inches in height, weighing somewhat more than 300 pounds each, and were specially imported from England in 1819 to serve as ornaments in the facade of the first bank building in Canada—the head office of the Bank of Montreal, which was constructed in that year on the site of the present Montreal General Post Office.

MCCORD MUSEUM IS NOT TO BE CLOSED

Gazette Sept. 2/35
University Authority Declares Decision Made to Retain Institution

There is no foundation for the rumor that McGill authorities intend to close the McCord National Museum, Dr. F. Owen Stredder, bursar of the university, declared last evening when he was asked to comment on a published report to this effect. Dr. Stredder admitted that, before he assumed his present post at McGill on August 15, there had been discussions on the cost of maintaining the museum but that, finally, the decision had been made to keep the institution open.

Regarded as a unique and unparalleled centre of historical knowledge, the McCord National Museum was donated to the university by the late Dr. David Ross McCord, its founder, who assembled the greater part of the collections which are now valued at approximately $200,000. On his death, Dr. McCord left his property to McGill in the form of an endowment for the museum, but it is understood that during recent years the income from his bequest has dwindled appreciably so that McGill has been required to meet a large part of the cost of the upkeep of the museum from its general funds.

Situated at the corner of Sherbrooke and McTavish streets, the museum building contains an extensive collection of documents, letters and objects of historic interest relating to Canada from the earliest settlement of the white man. There is also a comprehensive collection of Indian material illustrating the customs and habits of the various Indian and Eskimo tribes from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

The institution is open to the public and has long served as a centre for the teaching of Canadian history. While it is not used to any great extent by McGill undergraduates, the institution is visited almost daily during the school year by history classes from local public and high schools, and frequent exhibitions of widespread and topical interest are arranged by its staff under the direction of Mrs. F. C. Warren, the curator.

Pictures and Sketches By Miss Agnes Lefort At Eaton's Gallery

The exhibition of work by Miss Agnes Lefort, which is being shown this week and next at Eaton's galleries, differs from the majority of one-painter exhibitions in the variety of the subjects and, to some extent in the variety of manner in the painting of them. There are landscapes, figure pictures, portraits and flower pictures, in oils and in pastel, and Miss Lefort's methods change with her subjects. Some of the flower pictures are among the best in the exhibition, all broadly painted with a fine sense of color and form. A particularly good one is of a bunch of white peonies; another is a pastel of begonias, and an oil picture of lilacs is almost as good.

Landscapes and town scenes make up a large part of the collection. These are for the most part slight but suggestive sketches, of views from St. Helen's Island, of Montreal streets, of Shawinigan Falls and of other places in this province. There are many good effects of light and color, and the small sketches are generally more successful than the larger versions of the same subjects. One of the bigger and more decided paintings is a rather striking one of snow in a Montreal street. The pictures with figures,—"genre subjects,"—are more strongly painted, with a certain hardness. The pictures of a boy playing a mouth-organ, of a negress holding a bunch of white lilies and of a girl with a cat stand out among these, and there is a good study of a dog.

A few studies of nude figures are distinguished by their good drawing and by their clean and direct painting. There are also a few portraits, among which a pastel study of lace stands out by its color and modelling.

Marc Aurel Fortin is showing a few of his pictures this week in another gallery at Eaton's. As usual the work is remarkable for the vividness of its color and composition. Mr. Fortin does not report the facts of nature but translates them into a language of his own, which becomes ever more strident. A large picture of green trees in this exhibition, would be conspicuous anywhere else, but is subdued in comparison with the scarlet buildings and black skies which are on the other walls of the gallery, and particularly with the terrific storm with a rainbow which faces it. Mr. Fortin's work is always interesting, but it can only be seen with comfort in a large gallery.

GOBELIN TAPESTRY HERE

Coins and Medals from Mint, Sevres China, Books and 100 Commercial Booths
Arranged For

Preparations for the French Artistic Exposition, to be opened by His Excellency the Governor-General Lord Bessborough at Henry Morgan & Company, Limited, on September 4, are going on apace. The show, which is sponsored by the Chambre de Commerce Francaise in Canada, will be of great educational value and should draw thousands from near and far, for, to briefly outline present plans indicates that it will be a display of French art and industry on a broad scale. Incidentally there will be 108 valuable pieces of Sevres China, an exhibition of fine book-making, examples of coins and medals from the French mint, 100 booths showing the products of various French manufacturers, a plan of the International Exposition of Paris to be held in that city in 1937, and a group of very valuable Gobelin tapestries.

During the exhibition at Morgan's a visit will be paid to the port of Montreal by the French cruiser Ville d'Ys, while a large delegation from the Paris school of higher commercial studies will come to this city to return the call paid to that institution by a delegation of l'Ecole des Hautes Etudes Commerciales, Viger Square.

AT PRIVATE VIEW.

A foretaste of some of the beautiful products to be shown next month was given local press representatives yesterday afternoon in a private view of the Gobelin tapestries in the vaults of the Morgan establishment, where these examples of fine weaving, valued at over one million francs were on display.

This show truly turned back the pages of history, revealing an art that in France goes back to the family of Jehan Gobelin, a dyer, who established himself in 1450. This craftsman, incidentally brought celebrity and fortune to himself and his family by the discovery of a secret dye of scarlet produced from cochineal, then a recent import from the West Indies. His son Philibert carried on the work and left to his children houses and lands, this family launching the art by taking into their workshops in 1594 tapestry artists. Under the patronage of Henry IV, Italian and Flemish tapestry makers were encouraged to enter France, and in 1601 the enterprise was strengthened by the entry of other artists from Flanders.

These foreign tapestry makers were employed more than fifty years by the King, who granted them numerous privileges. Their reputation grew daily, so that the people, to glorify them, gave the name of Gobelins, not only to the district where the industry was, but also the river of Bievre which flowed to the west of the establishment. The Squire Canaye succeeded the brothers Gobelins, and they in turn were succeeded by a Monsieur Sluch, a Dutchman, who drew praise for the perfection of his work. The excellence of the artists at once put the tapestry makers under his royal protection, and employed them solely in the royal service. Then Louis XIV accorded to his minister the right to acquire the factories. This was done in 1662. At this period the Gobelins had their factory on the rue Montfard, today the Avenue des Gobelins. Louis XIV, therefore, must get the credit of establishing on a permanent basis the manufacture of tapestries under government control, thereby ensuring the continuance of this handicraft down to the present day.

Colbert established the Court Painter Le Brun as the director of tapestry making, and he remained there until his death in 1690.

Le Brun and his pupils furnished models for the artists, but extra artistic aid was required and the services of the painters Van du Neulen, Yvaet, Bolls and Baptiste were enlisted to add glory to the period of Le Grand Roi. Mignard, who succeeded Le Brun as director, had the assistance of La Chapelle Pesse as architect and studio director. Under their united guidance, despite a personnel reduced by war, a school of design was created with Toby, Coysvex and Sebastien Leclere as teachers.

In the time of Louis XIV there was no permanent museum for exhibiting the tapestries, which were only shown to persons of note on visiting the Gobelins. On the Fete Dieu the public were permitted to view the new works. The first catalogue and permanent exposition came later.

In 1669 Jules Hardonin-Mansact was named director with Le Siene Mathieu as inspector of paintings. Under their direction and the direction of their successors wonderful works were undertaken designed by Coypell, Ondry, Boucher and others.

WORKS AFTER BOUCHER.

The tapestries shown are works of art of high order. Beautiful in color they are done with a precision that almost simulates painting. This is particularly true of the figures after Boucher, the French painter who was made director of the Gobelins factory in 1755 and court painter in 1765. He was also director of the Academy and inspector of the tapestry manufacture of Beauvais, and was employed by Madame de Pompadour, both to paint her portrait and to execute several decorative works. His Watteau-like style gave him the title of the Anacreon of painting.

Distinctly painter-like in quality is a still life—fruit in a dish by Ney, while solid handling and bold color are manifest in a flower piece by Cezanne, the values of the blue-figured vase being perfectly realized. A work of large size is "Nymphs of the Seine", after Serrieres, with nudes against the river, its bridges with Notre Dame on an eminence, other famous buildings along this waterway having place in the composition which has figures in the borders. The figures while robust are graceful in form and good in color. Higher in key is another large tapestry called "South America," in which a nude figure stands in rich, vivid vegetation surrounded by the birds and beasts of that country, while in the distance are sea, shore and mountains typical of the region. The color note is gay and sparkling and the design, after Pinchon, strikingly effective.

Students of the arts will find much to interest them in these tapestries when they are placed on public exhibition. Some idea of the magnitude of executing them is recorded in the designs. For instance, "Nymphs of the Seine" bears the dates 1925-1933, and one of the works after Boucher, 1929-1932.

VALUED TAPESTRY ARRIVES IN CITY

Exhibition of French Works of Art to Be Held in Store

Gobelin tapestries to the value of over 1,000,000 francs lie today behind polished steel bars in a vault under the store of Henry Morgan & Co. Ltd. They are part of the 4,000 artistic French products which are being assembled in Montreal for an exhibition of what the French artist and artisan can make. The exhibition will be opened at Morgan's by the Earl and Countess of Bessborough on September 4.

For close to 300 years the French Government has fostered and subsidized the factory of the Gobelins where artist craftsmen have made famous tapestries of wool and silk which hang in palaces and in museums the world over.

The exhibit, now guarded by Morgan's consists of six panels and three magnificent tapestries, the largest of which, representing the Nymph of the Seine, took five men five full years to make. As artists are entitled to do they have woven their names and the years of their labor into the piece.

15 YEARS APPRENTICESHIP

It takes 15 years in the Gobelin factory to train an apprentice to the point where he may be trusted with serious work. It takes fine artistic skill to recreate with woven threads the pattern paintings made by famous artists. It takes, at the very least, a fine eye for color, for the workmen have 14,000 different shades of either worsted or silk to choose from in doing their work.

The tapestries, which will be on show in three weeks' time, include reproductions of patterns designed by Francois Boucher, Court painter and director of the Gobelins in 1765, a portrait of a lady of the 16th Century with the millefeuille background characteristic of that date, and a reproduction of a canvas by as modernistic a painter as Cezanne.

Executives of Henry Morgan's have received no clue from the French Government as to the worth of the individual pieces sent over for exhibition. They have been informed that if anyone wishes to purchase one, a cable will have to be sent to France and a price will then be quoted.

The entire exhibit, the first of its kind in Canada, and perhaps on the Continent, is being sponsored by the Chambre de Commerce Francaise.

OTHER EXHIBITS

There will be over 100 booths exhibiting the wares of noted French manufacturers at the show. One exhibit, for instance, will consist of 103 pieces of valuable Sevres china. Other booths will show the rare silks of Lyons, examples of coins and medals from the French mint, and specimens of artistic book-binding.

This travelling exhibition is a foretaste of the International Exposition of Paris, now being planned for that city for the summer of 1937. Plans of the buildings and lay-out of grounds for this exhibition will be exhibited at the show here.

During the period of the exhibition at Morgan's store Montreal will once more be visited by the French cruiser Ville d'Ys, and a delegation of students from the Paris School of Higher Commercial Studies will come to this city, to return a visit made to it by the students of l'Ecole des Hautes Etudes on Viger Square.

Brighton, England, August 13.—(P)—Sir William Watson, eminent English poet, died today in Ditchling, Sussex, after a fortnight's illness. He was 77.

Sir William Watson was born August 2, 1858, in Burnley-in-Wharfedale, Yorkshire. His first work, "The Prince's Quest," appeared when he was 22, but he did not win recognition until 1890 when his "Wordsworth's Grave" appeared.

In his career of more than half a century he wrote poetry that allowed him to take rank with the eminent poets of his time. He was stirred by public occasions, and the poetry these inspired led many to term him the "perfect Poet Laureate." Long before his death he ceased to expect such recognition.

In 1893, a year after Lord Tennyson's death, he was placed on the civil pension list at £200 a year by the then Prime Minister William Gladstone. His knighthood came in 1917.

Sir William was married in 1909 to Maurine Pring. They had two daughters.

GAVE LIFE TO MUSES.

Honorable poverty was the price Sir William paid for a life-long devotion to the muses.

The world of his latter days had little eye or ear for poetry and his wife was able to say late in 1932: "You scarcely will credit this, but the only copies of his last volume which have been sold I bought myself."

His style was uniformly clear and epigrammatic and his poems were dignified and stately without being pompous.

The poet was credited with having an admirable gift for literary criticism in verse, his commemorative poems on Wordsworth, Burns and Arnold being considered among the best in showing this quality.

His political poetry alone reflected deep emotion and passion. For a time there were repeated expressions of his indignation against England's foreign policy and one of his more famous fiery phrases was "Abdul the Damned," applied to the then Sultan of Turkey. This appeared in contributions to the Westminster Gazette but was deleted when published in 1896 in book form under the title of "The Purple East."

His "Ode on the Coronation of King Edward VII" appeared in 1902. Some of his other works in the twentieth century included "For England," 1903; "Sable and Purple," 1910; "Heralds of the Dawn," 1912; "The Muse in Exile," 1913; "Pencraft: A Plea for the Older Ways," 1916; "The Man Who Saw," 1917; "The Superhuman Antagonists," 1919, and "Ireland Unfreed," 1920.

So reduced in circumstances was the family in 1930 that an appeal for funds went out to the nation over the signatures of Sir James Barrie, Bernard Shaw, Rudyard Kipling, John Galsworthy and other notables. Several thousand pounds were collected.

In April, 1935, Sir William Watson was the recipient of a bequest of £1,000 from a wealthy American manufacturer, Albert H. Whitin, who was an admirer of his writings. At that time Sir William was 76 years of age and living with his wife and two daughters in a small bungalow in the County of Sussex.

Lloyd George was one of Watson's great admirers and was in the habit of sending him a hamper at Christmas from "Farmer George's farm."

Montreal Relatives

A sister-in-law of Sir William, Mrs. Elenora Watson, resides in Montreal, at Columbia avenue, Westmount, whose son, William R. Watson, is the owner of the Watson Art Galleries here, another son, A. B. Watson, being director of the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company Limited, of Montreal, while Mrs. P. W. Fortune, of Elm avenue, is a niece of the poet.

Man Wins Tea Cosy Prize

Toronto, August 21.—(P)—The art of making tea cosies is not confined to the fair sex, it was proven today at the Canadian National Exhibition when A. E. Perrins, of Westmount, Que., was awarded first prize in the novelty tea cosy class. Mr. Perrins' work was described as "exquisite," being of hand woven wool. The C.N.E. doors are to be opened to the public Friday.

OLD SEVRES CHINA ARRIVES FOR SHOW

Gazette Aug. 23/35
Magnificent Reproductions of Masters' Works Will Be on View

ARRANGED BY MORGAN'S

Exposition Artistique Francaise Will Be Held Next Month at Department Store

French tradition of craftsmanship in china, porcelain and glassware is admirably represented by products of the old and famous Manufacture de Sevres which will be incorporated with the display of Gobelin tapestries at the Exposition Artistique Francaise which will open at Henry Morgan and Company's store early next month.

The exhibit, which was unpacked yesterday and shown to invited guests and members of the press, includes magnificent reproductions of the work of masters such as Falconet, Boizot, Le Riche and Fernex. These take the form of bouquets of flowers exquisitely done in porcelain, vases of uncommon delicacy, sumptuous table services, miniature figures moulded in unglazed porcelain, and other objets d'art which will delight the connoisseur.

Outstanding exhibits also include table centres such as d'Oudry's "La Chasse" and Pigalle's "Triomphe de Bacchus." These, of course, may be accepted as perfect examples in their genre. There are, in addition, needle cases, umbrella handles and, of particular historical interest, examples of lights which illuminate the Petit Trianon of Marie Antoinette.

Of interest also is the statuary modelled by various artists in the service of the Manufacture de Sevres. It comprises examples done in soft sandstone and modern in their severity of line, as well as more conventional but no less admirable examples modelled in the usual white material.

The Manufacture de Sevres has had an illustrious history. It came into prominence in 1756, when its first workshop was set up at Sevres in the neighborhood of Versailles. Court patronage in that exquisite age drew the attention of the reigning monarch, Louis the Fifteenth, who purchased the factory from the original shareholders. One of its outstanding patronesses was Madame de Pompadour.

MANY TRIUMPHS MARKED.

The intelligent supervision of Count d'Angivilliere in the reign of Louis the Sixteenth added greatly to its prosperity. After a period of depression due to the French Revolution, the Manufacture de Sevres regained and increased its former glory during the period of the First Empire when its products were devoted exclusively to the glorification of Napoleon the First and the principal events of his reign.

Alexandre Brongniart, noted chemist, directed the Manufacture for the first 50 years of the last century and inaugurated the idea of making it a "Conservatoire des Arts Ceramiques," an ambition which his successors have consistently tried to realize. These included Ebelen, Regnault, Lauth and Deck, masters whose names are household words to specialists of the craft.

Sevres china and porcelain achieved a great triumph at the Universal and International Exhibition of Paris in 1900, and again, at the Exhibition of Decorative Arts of Paris in 1925.

R.C.A. NOVEMBER SHOW

Fall Exhibition to Be Open for Several Weeks

The Royal Canadian Academy exhibition will be held in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal next month. Entries will be received up to November 9, and the private view to members will be on Thursday evening, November 21. The exhibition will be open to the public for a month, closing just before Christmas.

Beginning November 30, an exhibition of water colors by the late Samuel Mathewson Scott will be held in the print room, for two weeks. Mr. Scott, who was born in Montreal in 1863, died in Florence, Italy, two years ago. Several of his works are in the Fogg Museum at Harvard. Most of the paintings to be shown here are of Florence.

Prof. C. T. Currelly, the curator, will speak on the new Royal Ontario Museum, at a meeting of the Art Association, Monday, November 4.

London.—Dr. D. S. MacColl deals, not for the first time, in the August number of the "Nineteenth Century and After" with the affairs of the Royal Academy, writes the art critic of the Morning Post.

Forty-five years ago he began to impress on the Council the desirability of reform in the administration of its duties to the art and artists of England. Many of the improvements for which he and others contended have been carried out, but reforms of a more fundamental description remain to be accomplished. Hence again his reason for breaking silence.

He finds that the distribution of the Chantrey Bequest is not yet satisfactory, and suggests that the right of the Tate Gallery Trustees to accept or reject the Academy's choice of the Chantrey purchases should be restored.

The Academy, he holds, is first of all a shop for the sale of works of art by living men, with privileges for members, but open to all-comers. "The shop," however, is not always open to every "outsider."

Indeed, "Rumour, not to speak of 'incidents,' accuses the jury for the current exhibition of strongly illiberal bias." Moreover, there are talented artists "still left upon the doorstep" of Associateship. "If the traditional limit of Associateship hampers expansion, it is high time," Dr. MacColl continues, "that it should be revised."

In this proposal lies the greatest difficulty to be overcome. It would involve the abolition of Associateship, which fundamental reform "might well be the subject of a Parliamentary inquiry, and if a more nearly national institution be the outcome there would be a case, should it be necessary, for some subsidy from the State, such as, in the beginning, came from the King's private purse."

Dr. MacColl also supports a reform advocated 50 years ago: "That the Academy Jury and Hanging Committee should not consist exclusively of Academicians, but should be elected by the votes of all exhibitors of the previous year."

He advises the holding of an autumn exhibition at Burlington House of work by Academicians, members of the other Royal Art Societies, along with exhibits from independent groups, such as the New English Art Club and the Art Workers' Guild.

He thinks that "with the shift from an excessive preoccupation with painting, greater freedom in the appointment of the President of the Academy is desirable," and, "it is among the architects that the model President is most likely to be found."

In his opinion, too, "Scholarship, the valuable academic quality, has among the present R.A.'s, run rather low. The Exhibition of British Art two winters ago had painful defects of knowledge and direction."

One more quotation: "The Academy is badly in want of a Secretary for outside negotiations; like Mr. Eden. One whose business it would be to keep himself closely informed by visiting regularly all the exhibitions, including 'one-man shows.' The President and existing Secretary probably have their hands too full to give all the time desirable for this task."

Commenting editorially, the Morning Post says, in part: Dr. D. S. MacColl is, like that other dour Scot, Alan Breck, "a bonnie fecther." Forty-five years have passed since he began to fight the Council of the Royal Academy. He has naturally not always won against defenders so well entrenched. Minor concessions have been gained from time to time, but they have made him all the more eager to obtain the "improvements" which remain to be accomplished. In his article in the August issue of the "Nineteenth Century," Dr. MacColl makes various interesting suggestions. The majority of them deserve favorable consideration from the Academicians, but they can hardly be expected to agree with the statement "that the first fundamental reform called for is the abolition of Associateship. That half-way house is a trap, a corral in which wild elephants are tamed . . . till most of the mischief is out of them." This assertion is not quite fair to the rebels among the young artists who have been received into the "corral." Men of our day, such as Sargent, Sir George Clausen, and Augustus John, did not lose any of their fortitude during their probationary periods, nor did the courage of Turner and Constable weaken while they were Associates. Moreover, the Academicians could not themselves abolish Associateship, which "order or rank" was instituted in 1770 with the approbation of George III, who was the founder and patron of the Royal Academy. He called it "My Academy." So that an attempt to carry out Dr. MacColl's suggestion might involve the intervention of the King or of Parliament. But the question of abolition need not be regarded seriously. An order which was good for Turner and Constable is good enough for the best artists of our era.

Governor - General Opens
French Exposition at Henry Morgan's

SEEK CLOSER RELATIONS

French Minister and President of Chambre Hope for Greater Exchange—Many Beautiful Exhibits

The close association which has existed between France and Canada for 400 years was emphasized yesterday afternoon when His Excellency the Governor-General officially opened the Exposition Artistique Francaise, in the store of Henry Morgan and Company, Limited, and the hope was expressed that, industrially, the relationship might be made even closer.

After he had been welcomed by Lucien Bernad, president of La Chambre de Commerce Francaise au Canada, which is responsible for bringing the exhibition to Montreal, and by His Excellency M. Raymond Brugere, Minister of France to Canada, the Earl of Bessborough, speaking, like all the others, in French, recalled, with a great deal of satisfaction, the sojourn he and Lady Bessborough had made in Quebec City every year since their coming to Canada, and spoke of his intimate knowledge of the province and his love of the French people.

One impression that remained with him, he went on, was that the influence of French culture had not diminished in Canada. France, with its fine taste and pride of workmanship, was the mother of the arts, and while Canada was open to influences from other civilizations, he was glad that, fundamentally, French culture persisted here. Canada, he thought, sympathized with modern French art, of which this exposition was a significant demonstration.

Among those in the Vice Regal party was Hon. C. H. Cahan, Secretary of State, one of the patrons.

At the close of his address, M. Brugere presented the Countess of Bessborough with a handsome table decoration in the form of a Gallic cock in Baccarat crystal, and Her Excellency in a few gracious sentences, said she was so touched by the gesture that she hardly knew what to say in acknowledgment of "such a delightful souvenir."

The French Minister began by expressing gratitude to the Governor-General for his interest in the exposition. It was another example of His Excellency's continued and often-expressed sympathy with France.

GIVES THANKS TO FIRM.

In speaking of the genesis of the exposition, M. Brugere recalled the words of Mayor Houde, expressed to the delegates of the Jacques Cartier mission last year: "We have need of your commerce and your industries." This appeal had been understood and the exposition was the first response to it. He went on to thank Henry Morgan and Company for its hospitality and to thank and congratulate M. Bernad and the other members of the Chambre de Commerce Francaise au Canada for making the exposition possible.

Unfortunately, however, while it was a witness to goodwill, it did not mean that there was a satisfactory and prosperous commercial movement between the two countries. From 1918 to 1930, French sales to Canada had grown to such proportions as to justify the highest hopes. But these hopes had been dissipated. In 1930, French exports to the Dominion had amounted to $21,000,000 gold; in 1934 they had dropped to $6,000,000, devaluated, a loss of 80 per cent. At the same time, Canada's exports to France had increased enormously, and he recalled a statement made by Premier Bennett in June to the effect that France bought 90 per cent. of its wheat imports from Canada.

He hoped that the exposition would convince Canadian importers of the quality of French goods and that the result would be a better balance of trade between two countries so closely allied.

CROWDS SEE EXHIBITS

Long before the Vice Regal party came to the dias and the exposition was declared open, Morgan's fifth floor was crowded with spectators. Most of them will, no doubt, return to make a more leisureed examination of the exhibits and, with the exposition open until 10 o'clock each night, the public will have ample opportunity to see all that is to be seen.

There is much to repay a prolonged visit. In addition to the French National exhibits, nearly 200 manufacturers are represented, in all phases of applied arts and crafts. The commercial section is divided into streets—such as the "Avenue des Parfums," the "Rue de la Ceramique et de la Verrerie," and the "Boulevard du Textile et du Cuir"—and the exhibits are arranged in row after row of shop windows.

On "Paper Boulevard," for example, are books, books, and more books; prints, engravings, plates; historical documents from the National Library; children's picture books in delightful fresh colors, more sophisticated books for grown-ups, some of them in most luxurious and tasteful bindings.

tastic shapes of fish, and birds, frogs' orchestras and miniature hunting scenes. There are fine examples of modern treatment in silverware and jewellery.

The French Government has sent precious Gobelin tapestries, so delicately textured, so faithful in color, that it is difficult to believe they are not paintings. The most striking are the enormous "Nymphs of the Seine," after Serrieres; Pinchon's gorgeous "South America," with its graceful native figures and its accumulation of tropical plants, birds and animals; and the reproduction of one of Cezanne's flower paintings.

The porcelains and ceramics from Sevres need to be seen more than once—marvellously executed statuettes of the old style, as light and frothy as whipped cream, and pieces in the chaster modern line; vases handsomely shaped and decorated with superb style.

The pictures from the Salon des Tuileries should not be overlooked, especially those of Jean de Botton, and one of the finest sections of the whole exposition is the collection of 255 bronze medals from the French mint. Many of them, as for instance those dealing with Jacques Cartier, have a special interest for Canadians, but, apart altogether from their subjects, as works of art they have an importance all their own.

Statuettes, drawings, photographs and "maquettes" of decorations for the Normandie, by such artists as Edy Legrand and Jean Dunand; furniture, screens, and designs for rooms are to be found in the decorative arts section.

"Textile Boulevard," with its fine fabrics, silks, religious vestments and articles of clothing, has a great attraction, especially for the ladies. There are gloves and leather bags. As to things in bottles—there are 15 perfume exhibits and 29 exhibits of wines, liqueurs and mineral waters. Things to eat—preserves and candies—and medicines to take when you are not feeling well; and surgical instruments for more drastic treatment; moving pictures, toys and games—all are laid out to view.

INTERESTING GLASSWARE.

More fascinating than anything, perhaps, are the windows devoted to glassware, pottery, china and metals. Here French applied art comes to its finest flower. Thick porcelain inspired by bold primitive designs is contrasted with glass as fragile as filmy soap bubbles. Mirrors have been decorated in striking modern motifs and glass has been blown into the most fantastic

SHOW OF PAINTINGS POPULAR IN APPEAL

Miss Agnes Lefort Has 81
Canvases at Eaton's
Galleries

Montrealers who know the work of Miss Agnes Lefort through the Academy, the spring shows at the Art Association, and through other group exhibitions, are now having an opportunity to see it as a comprehensive whole. Her first "one-man show" opened yesterday in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company and will be on view for two weeks. The chief criticism of one-man shows—much the best way to meet an artist, of course—is that there is often a tendency to crowd them, and Miss Lefort would have been advised to limit herself. However, she is a painter of essentially popular appeal and she may have needed 81 canvases to demonstrate her wide range of interests. Her subjects include portraits, nudes, flowers, still life, landscapes and such genre characters as a boy with a mouth organ, a dog, a child with a cat, a man puzzling over a chess game, and a group of gamins.

Miss Lefort is an able, often facile, painter, with the gift of freshness and spontaneity, never so unconventional in approach or technique as to be alarming. Her nudes are light and graceful, her genre pictures, human and her landscapes the sort "you can live with." Many of the latter have been done close to Montreal—some are street-scenes—but she is at her happiest in Shawinigan; in such sketches as "Vallee sous la Pluie" and "La Baie de Shawinigan" and especially in the carefully plotted yet living "Panorama de Shawinigan," with its serpentine of river and long green island and hills, and its quiet pattern of houses.

She looks all the more placid in contrast with the Marc Aurele Fortin exhibition next door. Miss Lefort is healthy but Mr. Fortin paints with much more than vigor. He has a tremendous gusto, if not violence. His vivid imagination is his strong point and in form, color and brushwork he paints with a highly individual style.

Gangster Gallery Of Horrors Shown

London.—A photographic "Chamber of Horrors"—twelve official American police pictures of dead gangsters and their victims—was recently on view in the foyer of the London Pavilion, W., to prove to cinema-goers that gangster films are not an exaggeration of the truth.

The photographs are covered with card-board flaps, and no one who so wishes need look at them. They were, however, being studiously examined by the crowds passing in and out of the building, and there have been protests against their exhibition in so prominent a place.

One of the most repulsive shows the body of John Dillinger, first and most notorious of the "Public Enemies," lying on a slab in full view of the public, who are seen filing past to satisfy themselves as to his appearance after being shot by the police.

The pictures are on view in connection with "False Faces," the latest of the films to be presented in London dealing with the work of the Federal agents of the American Department of Justice.

SHOW OF CANADIAN ART

About half of the shows by contemporary artists are given up to the work of foreigners, so it was doubly pleasant to receive the invitation of the directors of the Devon Art and Literary Colony (Montreal Section) to an exhibition of works by English and Canadian Artists and Authors that will take place next week at the British Empire Club in St. James's Square.

This enterprising organization has already received a good deal of attention since it established a centre in Torquay, where students from Overseas may study art in the summer while they gain some knowledge of the literary background of England.

The object of the colony is to encourage the interchange of works of art and literature between Canadian and English artists and authors, Devonians in particular, and the coming exhibition in the very centre of London should do much to further this praiseworthy aim. The section given up to literature at the Devonshire colony contains books by Messrs. Murray Gibbon, Leo Cox, and W. D. Lighthall, and the artists represented include Messrs. A. C. Leighton, William Walcott, Conway Blatchford, Charles Simpson, Edwin Holgate, Clare White, Simone Hudon and Major F. G. Gross.

Psalm of Montreal

In the July number of The Art Digest, Mr. Peyton Boswell, the editor, writing on the subject of "A Soiled Escutcheon," took San Diego, Cal., to task for taxing artists for the unsold canvases in their studios. This is going rather too far, even in these days of taxation of everything, as both the artistic and inartistic will admit. Then Mr. Boswell branched off to Vienna, citing the awful example of the good people who covered with sackcloth the semi-clad marble figure at the grave of Selma Kurz, the opera singer. Next he took a slap at Montreal, going back more than half a century to do so. As this city is used to attacks, both from its own citizens and outsiders, "arty" and not so "arty," the million or so dwellers may pay little or no attention to the latest comparisons with San Diego and Vienna.

At the same time, Montreal has its champions, even in the realm of art, and one of them has risen up to protest against the Boswellian slur in The Art Digest. Mr. William R. Watson, of the Watson Art Galleries, promptly took up his pen and wrote to the magazine in question, which published his letter in its August number. Here it is, with the celebrated psalm included, and the editor's reply:

"It is impossible to let you get away with the quotation of Samuel Butler's 'Psalm of Montreal' and its perennial insult to this city. Your editorial quotes at some length the origin of these satiric verses, and a little light might be thrown on it for the enlightenment of your cultured readers. It must be remembered that Butler was an Englishman visiting Montreal in 1875. The building he visited he calls our 'museum,' but fails to state that Montreal did not have a museum in the broad meaning of the word. The building (still in existence, and occupied by an auctioneer) was the very modest 'Museum of Natural History.' It made no claim whatever to be an art museum. Butler describes the cast of the Discobolus as being in a room filled with 'all manner of skins, plants, insects, snakes, etc.' The man he spoke to was not a curator, but a taxidermist, and described by Butler 'as an old man stuffing an owl.' He was also an Englishman ('whose brother was printer to Mr. Spurgeon'), and his remarks about antiques being 'vulgar' were the personal expression of a man of his calling.

"With these simple facts, surely it is time that this oft-quoted insult to Montreal was forever 'scotched.' If somebody sent your 'Museum of Natural History' a nice plaster cast of the Venus de Milo, what would be done with it? Quite likely it would be stuck in a corner surrounded by stuffed monkeys; and if a facetious visitor saw it there, could he not write a tart lampoon entitled 'Venus and the Monkeys,' or 'The Greek Goddess and Stuffed Ancestors'?"

"Let us tell the intelligent world through your pages that Montreal, for its size, is one of the most artistic cities in the world. Many of its art collections have international fame, and some of your readers may have even heard of the Sir William Van Horne collection, the Sir George Drummond, Angus, Hosmer, Ross, and many others. Its wealthier citizens pride themselves on their art collections, and it possesses a beautiful Art Gallery entirely supported by its members (unique in the world). But Butler was a fine novelist, and his thistle of a satire thrusts its spike through all the delicate blooms of the truth; and people can forget our culture, and the perfect taste of today, and quote from the dusty atmosphere of 1875 'O God! O Montreal!' As a parting word, 'O God! O Boswell!', did you not know that Charles Haddon Spurgeon was a great English divine, and not 'Canada's great preacher of the Mid-Victorian age'. So, hail and farewell!"

Montreal, of course, is sensitive on the subject of Samuel Butler's imitating poem. But nobody now thinks that Montreal is the sort of place the poet implies. The whole world knows that Montreal is a liberal city and an art centre. It so fell that Butler was inspired on his visit to Canada to make the metropolis of Quebec a symbol of Mid-Victorian prudery. The fact that the poem has lived is proof of the universality of its application. Montreal should be proud of this distinction—that is, if Montreal is sufficiently philosophic. But it won't, because no city on earth has much mass reasoning power.

The editor has an idea that Sodom and Gomorrah were beautiful cities, that many fine souls abided in them, and that if a modern could obliterate time and be a guest there, either in a fine home or an inn, he would have a feast of reason and joy. But it pleased a Biblical writer to tell a fanciful story about them and have Lot's wife transmogrified into a pillar of salt because she turned to look back toward the old home-stead when Yahveh (or nature) inflicted on them a San Francisco holocaust. Through the succeeding ages Jews and Christians have considered Sodom and Gomorrah as symbols of iniquity.

Mankind should not be deprived of symbols.

O God! O Montreal! Please have a sense of humor!

In its July number The Art Digest printed the last four stanzas of "A Psalm to Montreal." So many requests have been received from readers that herewith is appended the text of all the seven stanzas:

Beautiful by night and day, beautiful in summer and winter, Whole or maimed, always and alike beautiful—
He preacheth gospel of grace to the skins of fowls
And to one who seasoneth the skins of Canadian owls:
O God! O Montreal!

When I saw him I was wroth and I said, "O Discobolus!
Beautiful Discobolus, a Prince among gods and men!
What doest thou here, how camest thou hither, Discobolus?
Preaching gospel in vain to the skins of owls?"
O God! O Montreal!

And I turned to the man of skins and said unto him, "O thou man of skins, Wherefore hast thou done thus to shame the beauty of the Discobolus?"
But the Lord had hardened the heart of the man of skins
And he answered, "My brother-in-law is haberdasher to Mr. Spurgeon."
O God! O Montreal!

"The Discobolus is put here because he is vulgar—
He has neither vest nor pants with which to cover his limbs;

I, sir, am a person of most respectable connections—
My brother-in-law is haberdasher to Mr. Spurgeon."
O God! O Montreal!

Then I said, "O brother-in-law to Mr. Spurgeon's haberdasher,
Who seasoneth also the skins of Canadian owls,
Thou callest trousers 'pants,' whereas I call them 'trousers,' Therefore thou art in hell fire, and may the Lord pity thee!"
O God! O Montreal!

"Preferrest thou the Gospel of Montreal to the gospel of Hellas,
The gospel of thy connection with Mr. Spurgeon's haberdasher to the gospel of the Discobolus?"
Yet none the less blasphemed he beauty, saying, "The Discobolus hath no gospel.
But my brother-in-law is haberdasher to Mr. Spurgeon."
O God! O Montreal!

From Our Readers

"The Psalm of Montreal."

To the Editor of The Gazette:
Sir,—On Saturday last you published a column regarding the above skit written by Samuel Butler. It was, I think, published in Punch, during one of his two long summer visits about 1877, and its biting humor has been greatly appreciated ever since, not least by many Montrealers. If, however, any of your readers will look up the Life of Butler by H. Festing Jones, a copy of which is in McGill Library, he will find that when it appeared in London, Butler's good and generous lady friend wrote out to him that since he hated Montreal so much, he ought to get away from the Philistine Canadian City, and return to his friends and congenial London. His reply as given, is surprising. He says he does not hate Montreal, but on the contrary considers it the most beautiful place he ever saw; and in one of the happiest passages ever written about this city, describes his delight in retiring each afternoon to beautiful Mount Royal to enjoy its refreshing woods and lovely springs, and to meditate there in peace and quietness for hours. The index to Jones's "Life" will, I think, furnish two passages to that effect, under the word "Montreal," which will give some comfort to wounded Monteregian patriots.

Art Classes Open at The Y. W. H. A.

The Young Women's Hebrew Association art school opened this week, and is again under the direction of Aleksander Bercovitch. Since last season the studio at the Y. W. H. A., St. Urbain Street, has been rebuilt and re-equipped with a new lighting system and other advantages. Classes are held at night and in the afternoon, in drawing, oil painting and water color painting. There is no fee and the classes are open to all members of the Y. M. H. A. and Y. W. H. A., as well as to others who are interested.

An exhibition of work done this summer by students of these classes is now being held at the Y. M. H. A., Mount Royal Avenue. It consists chiefly of portrait studies of heads in some of which there is good drawing and good sense of form. Some landscape sketches and still life paintings are less important. A few sketches of heads and caricatures help to show that there is promising material in the class.

PHOTOS OF QUEBEC WILL BE EXHIBITED

Collection of Characteristic Views Traces French Influence in Canada

Mary Stevens Ayres, recorder of Quebec in fine photographs, is visiting Montreal for the first time in seven or eight years and is having private showings of her work at the Windsor Hotel and making plans for an exhibition. Winner of a bronze medal from Madrid, a silver vase from England, and many awards from photographic salons in all parts of the world, Miss Ayres, who lives in Brooklyn, has been "collecting" Quebec for a long time. "This is my golf," she says, "but it is better than golf. I have something to show for my moments of beauty."

She has a great deal to show—windmills, watermills, boats and fishermen, dog carts, and ox cars, fields and markets, churches, wayside shrines, delicately nourished gardens and tumbledown thatched barns, roads, trees, skies. Her art came to her almost by accident, when she went to St. Pierre Miquelon with a tiny box camera and was seized with the idea of tracing the French influence in Canada. Since the St. Pierre Miquelon days, she has studied photography wholeheartedly and now she uses all sorts of intricate cameras and does her own developing and printing. She says that while she benefited by instruction on the technical side, she still regards her sense of composition as instinctive and she is emphatic in her denunciation of "tricks."

Certainly Miss Ayres needs no tricks, and if her compositions are instinctive, her instinct is right. Not only has she a good eye for composition, but she has a natural feeling for "atmosphere," whether she be reproducing storm clouds over low hills and a heavy river, mist on the sea, sunlight on a church steeple, or the expressions on the faces of habitant children. And, apart from their charm, many of her photographs are of great value to Quebec historically, preserving as they do aspects of life that cannot remain forever.

PATTISON PAINTINGS ON VIEW AT EATON'S

Local Familiar Scenes Among Canvases to Be Shown During Week

Windsor street in the winter, with a glow in the sky and lights in the windows, a Christmas tree ablaze in the churchyard, a street car coming up and people hurrying; the city seen from the Mount Royal lookout on a cold day; St. James Cathedral muffled in snow; spring at Morin Heights, with clouds racing and a landscape cold yet quickening; the falls at Ste. Marguerite, turbulent water and turbulent color; fall plowing in the Laurentians—such familiar scenes are giving pleasure to visitors to the T. Eaton Company Fine Art Galleries this week, where there is an exhibition of paintings and etchings by A. M. Pattison. The show will be open until Saturday.

Mr. Pattison paints lightly and freshly. He is interested in his subjects, whether they be big churches or tumbledown houses, patches of hill or city streets; and he passes on his appreciation. Collectors of Montrealiana should be interested in his records of old St. Joseph Church and other buildings, now demolished, and his etchings of McGill University and other aspects of the city. He has a sensitivity to weather and some of his happiest effects are with snow and the clear colors of a winter's day.

WATER COLORS SHOWN

Ruby Heffer Has Works in California Exposition

Works by a former Montrealese decorate the walls of the British Empire cottage in the house of Pacific Relations at the California Pacific International Exposition, San Diego, Cal. These water colors of famous English cathedrals are from the brush of Miss Ruby Miriam Heffer, who went to San Diego about two years ago.

Miss Heffer has portrayed Westminster Abbey in subtle tints of grey, lavender and blue, and Exeter Cathedral with one of its fine stained glass windows as the centre of interest. Her study of St. Cross at Winchester shows the doorway where a crust of bread and mug of ale may still be claimed by any who pass that way.

For many years Miss Heffer was in the art department of the T. Eaton Company in this city.

Old Quebec Scenes Are Shown in Photographs

By M. Stevens Ayres
Star Sept. 18/35

A collection of photographs by Mary Stevens Ayres, which is now to be seen at the Windsor Hotel shows many scenes of the older life of this province. A similar exhibition, a few years ago contained many pictures of Quebec life, and the photographs which are now here are still better pictorially and no less interesting as records of Quebec houses, windmills, outdoor ovens and other things which are becoming scarce in the neighborhood of Montreal but are still to be found further down the river and in Gaspé. The collection also contains a number of good pictures made in New England and on the island of Miquelon, and some of Banff and other places in the mountains.

From a purely photographic point of view some of the pictures are rather unconventional in their treatment, particularly in the darkness of their tone and in the large masses of dark shadow, but these photographic faults, if they are faults, help the effects of the pictures considerably, and many of them are excellent as compositions, quite apart from their very great value as records. A few of the pictures have been colored but photographs are generally best in their original black and white. A number of them have been shown, and have won prizes and commendations at many photographic exhibitions in Europe and America, but their interest is still greater here in the country where so many of them were made.

CANADIAN ART SHOWN.

Many people were turning into the British Empire Club this week to admire the work of the Canadian artists who are exhibiting with the members of the Devon Art and Literary Colony. One of the most admired pictures was the "Forsaken Church," by Major F. G. Cross. The brilliant color of Charles Simpson's "Toronto Water Front," the paintings of Simone Hudon and the work of Edwin Holgate also attracted a great deal of attention. In the centre of the room were specimens of weaving, and books by such well known Canadian authors as Murray Gibbon, W. D. Lighthall and Leo Cox were shown.

The appreciative notices that had appeared in the local Devonshire press had a special interest for Canadians, who were told that "Charles Simpson, A.R.C.A., is showing some fascinating studies of Canadian life, his picture of a French market in New Orleans being extremely interesting."

Miss Stone, the energetic organizer of the colony, leaves for Canada tomorrow and hopes to arrange for a similar exhibition in Montreal.

ARCHITECT'S NOTES OF TRAVEL SHOWN

Black and White Sketches and Water Colors by L. E. Marshall on View

If the modern movement in art is architectural, as Wilenski says it is, one might, on first thought, expect architects to be the best exemplars of it. But it does not seem to work out that way. No one is more romantic than the architect when he goes on holiday from the problems of his profession. For that matter, he can be romantic enough even when he is designing buildings for construction. Architects on holiday usually search out "emotive fragments"—browsing around among ruins, making notes of porticos and pillars, sketching vistas of picturesque streets, bridges of sighs, campaniles, and the like; with a thought for the architecture that is in them, of course, but with the approach of travellers bringing back snapshots of well known places.

Certainly, the black and white sketches and watercolors of Lorne E. Marshall, now on the walls of the Art Association's print room, as of other architects who have exhibited here within the past year, is in the romantic, sentimental tradition. This does not detract from the pleasure that is in them as travel notes. Although his work has no shining individuality—none of the wit, for instance, one found in Harry Mayerovitch's recent show—Mr. Marshall observes well and adds spontaneity to faithfulness. He obviously had a good time in Europe, seeing what an architect should see, enjoying the streets of Paris, with the odd glimpse of Notre Dame, the bridges and the quais; finding towers in Carcassonne and Strasbourg, cathedrals in Spain, doorways in England, bridges in Venice, colonnades in Greece, and crossing to Africa to pick up picturesque bits in Baalbek and Rhodes. Mr. Marshall is a young Montrealese who, in 1931, was awarded the Booth Fellowship (Michigan), the Ryerson Fellowship (Chicago) and the Lake Forest Fellowship.

MONTREAL'S HIGHLAND REGIMENT ATTENDS CHURCH PARADE

The picture above, taken by a Star photographer outside the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul, yesterday afternoon, shows the Black Watch (Royal Highland Regiment) of Canada, entering the sacred edifice to attend their annual church parade. Officers of the two battalions can be seen lined up on either side of the steps, with the troops marching between them, while the pipe band and regimental brass band face one another at the curb, each side of the entrance. The picture also gives a good idea of the crowds, which turned out to witness the colorful military show. A feature of the service was the sermon of Major Rev. George H. Donald, D.D., chaplain of the regiment and pastor of the church, who spoke in plain terms of present-day European troubles, endorsing the stand of the British Empire and the League of Nations and laying a heavy charge on Italy, in the Italo-Ethiopian crisis.

BERTRAM NICHOLLS SHOWING PAINTINGS Oct. 1, 1935

Work of British Artists' Society Head Exhibited at Scott Galleries

Time cannot daunt Bertram Nicholls: He builds solidly against it. More than anything else, this is the impression left by the work of the distinguished president of the Royal Society of British Artists, now on view at the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street. His pictures look as if they have survived from another and a slower century; they have an antique cast. Yet, actually, they are not so much "dated" as safely out of Time altogether. In subject and technique Nicholls stands immovable against fluster and flow.

He paints — the word really should be builds — impregnable rocks and castles, roads, bridges and walls. His compositions are essentially classic and architectural. He builds them and they stand still, they endure. Nicholls is not interested in fleeting impressions or in emotions. If there are living things like human beings, trees or animals in his paintings, they are there as shapes, they are fixed within the frame forever, like the figures on Keats' Grecian urn.

It stands to reason that his color would be austere. But it is not always sombre. He may start with "dead coloring" and treat his subject as a monochrome, but out of long and arduous work comes transparency and glow, and while his color is never exciting — the last thing he would wish — it is satisfying, because it is the right color for him.

Of course Nicholls is not photographic. He sees and remembers as an individual; his work has tone, style, even atmosphere. Classic as it is, it is not without its romantic side and in one or two paintings in this exhibition he has slipped unaccountably into sentimentalism. It is difficult to escape glamor when one paints castle towers in Italy and domes in London, mountains and bridges and ancient roads, but the important thing about Nicholls is his solidity and balance, his timelessness.

Aesthetic Satisfaction Through Photography

It is possible through photography to come to aesthetic satisfaction, John Vanderpant, F.R.P.S., Vancouver, told a meeting of the Art Association of Montreal last night when he spoke on "Adventures in Pictorial Photography."

The speaker paid a tribute to the National Gallery for its progressive standpoint on pictorial photography and referred to the high standards of the annual salon which travelled throughout Canada. Out of 1,600 entries, only 200 were chosen this year. In the future, acceptance would be regarded as a great honor, he said.

Mr. Vanderpant had no advice to give about cameras but had many stimulating things to say about attitude and about the necessity for keeping the mentality as well as the lenses clean, for building up a rich mental reserve.

English Painter
At Scott's Gallery

The collection of pictures and drawings by Bertram Nicholls, P. R. B. A., which are now being exhibited by W. Scott and Sons is, possibly the best one-man show that has been seen here in some years. Mr. Nicholls' oil pictures are well known here, but there are in this exhibition more than two dozen of his oil pictures which have not been shown here, and with them there are some water colors and a few pencil drawings, all consistently good, with the same quiet sureness of invention and handling.

A sort of well judged economy, both of subject matter and of means, is a striking characteristic of all Mr. Nicholls' work; he uses color very sparingly, and yet a great deal of color is suggested. One picture here, of Hickling Broad, in which color has been used more freely, is one of the least successful of his pictures; in some Italian scenes, painted in a quiet Italian manner there is a rich but reserved use of color. Mr. Nicholls' way of seeing things generally has in it a good deal of the ways of some of the older English landscape painters, but some excellent pictures of ships in this exhibition are more related to the older Dutch marine painters.

Buildings or rocks make the subjects which he seems to like best and often he paints both together, as in the striking little picture of buildings on a cliff-side at Atrani, or the fine bridge, backed by mountains at Sospel. Conspicuous among the buildings is the view of Tarascon, seen across the river, — an admirable study in light tones, with hardly any deep shadows. In contrast with this are some of the rocky places, particularly one of a Gorge in the Maritime Alps, the Robin Hood's Bay and the Roccamadour, with planes of deep shadows.

There are three remarkable pencil drawings, a specially good one being a study of shadows under an archway at Orvieto. Another very good archway, with a group of donkeys, at Albengo, is among the water colors, delightful for the handling of light, shade and surface quality. Water color lends itself even better than oil painting to Mr. Nicholls' economical use of color; several of these drawings are almost entirely in black and white. Different from the others are the dark toned study of horses and trees in "The Rest" and the admirable study of fishing boats returning to harbor, made up of a few simple washes of greys and browns. These are the first water-colors to be shown here by Mr. Nicholls, who has only been working in this medium for a few years, and they are in their way quite as attractive as his oil pictures.

Art in London Is Sane Again

NEW YORK, Oct. 3 — (Star Special) — English painters and sculptors are beginning to realize

News of Art In Montreal

A small collection of sketches and etchings by A. M. Pattison is being shown this week in one of the galleries at Eaton's. Most of these are pictures of streets and buildings in Montreal, and among them are some interesting records of buildings which have now disappeared. They are very unequal and in some of them there are rather much fussy detail and some unsatisfactory color. The large picture of "Golden Autumn" is one of the most successful of the oil pictures. The few water colors are better; there is good atmospheric effect in the drawing of a rainy day, down-town, and the drawings of the Arts Building at McGill and of Lagache Street are interesting. There is some good atmosphere and feeling in the etchings.

The classes in drawing and painting conducted by Edwin Holgate, A. R. C. A., and Lillias Torrance Newton, A. R. C. A., at the Art Association of Montreal, opened again this week. Classes are held daily. The classes for junior pupils, under the direction of Miss Alberta Cleland, are held on Tuesdays and Thursdays.

An exhibition of water colors will be opened at the Arts Club, Victoria Street, tomorrow, Thursday evening.

By the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, a lecture on artistic photography will be given to members of the Art Association on Wednesday evening, October 9th, at 8.15, by John Vanderpant, F.R.P.S., of Vancouver.

that the public will not buy or will pay only low prices for modernistic art and are reverting to conservative styles. Bryant Baker, American sculptor of such works as "The Pioneer Woman," said yesterday upon his return from the Royal Academy show at London.

"They've really gone back to what I would call sane rather than the perverted rot in painting and sculpture," said Mr. Baker. He said he thought that needy sculptors could make a living designing simple memorials and grave stones to take the place of the Rococo carving which has emanated from Italy.

AESTHETIC VALUE FOUND IN PHOTOS

John Vanderpant Analyzes
Art and Defines Its Limitations

"Is it possible through photography to come to aesthetic satisfaction?" In an address bristling with aphorisms and illustrated by a series of excellent slides, John Vanderpant, F.R.P.S., of Vancouver, took up this question at a meeting of the Art Association of Montreal, last night, when he spoke on "Adventures in Pictorial Photography." His answer was yes, because art was the expression of formal relationships, and through them the expression of the artist's emotional and cultural reactions, and photography was capable of conveying these things, within its own limitations. But he was not chagrined by these limitations, for form was the limitation of beauty and there could be no art without boundaries. Photography, once anxious to simulate painting, was now coming to recognize its limitations as well as to glory in its own special qualities.

At the outset of his lecture, Mr. Vanderpant paid a tribute to the National Gallery for its progressive standpoint on pictorial photography and referred to the high standards of the annual salon which travelled throughout Canada. Out of 1,600 entries, only 200 were chosen this year. In the future, acceptance would be regarded as a great honor.

He had no advice to give about cameras, but he had many stimulating things to say about attitude — about the necessity for keeping the mentality as well as the lenses clean, for building up a rich mental reserve. He urged the application of the analytical power of the reason, but warned against sophistication as the undertaker to artistic achievement; he pleaded for modesty and the observation of little things, for love and sincerity.

The examples on the screen began with reproductions of a Van Gogh painting and of works by Emily Carr and F. H. Varley and moved on to Mr. Vanderpant's photographs. Had there been any inclination to argue with him about the aesthetic value of the camera when he was speaking, it would have been immediately dispelled when those slides appeared. There was real satisfaction in his tree patterns and his flower forms, and especially in his studies of impressive colonnaded grain elevators. If one were sometimes reminded of Georgia O'Keefe, it was not that the photographs looked like paintings or that O'Keefe's painting is photographic — far from it — but because they had such purity and dignity of formal design. It is evident that when photography ceases trying to look like Corot, it not only begins to realize its own strength but it shows itself to be in the true spirit of modern art.

The Arts Club
Has Show of
Water Colors

Water colour painting continues to progress in Montreal. Painters seem to become more convinced of the attractions of working in the medium and other people realize, by slow degrees, how good water colour drawings are to see and to possess. An exhibition of water colours, which is now open at the Arts Club on Victoria Street, contains some excellent work and shows plenty of diversity in choice of subject and method, though several members of the club, whose work in water colour is well known, are not exhibiting.

Among the more outstanding exhibits are several by H. Simpkins, who has shown much good work of the kind in the last few years. Some of his drawings at the club are in his best form, with clean handling of water colour and a fine sense of colour and of picture making. G. N. Norwell's drawings are also good pictures, though drawing is of much more importance than colour in them. His biggest drawing, of birch trees standing out against blue water and a misty hillside, is a fine and poetical composition; his other drawings have good work with less interesting subjects. G. R. Bagley's pictures have excellent drawing and vivid colour, which is sometimes rather heavy in tone; one of the most attractive of his drawings is a study of sunlight and tree shadows on a roadside house. The work by J. Beckwith in this show is very disappointing; his freedom of handling inclines to become looseness, and his portrait head and the figures in his other drawings are caricatures.

A drawing by A. C. Leighton of the snow and rocks of a mountain is a good study of surface but it lacks scale and distance, of which, however, there is plenty in his other, very satisfying drawing of a range of mountains. A number of sketches by J. Miller are quite small and slight, sometimes little more than indications of something seen, but there is a nice feeling of nature in all of them. Lincoln Morris' sketches are also small and simple but there is a pictorial quality in one or two of them, notably in one of a steamer in open water in front of a misty sunset, which has very good light and atmosphere. A rather similar study by Thurston Topham of a sail-boat is one of the best of his, with a good sense of space; others of his which have good qualities are a misty figure study and a view of snowy hills in twilight; his larger drawings of mountain streams have good drawing and color but are rather literal in their facts.

A large composition by J. Crockett of docks and down-town buildings in Montreal is a fine piece of illustration, cleverly painted, but too full of subject matter and detail to make a comfortable picture or to get the best results from water color. D. H. McGill gets some good effects of light and space with the freest and simplest of handling; a complete contrast is to be found in Chrystie Douglas' quite effective view of hilly country, in which color and detail are almost too intense. The work of A. Cloutier is another disappointment; his large "Autumn Foliage" is a piece of modern formalism in which neither the subject nor its treatment can be called beautiful.

Pictures by
F. H. Brigden
At Eaton's

In one of Eaton's galleries there is being shown this week and next a collection of water color drawings by F. H. Brigden, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., of Toronto. Mr. Brigden was first president of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Colors, and his work has been seen in exhibitions for many years. His work makes a very pleasant show of attractive places in many parts of Canada; Quebec villages among hills, peaceful rivers in Ontario, mountain streams, fruit trees in spring; and Mr. Brigden, wise man, prefers to work chiefly in summer and in fine weather.

These are not sketches but pictures, many of them with most interesting composition. There is a certain old-fashioned, nineteenth century feeling in the slightly hard and exact treatment of some of these; Mr. Brigden lets the beauty of his subject speak for itself; but there is a rather more modern quality in the formal treatment of the shapes of trees, which fits in perfectly well with the rest of the work. The pictures are all full of excellent color and light, and of clean direct water color painting, and are worth seeing both as examples of painting and as delightful Canadian scenery.

Gertrude, Berthe and Alice DesClayes and Mary Grant of Montreal Contribute Representative Works

Oils, watercolors and pastels by the talented sisters, Gertrude Des Claves, A.R.C.A., Berthe Des Claves and Alice Des Claves, A.R.C.A., and a group of paintings by Mary Grant make an interesting exhibition at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. The work is varied in subject matter, the greatest versatility being shown by Miss Berthe who, besides straight landscape with figures and vehicles, shows aptitude when it comes to quaysides with shipping. Portraiture and figures occupy Miss Gertrude, while Miss Alice Des Claves reveals marked ability in painting horses. Rocky coasts and the rolling sea make the strongest appeal to Mary Grant.

It is a cheerful show and the work reveals sincere effort on the part of the painters to translate beauty in terms of paint. On Saturday, when there was a good attendance at the galleries, some of the paintings from overseas had not been hung, but what was on the walls was representative and in every way worthy of the place these painters have won for themselves in Montreal and elsewhere.

Gertrude Des Claves, A.R.C.A., is particularly happy in her treatment of young womanhood as is evidenced in "Cherry"—an attractive girl in a red hat holding a bunch of flowers, and in "The Blue Bonnet," a spirited pastel of a blonde child. There is also an ably handled portrait of a woman in a red blouse holding a cat. In her group of work, too, is the capital original study for "Little Nipper"—a coster boy with a big cap askew near a pile of vegetables.

SOME EFFECTIVE LANDSCAPES.
Berthe Des Claves loves landscapes, which she finds attractive at all seasons of the year. Her interpretations of the wooded country in the autumn are particularly happy in the management of vivid hues, her treatment of flaming maples being effective and true. This ability to keep the key high and be convincing is clearly shown in "Golden Autumn in Quebec"—a typical rural scene with a man plowing near a farmhouse and outbuildings. The trees are in vivid autumn leaf and in the distance is a glimpse of river and blue hills. "Gathering Autumn Leaves"—figures beneath trees, with river and distant hills is another work true of the season. "On the Steps to the Garden," and "In the Rose Garden" have capably painted children, the latter especially being charged with the glare of a summer day. Of a more grim season is "A Bright March Morning Near Como," with its convincing impression of crisp atmosphere which envelopes the distant house, the sleigh and the row of trees which are mirrored in thawed pools at the edge of the road. "The Road to Carillon, Winter," is another sparkling work with sleighs on the road near a house above the ice-bound river which shows signs of breaking up. "The Village of Como, Winter," is a convincing interpretation of a brisk day. Clouds float in the blue sky and a sleigh travels the snowy road. The close of a winter day is well suggested in "Evening Light, Near Como," with its houses glowing with the last rays of the sun. Of the winter group, "An Old Courtyard in the City" sets a high mark with the tumble-down stable catching the slanting sun at the end of a shadowed yard where a man tends a horse and sleigh.

Of another land is the sympathetically handled "Crocus Time in the Woods," with the blue blooms brightening the grass beneath trees and a glimpse of distant stream. The versatility of this painter is shown in the acceptable manner in which she interprets the atmosphere of the seashore in "The Fishing Boat," and "The Blue Ship" where the fishing craft is moored at a wharf topped by old buildings. "By the Sea" shows two girls seated on a rock backed by a stretch of water.

HORSES ARE FAVORED.
Alice Des Claves, A.R.C.A., has seized the atmosphere of rolling rugged country in "Hunting on Dartmoor." Here huntsmen and hounds gallop across the grassy waste beneath a hill to the consternation of the wild ponies, two of which are hurrying to the side of two others that view the intrusion of their domain with dismay. Dartmoor ponies on their native heath provide the subjects for several effective works. "April Sunshine" is a truly English rural scene—two horses being led through a field edged by trees, buildings and a hayrick. "Judging the Farmers' Cobs, Widdcombe Fair" is a peaceful scene. The spectators line a rail, the judges stand before the rank of mounted animals and in the background are old buildings and the tower of a church. There is spirited action in the horses drawing seaweed at Exmouth, Devonshire, the sea and distant cliffs being capably suggested. "Loading Kelp" is another beach scene which shows how sympathetic Miss Alice is to this type of subject. Her skill in watercolor is evident in the broadly handled "Ploughing, England."

Mary Grant is most successful in "Rocks and Kelp"—massive rocks being bombarded with heavy waves, and she shows some subtle passages of tone in "Light Fog at Eastport," where wharves and boats under sails are being enveloped in vapor. "The Canal" features lake carriers and wharf sheds. A faintly rosy cloud marks the sky in the painting of rocks and foamy sea in "Incoming Tide," and "Overhauling the Boats, St. Andrews" shows men at work on a canted craft on the beach. The arrangement is good and the subject interesting. In the main, this painter imparts the suggestion of solidity to her rocks and weight and motion to her turbulent seas. The exhibition is announced to remain open until October 26.

Painted Pottery Culture and "Dragon" Bone Inscriptions
Described by Bishop
W. C. White

Study of material obtained by archaeological work in China has thrown a flood of light on Chinese culture of early days, and has made it possible to carry authentic Chinese history far back into the second millenium, B.C., instead of the ninth century, B.C., the Women's Art Society was told yesterday at its opening meeting in Stevenson Hall by the Right Rev. W. C. White, who was for 25 years Bishop of Honan, China. He is now keeper of the Eastern Treasure House of the Royal Ontario Museum, Toronto.

In a collection that arrived from Honan only last week, said Bishop White, there were pottery shards showing the "meander" made familiar by Greek design. These indicate that the "meander" may not have originated in Greece or the Near East, but in China. There are also pieces of carved stone and jade.

Traces of a culture hitherto unknown there were found in the Western part of Honan province—shards of the same painted pottery culture as has been discovered in the Danubian region, in Persia and the southern steppes. The last conclusion is that this culture originated in the southern steppes and that when the people were scattered, they took it east and west with them.

In 1914, said Bishop White, a Canadian, the Rev. J. W. Menzies, noticed a whitish powder when walking over fields. He unearthed bones and pottery shards, discovering the source of the inscriptions on the so-called "dragon bones." He now has a collection of about 50,000 inscribed bones or fragments, which have carried the authoritative history of China back to the period from 1700 to 1400 B.C.

In the new culture which was brought to light there were bronze castings of the second millenium, B.C., and inscriptions on ox, deer and tiger bones and on the plastrons of tortoiseshell, the latter indicating that at that time there were geomancers in China. The inscriptions on the tortoise plastrons—the under part of the shell, record the divinations of the geomancers. One in his possession, said Bishop White, records the augury that "the lotus will not come," a prophecy of drought.

Some of the early designs indicate that elephants were indigenous to China in those days. Bronzes of beautiful shape are wonderful in technique and some are inlaid with turquoise and lacquer, just as enamel was used later in cloisonne. There have been some remarkable finds of carved stone.

EARLIER ART DESTROYED.

Many of the tombs of early times have been found to have been broken into, and bronze articles hacked with axes. This is explained by the antipathy to the old dynasty, said Bishop White. Nothing of the Shang dynasty was retained by the Chou dynasty, and in turn the Ts'in dynasty destroyed the books, musical instruments and ceremonial vessels of the Chou dynasty and set out to form a new type of civilization.

Discovery of eight tombs, material from which fills a room in the museum at Toronto, was described by the speaker. The workers bored down into the earth and sank shafts, coming to thick alternate layers of charcoal and pebbles, then to two layers of timber, and finally to the tomb, about forty feet square and slightly deeper. Very little of skeletal remains and of coffins were found, but the archaeologists discovered beautiful carved jade. Frescoes of lacquer, in color, having medallions covered with silver or gold, and inlay, were in the tombs.

Lantern slides, nearly all being of objects in the Royal Ontario Museum, were shown by Bishop White.

Mrs. W. A. Gifford, the president, introduced Bishop White and Mrs. C. L. Henderson thanked him for his address.

SCENES OF ICELAND
BY EMILE WALTERS

Canadian-born Painter Exhibits in Eaton's Fine Art Galleries

REFRESHING COLORIST

Artist to Earn Study Fees
Punched Cattle and Played
Semi-Professional Baseball in Canada

Paintings of Iceland by the Canadian-born artist, Emile Walters, are attracting attention in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. It is the first time that a comprehensive show of the distinctly individual scenery of this volcanic island in the North Atlantic has been held here, and that they are characteristic and true is vouched for by Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the explorer, in a foreword to the catalogue in which he says the paintings by Walters are first hand impressions.

Over twenty works are on view and in them Mr. Walters shows himself to be well equipped as a designer and a colorist. His composition, in the main, is effective and his color vivid and clean. His artistic outlook veers towards the moderately modern and the type of landscape chosen enables him to indulge his bent without contortion or exaggeration. Where he seems to have deliberately essayed the decorative he has rather marred the general effect, as in the sky in "The Glazier Blink," where the mannered bands of pink and grey in the greenish sky above mountains of odd form do not improve an otherwise striking painting.

IMPRESSIVE MOUNT HEKLA

For pure impressiveness "Mount Hekla," the massive volcanic peak, sets a high standard. The noble mountain, streaked with snow, towers above the gullied plain in which there are glimpses of water. Dramatic and bold in handling is "The Approaching Storm (Kalfstindar)," with its snowy peaks under a cloudy sky. Another striking work is "April Thaw, Eastern Iceland," where the snow-patched plain are distinctly decorative. The full glare of strong sunlight is well suggested in "The Old Wall, Plains of Parliament," a work that is marked by a distant mountain of a beautiful luminous blue. Blue, grey and silver are the dominant tones in "Mount Hengill," the snow-clad mountain being reflected in ice-dotted water. "Plains of Parliament" is effective in design—distant massive mountain, water, rocky bays and a patch of land, amidst sinuous channels, houses and a church. Houses and a church figure in "Country Parsonage"—a landscape with hills and a blue stream in the foreground. "Late Autumn" is a strongly handled landscape with rocky hills that rise above marshland dotted with stones, water and tinted vegetation. "Almannagja North"—a rocky gorge with river is impressive, and effective in a decorative way is "Mount Skelfill." Sunlit birches screen green plain, river and a ridge in "Icelandic Springtime," and "The Sentinel (Eyjafjallajokull)" is solidly painted.

Emile Walters spent seven months in Iceland last year, and the exhibitions of his paintings in New York and Philadelphia excited wide interest. The catalogue states that to pay his fees in the Chicago Art Institute and the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Mr. Walters spent six months punching cattle, and playing semi-professional baseball in Canada. His paintings have place in the permanent collections of many museums and galleries in Canada and the United States.

The exhibition is due to close on November 2.

Exhibition of Pictures by Four Women

Star Oct. 18/35

The pictures of the three sisters, Gertrude, Alice and Berthe Des Clayes have been shown here in recent years in studio exhibitions. Their work can be much better seen now in an exhibition, which is being held in the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke street, of pictures by the three sisters, together with a few marine pictures by Mary Grant.

Portraiture is represented by the work of Miss Gertrude Des Clayes, by whom there are a number of studies of heads of girls and children. A pastel drawing of a little girl, "Little Primavera" is a bright and charming piece of decoration in light colors, without shadows or much form. An oil picture of an Irish boy is well painted but rather too pretty to be boyish. Some of the smaller studies are better than these. A little sketch for a larger picture, which was shown here last year, of a coster-boy in "pearlies" is good.

The specialty of Miss Alice Des Clayes is the painting of horses and ponies, and she has here a number of small sketches and studies of a kind which she has made familiar. Among her larger pictures there are a nice quiet one of a man ploughing, and one of a group of ponies on Dartmoor. A similar Dartmoor group appears in a picture of a boat, which is full of sunlight and gay color, and there are more horses in the striking composition of Widecombe Fair.

The work of Miss Berthe Des Clayes is better known here than that of her sisters and most of the pictures and sketches which she is showing are of places in this part of Canada. She has always made much of the reds and yellows of Canadian autumn, and they are conspicuous in many of her pictures in this exhibition. A group of trees near Melbourne, Que., is a blaze of color, but the reds are even more telling, by contrast with sober greens and brown earth in a picture of a man ploughing, an attractive color composition. There is also plenty of color, of a quieter kind in the snow scenes, which are here, and especially in a view of a village street, to which trees, shop windows and sleighs all

An exhibition of "Travel Sketches" by Lorne E. Marshall will be opened in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal next Saturday, Oct. 19th; it consists of water colors and other drawings made in Europe and elsewhere. Mr. Marshall who is a Bachelor of Architecture holds the Booth Fellowship of the University of Michigan and the Ryerson and Lake Forest Fellowships of Lake Forest College, Ill.

The three pictures have lately been received as gifts by the Art Association of Montreal.

A self-portrait by the Canadian painter, William Sawyer (1820-1889) has been given by his son, A. D. Sawyer. The picture is dated 1883.

A good example of the work of another Canadian, F. A. Verner, A.R.C.A. (1836-1928) has been given by Miss Isabel McLennan. This is a lake scene, with a war party of Indians in canoes.

contribute. Among her pictures are two very happy studies of children in gardens and particularly in the one in which the child is surrounded by a flood of sunlight. Other garden sketches are very effective, and some of English wildflowers, bluebells and others.

Marine pictures, seas and boats, are the things by which Mary Grant's work is best known, and by which she is best represented in this exhibition. There are a few inland pictures, of the Laurentians and other places, but they are decidedly less successful than her sea pictures. One of the best of these is of a dock and boats in a mist at Eastport, which is full of true seaside atmosphere; another of boats being overhauled at St. Andrew's is also rather successful. With these are several studies of waves breaking against rocks, full of movement and of striking contrasts between the reds of the rocks and the colors of the sea.

THE WEEK'S REVIEW OF ART

Star Oct. 26/35

The French Gallery of London has sent many good exhibitions to Montreal. A collection, from this gallery, of pictures which have to be sold owing to the death of one of the partners is being shown at Kearns' on University street, where they are to be sold this evening. They are modern pictures—British, French, Dutch and Canadian. The Canadian pictures are led by four scenes in Canada by W. H. Bartlett, who made so many valuable records of things in this country which have disappeared. There are three good work by Kriegerhoff, one of them a small but excellent river scene, and a large water colour by O. R. Jacob. Of more recent works there are two early works by Maurice Cullen, two early, green, landscapes by Homer Watson and two good examples of Archibald Browne. Among many good examples by British painters are works by Linell and Hughes-Stanton. French and Dutch pictures are in a majority. Mauve, Bosboom and Scherwitz are well represented and there are interesting works by Carriere, Boudin, Frere and Le Sidaner.

Many fine Persian carpets have been seen in Montreal, and there are more in a collection which is being shown by J. E. Tourangeau in the Mayor Building. There are just under a hundred of these and they represent many styles and periods of Persian carpet weaving, with some very fine examples. Every one can admire these carpets, but, to those who have the right understanding there is much more to be seen in them than beauties of design and colour. The owner of these carpets, Mr. C. R. Mayer, who collected them in Persia, is a student of Persian art, who has lectured in many places on the subject, and, as he explains them, the carpets have a new and greater interest. He has much to tell about the symbolism of the designs, about the methods of weaving and the places where it is done, of the materials used and of the developments which have taken place at different times in the methods of dyeing which produced the play of colour in the more recent carpets, and he makes the carpets in his collection into illustrations of the history of Persian art.

A group of sketches by Miss Mabel May, A.R.C.A., is being shown in a new place, the Green Jug Tea-room on Victoria Street, where they can be quite well seen. Most of them are sketches, made out of doors, with excellent colour and suggestions of design, but there are also one or two larger pictures, in one of which, "Sunshine and Shadow" there is a good pattern of tree trunks. A small portrait study is interesting and there are also some flower studies which are among the best things in the exhibition.

involved the sending of $5,295,334 out of Canada and, the statement said, curiously enough, while Canada has prolific fishery resources, the Dominion, last year, imported fish to the value of $1,251,065. Imported books, printed matter, stationery and educational supplies cost Canadians $9,868,733, while Canadian families expended over $1,000,000 on boots and shoes, notwithstanding the fact that the manufacture of shoes is one of the principal industries in this country. Gloves and mitts to the value of $1,507,562 and handkerchiefs costing over $1,000,000 were brought into Canada, while kitchen equipment worth $1,225,802 and recreation equipment and supplies valued at $296,632 were imported during that period.

These are just a few instances, the statement said, of imports which show that Canadians might well, to their own profit, give more attention to the importance of giving preference to Produced in Canada materials whether they be from the farm, mine, forest or factory, providing price and quality are at least equal with those of merchandise brought in from abroad.

FINE ARTS GALLERY EXHIBIT NOW READY

Gazette Nov. 6/35
Selection of Paintings Made for National Produced in Canada Show

While the eighth annual National Produced in Canada Exhibition does not officially open until Wednesday evening when Hon. W. D. Euler, Dominion Minister of Trade and Commerce, will deliver the opening address, the doors of the exhibition's Gallery of Fine Arts will open for a private showing tonight.

Over the week-end the selection of paintings accepted by the committee and representing the work of more than 30 Quebec artists was hung in the exhibition gallery. Under the new gallery system introduced this year, paintings are arranged in panels, each panel containing the three works of a single artist.

Among those who have been invited to attend the preview tonight are: the exhibiting artists and friends, the executive of the Produced in Canada Association (Quebec), Inc., sponsors of the exhibition, Sir Edward Beatty, Chancellor of McGill University, and Principal Morgan, of McGill, the principal of the University of Montreal and of L'Ecole des Beaux Arts, Hon. C. H. Cahan, former Secretary of State; R. S. White, M.P., Mayor Camillien Houde, B. W. Keightley, president of the Association of Canadian Advertisers, representatives of leading industrial exhibitors and others.

Statistical proof that Canadians should give more attention to the advisability of purchasing products of the Dominion in preference to those from foreign countries is included in a statement released from the headquarters of the Produced in Canada Association (Quebec), Inc., on Saturday, in connection with Produced in Canada week now being observed.

Imports for consumption during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1934, taken from government figures, show that in that period, farm products to the value of $69,292,065 were brought into Canada, and a big proportion of these are basic raw materials such as Canadian farms produce. Sketches by An Architect In Europe

A very attractive collection of "Travel Sketches" by Lorne E. Marshall is being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. A few of these are in water color, but the larger and better part of the collection is of drawings in black and white, in pencil or crayon. Mr. Marshall is a Montreal architect, who has won fellowships at several American universities, and his drawings show a sound architectural vision of the places, chiefly streets and buildings, which he has drawn. In most of them there is a sort of simple directness, with emphasis on large forms and masses of light and shade, and with only little detail. Mr. Marshall's travels seem to have taken him over much of southern and western Europe; the best of his drawings are of places in Italy, though there are many very good ones of Spain and France, too. His drawings are all small but his treatment of them has got some big effects and made them into interesting pictures. The water colors are larger and very striking by the vividness of the coloring and the freedom with which they are painted. A very few washes of color are made to tell a great deal and some of them give a very good idea of the color possibilities of the newest types of architectural construction which are being used in Europe.

Iceland in Pictures by Emile Walters

Emile Walters has found in Iceland a new field for painting, and he has made good use of it, as appears in his pictures which are now being shown in Eaton's galleries. It is, as he shows it, a country of big plain surfaces of meadows and mountains. There are green fields and sunshine and peaceful valleys, some of which are not altogether unlike pieces of Canadian scenery, without Canada's abundance of trees. But the more striking pictures show Iceland as a volcanic country, with strangely broken rocks and big, blocky mountains, of odd shapes; pictures of places which look like the right sort of background for some of the brutal stories of the Icelandic Sagas. Snow mountains are striking features of several pictures, but all these pictures show Iceland in summer, when it does not live up to its name, and Mr. Walters shows it as a hard country, in which rock does not seem to be far below the grass of the meadows. Mr. Walters' plain and simple method of painting quite fits his subjects; there are only a few of the pictures in which the tinting seems too plain to be probable or give a true impression of the form and color of the country. And the pictures are interesting not only in themselves, but also for the scenes which they show.

MONTREAL PAINTERS SHOWS GOOD WORK

Gazette Oct. 29/35
Eric Riordon Has Comprehensive Exhibition at The Continental Galleries
EUROPE AND QUEBEC

Young Artist Finds Congenial Material in Italy, Switzerland and Austria—Sympathetic to Laurentians

Eric Riordon of Montreal shows himself to be a young painter of great promise in his first representative exhibition of oils and pastels being held in the Continental Galleries of Fine Art, 1310 St. Catherine street west. His talent was evident to juries of selection at the Paris Salon in 1933 and 1934, and Toronto picture-lovers were enthusiastic over his offerings at a show held there earlier this year, but the present exhibition reveals the most comprehensive collection yet shown to Montrealers. Europe and Canada have supplied him with material which has been interpreted with praiseworthy competence and sincerity.

Naturally, to the stay-at-homes the strongest appeal will probably be made by his scenes in this province, some of his happiest efforts being inspired by the Laurentian country north of Montreal. Here, with a natural facility in painting mountains, he has found a truly congenial sketching ground. While he is by no means bound to any one season, Mr. Riordon appreciates to the full the beauty of winter.

Mr. Riordon knows what will make a picture, composes well and uses clean color in a confident manner. His drawing at all times is adequate, and he is content to set down Nature as it appears to the average spectator.

PASTELS OF THE NORTH

Among the pastels, which are handled in a crisp, decisive way, two sound examples are "Moonrise on the Cache River," and "Sunrise on the North River." In the former, the top of a massive timbered mountain catches the golden glow of the setting sun, while over its shoulder the pale moon swings up. The base of the snow-patched mountain is in deep shadow which envelopes the bush at its base and the birch and spruce on the ice-edged banks of the winding stream. The cold water with its reflections catches a rosy flush. In the second pastel the yellow of breaking day bands the sky above hills and throws into relief spruces that rise from the shore edging free and frozen water, while above the hills thin clouds are scattering. There is a convincing sense of bulk and solidity in the rock-faced hill with its snow-clad ledges in shadow. "Moonrise at Sunset, Cache River" is another poetic interpretation with shadowed hills, their timbered tops aglow with the setting sun.

"Winter Afternoon," a confidently painted oil, was one of his exhibits at the Salon, and is distinctly typical of this province—house and barn in a valley, with nearby mountain throwing shadow, distant snow-clad hills and, in the foreground, a bit of open water below deep banks, and bushes laden with snow. It is a convincing impression of a sunny winter day in a lovely region. "Near St. Sauveur," with its skiers, rolling meadows and distant hills aglow with sunlight under a blue sky with floating clouds, is another typical interpretation of a winter day. "Evening in November" has fine distant hills and bush in sunlight and shadow, with spruce and birches rising above the ice-edged water in the foreground. "Evening Sun, Shawbridge Country" is a good arrangement of sunlight and shadow with hills, spruces and figures on the snowy trail. "Spring in the Laurentian Foothills" shows an expanse of rolling country stretching to a line of hills over one end of which clouds break in rain. "Autumn near Ste. Adele"—hills, clumps of birches in fall leaf and a brook winding into the shadowed foreground—is an attractive work. In "Spring Near St. Jovite" clouds float above a hill at the base of which are houses dominated by the spire of a church.

WORKS FROM EUROPE

The works from Europe are varied in subject. Important among them are "Peaceful Valley, Switzerland"—well-painted snowy peaks in sunlight and shadow with ambered, grassy slopes rising from the valley; "In the Austrian Tyrol," which features a large building in a snowy expanse above which peaks tower into the blue sky; another scene of like title in which mist and clouds mingle at high altitude; "Moonlight Over Oetz Valley, Austria," in which the lofty snow-clad peaks gleam against the dark sky. Other scenes include views of La Maggiore, "Villa d'Este, Tivoli," "Sunrise Off the Brittany Coast," with two schooners pointed for a distant shore; La Madeleine, Paris; Notre Dame and a Bridge, Paris; "Off the Coast of France," with distant lighthouse and a gentle breaking in waves; "December Evening, Paris," with a suggestion of moist atmosphere, lights, and figures; and some church interiors. Nearer at home is "Tide in the Gulf"—a steamer in the water, gulls and the light distant shore.

According to present arrangements the exhibition will remain on view until November 8.

WATERCOLOR EXHIBIT—Oct. 24/35

Collection at Arts Club Is Exciting Interest

More than usual interest is being vouchsafed the exhibition of watercolors now on display at the Arts Club, 2027 Victoria street, judging from the many requests for cards of admission which the committee is receiving daily.

The majority of the exhibits, which number 55 in all, are landscapes of rural Quebec, many of the scenes depicting beauty spots of the St. Lawrence and Laurentian districts.

Visiting hours for friends of members are from 10 a.m. to 12 noon and from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. week days as well as after 3 p.m. on Sundays. The exhibition, which continues until October 24, is closed to visitors on Saturdays.

The exhibition of water-colors is complemented by a corridor exhibition of the sketches of Frank Downey.

Among those showing watercolors are H. Simpkins, T. Topham, J. Beckwith, H. L. Smith, Graham Norwell, Lincoln Morris, J. M. Miller, A. C. Leighton, C. Douglas, Bagley and James Crockart.

MAPLE LEAVES POUR IN

Annual Competition Attracting Considerable Interest

With hundreds of magnificent fall-hued maple leaves being entered for the annual competition under the auspices of the Canadian Government, through the Canadian Travel Bureau at Ottawa, in co-operation with the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and with perfect fall weather giving an added incentive to the city dwellers to holiday and week-end in the countryside, interest in this nation-wide competition is said to be rapidly establishing new high records. The competition closes on November 1, and the judges, Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., Edwin H. Holgate, A.R.C.A., Hal Ross Perrigard, A.R.C.A., and James Crockart, president, Montreal Chapter, Guild of Canadian Commercial Artists, have been selected. They will commence their work immediately after the close of the competition, and will decide the winners of the prize money, which this year totals $200.

THE ART OF CHARLEBOIS

Sir,—I had the pleasure to view specimens of the late J. Charlebois' illuminated addresses and other works of his art only a few days ago. Never have I seen finer and more artistic work in the various museums or private collections in this country or Europe. Now as a memorial to Charlebois' memory I am sure we in Canada would do him a great favor if his executors would present a sample of his work to be preserved for posterity in the Art Gallery.

THIRTY YEARS AGO

Montreal.—At the galleries of the Art Association on Saturday was opened an exhibition of paintings, water colors and pastels, the work of John Hammond, R.C.A., Maurice Cullen, A.R.C.A., Laura Muntz, A.R.C.A., and William Brymner, R.C.A. The exhibition, including seventy-five pictures and filling the four walls of the new gallery, was viewed by many members of the association and their friends, and the almost unanimous opinion was that a great deal of the work was not only of high order, but was in fact, about the best that these artists have ever shown.

MUSEUM PIECES DECLARED FAKES

Gazette Nov. 4/35

Archaeologist Says Cretan
Frauds on Display in Toronto, Chicago, Pittsburgh

Baltimore, November 3.—(P)—Dr. David M. Robinson, professor of archaeology at Johns Hopkins University, declared today there are Cretan frauds in the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto and the Field Museum in Chicago, and that 40 to 50 per cent. of Etruscan art in the Carnegie Museum in Pittsburgh is fraudulent.

Dr. Robinson did not say how many historical pieces at Toronto and Chicago he believes to be fakes. He amplified only with the statement that he thinks both collections may be the work of Enrico Pennelli, a dealer who has been charged with having foisted a fake sarcophagus on the British Museum.

At the same time Dr. Robinson said there are numerous other fraudulent relics of that period in leading museums in the United States.

Dr. Robinson was the archaeologist who unearthed the Greek city of Olynthus in 1928.

"As for the Carnegie 'Etruscans,'" Dr. Robinson said, "anyone who is familiar with the art can tell by merely looking at the photographs of the pieces that they are fakes. I am certain of it. There are certain combinations that go to show they are not authentic."

Pictures of the Sea By A. Bercovitch

Make Fine Display
Star Oct. 31/35

Painting in a new field, Alexander Bercovitch has produced some of the best and most striking work that he has done in the collection of sea pictures which is being shown in Eaton's galleries. These are studies of shore, sea and weather at Perce and other places on the Gaspé coast. — fairly large oil pictures, broadly, even roughly, painted but most effective. They are tremendous in colour, every colour that the sea can be, and, in one case at any rate, Mr. Bercovitch has invented a new colour for the sky, — a splendid blue, if rather unexpected in this latitude. Perce Rock insists in getting into nearly every picture that is painted in its neighbourhood, and it is here several times, but in a rather new aspect in some of the pictures; Bonaventure Island also comes in, and forms a most useful background or a sort of nucleus for effects of weather and sea.

Mr. Bercovitch has caught the sea in almost every kind of mood that it can be expected to have on the Gaspé coast. There is a delightful view along the shore in warm sunlight with a calm sea, another of Bonaventure Island half hidden by clouds with white caps on the waves; several effects of sunlight on broken and moving water; some are less distinguished, of moonlight on the water; all kinds of wind and weather and always plenty of good colour, and the freedom and directness of the painting helps the effects.

Two sketches of heads, which are in this exhibition, are interesting as studies of flesh against brilliant sea-blue backgrounds. Some Montreal street scenes and two large interiors are some of Mr. Bercovitch's best work, but are put into the shade by the sea pictures, which are the chief features of a striking exhibition.

Gazette Nov. 4/35

Selection of Paintings Made for National Produced in Canada Show

While the eighth annual National Produced in Canada Exhibition does not officially open until Wednesday evening when Hon. W. D. Euler, Dominion Minister of Trade and Commerce, will deliver the opening address, the doors of the exhibition's Gallery of Fine Arts will open for a private showing tonight.

Over the week-end the selection of paintings accepted by the committee and representing the work of more than 30 Quebec artists was hung in the exhibition gallery. Under the new gallery system introduced this year, paintings are arranged in panels, each panel containing the three works of a single artist.

Among those who have been invited to attend the preview tonight are the exhibiting artists and friends, the executive of the Produced in Canada Association (Quebec), Inc., sponsors of the exhibition, Sir Edward Beatty, Chancellor of McGill University, and Principal Morgan, of McGill, the principal of the University of Montreal and of L'Ecole des Beaux Arts, Hon. C. H. Cahon, former Secretary of State; R. S. White, M.P., Mayor Camillien Houde, B. W. Keightley, president of the Association of Canadian Advertisers, representatives of leading industrial exhibitors and others.

Statistical proof that Canadians should give more attention to the advisability of purchasing products of the Dominion in preference to those from foreign countries is included in a statement released from the headquarters of the Produced in Canada Association (Quebec), Inc., on Saturday, in connection with Produced in Canada week now being observed.

Imports for consumption during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1934, taken from government figures, show that in that period, farm products to the value of $69,292,065 were brought into Canada, and a big proportion of these are basic raw materials such as Canadian farms produce. Importation of breadstuffs involved the sending of $5,295,334 out of Canada and, the statement said, curiously enough, while Canada has prolific fishery resources, the Dominion, last year, imported fish to the value of $1,251,065. Imported books, printed matter, stationery and educational supplies cost Canadians $9,868,733, while Canadian families expended over $1,000,000 on boots and shoes, notwithstanding the fact that the manufacture of shoes is one of the principal industries in this country. Gloves and mitts to the value of $1,507,562 and handkerchiefs costing over $1,000,000 were brought into Canada, while kitchen equipment worth $1,225,802 and recreation equipment and supplies valued at $296,632 were imported during that period.

These are just a few instances, the statement said, of imports which show that Canadians might well, to their own profit, give more attention to the importance of giving preference to Produced in Canada materials whether they be from the farm, mine, forest or factory, providing price and quality are at least equal with those of merchandise brought in from abroad.

BERCOVITCH SHOWS PAINTINGS OF GASPE

Montreal Artist Displays
Skill in Exhibition at
Eaton Galleries

Alexandre Bercovitch, the Montreal artist who in his previous exhibitions has shown partiality to buildings, street scenes and vistas of the local port, has gone to the sea for inspiration, and the product of a sketching tour in the Gaspé region is now being shown in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal.

Mr. Bercovitch is not afraid to use paint, and, while some might like more evidence of subtlety of tone, there is no denying that his direct, vigorous treatment of the famous rock at differing hours and in varying weather has resulted in a sculpturesque solidity that befits the subject. There are evidences of unevenness in the works that occupy two galleries, and where some of the paintings fall short it is through simple causes that could be corrected—confusion of brushwork and slight errors in tone. On the whole it is an interesting show. It manifests considerable industry and shows that this painter is still exploring the possibilities of the medium.

SOME ATTRACTIVE WORKS.

Among the outstanding works must be mentioned "Silver Waters, Bonaventure," with fog partly screening the island and the grey-green sea breaking in waves upon the beach. There is much fine color in "Sunrise, Perce," with the sky splashed with gold and crimson, the fishing craft being sheltered by the noble rock. "Moonlight, Perce" is imposing in design but the treatment of the sky is not too happy. Rocks and cliffs about Port Daniel have made interesting subjects, and rows of waves have a decorative value in the grim, grey painting called "A Rainy Day." There is ominous threat in "Before the Storm"—spruce-topped cliffs under a leaden sky, and the impression of glittering sun-lit waves is well suggested in the beach scene with automobile, trailer and a painter sketching, called "The American Artist."

Included in the show are a good portrait of a young woman; a girl's head, entitled "The Irish Visitor," and a vase of flowers—vigorously painted asters topped by a lace curtain with a glimpse of sea and shipping beyond. In color, form and arrangement this is from all angles satisfying. Two street scenes reveal the artist's ability in this type of subject.

MUSEUMS SUPPLY SCIENTIFIC PICTURE

Director of Ontario Institution is Heard at Art Gallery

Museums can supply a great need in giving people a true scientific picture of life in the past. Dr. C. T. Currelly, director of the Ontario Museum of Archaeology laid particular emphasis on that point when speaking at the Art Gallery last night.

In his museum in Toronto he has made special effort to secure exhibits of dolls, tools, and models that give a graphic idea of how people went through the business of daily life in different periods in the past.

Dr. Currelly had taken as his subject the famous archaeological museum, which he has been instrumental in creating at Toronto.

It was just a coincidence that brought him in touch with George Crofts the famous expert on Chinese archaeology. Through him the Ontario museum has acquired some $10,000,000 worth of exhibits from the east.

GOVERNMENT INSTITUTION

Dr. Currelly went on to outline the provisions by which the continuity of the museum organization is assured. It is essentially a Government institution but the staff is appointed by the University of Toronto. The successor to Dr. Currelly will have to be a professor. Half the board is appointed by the University and the other half from the general public. In these ways political or other interference is avoided and the confidence of the public is held.

A series of lantern slides illustrated some of the exhibits.

F. Cleveland Morgan introduced the speaker.

MUSEUM OFFICIALS REPLY TO CHARGES

Ontario Chairman Cites Authority to Prove Cretan Objects Are Authentic

Toronto, November 4. — (P) — Officials of the Royal Ontario Museum here are satisfied its Cretan objects are authentic, J. B. O'Brien, chairman of the Board of Trustees, said today in commenting on a suggestion by Dr. D. M. Robinson, professor of archaeology at Johns Hopkins University, that the exhibits were spurious.

Mr. O'Brien described Dr. Robinson as "quite unconventional" and Prof. Homer Thompson, assistant curator of the museum and keeper of the classical collection, added: "He likes to make a fuss."

The museum had never had any dealings with Enrico Pennelli, the dealer who was charged by Dr. Robinson with foisting a fake sarcophagus on the British Museum and who was named as probably being responsible for the Cretan collection here, Mr. O'Brien said.

The major object in the Cretan group here, a gold and ivory statuette of the great mother goddess, "our lady of the sports," had been studied by the most outstanding master of Cretan antiquities, Sir Arthur Evans, who had it in his possession for some time for this purpose, the board chairman said. Sir Arthur considered it of such authenticity and importance that he published it in the Illustrated London News, describing it as the outstanding Cretan sculpture, Mr. O'Brien added.

"The statuette is unique, the outstanding one in the world," he asserted. "It is the outstanding specimen of Cretan statuary and ornamentation that has been recovered and has thrown a flood of light on Cretan religious beliefs and sports and recreation."

THIEF GOES TO PRISON AFTER BRIEF FREEDOM

Stole Valuables Including
$1,500 Oil Painting

Pleading guilty to stealing valuables, including an oil painting valued at $1,500, from the home of T. B. Macaulay, 3231 The Boulevard, on December 8, Paul Morin, who was only released from a 10-year penitentiary term in November, was this morning sentenced by Judge Hale, in the Westmount Court, to two years in the penitentiary.

The painting looted during the burglary was some five feet square and when Captain Broden and Constable Belec, of the Westmount Police, saw a man carrying a rolled canvas, on Sherbrooke street, on December 13, they questioned him. He said that the canvas had been given him by another man to sell, but on further investigation, at headquarters, broke down and confessed the burglary.

QUEBEC SCENES TO FORE

Oils on View Representative of Work of Best Known Provincial Artists—Canvases Reviewed

Part of the National Produced in Canada exhibition in the Sun Life Building is the Fine Arts Gallery, which was opened for private view last night and which, with its 80 or 90 pictures, mostly in oils, is representative of the work of the best-known Quebec artists and of some not so well-known. Adrien Hebert is there, Paul Caron, Robert Pilot, Wilfred Barnes, Albert H. Robinson, Sheriff Scott, F. S. Coburn, Edwin Holgate, John Lyman, Hal Ross, Perrigard, Prudence Heward, Lillias Torrence Newton, Sarah Robertson, Ann Savage, Mabel Lockerby, Harold Beament, the des Claves sisters and a great many others, some seen in only one work, none in more than three. For the most part, the paintings are of Quebec—the Laurentians, Gaspé, the Isle of Orleans, the streets of Montreal—although one or two painters have gone to Ontario for their subjects, one or two to England and one to war-time Ypres.

The committee's original intention of hanging the paintings in groups according to artists was not found feasible, but an attempt has been made to keep a unity in diversity and on the whole it is a comfortable, pleasant exhibition and although there are a few omissions, a comprehensive one.

Some of the canvases are familiar, as, for example, Holgate's violinist, Coburn's "La Danseuse Carlotto," and Mrs. Newton's portrait of Robert Mackay in a blue jersey. Of the other portraits, Adam Sheriff Scott's "Studio Visitor," a lady in a red dress and furs, is outstanding. Agnes Lefort seems happier in her landscapes. A. Bercovitch has done much more interesting work than the two heavily painted portraits which represent him.

Most of the landscapes are in romantic and even sentimental mood and there is nothing "modern" in any startling way; all the pictures are "the sort you can live with," though Sarah Robertson, in her lively handling of color masses; Mabel Lockerby, in her bright design, "The Old Pink House"; Mabel May, in her posterlike "Castle of Industry," harbor elevators and boats; and Ann Savage, in her broadly painted windy pine and sweeping hills of Georgian Bay, are more stylized than naturalistic. Prudence Heward has a spirited sketch of a house and tree, and Holgate's "Daisy Field, Perce," is a simplified landscape, solidly built and set down in suave, full color.

OTHER SCENES DEPICTED.

Adrien Hebert shows a bold pictorial harbor scene and an impression of the Chateau de Ramazay; T. Topham, two studies in blue, a ruin in Ypres and Montreal under moonlight, seen from the distance; there is an easy swing to A. Cloutier's hills and a more staccato movement to Moira Drummond's Laurentian undulations. John Lyman's most interesting contribution is "Coming out of Mass, Isle of Orleans." A good substantial painting is Pilot's headland and lighthouse, and also in the school of solid, academic painting is Barnes' "Lake." Perrigard's landscapes are colorful and glowing. Paul Earle's, vigorous; Albert H. Robinson's, ingratiating in rhythm and color; and Beament's full of atmosphere. Miriam Holland finds romance in fishing smacks; Alice des Claves, in English rural scenes; Berthe des Claves paints an impression of Dominion Square, and Gertrude des Claves, contributes bright-eyed, wide-awake children. Kathleen Morris has a blithe child-like way of handling a barnyard or a city street.

Other painters represented include: H. L. Smith, Mrs. Percival, David McGill, Miss Grant, D. A. J. Pavitt, Jean Munro, Rita Mount and C. Kelsey.

In the small water color section, Paul Caron shows familiar corners and picturesque horses, and H. J. Simpkins, Quebec landscapes. James Beckwith has a very amusing observation of character in "The Fair."

The committee in charge of the show consisted of F. S. Coburn, H. R. Perrigard, Paul Earle and Wilfred Barnes.

ROBINSON CHARGES ARE DUBBED 'SILLY'

Gazette Nov. 7/35

Dr. C. T. Currelly, of Ontario
Museum, Defends Cretan Objects

Toronto, November 6.—(C)—Dr. C. T. Currelly, curator of the archaeology section of the Ontario Museum, took up the defence of the museum's Cretan objects today with the suggestion that Dr. David Robinson, of Johns Hopkins University, who attacked their authenticity, was not an expert on Cretan affairs.

"There have been some statements about our Cretan collection and one or two were incorrect," Dr. Currelly remarked. "The collection consists only of two objects which makes the sweeping charge rather humorous or silly. However, we have a statuette which was sent to Sir Arthur Evans by its owner before we obtained it."

"Sir Arthur Evans is acknowledged everywhere as the foremost authority on Cretan affairs. He has spent his life on the work and 90 per cent. of all the material found in Crete comes from his finds. He is the man who discovered the Cretan civilization. He is a practical man who studies objects, not books. In study by hand, one acquires far greater knowledge than in any other way."

"Since 1899 Sir Arthur has devoted his life and fortune in this work. He published a picture of this statuette in the Illustrated London News as one of the greatest finds in history and used it as the frontispiece of his "Palace of Minos," the most outstanding work on Cretan civilization ever written."

"Unfortunately, without ever seeing the statuette, Dr. Robinson wrote an article and, without knowing Sir Arthur vouched for it, wrote a criticism of our bulletin on the object. He said several scholars doubted it. I don't think more than three or four persons saw it before it came here. Robinson had never seen it himself, but in the meantime he had committed himself."

"David Robinson is a great authority on Greek vases," said Dr. Currelly. "But I don't know who would accept his authority in Cretan, any more than I'd accept the authority of an eye specialist on foot trouble."

"Robinson is a good man on another subject. But he makes statements outside his own field, unfortunately, altogether too frequently. He may do so and not imperil his position as an authority in his own field, just as the eye specialist cannot be upset in his specialty because of his utterances in chiropody. "It has become rather a fad of late by persons wishing publicity to attack something. I don't think any great museum at this moment is free from attacks on one or more objects, usually for publicity."

Dr. Currelly said he did not think Dr. Robinson made his charges with any malicious intention.

"But there is this about it," he commented. "If I were to say he were a forger myself and not David Robinson, he can't prove he is. The baby carriages may have been changed sometime and his nurse walked off with the wrong baby. I would ask how he could prove it didn't occur. It is absolutely impossible to prove anything, anything at all, not a forgery."

The Grand Canyon In Pictures by Charles W. Simpson Star Nov. 11/35

A most cheerful exhibition, full of light and color, is being held at the Arts Club, Victoria Street, of work by Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A. The pictures, in water color and body-color are some of the best that Mr. Simpson has ever done. A large part of them are views of the Grand Canyon and they evidently do full justice not only to the immense scale and the strange forms of the walls and hills of the canyon, but also and above all to the range of its coloring—every color of the rainbow from purple to red, and, surprising as the pictures are, they seem to convey the exact truth, as well as being admirably decorative.

Just as good, in a slightly different and rather more peaceful way, are Mr. Simpson's views of Perce and other places on the Gaspé coast. Every one paints Gaspé, but Mr. Simpson has translated it into new terms of color, which give the pictures a quality of freshness and airiness and make much of the size of the cliffs and rocks. These Gaspé pictures, perhaps even more than the Grand Canyon views, are made of fine sweeping color patterns. A few other pictures—a good one of a Gaspé schooner in harbor, and some of scenes in rural Quebec—are also in this gay collection, which brightens the Arts Club room in a remarkable way.

Alice Innes Reveals Practised
Hand in Work at
Eaton Galleries

Alice Innes, of Toronto, shows herself to be a capable painter of the Canadian scene in the exhibition of oils on view in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. Her choice of subject is good and her color is engaging. In the main, the works are of a size suitable for the average home, and on this scale she is more uniformly successful than in the few more ambitious canvases. Spring, autumn and winter are the seasons she favors, and she does them justice. In none of the paintings is there exaggeration of form or color—she sees nature with the eyes of the average spectator.

This Toronto painter seems particularly at home in her winter scenes—picturesque glimpses of hills, buildings and wooded landscape about Burks Falls. Here she has discovered much congenial material as in "Christmas, Burks Falls"—hill, house and barns under snow; "Snow Squall," with much the same pictorial element; "Hoar Frost" and "March." "The North Country"—snow, spruce and hills under a well-painted sky—worthily interprets its title, and "Open Water, Burks Falls" is another convincing transcription of this region. "Easter" with its wooded hills, ice-edged water, and dead reeds shows careful observation. Birches flaunt fresh green in "Spring, Stoney Lake," and this tree, which the artist paints excellently, figures in "Thompson's Dam"—a sunlit glimpse of rocks and rushing water. A convincing impression of wooded hills in autumn livery above a stretch of water is "Three Mile Lake." Among the larger paintings the most effective is "Winter Morning Sunshine," in which the birches on the shore in the foreground play a decorative part.

It is a distinctly interesting exhibition by this painter who has not held a "one-man" show here before, and the red stars on the frames indicate that her art is being appreciated by Montreal picture-lovers.

MAPLE LEAF PRIZE IS WON BY N.B. GIRL

Gloria Robertson, 14, Submits Finest Specimen—Largest from Vancouver

A perfectly formed leaf, vivid with the glories of a Canadian autumn, won for 14-year-old Gloria Robertson, Upper Dover, Westmorland County, N.B., first prize of $100 in the Most Beautiful Maple Leaf Competition conducted this year by the Canadian Government, through the Canadian Travel Bureau at Ottawa, in co-operation with the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways. With thousands of entries from all over Canada, the mounting and sorting of the exhibits was a tremendous task.

Second prize of $40.00 was won by a beautiful specimen entered by Mrs. J. A. D'Amours, of Matapedia, Que., and third prize of $20.00 was captured by another beauty from the Maritimes, entered by Miss Ruth McKay, Milford Station, N.S.

It was an artist's job picking the best of these perfectly shaped leaves, all beautifully colored by Nature's paintbrush, and well known Canadian artists acted as judges. They were Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., Edwin H. Holgate, A.R.C.A., Hal Ross, Perrigard, A.R.C.A., and James Crockett, president of the Montreal Chapter, Guild of Canadian Commercial Artists.

The competition for the largest maple leaf was won for the second successive year by Richard Chambers, 169 West Pender street, Vancouver, B.C., with a leaf 21½ by 19½ inches, or 235½ square inches. He receives a prize of $30. This was the biggest leaf ever received, Mr. Chambers having won last year with a leaf of 226½ square inches which he secured by climbing a tree 40 feet high, although he was past 71 years of age at the time.

Second prize of $10 in this phase of the competition was won by Mrs. H. A. D. Whitaker, Wadsley P.O., West Vancouver, B.C., with a leaf 21 by 19 inches, or 203 square inches.

On Saturday next the prize winning leaves, together with a wide selection of the better entries will be put on exhibit on the fifth floor of Morgan's, St. Catherine street, Montreal.

There were so many fine leaves entered, rivaling the winners for beauty, that some hundreds of them have been selected and mounted in panels for display at many points in the country. They will be started on their tour with the prize winners after the display at Morgan's.

Large Canvases and Group of Sketches

At this late date, it is a strange thing to go into a gallery of A. Y. Jackson's paintings and see people being shocked and hear them utter such exclamations as: "Did you ever see purple snow?" When will they learn to go about with their eyes open? If the French impressionists could do nothing to make them bestir themselves and really look at things, one might have expected that their own painters, their Tom Thomson, Jackson, Lismer, MacDonald and Lawren Harris, would have jolted them out of their laziness and prejudice. It is not surprising that they were shocked by the Group of Seven at first, but they have had years to grow used to the Group's way of looking at the Canadian landscape, they have had years to verify the interpretation by their own experience in the hills and woods. Why do they go on being affronted? And affronted is the word, for it is curious the way people have of being indignant about paintings, as if they said: "How dare you insult our intelligence and our eyesight! We don't see nature like that." The answer remains, of course: "The more's the pity. Think of what you are missing!"

Not everyone who went to the galleries of W. Scott and Sons on Drummond street, over the weekend, was shocked, for Jackson is a painter of authority; he is no experimentalist; he has a secure place; and Montreal is not made up entirely of Philistines. Nor is it a matter of reputation. The show—29 large canvases and a dozen sketches—is an important one. We do not often see so many Jacksons together.

FINE USE OF COLOR

It stands to reason it is stimulating; the very fact that it can excite indignation is evidence of that. It is stimulating, first of all, because Jackson finds the Canadian landscape stimulating. If the Philistines don't let them look at Dutch canals! Stimulating in light and color. As in those high-keyed, brilliantly lit paintings: "Evening, Les Eboulements," "The Sawmill, St. Tite," "The Stream," "St. Hilaireon," in the biting "Muskeg" and in the currents of fire that stream through the hills of "October Evening." Jackson uses color courageously, daringly, but wisely and, as often as not, soberly. Many of his Laurentian paintings are subdued, even dull, and most of the landscapes he brought back from the Arctic are in low key, lit up only by a gleam of ice or a flash of sky or water. "Woods in Early Spring," with its pattern of vertical tree-trunks, is seen almost through a veil; it was painted some years ago, but even in his most recent work, Jackson never lets color run away with him; what could be quieter in color than the rocks and the Eskimo hut in the Pangnirtung "Summer" or the mossy stones in the Baffin Island "Grey Day"?

The exciting quality in A. Y. Jackson's landscape is rhythm. Clouds, hills, roads, how the earth swirls! It is not only the keen Canadian light and "the purple snow" that makes "Evening, Les Eboulements" stimulating. The little houses are whirled in a fast eddy of hills. In the Quebec street, the shapes tumble in a torrent; the road writhes in "La Maison Abandonnée"; Cape Hotham of Cornwallis Isle goes riding out to sea, followed by a wake of small icebergs; skies crawl or are whipped up into a lather of clouds. All is movement.

At the same time, all is equilibrium. Sometimes the speed is almost dizzying; again—"Labrador Hills," "Labrador Coast," "Grey Day, Baffin Island"—the measure is slow and long and steady; but whichever it is, the movement is controlled, equilibrium is established. There is nothing flimsy or flurried about Jackson's painting. His hills are solidly built; his houses are as much part of the earth as his rocks. Everything flows together, everything is part of the earth; even the sky, whether it draw downwards in thick-ribbed clouds or appear to be thrown off by the persistence of the hills.

A. Y. Jackson is an experience not to be missed. The exhibition will be open until the end of the month. R.H.A.

In judging the leaves for beauty, the artists were faced with the best leaves contributed from every province of the Dominion in as wide a range of colors as would be found on an autumn drive through the country. The judging was done on shape symmetry, color harmony, and color range. Very few points separated the first three leaves.

J. M. R. Fairbairn, chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and C. B. Brown, chief engineer of the Canadian National Railway, were judges in the biggest leaf phase of this nation-wide competition.

CHINESE RESEARCH LIBRARY IS CLOSED

Likely to Be Put in Storage for Time

University Withdrew Financial Support Two Years Ago as Economy Measure

The Gest Chinese Research Library, housed in the Redpath Library building at McGill University and considered to be one of the finest libraries of its kind in the world, was permanently closed to the public yesterday. While no official university statement was available, reliable sources reported that the library would be placed in storage before the end of the present month.

Two years ago, during the 1933-34 session, McGill withdrew financial support from the famed Chinese Library as an economy measure on recommendation of the finance committee of the board of governors. At the same time, the department of Chinese studies, which was founded in 1930 under the direction of Dr. Kiang Kang-hu, was discontinued. On that occasion it was stated that the department had "made a valuable contribution towards the promotion of Canadian interest in Chinese culture, history and civilization," and that "it is regretted that funds are no longer available for its continuance."

Visitors to the exhibition gallery in the Redpath Library yesterday found a sign reading "closed" at the entrance to the Gest Chinese Library. Asked for an explanation, Dr. G. R. Lomer, University Librarian, referred The Gazette to the principal's office. The principal's office said that a statement would be issued today.

Elsewhere, it was learned that Dr. Nancy Lee Swann, curator of the library, would relinquish her post during the next few days. She is not a member of the staff of McGill University, but an employee of Guion M. Gest, founder of the Chinese library.

COLLECTION HAS GROWN

The Gest Chinese Research Library was opened on February 13, 1926, Chinese New Year's Day. From a modest beginning, covering a period of many years, the collection has grown steadily. On the opening day, the library contained 8,000 stitched volumes and by January last year its holdings numbered 130,000 stitched volumes, and a collection of museum material. The contents of the library were arranged in the following categories: (1) classics; (2) history; (3) philosophy, science, medicine, encyclopaedias, etc., and (4) belles-lettres.

Among the library's prized possessions is the complete palace edition of A.D. 1739 of the then 24 dynastic histories of China, as well as Ming editions of several of the separate histories. The library also contains numerous volumes on history and geography in Yuan, Ming, Ching, and modern editions of Chinese standard works.

The library has the distinction of possessing one of the two copies of the great K'ang-hsi encyclopaedia to be found in the western world. The other copy is in the British Museum.

Van Gogh-

"Some Comments About Art"

By C. LANGFORD-BAKER
The Star's Resident Correspondent

NEW YORK, Nov. 13 — Dear "Que," While this is intended for you primarily, I retain the hope that it will prove of some slight interest to others. At least they may find in it a variation from this reporter's customary grooves.

You wanted me, you said, to make some comments about art. It did not appease you for me to reply that I don't know anything about art—and at least I omitted the other half of the cliché, bromidium or what-is-it. You were adamant and persisted—hence you must take the consequences.

There will be no apologies, but a word or two of explanation. I told you the literal truth. Many pictures baffle me; many more curiously antagonize me. I cannot, for example, look upon much of the work of the Renaissance painters. I have an instinctive and intense dislike for corpulent cherubs; hence, no sooner does one meet my gaze than I pass on, thereby of a certainty missing much beauty of color and of detail.

Only one master has ever gained your reporter's undesired but unquestioning allegiance. He is Whistler. I have spent hours among the Freer collection, in Washington, and hope to spend many more. But then Whistler's works, to me, are poems in paint, delicate, graceful and charming.

RETURNING to New York and to the assignment that you gave me, at least you left me my own choice. I chose Van Gogh, for several reasons. One, undoubtedly, was the sentimental attraction of the tragedy of his life. An artist, it seems to me, should never be too comfortable—and he was not the pampered recipient of a princely patronage. Moreover, I had learned that he possessed a certain quality of starkness in which I wanted to indulge. So I went with an artist who loves Van Gogh, and a lady who loves the artist. It was an ideal atmosphere.

The tour was not made without difficulty, for it seemed that half of New York was trying to get in to the Museum of Modern Art. However, we finally gained our objective after a good deal of patience and a considerable amount of wedging, and started on the first floor.

MY primary reaction was one of keen disappointment. Things were stark enough, but too crudely so. I do not mean in line and form, for I had expected that, but in conception. They were almost amateurishly stark. One, for example, which will illustrate what was to be found in many others, was called Dead Woman. It was a little too Grand Guignolish. It reminded me of young poets who, before they learn better, begin poems with: "When I am dead," etcetera. I have long since ceased to read poems which begin, "When I am dead," and, with a few minor exceptions, I was very disappointed with Van Gogh.

I told my artist friend so. He said: "I'm glad you are. I feel the same way. This is his earliest work and as far as I'm concerned, his worst. It may partly explain why he failed so bitterly while he lived. But we haven't seen anything yet. Come on."

ON the second floor was the output of what I suppose was his middle period. Except for a certain macabre quality, frequently manifest, it might easily have been the work of a different man. He seemed suddenly to have awakened, and to have decided to see what he could do with color.

But how do you expect a humble reporter to describe it? I can't—I do not know the words. I can only tell you that I practically had to be led away from three of the exhibits. One was a field of corn, exquisite in detail and beautiful in coloring. I remember that a little of the corn was blown down by the wind, also that a small bird was hovering over it in just the right place—a little left of the centre. If the bird had been put anywhere else, I think it would have spoiled the picture.

And there was a corner of a restaurant. It was a French restaurant; it couldn't have been anything else. There was, as we laymen would say, nothing to it but a few tables and chairs. But what a "but." They were actually there. You could have sat down at any one of the tables—and perhaps have drunk with Van Gogh.

THERE was a country scene showing a couple of haystacks. Of this a young aesthete in the crowd beside me disapproved heartily for, said he, "They wouldn't put the ladders against the haystacks that way in France; I've seen them and I know."

My friend the artist remarked to me, in some annoyance, that he didn't care where in Harlem they put the ladders. "I don't even care if they're not even haystacks. They're something very important, and they've got something in them that I'd give anything to be able to put there, and can't."

There were others that appealed to me strongly—certain Cypress and Ravines—that had a quality entirely unearthly. They groped and twisted and writhed, like utterly lost spirits. Perhaps they represented the soul of Van Gogh.

ON the next floor, his last work—with certain striking exceptions—did not seem to me the equal of that of his middle period. Often some of the fire seemed to be lost. But the writhing and the torment were more marked, and rather beautifully horrible.

The last floor, at the top of the building, was set aside for the work of his contemporaries. Perhaps the exhibit was poor, but I did not find much of it intriguing. There was, however, a devilishly satirical portrait of Van Gogh, by Gauguin, that will stay long in my memory.

When, however, we reached something in Spanish style which looked either like fat cherubs exercising on board ship or else an advertisement for men's underwear, we hastened out in the street.

So—I have done my best by you, "Que." In return, will you or any other interested party tell me why are experts? Van Gogh, I believe, made only a few hundred francs in his lifetime out of his pictures. The collection temporarily in New York is valued at roughly a million dollars. If he is a master now, wasn't he one then? And if he was, why did he have to be hungry?

And do you think there was any part of him, with a bitter expression on those gaunt features, watching the New York crowds jostling each other—to see the once despised works of Van Gogh?

Pictures by A. Y. Jackson at Scott's Gallery

Star Nov. 18/35

An exhibition, which is now open at Scott's galleries on Drummond street, of pictures and sketches by A. Y. Jackson, the Montreal painter who now lives in Toronto, shows some of his latest work as well as a little which is much earlier. One of the earlier pictures—painted before the war—of "Woods in Early Spring," is, to the ordinary eye, the best thing in the exhibition, a very remarkable study of color, light and distance. Another, evidently fairly old, is in the Group of Seven manner—a view of a purple hill across a lake, seen between birch trunks—and is a fine piece of color. In both of these Mr. Jackson shows the great powers of observation which are to be seen also in his sketches; a number of his sketches are in this exhibition and most of them are very good indeed.

In his more recent work Mr. Jackson has moved further away from recording natural facts. He translates nature into a language of his own and, in order to like his pictures, one must take the time to understand the language, and may still be baffled even then. One difficulty about some of these pictures is that, while the landscapes suggest nature, they are contradicted by the formal patterns of the skies, so that one may be left in doubt as to whether Mr. Jackson meant to paint a landscape or use scenery as the basis of a formal design. Apart from the formalities there is plenty of variety of scene and color in the exhibition. A number of these pictures are of places in Labrador and Baffin Land, hard and dreary countries to which Mr. Jackson has given all their repellent qualities. Others are of more familiar places, Algoma and the Lower St. Lawrence, and in these there is some gay color. One picture, which seems to be one of the latest, is a strange arrangement of reds and yellows, representing a maplewood in autumn; it seems to be a sort of shorthand note of a landscape, with which the spectator is left to do the work of discovering form or distance. Mr. Jackson's sketches and earlier pictures are for every one to see and enjoy; some of the later pictures reserve their beauties for those who understand and are accustomed to the formula according to which they are painted.

'ATROCIOUS,' BUT DRAW Art Institute Has Record Attendance Despite Critics

Chicago, December 10.—(P)—That exhibit of American paintings which caused conservative aesthetes to shudder, had at least one merit, officials of the Art Institute said today. They announced it had drawn the largest attendance of any ever held at the Institute—107,402, 30 per cent over last year.

The exhibit ended its annual fall term Sunday and the paintings which some critics termed "atrocious" are being returned to their creators.

Fine Dutch and French paintings of the 19th and 20th centuries have been brought to Montreal by P. C. Eilers, of E. J. van Wisselingh & Co., of Amsterdam, and are on view in the Johnson Art Galleries, Limited, 1340 St. Catherine street west. In the collection are works by Bauer, Bosboom, Dijsselhof, Gabriel, Jacob and Matthew Maris, Mauve, Neuhuys and Van Oostade, while of the French School Boudin, Corot, Fantin-Latour, Gauguin, Van Gogh, Manet, Monet, Monticelli, Pissarro, Ribot, Renoir and Utrillo are worthily represented.

All the works are outstanding examples that have been shown at important exhibitions and have in some cases come from leading private collections.

"Peasants Dancing in a Tavern," by A. Van Oostade, a panel signed and dated 1645, is a typical example of this master's work. The grouping of the drinking figures, the fiddler and the man and woman dancing is admirably done, the lighting of the timbered inn effective and the painting of the incidental dogs and cat accomplished. It is a human document of great interest done by a man who specialized in this genre. Despite its high and detailed finished the general effect is broad. While Jacob Maris is represented by "Old Amsterdam," a town scene of which type of picture he was a master, his brother Matthew's art is shown by "The Bride"—a visionary figure in white. Neuhuys's skill in two media is revealed in "Grandmother and Children," an accomplished oil, and in "Interior"—a Dutch family scene in which the bold handling of watercolor reveals the practised hand. Dutch landscapes of fine quiet tones are signed by P. J. C. Gabriel, and among the works by M. A. J. Bauer is a spacious stretch of desert with distant hills, an ox-cart with attendants and other figures, called "Landscape in British India." Figures mounted and on foot move beneath trees in the canvas entitled "In the Palm Garden," and his ability in composition is evident in "Cavalcade"—mounted figures ap-

Two Little Exhibitions

Some photographs by Otto Doob, of Montreal, make an interesting show on the walls of the Coffee House on Union Avenue. They are made by direct, unframed, processes of photography and Mr. Doob has got his effects and patterns by judicious choice of his subjects and points of view. Snow and its shadows have given him some of his best subjects and there are one or two good pictures of dark water running between snow banks. Many of these pictures, and some of the best of them, are of city buildings,—some of them street scenes with effects of mist,—others, even better, of the strong lights and shadows on grain elevators and steel structures. One of the most successful of the pattern photographs is of a row of tree trunks with their shadows, and there are some ingenious ones made with arrangements of paper cups. There are some good cloud pictures; the figure photographs are good too, but less distinguished; one of the best of them is of men climbing a steel tower.

A small group of drawings by F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., with some wood engravings by Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., is being shown at the Green Jug on Victoria St. The most striking of the drawings is one of a girl dancing,—a remarkable study of movement and the swing of drapery. A study of the nude is another very good one, and there are several drawings made to illustrate stories. Some of these are older ones and have more finish and completeness than is usual in the newer kind of illustration. A very good drawing among these is one of a pestilence, represented by a gigantic figure on horseback riding over a little town, and another fine allegory of the same kind is of a murderer and his victim, but some of the drawings have more cheerful subjects.

Among Mr. Holgate's prints are some good ones of British Columbia Indians and totem poles. One of the finest prints is of a woman walking upstairs out of darkness into light; a group of girls bathing is another very good one, and there are several interesting landscapes.

THE FRENCH SCHOOL

There is much to admire and covet in the examples by painters of the French School. Boudin is seen in a small work—shipping at Deauville. Moored at the wharf is a small vessel with sail up and behind a large craft, while in the distance smoke from a steamer drifts into the luminous sky. Besides a small port scene, Corot is represented by a small landscape of lovely tone—trees in a meadow, two cows and, in the foreground a woman with a bundle of wood on her back. The subtle greens are marvellously handled.

In the group of paintings by Fantin-Latour this artist's versatility is revealed. His skill as a flower painter is manifest in "White Roses in a Glass Bowl," a work fine in arrangements and admirable in the suggestion of atmosphere that envelops the blooms. Green and blue grapes, juicy, luscious and gleaming, are the subject of another canvas, while grapes, peaches and plums inspired the painter in third canvas. Then there is a graceful nude in sunlight and shadow sheltered by a tree near a stream. In the painting of the flesh there is a beautiful luminous quality. Another excellent performance is the study of a young woman with dark hair. There are two canvases with the "Temptation of St. Anthony" as the theme which reveal the artist's mastery in depicting airy fabrics and beautiful women.

Heavier in technique but glowing with rich tones is "Fete Champetre," by Monticelli,—women and children with dogs in a darkened garden.

By Renoir is "Roses in a Vase"—the blossoms well arranged and fluidly painted. By Monet is a garden scene, with shrubs, poppies in a flowerbed, a bit of driveway and a table spread for breakfast out of doors. Manet is represented by a bold pastel of a waiter, in an ill-fitting coat, with serviette under his arm, keeping a keen eye open to anticipate diners' wishes, and by Camille Pissarro is a winter landscape near Louveciennes — trees, houses under snow, horsemen outside a building and two figures in the foreground. It is a canvas dated 1872 when the painter was beginning to explore Impressionism. Utrillo signs "Le Lapin Agile"—a boldly painted impression of the famous Paris cafe, and a small work of quiet tones is the riverside scene by Van Gogh, called "The Public Bath." By Gauguin is a strongly painted self-portrait seen in profile, and a colorful landscape with figures before an idol, entitled "Tahiti."

In the print room of the Art Association of Montreal there is at present a collection of nearly seventy drawings by Louis Muhlstock of Montreal, whose work has been seen from time to time in other exhibitions but never so well as in this. The drawings are all of interest either as good drawings or as studies of character, and most of them are portrait heads or, in a few cases, only faces. There are some beautiful faces of girls, but some of the best work is in those which show more character, even with a certain amount of real ugliness. Specially good ones are two of old women, Miss Louise of Caughnawaga and Mrs. Regina Fish of London; there is another very good head of an Indian woman and a very good portrait study of a bearded man, and a clever set of four drawings of a little girl "Paranka." The drawing called "A young musician," is another which is full of life.

There is plenty of character in some of the sketches of groups of figures, particularly in two groups of old women and another, a slight sketch, of Brittany fishermen. A great deal is said with very few lines in the single figure of "Cabby at prayer." There are a number of figure studies in the exhibition, of which the best are some of the snail-like sketches; one or two of the more finished drawings of the nude are good but some of them,—large drawings of coloured girls, are rather spoilt by the use of an unpleasant red in the flesh tones. Mr. Muhlstock is at his best when he has character as well as form to put into his drawings.

Elections to the Canadian Academy

At the meeting of the Royal Canadian Academy, held in Montreal at the end of last week in connection with the opening of the Academy's annual exhibition, two associates were elected full members of the Academy, and four new associates were elected. All are painters. The new Academicians (R.C.A.) are Edwin Holgate of Montreal and Archibald Barnes of Toronto. The new associates (A.R.C.A.) are Adam Sherriff Scott of Montreal, Frank Carmichael and John F. Clymer of Toronto, and A. C. Leighton of Calgary.

S.M. SCOTT'S ITALIAN SKETCHES ON SHOW

Gazette Nov. 30/35
Interesting and Varied Exhibition Opens at Art Association

Montrealers will be very much interested in an exhibition which opened yesterday afternoon in the print room of the Art Association, Sherbrooke street. The late Samuel Mathewson Scott, who died in 1933 at the age of 80, lived a large part of his life in Italy, but he was closely linked to Montreal, and this posthumous show of more than 100 water colors, drawings and crayon sketches will have a personal value to a great many people.

Apart from this aspect of it, the exhibition is interesting in itself. Mr. Scott's work is the product of a quiet time, and quietness is perhaps its chief characteristic. Although the collection is made up of Italian scenes, there is nothing bizarre about it, nothing garish. He set down with great care, and one might even say affection, courtyards in light and shadow, domes and campaniles and spires, canals and gondolas, bridges and gardens. Here is Lake Como with the mountains looming behind, the pale glimmering of a sail balancing a pink house in a bright-hued garden; there is an ancient street with heavy-browed houses and a background of hills; people gossip at a doorway, move lazily on burros, quietly fish or mend nets; there are mellow ruins and livelier farm scenes; chateau and humble dwellings; Florence, Venice, Pisa, the big cities, and the smaller villages. The water colors are painstakingly made and many visitors to the gallery will find themselves preferring the drawings and the crayon sketches. Mr. Scott's touch in these is lighter, more impressionistic, and the effect in some is gaiety as, for instance, "The Fair," which is so deftly suggested. Many of the sketches are remarkable for having been done when Mr. Scott was at an advanced age and for being quite as fresh as the earlier ones.

The exhibition will be open for about a fortnight.

Italian Drawings By Samuel M. Scott At the Art Gallery

The late Samuel Mathewson Scott was a Montreal man who lived for many years in the last part of his life in Italy and, being in very pleasant surroundings, he did much drawing and painting for love of the places and of the work itself. A collection of this work is now being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. Most of it is of Italian scenes, chiefly of places near Florence and on the Italian lakes, with a few in Switzerland and elsewhere, and they all do justice to the beauty of the places.

Mr. Scott used many methods in the making of his drawings and used all of them well. There are in this exhibition pencil and pen drawings, drawings in wash and crayon, and water colours, and white and tinted papers have been used, and in some cases methods have been combined to make the most of the subject. Some of the pencil drawings are among the best in the collection, particularly some of the Italian buildings, which show a good architectural sense. Among other good drawings in black and white are a wash drawing of sailing barges in the lower Thames, with a good atmospheric effect, and one in black chalk of a street in Florence at night, which has excellent lighting and a successful suggestion of a crowd in the street.

There is an admirable sense of color both in the finished drawings and in the slighter sketches. A very good sketch, evidently quickly made, is in colored chalks of an Italian street, and there is some fine color in an unfinished water color of a group of cypress trees, and several of the simpler sketches are as interesting as the more finished works. These finished water colors show a lot of very pleasant places. Among the best of them are one of misty atmosphere on one of the Italian lakes and one of a bridge over a small river; and, in all of them, Mr. Scott has passed on much of the pleasure which he evidently had in making the drawings.

R. W. PILOT, R.C.A., SHOWS PAINTINGS

Holds First Exhibition in Four Years at Watson Art Galleries

SCENES OF THIS PROVINCE

Montreal Painter Finds Congenial Subjects in Laurentians, About Quebec, Isle of Orleans and Metis

Holding his first exhibition in four years, Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., reveals a marked advance in the collection of his paintings on view in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. The opening of this show on Saturday was marked by a good attendance of picture-lovers who have followed with real interest the career of this Montreal painter, and the general verdict was that the canvases and panels that number just short of 50—representing work done over the past four years—reveal distinct progress in interpreting the Canadian scene. There is greater confidence in handling and enrichment of the color sense, while, as befits an accomplished etcher, the drawing is still rightly considered of paramount importance. Surveying the collection brings a refreshing satisfaction that this painter has steadily followed a set course and abjured "departures" that might have meant a more rapid popularity. Mr. Pilot's art is eminently sane and wholesome, his impressions and depiction of Canadian landscape are normal and he is employing his talent to record in permanent form the beauties of Quebec province.

PAINTINGS OF PIEDMONT.

After exploring the pictorial possibilities of the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coasts and coastlines Mr. Pilot has looked to the Laurentians and, almost at Montreal's back door, has found congenial material about Piedmont—where the hills begin. In this group there are many admirable works. "Towards Evening, Piedmont," a large work painted out of doors, is a convincing transcription of the region—wooded rocky hills under snow that rise behind buildings edging the road on which a sleigh travels. "The Old Bridge, Piedmont," shows the metal structure on its piers of logs over the ice-filled North River, with pines, spruces and a high hill in the background. Vapor is rolling across the base of a noble hill in "A Misty Winter Day, Piedmont," a work that is convincing in its suggestion of penetrating chill, and there is fairer weather in "Early Spring, North River," with its sunlit trees and patch of open blue water. "Early Spring, Piedmont," reveals the beauty of sun-flushed wooded hills above buildings and barns, and lovely in its subtle tones of grey is "Hoar Frost and Snow, Piedmont"—building with figures at the door, two sleighs in the road and wooded hills heavy with frozen moisture. From this region, too, are "Winter Sunshine, Piedmont," "The Hotel, Piedmont," with pines and snow on a grey day; a variant of this subject on a crisp, cold day with sparkling snow and blue shadows; "The Hill, Piedmont," with sleigh going up the incline which is topped by a house—a composition that seems balanced despite the masses of evergreens that edge one side of the road. "The Valley, St. Sauveur," shows a fine stretch of country from a fringe of bush in the foreground, rolling hills, the distant church and the irregular heights beyond. "Village Street, St. Sauveur," with its houses, barns and church is another sound record of a sunny winter day. A bit further north, Mr. Pilot found a good subject in "Beech Trees, St. Margaret"—snow banks, a bit of open water, blue shadows and a row of beeches still displaying the fawn foliage of autumn.

SCENE AT CHAMBLY.

Of the winter season is "The Military Church, Chamby"—the old structure with its quaint spire backed by trees, adjacent buildings and old elms, fences and a bit of open water, all beautifully drawn and fine in tone. This canvas reveals the advance that the painter has made since he last held a "one-man" show. Fine, too, in its handling of subtle values is "Church, Sault aux Recollets," with its twin-spired building, noble trees under frost and snow and cold open water in the foreground. Greater mastery of his materials is evident in the well composed and confidently painted "Old Stone House on the Beauport Road." What a "find" this ancient building with its quaint dormer windows and an equally ancient structure across the narrow road. Mr. Pilot has done the scene entire justice—a fine sky overhead, glimpse of the river, snow and shadows all contributing to an outstanding canvas.

"A Summer's Day, Chateau Richer" is a canvas filled with heat and strong light that flushes the spire and roof of the church, a nearby house and a noble tree. A woman and child walk across the adjacent field. A shadowed foreground of transparent quality marks "Summer Morning, Beauport," with quaint house and apple tree. Strong sunlight also illumines "Courtyard, Beauport, Que." with its old house, trees and a green fence in light and shadow.

Metis has moved a congenial sketching ground with a group of interesting works. There is evidence of early morning activity in the smoking chimneys of houses edging the muddy shore in "Sunrise, Les Boules, Metis," and element weather is indicated in "View From Boule Rocks, Metis," with yachts and gentle waves breaking in foam against off-shore rocks. Strong sunlight floods "Sandy Bay, Near Little Metis"—church dominating groups of buildings, wharf, sunlit water and a cart descending a hilly road, and "Low Tide, Metis Beach," shows children playing on the sand, figures under an orange parasol, water and distant blue shore.

In his search for subjects Mr. Pilot has not overlooked the Isle of Orleans. Here he found a fine subject in the road and houses leading to the church at St. Francois, which he has set down with confidence. "Cap Tourmente from Isle of Orleans" is another direct interpretation. "Mount Ste. Anne from the Isle of Orleans" is a crisply handled pastel of the bold height against an evening sky with riverside lights dancing in the water.

From Quebec comes "Louise Basin," with schooners moored and under sail in the river, the market, the towering height of the Citadel, Chateau Frontenac and Laval University being shown. There is also a

Drawings on Display Reveal Development of Montreal Artist

One of the most interesting art exhibitions of the season is the group of 66 chalk and charcoal drawings by Louis Muhlstok, which opened Saturday afternoon in the print room of the Art Association. Piecemeal, this young Montrealer's work has become well-known to the public, but it is some time since we have seen enough of it at once to take the measure of his development.

Apart from the value of the show for its own sake, Louis Muhlstok's admirers see in it a further significance: it may be looked upon as a definitive exhibition, marking the end of one stage and the beginning of another. The artist seems to have gone as far as he can with these individual heads. A few give the sense, it is true, of having been too much worked over, but the best of them, as in the Paranka series, could hardly be simpler and at the same time retain the essential character of the subject. And character is the thing that concerns Mr. Muhlstok most, whether it be in the melancholy of an aged Jew, in the innocence of a child, the childlike-ness of a Negro, the resignation of an invalid, of the despair of a young man out of work. His reports are true and profoundly moving, but now is the time for him to push on, to give the pity and love he feels for humanity a wider application.

There are signs in this exhibition that he is reaching toward bigger things. The passive sadness that is seen in so many of his faces gives way to something quite different in the portrait of "Bill, the Negro Worker"; it is almost startling. More important than this, however, is the group of three heads he calls "War!" and still more important the two large drawings, "The Last Supper" and "Waiting for Breakfast." The first is a scene in a refuge for the unemployed and the second a huddle of men in a winter street. They are not completely successful, but though his technique is not quite equal to the enlargement of his vision, they show a move in the right direction. He must bring to the bigger field the swiftness, the directness and the simplicity of those half-dozen snapshots which are such a delightful part of the show, those little sketches of old women in conversation, parents and children, and the caddy at prayer, so well observed and set down in such quick, bold strokes.

Most encouraging of all are the new chalk drawings from the nude. To many they must seem a strange departure for the man who records with such sincerity and such sensitivity the features of patriarchs and children, but studies like the mountainous "Colored Girl Asleep" represent an important phase of development. They reveal the artist with a new flexibility and a sturdier appreciation of large forms. When he carries these achievements over into painting, he will have taken a long step forward.

HISTORY DEPICTED IN DISPLAY OF ART

Tweedsmuir's Open Small But Select Exhibition at National Gallery

Ottawa, November 22.—Lord and Lady Tweedsmuir tonight opened an exhibition of paintings as the National Gallery turned back a page of Canada's art history to show products of a school that is vanishing as an agency through age and changed fashion.

The show is small, representing by 137 paintings the work of ten artists, some dead and the rest old or ageing, who put on canvas what they saw through eyes trained in an art tradition that lingers in this country among few but the old guard.

Only four of the artists are native Canadians, the rest incomers from the United Kingdom, Australia, Newfoundland and the United States. Several are still working and all are or were members of the Royal Canadian Academy. One is its president.

Most nearly approaching the work of younger Canadians are pictures of Toronto's historical painter, Charles W. Jeffreys, and the late Maurice Cullen, landscape artist, who died last year leaving a great collection of Quebec and other scenes, mostly snow-covered and wintry.

Jeffreys, painter and illustrator, shows his most modern touch in his large canvas of a horde of Polish soldiers, en route across Canada during the war, bathing naked in the Niagara River. He has twelve other pictures in the show, including a large historical work entitled "The Founding of Halifax."

George A. Reid is represented by twelve works, among them his big painting, "Armistice Day in Toronto, 1918," with flying flags, paper streamers, and people dancing in the street. He has two historical works, as well as the family group, "Mortgaging the Homestead," his Academy diploma piece and probably his most widely-known picture.

There are several works from the War Memorials collection, including Jeffreys' "Poles," Reid's "Armistice" and a portrait of the academy, Sir Wyly Grier has nine other portraits in the exhibition, the best of his white-bearded father and one of Mrs. Esmond Grier.

Two panels, Peace and War, by Frederick Challenger, strike a sentimental spot in Ottawans. Nude studies, they were taken from the ceiling of the old Russell Theatre when it was demolished in 1923. Challenger, still working, has seven other pictures, including one of work on the Trans-Canada Highway in the Ottawa Valley.

Fifteen paintings represent the art of Horatio Walker, Listowel, Ont., native whose work won wide recognition in many parts of the world, particularly Canada and the United States.

The massive style of Homer Watson, the Doon, Ont., self-taught man who still lives in his native village, is evident in fifteen of his paintings, the most familiar of which is "The Flood Gate," owned by the National Gallery. "Winter Landscape" attracts major attention among the ten pictures by Aurele de Foy Suzor-Cote, the Arthabaska, Que., native who was trained in Paris, while Franklin Brownell, considered the best art teacher in Ottawa before he stopped teaching, has sixteen paintings, most of them small, including Ottawa and Gatineau scenes and brightly colored, almost prismatic pictures of the West Indies.

ARTS SHOWN MONTREAL ARTIST Star Nov. 25/35

Herbert S. Palmer, R.C.A.,
Has Attractive Works at Eaton Fine Art Galleries

Varied in types of country and in season and atmospheric effects are the paintings of Canadian landscapes by Herbert S. Palmer, R.C.A., on view in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. Mr. Palmer knows what will make a good subject and, as usual, is very successful in introducing horses and cattle into his landscapes. In passing, attention might be drawn to the spontaneous little painting of wooded hills in sunlight and shadow, with glimpse of winding river as seen from a height, called "Spring in the Gatineau Valley," which, under like title, on a more important scale is one of two works that represent this painter in the Royal Canadian Academy exhibition now on in the Art Association galleries.

This Toronto artist is convincing in giving a sense of bulk and solidity to his hills as is evidenced by the ably handled work called "Near Magog"—massive mountain, glimpse of water, wooded shore, and a group of Holsteins in the foreground. Of Quebec province, too, is "The Covered Bridge, Pickanock River," with winding stream, hill and spruces. In "Rolling Country"—a spacious landscape, under grey clouds, bush with splashes of gay autumn color and meadows in sunlight, the placing of the horses drawing a plough is distinctly happy.

The autumn scene makes a strong appeal to Mr. Palmer who is uniformly successful with his glowing reds. "The Old Maple" has much lovely tone in the rolling landscapes, pines, hills and fallen leaves, on which sheep rest. "Ontario Pasture, Rice Lake" is big in feeling and broadly handled—blue water, hills, fences and cattle on rising ground. The glory of autumn is evident in "The Valley Road" with its wooded hill barred with blue shadows, fenced roadway and sheep, under a blue sky with clouds. "Evening Colboy Bay" is admirable in its quiet tones and the effective manner in which the painter has handled a difficult composition. "October Landscape," with its birch, maple and spruces, distant glimpse of house on a hill and odd boulders in the foreground, has much fine, subdued color in the vegetation that bases the trees in autumn livery. The little "Midsummer Evening"—elms flushed with afterglow and horses and foal in a field, is true of the hour, and cows and elms figure in "Evening Shadows."

Scenes in which the hues of autumn have appealed to the artist's color sense include "The Road to the Lake," "Mountain Lake," "Indian Summer," "The Road to Haliburton," "A Country Lane," "Blue and Gold, Near Minden, Ont.," "October Sketch," and "When Shadows Lengthen," to mention a few of many good things. "Indian Fishing Shack"—wooden structure with sun-splashed roof, bush and lake, is a frank, convincing impression, and "The Mill, Barrow Bay"—building, skeleton woodwork, bridge and small waterfall, is effective in the values of the foam-spattered tawny water. These pictures, competently painted, are generally gay and refreshing—qualities that should appeal to the art-lover.

Unfinished Works Of Artist Destroyed Gazette Jan. 25/35

London.—Charles Adrian Stokes, R.A., who died in November at the age of 80, directed in his will that his executors should ask a Royal Academician, "perhaps Talmage, or Connard, or Russell," to cause, without scruple, the destruction on a large scale of all of his works that seemed unworthy.

Mr. Stokes, who left £1,503 (net personality £1,299), bequeathed £500 to his faithful servant, Josephine Noska, Graz, Austria, "as a token of gratitude for many years of devoted and unselfish service."

Sir Walter Russell, R.A., said: "I have already been through the pictures. The only pictures I decided should be destroyed were unfinished, unimportant works. The finished pictures, I decided, were well worthy of being retained."

MUCH GOOD PORTRAITURE

Sir Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., Receives at Inauguration of Show With Private View—Closes December 22

In keeping with the importance of its position, the standard of paintings and other works forming the 56th exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, which opened with a private view in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal last night, is high. On view are paintings strictly academic and otherwise, while the range of subjects surely includes something that will appeal to all tastes. While there are some works of an original turn, there is nothing that shocks nor strains credulity too far. Including architectural photographs, the exhibits total 444.

An encouraging feature of the show is the wide interest shown in it by artists from widely distant points. While the bulk of the entries come from Quebec and Ontario, there are examples from Halifax and from Victoria, with a fair sprinkling from towns and cities in between.

As usual, landscapes predominate, but portraiture holds an important place and is generally of high quality. Sir Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., reveals his skill as draughtsman and colorist in three works. In the portrait of Mrs. A. Monro Grier, he has successfully solved the problems of the blue dress worn by the sitter who holds an open book. Blue again figures in the gown worn by Dr. W. B. Hendry, while the portrait of Henry A. Stone, president of the Vancouver Art Gallery, in everyday garb enjoying a cigarette—is more informal.

Officialdom has its place in the excellent portrait by Alphonse Jorgens of Lord Bessborough. The late representative in Canada of the King, wears many decorations as he grasps the hilt of his sword. Then, too, from the brush of Mrs. Lilia Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., are the new occupants of London House in the Empire's capital—the Hon. Vincent Massey, in diplomatic dress, and Mrs. Vincent Massey. By Kenneth K. Forbes, R.C.A., is the Hon. J. L. Bowman in gown, and an out-of-door portrait of Mrs. Forbes in green and white. Ernest Fosbery, R.C.A., ably paints J. H. Putnam, B.A., against a red background. Evan MacDonald, O.S.A., in a black suit with yellow sweater, is a good subject by Marion Long, R.C.A. Blue is the dominant note of the gown worn by Prof. C. T. Currelly in the portrait by G. A. Reid, R.C.A., and greens have interested Adam Sherriff Scott in the gracefully arranged and capably-painted portrait of Mrs. Ross Clarkson. From the same brush is the portrait of the Montreal sculptor Alfred Laliberte, R.C.A., seated in his working smock grasping a lump of clay. Oscar De Laill shows a portrait of Miss Jacqueline de Rouen which has much to commend it. Edwin Holgate, A.R.C.A., shows great advance in "Portrait, Constance," a girl in red, with red and white tie, reading a book, which is finely modelled and admirably placed, but he scores heavily in his portrait of Dr. A. S. Eve, of McGill University, which presented innumerable problems in the academic gown of vermilion and brilliant yellow. The modelling of the face is direct and firm, and the general effect, while a bit startling, can be counted a distinct success. By R. S. Newton, R.C.A., are two portraits that fall short of his best efforts. Manly MacDonald, A.R.C.A., employs blues to good advantage in "Sally," and shows his ability to paint a sunny winter day in the attractive and closely observed "The Mill, Greenriver." Archibald Barnes, A.R.C.A., has a bit of strong painting in "Brahene Urban," a man of foreign mien in a rich tunic of differing yellows.

NO LANDSCAPE SHORTAGE

There is no shortage of landscapes, but there is a refreshing open-mindedness as to the seasons. It is not particularly an autumn or winter year at the R.C.A. Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., besides a view of meadowland under a cloudy sky, shows a bit of bare Newfoundland coast with an iceberg grounded off-shore. J. W. Beatty, R.C.A., imparts weighty girth to his noble trees in autumn leaf in "Wood Interior," and Fred H. Bridgen, A.R.C.A., is successful in his vista of open wooded country, clouds breaking in rain, and a hint of a rainbow. Harry Britton, R.C.A., goes to the sea for "Evening"—open water on the move, with wheeling gulls, and Henrietta Britton finds a snowy landscape, with buildings and spruces, to her liking in "Evergreens." Archibald Browne, R.C.A., has snow scenes with hills at sundown, and A. J. Casson, A.R.C.A., paints wooden shacks edging a rutted road with rounded wooded hill touched by sunlight. Autumn foliage interests Frederick S. Chalenger, R.C.A., in "Queen's Park, Toronto," and "Playmates." The Cornish coast gives a good subject to W. M. Cuthis, A.R.C.A.

HEAD OF ACADEMY

SIR WYLY GRIER, P.R.C.A., who with Lady Grier and W. S. Maxwell, vice-president of the R.C.A., received the guests at the opening of the 56th exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, in the Art Gallery last night.

The Misses Des Clayes are well represented. Horse subjects prove congenial to Alice Des Clayes, A.R.C.A. Berthe shows "A March Morning," and an autumn scene at Melbourne, and Gertrude Des Clayes, A.R.C.A., reveals her skill in portraiture. Mrs. Hortense M. Gordon, A.R.C.A., has a fluid watercolor on canvas in "Old Norman Mill, Jersey," and John S. Gordon, A.R.C.A., paints in solid fashion an English bit—"The Barbican, Sandwich, Kent." Clare S. Hagarty, A.R.C.A., shows sympathy for flower subjects and ability to paint them, and Fred S. Haines, R.C.A., is effective with a clump of trees and grassland called "Trillium Time." Arthur Heming, A.R.C.A., illustrates life in the northland, one work showing the crew of a H.B.C. crew taking a rest. Frank Hennessey, A.R.C.A., besides directly painted oils, is distinctly successful with tonal values in the pastel, "Jobber's Camp." Miriam Holland shows a confident touch and fresh color in "Landscape, Laurentian Mountains." Alice A. Innes reveals a firm touch in her massively composed snowy landscapes—"The Mountain, Burks Falls," and "Easter Time, Parry Sound District."

ROSES BY COBURN.

Varied is the offering of F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., whose "Still Life, Roses" is a fine bit of painting in a genre little suspected when viewing the bracing winter landscape with team, called "River Road, Richmond." From his brush, too, are "Nude Study"—a young woman dressing her hair, and a freely brushed-in portrait sketch of an attractive woman. Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., imparts solidity to the noble mountain that backs meadowland, with a group of sun-lit buildings in the middle distance; beneath a sky in which clouds are breaking. "Clearing Weather" is an apt title well interpreted. Adrienne Hebert, A.R.C.A., continues to record in paint those old-time city bits that might disappear overnight in a blaze. In "La Place Jacques Cartier," he shows the irregular buildings that face the west side of the market square, with, in the foreground, figures in the overflow market place. The grouping of the figures is interesting. They suggest types, including the man with a wooden leg. He has not overlooked a dog. F. W. Hutchison, N.A., has a spacious view of rising land, road and old buildings under a threatening sky, in "The Road to Tadoussac."

Charles W. Jefferys, R.C.A., tries a departure in subject in his watercolor "The Dark Huntsman," and is amusingly decorative in "It's a Cold World"—a jester in a snowy landscape. D. H. Macfarlane has a fluidly handled watercolor of sleigh and dog on a snowy road, called "Afterglow, Winter." H. Mabel May, A.R.C.A., paints village houses under snow with her usual directness, and David McGill envelopes with atmosphere wooded shore, water and distant mountains in "Late Summer, Lake Champlain." Florence H. McGillivray, A.R.C.A., shows bold painting in "Covered Bridge, Val Desbois, Que." and Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A., has made an interesting work out of an old cab-topped winter sleigh and horse. Rita Mount shows a nice color sense in two shore scenes with fishing boats. Stricter attention to the drawing of the craft could sometimes be paid. Elizabeth Nutt, A.R.C.A., has painted a stone bridge under snow, and Herbert S. Palmer, R.C.A., suggests depth and distance in his glimpse of river winding between wooded heights in "Spring in the Gatineau Valley." Hal. Ross Perrigard, A.R.C.A., has a compact and richly colored group of houses under a sunny winter sky, called "The Old Road," and Stanley Royle conjures with lights and shadow on rocks and water in "Tranquillity, Peggy's Cove, N.S."

Wharfside scenes have long interested Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A., and the diversity of such subjects have lured him to the waterfront in "Harbor Scene, Halifax," and "St. John River." Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., employs his usual light touch in the sunlit work called "On the Beach," and has captured lovely tone in his small freely painted "Sunset, St. Eustache." Dorothy Stevens, A.R.C.A., shows well modulated color and good drawing in "Nude in Sunlight." George Thomson suggests the swish of bending poplars and ruffled water in "An October Breeze," and Tom Stone shows winter activity in "Cutting Ice at Haliburton."

Henry J. Simpkins reveals his abilities as a watercolorist in "Peggy's Cove, N.S."—shacks and water under a threatening sky; and "The Camp" with figures under trees busying themselves about preparing a meal. "The Green Hills" and "A Sunlit Village" are the contributions of Mrs. Phyllis Percival who shows industry and advance, and Leslie A. Perry sends "Winter Scene, Morin Heights," and "Reflections, Lac Tremblant." Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A., has found his subjects at McGregor Bay, Ont., in Quebec, and in Basutoland, South Africa. John M. Loggie finds pattern in his treatment of "Morning on the Saguenay," and T. R. MacDonald has an interior called "John in the Studio." Mrs. Lillian Hingston is effective with her colorful pasturings, well arranged and soundly painted, and Alberta Cleland is successful with "Zinnias." By Harold Beament is "Hillside Harvest," while there a note of grim humor in the swathed heads of the surgeons in "The Discussion," by James E. Beckwith. There is good light and animation in "St. Dominique street," by Aleksander Berco-vitch, and Paul Caron finds the Quebec winter scene with habitant's horses and sleighs still to his liking.

Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., shows passages of lovely tone in his scene of old buildings under snow, incidental figures and a sleigh on a grey day, entitled "The Blue House, Chambly." It is in every sense a mature work confidently painted. P. R. Wilson shows two capital watercolors. Thurstan Topham has a snowy landscape called "Roseate Dawn, Mont Tremblant," and Mary E. Wrinch, A.R.C.A., is effective in the low-toned "The Old Flume, Jumping Cariboo Creek."

Architecture at The Art Gallery

Star Nov. 26/35

The annual exhibition and competition of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada is, according to the custom of several past years, combined with the exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy, and the photographs of buildings, sent in for competition, are being shown in the west gallery of the Art Association of Montreal.

Only completed work is accepted in this competition and building, as every one knows, has been done in rather small quantity for some years, but the work of twenty-three architects is shown in this exhibition and several of them show more than one building. No medals have been awarded by the Institute this year, and only one first award; this is given in the class of Domestic Interiors, to Mackenzie Waters for a residence at Toronto,—a composition of plain masses with big windows. Honorable mention in the same class is given to Gordon S. Adamson for a house at Orangeville and to A. T. Galt Durnford for a typical Quebec house at St. Sauveur. Two awards of honorable mention are made in the class of Domestic Interiors,—to H. J. Burden for a comfortable bedroom and to Maxwell Pitts for the design and furnishing of a sunroom.

Of buildings other than houses there are shown a cathedral, an armory, an observatory, a hospital, a museum, a college and a distillery. In the class of Church Architecture honorable mention is awarded to Henri S. Labelle for the pulpit of the cathedral, designed by him, at Valleyfield, and to Sproatt and Rolph for the chancel of Knox Presbyterian Church at Toronto. Mackenzie Waters receives honorable mention in the class of Industrial Buildings for the exterior of a gin distillery at New Toronto,—a building which shows its purpose, with no ornament except recessed panels in the walls.

Printmakers and Women's Art at Eaton's Gallery Star Dec. 4, /35

In two of the galleries at Eaton's there is this week and next an exhibition of work by the Three Printmakers,—W. R. Aykroyd, etcher, of Toronto; W. F. G. Godfrey, printer of woodcuts, of Toronto, and Leonard Hutchinson, maker of color prints, of Hamilton.

They have put together a number of very interesting prints, which make a very good show.

Mr. Aykroyd in his etchings is more of a realist than the other two. His excellent drawings, chiefly of streets and houses in England, France and Italy, come out at their best in the simplest of the etching; those in which good use has been made of white surface, and there are many such pleasant pictures of attractive places.

Mr. Godfrey's wood blocks are sometimes realistic but in many of them, and some of the best, he has made more or less formal designs, based on landscapes and trees, and there are some very good pattern designs of foliage and branches.

Mr. Hutchinson is almost entirely a formalist, and both lines and colors in his prints are worked into planned designs. He gets remarkable effects by the shading of colors and making colors fuse into each other and, while a few of his prints have a fairly wide color range, some of the best are made with two or, at most, three different colors. His prints, like those of Mr. Godfrey, show or are based chiefly on Canadian scenery.

The third of the larger galleries at Eaton's is occupied by the annual exhibition of the Women's Art Society of Montreal, with about sixty works. The flower pictures are among the best in the collection, as is often the case at these exhibitions, and some of the best of these are by Mrs. Lillian Hingston, Jean M. McLean, Mrs. Mary L. Dunning and Mrs. Allan Turner, who show oil pictures, and Mrs. Elizabeth Mitchell, who shows a good water color. Among the best of the landscapes in oils are works by Marjorie Allan, Norah Smyth and Mrs. Annie Pringle, while some of the best water colors are by Mrs. Winifred Lewis, Mrs. Mulock and Ethel Derrick. There are several studies of heads, among which A. K. Trim's two drawings, Ida Buck's large pastel and Mrs. Beatrice Long's oil sketch are conspicuous. Other oil pictures are contributed by Reba M. The Fifty-Sixth Exhibition of the Canadian Academy

The Royal Canadian Academy holds its exhibition, the fifty-sixth, this year in Montreal, and it was opened in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday evening. In its size and quality the exhibition is quite equal to those which have preceded it here, and the members and associates of the Academy are more completely represented than in many former years.

Landscapes, of course, occupy most of the wall space but there are a number of portraits and figure pictures of interest. One of the most striking is Archibald Barnes' portrait of Brahen Urban in stage costume, conspicuous for the breadth and simplicity of the painting, particularly of the costume. Edwin Holgate has a daring but strangely successful portrait, with the bright red and yellow of a doctor's robes.

Aphonse Jongers has an excellent picture of the robe, uniform and decorations of the Earl of Bessborough. Mrs. Torrance Newton has very truthful portraits of the Hon. Vincent and Mrs. Massey, and there are good portraits by the President, Sir Wyly Grier, by Oscar De Lall, A. Sherriff Scott and Kenneth Forbes. Figure pictures are few but among them are Dorothy Stevens' "Nude in sunlight", well drawn and painted but rather cold in colour and a figure study by F. S. Coburn.

Three of Canada's senior painters, Archibald Browne, John Hammond and Homer Watson are represented by characteristic landscapes. A mountain landscape by A. C. Leighton gets much effect with very little colour, some of the other more remarkable landscapes are by Fred Haines, George Thomson, J. W. Beatty and Paul Earle. Arthur Heming has three interesting compositions based on Canadian scenery and animals, Charles Simpson's "On the beach" has a great suggestion of distance and space; some of the best of the flower pictures are by Clara S. Hagarty, and Marion Long.

Other exhibitors of oil pictures are: Wilfred Barnes, Harold Beament, Aleksander Bercovitch, Andre Bieler, Murray Bonnycastle, F. Brandtner, F. H. Bridgen, Harry Britton, Henrietta Britton, George Broomfield, St. George Burgoyne, Frank Carmichael, A. J. Casson, F. S. Challenger, Alberta Cleland, A. Cloutier, John F. Clymer, W. M. Cutts, E. A. Dalton, Kathleen Daly, Rita Daly, Mrs. B. B. Deroche, Alice Des Clayes, Berthe Des Clayes, Gertrude Des Clayes, Ruth M. Dingle, Henri Fabien, Ernest Fosbery, Roland Gissing, Mrs. Hortense Gordon, John S. Gordon, Arthur Gresham, Edythe N. Harding, Mrs. G. Cogill Haworth, Marion Hawthorne, Norman K. Hay, Adrien Hebert, James Henderson, R. S. Hewton, Mrs. Lillian Hingston, Miriam Holland, Kenneth Holmden, Cleve Horne, F. W. Hutchison, Alice A. Innes, Charles W. Jefferys, Franz Johnston, Hugh G. Jones, Minnie Kallmeyer, Estelle M. Kerr, Agnes Lefort, Arthur Lismer, John M. Loggie, Manly Macdonald, T. R. Macdonald, Orval C. Madden, H. L. Masson, H. Mabel May, P. Moreland May, David McGill, Florence H. McGillivray, Alfred E. Mickle, Thomas W. Mitchell, Kathleen M. Morris, Rita Mount, Rowley Murphy, Elizabeth Nutt, Herbert S. Palmer, Frank S. Panabeker, Lawrence Pantan, R. B. Partridge, George Pepper, Mrs. Phyllis Percival, Hal Ross Perrigard, A. Leslie Bishop, Robert Pilot, Aileen Plaskett, Narcisse Poirier, Marguerite Porter, Mrs. Florence Proctor, G. A. Reid, Mrs. Beatrice Robertson, Stanley Royle, Ethel Seath, Peter C. Sheppard, H. Leslie Smith, Tom Stone, J. R. Tate, Thurstan Topham, W. F. Weston, M. E. Wilson, and Mary E. Winch.

Wilson's "Baths of Caracalla" and two large drawings by Henry J. Simpkins; others are by T. Stock, Owen Staples, Carl Schaefer, F. H. Portnall, D. H. Macfarlane, Andre Lapine, Leonard E. Kelsey, H. G. Hunt, John Humphries, Mrs. Dorothy Hoover, Harry Hood, Peter Haworth, W. R. Haddock, Charles Goldhamer, Marc A. Fortin, Wilfrid J. Flood, Walter R. Ferrier, Kent L. De Conde, Robert Darby, Frederick G. Cross, Kathleen Carswell, Paul Caron, F. H. Bridgen, James E. Beckwith and Mrs. D. Mary Bagley.

Some good pastels are shown by Frank Hennessey, and by Mrs. Katharina Brydone-Jack, N. de Grandmaison, Herman Heimlich, and Mrs. Christian McKel, Miniatures are exhibited by Eleanor Izard, Louie K. Raynsford and Mrs. Grace Watterson.

Among the prints and drawings there are two excellent dry-points by Herbert Raine, an etching by S. H. Maw, colour prints by W. J. Phillips and Leonard Hutchinson, and woodcuts by Grace Fugler. Other exhibitors of prints, drawings and designs are: Woodruff K. Aykroyd, John J. Barry, Andre Bieler, Sam Borenstein, F. Brandtner, Alexander Scott, Carter, Oscar De Lall, W. F. G. Godfrey, E. F. Hagell, Mrs. Phyllis Armour Hertzberg, Nicholas Hornvansky, Charles W. Jefferys, Ian Graham Lindsay, Harry Mayrovitch, Louis Muhlstok, Ernst Neumann, Percy E. Nobbs, Jacques R. Paradis, R. B. Partridge, Pauline Redsell, G. T. Sclater, and Yvonne Williams.

This year's collection of sculpture is a little smaller than usual, but unusually good. It includes two delightful small garden figures and a very well modelled seated torso by Florence Wyle, a dignified monumental group, for a fountain at Orillia, and a most amusing little figure, called "Bathing scene" by Allan Cameron, an interesting arrangement of ornamental curves in white metal by Elizabeth Wynn Wood, a fine, colossal horse's head by Emanuel Hahn, the formal and decorative "Black cavalry" of Jacobine Jones and a good little group of figures by Katherine E. Wallis. There are a number of good busts; among them are Frances Loring's large head of Sir Frederick Banting, Orson Wheeler's colossal "Christopher", an excellent head of a Chinese girl by Pauline Johnson, Mrs. de Montigny Lafontaine's half length, and those by Ernest Neumann and Sylvia Daoust. Other exhibitors of sculpture are Alberta Cleland, Zillah Cluse, Mrs. B. Dawson, Mrs. De Montigny Giguere, Sydenham P. Harvey, Henri Hebert, Alfred Laliberte, Ide Lyman, A. J. Segal, John Sloan, Elzeur Soucy, A. Zoltvany-Smith, and A. Zucca.

The exhibit of architecture is very small indeed this year, with only three exhibitors, E. L. Horwood, J. Melville Miller and Perry and Luke. The Royal Architectural Institute of Canada has a separate exhibition of its own, which is being shown in the west gallery of the Art Association.

Change Is Made In Ogilvie Board

Star Jan. 7/36

At a meeting of the directors of The Ogilvie Flour Mills Co. Limited, held on Friday, January 3, W. A. Black, who retired from the office of president of the company at the annual meeting of shareholders on November 21, 1935, resigned from the board, and the vacancy thereby created was filled by the election of G. A. Morris, general manager of the company.

It will be recalled that in announcing his retirement from the presidency at the annual meeting in November, Mr. Black stated that "for personal and family reasons I find it necessary to live elsewhere." His had been a connection of over fifty years in this particular business.

Pictorial Art Of Canada On Display

Herald Nov. 22/35

56th Exhibition of Royal Canadian Academy Officially Opened — 270 Paintings Typical of Canadian Trends—Toronto Largely Represented—Guests Received by Academy President.

THE Gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, was last night the scene of the opening of the 56th exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts. Nearly 800 guests were received in the galleries by Sir Wyly Grier, D.C.L. of Toronto, president of the Academy, Lady Grier, and W. S. Maxwell, Montreal, vice-president.

The exhibition will remain open until December 22nd and during that time its 270 paintings, as well as representative sculptures, etchings and photographs, about 445 exhibits in all, will be available for public inspection. This year the photographs of buildings which are displayed are being submitted for the annually awarded medal of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada.

A preponderance of contributions comes from Toronto. Represented are four members of that body which is regarded as having included and superceded the famed "Group of Seven." These are Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A., Toronto; J. Casson, A.R.C.A., Toronto; Frank Carmichael, Lansing, Ont., and Edwin Holgate, Montreal.

Their works all bear that distinctive touch which has helped more than anything else, to classify them. Perhaps it is the air of abstraction which is no doubt, in reality an attempt to do away with the non-essential.

The exhibition on the whole is representative in a Canadian sense, and, in addition, there are a few paintings possessing that intrinsic poignancy associated only with the highest art. However it appears that some of the younger artists trip up when endeavouring to improve on nature, which cannot be done. Nature is her own spectrum and provides her own counterpoint.

In spite of the weight of eastern contributions it remains for a Westerner, A. C. Leighton, of Calgary, to present two canvases of surpassing interest. They are entitled "Skoki, Canadian Rockies," and "Kokosila, Indian Village, Duncan, B. C."

In "Skoki" there is a solidity of construction combined with consummate draftsmanship. It could never be taken as just one more mountain picture. In "Kokosila," the flooding sunlight actually seems to make one feel warm. It has a magical stimulating quality which says plainly just how much the artist enjoyed painting it. This power of communication makes it truly an unusual canvas.

Hewton Portrait Attracts Interest

On display by R. S. Hewton, R. C. A., is a portrait entitled "Marie". Large dark eyes and dark hair, and a spiritual, haunting quality are evident. There is something inexpressibly plaintive about her expression. The ulna of the right arm is an apparent fault. A curious fact is that everyone viewing the picture imagines they know the subject.

John F. Clymer, of Toronto, has on view two paintings, "Thunder Mountain" and "Autumn Trail". "Thunder Mountain" is striking and clever, but somewhat in the poster style, but "Autumn Trail" is a real touch. It is finely decorative and, in spite of its bright coloring, there is something almost macabre about it. The movements are splendidly delineated.

The well-known Academician, Charles Jefferys, of Toronto, is also represented. Known to school children all over Canada for his reproductions in the school books, in "It's A Cold World" he has turned to a different field. A shivering jester, dressed in old world motley stands uncomfortably in the wintry blasts. He has also a water color and a pen and ink sketch.

Striking Work Montreal Artists

John M. Loggie of Montreal has only one hanging, but of singular interest. It is titled "Morning on the Saguenay." Another Montreal artist, Thurston Topham displays "Roseate Dawn, Mont Tremblant," the valleys have a wide sweep there is just the right amount of sun gilding the mountain top and shadows seem always just about to gather in the gorges.

The elderly John Hammond, R. C. A. of Sackville, N.B., usually in the portrait class, demonstrates his versatility with "Fish Wears St. John, N.B."

Wyly Grier, president of the academy is represented by three portraits: Mrs. A. Monro Grier, Henri A. Stone, of Vancouver, and Dr. B. Hendry, the latter pleasantly informal.

French and Dutch Pictures at the Johnson Galleries

Star Nov. 19/35

The collection of pictures brought to Montreal this year from the van Wisselingh Galleries of Amsterdam is rather smaller than most of the collections of former years but this is balanced by the interest of the pictures, which are being shown at the Johnson Galleries on St. Catherine street. There are about an equal number of French and Dutch painters represented but the French pictures are, in their various ways, the more important part of the exhibition.

Two works by Corot are both quite small, an excellent little picture of the port of Dunquerque and a landscape, which is between his earlier and his later ways of painting. A Tahitian picture by Gauguin very typical of him but more decorative in its color than most of his work; a small portrait of himself is very interesting. Fantin-Matour is better represented than any one else in the exhibition, with seven pictures. There is a fine example of his flower painting, and two pictures of fruit—one of them, specially good, of grapes. One of the best of his works here is a small and very good study of the head of a girl, and there are three figure pictures, of which a little one of a girl standing in sunlight under trees is worth special notice. A portrait by Manet of a cafe waiter is good Manet but naturally a rather dull picture; the only Renoir is a picture of roses in which Renoir's reds have their right place. A very fine head of an old man is by Ribot; a delightful picture of a full-rigged ship in harbor is by Boudin and there is a very pleasant garden full of sunlight by Monet. A small Van Gogh, a good and fairly early winter landscape by Camille Pissarro and good examples of Monticelli, Utrillo and Cezanne are also in this exhibition.

SPAN OF CENTURY IN CANADIAN ART

Interesting Collection Placed on Exhibition in Watson Art Galleries

EIGHTEEN BY KRIEGHOFF

Examples Include Work of Painters Who Have Won High Regard in Dominion and Abroad

Satisfaction and pride are the feelings excited by the collection of paintings by Canadian artists on view in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, where the front upstairs gallery displays examples from Jacobi down to the present. Chosen with discernment and hung with taste, the works reveal in pointed manner that Canada has long been able to boast a very personal art, and further show the change in vision, technique and taste in a century. In the group on view is work by sterling painters who have passed on — Brynmor, Cullen, Horne Russell, Morrice, to mention a few who have left their mark on Canadian art—as well as men of today who in their individual way show that painting in the Dominion is alive and moving.

There are 18 by Krieghoff, done in the period between 1848 and 1865. These reveal the painter in various phases from the individual figures like "An Indian Hunter" and "A Lorette Squaw," both winter scenes, to the more elaborate "Indian Trappers"—figures crossing a lake with a toboggan; the richly colored and enamel-like quality of "Chippewa Indians at a Portage"—hilly country, water, a birchbark canoe, bush and figures, to the important and dramatically treated "Owl's Head, Lake Memphramagog," with its boat and three occupants in roughening water, and noble mountain wreathed in threatening clouds. Then there are the spirited "Coming Down Rapids at Lachine," and "The Little Shawinigan," the latter showing logs on the shore of the rocky defile through which the river falls in foam, with an angler in the foreground and another figure in the distance. This work is one of Krieghoff's examples of painting out of doors and the identity of the fisherman has been established. From this brush, too, are examples which are of marked value to the historian—figures in carefully observed costumes and settings of their day, done with a precision and finish that are not now in the fashion. Two paintings are distinctly personal — "The Artist and his Friends," painted in 1848, showing the interior of his home at Longueuil with men playing cards, the painter and his wife, and their daughter Emelie before the open fireplace with a dog. "The Blue Carriole" shows Krieghoff and his wife in a smart sleigh behind a spirited horse on the frozen St. Lawrence River, with, in the distance, the blue shoulder of Mount Royal and the twin towers of Notre Dame Church, which, in a day that did not vision sky-scrapers, dominated all surrounding buildings. In these two works the finish is high and detail so complete that there need be no argument over how these people looked and what they wore—valuable documents now that almost every moment hatches some change.

Precision and detail mark the examples by O. R. Jacobi, 1812-1901, second president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, whose skill and observation record how the Montmorency River and its rapids appeared in 1860.

WORKS BY MORRICE

The groups by J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., 1865-1924, contains some lovely items—the breezy painting of sailing ships off St. Malo; a waterside scene in Venice with building, lights and figures; a night effect on the Seine with lights on distant shore, on a craft in the stream, and, in the foreground, a moored barge, solitary lantern and a watchman. This painter's skill in producing beautiful tone is evident in "Early Snow, Quebec"—barges and tug laid-up for the winter, riverside sheds, and a horse and cart travelling the snowy road. Among the sterling works by William Brynmor, C.M.G., R.C.A., 1855-1925, is a scene near St. Eustache, which reveals his ability and authority as a painter in water color. The art of Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., 1866-1934, is worthily represented by scenes of the Laurentian country, including the beautiful "Hoarfrost and Snow," with its glimpse of distant sunlit hill beyond the snow-covered river, with patches of riven ice, edged by trees powdered with frost and snow; as well as by solidly painted peaks and valleys in the Rockies. Among the works by A. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A.—mainly of the country about his native Arthabaska—is "A Sugar Camp," which has in it the promise of spring. A habitation in deep snow, a distant horse, the old wooden shack and the maples are painted with vigor, the shadows on the snow and building tie the design together, and there is in the tree-tops against the blue sky that ruddy flush that suggests the crows may arrive any day. F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., is well represented by winter scenes, with logging teams, buildings and expanses of country, which reveal his uncanny faculty for painting spacious skies in which thin clouds float; and by a watercolor—a Dutch interior with woman tending a vessel over a small brazier, which might have been signed by the best of the Dutch painters. The sea comes into its own with works by G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., 1861-1933, and two canvases are outstanding—a shore scene with waves breaking in foam on rocks; and "The Gully, Louisburg," with its rocks in sunshine and shadow and the heavy waves of the incoming tide piling into the narrow cleft.

Albert H. Robinson, R.C.A., has an important winter scene with buildings, backed by wooded hills, and sleighs travelling the hilly road, besides a number of smaller works which include a white house under a grey sky, direct in handling and right in values; and a vivid glimpse of white boats on mud, stretch of blue water and a steamer at the wharf at St. Malo. Emphasis on pattern marks the work of A. Y. Jackson, individual in vision and robust of touch, and St. Malo in sunlight, and a beach scene with figures are among representative paintings by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A. Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., shows his versatility in beach scenes about Metis and winter landscapes in the Laurentians at Piedmont and St. Sauveur, the snowy landscapes in particular revealing how thoroughly sympathetic this painter is to the Northland. Stretches of snowy, wooded hills in sunshine and shadow have attracted Henry Simpkins, who has employed his marked talent as a watercolorist to recording the country about Morin Heights, while Berthe DesClayes, besides a pastoral, shows carts hauling snow on Dorchester street, with Dominion Square and St. George's Church beyond. W. H. Clapp, A.R.C.A., now of California, has an important painting of sun-shot haze called "The Pool," besides an earlier Paris effort—"The Guarded Slave," which was shown at the Salon. By Paul Caron are watercolors in which habitants and their sleighs are the centre of interest, and some sketches and decoratively treated landscapes are from the brush of Archibald Browne, R.C.A. By the late Henri Julien is a spirited horse driven by a farmer returning from market, and, in addition to small sketches, the late J. Y. Johnstone, A.R.C.A., is represented by a luminous painting of an old farmhouse with a figure, in sunshine and shadow.

CULTURE OF TODAY FOUND TOO BOOKISH

Modern Man Out of Touch With Art, Prof. Ramsay Traquair Says

"Culture today is so largely literary that it is difficult for us to appreciate a culture based on seeing rather than reading," Professor Ramsay Traquair told the Montreal Art Association in a lecture last night on English mediaeval sculpture. He deplored the domination of books. Whereas, in the 13th century, he said, a man could be educated without knowing how to read, it was only too common, today, to be educated without being able to see. "We have lost the necessity of art," he exclaimed and he concluded his lecture with a plea that art should once more be something better than mere pleasant adornment.

Sculpture in the middle ages was a real and living thing, in a way that it could never be for modern man to whom books were no longer a dreadful mystery, he said. Mediaeval sculpture existed for a practical purpose, to instruct the people in the history of Christian civilization. There were no artists as artists were understood today; they were all stonemasons, bronze-founders, masons, all craftsmen, who worked according to tradition and whose art was essentially part of the buildings for which it was intended. Their expression was characterized by a true feeling for material and for purpose.

As he outlined the development of English sculpture, from stone to alabaster and bronze, from simplicity to the more luxurious and dramatic treatment, Professor Traquair explained the differences between the three outstanding styles and illustrated his comments with slides made from photographs of Westminster Abbey, Wells Cathedral, Lincoln, St. Mary the Virgin at Oxford, Exeter, and some of the other great buildings. He showed not only saints and angels and kings and bishops, but some of the smaller figures, cocks, foxes, dogs and fabulous lions carved out of oak to point a satire. These were examples of the humanity and humor that went into much of England's mediaeval sculpture.

Colorless sculpture was a modern taste, he said in passing. All mediaeval sculpture was brightly colored with clear tints and gilding, which not only aided the people to recognize the figures but did much to preserve the carving. He deplored the fact that only a few of the thousands of figures remained today, most of them having been destroyed by law. None of England's great 12th Century metalwork was left, largely due to the activities of Henry VIII, but England was richer in town memorials than most countries.

$30,000 PICTURES SUIT IS DISMISSED

Mr. Justice Mercier Holds Paintings Undamaged By Fire

The $30,000 action of the New York Art Corporation against the American Home Fire Assurance Company in connection with alleged damages caused six paintings by a fire in the gallery of John Joseph Cusack, on October 10, 1932, was dismissed with costs by Mr. Justice Mercier.

In judgment, Mr. Justice Mercier held that the oil paintings suffered no damage and that the defendant had proved the essential points of its case against the action. He thereupon dismissed the action with costs. The American Home Fire Assurance Company, however, offered to reimburse Mr. Cusack $5,000 had he paid to the concern the amount of the policy which had been annulled.

NATIONAL GALLERY FOUND UNSUITABLE

OTTAWA, Dec. 2—(C.P.)—Dr. Julius Held, former assistant director of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin, believes Canada's National Gallery should have a new building with an auditorium, and that the country needs a national library. Before his week-end departure for New York at the end of a lecture series Dr. Held, an authority on painting, expressed the belief that the National Gallery quarters adjacent to the National Museum were inadequate. He suggested that a national library might be formed through amalgamation of the Parliamentary and other libraries connected with Government departments.

Robert Pilot's Exhibition At Watson's

A collection of nearly fifty pictures and sketches, all of recent work, by Robert Pilot, R.C.A., is being shown at the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke St. The pictures are new not merely in time but also in ideas and manner and they make the best showing of Mr. Pilot's work that he has given. There are winter and summer landscapes, the winter ones mostly in the Laurentians, near Piedmont and St. Sauveur, the summer ones at Metis and other places down the river.

Some of the summer pictures are the newest, and one of the big ones is a very good marine of sea and rocky shore, with good colour and suggestion of movement. There is a big picture of Metis Beach, with an excellent effect of light in the sky, and it is very interesting to compare this, and some of the other pictures, with the sketches for them, which are also in this exhibition. Another striking picture, and one of the best in the collection is a view of Cap Tormente from the Isle of Orleans, a fine effect of a big, dark hill against a stormy sky. Rather like this is the only pastel in the exhibition, of Mont Ste. Anne from the Isle of Orleans, a good picture of the hill in half darkness in front of a cloudy evening sky, full of interesting lighting.

Mr. Pilot has always painted snow very sympathetically and there are some good snow pictures here. In some of them the snow helps to show up the gay colours of French Canadian houses, and the same colours without snow are in several cheerful pictures painted at Beauport and on the Isle of Orleans. There are quieter tones in a simple but very satisfactory composition of the hill at Piedmont, in one of the Military Church at Chambly, a group of buildings and trees surrounded by very wet snow, and in a very good summer picture of the village and church of St. Francois, Isle of Orleans, by evening light.

INTERESTING SHOW BY WOMEN ARTISTS

Gazette Dec. 5/35

Picture-lovers Are Attracted to Collection at Eaton Fine
Art Galleries

Work by the members of the Women's Art Society of Montreal, on exhibition in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, is attracting a good attendance, the show being one of the best put on in recent years. The standard set is high and there are evidences of distinct advance in the work of some of the painters.

Mrs. Lilian Hingston shows her usual sympathy and skill in "Pansies" and "White Flowers," the arrangement being engaging and the handling capable. Mrs. M. N. Mullally is effective in her oil called "Bouquet of Flowers," the practised hand being revealed in "Peonies" by Mrs. Mary L. Dunning. The same blooms have attracted Jean M. MacLean, while Mrs. Elizabeth Mitchell finds a congenial subject in "Roses." Mrs. Allan Turner contributes "Study of Currants."

In portraiture, Ida Beck has "Colored Boy," a confidently handled pastel, and "Brunette in Red," Mrs. Karl H. Forbes sends "Portrait Study," and Mrs. Beatrice M. Long, besides "Portrait of Colored Boy," is represented by "Study in Profile." Mrs. J. Pierce, whose ably handled portrait of a man at last year's show will be recalled, sends "The Habitant." Heads of children are contributed by A. K. Trim.

Landscape, as usual, predominates and there are some distinctly good things on view. Mrs. Jane C. Luke each year shows greater facility in suggesting atmosphere and the glitter of sunlight, qualities that are abundantly evident in "St. Vincent de Paul" and "A Street in Ste. Therese." Mrs. M. N. Mullally, too, is convincing in the suggestion of moist chill that envelops snowy landscape and building in "Heavy Snowfall, St. Sauveur." Ida M. Huddell finds a picturesque subject in an old mill, and Mrs. Winifred D. Lewis shows a vessel and drying nets, called "Low Tide, Rockport." Mrs. Annie Pringle finds the Laurentian country inspiring and shows a farmhouse and an autumn scene. Margaret C. Thompson exhibits works done in California and also a glimpse of the Grand Canyon of Colorado. Cap a l'Aigle and Point a Pic have been the sketching ground of Marjorie Allan, and Mrs. Ann Low Allan found a subject at Cornerbrook, Newfoundland.

Other works that are interesting and attractive are contributed by Mrs. John Allan, Jean Baillie, Mrs. Burns, Ethel Derrick, Edith Glen, Mrs. Darwin Higginson, Mrs. Mullock, Reba M. Saddington, Margaret Sanborn, E. A. Snaith, F. W. Sweeney, Norah Smyth and V. M. K. Walker.

The exhibition remains open until December 14.

A number of sketches and pictures by Frank S. Panabaker are now being shown in Eaton's art galleries. The sketches are the better part of this exhibition, and one of woods in autumn, a sketch of black trunks standing out against pale pink and nearly white foliage is quite the best of them. Two other autumn sketches are very good little compositions in browns and yellows, and there is a very nice softness of light in a sketch of summer evening on the Nation River. Some very good studies of skies are among these sketches, one rather striking one of sunlight breaking through clouds on Rice Lake and several other good ones, though in one or two of them the sky kills the landscape. There are several rather effective little pictures of lone trees standing out against the sky.

The larger pictures are rather unequal and some of them are hardly of Mr. Panabaker's best. Among the most successful of them are one of autumn haze on the Grand River, with a good impression of light and mist, and one of "Haying in the hills, Bale St. Paul." There are a number of good sketches made in the neighbourhood of Bale St. Paul. A big picture of cloud shadows on a hillside is a clever study of light and shade and colour, but not very interesting as a picture. Mr. Panabaker seems, in some of these pictures, to have been trying experiments which have not all succeeded.

PRINTS MAKE GOOD EXHIBIT AT EATON'S

Gazette Dec. 7/35

Etchings, Woodcuts, Color
Prints by W. K. Aykroyd, W.
Godfrey and L. Hutchinson

Lovers of prints will find much to interest them in the exhibition being held in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, by W. K. Aykroyd, whose art is etching; W. F. G. Godfrey, who cuts wood blocks, and L. Hutchinson with color prints. It is a show that reveals considerable industry, and there is plenty of variety as to subject.

Mr. Aykroyd has travelled far and seen much, and his etchings are straightforward performances. His sense of composition is generally good, his line is clean and he has a nice appreciation of what is quaint in architecture. Most of the plates have a rather formal individuality, adequate drawing and effective arrangement of light and shadow, and now, so thoroughly grounded, it may be that future prints by this artist may tend a bit more towards suggestion and greater spontaneity. Europe has furnished him with interesting subjects in the old timbered houses and clock tower in "La Rue de L'Hologe, Dinan"; a battlemented tower and old cafe plastered with tobacco signs, archway and figures in "Vannes, Brittany"; the Hotel de Ville at Saumur; five windmills and dike in "Summer Day, Holland"; ancient houses opposite the church at Conches, France; and clock-tower and old houses at Honfleur, France. In Holland, steamers and boats in the harbor at Amsterdam proved attractive, while, in England, a windmill in Essex could not be resisted, nor could the elaborate sign of "Ye Olde White Hart Hostlerie" at Red Hill, Surrey, be overlooked. Atmospherically, "Westminster Bridge" — figures, bus, gleaming pavements and the Houses of Parliament blurred by the downpour — touches the highest spot in suggestion, much the same spirit being shown in "Eaton's, College Street, Toronto," on a rainy day. Other prints include one of the Canadian schooner Bluenose under sail, and Kent Gate and Montcalm's house in Quebec.

Generally speaking, Mr. Godfrey brings a broad, bold technique to his wood blocks and shows appreciation of the decorative possibilities of black and white. "On the Don" — tugboat and scow and river-side buildings, is direct and clean in treatment, the movement of the water being well suggested. "Land of the Maple" has good distance in the water stretching to distant hills, while in the foreground is a noble tree. "The Rustic Bridge, Mt. Hamilton," is an ambitious effort, as is "The Deserted Lime Kiln" — the abandoned works being backed by a wooded knoll. There is a good impression of waning day in "The Valley Farm," with its shadowed buildings and banded sky, and the glare of noon illumines the group of trees in "Where Field and Forest Meet." Effective prints of smaller scale are the simply handled "Winter, St. Maurice Street, Montreal," with old buildings and deep-rutted snowy road, and "The Old Book Store," "Dominion Square, Montreal," is particularly happy in the treatment of the cabs on the Metcalfe Street stand, with trees and paths in the foreground.

Mr. Hutchinson is a lover of bright colors in his prints, which veer strongly towards the decorative. Particularly effective in the treatment of distant highland and water is "Hills of Waterdown, Lake Ontario," while there is lovely quality in the sunset sky of "The Old Coal Yard," with its wooden structure in silhouette. Clouds, trees, hills and water are the pictorial elements of "Prelude," which suggests that rain is on the way. "Winter's Warning, Lake Ontario," with its stretch of water, hill and poplars, has good color, and twilight is the time of "Fishing Shed, Grimsby, Ont.," with its moored boat, wooden walks and cabin. Light glitters on the water in "Burlington Bay," and a big sun swings up in "Dawn, Indian Point." Purely decorative and rich in color is "Marshland Nocturne" — trees in silhouette against water which reflects a ruddy moon, while geese fly overhead.

GROUP'S SECOND SHOW Gazette Jan. 2/36

Canadian Painters Exhibit in Toronto Gallery

Toronto, January 2.—(P)—The Canadian Group of Painters which evolved from the pioneering Group of Seven tonight opened its second exhibition since its membership was increased to 28 in 1933.

The exhibition, characterized by what one critic called a "commendable lack of imitation," forms the January feature at the art gallery of Toronto.

Paintings have been contributed by members of the group from Winnipeg and Montreal; Toronto and Midland, in Ontario; Nootka, Victoria and Vancouver, in British Columbia. Invited contributors have sent canvases from Ottawa and Montreal, while a number are from Toronto artists outside the group.

Montreal's Prudence Heward won the approbation of opening night critics with her "Dark Girl." Critics also were agreed that George Pepper of Toronto in his picture, "Granite," had successfully captured on canvas the majesty of rock.

The work of the original members of the Group of Seven was represented, however, as the outstanding contribution to the exhibition.

to Full Membership

FOUR NEW ASSOCIATES

Frank Carmichael, John Clymer, A. C. Leighton and A. Sherriff Scott in List—Sir Wyly Grier President

Elevation to full membership of the R.C.A. of three Associates, and the election of four painters to be Associates resulted from the annual meeting of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, held in the Lecture Hall of the Art Association of Montreal, yesterday afternoon.

The Associates elected R.C.A. painters are Archibald Barnes, Toronto, and Edwin H. Holgate, of Montreal. The new academical architect is Dr. John A. Pearson, of Toronto.

Those elected A.R.C.A. are Frank Carmichael, of Lansing, Ont.; John F. Clymer, Toronto; A. C. Leighton, Calgary, Alta., and Adam Sherriff Scott, of Montreal.

The officers of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts were re-elected by acclamation as follows: President, Sir Wyly Grier, Toronto; vice-president, W. S. Maxwell, R.C.A., Montreal; treasurer, Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., Montreal; secretary, E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., Montreal.

The council was elected as follows: J. W. Beatty, R.C.A., Toronto; E. Dyonnet, R.C.A.; F. S. Coburn, R.C.A.; R. W. Pilot, R.C.A.; Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., and Henri Hebert, R.C.A., all of Montreal.

THOSE HONORED.

Archibald Barnes, R.C.A., who came from England to Toronto five years ago, is regarded as one of the leading portrait painters. He is a sound draughtsman and good colorist, his contribution of a man in a yellow tunic in the R.C.A., exhibition at the Art Association admirably revealing these qualities. His promotion to full R.C.A. is rapid, since it was only two years ago that he was elected an Associate.

Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., of Montreal, who was elected an Associate two years ago, is a painter of vigor and originality. The present R.C.A. exhibition has an example of his virile brushwork and daring color in the portrait of Dr. A. S. Eve. Mr. Holgate is represented in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, and directs the art classes of the Art Association of Montreal.

Frank Carmichael, A.R.C.A., was born at Orillia, Ont., and studied at L'Academie Royale des Beaux-Arts, Antwerp, and at the Ontario College of Art, Toronto. He was elected a member of the O.S.A. in 1917. He is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, with a work entitled "The Hilltop."

John F. Clymer, A.R.C.A., is a bold colorist with a strongly developed decorative sense. This is evidenced in his contributions to the present exhibition of the R.C.A., in "Thunder Mountain"—an Indian with bird-like ceremonial head-dress, and a portrait scene of gay color, called "Autumn Trail."

A. C. Leighton, A.R.C.A., who came from England a few years ago, is an accomplished exponent of the fluid-wash watercolor. He has done much effective painting in the Rockies, and in the present R.C.A. show has two oils of very limited color range—"Skoki, Canadian Rockies"—mountains and a stream, and "Kokosila, Indian Village, Duncan, B.C.," which shows a group of buildings in pale sunlight as seen from above.

Adam Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, was born in Perth, Scotland, in 1887. He studied his profession at the Edinburgh School of Art, winning the Allen-Fraser Scholarship. He spent a year of independent study in France and six months in Holland, coming to Montreal in 1911. He did the decorations of the Hudson's Bay Company's building at Winnipeg—the history of settlement being the theme—the decorations at the Seignior Club, Que., at the Manoir Richelieu, Murray Bay, and both the figure and ornamental decorations at the St. Denis Theatre, Montreal. It was one of his paintings, "Arrangement in Grey"—a woman inspecting prints in a portfolio—that was stolen from a public exhibition a few years ago, and later recovered after confession by the thief, who committed suicide. This work now hangs in St. James's Club, Montreal. He is represented at the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by "The Green Hat" and "Captured Satyr," the latter a pastel.

ANNUAL DINNER HELD

Following the meeting the annual dinner was held at the Arts Club of Montreal, Victoria street, where the officers and members of the R.C.A. were welcomed by the president, Ben Deacon. The affair was informal and intimate. The president of the Royal Canadian Academy, Sir Wyly Grier, in a brief address in reminiscent vein, incidentally recalling a meeting with H.R.H. Princess Louise in 1883, touched on the amity that marks the membership of the R.C.A. and stressed the importance of its position in Canadian art. He then called on a few members and guests for speeches, which were brief. The two Montreal painters expressed gratification at the honor shown them by the R.C.A.

Those present at the dinner were: Sir Wyly Grier, Lady Dyonnet, Maxwell, C. W. Simpson, J. net, and the following members: J. W. Beatty, F. S. Challenger, F. S. Coburn, Paul B. Earle, Ernest Foss, Mrs. Hortense Gordon, F. S. Haines, Adrien Hebert, Henri Hebert, Edwin H. Holgate, C. W. Jeffrey, Hugh G. Jones, Miss Marion Long, John M. Lyle, Miss Mabel May, Miss F. H. McGillivray, J. Melville Miller, Percy E. Nobbs, R. W. Pilot, Miss Elizabeth S. Nutt, Hal W. Perrigard, Herbert Raine, G. A. Reid, Frank Hennessy and Hugh Vallance.

Progress of Art Told in Lecture Star Jan. 21/36

What was really an abridged history of painting was given in the lecture which Prof. George W. Eggers, Director of the Art Department of the College of the City of New York, gave to the Art Association of Montreal on Monday. The title of the lecture was "Trends and Digressions from Giotto to our time," giving the lecturer a subject which he could only with difficulty cover in a lecture which lasted nearly two hours. His purpose was, in part, to show how art, and more particularly painting has developed from the pure and simple story telling of Giotto and the primitive painters to the "baroque" artists, who compelled their spectators to enter into the facts and emotions of their pictures. Art, as he considered, has moved in a spiral, not returning exactly to its former self, but to a place just above or below where it was before. The lecture was illustrated by many pictures thrown on the screen, and special prominence was given to the work of Giotto, as a principal starting point of modern art. The importance and development of landscape, first as an accessory in pictures and then as a subject in its own right, and the growth of elaboration in a series of subjects of religious pictures were well shown in the lecture and its illustrations.

RETURN OF VARIETY OF ARTICLES SOUGHT Jan 17/36—Star

Art Dealer Sues Former Landlady

A question as to who is the rightful owner of a miscellaneous assortment of articles, including 14 paintings, a vacuum cleaner, coffee percolator, marble clock, kitchen clock, a plaster figure, a number of antiques, a sun ray machine and a violet ray machine is presented to Mr. Justice Duranleau, at the instance of A. B. Watson, art dealer, in the Superior Court today. The articles, according to the plaintiff, are his property and are worth $1,452.50, he states in a seizure in which he states that Mrs. Fred Campeau is detaining them illegally.

Mrs. Campeau told the court that all the articles contained in the plaintiff's list belong to her with the exception of the vacuum cleaner, sun ray machine and violet ray machine and Watson is welcome to remove the last-named articles from her house anytime he likes. As for the other articles, she says that they were gifts to her from Watson, who had been a boarder in her home for two years. These gifts, she said, had been made to her as tokens of friendship. As regards a large number of the paintings, she said that they had been painted by Watson himself, as an amateur painter, and he had insisted that she take from the walls some of her own paintings and substitute for them some of the pictures to which he now lays claim. In any event, she added, the pictures were not worth the $150 value which he now placed on them.

Work of Doris M. Judah Reveals Wide Range of Talent

Admirers of the work of Doris M. Judah, Montreal sculptor, as it has appeared from time to time at the Montreal Art Association, in the Royal Canadian Academy and other shows, will be interested in seeing the 16 pieces which have been assembled at the Coffee House, 1191 Union Avenue. The exhibition, which will be open until the end of the month, gives a comprehensive idea of the talent and scope of the modeller. For the most part, the work is in the nature of portrait sculpture, and busts are shown of Miss Winnifred Kydd, Brig-Gen. H. S. Birkett, the late Lieut.-Col. W. W. Burland, Miss Catherine I. Mackenzie, Professor Harold Hibbert, the late Dean H. M. Mackay. One head, of a sleepy child, is called "The Awakening"; there is a lively head of a young dancer. Of the three plaques, "Masque Oriental," a portrait of Mme. Kiang Kang-Hu, is outstanding.

Three works show the sculptor on flights of imagination. "Mind Moves Matter" is a decapitated head perched on a pile of books and blandly smiling; "On Waves of Sound" is a violinist heaved up by the turbulent sea; "And He Made the Stars Also" is a pair of hands shaping a globe.

Doris M. Judah, a former pupil of E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., A. Laliberte, R.C.A., and the late W. Brymner, R.C.A., was medallist of the Council of Arts and Manufactures, 1918-1919. She was director of the Rochester, Minn., Art Association and Modelling School in 1924-1925.

Sir Wyly Grier, D.C.L., president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, Lady Grier, and Mr. W. S. Maxwell, vice-president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts will receive the guests this evening at the fifty-sixth annual exhibition which is being held by The Royal Canadian Academy of Arts in the Galleries of the Art Association, 1379 Sherbrooke street west, at 8.30 o'clock.

Dr. F. Owen Stredder, bursar of the university, announced the retirements and in the announcement pointed out that the Board of Governors of the University acted under the statutory provision for the retirement of members of the staff who have attained or exceeded the of 65 years.

All were retired on pension, special arrangements having been made in the case of A. P. S. Glassco who is not yet 65 years of age. "In making these retirements," Dr. Stredder stated, "the board has expressed its great appreciation of the services rendered to the university and of the eminence achieved by staff members in their respective fields." The retirements go into effect at the end of the present academic year except in the case of Mr. Glassco, who retires December 31 next.

SENIOR DEAN GOES.

Dr. Charles Ferdinand Martin, head of the Faculty of Medicine of McGill, is the senior dean of the university and one of the most popular members of the staff.

Dr. Martin has an extremely high reputation on this continent as an authority on diseases of the blood.

He is a Montrealer, having been born here on October 14, 1868. Educated in Montreal schools and at McGill University, he took his first degree, that of B.A. in 1888, following this up in 1892 with degrees of M.D. and C.M. For the next three years he did post-graduate work in medicine in the foremost clinics of Australia, Germany and France, and in 1897 was appointed to the teaching field.

from the Dean of his faculty.
ACTED AS PRINCIPAL.

On one occasion when Sir Arthur Currie, then principal of the university, was absent from Montreal, Dean Martin filled in as acting principal. Besides his activities as head of his faculty Dean Martin was a member of the Royal Victoria Hospital Staff, whose physician-in-chief he was at the time of his retirement from the post in 1934.

Apart from the field of medicine Dean Martin is widely known as a sportsman. Tennis is his favorite game and he continues to play it. In 1891, while still a student at McGill, he won the Dominion singles tennis championship.

Among the honors that have been given him was the presidency of American College of Physicians in 1928-29, that of the Association of American Medical College in 1929 and also that of the Canadian National Commission for Mental Hygiene.

PROFESSOR LEACOCK

Prof. Stephen Butler Leacock, possibly the most widely known of the group through his numerous literary works, mostly in his customary humorous style, has been on the McGill staff 32 years. He was born at Swanmoor, Hampshire, England 66 years ago and was brought to Canada as a small child.

The greater part of his education was received in Toronto, at Upper Canada College and University of Toronto. He returned to Upper Canada as master in modern languages after his graduation from Varsity, then joined McGill in 1903.

Literary work of Dr. Leacock has been likened to the output of Lewis Carroll, who would alternate between writing "Alice in Wonderland," and subsequent stories on this immortal child, with treatise on mathematics. Mr. Leacock would jump from such parodies as "moonbeams from the larger lunacy" to "elements of political economy."

After the war he made a tour of the British Empire under the auspices of the Cecil Rhodes Trust, speaking on "Imperial organization." A few years later he toured Great Britain in another role, that of a humorist.

Among his serious works are "Baldwin and Lafontaine," "Essays and Literary Studies" and "The Unsolved Riddle of Social Justice."

PROFESSOR STANSFIELD

Alfred Stansfield, also a native of England, was sent by the Canadian Government in 1914 to report on electric smelting of iron ores in Sweden. Mr. Stansfield, at McGill since 1901, also was a member of the commission appointed by the Minister of Militia and Defence to investigate feasibility of producing refined copper and zinc in Canada, and in 1918-1919 served as editor of Iron and Steel in Canada. Author of a number of scientific papers, he was awarded the Plummer Medal of the Engineering Institute of Canada in 1921. From 1911 to 1931 he was commissioner of the pyx of the Royal Mint at Ottawa.

PROFESSOR WALTER

Herman Walter, professor of German and chairman of the department, has been associated with the university nearly 35 years. He was born 72 years ago and holds a degree of Ph.D. from Munich.

PROFESSOR EVANS.

Professor Evans joined the McGill staff in 1886 as an assistant in chemistry. Three years later he resigned this post to pursue postgraduate studies abroad, returning in 1891 as lecturer in chemistry. In 1900 he was named assistant professor of chemistry, in 1907 associate professor and in 1928 professor of chemistry.

PROFESSOR ARMSTRONG

Professor Armstrong came to the McGill staff in 1896 as associate professor of freehand drawing and descriptive geometry. In 1926 he was appointed professor in these subjects.

PROFESSOR DYONNET

Professor Dyonnet came to McGill in 1920 as special instructor in freehand drawing and modelling, and in the following year was named lecturer. Two years ago he was promoted to a full professorship in this subject.

PROFESSOR VILLARD

Professor Villard who obtained his B.A. degree at the University of France, M.A. at Ohio Wesleyan College and M.D., C.M., at Bishop's, joined the McGill staff as lecturer in French in 1910. In 1919 he was made assistant professor, in 1924 associate professor and in 1932 member of the faculty of graduate studies and research. He started his teaching career in Montreal as headmaster of the French Methodist Institute, later joining the staff of the Wesleyan Theological College.

PROFESSOR SNELL

Professor Snell was named assistant professor of chemistry at Macdonald College in 1907, and professor in 1909. For part of the session 1932-33 he was acting dean of the faculty of agriculture. This was following the resignation of Dr. Barton.

DR. ABBOTT

Dr. Abbott, who has gained fame for her studies on hereditary diseases of the heart following a distinguished academic career at Bishop's, McGill and Edinburgh, joined the medical faculty staff in 1905 as research fellow in pathology. In 1910 she was named curator of the medical museum and in 1914 lecturer in pathology. Two years later she was made lecturer in bacteriology and in 1924 was promoted to assistant professor in medical research.

Dr. McCarthy was appointed assistant professor of chemistry at Macdonald College in 1920.

Mr. Wright, who is retiring as registrar at Macdonald came to the college in 1907 as secretary to the principal, his appointment as registrar coming in 1928.

PHOTOGRAPHIC ART SHOWS 218 PRINTS

Abstract and Trick Poses Absent From International Exhibit

Ottawa, November 15.—(C)—The second Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art opened today at the National Gallery with a selection of 218 prints by 153 camera artists, including 26 by 16 Canadians.

The exhibited prints, selected by a jury from about 1,600 submitted by photographers all over the world, will be sent on tour at the end of the show.

Subjects of the pictures, produced by photographic processes unknown to most amateur snapshotters, vary through landscapes, portraits, figure studies, sports, architecture, nature studies and half-abstractions obtained by trick lighting and camera-setting.

Abstraction and trick pictures, fashionable a few years ago, have shrunk to a small minority and most pictorialists represented in the show have tackled their subjects naturally, seeking to bring up such things as textures of objects, atmosphere and the play of light and shadow.

Noticeable is the fine treatment of ice, snow and water. All three are combined in "Ice formations, Lake Ontario" by D. Campbell of Oshawa, Ont., a picture of ice banks, partly snow-covered, jutting into chill water. Snow-flecked, black water slides past puffy snow-covered ice in "Thin Ice" by J. P. Skillen of Hamilton. W. C. West of Chicago has a picture of twigs covered by crystallized snow through which light shows. He calls it "Translucence."

The Japanese, Mitsutaro Fuku of Seattle, Wash., has two fine water pictures, "Tidal Play," showing the rumpled surface of the sea moved by under-currents, and "Autumnal Shower," raindrops splashing into a pond beside lily pads. The pattern of river-work on the Gatineau is shown in "Sorting Logs" by C. M. Johnston of Ottawa. The Japanese, Preceded by a funeral service at Ottawa, where he died at his home, 88 Fifth avenue, New Year's eve, the burial of Henri Fabien, Canadian painter and sculptor, took place at Cote des Neiges Cemetery today. The body was brought here by motor hearse direct from the Christ-Roi Church in the Capital.

Mr. Fabien was born in St. Henry and received his education at the Brothers' School at Ste. Cuneode, where his father was mayor before that municipality was annexed to Montreal. He is said to have been the only Canadian who ever had paintings hung at the Paris Salon two years in succession.

His artistic ability first attracted the notice of E. Dyonnet of the Royal Canadian Academy who taught him for several years. Later he entered the Art Association School at Montreal.

In 1889 Fabien went to Paris where he studied under noted French artists. He returned to Canada in 1902 after a further period of study in Brittany. His first exhibition in Montreal attracted favorable notice from critics but few sales and Fabien went to the newspaper La Presse as a pen-and-ink artist.

GOES TO OTTAWA.

In 1905 he went to Ottawa and became chief draftsman of the Department of Indian Affairs. Later he became a translator for the Department.

In 1911 he had exhibited almost without interruption at shows of the Academy and the Art Association of Montreal.

Since 1911 he had exhibited almost My Daughter Jacqueline" to the Paris Salon where it was hung. The following year the Salon hung his portrait of Betty Low, Ottawa dancer now with the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe.

He is survived by his widow, two daughters and one son. J. Adelard Fabien, 4600 King Edward, Notre Dame de Grace, C. A. and J. Wilfrid Fabien, all of Montreal, are brothers, and Miss Maria Fabien, Montreal is a sister.

PHOTOGRAPHIC ART OF WORLD ON SHOW

High Standard of Excellence Displayed in 218 Camera Studies of Many Types

The validity of photography as an art medium has never been better demonstrated in Montreal than at the Second Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art, now being held in the Montreal Art Association gallery. First and foremost, the salon is interesting as a distinguished collection of pictures—218 of them; but it is valuable for two other reasons: for the enlightenment it brings the public on the development of photography, and for the stimulus it gives the photographer himself. A debt of gratitude is due the National Gallery of Canada for circulating the exhibition, and an especial debt to Frank R. Fraprie, Boston; Bruce Metcalfe, Toronto; and John Vanderpant, Vancouver, the jury which sifted through hundreds of entries from all parts of the world to arrive at an admirable conclusion.

A score of countries are represented, from China to Czechoslovakia, from New Zealand to South Africa, and the entries are so uniformly good, in approach and treatment, that it would be impossible to say that any one country was photographically better than another. Of course the standards of the judges have something to do with this uniformity, and those who heard Mr. Vanderpant's lecture in Montreal a few weeks ago will know something of what these standards are.

The uniformity is not of subject matter. Grasses throwing delicate shadows on ribbed sand are a world away from piles of metal pipes, but in the majority of the exhibits—and this is where photography has progressed—the subject is not the important thing; the grasses and the pipes were not photographed because they were grasses and pipes, but because they provided the elements of satisfying composition. Such titles as "Relief," "Still Life," "Sand Symphony," "Step by Step," "Light Fantasia," "An Architectural Abstraction," "Back Yard Pattern," "Floral Rhythm," "Modern Arrangement" and "Triangles" imply a photographer making pictures and not just "taking" them.

DESIGNS WIDELY VARIED

The exhibition is not made up of purely formal designs, however. Other qualities are present. There are pictures that tell stories, there are character portraits, there are sentimental, atmospheric landscapes. Yet they all have something to say photographically. It may be light—as it shines through the snow in the twigs of W. C. West's "Translucence"; as it makes a pattern with shadow on the tiled floor in Chen Chuan-Lin's "Shadow Effects"; as it is dappled with water and sand in "Sunlit Shore" by Hashimoto Kiyoshi. It may be texture—the bloom on Mario Gabino's grapes; the skin of Nowroz Kooka's "Mali"; the lustre of Karl Kletz's glass bowls; the leaves and stems of "Skunk Cabbage" by Emmanuel M. Weil; the feathers of Alex J. Krupp's peacock and E. W. Jackson's dead lily; the soil of Giovanni Sansone's "Farm by the Sea."

The best of them have body, texture, character, rhythm, balance, all in one. Among the most interesting from several points of view—and it is hard to keep the list within the bounds of a short newspaper survey—are: Harold Costain's architectural abstraction, "Autumnal Shower," by Mitsutaro Fuku; "Stairs," by James Emmett, Jr.; "Still Life," Bruce Metcalfe; "Floral Rhythm," John Vanderpant; "The Cellist," Dr. Maximilian Kern; "Clevis and Cable" and "Milling Grooves," John P. Mudd; "The Potter's Hands," P. C. B. Scott Hayward; "Freedom," Harold F. Kells; "Coming In," Carroll Frey; "Around the White Band," J. Em. Borrenberger; "Wavy Sand," Heinz Bertelsmann; J. M. A. van Dyck's "Modern Arrangement" and "Triangles"; Piet Spoor's "Tranquility"; Dr. Julian Smith's "You're Telling Me!" and D. Campbell's "Ice Formation, Lake Ontario."

The 16 Canadians represented make an excellent showing.

Landscapes, Marines, Still Life and Portraits in Show at Eaton Fine Art Galleries

Work by former students of l'Ecole des Beaux Arts, St. Urbain street, makes an interesting exhibition in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. Examples in various media—oils, pastels, watercolor, woodcuts and architectural drawings occupy the galleries, which have been thronged daily, all indications pointing to a record attendance between now and the closing day, January 4.

The paintings in the main reveal the solid grounding imparted to the students at l'Ecole des Beaux Arts by the director Charles Mailland and his teaching staff, the artists showing individuality of outlook and variety in technique. The general effect of the show is pleasing and the hanging has been tastefully done—not an easy matter when the differing sizes are considered.

In subject there is much to appeal to every taste—landscapes, marines, flowers and still life, with a few portraits. The scenes are generally bits of rural Quebec, which adds to the interest of the collection.

ATTRACTIVE LANDSCAPES.

Among the landscapes there are several comely scenes by F. Constantineau, who has found beauty in a hayrick and barns; a farmer carrying water from the pump to his stock in winter; the fire-swept ruins of St. Jacques le Mineur church on St. Denis street; the village of Piedmont backed by snowy hills, and a view of St. Sauveur in winter, to mention a few. Robust in handling is the church at Riviere Beaudette in summer by Madeleine Desrosiers, who is lavish in her pigment in a Laurentian scene. Rene Chicoine has broadly treated sketches of churches, and A. Filion found an interesting subject in a bit of the old barracks on St. Helen's Island. There is a summery atmosphere to a view of the old church at Tadoussac, by R. Dionne, and sunlight floods the glimpse of "Moulin Monk, Ste. Therese," by Maurice Raymond. This painter also shows a larger work—building, poplars and figures, called "Bouillier." By Paul Levesque, a competent sketch of the old of St. Andrew and St. Paul, demolished. Irene Senecal has attractive works, reminiscent of Gogh in technique, among them being a row of houses on a hill at Port Daniel; the church at St. Simeon with water and hills beyond and a group of old waterside houses. In all these attention has been paid to drawing, values and arrangement. She also shows a still life—cosmos in a bowl, with incidental objects.

Rose Savoie Dionne, shows ability as a painter of flowers in her studies of double peonies, some zinnias and of yellow chrysanthemums, and there is effective arrangement in the still life by Aylene Gauthier Charlebois—bittersweet berries in a dark glass vessel. An old mill at St. Eustache is one of the offerings of R. Arbour, and A. Filion has a wharf scene. Laurent Morin has a glimpse of a cemetery with tombstones in sunlight, and also a portrait of a woman in a round hat, and Leopold Dufresne has found the Gaspe country congenial, among his contributions being the rocks at Perce with rolling waves and gulls. A big pine, water and hills are the pictorial elements of "Las Masson", by P. V. Beaulieu, and Jean Paul Lemieux, besides a beach scene at Bate St. Paul, has a good painting of a girl with a barn in the background. Rolande Sicotte has an ambitious nude study, and also a portrait of an old man in sunlight. Simone Denechaud shows a boy's head, and the portrait of a girl is the offering of Helen Marjorie McLeish. A pastel portrait of a girl is the contribution of F. Beckman, and Frank Iacurto, besides a freshly colored view of red rocks and blue sea, exhibits a portrait of Dr. Mancuso in academic gown. A village street with quaint old houses is signed by Francoise Masson Dansereau, and Jacques Barry employs watercolor for "Old Stone House". A bleak winter landscape is by Raymond Pellus, and Jean Charles Faucher makes decorative pattern of a steamer's funnel and ventilators. Paul Leroux has some good portrait subjects in charcoal, and examples of sculpture are also shown.

DOUBTS EXPRESSED AS TO ART'S FUTURE

Gazette Jan. 21/36
Prof. G. W. Eggers Traces Development From Giotto to Rivera

"Art is 'all dressed up and no place to go.' It is clad in splendid armor; it is ready to fight, but it has no way of choosing what to fight for. In spite of the colossal equipment it has gathered to itself through the ages, it lacks singleness of purpose. Once it had the strength of religion. What is next?"

Professor George William Eggers, Director of the Art Department, College of the City of New York, speaking to the Art Association of Montreal last night, did not hazard a prophecy on his own account, but he closed his address with a tentative answer given by the great Mexican, Diego Rivera, who maintained that art should have social significance.

The story of art, Professor Eggers said, was a long story of innovations. Art was always radical. He likened it to a keen cutting axe-blade, to be sharpened and sharpened again. But he was conscious of a sense of continuity. Behind the edge was the iron, the accumulation of the experience of ages, and the axe was wielded by an arm. He began his survey of "trends and digressions" with Giotto and, ending with Rivera, swung back to Giotto again, for Rivera acknowledged the painter of more than 600 years ago as his master—"Mural painters may go to the right or to the left, but they will always go back to Giotto."

Beginning with Giotto, one of the really great artists of the world, Professor Eggers showed how the tendency of art was to elaborate on his simple statement, to become more graceful, credible, familiar and persuasive. From persuasiveness, it expanded powerfully into compulsion and the baroque was born. Then the artist involved the spectator, drew him headlong into the picture, gave him movement and emotion, even threw emotion directly on the canvas in "athletic brushstrokes," and added greater and greater resources to painting. A coldly classical art was interjected in the course of time, but after the baroque, art could never be classic again, and the characteristics of the baroque carried on into the extravagances of some modern painting.

Illustrating his remarks by a series of slides, Professor Eggers dealt with the development of impressionism, cubism and futurism, relating all these movements to the main stream, demonstrating the theory of Cezanne and showing the places of such men as Gauguin, Renoir, Seurat and van Gogh.

Dr. Charles Martin, who presided, made a dignified reference to the passing of the late King and the speaker said "The news will bring sadness on our side of the border as well as here."

Landscapes

By Paul Earle

Star May 8/36

The pictures and sketches by Paul Earle, A.R.C.A., which are at present being shown at the Arts Club, Victoria street, look very well in their surroundings and show Mr. Earle's work at its best. The richness of color in these true, or slightly flattering, views of the Province of Quebec makes the collection very decorative. Mr. Earle uses color in a way which is sometimes daring, but it almost always comes off and suggests a truth which is good to look at. The strong turquoise greens which appear in some of his foregrounds and the reds of some of the autumn pictures are fine examples of this brave coloring, which is made all the more telling by the great freedom of the painting, as free in the finished pictures as in the sketches. Striking contrasts of light and shade and the fullness of the shadows make big effects in many of these pictures—the view of mountains in "Indian Summer", the finely colored "Afternoon, Point Levis", the shady green "Farm", and the "Sunrise at Chateau Richer," a dark landscape splashed with sunlight. The rather sombre "Road to the Lumber Camp" and the "Sunlight before storm" with an apparently unnatural effect of nature, look as good as ever, and there are a number of sketches which are as good in their way as the bigger pictures.

FRANK PANABAKER SHOWS PAINTINGS

lection at Eaton Fine

Frank S. Panabaker, of Hespeler, Ont., whose work is well known to Montreal picture-lovers through his contributions to exhibitions of the Royal Canadian Academy and to the spring shows of the Art Association of Montreal, is displaying a collection of his paintings in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. This Ontario artist, who specializes in landscapes at all seasons, has a broad free touch, agreeable color and a good sense of design.

There is variety in the paintings which occupy two galleries, and some of Mr. Panabaker's happiest efforts are the products of sketching trips in Quebec province. In this group is "St. Hilarion, Que."—houses, barns and church, with a cart travelling a road that disappears over a hill. It is a summer scene with clouds moving in a blue sky. "Summer Showers, Perce," shows the famous rock beyond the curving bay, with, over Bonaventure Island, clouds breaking in rain. It is an interesting and effective work. "Quebec Cottage"—a study in sunlight with figure on the veranda, is fresh in color, and there is activity on the wharf in "Low Tide, Baie St. Paul," with schooner and wagons. The effect of heat haze over an extensive range of mountainous country is successfully captured in "Haying in the Hills, Baie St. Paul," where two men load a cart on high ground. From this region, too, is a sketch of a valley and distant hills flushed with golden light. An angler is trying his luck in fast water below falls, in the painting called "Fisherman, Shawinigan Falls," and fishermen of sterner sort are shown in "Net-Menders, Cape Breton." The treatment of the cloudy sky suggests a fresh breeze in "Incoming Tide," a beach scene with figures, and "Cloud Shadows, October"—rounded hills with clumps of bush in autumn foliage, cattle, and a small brook that trickles into the shadowed foreground, is one of the most effective of the larger canvases.

Generous in scale are two winter scenes—"Mountain Fairland," with evergreens, deer plodding through deep snow to a distant lake backed by a big mountain wreathed in clouds; and "Lonely Valley, Canadian Rockies" where the sun catches the rocky strata of a mountain and bands the shadowed valley through which a stream runs. "Covered Bridge," beneath a rounded bush-dotted hill, with team of horses emerging from the structure, is a sound interpretation of winter, while the small "Mountain Brook" is another truthful transcription of this season.

Of the fall season there are "Golden Autumn"—a roadway through sunlit trees; "Corn and Pumpkins" in which the values are well observed, and "Autumn Upland" with solitary birch in autumn leaf, rolling meadowland and distant clumps of bush in gay livery. "Grey Day, October"—lake whipped by the wind which bends pines on distant rocky islands, beneath a darkening sky in which geese wing in formation, is one of the many works done in the Georgian Bay district, a region Mr. Panabaker has found congenial. In this group are "Moonlight"—rocks, spruces and glittering water; "Sentinels"—pines bent by the wind; "Lone Pine"—a stately tree, bold against a blue sky, and many other attractive items.

It would be hard to find better illustrations of life in the Province of Quebec than the drawings of George Wright, A.N.A., an artist who is much better known in his own country, the United States, than in Canada. A group of etchings by him is now being shown at Scott and Sons' galleries on Drummond street, which show that he must have spent much time in French Canada chiefly in the neighborhood of Baie St. Paul, and spent it to good purpose in observing not so much the country as its people and its animals; and he has drawn them with a friendly humor. The etchings are true scenes of life, of habitants at work and play, of horses and cows—not just cows but real, typical French-Canadian cows. There is one very good etching of a herd of cows crowding through a gate which could hardly be seen in any other country and many of the others are just as characteristic. In a number of these etchings the dress of priests makes effective spots of black, and a very good one is of two priests playing croquet in a shady garden. These etchings are not merely very true illustrations, they are also admirable drawings, with plenty of life and movement, and have an interesting softness of line which is unusual in etchings.

THOUSANDS PAY LAST RESPECTS TO KING GEORGE

PLANS LAID FOR FUNERAL

Procession to Leave Hall at 9.45 a.m. Tuesday—Silent
Period at 1.30 p.m.

London, January 24. — (P) — The British people marched through cold, fog and darkness tonight to pay their last respects to King George V.

Despite a chilling wind, rising sharply after sunset, they came in throngs of tens of thousands to Westminster Hall, where the dead sovereign lies in state, to walk swiftly past the catafalque.

The late King's subjects, foregathering in Parliament Square to take their places in line, presented a scene rare in British history. Sorrowing citizens came through the streets in solid phalanxes, sometimes filling the roadway from curb to curb.

The only break in the continuous public pilgrimage to the catafalque was at 6 p.m. Then the hall was cleared as King Edward, the widowed Queen Mother Mary and other members of the Royal Family came for 15 minutes of silent tribute. Their visit was unexpected.

The Duke of Norfolk, 28-year-old hereditary Earl Marshal, announced today the time schedule for the royal funeral on Tuesday.

At 9.45 the procession will leave Westminster Hall, to reach Paddington Station at 11.48. At noon the funeral train will leave for Windsor, to arrive at 12.35. At 12.50 the cortege will leave Windsor Station, to reach St. George's Chapel at 1.15. There, the service, to be conducted by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Winchester, will begin almost immediately. At 1.30, two minutes silence will be observed, and it is understood this silence will prevail throughout the United Kingdom. Local authorities have been asked to synchronize all official and public clocks with the Greenwich signal so the nation shall stop in its course at the same moment.

KING TO FOLLOW COFFIN.

The coffin will be borne by a gun carriage drawn by bluejackets. King Edward will walk immediately behind the carriage, followed by the Royal Princes and foreign monarchs. Then will follow several landaus bearing the Queen Mother, the Princess Royal, the Royal Duchesses and foreign royal ladies.

Three thousand troops will participate in the funeral, from the army, navy and air forces. More than 1,000 footguards will line the one-and-one-half mile route from Windsor Station to the Chapel.

The actual service will be simple. It will include the late King's favorite hymn, "Abide with Me." The lesson will be read by the Dean of Windsor. Burial will be in the tomb section immediately below the historic Chapel that was restored by Queen Victoria.

Outside the Houses of Parliament tonight the mourners formed a waiting line 10 deep, extending the entire length of Millbank Road, clear to Lambeth Bridge, then along the bank of the Thames as far as the Tate Gallery, more than a mile distant.

They waited patiently, although it was obvious that thousands of them had no chance of entering the Hall before closing time. The line included nuns, farmers, men of the army and navy in uniform, old women in hats and long veils hardly seen here since the days of Queen Victoria.

By 10 p.m. Monday, when the lying in state will end, officials said, at least 1,000,000 of the King's subjects will have paid this final act of tribute.

The line four abreast marched into the great Hall past the coffin. Women who fainted were treated at a nearby hospital.

Already the crowned heads of Europe are arriving for the funeral. King Haakon of Norway and Queen

THREE ARE NAMED TO ROYAL ACADEMY

Gazette Feb. 13/36
Dame Laura Knight
Becomes Body's First Woman Member

LONDON, Feb. 12—(C. P. Cable)—Three persons—one of them a woman—have been elected to the Royal Academy, it was announced last night.

Dame Laura Knight, recognized as one of the finest living women painters, became the first woman in recent years to enter the select membership of the academy.

The others elected were Arthur George Walker, sculptor, and Henry Rushbury, engraver.

Dame Laura first exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1903. Her pictures hang in art galleries in many parts of the world. She became an associate of the academy in 1927. Her husband, Harold Knight, member of the National Portrait Society, also is an associate of the academy.

Mr. Walker's work includes a mosaic dome for a Greek Church at Bayswater, many memorials and statues to prominent persons and a number of war memorials.

Mr. Rushbury is a fellow of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colors and of the Royal Society of Painter-Engravers and Engravers. He executed a series of drawings and paintings for the Imperial War Museum, entitled "London in War-Time."

The Royal Academy was founded in 1768. Among those who petitioned King George III for its formation was Angelica Kaufman, who became a member. A woman compatriot, Mary Hoser, also was a member.

Membership in the academy is limited to 40 and only associates can be elected members.

THE WATERCOLORS BY HENRY SIMPKINS

Montreal Artist Holds Second "One-Man" Show at Watson Art Galleries

SUBJECTS ARE VARIED

Painter Adds Nova Scotia Coast and Coves to Sketching Grounds—Scenes of Northern Country

What the practised painter in watercolor can do with that expressive medium is admirably revealed in the work of Henry Simpkins, of Montreal, on exhibition at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. This young artist, who held his first Montreal "one-man" show in these galleries a year ago, manifests increasing confidence in the handling of fluid, clear washes, and commendable zeal in tackling new subjects. Having made it clear to the discerning picture-lover that he can competently interpret the Canadian scene under snow, Mr. Simpkins has gone to the sea for further inspiration and, in the present show, has also devoted more attention to high country and hills in those seasons when greens present plenty of problems. As ever, good design, clean color, adequate drawing and generally happy selection of subject mark the works.

The subjects Mr. Simpkins found in the Maritimes are attractive—"The Rugged Coast of Nova Scotia," with blue water, rocks and a distant sail; "Fishing Huts, Peggy's Cove, N.S.," with its wooden buildings, boats, pile wharves and figures; "Near Prospect Point, N.S.," a breezy interpretation of rocks and foam in sunlight and shadow; "Boats in Drydock, Lunenburg, N.S.,"—schooners, wooden staging, wooden sheds, ships in blue water and a distant shore. A fresh breeze drives the sea shorewards in "A Rocky Coast, N.S." where gulls wheel above the breaking waves, and in "A Fishing Cove," wharves, huts, barrels and a boat drawn up on shore are the pictorial elements. Peggy's Cove, so rich in material, has inspired some large works, where the quiet shelter has supplied plenty of objects to interest the painter—clouds breaking in rain, nets drying on rocks and the usual litter of barrels and lobster traps, while the play of sunlight and shadow on hills and water makes an attractive picture of "Kennebecasis River, N.B."

DONE IN NORTH COUNTRY.

Subjects from the North country with which this young painter introduced his work to Montreal art-lovers, are many and varied. "White Pine in the Sun," shows the skill of Mr. Simpkins in handling the effect of sun and shadow in deep woods. The noble tree is deep-rooted, and the shadow of its branches makes pattern on its substantial trunk. White water, sunlit hills and moving clouds are deftly set down in "Logs on the Rouge River," and clouds catch a rosy tint above purple hills in "After Sundown." Fast-moving water, trees and rocks in light and shade, as seen from a height, are convincingly recorded in "The Gorge," and more restful in spirit is "The Fisherman"—an angler seated in a boat in the shadow of a rock. "By the Lake" is a large work full of sunlight—birches, in the shelter of which a girl sits in a chair knitting. Another effective work of ample scale is "The Pine Grove"—tent, outside of which a man puts up a fishing rod; colored blanket on a line and, near the lakeshore, two figures that have got a boat ready for an expedition. Stately trees in fall finery, bands of shadow in a rocky pasture, a wooded bluff and distant hills figure in "Golden Autumn," and patches of sunlight and shadow make pattern in the broadly-handled work called "The Camp," where, beneath a clump of pines, two figures cook a meal. Silvery sunlight floods the wooded shore, water and distant hill in "Morning on the Rouge River," and the greens have been effectively managed in the painting of spruces and high meadowland with house and barns beneath a blue sky with clouds, called "Bright Sunshine Near Arundel." Big hills in light and shade and the glitter of sunlight on water make a comely scene of "Bark Lake," and sunsplashed land, rocks and pines have been confidently handled in "Sunlight Through the Trees." In the group of subjects discovered on the Rouge River, the painter shows skill in suggesting fast water tumbling over rocks, and the wooded shores illumined by a sun high overhead. In these works he has not overlooked the pictorial possibilities of stranded logs.

Of a colder season are "A Winter's Morning, Morin Heights"—nearby spruces and birches on a rise, a stretch of white country and a range of distant hills; and "Late Afternoon Near Morin Heights," with snowy hills flushed with gold, clumps of bush and house and barn in the shadowed foreground. "The First Snowfall"—spruces under a load of white with a girl on skis is a bold performance.

Other Lake in summer has furnished a good subject, and the artist has captured a typical scene in "Haying in the Laurentians." Hot weather is evident in a glimpse of buildings near Bonsecours Market, with figures and farmers' vehicles—a painting called "A Warm Summer's Day."

CLOCKWINDER SUIT FOR $9,500 FAILS

Feb. 11/36

Employers' Freed from Liability for His Fall from Ladder

PROOF HELD INADEQUATE

Court Finds No Evidence Companies at Fault, Rules Plaintiff's Own Negligence Responsible

Suit by Leander Albert Saucier, clockwinder, for $9,500 damages from Henry Birks and Sons, Ltd., and the Bank of Montreal, for injuries suffered when a ladder on which he was perched to wind a clock slipped from under him, was dismissed yesterday by Mr. Justice McDougall of the Superior Court.

Saucier was in the employ of Birks, the latter having an undertaking with the Bank of Montreal to keep its clocks in time. The mishap took place at the head office of the bank on Place d'Armes on November 6, 1933, Saucier suffering a fractured wrist which he alleged would impair his future earning capacity as a timepiece expert. He sued both firms jointly. The ladder he used was one found on the bank premises.

In rejecting his claim, the court ruled "where the sole effective cause of an accident is the plaintiff's own negligence he is not entitled to recover damages."

Saucier based his suit on the assertion both firms were remiss in their duty to him by failing to supply him with a safe ladder that would not slip on the marble floor, or other means of reaching the clocks in the bank premises; failure to supply safety appliances such as a rubber pad, to prevent slipping; and neglect to supply an assistant to hold the ladder while he was on it.

Mr. Justice McDougall pointed out at the outset the court could not accept the contention there was anything inherently dangerous in the work Saucier was called upon to do. He had repeated the operation of winding the clocks on numerous occasions and never at any time did he regard the work as dangerous. If there was no danger, the mishap must be regarded as a pure accident or due to the carelessness of Saucier himself.

ASKS PROOF OF NEGLIGENCE.

The court disregarded at once the suggestion that presumption of fault arose against defendants in virtue of article 1053 of the Civil Code, and noted the action was made to rest upon provisions of article 1053 only, which says: "Every person capable of discerning right from wrong is responsible for the damage caused by his fault to another, whether by positive act, imprudence, neglect or want of skill." And in any event, said the court, the case was not one which imposed liability upon the owner of a thing under his care. It was not the inanimate object which caused the damage, it was the manner in which it was used that was at fault. Without the intervention of some human agency the accident could not have occurred.

Under 1053 Saucier had to prove negligence, and he sought to discharge that burden by endeavoring to prove that the ladder in question was unsafe for the use to which it was applied, to the knowledge of defendants. This he had failed to do. The court held it was incumbent upon Saucier, if he were apprehensive of any risk attendant upon his work, either to refuse to do the work until the defects he complained of were remedied, or to supply of his own volition such safety devices as he believed necessary.

PERCY F. WOODCOCK IS PAID LAST TRIBUTE

Funeral Service Held For Noted Artist

Funeral services for Percy Woodcock, prominent Canadian artist, were held in Joseph C. Wray & Sons' Mountain street chapel Saturday. Interment was in Mount Royal Cemetery.

Rev. T. W. Jones, who officiated paid tribute to the artist's works and character. "He was a true lover and revealer of beauty who by the magic touch of his brush made realistic and abiding the loveliness of the commonplace and ordinary scenes about us. His paintings bear eloquent and adequate testimony to the high standard of his work and the excellence of the artistic qualities expressed in scenes of beauty and faithful portrayal of lives," Mr. Jones said.

Chief mourners included E. Clayton Woodcock of East Orange, N.J., Ald. George Pratt, of Outremont, and Paul and Albert Pratt.

Among those present were: Prof. Henry F. Armstrong, Dr. O. Handfield, C. J. Cockburn, Randolph Bridgeman, N.P., Mrs. Frank Heaton, W. F. Bennett, C. Hunt, Col. J. T. Ostell, Dr. J. C. Marcoux, A. D. Sawyer, C. Gravel and Raoul Dupre.

his home for the past 25 years. He had been ill for some time and was in his 81st year.

Born at Farmersville, Ont., on August 17, 1855, Mr. Woodcock was the son of Rev. Eli Woodcock and Poebian Wiltzie. He attended the Albert College at Belleville, Ont., and studied painting in England, France and Holland. In Paris he was for four years a pupil of Gerome and for two years studied under Benjamin Constant.

He returned to Canada and in 1886 was elected to the Royal Canadian Academy of Art. Three of his paintings hang in the National Gallery at Ottawa. Their titles are "Near Chateaugay," "An Ontario Farm," and "Returning from the Well."

MANY EXHIBITIONS

Mr. Woodcock exhibited at the important shows in Canada, and in the exhibition of the National Academy of Design, New York.

His wife, the former Aloysia Pratt, is the daughter of the late John Pratt, Montreal, who was president of the Richelieu & Ontario Navigation Co. Their three children have all predeceased them. A brother, E. Clayton Woodcock, lives in East Orange, New Jersey.

Mr. Woodcock was a close personal friend of the late Sir William Van Horne and was consulted by the latter in connection with the purchase of many of the pictures in the Van Horne collection.

The funeral will be held privately.

FRIEND'S TRIBUTE

In tribute a friend said: "Percy Woodcock was a descriptive painter who pictured the changing aspects of Canada, the golden summer in a forest of maples; the snow of the great North, the changing of the sky in spring and the tiny silver water falls."

"Neath his extremely searching and precise design, with his sober but powerful palette the feeling of the landscape painter was produced by this artist who, as an enchanter, concealed hisadroitness that he might the better capture the heart."

Yesterday The Star published the story of the late King George's most popular photograph, showing him chatting with a shabbily-attired little apprentice during a wartime visit to a Sunderland shipyard. Today The Star publishes the photograph and its readers will see revealed the late King's democratic nature at its best. The former little "paint-pot lad," Johnny Michael Cassidy, is now grown-up and unfortunately among the unemployed. When the camera clicked on the scene above the King was laughing heartily at an exchange of banter with the smiling and unperturbed young urchin. The King complimented Johnny on helping to build warships, and quick as a flash Johnny replied: "You get t'troops now and we'll get t'ships off!"

Millions in all parts of the Empire have thrilled to this picture, and it has been proposed in the press that the national memorial to George V might well preserve this scene in marble or bronze.

POUSSIN, LORRAIN, TOPICS OF LECTURE

Dr. Walter Friedlander Deals With Heroic Rome
Landscapes

The characteristics of Nicolas Poussin and Claude Lorrain, whose great landscapes have made their mark on European painting and have found many imitators, formed the subject of a lecture given to the members of the Montreal Art association last night by Walter Friedlander, Ph.D., formerly of the University of Freiburg, Germany, and now in exile. Germany's loss was the gain of Canada and the United States, Dr. J. W. A. Hickson said in his introduction of the speaker. Dr. Friedlander, a noted authority on his subject, he pointed out, was the visiting lecturer in art at the University of Pennsylvania and at the Metropolitan Museum, New York. He had also lectured at the Courtauld Institute, London.

"We all see the landscape of Rome through their eyes," said Dr. Friedlander, as he told of the two Frenchmen going to Italy, discovering the beauty of Rome and the Campagna, and founding the idealistic or heroic landscape. Poussin, he went on, was never essentially a landscape painter. He transferred to landscape his grand manner; he was a great constructionist—although his drawings were impressionistic and full of dramatic feeling—and his construction influenced Cezanne and through Cezanne the whole of the modern French school that sprang from him.

Lorrain, on the other hand, was more modest; he had none of the grand manner; he was not an antiquarian, but in some ways he had more native talent than the learned Poussin. He was more feminine than Poussin. He never learned to paint figures, but he discovered light and atmosphere and had a great influence on subsequent landscape painters.

Dr. Friedlander's lecture was illustrated with a number of excellent slides, including some made from drawings that have never been published.

ADY TWEEDSMUIR AT MEETING HERE

Earl of Listowel Addresses
Women's Art Society on Aesthetics

STANDARDS OF TASTE

Personal Prejudices Often Prevent Unbiased Judgment,
English Philosopher
Points Out

In order to reach the highest level of taste, the most perfect aesthetic judgment, the individual must succeed in withdrawing his mind from all the practical and immediate problems with which it customarily is filled, declared the Earl of Listowel, young English philosopher, when he addressed the Women's Art Society yesterday in Stevenson Hall on "Standards of Taste." The society was honored by the presence of Her Excellency the Lady Tweedsmuir, its honorary president, who came from Ottawa especially to be present at the lecture, and who returned yesterday evening. Her Excellency, who wore a simple black frock and hat, was attended by Miss Beatrice Spencer-Smith and Capt. Michael Adeane, A.D.C. A group of Boy Scouts formed a guard of honor.

The question: Are there, in fact, standards of beauty by which one can measure the excellence or indifference of his artistic taste? was put by the Earl of Listowel. The favorite attack made on those who say there is something more than personal prejudice about matters of taste is that there have been great variations of taste in different centuries, different ages, different epochs, different generations, different cultural epochs, and an astonishing difference of opinion among qualified critics, he observed. But these fluctuations in individual taste have been due to the intrusion of irrelevant psychological factors that have caused people to deviate from the straight line of good taste and true judgment. As an example, he mentioned religious taboos and puritanical scruples which prejudiced individuals against forms of art.

Personal prejudices and predilections get in the way of unbiased judgment, thereby making certain forms of art difficult to appreciate, so that it happens that nice shades of humor, forms of art, music, literature are not enjoyed without preparation, said Lord Listowel.

Any really sensitive and attuned mind that gives itself to a work of art without reserve, without allowing anything irrelevant to intrude, registers a judgment when it contemplates a beautiful thing which sets a standard to which all other judgments must endeavor to approach.

The first demand made upon anything called lovely or beautiful, whether a landscape, a garden, a musical composition, a novel or a painting, is that it should be animate, should give the impression of vitality and vigor. The insistence is that it should have vital expressiveness, such qualities as are usually associated with living organisms. A certain organic unity also is required, and in a real work of art it should be impossible to prune away any of its constituent entities, however small and insignificant, for they go to form an organic unity such as is possessed by a living organism.

It is a very stupid narrowness of mind that regards animation, vitality and wholeness or unity as being divisible, the speaker declared. The significance and the form in which it is embodied go hand in hand. That is why, when trying to discover on what to base judgment, to lay claim to good taste, wholeness must be considered. It requires a certain impartiality of attitude, the capacity to escape from one's greatest worry or sorrow, even those that cross the mind most frequently, in order to fill the whole consciousness with the beauty of what is being contemplated. The daily routine of modern life, Lord Listowel commented, often blinds people to the beauty that surrounds them.

WHY CRITIC IS NOT ARTIST

Why is it that critics do not produce works of art? The answer, Lord Listowel said, is that the individual has no psychological control over those impulses that have to well up in the mind of an artist for something great and beautiful to be produced. Perhaps the greatest secret and mystery is the experience of the artist when he finds himself compelled to create a work of art.

Mrs. W. A. Gifford, the president, expressed the honor felt by the society in the presence of Lady Tweedsmuir. Miss Beatrice Hickson thanked Lord Listowel for his address, after which Her Excellency went to the platform and expressed her pleasure in attending the meeting and in hearing Lord Listowel's address, which, she said, dealt with a subject she felt to be of the utmost importance today. Afterwards, Her Excellency took tea with the members.

QUEBEC LANDSCAPE PAINTINGS ON VIEW

Gazette Feb. 18/36
Paul Earle, A.R.C.A., Shows Countryside in Many Moods

Quiet moods of the Quebec landscape make up the exhibition of 40 oil paintings by Paul Earle, A.R.C.A., now on view at the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street. Such titles as "Indian Summer," "Misty Morning," "Late Afternoon," "Cloudy Day," "Early Morning," "Cloud Shadows" and "Sunrise" provide the clue to Mr. Earle's approach, and he conveys atmosphere with no little success. Color gives him pleasure and there is a good deal of gusto in the way he lays it on, but he never runs wild; there is nothing extremely individualistic about his pictures, and the result is they are the sort people mean when they talk about pictures they can "live with." Most of these in the show are of convenient size, too.

Although some are dramatic with the more exciting colors of autumn—as in the 1933 Jessie Dow prize painting—the prevailing mood is slumberous summer; mist rises, clouds lower, patchwork hills lie in a warm haze, trees are heavy with heat, old farm buildings seem to drowse, villages are submerged in the distance and the shimmer. Quebec—"Old Tugs" for instance—Bay St. Paul, Pointe Lévis, and St. Joseph are the scenes of some of the paintings. On the whole, the exhibition evokes pleasant sentiments of nostalgia without demanding too much of the spectator.

The show will be open until February 28. — R. H. A.

Feb. 18/36 Star

A collection of pictures and oil sketches by Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., is being exhibited at Scott and Sons' gallery on Drummond Street, and both in the variety of its subjects and in the treatment of them it vantage. Mr. Earle has a very good eye for country and for a picture; even the small sketches are well composed pictures, and the larger pictures, even of open spaces, seem never too big for what he has to put into them.

The colour and sunlight of this province are Mr. Earle's principal subjects, particularly in his later pictures. There is an earlier picture here, about twelve years old, of a road to a lumber camp through dark trees, which is one of the most interesting, but nearly all the others are in lighter tones. Some of the best of the pictures are of the country near Bay St. Paul. One of these of a misty morning has a remarkable effect of light and atmosphere, which fill a big picture. Another of midday has no strong light or shade but an abundance of space. Bright sunlight appears in an afternoon picture of Pointe Lévis, an arrangement of blues and greens broken by a yellow hillside,—"Cloud shadows," with a dark foreground and lighted hills, and in "Indian summer," with strong sunshine in front against grey hills. Mr. Earle's use of color in these is very interesting; the turquoise green of foreground and the deep blue of distant hills are exaggerations of nature which are quite right in the pictures. "Sunlight before storm" is a striking study of an unusual effect; the light on the trees against the dark sky looks all wrong, just as it actually does in such conditions.

Among the pictures in lower tones, there are two very attractive woodland scenes in northern Quebec, very true and excellent in colour, and one of "Sunrise at Chateau Richer," is a very good shady landscape with a splash of bright light in the middle distance. Some of the sketches are as attractive as the bigger pictures. A few of them are of houses and fishing boats but the best are of woodland and open country. There are a few good snow scenes, but the snow is only incidental; none of them are winter pictures.

OUTDOOR ART SCHOOL

Plans Made by University of Saskatchewan

Saskatoon — (C) — Saskatchewan's first outdoor art school will be established this summer by the University of Saskatchewan at Emma Lake, north of Prince Albert.

Augustus Kenderdine, noted Canadian artist, will conduct special outdoor sketching courses, and Dr. R. A. Wilson, of the University staff, will be one of the lecturers.

The site, selected in natural forest country, provides a perfect natural setting for study. Cottages adjoining the school will be available to students. Providing at least 40 students register, a regular credit in Arts II in conjunction with the school will be offered. The Carnegie foundation will donate a first-class library and furnish a part of the teaching material. The course is designed primarily for teachers, but provision will be made for students in advanced outdoor work.

Their Excellencies View Exhibit In National Gallery

Governor-General's Party See Paintings of "Group of Seven"

OTTAWA, Feb. 25—(C.P.)—The Governor-General and Lady Tweedsmuir with their son, Hon. Alistair Buchan, and Miss Spencer Smith, Lady-in-waiting visited the National Gallery yesterday to see the retrospective exhibition of painting by the Group of Seven.

Work of this group of Canadian artists was known to Their Excellencies who both remarked they had previously seen their pictures at Wembley and in the collection of the Hon. Vincent Massey. Several of the artists are personal acquaintances of the Governor-General who had met them abroad and on his previous visits to Canada.

The vice-regal visit was informal. Harry Southam, chairman of the board of trustees, and Eric Brown, director of the gallery, accompanied the party as it made the tour of the rooms. A. Y. Jackson, president of the Canadian Group of Artists,

TREE PAINTER IS DEAD

Carl Ahrens, Noted Canadian Artist, Was 72 Years Old

Toronto, February 27.—(C) — Canada's most noted painter of trees, Carl Ahrens, died at his home here today. He was 73 years old, an associate of the Royal Canadian Academy and a member of the Ontario Society of Artists.

Born at Winfield, Que., Ahrens studied painting here and in New York and achieved a reputation early in the century when he went to live at Artists' Colonies at Woodstock, N.Y., and Rockport, Mass. During his six years in this group he founded the Roycroft pottery department.

One of his notable accomplishments was a series of 30 canvases on outdoor scenes for the late General Mercer. The collection was exhibited in Toronto in 1911, and aroused favorable comments. The Mercer collection was invited to Belgium by the Minister of Fine Arts for that country.

During the war Ahrens presented one of his best canvases, "The Willows," to the Canadian Red Cross Society. It was auctioned for $1,800. Several years after the war he lived near Galt, Ont., in the heart of some of the best woodland country in Ontario where he painted trees.

He is represented in the National Gallery at Ottawa, the Glasgow Museum of Fine Arts and many public and private collections in Canada, the United States and Europe.

Surviving are his widow and three children, Laird Ahrens and Mrs. Stephen Jones, of Toronto, and Mrs. Frederick Downes, of Pontiac, Mich.

Did Woman Artist Fool All Ontario?

Painting of Laura Secord Said to Be a "Fake"

TORONTO, Feb. 24—(C.P.)—A solution was expected today to the mystery surrounding the painting of Laura Secord, one of Canada's most famous heroines, which hangs in the hall of fame at the Ontario Legislative Buildings.

Ever since the painting was purchased by the Government three decades ago, a story has appeared at frequent intervals that the painting was really the disguised likeness of former Premier George W. Ross.

When the strange tale made its most recent appearance Saturday Frank Worrall, Toronto art expert took the sombre portrait from its old-fashioned frame to make an X-ray examination. He declined to reveal his findings.

From an authoritative source, however, came the declaration the picture had been found to be a "fake" so far as it represented the woman who found a place in history following a 21-mile walk behind a cow to warn the British forces during the war of 1812-14.

The Laura Secord picture was painted by Mildred Peel, sister of Paul Peel, a well-known artist, and purchased for $500.

It hangs in a heavy gilt frame between the paintings of Sir Isaac Brock, British General killed at the battle of Queenston Heights during the war of 1812-14, and George Brown, one of the Fathers of Confederation.

The canvas, gleaming with countless coats of varnish, shows a woman in dark dress and white hood sitting on a high-backed chair. The features are harsh. Her hands are big with long fingers. A Toronto artist's declaration the hands looked more like those of a man caused the legend to be revived.

Mr. Worrall reviewed the portrait Saturday and said he could see another chair besides the one on which the woman sat. Close scrutiny disclosed the outline of a low arm chair on which the woman obviously was not sitting.

Premier Hepburn says the late Victor Ross, former Toronto Globe reporter, and later an oil company executive, told him the Government refused to pay Miss Peel for the picture and suggested a historical subject so she painted out the whiskers on the Ross portrait, put on a hood and had it accepted.

Arthur Lisher, Edwin Holgate and Lorne Harris of the original group of seven were also present with Miss Prudence Howard, Miss Anne Savage, Miss Mabel Lockerby and Miss Sarah Robertson, members of the new group which numbers 28.

His Excellency seemed particularly impressed by a large landscape by the late James E. H. Macdonald entitled "The Solemn Land," while Lady Tweedsmuir spent a considerable length of time admiring Arthur Lisher's "Quebec Village," a landscape in brown tones with a ploughed field in the foreground.

Two women painters are at present represented in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company—Mrs. Beatrice Robertson, and Miss Rita Mount, and their work has been attracting a great deal of favorable attention.

The first show is entirely of flowers and it is a refreshment to one coming in out of the winter streets. Mrs. Robertson paints roses, pink white and yellow, peonies and harebells, sweet peas, petunias, chrysanthemums, cyclamens, daffodils, gladioli, freesia, poppies, marigolds, attractively arranged in bowls and vases, and she paints them freshly and with apparent affection, remaining naturalistic and never looking for bizarre effects. WORK OF ONE ARTIST

Group Installed to Commemorate Life and Work of Past Students and Benefactors

Completion of the plans for memorial windows in the Montreal Diocesan Theological College chapel, University street, has now been made and every window is in place, presenting an interesting and beautiful addition to the already attractive little chapel. They follow a single scheme and, with the exception of the east window, which has been in the chapel for many years, they are the work of the one artist, W. C. Kelsey, bringing a unity in the general design under the direction of the Rev. Canon G. Abbott-Smith D.C.L., principal of the college.

Not only from their intrinsic value but from the names recalled by the memorial windows this addition to the chapel will be of considerable interest to the now large number of persons in the city and throughout Canada and the United States who have been connected directly or indirectly with this divinity school. They are memorials to benefactors of the Diocesan College, to former members of the staff, including three principals, or are placed there by friends of the college in memory of members of their families.

The general plan followed in the symbolical figure of the stained glass windows is: The Annunciation to the Evangelists, Apostles and Martyrs; and they include nine memorial windows, in addition to the east window representing the Ascension and dedicated by the late A. F. Gault, founder of the college to the memory of two brothers.

Three windows have been donated by Principal Abbott-Smith in memory of Grace Wilmot Abbott-Smith, Charles Bancroft Abbott-Smith and Mary Bancroft. A window is in memory of the late A. P. Willis, one of the most loyal friends of the college, placed to his memory by his sons.

The St. Luke window is a memorial to Henrietta Blake placed in the chapel by the Rev. A. H. Harrison, a former student of the college. To the memory of the late Principal H. M. M. Hackett and Professor F. D. Steen has been given another window. Dr. Hackett was head of the college from 1896 until 1901, and Professor Steen died in 1903 when on the staff of the college. The Rev. T. S. Boyle, D.D., Cobourg, Ont., is the donor.

GRADUATE REMEMBERED

Members of the family of the Archdeacon Ker, for many years rector of Grace Church, Pointe St. Charles, and a graduate of the college, have donated a window in memory. The two former principals, the Rev. J. A. Lobley (1873) and the Rev. William Anderson, D.D. (1877) are remembered in a window given through donations from a group of pupils of the MacKay Institute who have used the college for services.

The last window to be presented is the one from the alumni and is raised to the memory of the late A. N. Withey, M.A., L.Th., D.S.

flowers she has done in their outdoor setting are irises.

Decorative in a more formal way than some are the snow-in-the-mountains, the whole thing developed in gradations of green, and the marsh marigolds, and she has been particularly successful in her burning geraniums and in her petunias in "Wedgewood."

Pleasant rather than dynamic are the landscapes of Rita Mount, recollecting scenes in the Gaspé peninsula. In the "Three Sisters of l'Echouerie," the shoreline zigzags across the blue water; a foreland riding out to sea, houses and boats make up her view of "Petite Rivière aux Rapides"; and she has a picturesque "Old Store."

Perhaps she is at her best in the smaller sketches, especially in the little shore pieces where boats and rocks and gleams of sea and sky make bright patches of color. Coin du Banc, l'Anse des Rosiers, Petit Cap and Anse a Pierre give her some good material, and she has a winter subject in "At the Mill, Terrebonne," with its horses and wood-sleighs.

one of the most brilliant scholars who passed through the college, who was killed overseas. Mr. Withey gave up the travelling scholarship awarded him by the Union Theological Colleges in order to enlist in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces. The symbolical figure of the memorial is that of St. Stephen, the Christian martyr.

A coincidence related to the work of the designer of these windows, Mr. Kelsey, is that a number of years ago, and before he had any expectations of coming to this country, he worked on the present east window given by the late A. F. Gault when employed by the firm of Clayton and Bell, of London.

ART ASSOCIATION'S FUNDS REMAIN LOW

Recovery Not Reflected in Group's Income, President Reports

YEAR'S DEFICIT IS $3,705

Bequests, Gifts to Montreal Collection Acknowledged at Annual Meeting—
Officers Re-elected

More prosperous conditions last year were not reflected in increased income for the Art Association of Montreal, according to H. B. Walker, president, who submitted his report at the 74th annual meeting, yesterday. On the contrary, the statement of the honorary treasurer, W. B. Blackader, showed a deficit of $3,705.

"It is regrettable that we were not able to balance our budget," said Mr. Walker, "but in this respect we are apparently in good company. The increasing burden of taxation in its many forms exacts a heavy toll upon personal incomes and tends to absorb the margin of such incomes as might otherwise be available for educational and benevolent purposes. This condition is adding greatly to the financial difficulties of all institutions which are largely dependent, as this association is, upon voluntary subscriptions."

Acknowledgment was made of these bequests: $5,000 from the late Miss Mary Elizabeth Fleet, and $10,000 from the late Lillie F. Martin, of New York, made in accordance with the wishes of her late husband, Alfred W. Martin. The latter sum is not available immediately.

During the year, the following paintings were added to the permanent collection: "West Indian Washerwoman," Harold Beament, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. Murray R. Chipman; "North of Lake Superior," Frederick Arthur Verner, R.C.A., gift of Miss Isabella McLennan; "Monkey and Mirror," Gabriel Alexander Decamps, gift of Mr. and Mrs. P. F. Osler; and "Self Portrait," William Sawyer, gift of his family.

Mr. Walker made reference to the various exhibitions during the year and paid tribute to the National Gallery of Canada for its assistance; he spoke of the lectures, and went on to point out that the library now comprised 3,250 volumes and a file of more than 4,000 reproductions.

The council reported with regret the death of the following members: Mrs. M. Fountaine Brown, fellow; Mrs. J. H. Burland, Mrs. MacKenzie Campbell, Robert Craig, M.D., Miss E. S. Crawford, Miss M. S. Godfrey, Mrs. E. B. Greenshields, benefactor; Miss F. L. Hagar, Edwin Hanson, Miss M. E. Hardie, Ernest Henderson, J. H. Larmonth, Lewis Laing, Miss J. J. MacFarlan, Thomas Mitchell, Hon. W. G. Mitchell, Mrs. Alexander Murray, Fred Perry, F. H. Pitcher, Miss E. J. Reid, and Miss A. E. White.

Revenues for the year amounted to $19,023, the treasurer reported, and expenditure totalled $22,728. The deficit of $3,705 was slightly smaller than the year before. Mr. Blackader pointed out that the association received no civic grant. Annual subscriptions were more numerous than in 1934.

Arthur Browning, chairman of the executive committee, presented a report on ways and means, and F. Cleveland Morgan, convener of the museum committee, made reference to new acquisitions, mentioning particularly the Peruvian textiles which were given by William Gilman Cheney.

The president announced that their Excellencies The Governor-General and the Lady Tweedsmuir had graciously consented to be patrons of the association. The following officers were re-elected: honorary president, Right Hon. Baron Atholstan; president, H. B. Walker; vice-presidents, Dr. C. F. Martin, Dr. C. W. Colby; honorary treasurer, W. B. Blackader; secretary, Miss Ethel M. Pinkerton; librarian, Miss Olive Le Boutillier; Council, His Worship Mayor Houde, ex officio; for three years—Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, Gordon W. MacDougall, K.C., Ross H. McMaster, Lt.-Col. Herbert Molson, W. J. Morrice, Harry A. Norton; for two years—Arthur Browning, T. S. Gillespie, Elwood B. Hosmer, R. P. Jellet, J. W. McConnell, F. Cleveland Morgan, Brig.-Gen. E. de B. Panet; for one year—Ernest Alexander, D. Forbes Angus, Philip S. Fisher, G. W. S. Henderson, G. Alfred Morris, Howard Murray, Prof. Ramsay Traquair.

Lt.-Col. Herbert Molson was made a benefactor; W. Gilman Cheney and Ross H. McMaster, fellows; Lady Hickson, J. W. A. Hickson, Ph.D., and Miss Adaline van Horne, governors; and Mrs. P. F. Osler a life member.

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS

H. B. Walker, president, in his address said, "Your Council has pleasure in recording that in November last, Their Excellencies The Governor-General and Lady Tweedsmuir graciously consented to be Patrons of the Association."

"The steady improvement in economic conditions during 1935, and the growing confidence that continued recovery might be looked for, created an optimistic feeling generally which was well sustained throughout the year. The more prosperous conditions, however, were not reflected in increased income for the Association. It is regrettable that we were not able to balance our budget, but in this respect we are apparently in good company."

"The increasing burden of taxation in its many forms exacts a very heavy toll upon personal incomes and tends to absorb the margin of such incomes that might otherwise be available for educational and benevolent purposes. This condition is adding greatly to the financial difficulties of all institutions which are largely dependent, as this Association is, upon voluntary contributions."

"The endowment funds were increased during the year by the following generous bequests: $5,000 from the late Miss Mary Elizabeth Fleet; and $10,000 from the late Lillie F. Martin, of New York, made in accordance with the wishes of her late husband, Alfred W. Martin. The latter bequest will not be available immediately as it is subject to a life interest in the income derived from the capital amount."

"The activities of the year included a number of interesting exhibitions of a varied character, of which special mention should be made of the following:—The exhibition of Contemporary Paintings and Prints by representative artists of the United States selected by the Carnegie Corporation of New York; an exhibition of Contemporary British Paintings, and one of British Posters; also a collection of Modern Color Prints, and The Second Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art."

NATIONAL GALLERY AID

"These exhibitions were made possible through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada and we record our appreciation of the service rendered to us in this connection. The work of contemporary Canadian artists was well represented in the forty-sixth exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, which was a notable event of the year, and in the Association's fifty-second annual Spring exhibition. There was also a series of "one man" shows."

"The regular course of lectures, was supplemented, through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, by two very interesting and instructive lectures, 'The Gothic Age in England,' by J. E. Barton, Art Lecturer of the British Broadcasting Corporation, and 'Adventure in Pictorial Photography,' by John Vanderpant, F.R.P.S."

"The following paintings were added to the permanent collection during the year through the generosity of members and friends of the Association:—West Indian Washerwoman, by Harold Beament, gift of Mr. and Mrs. Murray R. Chipman; Lake, North of Lake Superior, by Frederick Arthur Verner, A.R.C.A., gift of Miss Isabella McLennan; Monkey and Mirror, by Gabriel Alexander Decamps, gift of Mr. and Mrs. P. F. Osler, and Self Portrait, by William Sawyer, presented by his family in memory of their father."

"The library now comprises 3,250 volumes on the fine arts, all of which are available for reference. A pictorial file was started in 1933, and has now become an important accessory to the library. It contains more than four thousand reproductions of the works of artists and sculptors of all countries, to which additions are being steadily made."

"The thanks of the Association are due to the contributors to the Sustentation Fund and the Museum Fund, and to the donors of gifts to the permanent collections and the library. The Council records its appreciation of the diligence and efficiency displayed by the members of the staff in the performance of their duties throughout the year."

"The Council, with much regret, has to report the loss through death of the following esteemed members of the Association: Mrs. M. Fountaine Brown, Fellow; Mrs. J. H. Burland, Mrs. MacKenzie Campbell, Robert Craig, M.D., Miss E. S. Crawford, Miss M. S. Godfrey, Mrs. E. B. Greenshields, benefactor; Miss F. L. Hagar, Edwin Hanson, Miss M. E. Hardie, Ernest Henderson, J. H. Larmonth, Lewis Laing, Miss J. J. MacFarlan, Thomas Mitchell, Hon. W. G. Mitchell, Mrs. Alexander Murray, Fred Perry, F. H. Pitcher, Miss E. J. Reid, and Miss A. E. White."

The hon. treasurer, Dr. Blackader, advised that the Association had operated at a deficit of $3,700 for the year. Revenue of $19,023 had been received against expenditures of $22,700. The deficit was smaller than in 1934 when it amounted to $4,000. Increased taxes were partly to blame, Dr. Blackader considered.

The report on the museum was read by F. Cleveland Morgan, chairman of the Museum Committee. Arthur Browning, M.A., presented the report of the Ways and Means Committee.

The adoption of the reports was moved by the president and seconded by Gordon P. MacDougall.

Taxation Blamed For Year's Deficit

Art Association Shows Loss For 1935.

Little improvement in the financial condition of the Art Association of Montreal last year was reported at the 74th annual meeting held last night. W. B. Blackader, treasurer, reported a deficit of $3,705, slightly lower than the previous year.

The increasing burden of taxation was given by H. B. Walker, president, as the reason for the association not being able to balance the budget. "Taxation in its many forms exacts a heavy toll upon personal incomes and tends to absorb the margin of such incomes as might otherwise be available for educational and benevolent purposes," he said.

Many bequests and gifts of paintings were acknowledged by the president who also paid tribute to the National Gallery of Canada for its assistance.

The following officers were re-elected: honorary president, Right Hon. Baron Atholstan; president, H. B. Walker; vice-president, Dr. C. F. Martin, Dr. C. W. Colby; honorary treasurer, W. B. Blackader; secretary, Miss Ethel M. Pinkerton; librarian, Miss Olive Le Boutillier.

Death followed a short illness. Funeral arrangements have not yet been completed. Mr. Woodcock was 80 years of age. He had resided in the Windsor Hotel for the past 25 years.

PAINTER ACHIEVES CONQUEST OF TIME

Gazette March 10/36
History of Art Reviewed by Miss Anne Savage in Talk to League

Rhythm, balance and unity are the three essential laws on which all art is based, said Miss Anne Savage, member of the Canadian Artists' Association, when she addressed the Jewish Junior Welfare League yesterday at a luncheon given in the Montefiore Club. Music is the first of the arts, and its sister, painting, has the same profound power, the speaker declared. The painter, however, has only a flat surface and is limited to lines and their dark or light tones, yet gives to the beholder the pattern of life as it has passed through the ages, becoming the conqueror of time.

Lantern slides beginning with an example of Greek pottery of 450 B.C., and ranging up to present-day Canadian art, were shown in illustration of the lecture. Examples of the Byzantine school, of Giotto, the first nature painter, of Botticelli, Leonardo Da Vinci, Albrecht Durer and Holbein, were shown. Works of Constable, who laid the foundation of landscape painting, and Kriehoff, the German-Dutch painter who settled in Canada about 1840 and became famous for his French-Canadian scenes, also were displayed on the screen. Kriehoff's was a European interpretation of Canadian scenes, and the beginning of creative art in Canada. The first creative Canadian artist, the speaker claimed, was Tom Thomson, whose picture "The Jack Pine," hangs in the National Gallery. He inspired the former Group of Seven, organized in 1919 and enlarged in 1933 to form the Canadian Group of Painters. That association will hold an exhibition of over 200 paintings in Montreal in a short time, Miss Savage said.

Mrs. Richard Kramer introduced the speaker and Mrs. M. Coshoff thanked her. Various reports were read. It was announced that a rummage sale will be held on March 30 and 31 at 4119 St. Catherine street west, conveners to be Mrs. L. Feldman, Mrs. L. Sperber and Mrs. M. Coshoff.

NORTH AND SOUTH COMPARED IN ART

Dr. Julius Held Notes Sharp Contrast Between Germany and Italy

In a time when the eyes of a frightened world were turned on Europe, a little light on the mentality of the nations, on the psychological conditions which influenced political happenings, which sometimes prevented peoples from understanding each other, might be welcome, Dr. Julius Held, formerly of the Kaiser-Friedrich Museum, Berlin, suggested to the Art Association of Montreal in a lecture last night. He proceeded to set forth the characteristics of northern and southern Europe by contrasting the art of the Germans, the Flemish and the Dutch on the one hand with the Italians on the other, and illustrated his statements with an excellent series of slides.

While he began by admitting his personal preference for northern art, Dr. Held was at pains to make it clear that there was to be no suggestion of one art being better than another. He made it clear, too, that he was speaking in terms of national, rather than racial, characteristics. The two were often confused, but European nations did not represent racial units, and climate and tradition could eradicate racial divergences. There were many examples of painters who had taken the characteristics of countries other than their own.

Balancing a Canaletto against a Vrel, a Raphael against a Grunewald, and so on, through several centuries of sculpture and painting—he did not come to the modern era—Dr. Held showed how the Italians sought idealism, the Flemish, realism, and the Germans, expressionism. The classic, with its clarity and discipline, with its love of rhythmic design and its power of representing emotion through the important but idealized human figure, its tendency to improve on nature, was contrasted with the northern spirit, negligent, delighted with the charm of irregularity, full of warmth and humor, saying yes to nature, glorying in the emotions and going beyond them into mysticism.

The two spirits met in France, the speaker mentioned in passing, but it would have required another lecture to develop that theme.

Dr. Held was introduced by Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, who expressed the association's gratitude to the National Gallery for the opportunity of hearing him.

INDICRAFT GUILD WORK IS OUTLINED

Star Feb. 28/36

Annual Meeting of Canadian Body Reviews
Past Year

Interest by farming communities in the cultivation of arts and handicrafts has increased the work and scope of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild to the point that a comprehensive reorganization of the guild is necessary, Lieut.-Col. Wilfrid Bovey, president of the latter body, said this afternoon, speaking at the annual meeting held at the headquarters at 2019 Peel street.

The past year has witnessed many changes affecting the work of the guild, Col. Bovey continued. The effect of the depression has convinced the agricultural population of the country of the need for making the most of their resources. The era of urbanization is drawing to a close, and it is evident that the coming era will witness a steady growth in the practice of handicrafts in the rural sections of the Dominion.

QUEBEC FIRST

The Province of Quebec had been the first to develop handicrafts, he said, probably because in the old province there was more inherited craftsmanship. Other provinces had followed, but New Brunswick has begun actively to interest the youth of both city and urban sections, which was evidenced by the introduction of arts and crafts in the high schools as part of the curricula. Such work would induce a creative spirit and the co-related use of hand and eye.

Declaring that one of the main characteristics of the next period of Canada's development would be a more independent attitude economically of rural communities, Col. Bovey felt that this trend would bring with it an intense cultivation of arts and craft. This would be a forward step productive of rewards to the individual far more satisfactory than those obtained by the majority of urban dwellers. This trend toward rural economic independence has been observed throughout Canada during the past year.

INDIAN WORK

The Federal Department of Indian Affairs has consented to send a questionnaire to agents throughout Canada to ascertain the extent and development of art and craft work of the Indians, it was noted in the report of the Indian committee, submitted by Miss Alice Lighthall. Results of the summary showed that considerable work was being done, but that marketing would have to be stimulated if these crafts were to be kept alive.

The report of the shop committee showed that handicrafts materials are becoming increasingly popular, not only as gifts and ornaments but as home furnishings here and abroad. Many visitors at the annual exhibition of the Guild last fall had shown marked interest in the skill and evident high artistic development of craftsmen in metal, cloth, wicker and several other types of work.

An improvement of 66 per cent in finances from the low point of 1933 was noted in the financial report. High optimism was expressed for the future sales of handicrafts products, the reasons for which were gradual improved business conditions, reflected by increased retail sales.

IMPROVEMENT NOTED

Improvement and progress throughout Canada was the keynote of the annual reports of the various branches of the Guild throughout Canada submitted. The Alberta branches were active, many requests for instruction from rural residents having been received during the year. Many lectures were given by various members of the Guild, and much enthusiasm had been aroused through the travelling exhibit in this Province last summer.

Nova Scotia was another highlight of handicrafts activity during 1935. Glove-making was becoming popular while the old spinning-wheel was coming back to its once honored place in the home economic system. A steady increase in the popularity of homespun and embroidery was reported in this province.

G. J. Trueman, of Mount Allison, reported an increased interest in weaving of all kinds in New Brunswick, while the demand for tweeds and hoked rugs was being maintained. The Ottawa Valley branch reported the construction of several table looms together with an increase in the weaving of bags and scarves.

The meeting was adjourned until March 30, when the plans for reorganization will be further discussed, and officers for 1936 elected.

DESIGNS FOR STAGE NOW ON EXHIBITION

Norman Wilkinson's Water-colors on Loan to Art Association

Alive to the widespread interest in play production brought about by the Dominion Drama Festival, the National Gallery is circulating an exhibition of original stage and costume designs, mostly in water color, by Norman Wilkinson of Four Oaks, and the show is now to be seen in the print room of the Montreal Art Association. It was lent to Canada by the Courtauld Institute of London.

The bulk of the 98 drawings were for Granville-Barker's productions of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Twelfth Night" at the Savoy in London, in 1913. "One has only attempted to give the design or plan necessary for the action of the play," Mr. Wilkinson himself said, "and the charm of light, line and color that may result from this and this alone." Charm of line and color is indeed the essence of these drawings, and while the chief interest in them is their application to the stage, they may be looked at and enjoyed simply for themselves. Delicacy and grace go through the whole series, whether the sketches be for Shakespeare, "Iphigenia in Tauris" (New York, 1915), or "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." They show Mr. Wilkinson bringing freshness to the theatre without going bizarre.

In contrast with the "Midsummer Night's Dream" of 1913, when the costumes were Greek, and Moonshine appeared in a long blue gown with stars on it, this in a green rose-sprigged tunic, the sleeves caught up with ribbons, quite in the spirit of the farce, and Oberon was an exotic sort of Javanese creature, stands the Elizabethan version of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre in 1933, a little more pompous, as the Elizabethans were more pompous in dress than the Greeks, but quite handsome and delightful. This was one of the designer's last works.

Word was received at McGill University today that the 1936 award of the Canadian Federation of University Women, value $1,250, has been awarded to Miss Naomi Jackson, lecturer in the department of German and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. C. Jackson, of Montreal West.

Miss Jackson obtained her B.A. degree at McGill in 1933 and the gold medal for modern languages in literature. She took honors throughout her course and held as well competitive scholarships in second and third years. She gained her M.A. degree last year.

Miss Jackson has had a brilliant academic career and plans to use the scholarship, to spend a year abroad, working between the Goethe archives at Weimar and the Keller archives at Zurich. She also plans to spend some time in one of the German university towns. Her special interests are Goethe and Keller and it was on the latter that she wrote her masters' thesis at McGill.

HAROLD BEAMENT IS SHOWING WORK

Gazette March 2/36
Paintings of Laurentian Region and South at Watson Art Galleries

PROGRESS IS EVIDENT

Collection of Forty Pictures by Montreal Artist Includes Effective Portrait and Still-life

The recent work of Harold Beament, the subject of an exhibition at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, will impress with its wide variety. The scenes which have inspired the artist range from the noble Laurentian hills in both summer and winter, to a sleepy Louisiana bayou under a heat-dripping southern sky. The pictures include a seriously painted portrait, a still-life of flowers and one sea-scape, the last-named work being exceptionally fine in color and design—the pattern of rocks and the movement suggested through the forms of floating clouds being effectively handled. One of the best of the landscapes is "Laurentian Valley," where interpretation has a greater accent than realism. The impression made on the mind by rolling hills and planes is re-created and made permanent through the movement and pattern of a fluid design. In color an excellent gamut of greens has been employed with the deeper notes of a blue stream and a cloud-filled blue sky. Turning to another theme from the Laurentian district there is sunny landscape entitled "Laurentian Home." In this canvas the artist has placed an interesting yellow house against the rich gold of a tree-covered hillside; the whole landscape being bathed in the mellow light of a warm autumn afternoon.

Notable among an excellent group of winter landscapes are three paintings of melting streams. The artist has evidently given a great deal of study to this subject, which is clearly congenial to him, and he has painted as if with joy the play of long evening shadows across the purple snow and the rose-flushed hills beyond where the last light of the setting sun glows. Difficult and daring values are well controlled and worked out in these poetic evening pictures. Almost romantic in feeling is the nocturne called "Moonlit Stream," and those who know that country will appreciate the truth of this interpretation. The color of snow at night, trees which are dark but yet not black, and the elusiveness of light which is half darkness will interest both art-lover and nature-lover alike.

It will be noted throughout the entire range of the forty pictures shown, that Beament is never striving for the merely picturesque, but remains the conscious artist in striving to convey the essential character of things, and holding firm to a controlled line and expressive design. Many of the canvases reveal how even a crude or apparently barren subject may be beautiful. Such for instance, is "Frosty Afternoon," where an ugly unpainted frame farm-house is made a thing of beauty by the play of light and the interest of its unsuspected pattern as seen against a yellowish autumn sky. A number of small pictures show the artist in a more intimate phase, and for many people these will have a special appeal.

To all interested in contemporary

Indian painting, this is an attractive exhibition. It does not show the stamp of any particular school or group, but reveals the artist as one who is individually sincere and moving forward.

Harold Beament, who was born in Ottawa in 1893, studied art in Toronto and in England. His work is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, the Art Gallery of Montreal, and in various private collections. He won the Dow Prize for landscape in the Spring Exhibition of 1934.

The present exhibition remains open until March 7th.

Star March 11/36

A collection of pictures, specially chosen by Messrs. Reid and Lefebvre of London, which is now being shown in Scott's gallery on Drummond street, gives a view of progressive painting in France in the last part of the nineteenth century. The dates of these pictures range from the sixties down to the first years of this century; works by Renoir are among the earliest and the latest of them, and there is nothing by the newer painters of recent years.

Older ideas and methods are shown in work by Courbet and Daumier; the Courbet is a very pleasant picture of a boy riding on the sea shore in front of a splendid, dull red evening sky; the Daumier is a characteristic picture of two lawyers listening to the speech of a third. By Fantin-Latour there is a good example of his flower painting and an earlier, and important picture of many figures—a fine piece of imagination and composition, which was too advanced for the people of 1863, when it was painted. Two small pictures by Boudin are good examples of his work but are rather lost among their present surroundings. The striking picture of the "Femme au miroir" has a sombre tone which is not typical of Degas. The work of Renoir rather dominates the exhibition, though the pictures by him are not of the kind by which he is best known. The charming head of a little girl in a hat is good French of the late nineteenth century but not very typical of Renoir and it is very different from the pastel of the "Femme a la rose," painted only two years later; this is far more characteristic of Renoir—a study of pale flesh tones against a white background. There is also a brilliant little study of a bunch of roses, painted at a restaurant on a piece of the table cloth.

Four of the seven Renoirs in this collection are landscapes, and very few of Renoir's landscapes have ever been seen here. He uses in them a strange system of colors, which produces interesting but not always very convincing results; it fits fairly well in a sketch of Algiers, with Arabs on horseback in the foreground, but it introduces a curiously tropical atmosphere into the French landscapes. The greenhouse effect of these pictures is emphasized by the contrast with the other landscapes in the exhibition—a cool, grey river scene by Monet, a good example of Camille Pissarro—a view of Rouen which is a triumph of painting over a rather dull subject—a brilliant picture by Sisley, full of light and air, and a very fine landscape by Cezanne, of houses among rich green fields and trees.

There are two pictures here by Gauguin; one of them is of Tahitian women bathing—heavy brown figures against a rather formal, full colored landscape; the other is of a village in Brittany, painted in the following year, in which the houses are French but the color of the landscape suggests Tahiti and the figures seem to be Tahitians dressed up in French clothes. The only work by Van Gogh in the exhibition is a very striking one—a portrait of Alex

Reid, vivid and full of life—which leaves one wondering how so strange a method of painting can produce so good a picture.

U.S. FIRM ACQUIRES PORTRAIT BY PIERO

March 6/36 Star
Late 15th Century Italian
Master's Painting Portrays St. Andrew

NEW YORK, March 5—(C.P.)—A discovery of major importance in art was revealed here today when M. Knoedler & Co., Inc., announced that it had found in Austria and brought to the United States a painting by the early Italian master, Piero Della Francesca (c. 1418-1492).

So rare are Piero's works that hardly more than half a dozen are known outside Italy. A small panel of "The Crucifixion," now owned by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., was sold at auction here in 1929 for $375,000 by Carl Hamilton.

The newly discovered painting portrays "Saint Andrew" and is one of the panels of a polyptych. Another panel of this same work is in the National Gallery in London and a third in the Poldi-Pezzoli Gallery in Milan. The others have been lost.

The exact source of the painting was not disclosed by the art firm. At one time the picture was in the collection of the Emperor Francis Joseph and bears on the back the imperial double-headed eagle seal. It was said that during the European wars of the 19th century it had been shipped down the Danube, together with many other pictures, some of which fell to the French when they entered Vienna.

FLOWER PAINTINGS ARE ON EXHIBITION

Gazette April 17
Spring-like Display Proves Successful at Watson
Art Galleries

In the first few days it has been on exhibition, the group of flower paintings by Canadian and European artists at the Watson Art Galleries, Sherbrooke street, has been so successful that it has been decided to make the flower show an annual spring event. It seems a good idea, these dull, rainy April days, when winter fades away so reluctantly.

There is plenty of refreshment in this exhibition, plenty of bright color, and a wide variety of methods of presenting it. The first painter that takes the eye is H. Davis Richter, R.I., R.O.I., who is nothing if not a virtuoso, who paints roses, ranunculi, cyclamens, china figures and chessmen, with sumptuous style. He is represented by half a dozen canvases. F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., who shows nine or ten, is of the same school, if a little less operatic; his flowers—mostly dahlias—his glistening figures and vases and pots, give the feeling of proficiency and the grand manner.

In contrast to these are such works as Jean Forbes' water color, a fresh, lighthearted bouquet; the "Heavenly Blues" by Marion Long, R.C.A.; K. S. Brydone-Jack's quick pastels; the dainty trilliums and cosmos by Clara Hagarty, A.R.C.A.; Ruth Dingle's "Blue and Gold"—jocund irises and daffodils; and Harold Beament's graceful darwins—all light and airy and modest.

An outstanding picture is Edwin Holgate's "Still Life," a blue hyacinth in a pot, with a bowl and a plate and a china figure, a blending of earthy colors, substantially painted but not showy. Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., has a gay spring-like bouquet; Paul Caron, a little plantation of delphiniums, and G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., a yard of roses. There is beauty in the voluptuous rhythms of Moira Drummond's white calla, and quite a different beauty in Ruby le Boutillier's peonies, a flat, meticulous, almost chintz pattern. Most of the painters have chosen cut flowers, but Kenneth Forbes, R.C.A., had a happy thought in painting two growing tulips, well set off by their background of earth.

There is historical interest in Fantin-Latour's white roses and Madame Fantin-Latour Dubourg's phlox. One of the most charming exhibits is M. M. Duffield's fuchsias, painted in 1859, Victorian, carefully wrought realism that has something of the beauty of stylization.

Quite out of the usual run are Alexander Bercovitch's "Decoration"—a vase of fruit, flowers, a large head, with a background of sea and Perce Rock; and Jori Pallardy's "Harmony" blurs of roses, a plate with two green apples on a table, painted in a lower key than Bercovitch's design.

Other painters represented are: W. H. Berger, E. G. Richardson, T. R. MacDonald, Eric Riordan, G. Fouace, Victor Champion, Berthe and Gertrude des Claves, Alexander Vollen and Lillian Hingston.

The show will be open until April 25.

Tom Stone Shows Canadian
Scenes—Van Gogh Prints
Also Exhibited

Tom Stone, O.S.A., who has a show of small paintings in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, reminds one of conventional Canadian poetry: he rejoices in Canadian sun and sky, hills and water and trees, and he reports them more or less faithfully, and melodiously enough, but without any dynamic individuality.

Of 36 canvases, two-thirds are winter—mostly water surrounded by snowy banks and evergreens, and roads through the woods. Logging naturally appeals to him and his largest picture, "Ice Logging Road, Yemagami" is picturesque. Most of the work was done in Northern Ontario—Haliburton, for instance—and Quebec. There is a view of St. Urbain, with its little brood of houses around the church, and a patchwork of hills and fields under a heavy sky at St. Hilarion. He picks out such romantic subjects as covered bridges and spruces shrouded in snow, and he has a taste for a dramatic sky.

"Sleigh Ride," with its patches of colored houses and children's clothes, is livelier than some, and he shows some brilliant tints in his autumn sketches. Mr. Stone's color is clean and bright; without being particularly distinguished, he is happy.

In the next room, Eaton's is taking advantage of the revival of interest in Vincent van Gogh to show about 30 colored prints of some of his best known paintings and a few not so familiar. They are in all sizes and are such faithful reproductions that the brush-strokes—those tremendously living brush-strokes—are not lost, and even the grain of the canvas may sometimes be seen. There is a self-portrait, a Zouave as clamorous as a flag, and the young man in the yellow coat and the blue hat; the sunflowers are in the collection, the irises, the incandescent chestnut tree, the green flame of the cypress and the clouds writhing away like smoke; and there are boats, workers, sunburnt gardens, and a molten harvest field under a fierce sun-disc.

Architectural School Of McGill University Has Annual Exhibition Star May 16/36

The annual exhibition of work by students of the School of Architecture of McGill University, which is being shown in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, is of special interest this year. The school has more students than ever before with the record number, 11, graduating from the fifth year. What is hung on the walls represents only a small fraction of the drawings made during the last session.

The standard of draughtsmanship in the first and second year work shown is very high and is characterized by harmonious coloring. The freehand drawing is thoroughly sound and the summer school measured drawing of historic buildings besides illustrating valuable examples of old work, show a real interest on the part of the young draughtsmen in their subjects.

The third year work in domestic design covers a variety of subjects, from a log cabin to a city club, in which Mr. Wong particularly distinguishes himself.

The fourth year work comprises a municipal council chamber with full interior details and a large swimming bath with full structural details, the first place being shared by Mr. Cooperberg and Mr. Hammond.

The fifth year work of the past session is notable both for the high average standard and the great industry of the students. Mr. Jones has the first place in the Country Town Hospital problem; Mr. Dixon has the honour in the Twenty Storey Commercial Building problem; and Mr. Magill in the Housing Estate.

VARIETY IN TREATMENTS
Established Painters Make Good Display—Open Mind
by Jury of Selection Evident

Opened with a private view to members and guests last night, the 53rd Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal presents a variety of evidences of artistic endeavors, and among the total of 621 items there would seem to be some thing to suit every taste.

Certainly artists have not been idle, and, looking at the show, it would be hard to be envious of the task facing the Jury of Selection. That body has displayed an admirably open mind in getting this collection together, always keeping in view the fact that encouragement of even a hint of ability may aid in the development of a "big figure" in Canadian painting of tomorrow. There are some painterly performances that stridently proclaim the triumph of matter over mind, and the antidote is furnished by a fair range of works by men and women who are content to be representational in their interpretations. In any event, there is plenty to please all camps, and the Association has, as ever, kept in mind that as an educational institution it is due to the public to show them what is going on in the studios, without—reasonable merit and decency being considered—being arbitrary in selection.

Outstanding among the exhibits are the paintings by F. S. Coburn, R.C.A.—who has shunned his logging teams and skiers on this occasion—and has contented himself with three admirable studies of Carlotto, the dancer. In these works, respectively entitled "Bolero," "Rumba de Cuba" and "Coke Walk," the painter shows his skill and versatility. In arrangement, drawing and color they touch a high level. "Shell Flower and Porcelain," a still life, is fine in texture and not without quiet humor. Richard Jack, R.A., brings sunlight and crisp air to his interpretation of hills, snow and figures, called "Winter in the Laurentians," and his ability as a portraitist is revealed in "W. A. Black" and "Mrs. G. Victor Whitehead." Alphonse Jongsers shows a portrait of Lord Duncannon, in blue shirt and brown coat, which will undoubtedly be considered charming, and subtle qualities of tone make "Harmony in Brown and Grey"—a girl seated at a table toying with a glass of wine—by Adam Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., one of his most important contributions to date.

SCENES IN LAURENTIANS

Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., gives us the clear, fresh air of the Laurentian country in the well designed "Mont Tremblant from Gray Rocks"; the sparkle of sunlight and the blue of distant hills beyond a stretch of white landscape, in "Champagne Hill, St. Jovite," and the beauty of open water flowing between snowy bank, backed by a wooded bluff, in "Winter Stream, St. Jovite." Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., sends two landscapes—"Cloud Shadows," with its true and effective interpretation of light and shade on meadows, and "Woods—near Magog," both handled with his customary authority. Wilfrid M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., has landscapes, with the usual interest in skies, called "The Hilltop," and "Summer Sunset," and Harold Beament has found congenial material in the Laurentians. H. Mabel May, A.R.C.A., finds landscapes in winter attractive, and David McGill besides conscientiously painted landscapes, has a self-portrait. Two portraits—"Olive" and "Miss Doris Butler"—are from the brush of Margaret McGill. Quebec scenes are among the offerings of Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A., and Jean Munro does suggest mild sunlight in "Springtime in a Park." From Elizabeth S. Nutt, A.R.C.A., of Halifax, comes "The Edge of the Wood," and Hal Ross Perrigard, A.R.C.A., reveals clean color in "On River St. Francis" and "Old Houses at Oka." Eric Riordon has glitter in his marine—"The Joyous Song of the Sea" and has truthfully caught the hour in "Afternoon Sun, Laurentians," though the technique in both rather hints at the "slick." Thurston Topham is represented by a sound nocturne called "Vieille Rue," and there are two boldly handled characteristic works by Homer Watson, R.C.A. Archibald Browne, R.C.A., is represented by "The Spirit of Winter." George Thomson floods with delicate light "Spring in the Caledon Hills," and Walter Stenhouse has a fine atmospheric study in pastel of Montreal's skyscrapers as seen through the gap from Dominion Square. Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., has a luminous port scene with departing liner, tugs and barges, called "Outward Bound," and also a good interpretation of a winter morning, with the Nelson column silhouetted against the sky, distant grain elevator and the dome of Bonsecours Market dusted with snow. Georges Delfosse shows nice contrast in the old Hotel du Canada, Montreal, and Oscar De Lall has a conscientious portrait in "Elena."

The talented Misses DesClayes are well represented along their respective lines. Gertrude DesClayes, A.R.C.A., shows crisp treatment in her pastel called "Primavera." Alice DesClayes, A.R.C.A., reveals her usual skill in landscape and seashore settings for her horses and ponies, and Berthe DesClayes retains the happy faculty of just tones in her interpretations of autumn and early spring when snowy roads are rutted and wet.

There is a fair representation of flower paintings—Ida Beck with peonies, Hazel M. Caverhill with white tulips, Diana W. Cox with a study of zinnias, Annette S. de Bellefeuille with roses, Marion M. Hawthorne with cyclamen and azaleas, Lillian Hingston with salpiglossis, Sally Hereford with pastels of peonies and spring flowers, Gratia Julien with lilies and lupins, Ruby Le Bouthillier with anemones and plantain lily, Mary E. Mullally with peonies, Mrs. John Ogilvy with tulips and still life, Frances E. D. Porteous with white hyacinth and a flower study, Margaret W. Richardson with peonies, Mrs. B. C. Richstone with a flower study, Beatrice Robertson with marsh-marigolds, Sarah M. Robertson with tulips, both pink and white; Owen Staples with tiger lilies, Amy B. Stone with tulips and trilliums, Frances B. Sweeney with rowan-berries and Darwin tulips, Gertrude V. Fleming with delphinium, R. H. Tacon with Canterbury bells, Lillian A. Tweedie with mixed flowers, Mrs. Melita Aitken with Oriental poppies and Beatrice Tobin Asselin with red tulips.

SOME GOOD WATERCOLORS.

Growth in appreciation of the water color medium is marked, and the work shown sets a high standard. Henry Simpkins reveals his usual virility and sound color sense in "Where the Red Deer Roam," the animals in a wooded winter landscape; "Peggy's Cove, N.S.," and "Afternoon Light," Charles W. Simpson, R.A.A., not usually an exhibitor in this medium, strengthens this department with his fluent interpretations of Gaspe fishermen and versions of the Grand Canyon at different hours. Stanley Royle shows nice clean handling and dignified arrangement in "Corfe Castle, Dorset," Harry E. G. Ricketts reveals his usual crisp treatment in a group which includes "Snow Road." From J. Melville Miller are "The Pool" and "The Brook." David H. MacFarlane has found good subjects about Bic and Gaspe, Hugh G. Jones with subjects found in Rome, Toarmina, the Cotswolds and on The Clyde. J. S. Gordon, A.R.C.A., sends a scene done at Barbadoes, B.W.I. and Hortense M. Gordon, A.R.C.A., has a sparkling bit of color called "Le Havre, France." Arthur Drummond finds Lake of Bays a happy sketching ground, and Paul Caron finds the Quebec scene productive of good subjects. "A Quebec Doorway," being especially effective. Ernest E. Bird sends carefully studied vistas of Laurentian country, and James E. Beckwith, in his group of boldly handled works, touches a high level in the impression of Phillips Square with the King Edward monument. Mary D. Bagley shows her usual bold attack in two winter scenes.

Others exhibiting are: Mary B. Abraham, George C. Adams, Mrs. L. H. Alexander, W. R. Allen, Louella H. Anderson, Paul Andrew, G. S. Bagley, H. Annual Spring Exhibition at Art Association

Star March 20/36
With the customary reception in the galleries, the fifty-third Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal was opened on Thursday evening, and will remain open till April 12th.

This year's exhibition is larger than usual, in respect of the number of its exhibits, though many of the pictures are small, and the pictures show plenty of variety of subject, style and size. Among the oil pictures there are some striking portraits; some of the more important of these are by Adam Sherriff Smott, A.R.C.A., Richard Jack, R. A., Frances K. There are many good landscapes, among which are three by two senior painters, Homer Watson, R.C.A., and Archibald Browne, R.C.A. Still life and flower pictures are always fairly plentiful in these exhibitions and some of the best of these this year are by Hazel M. Caverhill, Mrs. John Ogilvy, and Edith M. Glen.

JOHN LYMAN HOLDS SHOW IN NEW YORK

Montreal Painter Exhibits
Portraits, Nudes and Landscapes at Valentine's

John Lyman, the well-known Montreal painter, is holding a one-man show in New York, at the Valentine Gallery. Opened on May 14, it will go on until Thursday of this week.

The exhibition consists of 25 paintings: portraits, nudes and landscapes; most of them familiar to Montreal art lovers. Outstanding among the portraits are "Costume, 1890," "Arab Girl," and the studies of Mrs. John Bird, "Helen," "Renée" and "Jeanette." The landscapes include a number of Laurentian scenes, chiefly of St. Jovite, at different seasons, and there is one of Lake Superior and one of Bermuda.

"A vein of direct lyricism, effective in its simplicity, runs through the painting of John Lyman," The New York Times said on Sunday. "A lake—amid greenery, or with a glimpse of laden hayfields, or in a more sombre autumn mood—he presents smoothly and nostalgically."

LEIGHTON PICTURES ARE ON EXHIBITION

Nearly 100 Watercolors on View at Eaton
Galleries

Thoroughly proficient is the work of A. C. Leighton, R.E.A., A.R.C.A., whose exhibition of nearly 100 water colors opened yesterday in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, and will be on view until Saturday, April 5. His style is architectural rather than impressionistic and he handles brush and pen—he uses both in most of his water colors—with precision and no nonsense about it, but at the same time he manages to throw a glamor over his pictures.

Some of this is because of his subjects. You cannot be completely matter-of-fact if you are fond of collecting old windmills, as Mr. Leighton is. The charm of the picturesque has much to do with the appeal of his windmills, his old buildings and boats, his bridges and castles. He has painted Corfe Castle from many points of view; he loves old churches—Rochester Cathedral, for example; and old streets—the corner of Sandwich, Kent, in a bronze light, seen from above; associations add to the pleasure in such views as that of the Norfolk Broads, with windmills and sailboats, of Beachy Head and its palisades, of the old wine vaults of Plymouth, of Ellen Terry's house in Kent.

He has brought his appreciation of the colorful to Canada, too, and he shows in a romantic light the drydocks at Vancouver, the ferry there, an old paddlewheeler at New Westminster, and even the grain elevators of the prairies. He finds something of the soft English atmosphere in British Columbia, as he paints "Showers" at Duncan, and other landscapes.

Yet he is able to do justice to the Rockies, and his views of Cathedral Mountain, Mount Assiniboine, the Crow's Nest Pass, Floe Lake and Tumbling Glacier, are notable for a bulk and solidity that are not always found in water colors. Whatever his subject, whether castle or windmill, Sussex village or ridge in the Rockies, Mr. Leighton builds it up into a substantial well-integrated design and he does it with an uncompromising line and a sureness of color.

His work is known in Montreal. He has held many one-man shows in Canada and has been represented in the Royal Canadian Academy and in the exhibitions of the Canadian Society of Water Color Painters, as well as in the Royal Academy, the Royal Society of British Artists and the Paris Salon.

NOTABLE ARTIST IS BURIED IN CITY

Henri Fabien, Canadian Sculptor, Painter, Had Distinguished Career

Preceded by a funeral service at Ottawa, where he died at his home, 88 Fifth avenue, New Year's eve, the burial of Henri Fabien, Canadian painter and sculptor, took place at Cote des Neiges Cemetery today. The body was brought here by motor hearse direct from the Christ-Roi Church in the Capital.

Mr. Fabien was born in St. Henry and received his education at the Brothers' School at Ste. Cuneegonde, where his father was mayor before that municipality was annexed to Montreal. He is said to have been the only Canadian who ever had paintings hung at the Paris Salon two years in succession.

His artistic ability first attracted the notice of E. Dyonnet of the Royal Canadian Academy who taught him for several years. Later he entered the Art Association School at Montreal.

In 1889 Fabien went to Paris where he studied under noted French artists. He returned to Canada in 1902 after a further period of study in Brittany. His first exhibition in Montreal attracted favorable notice from critics but few sales and Fabien went to the newspaper La Presse as a pen-and-ink artist.

GOES TO OTTAWA.

In 1905 he went to Ottawa and became chief draftsman of the Department of Indian Affairs. Later he became a translator for the Department.

In 1911 he had exhibited almost without interruption at shows of the Academy and the Art Association of Montreal.

Since 1911 he had exhibited almost "My Daughter Jacqueline" to the Paris Salon where it was hung. The following year the Salon hung his portrait of Betty Low, Ottawa dancer now with the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe.

He is survived by his widow, two daughters and one son. J. Adelard Fabien, 4600 King Edward, Notre Dame de Grace, C. A. and J. Wilfrid Fabien, all of Montreal, are brothers, and Miss Maria Fabien, Montreal is a sister.

NOVA SCOTIAN ART MAKING PROGRESS

Gazette March 24/36
Will Soon Hold Its Own With Any in Canada, Declares
Miss E. S. Nutt, A.R.C.A.

Paintings from Nova Scotia would, in a few years, hold their own with any in Canada, Miss Elizabeth Styring Nutt, A.R.C.A., principal of the Nova Scotia College of Art, told members of the Maritime Women's Club of Montreal, at a meeting held last evening in the Windsor Hotel.

The Maritime Provinces were producing a "very fine and powerful painting school," said Miss Nutt, adding, "Watch out! You will have every reason to be very proud that you belong to the Maritimes. The people in the Maritimes are slow at getting started, but once they start, they will never let go!"

Miss Nutt was convinced that the fine art that would be produced in the Maritimes would not be a repetition of the art of either central or western Canada, but would be definitely eastern Canada. Already the Canadian spirit was finding expression in art that was purely Maritime Province art, she said.

The art of Canada was still in the melting pot, the speaker continued with all ideas imported. She pointed out that with the possible exception of six artists, the leading painters of the Dominion had received their training in Europe, and Europe had left its mark upon their work. Canada was still echoing Europe, but not entirely, for now Canadian art was beginning "to find itself."

After touching upon the great principles of balance, harmony and rhythm in art, Miss Nutt dealt with the work of representative Canadian painters. While every artist in the Group of Seven had received European training, Miss Nutt felt, nevertheless, that they were "the truest Canadian painters we have." She praised Varley as "the greatest draughtsman in Canada, and probably the greatest painter," adding that "Lismer was the greatest teacher."

She also spoke of the music of Tom Thompson's work.

"The art of Canada must be seen through Canadian consciousness," she said; "if not, it becomes only a copy."

"The young people in Canadian art today are looking inwards," said Miss Nutt, who viewed with optimism the future development of art in the Dominion.

Mrs. Darwin Higginson, the president, opened the meeting. Mrs. W. F. Worfolk, the convener of the arts and letters committee, was in the chair, and Miss G. Paige Pineo introduced the speaker. Miss Eda Nelson moved the vote of thanks.

A MONTREAL-IN-ART EXHIBITION

Sir—The executive committee of the City Improvement League has accepted, in principle, the recommendation of the league's citizenship committee sponsoring a "Montreal-in-Art civic exhibition", comprising examples covering retrospective and contemporary periods of Montreal's civic history. The entire subject is now under advisement, details are being worked out and the various available sources of collaboration are being surveyed.

The public will be interested to know that it is the aim of this exhibition to invite artists to submit their best work concerning Montreal and its regional area. Subjects produced in oil, watercolors, tempera, pencil and ink drawings, etchings, lithographs, sculpture, and the graphic arts will be solicited. It is hoped that loan exhibits will be received from private collections in Montreal.

Furthermore, the exhibition will be augmented by portraits in oil of leading citizens who played a prominent part in the development and improvement of Montreal. Old Montreal, it is anticipated, will be wonderfully represented by a loan exhibit, by the courtesy of the City of Montreal, from its municipal art collection of historic places. If ultimately available, this will be the first occasion when citizens will have seen this valuable group of paintings re-united at one time and in one place.

In addition, there will be art loans from financial and business interests, and from the National Gallery, Ottawa, and the Provincial Museum in Quebec. A section of the show will most likely be devoted to artistic photography of views of Montreal.

The date and place of this civic art exhibition have not as yet been decided. These and other points are important, but the decisive factor in this project is the assurance of active co-operation from the artists, public and private organizations, educational authorities, and individual citizens generally. It would facilitate matters if those interested in the success of this exhibition would kindly write their suggestions or offers of support to Mr. J. C. Bonar, honorary secretary, at the league's office, Room 52, 980 St. Antoine street.

TRUE CANADIAN PAINTING

Two Hundred Paintings and Drawings Offer Splendid Array of Work in Dominion's Own Tradition

By ROBERT H. AYRE.

Three years ago, the Group of Seven disbanded. In some ways, its work was done. For fourteen years, it had stood together, a small, compact army, fighting for a new, a dynamic, a Canadian way of looking at Canada, consolidating its position, attacking prejudice and stale tradition. Well fortified, tradition fought back and prejudice was violently hostile, but in fourteen years, the group wore down the reactionaries—all but a few hard-shelled diehards—and established its own tradition. Such is the way with art, as it is with the other affairs of men: the revolutionary becomes the accepted. But here is the interesting point about the Group of Seven: it was not anxious to throw up walls about itself, it was not convinced that it was the last word; it was still young and flexible and revolutionary enough to realize that there was room in Canada for even newer impulses; it was satisfied that it had celebrated Canada in a Canadian way, that it had steered Canadian painting in a new direction; it was true to its essential spirit when it multiplied itself by four, making room for the younger painters, and became the Canadian Group.

MacDonald is dead, Lawren Harris is not at present living in this country, but Carmichael, Casson, Fitzgerald, Holgate, Jackson, Lismer and Varley are still here painting, still forces to be reckoned with. And the group as a whole is still a force. Even when it is a matter of history, even when all the painters are dead, the Group will go on being a living power in Canada.

The abundance of its vitality is thrillingly evident in the retrospective exhibition arranged by the National Gallery and now open to the public on the second floor of the Montreal Art Association building. With the exception of the works of Frank Johnston, one of the original members, who resigned shortly after the Group was formed and can therefore hardly be considered a part of it, these two hundred paintings and drawings cover the whole history of the Group. It is a magnificent show, and the lovers of good painting would do well to move into the Art Gallery and camp there for the next few weeks.

CHANCE FOR RE-APPRAISAL

It is scarcely necessary at this late date to review the show. Some of the works are from private collections, but most of them are well-known to Montrealers. On the other hand, many have not been seen in Montreal for years, and the opportunity for renewing acquaintances is not to be missed. There is one joy in seeing the individual pictures, and there is another joy in seeing the Group gathered together again, in appraising it in terms of history, in being convinced if you were not convinced before, or triumphantly justified if you were one of those who believed in the Group from the beginning.

I shall never forget the shock of pleasure I got when I first saw Lawren Harris's "North Shore, Lake Superior." To come upon it after passing through a room of dull brown European pictures was like emerging from a dark house into the full flood of winter sunlight. This was Canada. It still is, and Lawren Harris still excites. But there is something more than the first shock of surprise and joy in Lawren Harris. There is something far more lasting in this superb clean architecture of mountains, icebergs, islands, stark trees, clouds, waves and shafts of light. Sound becomes sight and sight becomes sound; the light vibrates; all is one; the rhythms are gathered into one resounding chord. Harris paints Canada; he paints the ultimate North; but he goes beyond these and into the spirit.

Such high, rarified altitudes are too pure, too cold for many people, and for them there is another side of Harris in this show: the earlier Harris, who painted motley shacks and fences from a surprisingly comical point of view.

The Group of Seven is nothing if not diverse. From the lofty, icy mountaintops of Lawren Harris you can come down through the purity of Fitzgerald, through the austere but colored poetry of MacDonald, through the human robustness of Lismer and Jackson, through the variations of Carmichael and Casson and the fastidious sophistication of Holgate, to the world of jostling men in Varley.

Like Harris, Fitzgerald is pure, but with a difference. Living on the prairie, he is enchanted by light—how luminous is that sky in "Doc Snider's House"—but living on the prairie, he is not so dramatic in either forms or color. He works in a smaller field. If Harris enlarges through the resonant chord to a great stillness, Fitzgerald narrows to a small stillness. They both wipe out all the inessential. Drawing meticulously, painstakingly, his tree trunks, his stooks, his clouds, Fitzgerald reaches perfection.

At different ends of the scale, Harris and Fitzgerald are akin. Humanity touches them less than any of the other painters. Jackson and Lismer are all human. They do not refine. They throw themselves into their landscapes, Lismer boisterous, almost careless—what an abounding vitality and individuality there is in "September Gale"—Jackson a little more sober, a little more considered, but tremendously dynamic in his color and his rhythms.

There isn't room to say all that should be said about these painters; about Jackson's Laurentian and Baffin Land and Labrador landscapes; Lismer's joyous Nova Scotia tangles; MacDonald's rich pageantry of color, his wide vision, his imagination, his splendor and his sombreness—"The Solemn Land" is here; about Varley's lively portraits—"John" is wriggling and about to duck out of the frame—about his decorative panel, "Immigrants"; about Holgate's beautiful compositions of nudes and landscapes, his portraits. Holgate and Varley are more concerned with the human figure than with the lakes and trees and mountains. While remaining Canadian, they are closer to Europe than the others, they bring Canada a suggestion of the atelier, even if Holgate does paint lumberjacks sturdily and authentically, and Varley sometimes takes a fling at Georgian Bay. They draw Canadian painting indoors, so to speak. They are influences we need, for we cannot always remain in the open.

Casson—his "Thunderstorm" is memorable, and he shows some excellent water colors—and Carmichael—he brings in the human element with his mining villages—are less powerfully individual than the others, but they have something to say for themselves and should not be overlooked.

All these diverse elements go to make up the Group of Seven and to give up a thrilling experience. I cannot think of a better way to sum up the show than by saying it makes you feel—how good to be in Canada!

As an accompaniment to the Drama Festival, which is just now concerning many people all over Canada, the National Gallery of Canada has borrowed from the Courtauld Institute in London a collection of the designs for stage costumes and scenery made by the late Norman Wilkinson of Four Oaks, one of the most successful of recent English stage designers. These drawings, in pencil and water color, are being exhibited in different Canadian galleries, and are at present in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal.

These are attractive as drawings and, unlike some designs of the kind, they make the costumes look as if they could be really worn and be as effective in fact as in the designs. The larger part of them are for two productions made in London by Granville Barker just before the war. One of these was "Twelfth Night," for which there are two scenes of a sort of Venetian architecture; in the dresses for this only few colors have been used and they must have stood out well against the blacks and whites of most of the costumes. Mr. Wilkinson made a fairly free use of period and style in his designs, both in "Twelfth Night" and in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," for which the dresses are Greek with a little difference; there are some very effective, big patterns in color on these dresses, and the men's dresses have a rather oriental character with their long trousers. A few drawings and some photographs show another, Elizabethan setting of "Midsummer Night's Dream," made for Stratford on Avon, which is rather less pictorial than the Greek setting. There are more Greek dresses in the designs for a production of "Iphigenia in Tauris" in New York, and among these is a fine costume, with a red kilt and a red-plumed helmet for the barbarian king.

There are some more recent designs, some of Mr. Wilkinson's last work—for a Louis XV play and for Moliere's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme"—and in this last there is good use of imagination in the disguises and in the dresses of the fencing master and the dancing master.

An Exhibition Of Works of the Group of Seven

Star April 24/36
Another of the travelling exhibitions arranged by the National Gallery of Canada is now being shown at the Art Association of Montreal. This one is a big collection of work by the Group of Seven and it fills all the space lately occupied by the Spring Exhibition. It is called retrospective, but it could be called a memorial exhibition, since the Group dissolved itself by expansion into a larger group nearly three years ago. The collection does good justice to the Group by showing some of their best work; six of the original members are represented, though there is nothing by Frank Johnston, who was one of the first seven, and the two latest members, Edwin Holgate and L. L. Fitzgerald, who became additional members, as sympathizers not followers, are not very well represented. There are just on two hundred pictures in the exhibition, with from ten to twenty-seven works by each of the members.

As Canadian painters, who set out to make true pictures of Canada, the members of the Group found many of their best subjects in the color of autumn and winter, the two principal seasons of the Canadian year. None of them used the great possibilities of Canadian autumn better than J. E. H. MacDonald, and there are a number of his big pictures here, splendid in color and very true pictures of Canadian mountains and forests. With these fine decorations are some smaller pictures and sketches, which are just as good and as full of fine color and design.

The work of A. Y. Jackson is better known here than that of any of his colleagues. The exhibition contains many of his clever arrangements of sunlight on snow and some of his Labrador pictures, some of them with strange but interesting sky patterns. There are also some cheerful pictures and excellent sketches of summer and autumn scenery.

Arthur Lismer is represented by some of his best work. The "September gale" is here, a rather hard picture with an astonishing suggestion of movement in the trees and water, and the "Isle of spruce" is an impressive piece of decoration, with good colour. Some pictures of Nova Scotia are rather unequal but there are good ones among them.

F. H. Varley is more a portrait painter than the other members of the group, and his portraits here are more important than his landscapes. Among these are the portraits of Dr. Irving Cameron and of Mr. Vincent Massey, which both have dignity, but the best work here by Mr. Varley is on some of the smaller studies, such as the "Gypsy head," the clever and happy portrait of a boy and the self portrait.

Lawren Harris is the most experimental of the Group. One of his best works here is the portrait of the Rev. Salem Bland, which is hard but vivid. In some of his work he is as much a colorist as the other members, particularly in the pictures of houses and shacks, and there is simple and striking design in a picture of a northern lake, framed in yellow leaves. With these are a number of his bleak compositions of northern snows, — symbols rather than pictures, — painted with stark economy of line and colour. Franklin Carmichael is less well represented than the other painters. In some of his pictures the tones are rather heavy, but there is more freshness in a water colour and an oil picture of the Whitefish Hills, and there are good effects of light and interesting composition in several other pictures.

There are only a few pictures by Edwin Holgate, the Montreal member of the Group. The most striking of them are the finely drawn and painted figure studies and the portrait of a lumberjack. L. L. Fitzgerald is represented chiefly by a number of drawings, of admirable line and shading. Among the few oil pictures by him are some formal designs of leaves and landscape with a tenderness of colouring which distinguishes them from most of the other work in the exhibition.

GEST CHINESE LIBRARY TO BE WITHOUT HOME

May 1936.
McGill Lacks Room For Collection

More than 100,000 Chinese books, many of them centuries old, will be without a home shortly, it was learned at McGill University today. Notice has gone out from the university to G. M. Gest, founder of the Gest Chinese Research Library, that the university can no longer provide space in the Redpath Library to house this famous collection.

Mr. Gest, who was in Montreal yesterday, stated that he did not know what disposal would be made of the collection. It might even have to go into storage in Montreal or elsewhere. The Gest Library has been closed for some months due to lack of funds to employ a librarian.

University authorities explained that library space at McGill was so badly needed that it would be necessary to extend the stacks into the area occupied by the Gest collection. This made necessary the removal of this collection.

Exhibition of 100 Canadian Pictures to Go to Southern Dominions

Ottawa, April 30.—(C)—An exhibition consisting of approximately 100 pictures by contemporary Canadian artists is being organized by the National Gallery of Canada at the invitation of Dr. F. P. Keppel, president of the Carnegie Corporation of New York, which is bearing all expenses in connection with the exhibition. The collection will be shown in all the southern Dominions of the British Empire very shortly, according to a statement today issued by H. S. Southam, of Ottawa, chairman of the board of trustees of the National Gallery.

Invitations have been issued to all Canadian artists of professional standing, and pictures will be assembled in Ottawa not later than May 22. The following connoisseurs have accepted the invitation of the trustees of the National Gallery to act on a jury of selection with the chairman and Eric Brown, director: Sir Wyly Grier, president of the Royal Canadian Academy; Professor John Alford, head of the department of fine arts, University of Toronto; Martin Baldwin, curator of the Art Gallery of Toronto, and Paul Rainville, associate director, Museum of the Province of Quebec.

The exhibition, which will be on tour about 18 months, will open at Johannesburg, South Africa, next September, and after being shown in the important cities of that Dominion, will go to Australia and New Zealand.

The invitation from the Carnegie Corporation is said to be a recognition of the work done by the National Gallery of Canada during the past 15 years in successfully organizing and circulating art exhibitions throughout the Dominion and abroad. The Canadian exhibition will be followed by similar ones invited from the southern Dominions to tour Canada and the United States.

"We feel," said Mr. Southam, "that this undertaking, so splendidly conceived and so generously supported, is worthy of all possible encouragement, and the National Gallery of Canada is gladly co-operating to the fullest extent with the Carnegie Corporation to make the venture in every way successful."

MCGILL MUSEUM HEAD IS RETIRED

Well Known For Historical Exhibits

Known to thousands of Greater Montreal boys and girls for her series of exhibits illustrating Canadian history, Mrs. F. C. Warren is being retired by McGill University as assistant curator of the McCord National Museum. Her retirement, which goes into effect today, was announced as an economy move on the part of the university.

No announcement was made regarding the future of the museum. Previous university announcements indicated that as the museum served the public largely, it might have to be closed in the interest of economy.

NAMED IN 1928

Mrs. Warren succeeded Miss Mary Muir as assistant curator in 1928. Miss Muir was assistant curator from the time the museum opened in 1920. Mrs. Warren made a special study of Canadian history before being appointed to the staff of the museum.

Four years ago she inaugurated the special series of exhibits illustrating periods in Canadian history. The records of the museum show that some 12,500 school pupils have visited these exhibits, as well as thousands of others who have entered the museum.

Another of her major works has been the sorting and indexing of the valuable and original documents illuminating Canadian history and which are in the possession of the museum.

SELECTED VERSE

"Intelligentsia"

Toronto is a city where the arts are much admired,
Where artists and musicians are encouraged and inspired,
Where drama's gently mothered and where literature is sired—
Intelligentsia!

Toronto on the drama is exceptionally keen,
Because it is legitimate, unlike the vulgar screen,
But only on vice-regal nights are crowded houses seen—
Intelligentsia!

Toronto loves such paintings as not only blind but deafen,
And believes that plain geometry of drawing is the heaven,
And you're sure to go to heaven if you know the group of seven—
Intelligentsia!

Toronto loves its music when the citizens are sure
The music is the finest that their money can procure,
Toronto loves its music best when "tails" are "de rigueur"—
Intelligentsia!

Toronto worships literature upon its bended knees,
And sits around discussing books at highbrow p.m. teas,
But it rarely understands them if they're not in journalese—
Intelligentsia!

Oh, the culture of Toronto!
Oh, the culture of Toronto!
Oh, the culture of Toronto!

Tom Stone Shows Canadian
Scenes—Van Gogh Prints
Also Exhibited

Tom Stone, O.S.A., who has a show of small paintings in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, reminds one of conventional Canadian poetry: he rejoices in Canadian sun and sky, hills and water and trees, and he reports them more or less faithfully, and melodiously enough, but without any dynamic individuality.

Of 36 canvases, two-thirds are winter—mostly water surrounded by snowy banks and evergreens, and roads through the woods. Logging naturally appeals to him and his largest picture, "Ice Logging Road, Yemagami" is picturesque. Most of the work was done in Northern Ontario—Haliburton, for instance—and Quebec. There is a view of St. Urbain, with its little brood of houses around the church, and a patchwork of hills and fields under a heavy sky at St. Hilarion. He picks out such romantic subjects as covered bridges and spruces shrouded in snow, and he has a taste for a dramatic sky.

"Sleigh Ride," with its patches of colored houses and children's clothes, is livelier than some, and he shows some brilliant tints in his autumn sketches. Mr. Stone's color is clean and bright; without being particularly distinguished, he is happy.

In the next room, Eaton's is taking advantage of the revival of interest in Vincent van Gogh to show about 30 colored prints of some of his best known paintings and a few not so familiar. They are in all sizes and are such faithful reproductions that the brush-strokes—those tremendously living brush-strokes—are not lost, and even the grain of the canvas may sometimes be seen. There is a self-portrait, a Zouave as clamorous as a flag, and the young man in the yellow coat and the blue hat; the sunflowers are in the collection, the irises, the incandescent chestnut tree, the green flame of the cypress and the clouds writhing away like smoke; and there are boats, workers, sunburnt gardens, and a molten harvest field under a fierce sun-disc.

Work of Montreal Artists Included in Display

Of the 92 original travel posters on exhibition at Tudor Hall, Jas. A. Ogilvy's, Limited, all this week, two were executed by Montreal artists. The posters were submitted in a national contest sponsored by the Institute of Foreign Travel, New York City, and in the exhibition are entries by Roger Couillard, 3937 Berri street, and Oscar Schillenger, 3429 St. Andre street.

The originals of the three winning posters, which received awards of $500 and a round trip to Europe, $200 and $100 respectively, are included in the exhibit. Commenting on these in the American Magazine of Art recently, L. B. Rouff, jr., wrote, "All three posters are strikingly executed, but if I may be a self-constituted critic for a moment, I should like to revise the order of No. 1 and No. 2 and present the second prize with the blue ribbon." The latter is a composite of things to be seen in Europe, while first prize shows a young couple standing on a globe, a folder opening out over the poster and showing various places on the Continent.

FANTIN-LATOURE FOR ART ASSOCIATION

"La Parade de la Feerie" Acquired for Permanent Collection

The Art Association of Montreal has acquired the large painting by Henri Fantin-Latour, "La Parade de la Feerie," which was exhibited recently by W. Scott & Sons, Drummond street, in an exhibition of French paintings which was organized in conjunction with Alex Reid and Lefevre Limited, of London. It was first seen in Montreal in March, 1934.

Apart altogether from the glamor of its subject and the handling of it in warm, gorgeous colors, "La Feerie" has a romantic historic interest. Painted in 1863, it was sent to the Paris Salon, which rejected it. A place was found for the picture in the Salon des Refuses, and it was shown in the Exposition Centennale d'Art Français, in 1900. In 1906, it appeared in a retrospective show of Fantin-Latour's work, at the Palais des Beaux Arts, Paris. It was at the Museum of French Art, New York, in 1932, and two years later it was shown at the National Gallery of Canada in the "French Painting in the Nineteenth Century" exhibition, going to Toronto and Montreal.

One interesting aspect of the picture's history is that it was given by the artist to Whistler, who kept it until 1889, when he returned it to Fantin-Latour. It later became part of the Haviland collection. The canvas is 38 1/2 by 51 1/4 inches.

FINE LITHOGRAPHS AT ART GALLERIES

WORK STANDARD HIGH

Dozen Countries and 86 Artists Represented in Exhibition Marked by Contrasts

It would take columns to do justice to the exhibition of contemporary international lithographs now on view in the print room of the Montreal Art Association. The inclination is to pause in admiration before nearly every one of the prints, but there are 133 of them, and the best that can be done is pick out some of the highlights. This is not easy, and scarcely fair, for the National Gallery has arranged a show of uniform quality. In subject and handling, there is an extraordinary diversity—a dozen countries and about 86 artists—but there is a single standard.

One way of getting at the exhibition would be to speak in contrasts, to compare, for instance, the beautiful sculptural and human figures of Rivera and Charlot and Maillol with the pleasant artificialities of Marie Laurencin and Edna Clarke Hall. The three-dimensional solidity of van Dobbenburgh's church, Rockwell Kent's Greenland scene and Stow Wengenroth's "Coast Guard" might be contrasted with Pierre Bonnard's shadowy impressions and Edouard Vuillard's interiors; how different are Leon Lang's color patches from the textile design of Marion Ellis's flowers, and what a far cry to van Gelder's vegetables and flowers, almost painfully meticulous, like some exquisite old engraving! Compare the scratchy style of C. R. W. Nevinson's "Great White Way" with the smooth, clean treatment of two other modern subjects—"Tanks" by Louis Lozowick and Howard Cook's "New Hudson Bridge," and with these compare Wanda Gag's comical interpretation of a stone crusher—impressionism; deliberate, cold recordings; and humorous imagination.

There is plenty of humor in this show—Mabel Dwight's "Ferry Boat," with a touch of satire; Pearl Binder's "Boxall's Property Shop, Lambeth," and Franz Wacik's "Baron Munchausen," to mention only a few. And there is tragedy: Poncet's "Christ Carrying the Cross; Brangwyn's "They Cry Peace When There is No Peace"; Orozco's "La Bandera"; and Harmen Meurs' big, strong, earnest, almost dull designs. William Gropper's "The Judge" is the only print approaching the cartoon with social implications.

LASKE REPRESENTED.

One of the most delightful exhibitors is Oskar Laske of Austria. His "Christopher Columbus" has both imagination and humor, combined in a lively pattern of fresh crayon colors. The Santa Maria is being welcomed by hundreds of naked Indians, dancing, swimming, bobbing about in coracles, and the palm trees lean forward as if they, too, were about to jump into the sea. The same qualities are to be found in "Paradise"—Adam and Eve a little lost in a wilderness of animals, with the trees fuller of birds than of leaves—but the color is almost like that of an ancient illuminated manuscript. His third picture, "Evacuation in East Galicia" is an all-over pattern of peasants, bundles, waggons, horses and tents.

Important Frenchmen included in the exhibition are Matisse, Derain, Despiu, Forain and Vlaminck; their subtleties are too well known to be enlarged on here. Prominent among the English artists are Bone and Blampied; John Copley, who brings drama; James Fitton, whose "Circus" has a modern aspect; James Grant, whose mothers and children are beautiful in color and modelling; Augustus John, whose "Strolling Musicians" is extremely free and alive; C. W. Oliver, who shows two fine portraits; and Charles Winzer, who has imagination and a delicate line. Mateo Hernandez of shows giraffe, penguins and ca. and Teng-Kwei of China has two. One of the most sensitive and appealing prints is "Angel with pigeons" by Lode Sengers of Holland. This exhibition should be honored with as many visits of as many hours as possible. Fortunately, it will be open until April 3. R. H. A.

An Exhibition Of Lithographs

The latest to reach Montreal of the travelling exhibitions, arranged by the National Gallery of Canada, is one of recent lithographs, which is now being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. It is an international show, and eleven countries are represented in it, but most of the prints come from England, France and the United States, and nearly half of them are English.

Among the exhibitors are many of the best known workers in lithography, with many new ones, and there are examples of most of the ways in which lithography can be used. Simpler contrasts of light and shade are used to very good effect in some of them; John Copley's spectators in the gallery of a theatre is a good example, there is fine depth of shadow in A. S. Hartick's "Tinkers' Camp," and beautiful light in B. Tarnay's staircase picture; these are all English, and there is an effect of the same kind in the Italian, Giulio Cisari's "Prize Fight." The "Old Smithy" of the German, Kurt Winkler, has fine broad light and shade, but his other prints have an amount of small detail which is unusual in lithographs, and there is work of the same kind in the prints by D. Van Gelder of Holland. There is beauty of simplicity in the Austrian, Ernest Huber's prints of Jerusalem, and the American, Birger Sandzen's mountain lake; the one Chinese print, of geese by Teng-Kwei, is a happy adaptation of Chinese ideas with a new method. Rather geometrical designs are used in two American prints,—Howard Cook's of one of the New York bridges, and Louis Lozowick's of tanks in a factory.

Colour is used in a few of the prints and generally sparingly. It is very effectively used in a print of horses by Oswald Roux of Austria, and in the caricatures of Peter Sullivan of England. The big colour prints, crowded with people, by Oskar Laske of Austria, are curious and amusing.

Some of the better known artists who are represented in the collection are Frank Brangwyn, Muirhead Bone, J. A. Shepherd, Augustus John and Edmund Blampied, of England; Andre Derain, Marie Laurencin, Aristide Maillol, Jean Louis Forain, Henri Matisse, Pierre Bonnard and Edouard Vuillard, of France; Albert Bartoosen of Belgium, and Diego Rivera of Mexico.

WESTMOUNT PUBLIC LIBRARY REOPENED

Gazette May 8/36
Remodelled Interior Presents
Striking and Colorful Appearance

Redecorated, refurnished and remodelled at a cost of approximately $30,000, Westmount Public Library was reopened yesterday after having been closed for several months to permit the carrying out of extensive alterations. Brightness, modern equipment and more accommodation for staff and stacks were the principal features noted by book-lovers who thronged the library during the afternoon and evening.

Color is an outstanding feature of the remodelled library. The new double delivery desk in quartered oak, 33 1/2 feet in length, has been specially designed along modern lines with rounded exterior corners, a black recessed rubber base, and a dark blue linoleum top. Over the desk, in the four semi-circular panels formed by an arcade, are colored murals depicting the history of Letters. The subjects of the paintings, which were executed by A. Sherriff Scott, are the Stone, Egyptian and Medieval Ages, and the introduction of the printing press.

The stack room, two floors in height, is somewhat unique because of the free use of color, the shelving and panelled ends being of burnt orange with portions in black. An additional feature is the slight tilting of the two lower shelves in the stack room, enabling easier reading of the titles than when books are placed vertically. The two catalogue cabinets slope outwards also to enable the cards to be read more easily.

A. D. Thornton, chairman of the library's board of trustees, stated yesterday that he was more than satisfied with the work which was carried out by Cook and Leitch, general contractors, from designs and specifications prepared by Philip J. Turner, F.R.I.B.A., architect.

The Montreal Camera Club's Exhibition

Though the Montreal Camera Club has only been in existence a short time, its exhibition, which is now open, compares quite well with those of other photographic clubs and contains work which could hold its own in international exhibitions. The photographs, of which there are about a hundred, are being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. They include most of the subjects which are suited to modern photographic methods. Some of the outstanding portrait studies are by G. C. Papineau-Couture, who also shows some figure studies; a very well managed photograph of a head with black draperies is by Jose Newman of Toronto, and the portraits by Nakash and Charles Aylett of Toronto are excellent photography but more conventional than the others.

Successful pattern effects, which lend themselves so well to photography, are fairly numerous. A particularly good one is of pantiles on roofs of houses by J. Campbell; a pattern of tracks in snow is shown by W. D. McClellan of Ottawa; the photography and the choice of view point in W. Horton's row of arches is distinctly good; Leonard Davis of Hamilton has got an ingenious effect by photographing a cat and some boats through a fishing net. H. Schroyen of Toronto has got a good picture from a chance effect of sky and water; N. S. Horton has a rather good study of swirling water, and A. M. Johnston of Ottawa has made a striking picture of the shadow of heavy smoke on water, as well as an interesting effect of sunlight in a city street. Two other photographs in which light and shade have been well used are an odd night effect by A. R. Bixley of Regina and an interior by Alfred Bridgen of Toronto.

There are many other good pictures of ships, buildings and snow scenes. A little group of photographs in natural colours is interesting but not very important.

PHOTOGRAPH SHOW HAS WIDE VARIETY

April 21/36
Some Distinguished Work on View in Gallery Print Room

There is a lesson in the limits and possibilities of photography as an art to be learned at the spring show of the Montreal Camera Club in the print room of the Montreal Art Association. Of the 100 prints, a few are distinguished; most of them repeat the familiar story—games of lights and shadows; the satisfaction of faithfully recording surfaces, such as the texture of snow, the bloom of grapes, the cobbles of the pavement; the fun of creating novelties, telling quaint stories, catching odd events off guard. Not many of the photographers have concerned themselves with forms for their own sakes. G. C. Papineau-Couture is interested in the modelling of the human body and one of his nudes is particularly good. Interesting from the standpoint of form, although some of them have other elements are the whaleboats of C. M. Johnston, Ottawa; Roger Dion's "Geometrie"; R. King's "Concrete"; N. S. Horton's windmills, and Mr. Johnston's tug and ocean liner.

The most distinguished portraits are by Nakash of Montreal. The Hamilton Camera Club sends an outstanding photograph of a man at work, "Hones: Toil," and Blossom and Ray Caron have a good character in an old man playing cards. The most successful animal picture is "Boots," portrait of a kitten by Skillen of Hamilton.

The usual landscapes are to be seen, tracks in the snow, woods "artistically" diffused, and there are some good records of city streets. "Snowblossom," by D. Grayston is a pretty detail of snow on twigs. P. J. Croft and E. W. Jackson show a few examples of color photography.

STUDENTS DISPLAY DRAWING FOR YEAR

McGill School of Architecture Exhibition on View at Art Gallery

The annual exhibition of the work of the students of the McGill School of Architecture, now on view in the Sherbrooke street galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, will close on Sunday, it was announced yesterday. The exhibition is of especial interest this year because of the quality of the work exhibited, and on account of the fact that a record number of students are enrolled, while the graduating class of 11 budding architects is the largest in history.

Only a small fraction of the drawings made during the last session are on exhibition but they provide a representative picture of the work as a whole. The standard of draughtsmanship in the first and second year work shown is high and is characterized by harmonious coloring. The freehand drawing is thoroughly sound and the summer school measured drawings of historic buildings, besides illustrating valuable examples of old work, show a real interest on the part of the young draughtsmen in their subjects. The third year work in domestic design covers a variety of subjects, from a log cabin to a city club, in which Wong particularly distinguishes himself.

Drawings by fourth year students comprise a municipal council chamber with full interior details and a large swimming bath with full structural details, the first place being shared by Cooperberg and Hammond. The work of the final year undergraduates is notable both for the high average standard and the great industry of the students. Jones won the first place in the country town hospital problem, Dixon in the twenty storey commercial building problem, and Magill in the housing estate.

Adjudication of fifth year work has been done throughout the session by outside specialists, according to Prof. Percy E. Nobbs. He expressed the hope that their comments both on the general plans of development and on the economical planning of the two, three, and four-storey workmen's dwellings submitted in the housing estate problem would result in the graduating students being given opportunity to exercise their talents in the near future.

L'exposition restera ouverte ensuite tous les jours de 1 h. à 5 h. et de 7 h. à 9 h. 30 p.m. (le dimanche soir excepté) jusqu'au 16 juin inclusivement.

M. Scott étudia à l'Edinburgh School of Art de 1903 à 1906, gagna la bourse Allen-Fraser 1906-1909; étudia en 1909 à Londres, à la Slade School of Art, sous Henry Tonks, et fit un stage à Paris et à La Haye avant de revenir au Canada en 1911. Il était du 42e Bataillon R.H.C. durant la guerre et revint au pays en 1919. La Galerie nationale d'Ottawa et le Musée provincial possèdent de ses œuvres dans leur collection permanente. Elu A.R.C.A. en 1935.

M. Beament étudia le portrait sous J.-W. Beatty, R.C.A., à l'Ontario College of Art, et compléta ses études artistiques au Chelsea Polytechnic à Londres. Il a exposé à Londres, Paris, Buenos-Aires, New-York, et dans maintes villes du Canada et des Etats-Unis. Il était de la marine britannique (section Atlantique-Nord) durant la guerre. Pour nos peintres J'ENTENDS dire à travers les branches que la Ville de Montréal songe à consacrer la modeste somme d'au moins $2,000 à acheter quelques tableaux et aquarelles d'artistes montréalais qui se sont dévoués à décrire les charmes divers de la métropole. Le geste serait de beau ton et plein d'opportunité. Il ne faut pas oublier que nos peintres n'ont pas, en général, les mêmes chances que les musiciens parmi nous. Les musiciens sont rétribués pour les répétitions; ils ont le chemin ouvert du côté de la radio, malgré parfois certaines combines monopolisatrices. Nos peintres aussi ont faim. Eux aussi sont artistes. Et une ville digne de ce nom se devrait de penser à eux de temps à autre.

ARTISTS SCORE CHOICE OF LAYMEN FOR JURY

Body Will Select Paintings for Exhibit

TORONTO, April 30 — (C.P.)—Four Canadian artists yesterday joined in a protest against what they termed the "indefensible" procedure of the National Gallery in its choice of the jury of selection which will assemble the exhibition of Canadian paintings to go to South Africa, Australia and New Zealand.

The four, all members of the Ontario Society of Artists, are Archibald Forbes, Kenneth Forbes, Arthur Heming and Evan MacDonald. They contend that the jury is comprised of five laymen to one artist and that these laymen are in favor of modernistic art, though not one has successfully practised as a painter. It is maintained that the personnel is not qualified to decide "what shall or shall not represent the national art of Canada."

Sir Wylie Grier, president of the Royal Canadian Academy and the one practising artist on the jury, said he thought it would be improper for him to enter into the discussion except to point out that the invitations were sent by the National Gallery to individual artists. He said those protesting were "quite entitled to hold their opinion."

Dr. R. T. McKenzie, McGill Graduate, Makes Gymnasium Gift

Announcement that Dr. R. Tait McKenzie, noted sculptor, is presenting a ten foot long plaster plaque of racing skaters to the Sir Arthur Currie Memorial Gymnasium-Armory, was made today from Building Fund Campaign headquarters.

Dr. McKenzie is one of McGill's most prominent graduates, and has attained world renown as a sculptor of youth, particularly of athletes in action. Three of his works are particularly well known, namely, The American Scottish Memorial at Edinburgh, the Cambridge War Memorial, and the great statue at Greenwich of General Wolfe. The plaque which he has presented to McGill is entitled "Brothers of the Wind." It depicts eight figures in a stirring race and will add much to the Trophy Room of the new Gymnasium-Armory, which will house the many championship cups and trophies that McGill teams have won in years gone by.

TO SPEAK HERE

Dr. McKenzie will make a special trip from his home in Philadelphia to attend the opening dinner on Thursday, June 4, at which he will be one of the main speakers of the evening. According to reports from Campaign Headquarters, the demand for tickets for this dinner is increasing every day and many believe it will be by far the largest McGill dinner in recent years.

Although the Campaign does not officially open until next week, a number of subscriptions have already been received, including several large cheques turned in by the Special Names Committee under the Joint Chairmanship of C. F. Sise and Walter Molson.

The Student Committee, under the Chairmanship of John A. Nolan, also expects to make some substantial returns this week as they are canvassing the graduating class of 1936 this week prior to Convocation Day on Thursday.

SNYDER ENRICHES NATIONAL MUSEUM

Montreal Big-Game Hunter Presents Group of Wood Buffalo

OTTAWA, May 26—(C. P.)—Official Ottawa will be introduced tomorrow night to a sportsman's $22,000 gift to the nation, a habitat group of wood buffalo from Northern Alberta, occupying a glass-faced panel 29 feet long, 14 deep and standing against a circular panoramic painted background 45 feet long.

The group, one of the largest in the world and the only one showing wood buffalo, was donated to the National Museum by Harry Snyder, widely-known Montreal and Chicago big game hunter, who will make the formal presentation to Hon. T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines.

The buffalo or bison, a bull, a cow and a calf are shown fighting off a trio of timber wolves in a frozen marsh. The background of pines was painted from photographs of the Slave Lake district and the animals were photographed in stills and movies many times before they were finally shot and brought down by pack, airplane and train to New York to be mounted by sculptors and artisans in the group that took 15 men over a year to build.

RAPIDLY KILLED OFF.

The wood bison were once common to this continent and were used for food, clothing and equipment by the Indians. It is estimated that when the continent was discovered there were 50,000,000 inhabiting the area from the Great Slave Lake to Mexico and from the western foothills to beyond the Great Lakes. In 1890 there were less than 1,000 bison living. Some were held captive as curiosities on cattle ranches and possibly 500 head, the last wild remnant of the herd, roamed the woods and tundras of Northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories, south of Great Slave Lake. Today, as the result of protection, there are probably 25,000 bison.

The bison in the habitat group were chosen by expert advisors of Mr. Snyder as typical specimens. After being shot they were measured, the pelts removed and treated. Those with the skulls and largest bones were transported by pack and plane to the nearest railroad many hundreds of miles away.

SCULPTORS' WORK.

In New York sculptors made miniature clay models of the group from the photographs. The staff set to work on the final models. Huge clay bodies were made fitted to the skins, then paper mache and basswood forms were moulded, the skins were moth proofed and set on the paper mache forms.

HOMER WATSON, 80 NOTED ARTIST, DIES

Leading Landscape Painter Passes at Home in Doon, Ont.

KITCHENER, Ont., June 1—(C. P.)—In the countryside he placed on canvas so beautifully, Homer Watson's fine artistic touch was stilled by death. One of the Dominion's greatest landscape artists, he died in the little rural community of Doon which gave him the inspiration for paintings that grasped the fancy of those who loved the trees.

After a long struggle against illness, the artist died on Saturday at his Doon home, near Kitchener, his 80 years proving too great a burden to carry in his fight for health. He left behind works of art that carried his name into the circle of those the critics praise.

He was born at Doon and as a true lover of nature he turned to art when just a youth. When only 25 his painting, "The Pioneer Mill," reached the Royal Canadian Academy. The Marquis of Lorne, then Governor-General and founder of the academy, purchased the painting for Queen Victoria's private collection.

His laurels were enhanced only three years later when he was made the first elected member of the academy. The stately beech, oak and elm he wove into his pastoral landscapes to bring from one critic the remark he pictured the beauty of yesterday for those who live tomorrow.

PAINTED WAR PICTURES

Watson painted war pictures that gripped the imagination. His first was done for the Canadian Government in 1914 and it was a picture of Valcartier Camp. His inspired brush produced the painting, "Into The Unknown." It revealed the tragic march into the conflict. With the war's end he painted, "Out Of The Pit," the return of those who escaped the terrific slaughter.

Queen Victoria also acquired Watson's "Last Of The Drought," which followed his 1880 painting which the Marquis of Lorne bought. He journeyed to England several times to place his works beside those of the famous.

When 75, Watson attended an exhibition of his paintings at the Toronto Art Gallery, his small figure with his gracious manner winning him many friends who already clung to the views his brush presented.

Despite his fame in the art world, the scene was quiet and peaceful at his home in Waterloo County. There were no art dealers. He lived his last days with a sister who cared for him after his wife had died. Watson's last days were robbed of the country beauty by busy industry that stole the green foliage from the country he loved.

PREMIER'S TRIBUTE.

OTTAWA, June 1—(C.P.)—Premier Mackenzie King today paid tribute to Homer Watson, landscape painter, who died Saturday at Doon, Ont., near Kitchener. Watson was a friend of the Premier's father, the late John King, and the Prime Minister recalled he had visited the artist's studio many times when he was a boy.

Mr. Mackenzie King coupled with his tribute to Watson an appreciation of Carl Ahrens, another Waterloo County artist. In a press statement he said:

"In the death of Homer Watson, Canada has lost one whose name will ever be foremost in the realm of Canadian art. Homer Watson was recognized, not only as a great Canadian artist, but as one of the best of living landscape artists in any part of the British Empire. Throughout his lifetime his work received the highest and widest recognition. Mr. Watson was a man of the highest culture. He possessed great literary as well as artistic ability. His home and studio at Doon were visited, not only by lovers of art and friends from all over Canada, but by visitors to whom his reputation was known in many parts of the world.

"It will remain one of the historic homes of our country, and should be preserved as such."

TRUE PATRIOT

"Like many artists, Homer Watson was a true patriot, a lover of his own country. Had he wished to do so, he might, years ago, have gone to England to live, and received much wider recognition of his art and skill. He preferred, however, to remain in the little village of Doon, on the banks of the Grand River, in Waterloo County, with which, from boyhood days, he had been associated, and the natural beauty of which he loved so dearly.

"Only a few months ago Canada lost another of her great painters in the passing of Carl Ahrens, whose home during most of his lifetime was also in Waterloo County. Ahrens' work, like Watson's, enjoyed an international reputation. He and Homer Watson were intimate personal and life-long friends.

"Few, if any parts of Canada, have exhibited sounder or finer agricultural and industrial development than Waterloo County. It is conceivable, however, that long after the names of many of those who have been responsible for this development have been forgotten, the names of Homer Watson and Carl Ahrens will continue to have their association, not only with Waterloo County, but with the history of Canada.

"They have given to their day and generation the highest inspiration in creative art. They have as well left on canvas a record of artistic achievements associated with the natural beauty of our country, which will be the proud heritage of future generations."

National Gallery Head Lauds Watson's Work

OTTAWA, June 1—(C. P.)—Eric Brown, director of the National Art Gallery, last night said of Homer Watson, Canadian artist who died on Saturday at Doon, near Kitchener: "In his class, he was one of the finest painters this country has produced."

"He painted very well up to the last," Mr. Brown said. "That is, his power did not seem to be diminishing."

"The Flood Gate," perhaps Watson's greatest work, is in the possession of the National Gallery. "Ravine Farm" was purchased a short time ago. The gallery has several other examples of his work and three large war paintings are the property of the Department of National Defence.

Arthur H. Carey, Toronto Artist, Dies

TORONTO, June 1—(C. P.)—Arthur Henry Carey, Canadian artist, died at General Hospital here yesterday. He was in his 36th year. Mr. Carey was born in England, coming to Canada at an early age. He was well known in Ontario art circles.

DECORATIVE WORK PROBLEMS TACKLED

School of Interior Design Displays Samples of Students' Skill

Display of various stages in the studies of 23 students makes the second annual exhibition of the Montreal School of Interior Decoration not only a good summing up of the year's work but an interesting show. There are many examples of color schemes, with textile designs carefully scaled down and applied to drapes that are hung on well-proportioned windows—all on paper; perspective problems are worked out; rooms are measured; and there are working drawings of furniture—mostly old Canadian pieces belonging to the Montreal Art Association.

In addition to the meticulously executed rooms, complete with furniture and rugs, the students show a number of "free paintings," intended to give them flexibility as well as to teach them the harmonious relationships of colors. Outstanding among these studies are the water color drawings made by Clara Scott and John Bradley of rooms in the Metropolitan and other New York museums.

Original interiors are presented in maquettes by Leslie Morton, Clifford Logan, Mary Dobell, Muriel Bostwick and Betty Book, all showing definite development in the practical application of ideas.

Miss Muriel Wilkerson, director of the school, explained the absence of the more advanced styles of interiors by the fact that the students are well grounded in the older phases of architecture and furniture before proceeding to the latest developments, and all the students are in their first and second years. Their work is surprisingly proficient when it is remembered that none of them has had previous art training.

The exhibition will be open until Friday, from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. daily.

EXPLAINS PURPOSE OF ART GALLERIES

Gazette June 4/36
Harold Beament States Chief Function Is to Lead Public Taste

The functional purpose of an art gallery is not to follow but to lead public taste, Harold Beament, winner of the Jessie Dow prize for oils at the Spring exhibition in the Montreal Art Gallery, told members of the Advertising Club of Montreal in his address "An Artist Looks at Pictures" at the weekly luncheon meeting at the Mount Royal Hotel. His advice to the community at large was "go to public art galleries more often, for a great deal can be gained by so doing."

Painting is a translation, the importance of which depends upon the consistency with which it is carried out, Mr. Beament said. In discussing the evolution of art from the middle of the past century, he pointed out that the tendency then was to paint historical scenes or portraits. Gradually the trend was to instill more "life and blood" into pictures, bringing paintings into direct relationship to the life of the times. More vibrancy of color and vigor of design resulted.

Cezanne was stated to be "the aesthetic key to contemporary art" by Mr. Beament. He believed it necessary to produce art in a form not to trick the eye into an illusion, but rather to establish the conviction that the form portrayed really lived.

Announcement was made that the next meeting of the club would take place on Thursday night, when members will accompany the Young Men's Canadian Club to a summer outing at Ormstown Fair.

Leo Cox, president, was in the chair.

CHINESE RESEARCH LIBRARY IS BOUGHT

Princeton Acquires Gest Collection Once Housed
Gazette McGill 13/36

Princeton, N.J., July 12—(C.P.)—The famous Chinese library housed at McGill University, Montreal, for the past decade has been acquired by the Institute of Advanced Study of Princeton, the Institute announced tonight.

It acquired the 130,000 volume library from its owner, Guion M. Gest of New York. The purchase price was not given. The library has been stored at Montreal recently after McGill, for financial reasons, was no longer in a position to keep it on exhibition for research work.

The library was described by the Institute as "the largest and most valuable collection of Oriental and Far Eastern literature in America" with the exception of the United States Library of Congress collection.

The library will be devoted to the "cultivation of studies connected with the Far East and relations between the United States and the Far East," the Institute explained.

The volumes will be made available to Princeton University students as well as those of the Institute. The Institute, founded in 1930, describes itself as "originally and financially" separate from the university.

Removal of the Gest Chinese Research Library from McGill has been expected for some time. Opened on February 13, 1926, the Chinese New Year's Day, the library was closed on November 12, 1935, after McGill had withdrawn financial support from it. The move was taken as an economy measure on the recommendation of the finance committee of the board of governors. At the same time, the Department of Chinese Studies, founded in 1930 under the direction of Dr. Kiang Kang-hu, was discontinued.

Announcement that the library might have a new home within three or four months was made by Mr. Gest during a visit here at the end of last April.

When the library was opened it contained 8,000 volumes, contrasted with the 130,000 volumes today, in addition to a collection of museum material. Contents of the library were arranged in the following categories: (1) classics; (2) history; (3) philosophy, science, medicine, encyclopaedias, etc., and (4) belles-lettres. A prized possession of the library is the complete palace edition of A.D. 1739 of the then 24 dynastic histories of China. It also possesses one of the two copies of the great K'ang-hsi encyclopaedia to be found in the western world.

July 13/36 HONOR IS CONFERRED ON M'GILL LIBRARIAN

Made Fellow of Royal Librarian Association

Election of Dr. G. R. Lomer, McGill University librarian, as a fellow of the Royal Librarian Association of England, was announced at the university today. This is regarded as a high honor since the association is the only one of its kind existing in England under Royal Charter. Membership as an associate or fellow is only by examination, except in the case of distinguished librarians who have contributed to the advancement of the profession of librarianship.

Dr. Lomer is a native of Montreal and a graduate of McGill University, from which he obtained a B.A. degree in 1903 and M.A. in the following year. He obtained his Ph.D. in education at Columbia University in 1910. Educated as a teacher, he began his career as an instructor in English at McGill University and later formed the education department. Appointments at the University of Wisconsin and in the school of journalism at Columbia University followed. For a time Dr. Lomer acted as an editor. In 1920 he was appointed librarian and director of the library school here.

W. G. CHENEY PAID HONOR AT FUNERAL

Gazette - 28.7.36
Former Montreal Resident,
Who Died in Pasadena,
Laid to Rest Here

Funeral services for the late William Gilman Cheney, formerly of Montreal, who died on July 17th, in his 78th year, at Pasadena, California, were held yesterday afternoon in the chapel of Joseph C. Wray and Bro. The Rev. F. H. Wilkinson, rector of the Church of St. James the Apostle, officiated at the service. Interment was in Mount Royal Cemetery.

Mr. Cheney was the only son of the late Gilman Cheney and his wife, Ann Lincoln. Mr. Cheney's father was associated with his brother, the late B. P. Cheney, of Boston, as pioneers in the express business in the New England States and Canada, founding the United States and Canada Express Company in Canada. The latter company was absorbed by the Grand Trunk Railway shortly after Mr. Gilman Cheney's death.

William Gilman Cheney was educated in private schools in Montreal, and graduated at the Hopkins Rock Point Military Academy at Burlington, Vermont. In business he had been connected with the Fellows Medical Company in Montreal and New York, and later he was employed in an executive position with the Merchants Cotton Company of which his father was a director and a large shareholder. Members of the Cheney family were largely interested in the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company of Manchester, N.H., and they were among its founders.

Mr. Cheney retired from business about thirty years ago because he did not enjoy robust health. He spent many years in world-wide travel, and at the outbreak of the war he was in Germany. He was a man of literary and artistic tastes, of a modest and retiring disposition, and was known as a contributor to all causes in the interest of his fellow men.

Guy Tombs represented the Montreal Sailors' Institute at the service, and Miss Ethel M. Pinkerton represented the Art Association of Montreal. Rev. C. H. Dickinson represented Erskine and American United Church.

Among others who attended were: B. P. Cheney, A. B. Chaffee, William H. Bryce, Edward Smith, B. J. Hodgson, T. W. Hodgson, A. A. Hodgson, Miss M. Radcliff, Mr. and Mrs. R. Martin, R. S. McCutcheon, W. A. Doig, Marcus Alexe, Max Bohrer, G. Gordon Hyde, W. C. Hodgson, Mrs. Peter Laing, Mrs. Grant Stewart, A. G. M. Miller, C. I. Root, B. H. Barron, A. W. Royan, Alec McDougall, Charles F. Shearer, C. E. Scarff, Dr. J. A. Nutter, R. S. White, M.P., C. A. Hodgson, W. M. Birks, Alexandre Clarke, Arthur McMaster, Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Barker, A. K. Starke, A. C. Budge, W. Ormiston Roy, Dr. D. F. Gurd, R. P. Jellett, E. Russell Paterson, Frank J. Hodgson, Harold Sims, Hamilton Howard, H. O. C. FitzGibbon, Dr. F. S. Patch, O. N. H. Owens, Col. G. W. Birks, J. W. Beaton, D. S. Walker, J. J. Roberts, Miss L. E. Radcliff, Miss M. McLeod, Mrs. F. J. Hodgson, Allan F. Glover.

WILLIAM G. CHENEY.

National enthusiasm was a marked trait in the character of William Gilman Cheney, formerly of Montreal, who died at Pasadena, California, and was buried in Mount Royal Cemetery on Monday. A man of great executive ability, the late Mr. Cheney's business relations had a national and international range. For a number of years he was connected with the Fellows Medical Company in Montreal and New York and later occupied an executive position with the Merchants Cotton Company of which his father was a director. Members of the Cheney family were largely interested in the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company of Manchester, N.H. They were, in fact, among its founders. The late Mr. Cheney, due to impaired health, retired from all business activities some thirty years ago. Since then he had lived most of the time abroad. During the Great War his relations to his own country and his feelings concerning it were demonstrated in a strikingly patriotic manner. At all times he was a generous contributor to causes directed to the welfare of his fellow-countrymen, and when the Income Tax Act was passed at Ottawa as a war measure, although his income was not drawn from any source subject to such taxation, Mr. Cheney considered he would be remiss in his civic duty were he to take advantage of the exemption the law provided. Accordingly, he annually contributed to the national Treasury the full amount that would have been due from him had his income been assessable under the Federal Income Tax Act. It was added proof that the late William G. Cheney was a public-spirited citizen of the Dominion of the highest type.

LIST OF BEQUESTS

Follows a list of bequests indicated in proportionate parts of the residue, i.e., 1-20th to the Y.M.C.A., 1-40th to the Art Association of Montreal "as an endowment to be known as the Gilman Cheney Bequest, the annual revenue to form a nucleus for the purchase of pictures, paintings, etc., from time to time," and so on. NO BENEFITS

The will then continues: "I direct further that my wife shall not benefit by any division of any residues of my estate under any circumstances."

"As I have bequeathed the largest part of my estate to charitable, benevolent and religious institutions, should not these bequests, if not entirely free of any succession legacy, death or State duties as I understand they are now, at least be subject to a nominal or reduced rate?"

"For the same reason, while my estate is being held by trustees or executors, should any income tax be paid on it?"

Follows the customary formal instructions and authorization to the executors and trustees as to the carrying out of the bequests indicated.

MCGILL SURPRISED

McGill University's benefaction came as a complete surprise, university officials stating that the first intimation of the generous bequest was obtained upon receiving a copy of the will of the late William G. Cheney.

Dr. Owen V. Stredder, bursar and secretary, who received the copy, was studying the document today. "Naturally," he said, "the university is extremely gratified with the generous bequest of Mr. Cheney. Because the university was successful in balancing its budget, with the aid of members of the board of governors, for the last fiscal year, it does not mean that there can be any let-up in measures to secure economy. Such bequests, and any bequests which add to the general funds of the university, are of particular value when authorities here are attempting to maintain unimpaired the principal functions of the institution."

pany. By 1879 the company was operating an express service to all of the important eastern cities. On August 15, 1887, Gilman Cheney was made general manager.

On October 13, 1889, Benjamin Cheney resigned as president and 10 days later his brother, Gilman, took over the post.

WILLIAM Cheney was the only son of Gilman Cheney and Ann Lincoln.

He was born in this city, and was educated in private schools here and in the United States, graduating from Hopkins Rock Point Military Academy, Burlington Vt. Some time later he joined the Fellows Medical Company in Montreal and in New York.

During his lifetime, William Cheney was an executive of the Merchants Cotton Company of which firm the elder Cheney had been a director and a large shareholder.

WILLIAM Cheney retired from business about 30 years ago to devote his time to travel. He spent some time in Germany and was strongly interested in art, and literature. He was a generous and unobtrusive philanthropist, giving money to charities in Canada and elsewhere.

As a single instance of public mindedness, he turned down the legality which made him immune from income tax imposts during the War to pay the Dominion Treasury what it might have taxed him had he not been exempt.

Sums estimated at $2,000,000 were bequeathed to local institutions by the will of the late William Gilman Cheney, formerly of Montreal, who died at Pasadena, California, on July 17 and was buried here on Monday last. He was in his 78th year. The largest beneficiaries are the Montreal General Hospital, McGill University and the Royal Victoria Hospital.

Montreal General, of which Mr. Cheney was a life governor, receives an amount estimated at $600,000; McGill University will benefit, it is expected, to the amount of $400,000; and the Royal Victoria Hospital will receive two legacies totalling $200,000. Besides other hospitals, the local beneficiaries include the Salvation Army and the Montreal Sailors' Institute, Christ Church Cathedral and Erskine and American United Church, the Y.M.C.A. and the Y.W.C.A. and the Art Association of Montreal.

The majority of the bequests are named in memory of Mr. Cheney's father, others being named in memory of his mother. Under Quebec law, Mr. Cheney's will does not need to be probated. The joint executors of the estate are the Royal Trust Company and Thomas W. Hodgson.

Mr. Cheney bequeathed the residue of his estate to certain institutions in varying percentages. The percentages have been worked out and will, it is believed, amount to the following totals:

- $600,000—to the Montreal General Hospital as an endowment in the name of the late Mr. Cheney's father, Gilman Cheney;
- $400,000—to McGill University for the establishment of a chair or chairs, in the name of the late Mr. Cheney's father, Gilman Cheney, the annual revenue to be applied in the interests of the Medical Faculty;
- $100,000—to the Royal Victoria Hospital as an endowment in memory of the late Mr. Cheney's mother, Mrs. Mary A. L. Cheney, the annual revenue to be applied as the management of the hospital considers best for the maintenance of beds or otherwise in its Maternity Department;
- $100,000—to the Royal Victoria Hospital's Endowment Fund;
- $100,000—to the Verdun Protestant Hospital, formerly known as the Protestant Hospital for the Insane, as an endowment to be known as the "Gilman Cheney Endowment";
- $100,000—to the Montreal Protestant House of Industry and Refuge—to be known as the "Gilman Cheney Fund";
- $100,000—to the Salvation Army in the City of Montreal—to be known as the "Gilman Cheney Endowment";
- $100,000—to the Montreal Sailors' Institute—to be known as the "Gilman Cheney Fund";
- $100,000—to the Young Men's Christian Association of Montreal—to be known as the "D. A. Budge Memorial Fund";
- $100,000—to the Montreal Young Women's Christian Association, to be known as the "Mary A. L. Cheney Endowment";
- $50,000—to the Children's Memorial Hospital—to be known as the "Gilman Cheney Fund";
- $50,000—to Christ Church Cathedral;
- $50,000—to Erskine and American United Church;
- $50,000—to the Art Association of Montreal—to be known as the "Gilman Cheney Bequest."

Mr. Cheney was the only son of the late Gilman Cheney and Ann Lincoln. His father was associated with his brother, the late B. P. Cheney, of Boston, as partners in the express business in the New England States and Canada, later founding the United States and Canada Express Co. in Canada. This company was absorbed by the Grand Trunk Railway shortly after the death of Gilman Cheney.

Educated in private schools in Montreal, and graduating from Hopkins Rock Point Military Academy, Burlington, Vt., Mr. Cheney in his business life had been connected with the Fellows Medical Co. in New York and Montreal. He was also employed as an executive by the Merchants Cotton Co., of which firm his father had been a director and a large shareholder. Members of the family also were largely interested in the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., of Manchester, N.H., which they helped to found.

Mr. Cheney retired from active business life about 30 years ago and had since spent many years in world-wide travel. At the outbreak of the war he was in Germany. A man of literary and artistic tastes, he was of a modest and retiring disposition. He was a generous contributor to all causes bearing on the welfare of his fellow men.

The personal responsibility he attached to his wealth and influence was illustrated when, during the war, he ignored the legality which made him immune from income tax contributions, to contribute an amount to the Canadian Treasury equal to that which he would have paid had it been legally enforceable.

THE W. G. CHENEY BEQUESTS.

The generosity, public-spirit and noble disposition which characterized William Gilman Cheney in his lifetime are reflected in the public bequests which he made in his will. They are announced today. Comprehensive in their provisions, these bequests will benefit all sorts and conditions of people, young and old, and particularly those of whom he was proud to be a fellow-citizen. Very liberal are the amounts willed to the Montreal General Hospital and the Royal Victoria Hospital, as endowments in perpetuation of the memory of Mr. Cheney's parents. An additional $100,000 is left to the Royal Victoria Hospital's endowment fund. The Cheney family is also to be commemorated through handsome endowments to the Verdun Protestant Hospital, the Children's Memorial Hospital, the Montreal Sailor's Institute, the Montreal Young Women's Christian Association, the Montreal Protestant House of Industry and Refuge, the Salvation Army in the city of Montreal, and the Art Association of Montreal; whilst $100,000 is willed to the Young Men's Christian Association of Montreal, to be known as the "D. A. Budge Memorial Fund." The McGill University bequest is noteworthy as a reminder of the late Mr. Cheney's past concern for the welfare of this seat of higher learning. The University is to receive $400,000 for the establishment of a chair, or chairs, in the name of the testator's father, Gilman Cheney, the annual revenue to be applied in the interests of the medical faculty. The bequests as a whole bear testimony to the genuine liberality and benevolence of one who was ever obedient to the impulse of humanity.

A PRINCELY BENEFACTOR

MRS. J. J. HAY BROWNE ATTAINS CENTENNIAL

Star Aug. 6/36
Celebrates 100th Anniversary Tomorrow

Celebrating her one-hundredth birthday tomorrow at the cottage she is occupying at Como for the summer, Mrs. J. J. Hay Browne will receive the congratulations of many friends. Mrs. Hay Browne was born at Leith, Scotland, on August 7, 1836, one of nine daughters of Thomas Hay and Agnes Dunlop Hunter. She came to Canada to join a sister, Mrs. George Winks, arriving at Quebec August 3, 1867. Meeting her brother-in-law in Quebec was Mr. John James Browne, a Montreal architect, who at one once fell in love with the newly-arrived Scottish lassie. They were married at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George Winks on Dorchester street on December 19 of the same year.

Mrs. Browne recalls living for a time at St. Lawrence Hall, then the foremost residential hotel in the city. She still has amusing recollections of theatre parties to attend plays at the Theatre Royal. To get away from town in the summer one went out to what is now Cote St. Antoine Road. Horse drawn cars went no farther than Guy street, between which and St. Matthew street there were only two houses. When Mr. Browne built the family residence on St. Luke street, the cows used to pasture in the fields west of St. Matthew street.

While Mrs. Browne likes to speak of the past, she is also alertly interested in what is going on at the present time. On the Sunday morning when the Vimy Memorial was unveiled, Mrs. Browne, within a few days of her hundredth birthday, rose early to listen in during the radio announcements of the proceedings, endeavoring not to miss anything of the King's speech. She motored in from Como last fall to cast her vote in the general elections.

Until about two years ago, when she had an illness, Mrs. Browne was a member of the Women's Canadian Club, and she attended many of the lectures each season. She is a member of the Art Association of Montreal, and a former member of the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire. She has taken a constant interest in the welfare of the ex-service men, and although in the last two years she has given up going through the wards of the military hospital at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, where her daughter administers the soldiers' fund of the Women's Art Society, she still visits the hospital occasionally. She is a member of St. George's Church, and was present at a service the Sunday before Christmas last. Among things stored in her retentive memory are many church hymns, learned long ago or more recently and poems, notably Tennyson's "Locksley Hall." Knitting dainty articles of wool is her favorite pursuit now-a-days.

Mr. Browne died in 1893. The Misses A. D. and Daisy Hay Browne live with their mother. Another daughter, Mrs. Charles E. Winks, has come from Winnipeg for the birthday celebration, as has also Mrs. Browne's granddaughter, Mrs. James Ross Jenkins.

VIMY MEMORIAL DESIGNER RETURNS

Star Aug. 18/36
W. S. Allward Spent 14
Years Working On Monument

A tired, slightly drooped man with near white hair, modest in mien, excited at being back in Canada, and anxious to catch the Toronto train, arrived on the Canadian Pacific liner Montclare Saturday night—he was W. S. Allward, designer of Canada's memorial at Vimy. He is going back to Toronto after 14 years' absence, to open up a studio and start up business over again.

"I went over there in 1922," he said, "and I never came back."

"Why didn't you come home?"

"I wanted to finish the job. I wanted to stay there and work. During that time, I had all kinds of people working for me. There were English and French, Canadians, Scottish, Irish, and Belgians."

"Any Germans?"

"No, no Germans."

"Did it give you a great thrill when you saw the huge throngs at Vimy, and the King himself?"

"Now, my boy," he said as he put his hand on the reporter's shoulder, "I am sure you know I am not the man to answer that. You ask some of the men how they felt."

MODELS USED

"How did you first start working on this memorial?"

"With models. You know we all do that. Then when I got something I wanted, I developed it from that."

"Did you drive home the last stone yourself—did you put on the finishing touch?"

This question brought a surprising answer.

"Do you know," he said, "I just finished the memorial the day before the dedication?"

"No," he said, "I did not put on the finishing touches."

Then he looked as if it was a thought which had just occurred to him, and he wished he had thought of the idea himself at the time.

"What are you going to do now?"

"I am going to Toronto to open a studio—if I can find one."

"Are they hard to get?"

"Yes—very. Then I shall start to work."

"What kind of work?"

"I have several things in mind that I cannot mention now."

ALLWARD MODEST ABOUT MEMORIAL

Says Sculptor Is Small Compared With What Pilgrimage Stands For

Toronto, August 17.—(P)—"Works of art live only as people live with them," Walter S. Allward, creator of Canada's war memorial on Vimy Ridge, unveiled by King Edward, said today as he visited his son in suburban York Mills.

"In the next war," he said, "if there be one on a large scale, there will be no time for local treatment. In such a war, the objective would be to destroy whole cities of humanity. One work of art would be neither here nor there."

Mr. Allward asked that his name be not "played up" in connection with the memorial towering on the Ridge where Canada's armies scored a great victory April 9, 1917.

"The individual, the sculptor," he said, "is so small in comparison with what it stands for, very small in comparison with the meaning of the Vimy Pilgrimage."

"Now that the memorial is erected, the interest has ended so far as I am concerned. It lives only as people look at it. As soon as a sculptor has created such a work, he himself has finished, and he thinks of new things he would do if he were doing it again."

For Mr. Allward his return home was the end of a long journey. Twelve years ago he went to France and has been engaged since in the construction of the memorial. His work ended with the unveiling July 26.

"Canada is home for me, but I have scarcely my bearings yet, I have been away so long. Canada is fortunate. You do not bring up little families here, having to teach the children how to put on gas masks in case of war. And Canada is fortunate in not having hard, artistic traditions to confine expression."

In connection with modern art and criticism which has been voiced of some sections of it, Mr. Allward said:

"My criticism of some work which offends would not be on moral grounds, but because too much of it is rubbish. Many people today want what is 'outré' merely for the excitement of it."

"I have heard people express fears that lack of tradition would hinder Canada's artistic development, that we have had no Michelangelos. But that did not prevent wanting to have a Vimy Memorial, did it?"

Mr. Allward admitted that he had "one or two things in mind" when asked about future commissions, but they were too indefinite to comment upon.

"My first interest will be to find myself a place to live, and I shall want to feel out the land before I decide," he said. "Then, it will take some time to erect a house and studio. And I want to do some work for myself, entirely for my own satisfaction."

He might settle near Toronto, but he was not sure.

A grocer's anxiety over an old customer's failure to visit his store for some days led police to a dilapidated 14-room house on St. Antoine street yesterday afternoon to find the body of E. W. Beuthener, 87-year-old eccentric who had lived alone there for four years with only a cat for company. He had been dead for ten days, police said.

Police broke through a window at the back of the house at 1426 St. Antoine street and found the body near the street door, fully clothed. Rats had mutilated the face, arms and legs.

Something of a recluse, an eccentric, a bit of a mystery to the people of the neighborhood who saw him leave the house only two or three times a week to buy food, Beuthener had become almost a legendary figure. For fifty years he lived in the old house, but few in the neighborhood knew his name and he spoke only to the tradespeople from whom he purchased the few things he seemed to need. Four years ago his wife died and he lived on in the run-down house with his pet.

Mrs. W. Nemiroff, who keeps a small provision store nearby, yesterday told a Gazette reporter that because of his advanced age Mr. Beuthener had been unable to keep either himself or his house in good appearance.

"When I visited his house with my husband two or three years ago, I thought I was surely stepping into a haunted house," she said. "Everywhere the cobwebs brushed our shoulders and the dust lay two or three inches deep on the furniture, much of which was wrapped in almost century-old newspapers—he never threw much away in his latter years. He valued everything—his life most of all, for on his 87th birthday he told us he was certain he would live to be a hundred or more."

In a neighborhood where the struggle for existence is bitter and where the only artistic furnishing of most of the poor homes in the locality is a calendar on the wall, Mr. Beuthener's private art collection, hanging in almost every room of the four-storey house, was a never-ending source of wonder and rumor to all who saw it.

"He retired from business some time back in the 1890's," said Mrs. Nemiroff, "and since that time he had been painting, drawing and sketching. He has some very large canvases in his house, and he once told me that he was offered $2,500 for one of them by an art gallery; but his wife refused at that time to sell, saying that it would be a terrible thing to exchange sheer beauty for cold gold."

LIVED CAREFULLY

"He was an artist, as far as I can find out," declared O. Brault, whose drug store is situated on the corner next to Mr. Beuthener's house. "I don't know whether he made any money from his painting, however—he was probably too old—for during the past few years he has lived very carefully, burning candles instead of using electricity. It must have been very difficult with candle light in the dark shadows of his house, for there are some large rooms within those four storeys."

C. E. Bruchesi, who has attended several legal matters for the late Mr. Beuthener, told The Gazette that he was a native of Germany, and had travelled to Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1868, where he was engaged in the steel business for a time. In 1876 he came to reside in Montreal, where he was employed for many years as an accountant with a local firm manufacturing printing machinery. Later he had entered the import and export trade, working for his brother who was in the commission business. His brother, who died about three years ago, had served for a number of years in the succession duties office of the Province of Quebec.

A. BIELER APPOINTED

Montreal Painter to Teach
Fine Arts at Queens

Announcement was made yesterday of the appointment of Andre Bieler, Montreal painter, to the chair of Fine Arts in Queen's University, Kingston, Ont. He will present a course of lectures on the history of art in conjunction with his tuition in painting, and will assume his duties with the opening of the new term.

The news was received with a great deal of satisfaction in Montreal art circles, where Mr. Bieler is held in high esteem. He began his studies in Switzerland with his uncle, Ernest Bieler, and continued in Paris. The Island of Orleans, where he lived for some time, and the Laurentian villages have provided him with most of his subjects. Whether it be in oils, water color or gouache, Mr. Bieler's work is distinguished by its individual style, its felicity of design and its freshness of outlook. Unlike many Canadian painters, Andre Bieler has always been interested in the warm, human aspect of the Canadian scene and his work, familiar in many exhibitions, has always won a quick response of sympathy.

DRAWINGS, DESIGNS WILL BE EXHIBITED

Star Sept. 19/36
Display On View At Redpath Museum

More than 300 facsimiles, comprising drawings by the early masters and historical designs for stage scenery and costume, are going on view Monday in the exhibition gallery of the Redpath Museum, McGill University. The exhibit will be open Monday to Friday from 9 a.m. to 10 p.m., and Saturdays 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., for a period of several weeks.

The drawings by the old masters are faithful reproductions of originals in the Kunsthalle in Hamburg and Bremen, the Kupferstich-Kabinett of the Museum at Weimar, and the Landesmuseum in Braunschweig. They include 125 sketches in pencil, crayon, wash, ink, sanguine, and water color by a great variety of artists of different ages and countries, including Hans Baldung, Brueghel, Canaletto, Cranach, Durer, Greuze, Guercino, Filippo Lippi, Piranesi, Raphael, Rembrandt, Tintoretto, Van Dyck, Van Ostade, Wouwerman, and many less known artists. These are supplemented by 26 examples of magnificent woodcuts of scenes from the Life of Christ by early artists, from the Geisberg reproductions of originals in Munich. Both these collections were presented to the Redpath Library by Lady Roddick.

The theatrical designs of costume and scenery, of which 183 are exhibited, are reproduced in "Monumenta Scenica" (12 volumes) from the XVII and XVIII century originals in the National Library in Berlin, where there are probably more beautiful examples than anywhere else in the world. They include sketches by Burnacini, Palladio, Piranesi, Bibiena, Callot, Lully, Rameau, and many others, as well as designs for the Commedia dell'Arte and the Pageant of the State Funeral of Duke Charles III in 1618.

These volumes, described as "the most magnificent work on the theatre ever printed," were presented to the Redpath Library by Howard Murray, O.B.E.

SCULPTURE CLASS OPENS

Term to Include Portrait and Figure Work

Montreal's only life class in modelling will open its sixth annual session this morning at the Sir George Williams College under the direction of Orson Wheeler. An ambitious programme, including portrait studies and full-length figures, is planned for the coming term.

The term which opens today will extend to June 1.

In the five years during which Mr. Wheeler has conducted classes in sculpture at the college a large percentage of his students have exhibited with the Montreal Art Association and with the Royal Canadian Academy of Fine Arts. Mr. Wheeler received his training in New York at the Beaux Arts Institute of Design and at the National Academy of Design.

Mr. H. B. Walker is entertaining at a dance at the Hunt Club on Wednesday evening, November 18, in honor of his debutante granddaughter, Miss Diana Walker.

Gazette Sept. 26
James Beckwith's Canvasses
Show a Decided Advance

In the print room of the Art Association gallery just now, Montreal is being given an excellent opportunity to see what it will miss when James Beckwith takes his departure, as he soon will, for other scenes. Beckwith is one of the most interesting of the younger painters and his little show of 22 water colors is a bright opening for the picture season.

With the exception of "The Square," which was hung in the Royal Canadian Academy in 1934, in the Art Association's Spring Exhibition this year, and which travelled with a National Gallery collection, the work is all new. It marks a decided advance. Without losing any of the spontaneity which makes his landscape impressions so refreshing, he has tightened up, and he is using more lively color. Clean, stimulating color is, indeed, an outstanding characteristic of the exhibition.

Especially successful are the patches and stripes of "Shanty Row"; the gay little "Merry-go-Round"—all color and motion; the old shack with the blue door and the green tobacco patch—"Dilapidation"; and "Nubble Light-Maine," a smart, clear-cut composition. The decoration, "Zoe," the mask-like face of a woman, suggests other fields in which Beckwith should be successful. Imagination—as in "California," an atmosphere realized in blurry spots, and in "Hilltop Cabins—Vermont"—and wit, though it may hold back a little shyly—are inherent in his work and will carry him a long way.

Star Sept. 29/36 J. Beckwith's Water Colors

James Beckwith produces some of the most interesting of the many good water colours that are being made in Canada now. A small collection of his work, which is being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal contains drawings which show his broad and simple method at its best, and, if it does not always quite come off, it is often very good indeed. There is strength and a beautiful simplicity in all these drawings, and Mr. Beckwith gets a surprising amount of suggestion with a few strokes of color and a most judicious use of white paper. A fine example of sure and simple treatment is to be seen in a view of the Harbour Bridge, and another very good composition is of a group of fishermen on a rock against a big expanse of sky. There are several very good sky effects in this exhibition, particularly in the drawings of a lighthouse and of a beach scene in Maine, and of a suburban station and of a truck garden, though the last two are not among the best of the drawings on the whole. The big drawing of Phillips Square, which was shown in the Academy exhibition, is a fine study of snow and buildings and one of Mr. Beckwith's best pieces of work. There is an admirable quality of light in all these drawings and the colour, if it is sometimes a little crude, is generally strong and decorative. As a contrast to most of the drawings there is a very good one in quiet, almost grey tones, of a group of farm buildings, called "Solitude," which is one of the most successful. As another contrast there is a sort of portrait, called a decoration, of a columnar form derived from a woman's neck and head, which is a clever piece of work and rather amusing.

BECKWITH IS HONORED Gazette Sept. 30/36 Artist Now Member of California Water Color Society

James Beckwith, whose water color show in the print room of the Montreal Art Association, Sherbrooke street, is attracting a great deal of attention, has been elected a member of the California Water Color Society, according to word received in the city yesterday. His painting, "New Hampshire Quarries," has been accepted for the annual exhibition at Los Angeles, and with the acceptance comes automatically membership in the society. Mr. Beckwith has exhibited in New York, in the National Gallery, Ottawa, in the Royal Canadian Academy and in the Montreal Art Association Spring Show.

An exhibition which was held last season at Scott's galleries contained some of the most recent French painting that had been shown in Montreal, but it stopped about the year 1900. This year an exhibition, which opened last Saturday at the same galleries brings the story further, to work which has been done since the beginning of the century; and it makes a very interesting show of work which is well known and admired in more progressive places.

This collection of pictures is described as by the School of Paris, but it does not show any of the agreement in ideas or methods which the name school might imply. Some of the pictures in it are quite conservative, — for example the three by Derain, of which the big still life, "La table garnie," might have been the work of a Dutch painter, and the portrait of Prince Bassiano could be nineteenth century work. Utrillo is another of the more conservative painters and one of his three, of a street with an avenue of trees is a particularly good example. Odilon Redon's little sketch of a bunch of flowers is also quite normal. One moves a little forward with Matisse, by whom there are two pictures. In the bigger of these, "Les deux raies," the fish in the foreground and the shore and cliffs behind hardly hold together; in the smaller one there is an interesting sketch of a woman's torso.

Two pictures by Picasso are among the most striking things in this exhibition; his big group of figures, "La Vie," has dignified drawing with a sad color; his "Abstraction in black and white," — an arrangement of curves in to a sort of gargyle, — is not a picture but a rather intriguing ornament. De La Fresnaye's "Artillerie," which is a part abstract, part cubist representation of movement, gives an interesting comparison with Rousseau's primitive and literal, and quite lifeless artillerymen. Braque's "Les grosses pommes" is pure abstraction, — an arrangement of lines and forms without any obvious meaning.

Suggestion, without statement of facts, is to be found in the sketches of Dufy, who paints in shorthand, and there is more in the little sketches of guard-mounting at St. James' Palace than in the bigger view of the bay of Nice. There is something of the same kind in Lurcat's "L'île Verte," which is a collection of disconnected notes put together in the middle of a canvas. Lurcat's "Fleurs au bord de la mer" is a more formal and rather effective decoration. Several other ideas of picture making are to be seen in the exhibition. Modigliani's portrait of Morgan Russell, which was here last season, has now a companion, "La chocolatière," with an equally long and flexible neck; Dufresne's "Enlèvement d'Europe" is an imaginative but untidy picture, with the color and texture of tapestry; Leger's enormous rose is a sort of pattern in red and black; Rouault's "Trois Juges" is a rather heavy caricature.

Pictures by some rather older French painters are also to be seen at Scott's. Among them are two very good examples of Courbet, — a group of choirboys and a sea shore picture, — two interesting French landscapes by Gauguin, — quite French, without any suggestion of Tahiti, — a very bright little girl's head and some other pictures by Renoir, a broad and sketchy landscape by Cezanne, a picture, full of sunlight, by Sisley, and an early and very Dutch landscape by Monet.

Landscapes by Louis Muhlstock

In the exhibition of his pictures, which fills two galleries at Eaton's Louis Muhlstock makes a new move. In past exhibitions he has shown some good drawings of heads, and there are some oil pictures of heads in this exhibition, one of which, of an old man, is very strongly painted, but most of these pictures are landscapes. The most pleasant of them are a few painted in France; a shore scene at Deauville is good but some sketches of the outskirts of Paris are still better. The new pictures are of places in and around Montreal, with some, which are less successful, of the Laurentians. There are some good Montreal scenes and particularly good are some market scenes, with figures, in Montreal and France, in which the grouping and lighting are quite effective. In his landscapes, many of them on Mount Royal, Mr. Muhlstock seems to like a strange sombreness of colour and shadow; the darkness in some of them suggests tropical forests far more than anything in Canada. One of the best of them is the picture of trees and river in spring at Cartierville. There are also a number of sketches, some of them very good, of Montreal harbour.

MUHLSTOCK'S SHOW DENOTES PROGRESS

Gazette Oct. 9/36
Montreal Artist's Paintings
on Display at T. Eaton
Co. Galleries

To those who know Louis Muhlstock chiefly for his work in black and white, for the familiar heads so sympathetically perceived, so delicately portrayed, the exhibition now on view in the Fine Art Galleries of The T. Eaton Company will come as a revelation. Of course this young Montrealese has always been a painter, but his greatest success has been in the other medium and has tended to obscure the fact that he really has a passion for color. Friends who have watched his development have known this passion, but some have felt that he was all too ready to sacrifice form to it and have preferred his drawings.

A new Louis Muhlstock has been developing in the past year, however. The majority of the 50 canvases in the present show were painted in that period, and while there are still evidences of struggle, there are more evidences of achievement. As he strives for form, some of his work appears labored and heavy, but his palette, while losing none of the richness and warmth which are its chief characteristics, has become more lucid, and he is getting a firmer grip on composition.

There is no gainsaying Muhlstock's vitality. It is a warming experience to look at these paintings, whether the subject be a backyard with shadows moving across sunlit walls and fences, a street of many-colored houses, a path on Mount Royal, or a group of sturdy trees marching up a hill. Three portraits—Joe Lavalée and two children—recall the drawings and the artist's sincere appreciation of character; he has discovered a good use for sumptuous color in a still life of fruits and vegetables; and he is beginning to find his way about the Harbor.

The exhibition will be open until October 17.

ECENTRIC ARTIST HERE FOR EXHIBIT

Star Oct. 15/36
Paul Nietzsche, White Russian, Gives Views On Canadian Art

A vivid personality in the world of art is in Montreal today in the person of Paul Nietzsche—no relative to the famed Friedrich — a White Russian who is to hold an exhibition of his paintings in the Continental Art Galleries beginning Saturday.

A personal acquaintance of the noted Rodin, a graduate of the Academy of Odessa and the Royal Academy of Munich, Mr. Nietzsche fled Russia in 1918 and has since rambled all over the world. He is intensely proud of his "rambling" costume—a salt and pepper golf suit, a pork pie hat, brogues and a tie which rivals some of his own most impressionistic canvases.

"Very comfortable indeed," he chuckled in perfect English, and his eyes twinkled beneath bushy eyebrows and horn-rimmed glasses.

TO LIVE IN ENGLAND

Mr. Nietzsche is going to live in England when he is through with his present visit to Canada and the United States. He has only a few more formalities to comply with before being admitted to British citizenship.

The painter "blew up" when asked if the Soviet had developed an individual art. "Ach," he hissed, "why do you ask me that? Art is universal — there is nothing such thing as North Pole art or South Pole art, Soviet art or Eskimo art. Art is not a national affair, and through art all nations should be brought closer together. Artists should be received with open arms wherever they go — not that I'm looking for anything for nothing."

Canada was yet too isolated in the matter of art to have developed as far as other nations, Nietzsche thought. He believed budding artists here should travel more, get out of Canada, broaden their vision and realize that there were more things to paint than snow scenes. "But some are very, very good," he admitted.

ODD DISHES

Nietzsche was born at Kiev 50 years ago, the son of a wealthy printing plant owner. He is a connoisseur, a dilettante and a gourmet. In regard to the last-named proclivity he believed that the mixture of French and English dishes in the province of Quebec was "odd, to say the least."

"So you don't think pea soup and roast beef are a good combination, Mr. Nietzsche?"

"No, neither is haggis and bouillabaise."

The very thought of this mélange, plus the smoke from a large cigar Mr. Nietzsche was smoking sent the reporter scurrying for fresh air. That suited the painter. He had nothing more to say.

Fine French Paintings At Scott's Galleries Gazette Oct. 4/36

By ROBERT AYRE.

To open the door of a Montreal art gallery and be confronted by Pablo Picasso is an excitement that doesn't happen every day. In fact, in the knowledge of this reviewer, it has never happened before. For the sake of accuracy, I should not forget that there was a Picasso painting in Montreal two years ago, but it was scarcely representative. And while I mean that you are literally and overwhelmingly confronted by the great Spaniard when you enter Scott's on Drummond street, I mean it figuratively, too. Let Picasso for the moment be the symbol of the modern painter.

Never has Montreal had such an opportunity to see modern French painting as came to it Saturday when the exhibition "The School of Paris" opened at Scott's by arrangement with Alex Reid and Lefevre of London. Some of these men we have seen before, in other shows at this enterprising gallery—Derain, Matisse, Utrillo, even Dufy and Modigliani—but never Braque, never Dufresne, nor de la Fresnaye, nor Leger, nor Lurcat, nor Rouault. Things are moving.

While it is a small exhibition—33 works—and does not attempt to include everybody, it indicates all the trends and is close to being a complete history of French painting of the 20th Century. It stops just short of surrealism, but it goes far enough to point the way and perhaps next year will see another step in advance.

Picasso's dominating "La Vie" is worth a journey of many miles. It is one of the most important canvases of his "blue period," a marvellous example of his genius in building with a single color, and in balancing a classic purity of form with a touching expression of human emotion. But if it were the only Picasso on the wall, the show would lack the comprehensiveness which is its great value. The blue period is only one phase of Picasso's multifarious activity, and we need that example of his more recent work which he calls "Abstraction en blanc et noir, fond brun." Its strange shape, its suggestion of a human face just recognizable enough to be baffling, its brown on brown, in the manner of the suprematists, will be puzzling to many who can admire "La Vie," and no doubt irritating to a few. Yet, after all, it is a modest little thing along the way, just a hint of Picasso's development.

NEAR-CUBISM SHOWN

We have to be led gently into new experiences. The best possible introduction to cubism, for instance, is a picture like Roger de la Fresnaye's "L'Artillerie." With its gun carriage, its soldiers on horses and its marching drummers, it is close enough to the semblance of things to be acceptable even to those who would ordinarily shriek at the very word cubist. Without realizing it, they have become used to the technique, and many of them would be surprised to hear that "L'Artillerie" was cubism.

Fresnaye is also represented by a still-life in semi-abstract, "Vase des Fleurs," built up of solid forms and colors. To me, it is more satisfying than Braque's pale "Les Grosses Pommes"; but I have seen Braques I like better.

I have seen better Legers, too, although there are places where "La Rose" would make an excellent decoration. The best comment on it is John Lyman's apt quotation: "A rose is a rose is a rose."

Jean Lurcat's "Fleurs au Bord de la Mer," painted just this year, and his "L'Île Verte," with their dislocations and strange juxtapositions, and the sense of dream and the individual mind arbitrarily creating, bring us to the verge of surrealism. His color is fresh and unusual and he has an airiness that many of the surrealists lack.

The new romanticism is seen in the large tapestry-like "L'Enlèvement d'Europe," by Charles Dufresne. Here we have an idea from another era—a sort of pastoral allegory, with big sweeping trees, cows, a family group, a man asleep on the grass, cupids in the air, a nymph in the water and Europa being carried away by the bull. But there is a difference. The color is smoky and sombre, one cow is red and the other sulphur, a steamboat cuts across, a belching anachronism. None of these things would matter if the picture had inherited with its idea some luminosity and some harmony of design.

ROUAULT REPRESENTED.

Rouault is well represented by "Les Trois Juges," painted in great slabs of color; brutal, but rich and tremendously effective. In contrast are the two Modigliani portraits—the Morgan Russell, which was here in 1934, and "La Chocolatière." Modigliani was also influenced by the savages, but he refined his experience to the utmost delicacy.

Of the more familiar painters, we have Derain—the classic "Table Garnie," the beautifully composed and warmly colored landscape, "Le Mur Rose," and two sensitive portraits; Henri Rousseau—"Les Artilleurs," which shows the douanier in a vastly different world from Fresnaye; Matisse—the delicate "Femme Nue Agenouillée" and a seashore, attractive in color and the arrangement of its large pattern; Dufy appears in his happiest style in "La Baie de Nice" and two delightful pieces from the London streets—St. James's Palace in the rain, and the Changing of the Guard; there are several charming Utrillos, a Redon flower piece in pastel that has no sinister implications, and some modest but representative works of Bonnard, Segonzac and Vuillard.

In the other rooms, Scott's are showing a few outstanding Renoirs, a Cézanne, a Sisley, some Gauguins and several others. The exhibition will be open for about a month.

"L'Artillerie", toile de R. de la Fresnaye, (1884-1925), a été peinte en 1911. Qu'est-ce été si l'artiste avait repris le sujet avant de mourir? Construite avec un sens rare du pittoresque et une curieuse architecture des valeurs qui sent encore le cubisme, ce tableau prend une signification fort intéressante dans les rutillances et les heurts du coloris. C'est l'une des oeuvres de l'Ecole moderne de Paris, que les galeries Scott, 1490, rue Drummond, exposent à partir d'aujourd'hui, sous les auspices de la firme Alex. Reid & Lefevre, de Londres, avec des toiles de Picasso, Rousseau, Utrillo, Derain, Matisse, Dufresne, Dufy. "L'Artillerie" fait partie de la collection Tetzen-Lund, de Copenhague.

EN BAS, deux aquarelles de James Beckwith, — de celles qu'il expose actuellement à l'Art Association. A défaut de pouvoir photographier le "remuement" des taches de couleurs que l'on trouve dans d'autres sujets plus caractéristiques de son genre, nous avons dû nous contenter de reproduire ici des scènes plus "fixes", mais dont le blanc-et-noir ne rend presque plus déjà le rythme et l'impressionnisme obtenus par la rapide transposition du coloris. (Pour Beckwith, clichés la "Presse").

On le voit ici au cours de ses remarques, esquissant un large geste qui embrasse tous les arts paysans de chez nous dans les promesses du gouvernement Duplessis. and Example It Sets to Country People

"We are all here to stay, and we might just as well get along amicably," said Hon. F. J. Leduc, Quebec Minister of Highways, as he officially opened the Canadian Handicrafts Guild exhibition in the gallery of the Art Association, Saturday afternoon. He was praising the Guild for its bi-lingual character and for the example of co-operation it gave.

Representing Hon. Joseph Bilodeau, Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Leduc expressed the Provincial Government's interest in the trade aspect of the Guild, in the help it gave in stimulating interest in the province. He went on to speak of its social value as well. "We are paying the price," he said, "for the past exodus from the country to the city, and now we must turn the tide back again to the country. One of the finest ways is to make the countryside more pleasant, not so lonely. Your example will bear fruit in a higher standard of living for our rural people." He congratulated the Guild, assuring its members that the Government was interested in its work and hoped that it would long continue.

Mr. Bilodeau, he gave assurance, was anxious to protect the handicraft workers against exploitation and give full encouragement to these "pioneers of an art that represents the civilization of Quebec."

The minister was thanked by Georges Bouchard, M.P., who made some reference to the objects of the Guild.

These were set forth by A. T. Galt Durnford, president of the Quebec provincial branch—an outlet and a market for the country worker; a drawing closer together of city and country; stimulation, through exhibitions, of a high standard of workmanship, and education of the workers.

Mr. Durnford expressed his appreciation of the Government's interest and paid a tribute to the chairman of the exhibition committee, Mrs. Oliver Smith.

Among those attending the opening were Louis Coderre, deputy minister of Trade and Commerce; Esdras Mainville, technical adviser to the department; Dr. C. F. Martin, honorary president of the Guild; Professor John Hughes and Col. Wilfrid Bovey, members of the general committee; Professor Romeo Valois, University of Montreal; and H. B. Walker, president of the Art Association of Montreal.

While the speakers laid emphasis on Quebec handicrafts and the bulk of the exhibits are from this province, there are examples of work from all parts of the Dominion.

VARIETY IN EXHIBITS

As usual, hooked rugs are very much in evidence. The hooked rug, in the opinion of some of the visitors, Saturday afternoon, is really getting past itself. There are a few simple designs and some good conventionalized patterns, but in many of the exhibits the rug is no longer a rug but a picture, the most elaborate landscape, without any of the charm and character of the old styles.

The show includes catalogue, afghans, handwoven fabrics, embroidery, petit point, samplers, quilts, crochet, knitting, children's frocks, toys, batiks, in great number and variety. There is work in leather and quilts. One of the most original exhibits is the painting on buckram of an Indian St. Francis preaching to Canadian birds. It comes from an Indian school in British Columbia.

Wood-carving attracted a good deal of attention Saturday. There were Indians, bears, bison—even a lion and an elephant. The series of buttons and buckles by Bryant Schwartz was intriguing.

Ship models were in evidence, and there was a good showing of pottery, hand-made furniture and work in the metals. Of outstanding interest this year are the pewter of R. F. Girdwood, Quebec, and Harold G. Stacey, Ontario, and the fine book-binding by Douglas Duncan of Toronto.

An exhibition of early French-Canadian furniture is being held in the print room.

MONTREAL DOCTOR IS GOING TO SPAIN

Star Oct. 22/36

Dr. Norman Bethune To Head Mission To Madrid

TORONTO, Oct. 22—(C.P.)—Dr. Norman Bethune, Montreal surgeon and head of the Canadian Medical Mission to Spain, conferred with Spanish loyalist leaders here yesterday prior to his departure for Madrid with medical and surgical supplies.

"I am only heeding the call of 1,000,000 people suffering and needing medical aid," he said. "I am not going over for the adventure. Even though Madrid is besieged, we shall get in by airplane."

The announcement from Toronto that Dr. Norman Bethune, Montreal surgeon, is to head a Canadian medical mission to Spain, came as a surprise to many of the medical fraternity in the city, and The Star failed to find anyone who was connected with the organization. Dr. Bethune, who has an Ontario license as a surgeon, was born in 1890, and was for several years connected with the Sacred Heart Hospital at Cartierville where he performed chest surgery, being keenly interested in tuberculosis. He is an associate member of the American Association of Thoracic Surgeons, and was connected with the Royal Victoria Hospital.

Medical men questioned whether any medical mission of importance would be sent to Spain, pointing out that conditions in Madrid were such now that the likelihood was that they could not get to the beleaguered city in time to help the loyalists, which Dr. Bethune declares to be the objective he has in view. Dr. Bethune is credited with advanced views and during the last election issued a lengthy mimeographed letter entitled "Care for the Common People." His address in Montreal is 1154 Beaver Hall Square, but inquiries there today revealed that Dr. Bethune would not be back from Toronto until tomorrow and no information could be given regarding the proposed mission.

TWO ART DISPLAYS ATTRACT INTEREST

Independent Art Association and Margaret C. Thompson
Show Works

Two exhibitions are at present attracting some attention in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company—a group of water colors by Margaret C. Thompson and the annual show of the Independent Art Association.

The former consists of about 40 sketches, much more pleasant than disturbing, covering a wide range of landscape, from the Highlands of Scotland and the Auvergne Mountains in France to California and the Yosemite. Lake Champlain, the Maine shore, the Adirondacks and Lake Memphremagog figure in the series of holiday memories.

A dozen painters and several sculptors are represented in two score works in the Independent show. The most ambitious of the paintings on the wall is by Maurice Le Bel, whose childlike little Christmas card, "Les Cochers", is to be contrasted with a large, sumptuous interior containing a gallery of paintings, a piano, a cello and some overstuffed furniture. Ruth B. Henshaw exhibits water color landscapes that are freer than most; Jean M. Maclean shows port scenes and flowers; Warwick J. Low, birds; Robert Sharpe, waterfront views; Stanley B. Wilson, cows in pastures. There is plenty of variety. Other painters represented are: Charles Tulley, Norah Fergusson, Helen Slack Wickenden, Fred Ridge, Nesta Low and Dr. Nathan Freedman. The sculptors are Orson Wheeler, John Mellor and Prudence Dawes.

The exhibitions will continue until the end of the week.

ERIC RIORDON SHOWING

Laurentian Scenes Predominate—Canadian Painter
Also Exhibits Sketches
Done Abroad

The work of Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A., is not as well-known in Montreal as it should be. In the past, it has come to us only as part of some larger exhibition—notably, the memorable retrospective show of the Group of Seven in the Montreal Art Association galleries. So there is every reason to congratulate W. Scott and Sons on the exhibition which opened on Drummond street on Saturday, the first all-Lismer show to be held here.

While the majority of the paintings—25 out of 35—are small sketches, it is a representative collection, revealing the dominant characteristics of the man in no uncertain terms. All except his abundant sense of fun. This could have been brought out in the group of drawings, had the ten not been selected to chime in with the rest of the exhibition rather than to display the various sides of the artist's temperament.

If you like your Canada tame, with its contours softened and sentimentalized, Lismer is not your man. The Canada he proclaims with powerful stroke and ringing color is a hard, fighting land. "Cathedral Mountain", for example, is a massive struggle; the hard clouds, no less than the rocks, are engaged in it. How obdurate are the rocks in "The Sombre Isle of Pic", and how the wind has stripped the McGregor Bay Islands, leaving only a few shreds of tough pine! In "Old Pines, McGregor Bay," the painter exults in great wrestling trunks against stormy sky and turbulent water. Even his "Milk Weed," delicate in color and charming in pattern, and his decorative sumachs, are sturdy plants. "The Stone Mill" is old and settled and gracious, but the grim fight emerges again in "Quebec Village." This is none of your pretty romantic landscapes, but the picture of a stern, obstinate soil.

For the most part, Lismer is, of course, an inland painter, but the force of the salt, uncompromising sea shakes two outstanding canvases in the collection—"Nova Scotia Harbor" and "The Boat Deck."

One of the sketches, "In Zululand," reminds us that he is now in South Africa, reorganizing art education in the schools throughout the Union. But its chief interest lies in its contrast with the Canadian scene.

It is a hard, demanding, unyielding Canada Lismer paints, but it is a Canada both challenging and stimulating, and it would be hard to leave the show unthrilled.

RIORDON EXHIBITING.

The comment of a lady overheard in the Continental Galleries of Fine Art, St. Catherine street, Saturday afternoon, sums up as aptly as may be the exhibition of more than two score paintings by Eric Riordon now being held there. "They are just the sort of pictures you can live with!" she exclaimed, and there is no question but that these landscapes will meet with the approval of the buying public in general. They are small, proficiently executed in their own manner and they take no risks in either subject or treatment.

Mr. Riordon gives us the French Alps, the Scottish Highlands, fisher-boats in Brittany, the Riviera, the church of St. Germain des Pres, in Paris, a ship wallowing in the sea, after storm, and a group from the Laurentians. Most of the latter are in winter, with cottages cosily smoking, a glow on the snowy road and a glint in the sky, and perhaps ski-ers and ski-tracks. If there is a touch of sentimentality about them, the majority of people will not object to it. The associations are half the charm of "pictures you can live with."

The painter handles his snowy hills, his tufted trees, his atmosphere, with a deft and easy brush. Particularly interesting are his Matterhorn and his other Alps pictures and his "Harvest, Piedmont," a gracious and unusual view of the Laurentians.

The exhibition opened Saturday and will continue until Friday, November 13.

BALLAD 'SPEAKING' DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Gazette Oct. 29/36

Miss Marjorie Gullan Gives Recital Before Business
Women's Club

Inspiring illustration of the power that the spoken word can exert was furnished by Miss Marjorie Gullan, who is chairman and director of studies of the Speech Institute, London, Eng., in a recital of ballads last night before the Business and Professional Women's Club in the Windsor Hotel, when she held the rapt attention of her audience with selections ranging from the intensely dramatic Scottish "Binnorie" to some homely and amusing Irish pieces.

Miss Gullan prefaced her "speaking" of the ballads with an outline of the work carried on by the Speech Institute in "trying to give some mastery of spoken language to the professional boy and girl, man and woman, so that they may function better in their daily lives." She told, too, of the development of choral speaking, and that the particular style of poetry required was being met by John Masefield, T. S. Eliot and some of the moderns in writing work which could be spoken by groups of people together.

The ballads reflect the psychology of their country, Miss Gullan pointed out, those of England being "like the English meadowlands," and the Scotch "like the dark glens."

Miss Gullan was at her best in the Scottish and Irish ballads, probably because the first held either stark dramatic quality or pawky humor, and the second a homely, comic character. The Irish ballads were from "Songs from Leinster" by W. T. Letts. The best of the English ballads was "The Raggle Taggle Gypsies." The recital was closed with "The Song of the New World," by Clarissa Graves, one of Miss Gullan's associates in the Speech Institute, written for choral speaking.

Miss Gullan was accompanied by Miss Kirby, a co-founder of the institute.

Mrs. Amy B. Hilton presided. Miss Gullan was thanked by Miss Mabel Brittain.

An appeal for support of the Federated Charities drive for funds was made by J. Alex. Edmison.

Executives Honor T. Eaton Employee

25 Years Service Marked
By Presentation.

His completion of 25 years service with the firm was made the occasion of a presentation to Emile Lemieux, display manager, by executives of The T. Eaton Co. Limited of Montreal, Saturday. Mr. Lemieux was the recipient of a gold watch, suitably inscribed.

P. B. Walls, director and merchandise manager of the Montreal store, made the presentation and congratulated the new member of the "Quarter Century Club". W. F. Locke, superintendent, and other "club" members, also welcomed the new member.

The staff of the display department also marked Mr. Lemieux's long service, with the presentation of a handsome piece of sterling plate and a silver desk clock.

Mr. Lemieux is widely known in art circles in the Dominion, particularly for his outstanding Laurentian paintings. He is a member of the Arts Club of Montreal, and has been an exhibitor at the Art Gallery for many years. His paintings have also been accepted at the Royal Academy. He is a life member of the Chateau de Ramezay and a member of Laval sur le Lac Golf Club.

Mr. Lemieux spent several years in Paris, and since that time has travelled extensively in Europe. The presentation of Eaton displays, all of which come under Mr. Lemieux's direction, reflects his genius for colour and design. Many of his displays, notably St. Catherine St. windows of a commemorative type, have been judged among the finest on the American continent.

In the heart of Montreal's business district, surrounded by busy business blocks, stores and offices, is a children's attic studio, one of the most unusual art studios in Canada. Its patrons are children whose parents may be poor and whose opportunities are limited. They go there not to learn to paint, but to paint. Many of them, unfettered by adult ideas, reveal true talent; many of them reveal extraordinary ideas of color; all of them exhibit imagination and individual personalities.

Designed to develop minds rather than mechanical skill, the attic studio has been made possible through the generosity of a Montreal doctor who is now on his way to Spain to take medical aid to the victims of that country's ruthless civil war. Little is known of the studio's work and few Montrealers have ever been privileged to visit the attic room. This week, with the opening of the National Produced in Canada Exhibition, the young "artists" will publicly display their imaginative paintings for the first time. Art lovers who view the exhibition will enjoy a new experience. Students of psychology will have an opportunity for double study. First, they will consider the minds of the children who produced the work; second, they will witness the reactions of the general public educated to appreciate art only when it is formal and traditionally correct.

New to Montreal, the Austrian movement in child education has nevertheless an international history. Forty years ago it began in Europe with the stimulation of interest in the creative abilities of children expressed in art form as its aim. Led by Professor Cizek, in Austria, the movement completely divorced itself from enforced art instruction as prescribed by the authorities and children were permitted to draw, and create, whatever they wished to do. The first principle of the movement was to encourage the child to put in color his own ideas. The only unpardonable sin was to copy.

Educationists and artists generally throughout Europe watched with interest the results of Professor Cizek's experiment. That they were impressed is demonstrated by the fact that the movement quickly spread to other countries. It is now firmly established in Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, Russia, Spain, Switzerland, the United States, Japan and other countries.

In Canada, Arthur Lismer, of Toronto, six years ago recognized the contribution that art could make to Canadian education and the development of better Canadian citizens. He undertook, rather hesitantly, to introduce the new movement to the Ontario capital. Since then he has brought more than 6,500 children to his classes and introduced more than 27,000 children to the Art Gallery each year. His work has gained recognition not only in Toronto but in other parts of the British Empire and he is now engaged in introducing the new creative system in South Africa.

Four months ago the Montreal Children's Creative Art Studio. Centre was founded in Montreal. Operating without funds, it has depended for its existence on the generosity of Dr. Norman Bethune, noted Montreal chest surgeon, who, in addition to being a talented amateur artist is keenly interested in child psychology. Assisting Dr. Bethune have been F. Brandtner, Montreal artist, and Mrs. Marion Scott. The studio is located in the front portion of Dr. Bethune's office on Beaver Hall Square.

Obviously, with such limited facilities and without financial support, the work of the centre has been on a small scale. Children were selected from the University Settlement, the Griffintown Club and other centres. Each child was supplied with sheets of brown paper, approximately two feet square, a brush, a pie-plate for a palette, and an assortment of poster paints. At first they waited hesitantly for instructions. All they were told was to paint. The subjects they have painted will make up the display at the exhibition.

To develop imagination in the children, sponsors of the centre have from time to time taken them on city tours, to the waterfront, through factories, up to the look-out, along city streets. Then they have returned to the studio and put into color their own impressions. The results are stimulating and amazing. Blue waves, trim yachts and smoke-grimed freighters, blue, red and purple skies, trees, a flower, a house, a street of stores, a fair girl dancing, a boy flying a kite, horses, imaginative animals—these and hundreds of other subjects have been created from children's minds. Each reveals some child's thoughts and impressions. No one is like another. And the children, uninterrupted by adult instructions, revel in the opportunity to use color and design as they believe they should be used.

Not all children, of course, succeed. Some hesitate and reveal no creative ability. For them the guide (teachers at the centre are guides, not instructors) attempts to arouse the inborn power to create which exists in every child. Children are permitted to select their own subjects without supervision or dictation; they then present their paintings to the guide for criticism and he assists them to utilize painting as a complete manner of expression and encourages them to develop their own ideas of form and color.

A child, guides at the centre point out, is not an empty container to be pumped full of ideas, but is a living, growing being, full of ideas and an active personality. Only by being given an opportunity to express these ideas is he able to develop properly. One child is given to inward things, another to outward things. It is, according to the centre, wrong and dangerous to attempt to mold all children into a similar pattern by imposing ideas upon them. By impressing an adult outlook on child artists, it is explained, the only result is a reflection. And any interpretations that are worthy of the name of art come from within, from the subconscious mind or from natural reaction to the external world. They are not results of something imposed, but of something experienced.

The purpose of the Children's Creative Art Centre is not to develop artists but to make children beauty conscious and therefore better citizens. The display arranged by the centre for the Produced in Canada Exhibition will, it is believed, create a wider interest in the activities of the centre and at the same time present to the Montreal public a selection of child art that could not have been produced by standardized methods or drill in art formulas.

TWO ARTISTS SHOW AT EATON GALLERY

Gazette Nov. 3/36
Joseph Giunta and Marc Aurele Fortin Display
Varied Works

The danger of first exhibitions is the tendency to generosity, and Joseph Giunta, young Montreal painter whose show opened yesterday in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, fell into the pitfall. He scarcely does credit to himself in displaying 100 paintings, since most of them are tiny things, the merest notes—the slope of a hill, the corner of a field, a patch of shore, a spot of autumn foliage, a wisp of mist over the river; good practice, no doubt, but hardly important enough to frame and hang on a gallery wall. In his larger canvases, when he really seems to be trying, he demonstrates energy and some ability, though he rarely breaks away from the conventional. That he has promise, if he will let himself go, is seen in pictures like the vivid one of children dancing.

Next door to Mr. Giunta is exhibited a group of 25 new works of Marc Aurele Fortin. It is scarcely fair to compare the two painters, but the contrast is inescapable, since they are placed side by side. Fortin doesn't always come off, his compositions do not always hold together, they lack depth; but if there is one thing Fortin is, it is extremely individual. His pictures of Venice, of Quebec cottages and jumbled cities, seem to be stitched rather than painted. In a sense, those wriggly lines of his are like threads of wool, yet they are too luminous for such a simile, too phosphorescent. Fortin lives in a strange, exciting world of his own.

Arthur Lismer's Work at Scott's Star Nov. 4/36

The fact that Toronto painters have generally been rather disinclined to show their work in Montreal adds to the interest of the collection of work by Arthur Lismer, which is now being exhibited at Scott's galleries. The collection includes oil pictures and sketches and drawings, of which there are only ten, are some of the best that Mr. Lismer has ever shown here, in quality of line and composition. One of the best is a drawing, on grey paper, of a group of mill buildings, another, with a fine sense of space, is of a view across an inlet; the same good qualities are in a drawing of some fishing folk at Perce; there is good light and shade in two scenes of tangled woods, and a feeling of wind and movement in a sketch of pine trees.

The oil paintings are mostly small sketches, some of them mere notes in color, but there about ten bigger pictures. In most of these there is, with a certain formality of drawing and composition, a lot of good color. Some of the best of them are of places in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, which seem to have inspired Mr. Lismer more than his more familiar scenes in Ontario. There is fine, decorative color in most of these eastern pictures, and they contrast with the "Cathedral Mountain," painted eight years ago, which is a very formal composition, with little suggestion of scale or distance. There is an abundance of good color in many of the small oil sketches in this exhibition. Only one of Mr. Lismer's South African sketches is here, but it is a good one—a rich purple sunset; a sketch of a red chair in a garden has a delightful effect of sunlight; there is excellent lighting in a view through a window on Georgian Bay; an Evening Sunglow, a study of sea, cottages and boats in Nova Scotia and a sketch of MacGregor Bay are others in a good collection.

Gaz. Nov. 5/36 The McCord Museum.

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—It seems amazing to me that no vigorous protest has yet been made regarding the closing of the above museum. I have about 2,000 worth of exhibits there and I can neither see them myself nor show them to my friends. I was quite undecided whether I would place these in the McCord Museum or the Chateau de Ramezay but I had such implicit faith in McGill University that I decided to place them in the McCord Museum hoping they would be of interest to generations to come.

I think your readers (especially those who have exhibits there) will agree with me that the action of McGill in closing the museum is a flagrant breach of trust on the part of the university. The excuse that the institution was closed for economy's sake, to my mind, is ridiculous. A retired soldier as doorkeeper and a lady curator appeared to be the personnel of the establishment.

The lady curator, on many occasions, gave very interesting lectures to large crowds of school children on the past history of Canada which was a very desirable education for the young. The discontinuance of these lectures and the closing of the Museum, to say the least of it, is to be deeply regretted.

I believe a statement has been made that the closing is only temporary, but this is a broad statement to make—altogether too indefinite. Now I think it is incumbent on the university to either reopen the Museum at once or return to the donors their exhibit on demand.

40 LOCAL PAINTERS SHOW IN EXHIBITION

Art Display Is Part of Produced in Canada Offering

Nearly two score Montreal painters are represented in the art show held as part of the Produced in Canada Exhibition in the Sun Life Building, and those who attended the advance showing last night saw about 80 works, of artists both well known in the galleries and not so familiar. While landscapes predominate, there are a number of portraits, two nudes, and a few flower studies.

Among the landscape painters are: Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., who shows a large pastel of summer woods and two charming water color sketches; Misses Alice and Bertha des Claves, the first represented by horses on the shore and pasturing on a hillside, and the second by winter and autumn scenes; Paul Caron, whose water colors are the well known Caron Quebec subjects; Albert Cloutier—sugaring in the woods and a group of snowed-in buildings, painted with something of the A. Y. Jackson manner; Paul B. Earle, who has three vigorously presented pictures of woods and hills and boats; Prudence Heward, who shows a strong composition of mountain forms; Adrien Hebert, who offers a variation in his impressive grain elevators and smoking tugs at the harbor; Mabel Lockerby, whose treatment of trees and hills is individual; K. M. Morris, A.R.C.A.—three piquant sketches of life in the hills and a city square; Eric Riordon—familiar wintry views; and Thurston Topham—a broad pattern of leaves and water.

Others in this section include: E. Aubin, N. Collyer, Elythe Neilson Harding, M. R. Holland, J. Humphries, T. H. Garside, C. W. Kelsey, Rita Mount, D. McGill, J. Munro, Lorna Lomer Macaulay, Phyllis M. Perrin, Margaret C. Thompson, and Nellie Mallows.

Portraits are shown by Harold Beament; Gertrude des Claves—two bright-eyed children; Oscar de Lail—a full-length nude; Richard Jack, R.A.—two children; C. W. Kelsey—a woman musher; Agnes Lefort—a boy with mouth organ and a nude; Louis Muhlstock—the head of an old man; he also shows an interior with a Laurentian view; R. Blackwood Partridge, Leslie Smith, and G. Watterson. A. Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., who exhibits a large portrait of a woman, also shows a bowl of flowers. Particularly bright and witty are Sara Robertson's tulips and her cornfield. Ruby le Boutilier, and Lillian Hingston are represented by flower pictures.

The show was arranged by a hanging committee consisting of Paul Caron, Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., and A. Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A.

Children's Paintings Brighten Exhibition

Gazette Nov. 5/36

It will not be surprising if many visitors to the Produced in Canada Exhibition give short shrift to the orthodox art gallery which is part of the layout and pay keener attention to the display of children's paintings along the corridor. This will be no disparagement of the work of the older people but rather a tribute to something exciting, something that will come with the force of a new discovery to more than a few in Montreal. At a similar exhibition in the Toronto Art Gallery, the reviewer once heard the wife of a distinguished Canadian artist exclaim: "Why do grown-ups try to paint, anyway?"

The Children's Art Centre came into existence about five months ago. Dr. Norman Bethune providing it with quarters and materials, and Fritz Brandtner bringing to it, as director, his abundant energy and enthusiasm, a knowledge of like movements in Europe and, closer at home, in Toronto, and the modern point of view which is so essential to an enterprise of this kind.

For the benefit of those who might not be familiar with the idea behind it, perhaps it should be pointed out that the function of the Children's Art Centre is to give the child an opportunity for the freest expression of his imagination and of his reactions to the visual world without the interference of adults who, in the conventional schools, impose their adult traditions. The movement began with Dr. Cisek in Vienna and has been exploited with astonishing success in Toronto by Arthur Lismer, A. R. C. A., who is now in South Africa re-organizing children's art education on the same basis.

The inclusion of a group of paintings by boys and girls in the recent contemporary American exhibition in the Museum of Modern Art, New York, and the Museum's purchase of several examples, indicate the growing significance of the activity. Now Montreal has an opportunity to see for itself and to give its encouragement. So long as the movement is carefully nurtured and the young artists not made self-conscious—that would defeat the objective—the community will be enriched.

JOY MOVES PAINTERS.

Joy is the one impulse that runs through the diversity of those 60 paintings in the Sun Life Building, and it seems to me—though grown-ups too often forget it—that joy is the only valid reason for ever making a picture. Every one of the young painters—none are older than 15, one is as young as five—was moved by the delight of seeing or imagining, and the delight of putting it down in color. The children were taken to the harbor and encouraged to tell what they saw, in their own way; a tour through a bakery excited them into painting the story of wheat and bread. What does it matter if the boats in John's harbor are all out of proportion, if the smoke flies off in all directions, if the buildings packed along the waterfront are sky-scrapers such as Montreal has never known, riddled with an incredible number of windows? John's picture is full of the bustle of harbors and full of John's own happiness. To look at it is to feel the way he felt. Who ever saw blue horses? But who is so literal as not to understand them? If there is anyone so literal, he is to be pitied.

It is a refreshing experience to look at these harbors and blue horses, these streets and staircases, this clown and that hockey player, these children having tea parties, these trees and flowers, that blowing field of wheat, the Indians in the red canoe, the roaring locomotive, the windmills, parti-colored houses, restaurants, shop windows, bakeries and sail-boats and strange fairyland mountains; a stimulating experience.

ITALY'S VILLAS SHOWN Gaz. Nov. 5/36

Herbert Cross Gives Illustrated Account of Tour

Lovers of life in the open air, though they took to it in the stately and ceremonious manner rather than in shirtsleeves, the Italians built their villas—casino, bosco and parterre—built them for their own pleasure, but left them for the enjoyment of generations to come. One who has delighted in them—Herbert Cross—passed on his enthusiasm to the members of the Montreal Art Association last night, with the aid of tinted slides.

Of all gardens, said Mr. Cross, none equalled the gardens of Italy, and he went on to prove his statement by taking his audience on a villa tour of northern Italy, Tuscany, and Rome and its environs. He showed them such famous places as the Villa Lante, the Villa d'Este, the Villa Borghese and the Pitti Palace, pointing out the architectural style of the buildings and the use made of statues and fountains in the formal gardens, fountains in their charm, loveliness and glamor, and admiring the vistas. He ended with a little verse and a confession that the name of Italy was engraved on his heart.

Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, who presided, announced a series of lectures by Dr. Julius Held, beginning on November 23.

Peace, Quiet Pervade Show at Art Gallery

Gazette Nov. 7/36

It's another and quieter world you enter when you step into the lecture room of the Montreal Art Association and yield yourself to the gentle persuasion of the exhibition now on view there. These three score paintings from the collection of the late Edward Black Greenshields are mostly of the Dutch School—tranquil evenings, cool retreats, ducks dabbling in pleasant pools, mild flocks of sheep, cows standing still or plodding slowly, peaceful domestic interiors, with here and there a stormy sky or a whipped-up sea to make the quietness the more quiet. Coming in out of the hurly-burly world out of a time whose art expression is dynamic, you have to yield, you have to adjust yourself, key yourself down, the way you do when you turn from tempestuous Beethoven symphonies to Haydn quartets, and it's not a bad idea now and again to slip into haven. There are 14 works of the Maris

NOV. McCord Museum. 10

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—I was glad to see in your paper an expression of regret in relation to the closing of the McCord Museum, and wish to add my testimony to the value of the historical talks given by the curator, in the museum, to the school children. The modern method of preaching history by going to the sources and showing the pupils in how to learn for themselves is infinitely more effective than the purely theoretical method. Given the opportunity, it is the true way to teach. We have this opportunity in Montreal, and are throwing it away.

With regard to the expense, I am sure the school boards, because of the educational value of the exhibits and of the work of the curator, would make some contribution to keep the Museum open. Also I have for a long time felt that the Women's Canadian Club ought to do some more creative work than it does. They gave a scholarship one year for a piece of historical research work, and might be glad to contribute regularly to constructive educational work in relation to the study of Canadian history. I am also sure that the History Association of Montreal is vitally interested in the Museum and would help in whatever manner possible. This society was instrumental in having the Museum opened to the public on Sundays, and at the initial stage they helped and at the work. It is a great disappointment to our members to see the doors of the Museum closed and to feel that our historical treasures are inaccessible to us. I am sure that if the newspapers would help, we might do something to retrieve the mistake of closing the Museum.

Child Art Show Sought By Queen's Herald Nov. 14/36

Interesting Exhibit Will Be Loaned to University

The wide interest in the work of the child artists at the Montreal Children's Art Centre, seen during the past ten days at the National Produced in Canada Exhibition, resulted yesterday in an invitation from Queen's University at Kingston, Ont., to display the creative work there immediately following the Montreal exhibition.

The invitation, received by Fritz Brandtner, art director of the centre, was from Andre Bieler, art instructor at Queen's and praised very highly the work being carried on by the centre and the results as illustrated at the exhibition. Arrangements for the loan exhibition to the university are being completed.

During the Montreal exhibition, Mr. Brandtner stated, the Montreal public generally has taken a very keen interest in the children's work. Particularly notable, he said, was the interest by leading Montreal artists and art lovers.

Several of the children's paintings have been sold to artists and collectors, the proceeds being devoted to the Centre to help carry on the work there. Children receiving aid at the centre come from the Griffintown Club, the University Settlement and other community centres.

brothers—a christening and a small and precious "Yoke of Oxen" by Matthew; eight by William, including the duck pond given the Art Association by Mrs. Greenshields in memory of her husband, the fresh and sparkling "Milking Time at Abcoude," all gentle pastorals; four by James, harsher, more forceful—seashore, towpath, winter landscape and the murky, almost violent "Dordrecht Cathedral."

Mauve is represented by six canvases, horses drinking, sheep and shepherds, the cottage door; there are Weissenbruch storms with birds tossed against skies of infinite loneliness—a curiosity of the collection is Weissenbruch's palette with a sea and ship painted on it and the thumb-hole for the riding moon; there is a large poetic Lhermitte, "End of the Day"; a mysterious landscape by N. V. Diaz de la Pena; an interior by Bernard de Hoog with the sympathetic figure of a young mother leaning over a cradle; a moonlight by Jongkind, a sunshine by Neuhuys, an after-rain by Steelink.

The two beautiful Morris—The Public Gardens, Venice and "St. Malo-La Plage"—are well known. Particularly fine are the Bosboom—the church interiors are meticulous and jewelled as miniatures and yet big and solid; the Ryder "Sentimental Journey," coach climbing under moon, is almost swallowed in its own thickness but it is full of magic; Sir John Lavery's "Green Motor Bonnet" adds brightness to the collection and his Tangiers scenes are romantic; there are two dim but graceful Corots and two glowing Monticelli's—"Fetes Champetre"; a Turner water color sketch of Lake Geneva is so airy that it scarcely belongs to this show.

Other painters represented are: de Bock, Church, Henner, Israels, Jures, Pieters, Sherrewitz, Ter Muelen, Tholen, van der Veele and Voerman.

The exhibition will be open to the public for several weeks. R.H.A.

FRENCH ART HELD BEST

Tops Modern Field, Maurice Gagnon Says

In the quality as well as the quantity of masterpieces it has produced, French painting ranks highest in the world today, Maurice Gagnon, professor of history of art at the Jean de Brebeuf College and a graduate of l'Ecole du Louvre of Paris, told a meeting of La Societe d'Etude et de Conferences at the Windsor Hotel yesterday afternoon.

The freedom of expression of French painting dated in part from the birth of impressionism, he said. Art being a constant action and reaction, impressionism had found its counterpart in the works of Cezanne, Gauguin and Van Gogh from whom derived the three main currents of French painting, fauvism, cubism and surrealism. The speaker believed that French painting was moving in the direction of a new classical order.

Mr. Gagnon illustrated his lecture with a number of slides. Mrs. Romeo Boucher presided.

ANIMAL PAINTER HERE

Carl Rungius in City After Hunting Trip

Carl Rungius, among the best known painters of wild life in the world today, visited Montreal yesterday on his way to New York. The artist, whose winter home is in New York and who has been a summer resident of Banff, Alta., since 1921, has just completed a three-week hunting trip near the Banff National Park, where he bagged a moose with a 54-inch spread and a large buck deer, as well as finding time to make many sketches for future paintings.

The authenticity of the wild animals in his paintings is Carl Rungius' reward for 40 years of hunting on the North American Continent, during which time he has shot every type of big game except muskox and polar bear. As many as 20 trophies in some years have fallen before his gun.

Toronto Painter Re-elected President for His Seventh Term in Office

MANY NEW ASSOCIATES

Harold Beament and Henry Simpkins the Montreal Artists Honored—Two Local Architects on List

Two Montreal painters were elected Associates at the annual meeting of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, held in Toronto at the week-end, when Sir Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., was re-elected head of the Academy for his seventh term.

The local artists honored are Harold Beament and Henry Simpkins, others elected Associates being Stanley Royle, Sackville, N.B.; W. P. Weston, Vancouver; Charles F. Comfort, Franklin Arbuckle and Miss Alice A. Innes, all of Toronto.

Four Associate architects elected were the following: H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, Montreal; Ferdinand H. Marani, Toronto; Mackenzie Waters, Toronto, and Lucien Parent, Montreal.

The Associate sculptor elected was John Sloan, of Hamilton, and the Associate engraver, Leonard Hutchinson, of the same city.

Officers elected were: Sir Wyly Grier, president, Toronto; W. S. Maxwell, R.C.A., vice-president; Chas. W. Simpson, R.C.A., treasurer; E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., secretary, all of Montreal.

Incidentally, Mr. Dyonnet enters on his 27th year as secretary.

The Council elected is J. W. Beatty, R.C.A., Toronto; E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., Henri Hebert, R.C.A., all of Montreal, the newly elected members being Fred S. Haines, R.C.A., Toronto; Chas. W. Simpson, R.C.A., Montreal; W. S. Allward, R.C.A., Toronto; Ernest Fosbery, R.C.A., Ottawa; Percy E. Nobbs, R.C.A., Montreal, and Charles W. Jefferys, R.C.A., York Mills, Ont.

THE NEW ASSOCIATES

Stanley Royle, A.R.C.A., a native of Sheffield, England, has been a resident of Canada for some years. Formerly assistant director of the Nova Scotia College of Art, Halifax, he is now director of the art department of Mount Allison University, Sackville, N.B.

W. P. Weston, A.R.C.A., who specializes in landscapes and has been active in developing interest in art on the Pacific coast, is art director of the Provincial Normal School, Vancouver.

Charles F. Comfort, A.R.C.A., Toronto, is well known as a painter and an exponent of the graphic arts. He is a regular exhibitor at leading exhibitions and has held successful "one-man" shows.

Franklin Arbuckle, A.R.C.A., Toronto, is partial to figure subjects and the life of the city. In the present Toronto show one of his entries is "Trolley Car Madonna"—a young woman with infant squeezed between men reading newspapers with an ample woman strap-hanger in the foreground.

Miss Alice A. Innes, A.R.C.A., Toronto, who was a pupil of J. W. Beatty, R.C.A., of that city, generally devotes herself to landscapes, her sketching ground being about Burks Falls. Her work which is marked by strength and effective color was the subject of a "one-man" show in the Eaton Fine Art Galleries, Montreal, last November.

Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., Montreal, is known for his paintings of the Laurentian country—villages, chilly streams and covered bridges—with an occasional excursion to the West Indies where he found congenial material on sea and land, notably some scenes of natives sorting sponges on wharves abaze with sunlight.

Henry J. Simpkins, A.R.C.A., Montreal, is one of the leading exponents of the watercolor in Canada. Originally from Winnipeg, he has been a resident of Montreal some years. He finds his chief inspiration in the Laurentians at all seasons, winter making, perhaps, the strongest appeal and the scenes of some of his happiest efforts being Morin Heights and along the winding Rouge River. His trips to the Maritimes have also resulted in many effective works at Peggy's Cove and about Lunenburg. His "one-man" shows at the Watson Art Galleries, Sherbrooke street west, are annual events anticipated with interest.

John Sloan, A.R.C.A., Hamilton, is a sculptor who has made steady and consistent progress. Art-lovers will recall his striking work of Salome with the head of John the Baptist in the R.C.A. show here last November.

Leonard Hutchinson, A.R.C.A., Hamilton, while a capital exponent of black and white, is probably better known by his color prints. He possesses a marked decorative sense, and his skill was shown in a collection of prints held in the Eaton Fine Art Galleries, Montreal, last December.

ASSOCIATES ARCHITECTS.

H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, A.R.C.A., Montreal, can number among his works the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul, Sherbrooke street west, Montreal, and the executive offices of the National Breweries, Limited, in the same city.

Lucien Parent, A.R.C.A., Montreal, is, among other works, known for the Monastery Sainte Genevieve de Pierrefonds. He also designed the residence of M. Blondeau, Laval Sur-le-Lac.

Ferdinand H. Marani, A.R.C.A., Toronto, was the designer of the important buildings in Toronto—the offices of the Provincial Paper Company, and the office building for the North American Life Assurance, in the same city.

Mackenzie Waters, A.R.C.A., Toronto, among other works, designed the distillery of W. & A. Gilbey, New Toronto.

In connection with the gathering of the officers and members of the Royal Canadian Academy in Toronto, the occasion was taken to pay tribute to Walter S. Allward, R.C.A., of Toronto, sculptor of the now famous Canadian War Memorial on Vimy Ridge, unveiled this summer by His Majesty King Edward VIII. The creator of what competent authorities designate "the finest war memorial in France," retiring as he has always been, attended the dinner on the express understanding that he would not have to make a speech. Faith was kept—he was not called on.

The 57th exhibition of the R.C.A., being held in the Art Gallery of Toronto, catalogues 251 items. There is also being held in the same building an exhibition of the work of Vincent Van Gogh, under the auspices of the Museum of Modern Art, New York.

The annual exhibition of pictures brought from the van Wissingh galleries at Amsterdam is now being shown in the Johnson Gallery on St. Catherine street. The collection is not quite so large as former ones, but the pictures in it, modern Dutch and French in about equal numbers, are as good as ever, and it differs from previous exhibitions from the same gallery in the presence of a few works by very recent French painters.

Among the Dutch pictures are five by Bauer, with a very good one, mostly in tones of white, of an Arab café, a good example of Weissenbruch's work in a picture of sea shore and sky, an excellent landscape in quiet greys and greens, which is one of three by Gabriel, and two good examples of Bosboom's work. James and William Maris, Mauve and Neuhuys are also represented, as are Dusseldorf, de Zwart, Poggenbeek, Vaes and Bretnier.

Five works by Fantin-Latour are among the French pictures,—a very good one of grapes and an exceptionally fine one of lilacs in a glass bowl are two of them; there are two Daubignys, one with rich greens, the other a picture, in quiet tones, of sea and sky. There is a good little landscape with figures by Corot, a sunset with strong red clouds by Dupre, a seascape with fine color by Monet and an interesting brown landscape by Monticelli. By more modern painters are a strange but striking interior by Bonnard, a picture of two girls which is a good example of the work of Matisse, a white street scene by Utrillo and one of Dufy's amusing memoranda, of people on the deck of a steamer. Boudin, Jaque, Vollon, Pissarro, Raffaelli and Mettling are other painters who are well represented.

P. Eilers of Amsterdam is now again, with an exhibition of French and Dutch paintings of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, which may be seen at the Johnson Galleries, St. Catherine street, until the end of the month. This year, he has brought some 40 works, representative of such men as Bauer, Bosboom, Bretnier, two of the Marises, Mauve, Weissenbruch, de Zwart, Bonnard, Boudin, Daubigny, Dufy, Fantin Latour, Matisse, Corot, Monet, Monticelli, Pissarro and Utrillo.

To look at them in alphabetical order—there are five of Bauer's Eastern pictures, including a feathery palm garden and two water colors swiftly and sensitively noted—"The Holy Ganges" and "Arabian Cafe." A compact church interior shows Bosboom in his best. Bretnier's "Festival Day in Amsterdam," broadly handled, is as full as Tahiti and comes chiding people who think the Dutchmen always dull. The only fish in show, by the way, are not gilded in a basket but very alive in G. W. Dusselhof's "Aquarium." Glowing spots of color, of them cunningly subdued by water, if mussels can be called one might jump from B to V and remark the unusual still life by W. Vaes. Five of them, open and revealing jewel tints.

There are three landscapes by P. J. C. Gabriel, a woodcutter in winter by Mauve, and two of J. H. Maris's works, one of which is a view of Dordrecht with weather bearing down and blurring the outlines. W. Maris is represented by a few, enamelled in satisfying color. The other Dutchmen are Neuhuys—"Grandmother and Children"; Poggenbeek—landscapes; Weissenbruch—shell-gatherers, small in one of his lonely wastes of sand, sea and sky; and W. de Zwart—a painter's integrity in a few apples.

Bonnard's "Femme au Parasol," an interior, stands quite by itself in the show, for its rousing color and individual composition, and Dufy seems like a mischievous imp in the midst of the sober fellows, with his scribbled people on the breezy boat deck. Boudin's "Fete de Village, Bretagne," has its points but it seems to need something to set it going. There is more in the two Daubignys—a healthy rolling hill and a modest shore—than the eye takes in at the first glance. Grapes and flowers show Fantin Latour as the accomplished craftsman who knows his color and texture.

Two women playing dominoes give Matisse a good subject for pleasant color and well-poised composition. It is interesting to contrast Raffaelli's Paris with Pissarro's. The former is cheerful but seems to have a lot of waste space and not much backbone. Pissarro's impression is subtle in its hazy, pearly tints and every stroke means something.

PRIZE AWARD MADE FOR MODEL HOUSES

B.C. Architect Wins First Honors in Competition
Held by Eaton's

Montrealers who are interested in building small houses costing not more than $7,500 and medium-sized houses up to $12,000, or those who are just curious as to the trend of modern domestic architecture, will be able to collect ideas at the show of drawings and models now on view in the Fine Arts Galleries of the T. Eaton Company. The exhibition is the result of the firm's architectural competition in which 149 entries were received from all parts of the Dominion.

Prizes, amounting to $5,500 were awarded as follows: First prize of $1,000 for medium houses and grand prize of $500—W. F. Williams, Nelson, B.C.; another first prize of $1,000—Harold J. Savage, Toronto; honorable mention awards of $100 each—Ernest I. Barott, Montreal; William Ralston, Robert R. Moffat, Ralph Kinsman and A. Wilson, all of Toronto, and Gordon Hughes, Ottawa.

For small houses, the two first prizes of $1,000 each were awarded to Wilkes and Fisher of Toronto and Kent Barker of the same city. Honorable mention awards of $100—W. F. Williams, Nelson, B.C.; William Mollard, Wilfred Whaley, S. K. Sinclair and Henry F. Stevenson, all of Toronto.

The competition was designed to work in with the aims of the National Housing Commission and small houses were not to cost more than $7,500, with medium-sized ones going up to $12,000.

More than 100 of the drawings are on exhibition, each showing a perspective of the building, elevations, floor plans and other details. Five models, one interior, of a number of rooms, with tiny furniture, and five exteriors, all neatly landscaped with bits of sponge dyed green, fashioned ingeniously into trees and shrubs, are particularly intriguing to the layman who does not read plans readily.

The perspectives, however, give a clear idea of the appearance of the finished dwelling. The vast majority of the designs show the influence of the more recent styles of architecture, square or oblong boxes with flat roofs, many of them with terraces and most of them opened up generously with windows. There are interesting variations on the theme—rounded corners and the like—but most of the houses are strictly functional. Only one drawing—the entry of a

BRILLIANT MURAL OF WINTER SPORTS

Gazette Nov. 24/36
Skiers and Skaters Depicted in Vigorous and Colorful Style

Color, brilliant and stimulating, dominates the women's winter sports department at the Robert Simpson Montreal Limited store, keyed by a vivid 75-foot mural full of action and strong tones which has been placed along two walls. Figures of skiers and skaters depicted in bold vigorous style follow each other the entire length, the whole scintillating in the glow of concealed lighting effects.

The mural, executed in oils, was painted for Simpson's by R. L. Kulbach, and its strong, realistic treatment breathes the very spirit of winter sports in Canada, the flying particles of snow crystallized in the keen northern air, the vigorous downhill rush of the skiers, the swooping grace of the skater skimming steel-grey ice, the fun of being towed on skis by a trotting horse, and the breath-taking flight of the toboggan.

Lightness of fabric is allied with color in the skiing and skating outfits, in this department and Grenfell cloth tunics and jackets are prominent in the display. Contrasts are smart, as terra cotta with eggshell white. The Austrian style of costume predominates, and the visitor's eye is struck with the fascinating color designs of the socks. From the frozen north comes a fashion note—the parka, either a separate article designed to be anchored down to the rear of the jacket collar, or in one with the garment and sometimes fur-edged.

TRANSITION PERIOD IN ART DESCRIBED

Nov. 24/36 Gazette
Dr. Julius Held Opens Lecture Series on Northern Painters

An audience which filled the lecture room of the Montreal Art Association and extended into the hall beyond, last evening heard the first of a series of four public lectures on the great masters of Germany and the Netherlands by Dr. Julius S. Held, former assistant director of the Kaiser-Friedrich Museum, and now research fellow and lecturer on fine arts in New York University. Speaking under the auspices of the National Gallery of Canada, Dr. Held is making a tour of the Dominion. His Montreal series will be continued on Thursday, and on Monday and Thursday of next week, at 4.45 p.m.

Yesterday's lecture was concerned with the period of transition between the Middle Ages and the Renaissance in northern art, with the van Eyck brothers, Roger van der Weyden and Hugo van der Goes as the chief figures. With an admirable grasp of his complicated subject, and assisted by beautiful slides, Dr. Held outlined the background of the great Flemish painters and indicated their individual characteristics.

He began by pointing out that the history of mankind was a continuous stream of deeds, thoughts and sensations, without a break, and for the study of it, it was necessary to establish "periods" based on differing stylistic qualities which grew out of the social and cultural life. The period he was considering was the transition from the rigid control of the Middle Ages to the more modern world when individual liberty was at least postulated. He warned that changes did not take place suddenly and that landmarks rather than "turning points" must be sought.

Flemish art in the 15th Century arose out of what was usually looked on as a gloomy corner of the Old World. It came out of a time of misery, persecution and terrible suffering, but a time of a highly refined aristocracy, of splendid churches and brilliant pageantry. The astounding rise of a great school of painting was chiefly the result of the growth of material wealth and the cultural ambitions of the powerful house of Burgundy, which generously fostered the arts and dazzled Europe with its luxury.

The Flemish school of the 15th Century Dr. Held said, was usually referred to as primitive, but while many of the works had the charm of simplicity, they were anything but primitive or naive. He went on to show how symbolism and mysticism developed and how the court had its influence, even in the attitudes of the saints.

Modern painting in the north was usually regarded as having its beginning in Jan and Hubert van Eyck. Jan, who perfected painting in oils, combined secular realism with the religious symbolism of the Middle Ages; studied things and men and the effect of light with an acute observation, and was at the same time monumental and meticulous. The Ghent altar-piece was the most important Flemish work of the fifteenth century. Roger van der Weyden was refined, but he was characterized by dramatic animation; and van der Goes carried art away from the aristocratic idealization, and introduced the common man.

The first of a course of four lectures by Dr. Julius Held, formerly assistant director of the art collections in Berlin, was given at the Art Association of Montreal on Monday. This was the beginning of something new for the Art Association,—afternoon lectures open free to the public,—and the size of the attendance on Monday showed that such lectures are likely to attract the public.

The subject of Dr. Held's course, which has been arranged by the National Gallery of Canada, is "The great masters of the Netherlands and Germany,—Van Eyck to Rubens." In Monday's lecture he dealt with the preliminaries of his subject and with the work of the earliest Flemish painters, particularly the Van Eycks, Van der Weyden and Van de Goes. With many good lantern slides and with very clear explanations he made his lecture thoroughly interesting and at the same time quite popular.

Three more of these free lectures are to be given in this series. The second will be given next Thursday afternoon, November 26th, and the other two on Monday and Thursday of next week, beginning on each day at 4.45.

Landscapes by Harold Beament

An exhibition, which is now to be seen at Watson's gallery on Sherbrooke st., shows the work of Harold Beament, one of the recently elected Associates of the Royal Canadian Academy, at its best. Mr. Beament's work has been gaining in light and warmth for some years and his present collection is a most cheerful one, and this is true of his Canadian pictures as much as of those painted in the West Indies and in the Southern States.

Two of the most striking of these pictures are West Indians,—different views of a big windmill, in which very good use has been made of the white masses of the tower and sails. There is good composition of another kind in the bands of colour and shadow of a view across the lower St. Lawrence, and a nice arrangement of curves with light, fresh greens in a picture of Peggy's Cove, N.S. The southern pictures are interesting with their strong greens, hot sunshine and poverty-stricken houses, and they make a good foil to the paler but still warm yellows and greens of the pictures of Canadian autumn. One of these has a fine effect of shadow on a big hill and on the foreground, and there are some other delightful patterns of color painted at Piedmont and other places in the Laurentians. Some of the pictures have nice, unusual points of view; a bridge in Arkansas, seen from above, is one of them, and another is a picture of sunlight coming from behind shadowed hills at Bark Lake. Some Nova Scotian pictures have good studies of boats and there is a very good sketch of a group of schooners with white sails spread to dry.

WEDGWOOD'S FAME STILL UNSURPASSED

Gazette Nov. 25/36

Professor Tells How Badly Matched Teapot Led Him to Study Pottery

Having inherited a teapot, Dr. Thomas Clark, professor of geology at McGill University, went shopping for a sugar bowl and cream jug. Surveying the completed set, he congratulated himself on having achieved a perfect match. Disillusionment came when a connoisseur friend informed him that the teapot was 100 years older than the other pieces.

The story and its result—study of the voluminous literature of Josiah Wedgwood—formed the material of an illustrated lecture yesterday morning before the Women's Art Society in Stevenson Hall. The literature was voluminous, said Dr. Clark, because Wedgwood kept careful records of all his experiments.

The young Josiah worked in his father's pottery and became interested in the chemistry of the craft. He realized that knowledge of artistic principles was required also. Not content to follow in the footsteps of his father and the long line of potters from which he was descended, he became the master potter of England and achieved a reputation that never has been excelled, said Dr. Clark. After his apprenticeship, he rented a factory of his own and started to produce a green glaze ware different from the prevalent salt glaze and tortoiseshell ware. This became so popular that Wedgwood could not meet the demand and had many imitators.

At this time Wedgwood was experimenting in an endeavor to produce a white ware, and the result was a cream ware. Decorations of this ware were hand-painted and meant the early use of transfers.

Queen Charlotte was so pleased with her tea set of cream ware that she ordered a dinner service of 200 pieces, and the name "cream ware" was changed to "Queen's ware," as it still is known.

Wedgwood had international fame. The Czar of Russia ordered a dinner service of 1,000 pieces with 1,300 different English scenes painted on it. Since the Russian revolution, this has disappeared, said Dr. Clark.

Continuing his experiments, Wedgwood started new potteries and produced black ware and wares without glaze which are known as "terra cotta," until finally he arrived at the popular blue and white Jasper ware.

Throughout his life he was a man of foresight, interested in the problems of the future, and he chose his colleagues with care. By the year 1790 Wedgwood's show room in London held the same place in society as a modern art gallery does today, the speaker said.

Mrs. C. L. Scofield introduced Dr. Clark and Miss Isabel Brittain thanked him.

La Presse Nov. 21/36

LES miniatures sur porcelaine que Mlle Juliette de Lavoye expose actuellement chez Morgan sont, par le souci de la ressemblance, la perfection du détail et le naturel du coloris, bien loin de ces miniatures que nous connaissons, avec leurs figures doucereuses pour bonbonnières, leurs doigts de cire effilés, leurs couleurs en garniture de gâteau.

Mlle de Lavoye a su nous débarrasser, de même, de ces vitres bombées et de ces petits cadres ronds et parfois encombrants de jadis.

La vérité des physionomies d'enfants ou de femmes est telle que la meilleure photographie colorisée peut nous la donner, et parfois un peu meilleure, parce que sur porcelaine le coloris est légèrement plus lustré, choisi du reste avec un goût averti par la miniaturiste.

Si vous voulez un souvenir vivant et véridique tout à la fois, les miniatures de Mlle de Lavoye sont, pour le sûr, désignées d'avance.

Mais pour le visiteur moins embarrassé de la ressemblance et soucieux de repérer le point de vue artistique de ces miniatures, elles posent quelques petits problèmes. Mlle de Lavoye, de son propre aveu, travaille d'après des photographies. Elle montre même avec ces miniatures chez Morgan quelques exemples qui sont d'une formule très voisine de la photo colorisée. J'ai en mains, par exemple, une reproduction sur petite échelle d'une photo signée Garcia de l'hon. George-St.-Lawrence-Neufville Ponsonby, enfant de lord et lady Bessborough, à l'âge de trois ans; or, je constate que la délicieuse miniature du petit Bessborough excette semaine s'en tient point à cette photo, jusqu'à ressembler aux proportions de ma main. Et quand on sait comment est facile d'imprégner des images dans la porcelaine, on peut se demander si Mlle de Lavoye ne fait pas autre chose que cela, à quoi elle ajoute ensuite une coloration délicate.

La miniature sur ivoire peut avoir le tort de jaunir et de se craqueler, mais le recours à pareil procédé y eût été autrement difficile, je crois, et on y eût retrouvé peut-être, même avec leurs charmes un peu naïfs et cireux, des souvenirs du siècle des grâces et de la photo-générité. Telles quelles, avec leur ressemblance exacte et vivante assurée par le fonds photographique, avec leur coloration très aimablement naturelle (une qualité que certains photographes ont peine à découvrir), serties dans des cadres aux lignes carrées et de gentille discrétion, les miniatures de Juliette de Lavoye sont délicieuses surtout quand il s'agit de faire revivre des minois d'enfants et des scurires de jeunes femmes du monde. C'est un des souvenirs les plus délicats que vous puissiez souhaiter.

Montrealer 15th, 1936. ARTHUR LISMER

IT was a pleasure to find Messrs. W. Scott & Sons acting host during the past fortnight to the paintings and drawings of the Torontonian Arthur Lismer. Well-known as he is, I believe it was his first solo show in Montreal. For a number of years he has been principally interested in art education and has lately been called to the South African Union to organize the teaching of art in its schools.

Like so many painters of his generation Lismer had an academic training modified to a degree by that part of impressionistic influence that pervaded the schools. To this he gradually added a definite sense of construction. But unlike many others who were given the same drilling yet who were moved by modern trends enough to realize its inadequacy, he does not reveal an ill-resolved conflict between nature and design. He is all of a piece. At times when the subject encouraged it, particularly when dealing with sunlight, he reverted to impressionistic recording and the result is somewhat thin and unsubstantial. At times, however, with rich and sombre colour he builds massively. All his qualities are resumed in the small picture, Morning Light, Lake Superior—solid and vigorous without subtlety, simple and sincere.

PRODUCED IN CANADA

THIS year again the Produced in Canada Exhibition included a fine arts section. But the first evidence of its artistic activities was the Carl Mangold poster that shone vigorously amid the drab pictorial publicity to which we are accustomed. Commenting last season on an exhibition of posters by Cassandre, Henry McBride, art critic of the New York Sun, remarked that one of the major mysteries of American business was that it generally believed advertising must be stupid. There are artists able and anxious to provide something less appallingly banal than the silky-legged cuties which with total irrelevance represent anything from physics to explosives. But business still believes that only in European countries is the public able to understand art in publicity. And the public has no chance to vindicate itself. Yet it seems beyond question that in spite of its small format Mangold's poster made all eyes swivel and led them to read its message.

I hope anyone who intended to visit the fine arts section did not do as I did and encounter on his way the exhibition of children's paintings done by pupils of The Children's Art Centre under the direction of Fritz Brandtner. So much joyous spontaneity, imaginative freedom and freshness of vision would send anybody through the looking-glass, only to be brought back by next morning's newspaper.

Art for children, not the drudgery of the old-fashioned drawing lesson, but sympathetic encouragement to give intuitive expression to their experience, is claiming more and more the attention of educationalists. Protecting and fostering this gift is one of the triumphs of progressive education. While its promotion is comparatively recent in the United States and Canada, it is a good many years since Prof. Cizek pioneered it in Vienna. Other European countries and Mexico soon adopted it. Nevertheless when just a year ago the first national exhibition of children's work was held in New York, more than a hundred schools in twenty-four states contributed paintings. The previous year had seen an even larger international show comprising exhibits from forty countries. And when last month the Museum of Modern Art in New York presented a selection of work representative of the various departments of the Federal Art Project, it acquired a group of children's paintings done in W. P. A. classes, and promised eventually to have a special room for children's work. In New York City alone 30,000 youngsters attend F. A. P. classes.

The result of this wide-spread encouragement of art for children has been to make it amply clear that it is as natural for them to express themselves graphically as in language, that indeed they often can do so even more eloquently and that if the gift seemed rare in previous generations it was chiefly attributable to the withering effect of the old conventional attitude both at home and in the school. The new method is not designed to produce artists but to enrich the lives of coming generations and increase the numbers of those for whom art in all its forms, from furniture to murals, is really an enhancement of living.

THE GREENSHIELDS COLLECTION

THERE is an aroma of antimacassars and ball-fringe in the ground-floor gallery of the Art Association where the collection assembled during his lifetime by the late E. B. Greenshields, Esq. is being shown until November 22nd. It is typical of the collection then in vogue in Montreal. In fact it is even much better than typical and therefore gives a good opportunity to rearrange our ideas.

It comprises excellent examples (save for Jongkind) of most of the nineteenth century Dutchmen, a Barbizon representative in Diaz, Corot (in his more conventional aspect), Monticelli, who at times was really something of a painter, a water-colour by Turner, a few other French and English painters. Quite apart are two early Morrisces, which show his personality well on the way to emancipation from his earliest influences.

As you come in on the right there is a picture by the American Albert Ryder whose label bears the title The Sentimental Journey. It may well prove the title of your tour. There is an abundance of the sentimental and picturesque, and no lack of clever brush handling. There is little concern for pictorial construction, and little genuine emotion.

The nineteenth century was a comfortable era and the public was disinclined to tolerate anything that disturbed its feelings. Baudelaire tells how one day the minister of fine arts sent for Delacroix and, saying that it was an affliction to see a man of so great talent averse to putting a little water in his wine, finally asked him if he could not moderate his manner. Suffocated by indignation the painter replied that if he painted in the way he did it was because he could not do otherwise, with the result that for seven years he was refused official recognition.

It was indeed a curious period. (I suppose all periods are curious when seen from just far enough along the curve of evolution to make them "date.") In the heat of the twentieth century reaction it was the fashion to talk of the "stupid nineteenth century." Now, in France at least, they are more inclined to call it "le grand dix-neuvième siècle." The fact remains that probably no other epoch ever saw so much bad art. Not that it failed to cultivate the great tradition—in fact not since the renaissance had Europe seen so much good painting—but it was also prolific of a production that had but feeble roots in the tradition. Due to a complex of influences involving every province of thought and activity, there was a vast cleavage between art and the public, and there grew up a popular misconception of the nature of art. Of how the market and the academies fell into the hands of those most responsive to the popular misconception, and who were therefore the most successful, Clive Bell has given a circumstantial account.

ART NOTES

THE most important annual exhibition on this continent, the Carnegie International in Pittsburgh, is at present holding its assizes. Fewer countries were invited than formerly—six in number—of which Canada was not one. The jury awarded the first prize of $1,000 to a picture by Leon Kroll, which Mr. Jewell, critic of the New York Times, calls a "routine studio set-up." The second prize went to Pierre Bonnard.

A retrospective of the work of the water-colourist John Marin, the most isolated and probably the most powerful figure in contemporary American painting, is the feature in the Museum of Modern Art in New York.

This promises to be a Picasso season as last winter was a Van Gogh season, though there is little danger that the Spaniard's painting will evoke as much enthusiasm as did the Dutchman's romantic life. The Valentine Gallery in New York opens with a Picasso retrospective—1901 to 1934—on view until November 21st. At the same time the blue and rose periods are exemplified in the Seligmann gallery.

Scrapbook Is Kept At University

Newspaper clippings in reference to McGill University dating back to 1854 have been discovered in university storage vaults. These clippings give an interesting and somewhat informal history of the university's happenings and its growth during a period of nearly a century.

The oldest one is taken from the editorial columns of the old Montreal Sun. The editorial urged the university to advertise its courses. "We have all the materials for a first-class college," the editorial points out. "Unless, however, more urgent and energetic steps are taken than we, so far, have heard of, McGill College will soon be counted among the things that were."

This was before the coming of the university's principal, Sir William Dawson. The story down through the years with his advent shows the gradual growth in influence of the university.

The clippings now form a part of the university "scrap book" which is systematically kept up from day to day with excerpts from leading local dailies.

Clarence Gagnon se fixera-t-il au pays?

L'éminent peintre canadien-français, de passage à Montréal après une longue absence, voit son nom mêlé à maintes rumeurs de réorganisation artistique.

Clarence Gagnon, l'illustrateur désormais célèbre de "Maria Chapdelaine", le plus canadien-français de tous nos peintres avec Suzor-Côté et le plus connu en même temps dans tous les pays du monde. — Clarence Gagnon est revenu au pays après une longue absence. Il y a douze ans depuis sa dernière visite à Montréal; il a trouvé le visage de la métropole bien changé. Il y a plus longtemps encore qu'il est établi là-bas; il habite au moins quatre mois par année à Paris depuis 1904, quitte à voyager durant les huit autres mois de pays en pays.

Homme d'une conversation charmante, M. Clarence Gagnon a longuement entretenu le représentant de la "Presse", ce matin, à la demeure de son beau-père, M. L.-L. Rodier, 332, rue Metcalfe, à Westmount, des plaisirs délicats de la pêche en Scandinavie, en Laponie, en Suisse.

Dans son fin visage tout en sourire, encadré de cheveux blanchissants, mais où la moustache garde un souvenir de blondeur, les petits yeux au bleu très pâle et très vif avaient de la malice. Naturellement le peintre savait la question qui tremblait aux lèvres du reporter: la visite a-t-elle quelque rapport avec certaines rumeurs de réorganisation dans le domaine de l'enseignement artistique?

M. Gagnon n'a laissé rien supposer. Il est ici pour visiter sa famille et se reposer dans l'atmosphère du pays. Son séjour sera de quelques semaines, peut-être même durera-t-il jusqu'à la fin de l'été prochain. L'artiste avoue qu'il a extrêmement hâte de se rendre compte des progrès et tendances de la peinture et de l'art dans la province; il porte un vif intérêt aux arts domestiques; il se fera un plaisir de visiter l'Ecole.

Objet de certaines démarches

L'hon. Athanase David approcha jadis M. Clarence Gagnon à Paris, au sujet de la direction des Beaux-Arts dans la province. Dans le monde artistique on sait que depuis quelques années le nom de Clarence Gagnon est revenu à la surface dans les conversations à maintes reprises et qu'on a signalé qu'en plus d'être un de nos plus grands et plus indiscutables artistes canadiens-français, il conquerrait d'emblée les milieux étrangers par sa culture et sa connaissance de Londres et de Paris, par la gloire de "Maria Chapdelaine", par son respect de la tradition allée à un modernisme bien averti.

On a signalé quelle fierté il y aurait de consacrer ici-même la gloire d'un des nôtres.

Mais M. Gagnon a toujours refusé. J'ai voulu toujours garder la liberté entière, dit-il. Je ne me suis jamais laissé attacher à aucun marchand, à aucun groupe; je ne voudrais pas être attaché à la "politique" ou comment dirais-je?...

Son amour du Canada français

Je ne me suis pas installé à Paris par délicatesse d'incompris, explique-t-il. Au contraire j'aime tellement le Canada et surtout la province que je me connais trop; je n'aurais jamais fini d'explorer les jolis coins, et les tableaux resteraient inachevés. Là-bas je ne peins que du "canadien". Je ne rêve qu'au Canada. Le motif reste fixé dans mon esprit et je ne me laisse pas capter par les charmes du changement de paysage. En Suisse, en Scandinavie, partout je retrouve mon Canada français.

De talents, ma province en foie

M. CLARENCE GAGNON, le peintre canadien-français que ses toiles bien canadiennes autant que les fameuses illustrations de "Maria Chapdelaine" ont rendu célèbre, est de passage à Montréal après une absence de douze ans. Il s'est retiré chez son beau-père, M. L.-L. Rodier, avenue Metcalfe, à Westmount, où le photographe l'a surpris ce matin. (Cliché la "Presse").

sonne. Je voudrais qu'on les découvre davantage. Je voudrais voir nos arts domestiques organisés comme en Suède et en Norvège, par exemple.

Que ceci et de tant d'autres choses, M. Clarence Gagnon nous entretint fort aimablement. Mais l'heure presse, et il en faudra reparler.

M. Gagnon exposera probablement à Montréal, du reste, les originaux de ses illustrations de "Maria Chapdelaine". Et, aussi, il semble que son nom doive nous revenir pour d'autres raisons encore.

COLLECTOR OF ART OPENS A GALLERY

Gazette Nov. 28/36
Herman Silbermann Places
Extensive Private Collection on Exhibition

After years of collecting pictures as a hobby, Herman Silbermann, Montreal business man, has opened a public gallery at 820 Notre Dame street west, and has on exhibition there a large and varied collection of works by American and European painters. The only Canadian represented so far is Cornelius Krieghoff, but his five little paintings are well worth seeing—an Indian hunter, a baker, a man with a water barrel, three men on a sleigh and a gay tobogganing scene.

In a sense, Charles P. Gruppe might be claimed to be a Canadian, since he was born in Ontario 76 years ago, but he received most of his training in Holland and has lived in New York for some years. He is a man with a distinguished career and is represented in some of the leading collections, including the National Gallery, Ottawa, and the National Museum, Washington. Mr. Silbermann's collections of Groupes is extensive—many Dutch landscapes and canal scenes, and a nude on the seashore. It is interesting to compare the group by his son, Emile Gruppe; the subjects are similar but the touch is swifter and in some cases fresher. He has painted boats at Gloucester, Maine, and snowy landscapes in Vermont.

Among the English painters are Sir E. A. Waterlow, R.A.—a large picturesque record of Irish peasants at their shrines on the shore on St. Mac Dara's Day; T. S. Cooper, R.A.; W. A. Breakspear, R.I.—Milton dictating to his daughters; Bernard Gribble—Drake towing home his Spanish prizes, and a full-sailed ship, "The Great Harry."

Mr. Silbermann has several Bernard de Hoogs, "Mending Time," and a mother and child being particularly noteworthy; an interior with children by D. Blomfield; cavaliers by de Andreis; "The Letter" by Edward Portlieje; a large painting of sheep by H. van der Weele; and works by van Zeek, Enjolras, Verschuur, Tucek, Pitte, Mazzotti, Artz, F. Breansky, sr., and T. Schwala.

Reginald F. Bolles of Cape Cod is represented by a hanging goose painted with the natural grain of wood for background, and by a vase of irises; Pauline Williams, by zinnias; F. Focardi, by a group of Italian working people enjoying their siesta; K. Witholm, by four panels representing the seasons; A. Priecheufried, by an expressive synagogue scene; J. L. Pettijean, by a still life; H. S. Hubbell, a portrait of a woman, with oranges to carry out the decorative scheme; there are brilliantly lighted mountains by Meindl and marines by George L. Morris and others; H. Bremon-tier is represented by a moonlight landscape.

In his collection of etchings, Mr. Silbermann is showing animals by Carl Rungius, dogs by Morgan Dennis, and a variety of subjects by J. B. Costigan, E. D. Warren, Churchill Ettinger, George Elmer

Star Nov. 27/36 Some Pictures By Americans

A collection of pictures which is being shown by Herman Silbermann of Notre Dame street west contains several by American painters whose work is not well known in Montreal. Chief among these are some by two Canadians, who now live and work in the United States. By Charles P. Gruppe, formerly of Picton, Ont., there are some good views of the harbour and ships at Gloucester, Mass., and one of a Dutch harbour. Still better is the work of his son Emile A. Gruppe, who has also painted Gloucester with some good effects of atmosphere. There is also a happy effect of sunlight in a picture by him of girls bathing on a sea shore. There is striking realism in a still life of a dead wild duck by Reginald F. Bolles by whom there is also a flower picture. Other American pictures are a vivid portrait of a girl by H. S. Hubbell and an interesting picture of a man in a boat in an empty space of sea and sky by Morris. By other than American painters there are a big picture by Sir Ernest Waterlow and a pleasant, quiet landscape with a windmill by W. G. E. Jansen. There are also some very good etchings and a few woodcuts in colour by American engravers.

Five little pictures by Krieghoff are very typical scenes of Canadian life, with habitants and Indians, their sleighs and their horses.

DURER CONSIDERED ROMANTICS' MODEL

Movement Sought to Revive His Qualities, Dr. Julius Held Says

When the German romantic movement of a hundred years ago discovered the early German and Flemish masters of painting, the enthusiasm centred chiefly around Albrecht Durer, Dr. Julius Held told the large audience which gathered in the Montreal Art Association lecture hall yesterday afternoon to hear the second in his course of four lectures on the art of Germany and the Netherlands. All the qualities the followers of the movement admired and wanted to revive they found in his work: simplicity, modesty, tradition, middle class contentment, and above all, Germanism, a national consciousness that had a contempt for all things foreign. But, Dr. Held pointed out, while Durer represented all these things, there was an essential dualism in his nature; in addition to having the feeling for domestic comfort, which could be seen in the St. Jerome in his study, he went through the tragic battles of genius, as was shown in his searching Melancholia.

Influenced by the humanism of his times, Durer was conscious of the visionary power of the artist as a great gift, and he painted many self-portraits. He was conscious of himself as a teacher, too, and wrote learned treatises on human proportions, on geometry in painting and on fortifications. He was concerned with skill as well as knowledge and he sought for beauty through science.

Illustrating his comments with slides on a double screen, Dr. Held displayed the master's power of expression in black and white, his careful observation, his love of nature, the trend of his development to greater monumentality, the importance of his place as a representative of German culture in the time of the Reformation.

Dr. Held, formerly of the Kaiser-Friedrich Museum, Berlin, and now of New York University, is lecturing in Canada under the auspices of the National Gallery of Canada. Next Monday, at 4.45, he will speak on Pieter Brugel and Matthias Grunewald. The lectures are open to the public.

Held Discusses Works
Of Grunewald, Bruegel

Dec. 1, '36

Matthias Grunewald, the early 16th Century German painter who was "the perfect counterpart of Durer," and Pieter Bruegel, the "pessimistic philosopher and great artist," were dealt with by Dr. Julius Held in the third of his series of lectures under the auspices of the National Gallery of Canada. Speaking in the Montreal Art Association lecture hall yesterday afternoon, he began by pointing out that Durer and Grunewald were in the realm of German art what Goethe and Schiller were in literature; they were outstanding national representatives. Yet little was known of Grunewald's life; he had been forgotten from the 17th Century until the end of the 19th; and the name applied to him was not his own.

Illustrating the characteristics of the painter by slides made from photographs of the Isenheim altar and other works, Dr. Held showed that Grunewald created in a dynamic furor of imagination. His visualization of human emotions through line and the color which he used like an intoxicating drug was tremendously arousing. In his craving for expression, he was at times super-realistic, he distorted appearances, and his passions seemed to stream unchecked.

The great Flemish painter Bruegel lived in Antwerp at a time when the city was extremely cosmopolitan and kaleidoscopic. He was a mine of factual information of the period, but he was more concerned with the lasting aspects of human nature than the accidental; he painted mankind rather than individuals. Injustice, malice and, above all the foolishness of the world, moved him; he was the pictorial parallel of Rabelais. A philosopher and a pessimist, desiring to teach, he was anxious to get down to fundamentals. He chose to paint the peasants because he found them closest to nature; with their simple animal impulses, they were open to life. At the same time, he was one of the boldest and most modern artists in his century and one of the greatest of all landscape painters. Following Durer and da Vinci, he was more successful because he was more daring.

On Thursday, at 4.45, Dr. Held will deliver the last of his four lectures on the great Northern masters of painting.

Justice Surveyor Opens Show of 60 Works by Self-taught Artist

Two years ago, Yvonne Bolduc, hooked-rug maker and self-taught painter from Baie St. Paul, came to Montreal with a collection of her pictures and was received with enthusiasm. Yesterday, Mr. Justice E. Fabre Surveyor, president of the Society of Friends of Maria Chapdelaine, accompanied by Leon Mercier Guin, opened another exhibition of Miss Bolduc's work at the Gwynne Studios, Victoria street.

This time there are nearly 60 paintings, all illustrations to Louis Hemon's story of French Canada. One of them won a third prize at the provincial exhibition this year. The Peribonka church is there, the gathering of the people after mass, la mere with her broom, Esdras and Tit-Be in the woodyard; all the characters are there, working in the fields, snug at home, sleigh-riding; and the little house is to be seen whipped by the winds and snows of the northern winter.

Miss Bolduc's work has been compared with that of Cornelius Kreighoff. She has his love of the country and the people and his eye for detail, but of course she lacks his finish and his sparkle. Nevertheless, in some of her little pictures she displays a remarkable ability for composition and for recording action, and her naivete adds to her charm.

She has sent up a small collection of rugs, and in these she is at her best.

19 Canadians Have 30
Portraits of High Quality in Salon

OTTAWA, Oct. 26.—(C.P.)—The Third Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art was opened on Saturday at the National Gallery with a greater numerical representation by Canadian camera artists than previously. The exhibition will be shown here for a month and then will be sent on a tour of principal Canadian cities.

Among the 127 exhibitors showing 184 prints 19 Canadians are represented by 30 pictures of high quality, portraits, landscapes, seascapes, architectural and natural history subjects.

Two of the show's best marines are by the noted photographer on the sea, W. R. Macaskill of Halifax. His "Starboard Lookout" shows part of a schooner's foredeck with an oil-skin-coated lookout man facing a burst of spray as it explodes overboard. His "Crooked Road" depicts a group of buildings and the rough track at Peggy's Cove, N.S., widely-known artists' resort.

Best among Canadian portraits include one of J. Vanderpant, the Vancouver photographer, by Johan Helder of Ottawa, and one of Grey Owl, Indian naturalist, by Yousuf Karsh, Ottawa professional portraitist.

CHURCH INTERIOR SHOWN

Helders, an amateur and head waiter of a hotel grillroom in his working hours, also shows a beautiful church interior, "Come Unto Me," Vanderpant, subject of Helder's portrait, has a fine architectural picture, "Spirit and Matter," apparently the south side of Rockefeller Centre, New York, with the spire of the Little Church Around the Corner in the foreground.

Among the best natural history subjects are "Pussy Willow" by Gordon M. Tranter of Calgary and "The Goldfinch" by Francis J. Wilson of Saskatoon.

E. W. Smithson of Toronto shows the only Canadian comic picture, the head of a facial contortionist with a pipe. It is "Popeye The Sailor."

Frank Halliday of Calgary has two fine prints, "Hurrying The Work," a picture of plowing, and "Fairyland," showing frost-covered trees on either side of a winter road.

Annual Art Show Open
By Bertha Des Clayes

In her studio at 1158 Beaver Hall Square, Miss Bertha des Clayes has opened her accustomed December show of paintings. While they are of varying sizes, most of them are small, painted with an eye to the requirements of the average picture-buyer. In subject, they are designed to appeal to lovers of the charming. The majority are pretty scenes of the familiar Quebec countryside—autumn foliage, wintry roads with picturesque cottages and brightly-clad children, and sleighs going through the woods. Miss des Clayes shows, too, sailboats in Nova Scotia and in Cornwall. Whether the work be in oils or pastel, she is consistently light in touch and happy in mood.

On exhibition at the same time are some of her sister Alice des Clayes' horses and several paintings by Gertrude des Clayes, portraits and flower studies. A particularly striking one is the green Gypsy caravan.

The work of the three sisters is well-known to Montrealeers and Bertha des Clayes' annual show has come to be an event for many. It will be open until December 21.

LALLEMAND GALLERY
GIVEN WARM PRAISE

Professor Lectures On Art
Collection

The collection of paintings gathered over many years by the late Frederic A. Lallemant received warm praise yesterday from Maurice Gagnon, professor of the history of art at Jean de Brebeuf College. In a lecture to members of the Societe d'Etudes et de Conferences, Mr. Gagnon paid high tribute to Mr. Lallemant for his artistic sense and for his great contribution to the cultural life of Montreal.

Prof. Gagnon conducted the members of the society through the gallery in the Lallemant house on Sherbrooke street west, pointing out and commenting on some of the outstanding pictures. The visitors were received by Mrs. F. A. Lallemant.

At the conclusion of the lecture Prof. Gagnon told of his admiration and respect for the Lallemant family.

"Mr. Lallemant," he said, "by his refined aesthetic taste, has made possible for us the supreme pleasure of artistic contemplation. This gallery of outstanding superiority is an imperishable monument to the honor of Mr. and Mrs. Lallemant and an example that stands out both here and abroad. And in their path follows in a princely and intelligent way another noted patron of the arts, Jean Lallemant."

The collection of paintings covering the walls includes examples of the various European national schools of the sixteenth to early nineteenth centuries. From the rich variety Prof. Gagnon chose a few pictures for special comment to illustrate the artistic territory covered by the collection.

He went first to examples of eighteenth and nineteenth century German painting by Antoine Raphael Mengs and Madame Adelaide Salles-Wagner. Then came picture of Cornelius Krieghoff, the German of Dusseldorf, who came later to Canada. He is represented by a work that is a copy of Rubens.

Among the others to which the Professor drew particular attention were works by the Italians, Guido Reni, Desiderio, and Pannini. He praised highly the portrait of Madame Recamier by Baron Gros the Duchess of Marlborough by Van Dyck, and portraits of men by Holbein and Franz Hals.

Greatest of all the pictures in the collection is probably "Modesty and Vanity" by Bernardino Luini, a pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, according to Professor Gagnon.

RUBENS HELD TO BE 'TRUE POET OF ART'

Dec. 4/36-

Gazette
Dr. Julius Held Says Artist
Idealized Whatever
He Touched

Just because his models were not as emaciated as the figures in a modern fashion magazine is no reason for concluding that Peter Paul Rubens' ideals of beauty were unpleasant, in the opinion of Dr. Julius Held, formerly assistant director of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum. Lecturing in the Art Association building yesterday on the great painter and diplomat, Dr. Held described him as a "true poet in art," a man whose work was not heavy, earthy and realistic, as was so often maintained, but a man who was in harmony with his times and who idealized whatever he touched. He treated the relations of the sexes with frankness and humor; he was bold, but never lewd.

In Rubens Dr. Held found a synthesis of northern and southern art, a unity of beauty and naturalness, the spirit of the classics of antiquity merged with Christianity. With his Flemish sensualism, Rubens brought to mythological figures a vitality never before known; in his painting, Arcadian idealism assumed serene reality. He saw nature as he wanted it to be, in peace and fertility. Gone was the pessimism of a Bruegel.

The biography of Peter Paul Rubens was one of the most brilliant success stories the world had ever known, the lecturer pointed out. Rubens was a favorite of the gods, but no one ever deserved this favor more or justified it better in his life and work. He had great talent and a captivating temper, but with these qualities went training and self-control, and he worked incessantly. So great was his ease of creation that his astounding works seemed mere play. He was not merely boasting when he said, "My talent is of such a kind that no commission, however big, has ever exceeded my courage."

In view of his gigantic commissions, it was not surprising that he set up his "painting factory." Students contributed most of the labor on the big pictures, but Rubens always made the sketches and retouched the finished work, and in spite of the combined authorship there was never a shade of dishonesty in his dealings.

Reference was made to the important role Rubens played, as a diplomat, in international relations, to his travels, to his family life.

By means of slides thrown on two screens, the lecturer drew attention to Rubens' fine draughtsmanship, demonstrated his debt to Michelangelo, Raphael and Titian, and showed how he diverged from the Italian masters.

This was the last of the series of four lectures on the great painters of Germany and the Netherlands, and on behalf of the Art Association Dr. C. F. Martin expressed Montreal's gratitude to Dr. Held and to the National Gallery of Canada.

Photographic Salon at the

Star Dec. 10/36

The third Canadian International Salon of Photography, arranged by the National Gallery of Canada, is now being shown in the lecture room of the Art Association, and is to remain there until the twentieth of this month. It is rather larger than either of the first two exhibitions, and is quite as good and as truly international.

Photography, on its technical side, has gone so far that the photographer can do almost anything that he wants to do, and the success of the result depends entirely on his choice of subject lighting. And there are all sorts of subjects in this exhibition. Some very good portraits are among them; a portrait of Einstein and a study of a Chinese head are two of the best, and a life-size head of an old and a very wrinkled woman and a portrait of "Grey Owl" are very good. The figure studies are good but the very important; there are some excellent photographs of animals, particularly one of two polar bears.

The patterns which wind makes snow, sand and water are also of interest to photographers, way they have supplied the subject of many of the photographs, some of the best, in this exhibition. There are also a number of photographs in which admirable use has been made of the texture of fabrics and of the play of light on wall surfaces. Good atmospheric effects have been got in some of these photographs and two of the most notable of these are of a view across the lagoon at Venice, and of cliffs half hidden by a snow cloud.

A good deal of ingenuity is shown by some of the exhibitors in choice and arrangement of subject. There is a striking effect of a man holding a white drapery, blown by the wind in front of a grey sky; another is of a scarecrow standing out against the sky, another is an under-water photograph of a pair of legs, with rising air bubbles. Patterns suited to photography have been made out of ventilator pipes, weights on a scale, scissors and all manner of more or less unlikely things, there is a quite amazing photograph of a group of undressed shop-window dummies, and there is a sprinkling of eccentric subjects, some of which make quite interesting pictures.

ARTS CLUB HONORS CLARENCE GAGNON

Noted Canadian Painter, Back From Europe, Eulogized
by Members

One of Canada's most distinguished painters was welcomed last night when the Arts Club of Montreal held a reception in honor of Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., who has been in Europe for the past 14 years. With Madame Gagnon, the artist was greeted by a large number of friends and admirers.

In the words of R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., president of the club, they came to pay homage to a man who represented Canada with distinction in Europe and brought great credit to his native land. "He has been away for 14 years," said Mr. Pilot, "but in watching his achievements and rejoicing in his successes, we have been very close to him."

He reminded his hearers that Mr. Gagnon was not only a painter of outstanding ability but an etcher who stood in the forefront and whose work was in some of the most important European collections. Furthermore, he had been the illustrator of two of the most beautiful books of the age, books—one of them "Maria Chapdelaine"—which had won the praise of the French critics and had even been the subject of a radio address in Stockholm, Sweden. He hailed Mr. Gagnon as a worthy ambassador of Canadian culture overseas and an artist whose beautiful works were an inspiration and a pleasure to the people at home.

After Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., had extended felicitations in French, William Maxwell, R.C.A., said that if Mr. Gagnon returned to France the Arts Club and a great many other Canadians would be much disappointed. In reminiscent mood, Mr. Maxwell went on to recall the old Renaissance Club and to tell the gathering that it was at his own home that Mr. Gagnon had made his first etching—in 1902, a drypoint "bigger than a visiting card but smaller than a playing card." He recalled, too, that while Mr. Gagnon was essentially a painter and etcher of landscapes, he had made life-size figure decorations for the old Princess Theatre.

During the evening, Maurice Ondere, accompanied by Edmond Trudel, gave a programme of violin solos, including some of the works of the modern Spanish composer, Joaquin Nin.

Acquisitions Enrich Art Gallery Rooms

Gazette Dec. 26/36

A number of times during the past few months, the little red ticket "New Acquisition" has gone up in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, and the community has been enriched.

To begin with the oldest things—there is a tile from one of the tombs of Old Loyang in Honan. It dates back to the Han Dynasty, about 220 B.C. Of these tiles—there is a similar one in the Royal Ontario Museum, Toronto—an authority quoted in the Illustrated London News said they were "amongst the most important archaeological discoveries that have yet been made." The tile bears the incised figure of a winged horse. Far more than 1,000 years old are the charming pottery figures of "The Philosopher and the Bird"—a humorist, if not a comedian, is this very human old philosopher—and the three musicians gracefully playing their instruments.

In a different mood is the stone mask from ancient Mexico, a realistic face, grimly cruel. The eye-sockets, now staring vacantly, were once terribly alive with shells or jewels.

There is another contrast in the lovely Madonna and Child, from northern France of the 15th Century. It is cut from Caen stone and polychromed. Unfortunately, the infant has lost his head, but the little body has been tenderly portrayed and the figure of the mother, who wears a crown, is a work of extreme delicacy.

Another acquisition this year was a polychromed walnut cabinet—Lyonnais, 16th Century—a very rich, heavy and ornate piece of furniture, with carved panels showing the salamander—a badge of Francis I—creeping among the grapevines. A collection of carved oak fragments from England of the early 15th Century was the gift of Mr. and Mrs. F. N. Southam.

Messrs. Stuart and Turner of London, England, presented the association with an English cabinet of 1765. It is a three-cornered cupboard built in the architectural manner, with columns and a foundation of bricks (carved in the pine), has three open shelves for the display of china, a tray and more shelves behind doors.

Photographs Shown At Art Galleries Gazette Dec. 9/36

Both hemispheres—19 countries in all—are represented in the third Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art now being held in the lecture hall of the Montreal Art Association, under the auspices of the National Gallery of Canada. Nearly 200 exhibits show a wide variety in subject and treatment. Sentimentality and romanticism are contrasted with uncompromising realism and semi-abstracts, but there are few fantasies and trickery is at a minimum.

Some of the prints, notably those of the Englishmen J. Dudley Johnston, Hon. F.R.P.S., and G. L. Hawkins, F.R.P.S., go a long way towards painting, and the diffused city scenes of Edward Alenius, F.R.P.S., and Robert Bagby, both of the United States, while remaining photographs, seem to be influenced, and with the pale cast of sentimentality thrown over them. It is interesting to compare the Canadian Vanderpant's skyscraper and church steeple. Mr. Vanderpant has an idea to convey—he calls his picture "Spirit and Matter"—but it is anything but sentimental, and when all is said and done the important thing is the contrast between the forms themselves—the quick-thrusting spike-shape rising in front of the massive, though remarkably light, fabric, with its slowly descending zigzag; and this could be nothing but a photograph.

Like a Japanese wood-block print is Kiyoshi Hashimoto's "Rising Sun," but "Water" by Kusutara Matsuki is strictly photographic. So are the "Silken Patterns" of Dr. Don Arturo de Carvalho, of Bombay, and the dry solid waves of R. F. McGraw's "Mud Hills, Death Valley." So are Federico Vender's iron weights; Eugene Declercq's very white china; the exaggerated forms of P. Dubreuil's upholsterer's tools; the lively texture of W. P. Grayston's Montreal pavement; Robert F. Janssens' pestle and mortar; and the hanging laundry in J. de Freitas Martins' Portuguese study.

The camera has much to offer in close-ups of nature, and there are good examples here, in the grasses of M. E. Baumberger and W. H. Bettie, Gordon M. Tranter's delicately poised gull and pussy-willow sprigs, Emilio Vidal-Ribas' astonishing shot of penguins swimming, H. W. Wagner's exquisitely lit leaves, Francis J. Wilson's goldfinch and "The Lotus" by Charles Bradley.

MANY PORTRAITS SHOWN.

Portraits are numerous, ranging from character studies like the Dickensian theatrical works of Dr. Julian Smith, F.R.P.S., Yousuf Karsh's fiddler, Albert Karplus' old woman, Jeno Denksstein's quaint child and E. W. Smithson's "Popeye the Sailor"—is it possible such a being really exists?—to the plain, rugged, far from posed of fixed-up, "Toller" by Henry E. Crawford, and the splendidly composed "Warrior" by Janssens. There are nudes, some of them beautiful in modelling and simple in expression, some of them too sentimentalized.

On the whole, the Canadians hold their own very well. Vanderpant's "Spirit and Matter" and his semi-abstract, "Trumpets of Industry" are high marks in the show. E. M. Finn's "Peace Tower" is a good clean stroke; the "30 Below Zero" of C. M. Johnston, A.E.P.S., is real winter; there is tremendous action in "The Starboard Look-out" by W. R. Macaskill; if H. F. Kells' "Salome (Remorse)" with John the Baptist's ghostly face in the background, seems a little silly, it has something to recommend it photographically. Grayston, Karsh, Smithson, Tranter and Wilson have been mentioned. Others represented are: J. W. Campbell, Montreal, tiles and a cat in the window; Floyd S. Chalmers, dinghies; H. G. Cox, child's head; Frank A. Halliday, Stanley Harrod, F.R.P.S.; Jonan Henders, F.R.P.S., a church interior, a restaurant, and a portrait of Vanderpant; N. Horton, St. Lambert, boats at high tide; J. P. Skillen, a cat; and F. C. Tyrell, a staircase— "Rhythmic Line."

NATIONAL GALLERY BUYS CULLEN WORK

Gazette Dec. 26/36

"The Valley of the Devil River" for Dominion Collection at Ottawa

Typical of the Laurentian region where he produced the work by which he is best known, "The Valley of the Devil River," by the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., has been acquired by the National Gallery of Canada, at Ottawa, from the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, where, until his death in 1934, the annual Cullen exhibitions were events looked forward to.

The canvas, just purchased for the national collection is an example of Cullen at his best—spacious in feeling, happy in composition and sound in color—and depicts a stretch of North Country with a noble hill in the distance, snowclad wooded country rolling down to the steep banks through which the Devil River winds. On the left is a bare rounded knoll based by evergreens.

The painting, done in 1927, is 30 by 40 inches and is an important addition to the section of work by Canadian painters at Ottawa.

Small 'Royal Academy' On View in Montreal

By ROBERT AYRE.

There is, so to speak, a small Royal Academy in the upstairs galleries of the Montreal Art Association just now. The 89 pictures, which are touring the country through the good offices of the National Gallery of Canada, were selected from the section of British painting arranged by the Art Exhibitions Bureau of London for the recent Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto. Academy seems to be the word because of the diversity of styles and because—though a few of them would never get past the old guard—the exhibits are, on the whole, orthodox enough.

They range all the way from such tried-and-true men as David Muirhead, William Lee-Hankey, James Kerr Lawson, Cayley Robinson and G. Spencer Watson, to David Bomberg and his private Spanish insurrection which, to the sober academicians, must seem an outrage; to Scott Nisbet and his almost grotesque street accident; to Cecil H. Lay and his harsh, child-like and spotty "Park"; and to Sir William Nicholson and his surrealism.

The latter is the nearest approach to modern extremes, and it is so modest that the most conservative could not take offence. They might wonder what possessed Nicholson to put the figure of a prancing horse inside a glass case, set two apples and a pair of gloves on top and move the thing out on the beach, but they would have to admit that result is charming.

Dame Laura Knight is here, looking like a very successful and prosperous artist in her large-spread portrait of Lamorna Birch and his two daughters. It is splendidly painted, full of assurance and gusto, and the daughters are appealing little figures—though rather uncomfortably placed for eternity—but, somehow, the picture leaves me cold.

I'd rather have Duncan Grant's vase of flowers on the old stove, or Nicholson's horse; John Nash's "Chalk Pit," with its dry, individual color, or his barges and warehouses; "Thelma," by Arnold Mason—a few strokes on bare canvas, but there you are! Bomberg's smashing, bloody landscape, or Margaret Fisher Prout's "Tea in the Garden," blazing with sunshine. They shouldn't be compared, of course, but in a variety show like this, your preferences have free play.

Sickert is here, in his well-known sketch of "King George and His Trainer"; interesting to contrast its human warmth with the intellectual portrait of Glen Byam Shaw as Laertes, by Glyn Warren Philpot.

Lady Patricia Ramsay shows a tryptich of tropical fish. Phillip Connard is represented by a fantasia "Merry England." It is crowded with carnival but, either because the color is pale, or the design is not free enough, or both, it lacks the spirit.

Outstanding among the portraits are George Belcher's Dickensian "Mourner," painted in traditional style, good, solid character-drawing; Ethel Gabain's "Red Berries," a little affected; and Neville Lewis's healthy Lady Marguerite.

A. K. Browning's "Siesta" is warm and gracious, and "The Young Rower," by L. M. Glasson, just the opposite, cool and clear-cut and springy. Gerald Kelly's poses of Ma Seyn Nu are extremely proficient. The landscapes include a decorative clean sweep of plowed hills by Rowland Hilder; an Ethelbert White sort of semi-abstract by Guy Kortright; one of White's own, from Cyprus, which seems thinner than some of his work; a lush green Wales piece by Raymond Coxon; a Vanessa Bell, a Sir Charles Holmes, two by Nadia Benois.

A few painters are interested in the affairs of people—Scott Nisbet; Gerald Cooper, who handles haying with a naive touch; L. S. Lowry, who is almost primitive in his street scene; J. Gilroy, who does an illustration of skating; Cecil H. Lay. R. Kirkland Jamieson compresses into his "Early Spring, N.W." the character of a London house.

The old creature sits entrenched in grim defiance, with a menacing respectability that hints sinister secrets.

Bernard Meninsky and the late S. J. Peploe show fine still-life studies.

An Exhibition Of Canadian Sculpture

Star Dec. 23/36

After taking due care of the painters and photographers, the National Gallery of Canada has now turned its attention to the Canadian sculptors and, in co-operation with the Sculptors' Society of Canada, has arranged a travelling exhibition, which is now being shown by the Art Association of Montreal.

As must be expected in the circumstances, most of the works which are shown are small, but there are enough of them, with a few big pieces, to make an interesting and fairly representative exhibition. Among the larger pieces are two exceedingly fine busts by Emanuel Hahn, one of Vilhjalmur Stefansson and one of Jack Miner, designed to be cast in bronze. In contrast with the strength of these is Mr. Hahn's rather smooth and tender bust of a woman in marble. There is very good modelling of a striking head in Orson Wheeler's colossal bust of a Negro, and his small study of a quite featureless figure is well composed.

Sculptors have added several new materials to those which they use. Elizabeth Wynn Wood makes a very good use of tin in several of her works; two which are very interesting—Northern Island, and Reef and Rainbow—clever arrangements of lines, almost in two dimensions. She shows some other good models in tin, and two designs in plaster, which are formal and architectural. Florence Wyle shows a gay figure of a dancing baby and a big simple head of a singing man; she has also several pieces of pottery, of which a head of an Eskimo girl is particularly good and well designed for its material.

There is much expression in the features of Henri Hebert's two busts—of Miss F. R. and of J. Murray Gibbon—and he has a very good little bronze figure of a man. Frances Loring's bust of John Pearson is good but rather massive for a portrait bust; her two small bronzes, Grief and Lamia are excellent compositions. Jacobine Jones shows two nice little bronzes of foals; Alvin Hilt's well modelled marble torso is better than his wood carvings; Stephen Trenka has a very good head of a Negro boy and some other small works in pottery and wood.

This exhibition and that of Contemporary British Painting are to be on view at the Art Gallery till January 3rd.

Contemporary British Painters

Star Dec. 15/36

An exhibition of contemporary British painting, which has been brought together by the National Gallery of Canada, opened this week in two of the upstairs galleries of the Art Association of Montreal. While it does not contain any picture of great importance, the collection is thoroughly interesting and shows the variety of independent ideas about subjects and methods which are to be found at present in British painting of the saner kind. Portraits and figure pictures are rather outstanding in it and two particularly good ones are Arnold Mason's "Thelma," an excellent sketch of a head, and another girl's head by Neville Lewis. There is a very interesting sketch by Walter Sickert of the head of King George V, at a race meeting, and rather striking portrait of a girl by Edward Le Bas; Glyn Philpot's portrait of an actor is strong, but hard and ugly. Notable pictures are George Belcher's jovial "Mourner" and L. M. Glasson's "Young Rower," a very good study of a good model. In Gerald Kelly's two portraits of a Burmese girl, the painting is very good but the subject is the chief attraction; the portrait heads are probably the most interesting part of T. G. Dugdale's picture of the Chelsea Arts Club. Dame Laura Knight's enormous picture of Lamorna Birch and his daughters is no doubt good as portraiture, but much too big for its subject.

Some of the landscapes are good but commonplace. John Nash's "Chalk pit" is a fine piece of work in its composition and atmosphere, and Rowland Hilder's exactly painted "English landscape" is a good decoration and very English. There are a number of good water colors, some of which show the return in England to the style of the tinted drawing, with its simplicity of composition and color; the drawings by Heber Thompson, Percy Lancaster and Walter Russell are among the best of these.

R. W. PILOT EXHIBITS SCENES OF QUEBEC

Paintings of Quebec scenes by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., drew a large attendance to the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, when this Montreal artist's annual exhibition opened on Saturday, and judging by the inaugural day—when the encouraging red star indicating "sold" began to appear—there is every promise that the carefully selected works will continue to attract picture-lovers and collectors until January 30, the date now set for its closing.

It is a refreshing show in subject matter and one that revives the spirits, in that it reveals the painter has not contented himself with past successes, but has struck out and gone ahead. It has been sound advance—not a departure into those incoherencies that win questionable applause and require touring lecturers to explain their meaning. The painter sees nature normally, sympathetically and, his experience broadened, with a closer understanding. Greater confidence is manifest in his touch and his handling of tone shows development.

Quebec province has been his scene of action, and in all the works shown there is evidence that his choice has not been amiss. The subjects range from the Laurentians to the lower St. Lawrence, and in them all there is sincerity and a sense of happiness in the doing.

IMPRESSIVE CANVASES.

Two large canvases in particular reveal impressive development—"First Snow, St. Agnes," and "Petit Lac," near Murray Bay. The first, shows miles of bush-clad country stretching to a range of dark mountains streaked with thin snow, undulating wooded country in the middle distance and, in the foreground, trees, bare of leaf, based by ruddy underbrush and snow that barely conceals the grass parched by autumn suns. The second, as spacious in feeling, reveals a farmer ploughing above the hollow where evergreens are mirrored in the narrow strip of water, backed by trees and vegetation rich in autumn dress that deck the rolling hills stretching to a barrier of mountains, dark against the cloudy sky. Day is waning—and man seems a very little thing.

From Murray Bay come a number of excellent works, an eminently successful one in atmospheric quality and bold composition being "The Wharf at Murray Bay"—a vessel moored at the end of the pile structure that juts out into the placid water, with its rowboats and reflections of headland. "Old Mill," with its dormer windows, weather-stained woodwork and gallery, with horse and wagon nearby, is an interesting bit solidly painted. Under strong sunlight are the church and adjacent buildings at Murray Bay, with a glimpse of river and distant mountains of luminous blue—a work that suggests sparkling light and heat. Of a cooler season is "October Day, near Murray Bay," with its vertical poplar, roadway that rises over a rounded hill, houses, and a distant hill rosy with autumn foliage.

St. Irene inspired two works—one of houses and rolling country above the broad stretch of river, and the other, with a slightly changed viewpoint, showing a sunlit foreground and the fog lifting from the river. Autumn tones glow in "October, St. Simeon"—wooded hills that drop to the water's edge, a church and buildings near the shore, and a road that scores a hill. Lower in tone is "Pointe au Pic, from Cap a l'Aigle," with its cluster of buildings below the darkening hill, mirrored in the placid water. Evergreens contrast with autumn woods on the imposing hill above the rocky shore and the waterside buildings, in Port au Percil, and a cloudy sky stretches above the river, and the church and row of houses, as seen from a rise in the road, in "St. Fidele." There is a solidly painted house, figure, fence and trees, in sunlight and shadow, called "Old Courtyard, Beauport," and gay hues mark "Autumn Gold, Sillery," with its church on the height, shore beneath and sweep of river.

Of the country nearer at home are "Early Spring, Ste. Adele"—low snow-clad hill, buildings, and curving river with thinning ice, a grey work of subtle values; "Ste. Adele," with background of misty bush, church and buildings under snow, and water-sogged ice on the stream; "View from the Shawbridge Road," with distant hills patched with bush, house and barns and a sleigh in the road; "January Thaw, Piedmont" with impressive hills and broken ice and fast water, and, over all, a cloudy sky.

"Tumbling Waters, P.Q.," typical of a hundred Laurentian spots,—hill, trees under snow, and the riven ice of a turbulent stream—is a work that should always give pleasure.

Blue shadows make patterns on the snow in "Sugar Bush, Piedmont," and there is a reminder that winter once meant plenty of snow, in "The Valley, St. Sauveur," with its glimpse of church, bush and white rolling country.

Some good pictures, older and newer, made up a collection, brought from the Cooling Galleries in London, which is being shown at the Johnson Gallery on St. Catherine Street. Two of the oldest painters represented in it are William Shayer, with a large picture of a fisherman with a child on a pony, and Sidney Cooper, with a group of cattle in a landscape, both good examples of their painters. Israels and Mauve are represented by small but very good examples, and there are an admirable picture of white asters by Fantin-Latour, a large and striking landscape of Corie Castle by Jose Weiss, and two big and two fine and very typical water colours, with figures of girls, by Russell Flint. By Le Sidaner there is an excellent picture, full of atmosphere and feeling, of some houses and the front of a church in evening twilight; by Brangwyn there is a very characteristic picture of a bridge in front of some sunlit buildings, a picture painted by Brangwyn to replace two early water colours, which he preferred to destroy.

Three pictures by a much newer painter, the London bus-conductor and painter, R. Tilbrook, more then hold their own among these works of better known men. Two of his pictures were shown here by Mr. Cooling a year ago, but the present pictures are far better in every way. There is some modern breadth and simplicity in the painting of them, and they have a quite remarkable feeling of space and fresh air. The best of them are a large one of an open landscape at Langley, with open fields, a fringe of trees and distant hills, and a group of farm buildings at Mickleham, with wooded hills behind them, both very good in light and colour. In the third picture, which is less important, a red bridge makes a good effect in a green landscape.

Among other pictures in this various collection are three good sketches by Arnesby Brown, two of cattle and one of a landscape, two excellent sketches of Dutch river scenes by Mastenbroeck, a large, clever and exactly finished picture of a Negro in oriental armour by L. Deutsch, and some other oriental pictures by R. Weiss and R. Ernst.

The Greenshields Collection

People who did not see the E. B. Greenshields collection of pictures, when it was shown at the Art Association before Christmas, have another opportunity now that many of the pictures from it are being shown at Scott's on Drummond street. Some of the best of the pictures are in this second exhibition—among them are the large "Christening" by Matthew Maris; L'Hermite's fine "End of the Day"; Corot's "La Rochelle"; the very interesting water colour of the Lake of Geneva by Turner; Lavery's night scene in Tangier; Weissenbruch's big storm picture and several of the best of the pictures by Mauve, William Maris, Diaz, Monticelli and other painters.

E. A. Corbett was elected president of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild at a meeting last night. A recently appointed director of the Canadian Association for Adult Education, Mr. Corbett succeeds Col. Wilfrid Bovey, who was president of the organization for seven years.

The rapidly increasing interest in handicraft work was touched upon by Col. Bovey. "During the past few years," he said, "the educational value of handicraft work has been recognized in a very definite way. I believe that an important part of the Guild's activities from now on will be an encouraging of handicrafts as part of our adult and formal educational system."

Mr. Corbett is leaving tomorrow on a trip west during which he will visit branches of the guild in Winnipeg and Edmonton. He will also visit British Columbia with a view to re-establishing a branch of the guild that existed some years ago.

ERNEST ALEXANDER DIES IN 75TH YEAR

Gazette Jan. 13/37

Retired C.P.R. Secretary Served Company for 43 Years

UNDER 3 PRESIDENTS

Started as Private Secretary to Sir William Van Horne
—Sir Edward Beatty
Pays Tribute

Ernest Alexander, retired secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, died at his home here last night. He was in his 75th year. Mr. Alexander retired a year ago after serving the company for 43 years, the last 19 in the capacity of secretary.

Mr. Alexander's death brings to an end a long and active career in which he earned for himself a splendid reputation as a business man of wide ability and as a citizen. His career with the Canadian Pacific commenced on March 1, 1893, when he became private secretary to Sir William Van Horne, then president of the company. He served in this capacity until 1899 when he became chief clerk in the office of Lord Shaughnessy. From 1908 until 1912, Mr. Alexander was assistant secretary on August 10, 1912, and continued in that capacity until his abilities earned for him the post of secretary of the company, which position he attained in January of 1917. He thus served directly under three of the four presidents of the company.

The importance of his work and the consideration required by railroad problems, especially in the earlier days of the company, did not prevent Mr. Alexander from making a host of friends.

Although the duties of his office kept him close to his tasks, Mr. Alexander was a warm believer in sports. He was an ardent golfer and curler.

A native of Yorkshire, England, Mr. Alexander was educated in Hamilton, Ont., where he also began his railroad career in 1882 as a clerk in the service of the Grand Trunk Railway. He was a member of the Royal Montreal Golf Club, the Royal Montreal Curling Club, the St. James Club, and a member of the Council of the Art Association.

RETIRED IN 1935.

Mr. Alexander retired from active service on December 31, 1935, the directors of the company on that occasion expressing their appreciation of his loyal and efficient service. He is survived by one son, E. Douglas Alexander, of Vancouver; by three grandchildren, Ernest, Douglas, and Sheila; by four brothers, Sir Douglas Alexander, New York, and S. H. S., and A. G. Alexander, Hamilton, Ont.; and two sisters, Mrs. Walter Gillespie, Exeter, N.H., and Mrs. George Gillespie, London, Ont.

The funeral service will be held at Wray's Chapel, Mountain street, at five o'clock Thursday afternoon. Interment will be at Hamilton, Ont., on Friday morning.

Sir Edward Beatty, G.B.E., K.C., L.L.D., chairman and president, Canadian Pacific Railway, in a tribute to Mr. Alexander said:

"Ernest Alexander for over 40 years was a loyal and efficient Canadian Pacific employee and officer whose passing we all will very deeply regret. His genial and kindly nature and his high standards of culture earned for him an unusually wide friendship among the company personnel. It was only a little while ago that he retired from active life and we all hoped he would have many years in which to enjoy a well earned leisure."

"The news of his death will be received with sorrow by Canadian Pacific people the world over."

SCULPTOR FINDS ART ONE OF LIFE'S NEEDS

Jan. 6/37 Star

Lecture and Modelling Before Art Society

It would not be surprising if there is a noticeable demand for plasticine for modelling in Montreal homes following the demonstration of sculpture in that pliable material by Madame Suzanne Silvercrucy at a largely attended meeting of the Women's Art Society in Stevenson Hall yesterday afternoon. Madame Silvercrucy, who is a sculptor of note, modelled before her attentive audience a small head in plasticine while she chatted of this and that—the need for creating beauty in life, the psychology of the artist that sees in the nude model not a human being but a human statue, "modernism" in sculpture—which she hoped was only a passing phase, the value of interesting work in relation to health and happiness, rule of relativity in sculpture, and so on, together with humorous anecdotes of sitters and experiences in the pursuit of her art.

Incidentally, the medical theory of occupational therapy received important support, when the sculptor told of how her attention had first been drawn to modelling when she had been given a box of kindergarten material to while away the tedium of illness. Her interest in her new occupation, once she had succeeded in making something that looked like her little dog, led to rapid improvement in her health, and later she attended the Yale School of Fine Art and afterwards studied in Paris and Belgium.

In the course of her lecture she spoke of the memorial to the late Queen Astrid, which she was commissioned to make for the library at Louvain. "We loved her so much," Madame Silvercrucy said. When I studied making the memorial I thought of her as the mother of the Royal children, the woman who had given Belgium two sons and had ensured the succession to the throne. The memorial group shows the eldest little girl reaching up her arms to receive from her mother the baby, while the little boy stands looking on in an attitude of protection.

Madame Silvercrucy, who in private life is Mrs. Henry Walcott Farnam, jr., of New Haven, Conn., came to Montreal nineteen years ago to make an appeal on behalf of Belgium. She remarked yesterday that she had come this time "to make an appeal for beauty in life." She spoke of art as something that makes one appreciative of beauty, conscious of the spiritual side of personality.

In the view of the sculptor wrinkles may add a certain beauty of their own to the human countenance. "We cannot do anything about the bony structure, which is inherited, but our facial expression we make for ourselves," she said, adding that if we remembered this there might be fewer "drooping mouths." Keeping the muscles around the mouth lifted in appearance of cheerfulness had a reaction on the feelings as well as the face. "An old face with wrinkles made by pleasant thoughts and kindly feelings is beautiful," the sculptor declared.

In conclusion Madame Silvercrucy urged her hearers to cultivate some form of art as a channel of self-expression. In these days of disturbing elements, art is a refuge, and "even a hobby helps."

Mrs. C. L. Scofield, president of the society, introduced Madame Silvercrucy, who was thanked by Mrs. Westcott Papineau.

Mrs. Mary Duncan Carter, assistant director of the McGill Library School, has resigned to become director of the School of Library Services of the University of Southern California, Los Angeles, it was announced yesterday. She will leave at the end of the month.

A native of St. Paul, Minn., Mrs. Carter was educated in Chicago and in the New York State Library School, Albany, which later became the School of Library Service, Columbia University. She graduated in 1923 and came to McGill in 1927 as assistant professor in the Library School. A year later, she was appointed assistant director. With the support of Carnegie Corporation fellowships in 1931 and 1932, she worked for her doctorate degree at the University of Chicago. Her thesis was "An Analysis of the Reading Situation in Montreal."

ART EXHIBIT AND SALE

Collection of Late E. B.
Greenshields to Be Shown

An exhibition and sale of the collection of the late Edward Black Greenshields will open at the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Drummond street, on Monday. The pictures, about 60 of them, were on show in the lecture hall of the Montreal Art Association in November. They are largely of the Dutch school of the 19th Century—such painters as the Maris brothers, Bosboom, Bernard de Hoog, Mauve and Weissenbruch—but Corot is represented, and Monticelli, Sir John Lavery, and the American Ryder, and there are two fine Morrisces.

Van Gogh Prints Show All Aspects of His Art

Montreal did not have an opportunity of seeing the big Vincent van Gogh exhibition which caused such a sensation throughout the United States and which concluded its tour in Toronto, but, as the next best thing, a show of Hanfstaengl reproductions has come to the city and will be on view in the Art Association print room until next Monday. Travelling under the auspices of the Museum of Modern Art, New York, it came here from Virginia and goes on to Kalamazoo.

Most of the works are familiar—the famous sunflowers, the irises, the powerful dark green flame of the cypresses, the gayly colored, almost oriental, boats on the shore and the bridge at Arles, the artist on the road to Tarascon, the portraits of Armand Roulin and Dr. Gachet, the zouave, the raw "Cafe at Night," but there are others not so well known and the show, small as it is, is complete enough to give a stirring account of the man's all-consuming emotion and extraordinary individuality.

"Vast stretches of corn under troubled skies, and I need not go out of my way to try to express sadness and the extreme loneliness," he wrote of the wheatfield and black crows, painted in the last agonized year of his life. His almost terrifying vitality is felt as profoundly in the still life of pears, in the high-keyed decoration of flowering chestnut branches, in the cloister garden of Arles hospital, in the Pieta after Delacroix, and even in the drawings. Vitality is not lacking in the landscape with a vegetable garden, but with the long horizontals, the wide distance, and the refreshing color, peace has come.

The reproductions are so faithful that a visitor to the gallery, seeing the pencil strokes in one of the drawings, could not be convinced that the work was not the original.

VIEWS REMBRANDT AS INDIVIDUALISTIC

Gazette Jan. 26/37
Dr. Julius Held Says Painter Went Own Way in Life and Art

In both his life and his art, Rembrandt, son of a miller, born into democratic seventeenth century Holland, manifested the right of the individual to follow his own way. Dr. Julius Held told a large audience in the Art Association lecture hall yesterday afternoon, when he discussed "the historic Rembrandt" as he was known from the documents. His art was individual in the most emphatic sense of the word, said Dr. Held; the absolutely personal expression of his own experience. He was the first artist to follow his personal moods and emotions to penetrate his work, and it was only by knowing the man that his painting was really understood. He painted more self-portraits than any other master, continuously studying expression, and was ruthlessly sincere in his self-observation as he recorded the changes of the years.

Much had been made of Rembrandt's handling of light and shade, Dr. Held went on, but this was only a means to an end. The secret of his art was in its twofold reality; its poetical transformation of reality and its humanization of the imaginary. The life he painted was immediate and full-favored and yet transfigured. The Amsterdam "Park Avenue crowd" like his portraits because, while they were good likenesses, they were surrounded by a halo of a more poetic life.

Rembrandt became a fashionable painter, so successful and happy that his style was influenced and for a time he was almost a Dutch Rubens. But he returned to his own road and, in 1642, when his wife died, came a turning point in his career. His contacts with society loosened. From then on, his development was rooted mainly in inner experience. His work, as a means of expression, his personal freedom, were more important to him than commissions and honors. His last years were broken by many sorrows. He was declared bankrupt, his house was sold, his paintings were disposed of cheaply, his collections were dispersed, his only son died. Yet the intrepid qualities of his character showed themselves; he displayed no bitterness; he kept his confidence in his work; he saw himself as the phoenix rising triumphant out of the ashes.

Star, Jan. 28/37

A collection of prints, which is now being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal, is of interest to students of design and to admirers of good color printing. The prints are reproductions of color patterns, mostly painted not printed, on Indian cottons, the original Calico, of the 17th and 18th century; a few are from designs but more are from photographs of the finished fabrics. They are very good examples of Indian design, with, in many cases, foreign influences—Persian and Chinese, and sometimes European; many of them may have been made for sale in Europe, and in one the design includes a more or less European coat of arms. The colors are few, as usual in Indian designs, but are used to very good purpose in patterns, very often in the form of growing trees with flowers and birds, which cover the surfaces. The original pieces are often quite large—hangings or bed covers, but there are also some garments made from painted cottons, which are in a quite modern taste. There are also a few reproductions of old printed cottons, which are as good in design and color as the painted ones, and some interesting imitations of Indian designs, printed in Genoa.

East Indies Calicos Feature of Display

While it is of particular interest to designers, anyone who follows art in its many ramifications will get distinct pleasure out of the exhibition now on view in the print room of the Montreal Art Association. It is a series of facsimiles illustrating calico painting and printing in the East Indies of the 17th and 18th centuries, a gift to Montreal by G. P. Baker, of London, the collector, and author of the book which accompanies it. The reproductions and Mr. Baker's notes make available the history and the processes of a unique art as well as giving a number of splendid examples.

These calico prints were once very popular in Europe for bed hangings and covers, frocks, hat covers and shawls, and even rugs. The colors are sometimes delicate and subtle, sometimes gorgeous in the rich oriental style, and the patterns—flowers, realistic and conventional, leaves, ribbons, vines, trees, birds—are detailed and intricate. Chinese influence is seen in some of the designs, as in that of the flowering tree emerging out of rocks, and there are also evidences of Persian styles. Ideas from the west have worked in, too. The prayer rugs are only cotton, but in color and pattern they are almost as substantial as woven wool.

The exhibition is enhanced by a block print cotton quilt from 18th century India. It was brought to Canada by Captain John McCann in 1804 or thereabouts and was presented to the association by Isabella C. McLennan. Trees bearing enormous flowers, large peacocks and small animals, make up its design, surrounded by a wide border.

A small show in the same room which has been attracting a good deal of attention is the group of 20 miniature flower paintings by Lorna Burgoyne, R.M.S., member of the Society of Women Artists, England, and associate of the Societe Nationale des Beaux Arts, Paris, who now lives in Ontario. It is an old-fashioned art, perhaps, but there is no gainsaying the exquisiteness with which Mrs. Burgoyne sets down her flowers in jewel-like color.

Star Jan. 28/37

In continuation of the series of lectures on Flemish and German painters, which he gave a short time ago, Dr. Julius Held, formerly of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin, is giving two lectures on Rembrandt at the Art Association of Montreal, and the first of these was given on Monday afternoon to an audience which more than filled the lecture room. In this lecture, called the "Story of Rembrandt's Life," Dr. Held gave an outline of the painter's life and surroundings and attached to it some account of Rembrandt's work as a portrait painter, which he illustrated on the screen with many very good slides of some of Rembrandt's pictures and drawings of himself, of his wife Saskia, of her successor Hendrickje and of his son Titus. He also brought in references to some of Rembrandt's big group portraits—the "School of Anatomy," the "Night Watch" and others, which were shown and compared with group portraits by other painters of the same time. The lecture has as much that was of interest about Rembrandt's painting as about his life. The second lecture, on "Rembrandt's artistic development," is to be given on Thursday afternoon of this week at 4.45.

Portraits by M. Maksolly

A few portraits by Maximilian Maksolly are being shown by Edmund Boden on Peel street. Professor Maksolly is an Estonian, who was, before the Russian revolution, a well-known painter in St. Petersburg and has lately come to Montreal. He has since then painted in many other countries—Austria, Szechow-Slovakia, France and England, and in Bermuda he was engaged in making official portraits of Speakers, past and present, of the House of Assembly. Among the few portraits which are being shown here there is one oil picture of a lady, a freely painted and rather striking portrait. The others are large, three-quarter length pastels. One of these, of a Bermudian man, has something of the formality of an official portrait; two others, of ladies, have more freedom and breadth in their drawing, particularly in the figure and dress of one made in Prague.

DR. HELD ANALYZES REMBRANDT'S STYLE

Jan. 29/37 Gazette
Discusses Painter's Change From Dramatic Action to Psychological Expression

Dr. Julius Held, formerly of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum, Berlin, and now attached to the University of New York, who has been lecturing in Canada for several months past, under the auspices of the National Gallery, concluded his series yesterday with an address on Rembrandt in the lecture hall of the Montreal Art Association. This was his sixth appearance in the city this season, speaking on painters of Northern Europe, and the audience was so large that even rows of extra chairs out in the corridor were not enough to accommodate the crowd. Dr. C. F. Martin expressed the association's indebtedness to the National Gallery and to the lecturer personally.

On Monday, Dr. Held outlined the life of Rembrandt. Yesterday, he made a more particular analysis of his painting, showing its development in both content and style. In his early days, Rembrandt was interested in dramatic action. This gave way to psychological expression. Then came his discovery of the powerful effect of light and shade. He made use of it as he returned to passionate action and became obsessed with dramatic story-telling. For a time, he was influenced by Rubens, seeking mastery of movement and bigness of composition. In the year of "The Night Watch," his wife died, his fortunes began to dwindle, and his art changed. It became more quiet and restrained, governed by an inner emotion.

Dr. Held demonstrated this new spirit of simplicity and deeper interpretation by comparing two versions of "The Supper at Emmaus," one done early in life and one in the painter's last years. There was a trend to a more monumental conception in both design and modelling in all Rembrandt's late work. The changes in his life and attitude could be seen in the faces of his portraits. He had always identified himself with his models and in the later years the portraits, whether of blind Homer, of Biblical figures, or of old men and women, reflected Rembrandt's own inner absorption, his sadness, his resigned wisdom, his love, forgiveness and compassion.

CANADIAN ART AND ITS RISE OUTLINED

Development of New Way in Painting Country Traced by Miss Savage

In 1910, American advertising had become a very fine art. As a result, Canadian firms were obliged to employ better types of artists. A Toronto company brought from the Old Country J. E. H. Macdonald, Arthur Lismer and John Varley, and these, with A. Y. Jackson, of Montreal, Tom Thomson, Lawren Harris and, later, Edwin Holgate, became the creators of a new medium.

The development of the new art was described in graphic fashion yesterday by Miss Annie Savage at a meeting of the Woman's Guild of Christ Church Cathedral in the parish house. In a lecture made keenly interesting not only by her comments on the pictures shown by means of lantern slides, but also by her stories of the lives of the artists.

The art of European countries, with the principal characteristics of each as reflected in its painting, was sketched by Miss Savage. Constable was "our ancestor from the point of view of Canadian painting," and from England Canada inherited love of the land, of the "good earth," she said.

Young Paul Kane's going to Paris from the little village of York, where his family had settled in 1840, his coming back and joining an expedition to the North West and there painting "The Buffalo Hunt" and "Indian Encampment," were described. Next, Miss Savage told of Cornelius Krieghoff arriving in New York from Holland and there meeting Louise Gauthier, whom he married and who brought him to her home in Longueuil.

In the transitional period between Krieghoff and 1910, art in Canada was built up and galleries were opened in Montreal and Toronto as the result of the work of Brymner, Cullen and J. W. Morrice. The new spirit dated from 1910 when Lawren Harris returned from Germany, obsessed with the desire to find a new way of painting Canada.

The development of Tom Thomson's genius was attributed to Jackson and Harris, whom he took on camping trips through the Georgian Bay country in which he had grown up. Soon the group of artists felt they had found their new medium.

Thomson's paintings after his rejection and Jackson's acceptance at the recruiting office in 1914 were shown, as Miss Savage indicated how he had contributed to Canadian painting the motive of the pine tree. It was light that interested Harris, she said, showing slides with shafts of light having patterns in the foreground. In Jackson's pictures were "the tremendous rhythms of the St. Lawrence itself." Harris brought to Canada the second prize from the Pan American Exposition for his great creative painting inspired by a scene on Lake Superior.

Mrs. Harold Stewart presided. Miss Savage was introduced by Mrs. Lionel Lindsay and thanked by Mrs. George McLeod.

Works Of Suzor Cote In Montreal Collections And Provincial Museum

No painter of this province is better known throughout Canada than Suzor Cote, whose death in Florida was announced on Saturday. Though he was above all a painter of the scenery and people of Quebec, his work found its way into many collections outside of the province and a number of his best pictures and bronzes are in collections in Ottawa and Toronto. Much of his work, however, remains here, and his native province still has the two most important pictures, in point of size at any rate, that he painted. The large "Blessing of the Sap" was bought by the Provincial Government and is now, with many other of Cote's works, in the Provincial Museum at Quebec. The other very big picture, "The Harvest," a scene of his native Arthabaska valley, with its hills and villages and a field of grain with harvesters in the foreground—is now in the collection of the painter's friend, Arthur Lallemant of Westmount.

The bronzes, which are some of the best of his works, are also admirable as illustrations of French-Canadian people and ways. The very fine bust, called "The Bishop," was given by him to the Art Association of Montreal, which has other good examples of his work. He was able to show in these little figures his love of his own people. There is one pair of figures of a man and a woman who, left all alone, were brought together by Cote as companions of their old age, and they still sit together in Mr. Lallemant's collection.

Noted Artist And Sculptor,

Quebec

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla., Jan. 30.—(A.P.)—Marc Aurele de Foy Suzor-Cote, 66, noted French-Canadian painter and sculptor, died at his home here last night after suffering repeated paralytic strokes.

Suzor-Cote came here in 1929 from Montreal after the first attack had rendered his left hand and left side helpless. He had lived here since except for a part of two winters in Havana. There and in Daytona Beach he did his last work.

Born in the Quebec village of Arthabaska, Suzor-Cote studied in Paris where he first achieved fame by winning the Grand Prix of the Salon de Paris' annual exhibit when he was 28.

After repeated successes in Europe's art capitals he returned to his native province and established a studio in Montreal in 1907. Three years ago he married Mlle. Matilde Savard who had been his nurse and companion since he became afflicted.

WAS MANY-SIDED

Suzor-Cote was a many-sided artist. He did seascapes, landscapes, nudes, flower studies, still lifes; but he excelled in depicting the French-Canadian habitant at work and at rest.

He possessed a splendid singing voice, and at an early stage in his career there was considerable doubt as to whether painting or singing should be his career.

Born in Arthabaska, Que., in 1869, son of a notary, he manifested early signs of artistic talent. His father gave him every encouragement and, in 1890, sent him to Paris to study at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, and the Julian and Colarossi academies. Four years later he was an exhibitor at the Salon, and in 1900 at the Paris International Exhibition he was awarded a bronze medal. A year later he won honorable mention at the Salon and in the same year was elected Officer de l'Academie.

He also won high regard in Paris as a sculptor. He showed his first work in this branch in 1907 at the Salon de la Societe des Beaux-Arts. His exhibit was a Canadian trapper pulling a sleigh loaded with furs.

He afterwards returned to Montreal and opened a studio here, seeking in the rural life of the Province of Quebec his chief inspiration for a long series of outstanding works of art, both in painting and sculpture.

He was elected to the Royal Canadian Academy in 1912 as associate, and as full member in 1914.

Daytona Beach, Fla., January 29. —Marc-Aurele de Foy Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., 66, French-Canadian painter and sculptor, died at his home here tonight. He came here in 1929 from Montreal, suffering from a paralytic stroke that had rendered his left hand and part of his left side helpless. New attacks the past two weeks paralyzed his right side and the great fighting power that had kept him alive for so many years slowly left him.

After coming here Suzor-Cote spent a part of two winters in Havana, and it was there and in Daytona Beach that he did his last work—some street scenes of Havana, a charcoal study of the head of Jesus on the cross, and a study in clay of a Canadian woodsman fording a stream that was to have been cast in bronze.

Three years ago he married, here, Matilda Savard, who had been his nurse and companion since the beginning of his affliction. Three brothers, Eugene, Arthur and Edward, the last named a Catholic priest, and two sisters, Miss Louise Cote and Mrs. Alice Poisson, survive. A high requiem mass will be read for the dead artist in St. Paul's Cathedral here, probably Monday. Members of his family in Montreal were advised tonight and final arrangements for the funeral will be made after hearing from them.

Though he was a painter long since "arrived", and immune from the excesses of some of the so-called "modern" men, Suzor-Cote was nevertheless an interested experimentalist in the matter of techniques, so that, except in his nudes in pastel and the bulk of his winter scenes, there was often lacking the purely individual touch which is the marked characteristic of the painter who goes his own way and is not concerned with the methods of other artists. In his portraits of habitants he had the gift of seizing and transferring to canvas the character of his sitters, and he showed great skill in rendering dazzling sunlight. He was equally at home in the use of oils, pastels and charcoal and all he did was marked by breadth and solidity.

The possessor of a fine voice it was for a time in Paris a "toss up" whether he should be a Grand Opera singer or a painter. In his younger years in Paris he met many persons who have since made their mark and among the treasured possessions in his studio in Ste. Famille street was an autographed portrait of Pablo Casals, the famous "cellist, whom he knew in his student days.

REVEALED TALENT EARLY.

Marc Aurele de Foy Suzor-Cote was born at Athabaska, Que., in 1869, the son of a notary who spared no pains to encourage the artistic tendencies which his son manifested when young. His early work showed great promise and in 1890 he went to Paris where he studied at the Ecole des Beaux-Arts and at the Julian and Colarossi Academies. Four years later he exhibited at the Salon. At the Paris International Exhibition of 1900 he was awarded a bronze medal, and at the Salon of the following year he received honorable mention. In the same year, he was elected Officier d'Academie by the French Government. He was a member of the Societe des Artistes Francaise, Paris.

His work as a sculptor was highly regarded in Paris, his first work, shown in 1907 at the Salon of la Societe National des Beaux-Arts, having a distinctively Canadian flavor—a hunter pulling a toboggan loaded with furs.

Following his stay in France he returned to Montreal where he opened a studio and applied himself to painting a variety of subjects. He found his material in the country about the place of his birth—habitants working in the fields in all sorts of weather, garnering the harvest, hewing and hauling wood, and laboring in the sugar bush. One of his most effective canvases depicted a rural custom—a priest, with attendants, blessing the maple trees. The picturesque and colorful uniforms of the French regime also attracted him and he did many historical compositions dealing with Canada's early days. He was interested in the nude which he rendered in both pastel and oil.

Some of his most successful efforts were studies of habitant types. Seeing that the auto was leading to improved roads and that this up-to-date mode of locomotion was removing the old-time isolation of back-lot farms, he was ever keen to capture material before conditions changed. He did many portraits of the old settlers—the sturdy old stock that stuck to their old dress and customs—and his knowledge made it fitting that he should illustrate Louis Hemon's famous novel, "Maria Chapdelaine" when it first appeared in modest form.

GOVERNMENT BOUGHT WORKS.

The matter of media offered no difficulties for he worked with oils, pastels, charcoal and clay. His statuettes, cast in bronze, were capital performances and for subjects he found the lumberman, the trapper, the voyageur, the hunter, the Indian women of Caughnawaga, the habitant and military types of the French regime all congenial to him. Suzor-Cote, who was elected an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1912 and a full Academician in 1914, is well represented in the National Gallery of Canada at Ottawa, among his works acquired by the Government being "Autumn Landscape, Evening," "Return from the Harvest Field," "Stormy Sea," "The Settlement on the Hillside" and "Youth and Sunlight." A number of works were also purchased by the Quebec Government.

Examples of his work have place in private collections in Europe, the United States and in Canada. "A Pastoral," exhibited at the Salon of 1898, was acquired by L. J. Forget of Montreal, and "Poachers by a Fire" was acquired by E. H. Lemay of this city, and from year to year his work, shown at the R.C.A. exhibitions or at the Art Association of Montreal, found purchasers. He also did four large decorative panels for the Virginia mansion of Thomas F. Ryan the New York millionaire, and a series of winter scenes for Mrs. Fulford of Brockville. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was among those who sat to him for portraits.

A few years ago an important loan collection of his works was shown in the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Montreal.

Watch for Looters

Viterbo, Italy, February 1.—(P)—Italian frontier guards tonight were warned to maintain an alert watch as police throughout the country sought seven ancient paintings stolen from the cathedral here.

The paintings, which represented scenes in the Passion of Christ, were part of the cathedral altar decorations. They are attributed to Taddeo di Bartolo, 14th century painter.

Police said they believed the thieves would attempt to smuggle their loot from the country. Art experts said the value of the paintings was inestimable.

There are seven scenes, which were arranged as an altar screen. They included "The Last Supper," "The Kiss of Judas," "The Crucifixion," and "The Resurrection."

Police said the works were stolen last night by a person or persons who entered the cathedral with a pass-key.

The Late Suzor Cote.

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—Your very excellent tribute to the late Suzor Cote was read with a great deal of interest by the writer who had the privilege of somewhat intimate association with Mr. Cote some years ago, occasioned by the artist's acceptance of commission to paint a life size picture of Paul de Maisonneuve.

At that time Mr. Cote's interest in painting was negligible as his enthusiasm was all for sculpture. However, he accepted the commission and apparently it rekindled his old love for painting. However, in his search for photographs or sketches of his famous subject which would give him some idea of what he would look like in life he was unable to obtain anything of an authentic nature, either in France or Canada, so he painted his subject from pure imagination. The picture was greatly admired by good judges of paintings and it hung for many years at the entrance to the staircase leading into the salon of the steamer "Montreal," but unfortunately it was destroyed when that steamer was burned to the water's edge in 1927. This was indeed unfortunate, as the painting may have eventually found its way to one of our art galleries in either Quebec or Montreal for the benefit of posterity, for by some strange imperfection of fate, the works of artists are only really treasured after the death of their creators.

Exhibition by Two Painters at Eaton's Gallery

The current exhibition at Eaton's galleries is shared by two Canadian landscape painters, Herbert S. Palmer, R.C.A., of Toronto, and Wilfred Barnes, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, each with a room to himself. Mr. Palmer, in his Ontario landscapes, has, as usual many fine effects of autumn coloring, with broad daylight and sunshine, and among them some very good compositions and studies of trees. There are two very good black and yellow pictures of maple trees, a fine, big red tree in "Lengthening shadows" and several excellent arrangements in copper and green. Even better are some of the pictures in which duller colors prevail. "Smoky weather," with its low tone of brown trees against a faint grey hill, and "Old homestead," in quiet tones of green and brown, are two very successful compositions. There are studies of summer weather too, if they are rather less conspicuous than the autumn pictures, and "Gatineau Hills," a pleasant design in greens and blue, is one of the best of these.

Mr. Barnes, as his way is, is as much concerned with skies as with the earth below, and he shows several fine expanses of broken sky with cloud shadows on the landscapes. There are three or four pictures of brilliant sunsets, ranging from strong reds to pale yellows, which stand out among the other pictures, and some more peaceful landscapes, which are quite characteristic of his work. Sea pictures are rather less usual with him, and he shows several which are very interesting—one of a sailing boat with a big iceberg, another a very good study of a steamer in fog among ice floes, one larger picture of a berg stranded off shore with a fine sky of grey and brown clouds, and a good little seascape of big waves under a bright but clouded sky with a very good effect of light on the water. A few woodland pictures, in oil and pastel, are less successful than the skyscapes.

Gazette SUZOR-COTE Feb. 1/37

The death of Marcus Aurele de Foy Suzor-Cote, French-Canadian painter and sculptor of international fame, will be universally regretted. Quebec had legitimate cause for the great pride she felt in her son, who was acknowledged to be the most versatile artist that French Canada has produced. Vocalist and musician, he could sing a song and play the cello as well as he could draw, which is to say a great deal. It was, however, by his drawings and paintings and by his sculpture that Suzor-Cote gained world fame for his name. He studied and worked abroad, to win repeated successes in Europe's art capitals. But the call of "home" became irresistible. He returned to carry on his work in his studio in Montreal for part of the year and in his native village of Arthabaska during the summer. "When I feel, I can paint," he said on one occasion. "That is the great thing—to have feeling; and always when I am in my own country and among my own people I have feeling and inspiration." Fine feeling and great inspiration are manifest alike in those pictures which depict landscapes of his own country—his snow scenes are particularly noteworthy—and in those pictures of his "own people" in which his brush has interpreted such an abundance of character in figures of hunters, trappers, voyageurs, woodsmen, and others. The passing of a master of the arts leaves an aching void today in the world of art.

Art Lecturer

ERIC NEWTON, northern art critic of the Manchester Guardian, who on Thursday evening is to give an illustrated lecture on "The Meaning of Modern Art" to members of the Art Association of Montreal. The lecture has been arranged by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

Eric Newton, B.A. (1913); mosaic artist, decorative painter; member Art Workers' Guild, northern art critic to the Manchester Guardian, was born at Marple Bridge, April 26, 1893. He has exhibited at the Paris exhibition of Decorative Art, at the Royal Academy, and is official purchaser for the Rutherford Collection, Manchester. His work has been illustrated in The Studio (decorative drawings, mosaics, etc.) Other principal works include an altar-piece at the Church of Our Lady and St. Edward, Chiswick (for Sir G. Gilbert Scott). Publications include reprints of lectures on art in The Listener, Arundel Society's Journal, while an article on Van Gogh was re-printed as a leaflet. He is also author of the book "The Artist and His Public." In 1935 he gave a series of twelve lectures for the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Eric Newton, an English painter, designer and author of books and articles on art subjects, lectured on "The Meaning of Modern Art" to the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday evening.

The Meaning Of Modern Art

Without offering any exact definition of "modernism" in art, Eric Newton lectured on "The Meaning of Modern Art" to the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday evening. He claimed for the art which can be called really modern that its chief character is freedom of the artist's expression, and that, in this, it is the continuation of a progress, which was interrupted by the, sometimes photographic, realism of the nineteenth century. His lecture, much of which consisted of explanations of the many good lantern slides which he showed, consisted largely of comparison of examples, some of the nineteenth century works were well chosen as horrid examples, though one, at least, of them was a work not of the nineteenth but of the seventeenth century. Cezanne and Picasso were shown as successors to Reynolds and Watteau, in a course which was broken by the sort of naturalism that appears in the work of Constable, Turner and Burne Jones. The symbolism of Epstein was contrasted with the realism of Michael Angelo, and Mr. Newton extended his view to architecture and poster design. His views, if they did not convince the whole of his audience, were admirably expressed. H. P. B.

Eric Newton Says Preconceived Ideas Bar Understanding of Modern Painting

Preconceived ideas of what art should be, based on the "naughty" 19th Century, which went off the track and introduced the bad practice of copying nature instead of interpreting it through symbols, are responsible for the hostility with which many people greet modern art, Eric Newton, English critic, told the members of the Montreal Art Association in an illustrated lecture last night. The influences of that period, which brought the literary and the sentimental into painting, which tried to escape from life through a false romance and which at the same time was enslaved to appearances, were still strong, he said, and today most people expected a picture to be a copy.

No attitude, said Mr. Newton, could be more hopelessly unaware of the true meaning of art. The artist, as he saw him, was a man who felt something very deeply and proceeded to symbolize that feeling, to get a message across in whatever medium he was using. He was like the little girl who explained to Roger Fry: "I think and then I draw a line around my think." This was a profound statement, the lecturer was convinced, of the position of the true artist. He departed from literal truth to get the greater spiritual truth. The people who did not like modern art objected because he did not conform to their badly founded ideas of what art should be, because they expected him to "look and draw a line around his look."

Mr. Newton reminded his hearers that artists before now had been misjudged—The Times couldn't say anything bad enough about Turner's "Temeraire"—only to prove themselves and ultimately become recognized as great geniuses. Because critics had been wrong in the past, however, did not mean that all the modern artists were great. But it would be strange indeed if a generation of artists ever arrived that went completely off the rails—he seemed to forget the naughty 19th at this point—and the modern painters couldn't all be bad.

On the contrary, he saw modern art as a return to the great traditions that began as far back as the Assyrians. Instead of copying, it worked through symbols, it had an honest respect for its material, it got strength through simplification, it faced up to its times.

Mr. Newton, who has been touring Canada under the auspices of the National Art Gallery of Canada, was introduced by Dr. J. W. A. Hickson and thanked by H. P. Bell.

Exhibition by Two Painters at Eaton's Gallery

The current exhibition at Eaton's galleries is shared by two Canadian landscape painters, Herbert S. Palmer, R.C.A., of Toronto, and Wilfred Barnes, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, each with a room to himself. Mr. Palmer, in his Ontario landscapes, has, as usual many fine effects of autumn coloring, with broad daylight and sunshine, and among them some very good compositions and studies of trees. There are two very good black and yellow pictures of maple trees, a fine, big red tree in "Lengthening shadows" and several excellent arrangements in copper and green. Even better are some of the pictures in which duller colors prevail. "Smoky weather," with its low tone of brown trees against a faint grey hill, and "Old homestead," in quiet tones of green and brown, are two very successful compositions. There are studies of summer weather too, if they are rather less conspicuous than the autumn pictures, and "Gatineau Hills," a pleasant design in greens and blue, is one of the best of these.

Mr. Barnes, as his way is, is as much concerned with skies as with the earth below, and he shows several fine expanses of broken sky with cloud shadows on the landscapes. There are three or four pictures of brilliant sunsets, ranging from strong reds to pale yellows, which stand out among the other pictures, and some more peaceful landscapes, which are quite characteristic of his work. Sea pictures are rather less usual with him, and he shows several which are very interesting—one of a sailing boat with a big iceberg, another a very good study of a steamer in fog among ice floes, one larger picture of a berg stranded off shore with a fine sky of grey and brown clouds, and a good little seascape of big waves under a bright but clouded sky with a very good effect of light on the water. A few woodland pictures, in oil and pastel, are less successful than the skyscapes.

Preconceived ideas of what art should be, based on the "naughty" 19th Century, which went off the track and introduced the bad practice of copying nature instead of interpreting it through symbols, are responsible for the hostility with which many people greet modern art, Eric Newton, English critic, told the members of the Montreal Art Association in an illustrated lecture last night. The influences of that period, which brought the literary and the sentimental into painting, which tried to escape from life through a false romance and which at the same time was enslaved to appearances, were still strong, he said, and today most people expected a picture to be a copy.

Flowers and Landscapes By Jane C. Luke

A small collection of pictures, — landscapes and flower pictures, — by Mrs. Jane C. Luke, is being shown this week and next at Johnson's Gallery on St. Catherine street. Mrs. Luke has been a frequent exhibitor in Montreal and her landscapes are familiar; there are in this exhibition a number of them, — little pictures of old houses and very pleasant places in the Province of Quebec, with some of the places in Europe. Among the Canadian pictures are a good arrangement of bright color in "Autumn" and a nice effect of light in the pastel of "October sunlight." A good street, "Petergate, York" and a dark archway with a distant landscape at Lugano are among the best of the European pictures. The flower pictures are, however, much the best things in this exhibition, and a square panel of "Dogwood and Redbud" stands out among these, — remarkably good both as painting and as a decorative design. Another picture of Phlox is almost as good as this. In the picture of Cosmos in a blue bowl and in that of Peonies and Delphiniums the flower painting is very good, but the pictures are not so successful as compositions, and in the latter there are too many other things to break up the arrangement. Several other flower pictures are also worth seeing and are far more interesting than the landscapes.

JANE C. LUKE SHOWS SUNNY PAINTINGS

Montreal Artist Reveals Ability in Landscapes and Flowers at Johnson's Quaint byways with picturesque cottages in sunlight, occupy the brush of Mrs. Jane C. Luke, of Montreal, who is holding an exhibition of her work in the Johnson Art Galleries, 1340 St. Catherine street west. Flower paintings and scenes done abroad serve to show this artist's versatility.

The oils, of moderate size, are generally good in arrangement and are painted with evident sincerity. Mrs. Luke being quite successful in suggesting atmosphere and the glitter of sunlight and warmth. "Shadows"—an old white house splashed by the shadow of a tree across the road, is attractive, as is "The Sunny Road" with its houses and poplars under a cloudy summer sky. "On the Road to St. Vincent de Paul"—buildings, a wayside cross, shadowed road and a glimpse of water, is a work that will appeal, as will the houses, barns and church in the painting called "To the Village of Henryville, Que." From Ogonquit comes "Breezy Day"—wheeling gulls and waves breaking on rocks. "October Sunlight" is a broadly handled pastel of a tree-edged road, fence, and a distant house, backed by a rolling hill.

Products of travel include "Ann Harthaway's Cottage, from the Orchard"; "Petergate, York"—old buildings in a narrow street, with a glimpse of the towers of the Minster beyond; a bit of a church as seen "From a window in Florence"; and some other Italian items.

The flower pieces reveal a decided talent for this genre, especially effective being "Cosmos," "Callendulas," and "Peonies and Delphinium." In these the arrangement is good, the color true and the bowls and vessels capably painted.

ALACE OF TITANIA IS PLACED ON VIEW

C. L. Burton, Simpson Company President, Officiates at Opening Ceremony

CHILDREN TO BENEFIT

Money Collected at Exhibition to Go to Fund for Cripples—Service Clubs Sponsor Showing

The Palace of Titania, Queen of the Fairies, was opened here for the first time in a special preview ceremony in the Robert Simpson Company store last night. As Mayor John Jenkins of Westmount, and Alderman Leon Trepanier, representing the Mayor of Montreal, gave the affair their patronage, C. L. Burton, president of the Robert Simpson Company, presented the diminutive palace to Montreal for one month during which it will be on view to provide funds for the aid of crippled children in Quebec.

Brought here under the auspices of the United Service Clubs, Sir Neville Wilkinson's famous fairy castle will open to the public today and remain here until March 6.

In his presentation address, given after an introduction by Service Clubs chairman, H. F. King, in which he expressed the clubs' pleasure at being the vehicle which enabled the Palace to visit Montreal, Mr. Burton told of the pleasure which the Lilliputian creation has brought to countless children throughout the world.

He placed particular emphasis on the humanitarian idea which led Sir Neville to devote endless hours to the building of his delicate structure. Sir Neville regretted, Mr. Burton said, that he had been unable to accompany the palace to Montreal. Since, as Ulster King of Arms, he must be present at the coronation next May to lead the regal procession, the famous architect had been unable to make the trip.

"The people of Montreal," Mr. Burton continued, "will undoubtedly give a stirring response to the beauty of Titania's Palace and to the noble idea which engendered it."

TWO CITIES REPRESENTED.

First of the municipal representatives to address the gathering, Mayor Jenkins, stressed Sir Neville Wilkinson's kindness, and thanked the Simpson Company for bringing the Palace to Montreal. Recalling the constant interest of the Rotary and kindred service clubs in working to alleviate the sufferings of crippled children, he said that physically handicapped children are "entitled to the deepest goodwill and fullest assistance."

Apologizing for the absence of Mayor Raynault, who had gone to Toronto to "get new and progressive ideas," Alderman Trepanier pointed out that citizens of Montreal could not fail to co-operate with the high motives implicit in Titania's Palace, and urged them to follow the lead of their municipal leaders both in giving the enterprise their fullest support and in enjoying its exquisite craftsmanship.

On the speaker's platform last night were the following: C. L. Burton, president of the Robert Simpson Company; R. H. King, general manager; H. F. King, chairman of the United Service Clubs; Mayor John Jenkins; Ald. Leon Trepanier; A. Lapres, president of the Rotary Club; and Douglas Taylor, president of the Province of the Quebec Society for Crippled Children.

Arts Club Exhibition By Eleven Painters

By ROBERT AYRE.

Eleven painters, most of them working in and around Montreal, are represented in one of the most interesting exhibitions of the season, at the Arts Club, Victoria street, through February 19. So individual is each one of the eleven, departing so radically from the accepted Canadian traditions, that the word "interesting" is indeed all too mild; the show is a revelation. This is not to say that they are all great painters, or that they will start new and exciting schools, but the show will come as a surprise to many who do not realize that such things are going on in their midst.

A very good reason for the public's not knowing is that at least seven of the eleven are infrequent exhibitors. Prudence Heward, Alexander Bercovitch, Sarah Robertson and Mabel Lockerby are familiar; but John Lyman seldom shows in Montreal, John Humphrey is almost unknown here, and it is not often the public has opportunity to see the works of Fritz Brandtner, Goodridge Roberts, Jori Smith, Jean Palardy and Marion Scott.

Taking them in alphabetical order, the first to be considered is Bercovitch. He shows the sophisticated decoration—flowers and a mask, with Perce Rock in the distant background—which appeared in the exhibition of flower pieces at the Watson Galleries not so long ago; and three portraits, the gentle-faced Negro girl who was in the Art Association spring show, and portraits of "Bigal, the Poet" and Moislie Leib. One of the latter is a head isolated on a gold background and the other is a figure so powerfully projected, so surrounded, that he seems to bring into the room with him the forces of an agitated world. Both are vigorously painted and extremely expressive.

Dynamic fantasy enters with Fritz Brandtner's "Scarborough Bluffs." Anyone who knows these bluffs just outside Toronto will understand that the reality was just the impetus to set this painter off on a sky-rocket flight. Crashing color and bold pattern. The pigment sings joyously in his sunflowers. Much more subdued is his design for a mural, a colored drawing of men at work. It is full of activity, in beautifully rhythmic lines, well-controlled.

The great solid body of the earth goes rolling through Prudence Heward's Shawbridge and her Piedmont picture is a rich pattern of hillfolks, colored trees and water. Never content with mere surface impressions, Miss Heward is a painter of profound integrity, a painter who both stimulates and satisfies. Her two little sketches of India children are finely realized.

STILL-LIFES SHOWN.

John Humphrey of Halifax is another whose integrity gives authority, who works from the inside. In the two still-lives in this exhibition his color is distinguished and his design sophisticated, though never tricky. One of them is splintered almost to cubism but it holds fast to reality. An admirable painter, Humphrey should be far better known.

Light, personal, almost whimsical landscapes are contributed by Mabel Lockerby. She also shows a charming decoration, "Cat and Begonia."

John Lyman, who arranged the exhibition, is represented by a nude, by two of his Laurentian landscapes—how quietly and thoughtfully he goes about it, how certainly, how inevitably, if slowly, these modest-seeming pictures work their way into your consciousness and stay there... and by a self-portrait. The latter is one of his most successful canvases. It is light in color and it gives the effect of a minimum of labor, yet it is alive. An excellent likeness, too.

Jean Palardy shows two of his happy, childlike—in the best sense of the word—impressions of country life, the haymaking scene being particularly delightful. We must see more of Goodridge Roberts. His "Three Dancers"—flat color, solid line and robust rhythm—is an original work, but his pencil and water color drawings, sensitive as they are, are hardly enough to give his measure.

Three women painters complete the list. Sarah Robertson is as lively and spontaneous as ever, with her wriggling ferns, her St. Pierre village with its spire and happy-go-lucky pointed roofs, her conventional Lake Manitou in autumn, and her "Afternoon in March," seen through a window. Marion Scott's best feature is her strong, almost classic, sense of form, demonstrated in "Construction," the study of a girl's head, an interior and a mullein plant. In the latter, the color and flannel-like texture of the leaves are a joy. A painter of outstanding ability is Jori Smith. Her portraits of "P'tit Vieux" and "Rose" are full of character, well observed, beautifully expressed, and there is strength in individual style in her nude and her "Torso and Prints."

Mrs. E. F. Bovey writes me a kind note saying that she regrets to hear from her son, Lt.-Col. Wilfrid Bovey, that I am laid up in hospital. It seems that her son is in the habit of reading these columns, and that he thought I should be interested in part of a letter from her daughter which she happened to read to him the other day. The daughter is married to an official of one of the Indian railways, and the letter deals with the effect of the Purdah system on its high-caste victims. The lady writes: "We have just had a lady-doctor from the Multan Mission Hospital staying with us for a few days. She told us a pathetic story about one of her first cases in India. She came out to Multan soon after finishing her medical training and is one of those fair smooth-faced women who look even younger than their age. She had only been at the hospital for two or three weeks when a wire arrived from the Maharajah of a neighbouring Native State for a doctor to go to see his sister. The senior doctor could not go, so Dr. Blank was sent and, as she could only speak a few words of the language, the hospital matron was sent with her. They arrived at Bahawalpur (pronounced Balpur) about 2 a.m. and were met by the State physician and the State grand vizier. They conducted her in a carriage to a large house and said it was the State Rest House where she was to sleep. She, thinking of the telegram that had brought her by the first train, said, 'But what about the patient?' 'Oh, not tonight,' they answered, 'plenty of time in the morning.' She thought this rather funny, but, after some argument, was finally convinced that she could not possibly see her till the morning. Then they asked what time she would like her tea in the morning? Still thinking of the patient, she suggested 6.30. 'Oh, no, that is much too early, 8 o'clock will be ample time.' Finally she said she must have it at 7.30 and they agreed, but at 7.30 there was no sign of tea, which finally arrived at 8.30 and it was not until nearly 10 that she was conducted to the Palace. At the Gate House they all had to stop and telephone to the Palace and ask if they were allowed to proceed and the Maharajah gave his gracious permission. It turned out that he had not waked until nearly 10, and until he woke, the gate could not be opened and no one could enter in case they disturbed his slumbers even though he had wired for the doctor for his sister! As they went towards the women's quarters there were high walls and sentries in every direction. By ones and twos the little lady doctors' escort had to fall back until at the outer door of the harem the State doctor could go no further. He had meanwhile been telling her about the case: 'Of course,' he said, 'I have not seen the patient, but from what the women have told me, I think she may have bronchitis. It might be malaria or it might be sandfly or it might be phthisis. She has been ill about a month and I thought that perhaps a lady doctor should now come and see her.' Dr. Blank then went inside and a woman appeared and took her to see the patient.

She was a girl of about 21 and surrounded with thick curtains, draperies and no windows and no air. The doctor said it was quite obvious what was the matter but, having gone over her with a stethoscope, she decided she was too quick and they would think she could not be doing her job. So she started again with another stethoscope and went all over her again. Then the girl asked pathetically, for 'good medicine' and she gave her the strongest mixture of innocuous things she could think of and then went out to talk to the state doctor. She said: What she needs is to go up to a Hill station for good air. Oh, but that is quite impossible. She can never leave these walls. Well, then, put her in a walled garden. No, that is equally impossible. She is very high class. She cannot go out. Well, then have the Maharajah's band to come and play and amuse her. No, that could never be done. Well, give her the best gramophone that can be bought so that she can amuse herself. And that seemed all that could be done. Isn't it pathetic? I must go out and thank Heaven that I was not born a Purdah woman.

I sympathize. At the moment I cannot get out, but I can have my windows open. I have discovered that even though the greater part of one leg has been removed an attack of sciatica can start from the phantom heel as the doctors call it, and shoot all the way up the missing leg like toothache at intervals. Also I have a radio to amuse me which makes a shattering noise that is supposed to be music. Still, I can have visitors who can come and pass the time. My conversation is punctuated with outbursts of smothered profanity which helps to pass the time and improves their vocabulary. I am glad I was not born a Purdah woman.

THE GAZETTE

Feb. 16/37 Gazette Etchings Are Shown By British Artists

Under the auspices of the National Gallery of Canada, an exhibition of unusual interest is now being held in the Montreal Art Association gallery—200 etchings by the distinguished British artists, Augustus John, R.A., and Gerald L. Brockhurst, A.R.A., R.E. It is said to be one of the finest collections of their etchings in existence; certainly it is the finest that has ever come to Canada, and well it will repay prolonged study.

Mr. John shows 105 works, many of the subjects appearing in several states; there are prints from five plates of the William Butler Yeats portrait; and students will be interested in seeing impressions of several plates after cancellation. In portraits of himself (looking like an apostle or an Old Testament prophet), of such men as Yeats, Epstein, and Sir William Rothenstein, of Gypsies and old men, women and children, John shows himself a master of characterization. No squeamishness stands in his way when he comes to do a likeness and his sense of the comic usually adds a fillip. The portraits of Charles McEvoy and of "Gwendolen" may not be flattering but they are human. John is all alive, swift and spontaneous, but completely sure, and there is no question of the Rembrandt quality in much of his work. In addition to the portraits, there are figures and groups—"The Hawker's Van," "Dartmoor Ponies," "The Little Camp," "Quarry Folk" and so on—that are richly reminiscent of John the painter.

None the less alive are the portraits by Mr. Brockhurst, but where John is racy in his line Brockhurst is incredibly exquisite. In "The Black Silk Dress," the portraits of his wife, of "Dorette," "Casper," James McBey and Henry Rushbury, he carries the craft of etching to a place no one else has attained. His figures become sculptural, modelled with extreme subtlety, and the impressions have a depth and color like nothing so much as his own meticulous oil paintings on wood. While there are several studies for decorations in the 91 examples of Brockhurst's work on view in this collection, most of them are portraits.

About two hundred works by two British etchers, Augustus John and Gerald Brockhurst, — have been brought together by the National Gallery of Canada, with the help of Mr. Brockhurst, and the collection is now being shown in one of the upstairs galleries of the Art Association of Montreal; it makes an exhibition which should not be missed by any one who is a lover of etchings or practises the art of etching.

The etchings are all from fairly small plates and all are portraits or figure studies, and they show interesting resemblances and differences between the work of the two men. Many of the prints shown are of more than one state of the same plate and some of as many as four states. In more than half of John's etchings only one state exists and only a few of them are later than a fourth state. This is true also of Brockhurst's earlier works, but among the later ones there are many eighth and ninth states and one a print of a thirteenth state.

John practised etching for a fairly short time, and many of his etchings seem to have been experiments; some of the prints shown are from plates which have been cancelled with scratches. In many cases they are admirable and very simple drawings, in which a great deal is said, sometimes with only a few lines. Brockhurst has occasionally, like John, been content with two dimensions, but in most of his work he aims at three dimensions and most of the work done on later states of his plates is stippling to bring heads and figures into greater relief. In one or two of his etchings this working up has perhaps been carried too far. The collection contains many very good prints and makes an excellent display of modern etching methods.

The designs for oriental painted cottons are still in the print room of the Art Gallery and there have been added to them two examples of printed cottons, belonging to the Art Association. In the same room there is a small collection of miniature paintings of flowers by Lorna Burgoyne, R.M.S., which are very pretty in their design and color.

A. T. Galt Durnford Suggests Participants Include Handicrafts in Re-decorating Designs for Homes

A proposal to affix a "hall-mark" of quality to handicrafts as a protection to the public against inferior work, together with the suggestion that Home Improvement Plan participants include handicrafts in their redecorating designs were major features of reports presented yesterday at concurrent annual meetings of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild and the Quebec Provincial Branch of the Guild at Dominion headquarters, 2019 Peel street.

The hall-mark, urged in the report of A. T. Galt Durnford, Quebec president, would be applied only to articles conforming to certain minimum standards of quality and workmanship. Mr. Durnford further saw the Home Improvement Plan as a golden opportunity through which to stimulate the production of handicrafts and at the same time to assist the hard-pressed rural workers who monopolize the market. He stressed the value of handicrafts as decorations.

Increasing interest throughout the west was reported by E. A. Corbett, elected president of the Canadian Guild yesterday to succeed Col. Wilfrid Bovey. Mr. Corbett, recently returned from an extended tour of the western provinces, found that they were following the examples of the older eastern area in turning out artistic hand-made products.

Colonel Bovey, in appreciation of the work he has done for the Guild, was presented with a carved black slate totem pole.

Other reports indicated that sales in the Guild shop here, which is an outlet for handicrafts from workers throughout the Dominion, showed satisfactory increases over previous years.

Announcing the patronage of Their Excellencies the Governor-General and the Lady Tweedsmuir, the Canadian Handicrafts Guild proceeded to elect the following to office for 1937: Dr. C. F. Martin, honorary president; Mrs. James Peck, Montreal, R. C. Wallace, Kingston, G. J. Trueman, Sackville, N.B., honorary vice-presidents; E. A. Corbett, president; A. T. Civic Art Exhibit.

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—Although the official opening date of "The Montreal-in-Art Civic Exhibition," sponsored by the City Improvement League, is still distant, there is, nevertheless, a valid presumption that the intervening time will, as usual, fly by quickly. The preliminary organization will certainly be time-consuming. The League, through its Citizenship Committee, has given itself about eighteen months to make the preparations. If it gets the desired collaboration from public and private organizations, and from the public leaders and private citizens, as well, the opening should be as scheduled. A considerable amount of "spade-work" and "missionary work" has been done by the League, but much remains.

This Civic Art Exhibition is intended to describe Montreal and District pictorially and "selectively" under the French, English, and Canadian Rule. In general, it will comprise four main divisions: (1) Paintings of old and retrospective Montreal; (2) modern and contemporary paintings; (3) oil portraits and sculptured portrait busts of notable Montreal citizens; and (4) etchings, drawings, prints, and photographs. At a conservative estimate, there will probably be about 500 items on view. It will at once be seen how important will be the selection of works of artistic merit. The success of the show will also depend upon the ready response for art loans given to it by owners of private art collections. For instance, the core of the exhibition could be built around a loan of the historic municipal art collection of the Corporation of Montreal, or around Kriehoff's paintings of the Montreal scene, in possession of prominent local families. Among the objectives of this letter, is to place before interested, public-spirited citizens the worthwhileness of the exhibition as a timely, practical, concerted effort in educational "civility" and in instructive "civic appreciation." The moral support of the entire community is an essential prerequisite. Another objective is to call upon those who wish to make loans of paintings and other civic-art works of quality to communicate with the League, expressing their desire to so collaborate. The League sincerely hopes that the collaboration forthcoming will be both great and sustained, so that the credit for the success of this civic project will redound to all the citizens, French-speaking and English-speaking, in this community and in Greater Montreal. Letters with offers and suggestions as to sources of loans, from artists, individual owners, or corporations, may be mailed to—and will be gratefully appreciated by—the sponsors: The City Improvement League, Room 52, 980 St. Antoine street, Montreal.

A. J. LIVINSON,
Chairman, Citizenship
Committee of the League.

New Exhibitions

Ladies in wimples, gentlemen in armor, churchmen in vestments, most of them with their hands piously uplifted, palms together, are the subjects of an unusual exhibition in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. It is a collection of brass rubbings, made in English churches about 65 years ago, by Rev. Archibald Longhurst, and loaned by the library of McGill University.

Among the personages are Aphra Hawkins, who "departed this frail life" on January 16, 1605, and Thomas Hawkins, who died in 1587 at the age of 101. Most of the rubbings are from 16th Century brasses.

Beautiful in their stylization and line, they also have a great historical interest and ought to be valuable to students of costume.

Several books on monumental brasses are on display and a charming original brass from a 15th Century tomb—seven daughters in a row—loaned by F. Cleveland Morgan.

TANCREDE AT EATON'S.

Robert Tancrede, French painter, who is artistic director of the Catholic Museum in Montreal and who executed the copies of the murals in the Catacombs of Rome, is holding a show in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company. Occupying two rooms, the exhibition gives a good idea of his individual style and scope.

While he shows some landscapes, made in both Europe and Quebec—Gaspé and the Laurentians—Mr. Tancrede seems happier when he is painting buildings. His best quality is his sense of structure and his dry flat color is an asset in this. A feeling for the picturesque and dramatic in architecture is displayed in crowded Paris streets and Spanish bridges and walls, but he never lets these tendencies run too far away with him. New York and Montreal skylines should have a particular local appeal.

The exhibition may be seen until Saturday, March 13.

THE STYKA BROTHERS.

An exhibition of the works of Adam and Tade Styka, European landscape and portrait painters, now showing in Toronto, will open in the Eaton Fine Art Galleries, March 15.

DR. C. F. MARTIN, elected president of the Art Association of Montreal, succeeding H. B. Walker, who held the office for eight years.

DR. MARTIN NAMED ART GALLERY HEAD

Gazette March 9/37

Succeeds H. B. Walker, Who Has Held Office for Eight Years

On the retirement of H. B. Walker, who held the office for eight years, Dr. C. F. Martin was elected president of the Art Association of Montreal at the annual meeting yesterday. W. B. Blackader, treasurer for the past eleven years, also retired and was succeeded by G. W. S. Henderson. Mr. Walker was elected honorary vice-president and Mr. Blackader honorary treasurer, thus remaining members of the council.

Other officers were chosen as follows: Honorary president, Right Hon. Lord Atholstan; vice-presidents, Dr. C. W. Colby, Dr. J. W. A. Hickson; members of council, for three years: D. Forbes Angus, Philip S. Fisher, G. Alfred Morris, Howard Murray, O.B.E., Professor Ramsay Traquair, Dr. F. M. G. Johnson; for two years: R. W. Reford, Miss L. Adaline van Horne becomes a governor. The late Mrs. Charles Meredith and the late William G. Cheney were added to the roll of benefactors.

In his annual report, the retiring president expressed the association's gratitude to Mr. Cheney and others who had made bequests or given gifts, spoke of the exhibitions and lectures, paying particular tribute to the National Gallery of Canada for its assistance, and referred to the increasing enrolment in the art classes.

Mr. Blackader's financial statement showed a deficit of $3,952, which was $250 greater than that in 1935 but $100 less than 1934. Receipts last year totalled $19,920 and disbursements $23,872. In the previous year the figures were $19,020 and $22,728; and in 1934, $19,915 and $23,968. Among the gifts acknowledged was a special donation of $1,000 from Miss van Horne. Annual subscriptions totalled $12,100 last year, $12,432 the year before and $11,722 in 1934.

In the absence of Arthur Browning, who is in California, Mr. Henderson read the report of the chairman of the executive committee, on ways and means. The sustenance fund, Mr. Browning indicated, averaged $4,000 annually but it had fallen far below the average in the last few years, and he appealed for more assistance.

Acknowledgement was made of the presentation to the gallery of a portrait (Mrs. Ichabod Wright) by Sir Thomas Lawrence, P.R.A., and of six Florentine bronzes of the 16th Century, by the late Mrs. Charles Meredith.

F. Cleveland Morgan, convener of the museum committee, reported additions to the museum, including Peruvian fabrics of 800 A.D.; a Chinese pottery figure dating from the Northern Wei dynasty, 386-557 A.D.; English Gothic woodwork, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. F. N. Southam; a pine corner-cupboard, given by Stuart and Turner of London; a French Renaissance cabinet and a rondel of French stained glass, 12 Century, gifts from Miss Mabel Molson; a Luristan bronze cup, 800 B.C.; a stone mask from Mexico; and a 15th Century madonna and child of polychromed stone, given by J. W. McConnell.

Art Association Meeting

The annual meeting of the Art Association of Montreal will be held at the Galleries on Sherbrooke street west at five o'clock this afternoon. Election of officers and council for 1937 will take place.

ROBERT ADAIR

STROKE IS FATAL TO ROBERT ADAIR

Well Known Business Man
Dies At Age Of 72
Years

The death took place early this morning of Robert Adair, president of the Hartt & Adair Coal Co., Ltd., who had been for over half a century connected with the commercial life of Montreal, and was a director of several important financial organizations. Mr. Adair suffered a stroke ten days ago and was taken to the western division of the Montreal General Hospital, but did not respond to medical treatment. He was in his 73rd year.

The funeral service will take place at the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul, Sherbrooke street, of which Mr. Adair was a member and a former trustee, on Saturday at 2.30 o'clock.

Robert Adair was born at Rutherglen, Scotland, on August 11, 1864, the son of the late Robert Adair, merchant, and Anne (Shearer) Adair. He was educated at Hutcheson's Grammar School, Glasgow, and when he was 19 years of age came to Canada. In May, 1883, he began as clerk in the coal office of the late George F. Hartt, and learned the business thoroughly. In 1909 he became principal owner and president of the firm, and remained in that position up to the time of his death.

ART SOCIETY HAD SUCCESSFUL SEASON

Membership and Interest
Well Maintained

Membership maintained at the same number for the past two years was noted in reports at the annual meeting of the Women's Art Society, held in Stevenson Hall yesterday afternoon, under the presidency of Mrs. C. L. Scofield. The program, which had made the season a successful one, including a wide range of lectures on various phases of the arts, was reviewed by the secretary, Miss Ethelwyn Bennet, and the large volume of correspondence was indicated by Mrs. J. C. Beswick's report.

The financial statement showed total receipts of $3,482, and a balance of $952. Grants during the year included $50 to the Art Association, $50 to the Montreal Orchestra, and $15 to the Children's Library.

Mrs. R. M. Mitchell gave the report of the studio group, which comprised seventeen members, classes having been held for almost five months, under instruction of A. Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A. Seventy-two pictures were shown in the annual studio exhibition. The outdoor sketch class, under direction of Miss M. Sanborn, had a membership of fourteen in the Spring and ten in the Autumn. Mrs. W. Boyd Campbell gave the library report.

In connection with the report of the administration of the soldiers' fund of the society, for the men at St. Anne's Military Hospital, who are visited weekly and are given special treats on anniversaries, sympathy was expressed with the convener, Miss Hay Browne, in her serious accident. An exhibition and sale of handicrafts made by the ex-service men was held before the meeting.

Officers elected for 1937-38 are: President, Mrs. C. L. Scofield; first vice-president, Miss Isabel E. Brittain; second vice-president, Mrs. W. J. Armstrong; recording secretary, Mrs. L. H. Miles; corresponding secretary, Mrs. G. D. Pratt; treasurer, Miss Jennie Eveleigh; members of executive, Mrs. W. Boyd Campbell, Mrs. A. O. Dawson, Mrs. R. J. Durlley, Mrs. W. M. Ford, Miss H. M. Gray, Mrs. R. F. L. Picard, Mrs. C. A. Richardson, and Mrs. R. R. Thompson.

Interpretation of Will Sought in Court Action

Case Involves Testament of Mrs. Charles Meredith Who Left Estate of $2,500,000

A QUESTION of interpretation of a holograph will and of the ultimate disposal of a part of the estate of the late Mrs. Charles Meredith, who died on June 24, 1936, leaving an estate valued at approximately $2,500,000 was presented to Chief Justice Greenshields in the Superior Court this morning. At the hearing this morning the facts of the case were admitted and the questions were submitted to the court only on points of law and the interpretation of the will, written by the late Mrs. Meredith in her own handwriting on stationery bearing her private address at Senneville.

CLAUSE TO BE CLARIFIED

Chiefly involved in the case is the interpretation to be placed on a clause of the will which reads, "The rest of my estate to be divided equally between my brothers and sisters or their immediate heirs, including my sister Edith's family, and between my husband's, Charles Meredith's nieces' and nephews' immediate heirs."

In the statement of facts offered to the court it is pointed out that the estate left by Mrs. Meredith was derived, one-half from that of her late father, R. B. Angus, and one-half from her husband, Charles Meredith. Obviously, His Lordship was told, in making her will Mrs. Meredith was actuated by a desire to turn back to the Angus family the half of the estate which had been derived from it and to give over to the Meredith family the part emanating from it. Brothers and sisters of Mrs. Meredith were D. Forbes Angus, William F. Angus, D. James Angus, Mrs. W. W. Chipman, Mrs. R. McD. Paterson, Mrs. C. F. Martin and Mrs. F. L. Wanklyn, the last named having predeceased the testatrix.

In the will, it was pointed out, Mrs. Meredith passed over one surviving brother of her late husband, Thomas Graves Meredith and started the succession with her late husband's nieces and nephews. These nephews and nieces, who are defendants in the present action are Mrs. James D. Thornburn, Mrs. G. A. Peters, Miss Mary Meredith, John Stanley Meredith and Thomas Redmond Meredith. The estate of another nephew, Edmund Meredith, jr., now deceased is represented in the proceedings by the Royal Trust Company.

LEGAL QUESTION

The legal question raised by the proceedings is whether Mrs. Meredith meant by her will to restrict the bequest going to the Meredith side of the family to nephews and nieces of her husband who were living at the time of her death or whether the children of other nephews and nieces who had predeceased her would share in the Meredith half of the estate. Plaintiffs in the case are the latter group, consisting of grandnephews and grandnieces of Charles Meredith, who are at the same time children of his nephews and nieces who died before Mrs. Charles Meredith.

Solution of the problem, His Lordship was told, depends on the legal interpretation to be placed on the two words, "immediate heirs," appearing in brackets at the end of the phrase in the will, "my husband's nieces and nephews, (immediate heirs). For the plaintiff grandnephews and grandnieces, it is suggested that what Mrs. Meredith meant to say was that the half of the estate should go to her husband's nephews and nieces or their immediate heirs, in the same manner as she had provided for the heirs of her brothers and sisters in the earlier clause of the same paragraph of the will. That interpretation would take in the children of deceased nephews and nieces.

HOLD BEQUEST LIMITED

The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the words in brackets are descriptive of the words, "nephews and nieces" appearing immediately before them, and that on that interpretation the bequest was limited to nephews and nieces then surviving. From the fact that Mrs. Meredith put the two words, "immediate heirs" in brackets in referring to the Meredith side of the family, it was obvious, they suggest, that she intended to give a different meaning to them than she had done in the case of her own side of the family, when she said, "my brothers and sisters or their immediate heirs."

In short, the Court was told, the plaintiffs suggested that the word, "their" should be read along with the words, "immediate heirs" and the defendants claimed that the word "his" should be read in at the same point. Judgment was reserved.

George H. Montgomery, K.C., and W. F. Chipman, K.C., are acting for the plaintiffs and F. E. Meredith, K.C., and George A. Campbell, K.C., for the defence.

Surgeon-in-Chief

who, at today's meeting of the executive committee of the Board of Governors of the Royal Victoria Hospital, was appointed to succeed the late Dr. Scrimger. The committee also passed a resolution of deepest regret over the death of Dr. Scrimger, and greatest sympathy for his family.

MCKENTY CHOSEN FOR HOSPITAL POST

New Surgeon-in-Chief Is Graduate of McGill University

Dr. F. E. McKenty was today appointed to the position of surgeon-in-chief of the Royal Victoria Hospital following a special meeting of the executive committee of the board of governors of that institution. The position which he fills was made vacant recently by the death of Dr. Francis A. C. Scrimger.

Dr. McKenty, who is also assistant professor of surgery in the faculty of medicine at McGill University, was born at Bath, Ontario, in 1881, and he received his early education in the town of his birth. Entering McGill University in 1900, he graduated in 1904 with honors, receiving the degree M.D.C.M. He then entered the Royal Victoria Hospital as interne for two years, serving under the late Doctors Bell and Garrow. Finishing his internship, he went to England and, one month after arriving, wrote his conjoint examination, receiving the degree of M.R.C.S., and L.R.C.P. Four months later he took the primary and final fellowship examinations of England and obtained the F.R.C.S. degree.

STUDIED IN GERMANY

He then went to Freiburg, Germany, where he studied pathology under Professor Aschoff.

Leaving Freiburg, he went to Berlin where he remained a year studying surgery under Professor Bier and pathology under Professor Pick. After continuing his studies in Vienna and Paris, he returned to America and visited the various clinics in the United States. He began his practice in Montreal in 1909 the first years of which were spent mostly in research and laboratory work.

In 1909 he was given a position as clinical assistant in surgery at the Royal Victoria Hospital and was the first to introduce spinal anaesthesia into the Royal Victoria Hospital, having had considerable experience with it while working under Professor Bier in Berlin. He also was instrumental in spreading the use of intravenous saline in certain diseases. He contributed articles on blastomycosis, actinomycosis, tumors of the appendix, Paget's disease of the breast, the embryology of the neck and tumors of the neck, and on the treatment of surgical tuberculosis with reference to tuberculin. In the same year, he was appointed demonstrator in anatomy at McGill, which position he held for five years. He also lectured during the same period in operative surgery and applied anatomy.

WAR SERVICE

During the war, after spending sometime in England, he went to France and served in the base hospital at Treport five months and with the McGill unit at Boulogne for six months. On his return from the war, he was appointed associate in surgery; a few years later he became assistant surgeon; finally, three years ago, he was appointed surgeon. In all these several positions he was actively engaged in teaching clinical surgery, and during the past four years he controlled all the fourth year teaching in the Royal Victoria Hospital.

Dr. McKenty is also a Fellow of both the American and Canadian College of Surgeons. Last year, he became assistant professor in surgery at McGill.

A resolution was also passed by executive committee, offering the sincere sympathy of the board of governors to Mrs. Scrimger and the family, at the "great loss sustained by this institution and the community at large in the death of Dr. Scrimger." The latter was associated with the hospital for a period of over 32 years, holding the position of surgeon-in-chief at the time of his death.

WARDEN'S PICTURE UNVEILED AT R.V.C.

Presentation Made to Mrs.

Walter Vaughan at

Ceremony

COLLEGE KEEPS GIFT

Tributes Paid on Behalf of Alumnae, Governors and Faculty of McGill University

Women graduates of McGill yesterday placed in the perpetual hall of honor of their university another of the distinguished figures in its history when they unveiled and presented a portrait of Mrs. Walter Vaughan, the retiring warden of the Royal Victoria College.

In the presence of members of the McGill Alumnae Society, of the Board of Governors and of the faculty, the portrait was given to Mrs. Vaughan, who in turn presented it to the college. The portrait hangs on the north wall of the college drawing room.

Mrs. John Rhind, president of the Alumnae Society, recalled Mrs. Vaughan's long association with the university, first as a graduate of the class of 1895, when she received the B.A. degree, gaining her M.A. in 1897 and later being appointed to the staff of the English department. In the year that the Royal Victoria College was opened, Mrs. Vaughan, then Miss Susan Cameron, became resident tutor, Miss Hilda Oakley being the warden. When Miss Oakley returned to England, Miss Cameron remained as assistant with Miss Hurlbatt. Married in 1918, she returned to become warden in 1928.

As a student, a graduate, a lecturer and as warden, Mrs. Vaughan gained the deep admiration and affection of all with whom she came in contact. Mrs. Rhind said, as she spoke of the years students had spent with her, when her profound knowledge of English literature, her eagerness and willingness to share with others had come to be qualities which they would always associate with her name. Mrs. Vaughan's personal charm, her ability to think clearly and speak freely had been of infinite value to all who passed through the halls of the college.

When a "tangible reminder" of her association with the university was planned, response came from every province of Canada and from many states of the American Union, said Mrs. Rhind. Paying tribute to "what you have done for this college and for us," Mrs. Rhind expressed on behalf of the Alumnae Society the hope that she would now be "free to do those things that we have not allowed you to do in the past," that she "would no longer be disturbed in the middle of your favorite book," and that the doing of those things would not take her too far afield.

The portrait then was unveiled by Miss Georgina Hunter, a member of the first class of women to receive their degrees from McGill, in 1888, and the first president of the Alumnae Society. Miss Hunter performed the ceremony in place of Lady Drummond, the honorary president of the society, who was unable to be present. Miss Hunter also spoke of Mrs. Vaughan's contribution to the university and to the Alumnae Society.

REPLY BY MRS. VAUGHAN.

The Alumnae Society had taken a very subtle means of "laying a ghost" which otherwise might haunt the college and the next warden, by setting up an image, said Mrs. Vaughan.

"I am quite clear in my own mind that the Alumnae Society of this university is the most remarkable institution known to man or woman," she declared. "I find it difficult to think that any other organization can do what this organization has done—to take hold of a person born for some mysterious reason . . . absolutely uninterested in organizations of any kind; like Kipling's cat, walking alone, full of the instincts of the anarchist; and make it a member at the earliest possible moment—when the university has declared it has done its best to educate that individual."

"We pass over nearly half a century and find that hapless individual not only still a member of the Alumnae Society but with a record of having attended the monthly meetings regularly . . . having endured those inexplicable institutions of president, treasurer, secretary with minutes of meetings—all utterly antipathetic to the anarchic person." Mrs. Vaughan, amid the laughter of the gathering, declared that the story would go on as "I am a life member!"

The Alumnae Society "is an institution full of extraordinary activities and a most extraordinarily generous society," she commented. "They perhaps hardly know what they have done in giving me this very generous gift. They have perhaps taken a very subtle means of laying a ghost . . ." She asked the college to accept the portrait.

Dr. C. F. Martin, on behalf of the Board of Governors, spoke of the feeling of sadness on the part of all who knew Mrs. Vaughan at the thought of what her going would mean to the college. With the deep sense of loss was coupled that of "the triumph of her achievement." The portrait, he said was a very graceful tribute to an able teacher, a distinguished administrator, one whose qualities "inspired respect and admiration and, of course, affection," and its significance was very great.

Tribute from Mrs. Vaughan's colleagues was paid by Prof. Rene du Roure, head of the department of French language and literature. In dealings with Mrs. Vaughan, "we found sense of humor, great sympathy and great encouragement, and it was a great inspiration to my colleagues and myself. We are glad to have this likeness of her, but we do not need it to keep her in our memories, in our minds, in our hearts."

The brass plate on the portrait, executed by Kenneth Forbes, R.C.A., is inscribed: Susan Cameron Vaughan, M.A. (McGill), lecturer and associate professor in English 1899-1918. Warden of the Royal Victoria College 1928-1937.

An Exhibition Of Pictures by Homer Watson

The collection of pictures by the late Homer Watson, R.C.A., which is being shown at the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke street, will give a quite new idea of his work to many people who know it only from the pictures which he sent to exhibitions in the last part of his life. A few of his larger pictures are here, but nearly all of these are smaller works, not studio pictures, but evidently painted out of doors, and in moods quite different from that of his studio pictures. They are not dated, but a few were evidently painted long ago, some of them in England and France and among these a delightful little sketch of an English village. The larger number are Canadian landscapes and, with the exception of a few of the Island of Orleans, all are of scenes at or near Doon, Ontario, where Mr. Watson was born and passed most of his life.

In these pictures there are many of the woodlands and big trees which Mr. Watson so often painted, and many autumn scenes, but only little of the sad browns and greys which were in his later exhibited works. There are pictures of all seasons of the year and several wide, open landscapes, views of the valleys of the Grand River and the Speed River in summer and winter. A few, evidently hasty sketches, are among the most interesting. There is in every one of them a simplicity of color scheme and a limited range of color—very restricted means for such admirable results. Fresh and cheerful greens are the most striking, and rather unexpected, elements in most of these pictures, which are some of the best of Mr. Watson's work and help to show his importance among Canadian landscape painters.

The exhibition is to remain open till Thursday of next week.

EXPERT DECORATOR LISTS DEADLY SINS

Polar Bear Hides Vex Evan
J. Tudor, N.Y. Art
Historian

A busy oriental rug is scarcely the thing for a quiet library. Evan J. Tudor, of the department of the History of Art, New York University, and lecturer at the Metropolitan Museum, who gave this hint to members of the Art Association of Montreal in a lecture last night, also sighed as he thought of people who put polar bear skins in their fastidiously designed rooms. He was vexed with people who mix up their periods. And he was none too enthusiastic about the invasion of drawing rooms by stove-pipes and bathroom fixtures. On the other hand, he pointed out that, in its proper place, an oriental rug might determine the color scheme of an interior, and he gave modern furniture credit for introducing a fine new use of woods.

His subject was "Fundamentals of Interior Decoration." The first fundamental, he said, was good proportion and he insisted on working to scale. Describing his own methods of work, Mr. Tudor gave his audience the benefit of wide experience and boundless enthusiasm. He told about the careful planning of every detail, of building models and using color charts, and he had scores of slides to illustrate his points—"a good illustration is the shortest distance between two minds."

The designer of interiors was, of course, limited by conditions, he admitted, but he showed how difficulties could be overcome, how bad original proportions could be improved by good design.

Much of what he said might be regarded as hard and fast rules. All good design was based on certain well-defined principles. At the same time, precedent could be used as a servant and there was room for a great deal of refinement on the old themes.

Interior decoration was a big thing, a really worth-while thing, Mr. Tudor declared. It could become an absorbing pleasure, opening up to the student the rich field of the history of art and, beyond that, the history of man as expressed in his every-day life.

JESSIE DOW PRIZES GOTO MONTREALERS

Gazette March 30/37

Awarded to Graham N. Norwell for Oil, and Thurstan Topham for Watercolor

Jessie Dow Prizes were awarded by the judges yesterday to two Montreal painters, those honored being Graham N. Norwell, for his oil "Lake Nipissing"; and Thurstan Topham, for his watercolor "Grey Day, Montreal from University Tower."

Both these paintings are among the works by these artists at present on view in the spring exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal.

The recipients of the awards are well-known to Montreal picture-lovers, having been contributors to local and out-of-town shows for a number of years.

"Lake Nipissing" by Mr. Norwell is in characteristic vein—wooded, hilly country with trees under heavy snow, and, in the distance, a patch of water. In general tone it is marked by a wide range of blues.

Mr. Norwell's versatility is shown in his other works on view—"Dead Trees," in conte crayon; "Northern Lights," in pastel, and "Laurentian Winter," in water color.

"Grey Day, Montreal from University Tower," by Mr. Topham, gives a good impression of snow-covered buildings and a glimpse of distant Jacques Cartier Bridge in falling light. It is solidly constructed, broadly handled and good in tone.

His other works in this medium are "Above the Falls near MacDonald Lake, P.Q." and "Moonlight, September, North River."

Dr. and Mrs. C. F. Martin are leaving for New York tomorrow evening and sailing on Saturday in the Conte di Savoia for Italy to be away for several months.

Water Colors Shown By B. Cory Kilvert

Gazette April 16/37

Known best as an illustrator and cartoonist and as a painter of romantic murals—the Spanish Main is a popular subject—B. Cory Kilvert, Canadian artist who has lived many years in the United States, comes to Montreal with a small show of water colors, mostly landscapes and marines made in Canada and Maine. The 37 pictures are on view in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal and may be seen until April 25.

Using heavy browns, purples and cobalts, working in big masses and sweeps of rhythm, Mr. Kilvert paints with a crashing sort of power, dramatizing everything he touches. The hand of the illustrator is particularly evident in such subjects as "The Little Farmer," "Share Croppers," "Going Home," "The Shyster," and "Sand Dunes, No. 2," as the titles indicate, but he has a story to tell even when he is just showing a breaking wave, an old barn, a group of boats, a hill.

Mountain and clouds in "The Plowman," for instance, are pregnant with roaring storm; the menace is contrasted with a vivid flash of green grass in "The Shower." High spirits, almost comedy, dominate the two "Red Barn" pictures. The old building rides the hills, triumphantly, if not a little bumpily, like a successful Ark.

While Mr. Kilvert's color is often thickly loaded, it is at times light and translucent, as in the falling green wave in "Lazy Water," and while he sometimes seems careless, leaving forms unrealized and dull, the total result is great vigor and spontaneity.

Architecture.

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—After attending the opening of the spring exhibition at the Art Gallery two weeks ago, I read a long article of comment on this exhibition which appeared in your paper. The article mentioned the people who were present. It commented on most of the exhibition in considerable detail, but one section it dismissed without comment—Architecture!

This whole exhibition was rendered possible owing to the efforts of those who erected the building in which it was housed. Therefore architecture would seem to be of some importance. All forms of art need comment and criticism to improve their quality. All visual art has an influence in forming the taste of those who see it. A picture is to a large extent the expression of one individual and may or may not influence and give a feeling of the environment in which we live. A poor picture will be relegated in the majority of cases to a place where it can only influence the tastes of a few. A building, however, is a different problem. It is a definite expression of the way a group of people wish to live and this has to be interpreted by the architect in whose hands the building is entrusted. A badly designed building is exposed to public view and will unconsciously form the taste of thousands of people. It represents a considerable investment and will be seen for a number of years. Its effect on real estate values in the neighborhood also has to be taken into consideration. It would seem, therefore, that this department of art would merit comment of at least the same rank as that devoted to painting.

Prizes were awarded yesterday for work done by students in the Junior Drawing Class of the Art Association of Montreal, under the direction of Miss Alberta Cleland.

5 CHILD PAINTERS TO SHOW IN PARIS

Gazette April 10/37

One, Sarah Bercowitz, 14, Gets Free Visit to French Exhibition

Five Montreal children, three of them from the Children's Art Centre conducted by Fritz Brandtner, have been chosen, from a Canada-wide competition for child art, to have their paintings displayed at the Paris International Exhibition opening in Paris, France, on the first of May. Six awards were given for children between the ages of seven and 18 years, with five of the six coming to Montreal.

First place in the 14 to 18 year group was awarded to Sarah Bercowitz, 14, a pupil of the Children's Art Centre. Miss Bercowitz will be given a week in Paris to visit the exposition and her prize painting, "Workers in the Field," will be entered in an international competition.

Paul Perreault, 13, won second place in the seven to 13 year class, with John Swail, nine, third. Both these children are from the Centre. They will have their pictures on display in the exhibition galleries and will be eligible for the numerous cash prizes offered by the French Government. Paul Perreault's painting was a colorful Montreal street scene, while John Swail, who lives in Hampstead, showed a dramatic "Workers on the Sea."

Lottie Painoff, 16, and Sarah Steinberg, 14, of the Baron Byng High School, were the other Montreal winners, taking second and third places in the 14 to 18 year class, with paintings on the same subject, "Women at Work."

The only award outside Montreal was first place in the seven to 13 year class, which went to Billy Withrow, 10, of the Art Gallery of Toronto.

Winning of three awards out of six by the Children's Art Centre was considered particularly notable because schools and classes from all parts of Canada submitted paintings. The Montreal centre, working under financial handicaps, was one of the smallest groups represented, since it numbers only 20 pupils, compared to the several hundred of the Toronto Art Gallery. The awards were also considered to be a tribute to the creative ability of the director, Fritz Brandtner, who has given his time to developing the work of Montreal child artists. A display of their work created a good deal of interest at the Produced in Canada Exhibition recently.

Paintings for the Paris International Competition were received by the National Gallery of Canada at Ottawa and judged by a jury of outstanding Canadian artists and critics.

MUSEUM WILL HOUSE BACHE ART COLLECTION

Banker's N.Y. Residence To Be Converted

NEW YORK, April 29—(A.P.)—Jules S. Bache, banker, announced through his attorneys last night that he would convert his Fifth avenue residence into a public museum for the permanent exhibition of his art collection, regarded by critics as one of the finest private collections in the United States.

The collection includes masterpiece paintings of the great artists of the Italian, Flemish, French, English, Spanish, Dutch and German schools, as well as many rare examples of sculpture, enamels, tapestries, porcelains, furniture, bric-a-brac and other art objects.

The announcement was made shortly after Bache departed for a summer in Europe and no estimate was made as to the value of the collection. However, it was recalled that in 1927 it was valued for insurance purposes at $5,000,000. Since then a number of expensive additions have been made.

Cosimo Masterpiece Purchased by Canada

New York, April 16.—(A.P.)—The sale of Piero di Cosimo's famous painting "Vulcan and Aelolus as Teachers of Mankind," to the National Gallery of Canada at Ottawa, was announced today by the Schaeffer Galleries. The Italian master's canvas was for more than 100 years a part of the noted collection of the Marquess of Lothian at Dalkeith, Scotland.

The picture, painted between 1490 and 1500, formerly was in the collection of the Marquess of Lothian, Newbattle Abbey, Dalkeith, Scotland, and was brought to New York last winter.

Piero di Cosimo became especially interested in mythology after a visit to Rome in 1482, when he assisted his master, Cosimo Roselli, in painting frescoes in the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican.

The mythological stories of Greece and Rome made an especial appeal to di Cosimo's active imagination. He is known especially for his landscapes, against which his mythological figures are portrayed. He also painted religious subjects and portraits.

In the picture just acquired by the Canadian gallery the action, as identified by Professor Erwin Panofsky of Princeton University, includes Vulcan, the Roman God of Fire, at his forge beating out a horseshoe, assisted by Aelolus, while a young horseman, mounted, waits for the shoe.

In the foreground a man is sleeping, while behind him a mother attends her husband and child. In the distance four men are building the framework for a cottage. Birds, a camel, a giraffe and a grasshopper are also included in the composition.

The presence of the giraffe is attributed by Professor Panofsky to the fact that in 1487 the Sultan of Turkey presented one of these animals to Lorenzo the Magnificent in Florence, where it was an object of great curiosity, and probably inspired Piero di Cosimo to portray it in this picture.

EXHIBITING DESIGNS FOR CONCERT HALL

McGill Architectural Students Display Work in Art Association Show

Designs for an exhibition concert hall—of the type which Montreal may some day build for its projected civic centre—are on view in the galleries of the Art Association this week with other drawings and problems selected to represent the work of students in McGill University's School of Architecture.

Of nine fifth year students, five designed concert halls for their thesis problems, while the remaining quartette, attacking the field of low-cost community planning, created a housing estate for 7,000 people. Each problem, according to Prof. Percy E. Nobbs, professor in charge of design, confronted the students with intricate tests of their knowledge.

In attractively landscaped parks, the concert halls include a large and a small auditorium, with the emphasis for the complete design laid on easy access for traffic and adequate parking facility close at hand. The ambitious town planning schemes show how the architect may design cheerful, low-cost apartments and surround them with parks and playgrounds. The sordid gridiron pattern, so common in suburban planning, is eliminated in favor of airy circles and gently curving streets.

The annual exhibition includes, along with the definitive designs of the graduating class, examples of every stage in the young architect's development. Beginning with free-hand drawings of classic casts, the exhibits extend through exercises in practical design, structural problems and purely decorative work intended to test the student's imagination and artistic ability.

FLOWER PAINTINGS SEEN AT WATSON'S

Bring Gay Color to Sherbrooke Street Gallery

GLADIOLUS BY COBURN

Marion Long, R.C.A., and Clara Hagarty, A.R.C.A.,
Among Those Contributing From Toronto

Paintings of flowers hold the walls of the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, and the collection of work by Montrealers and others makes a brave showing. There are examples by painters who generally favor flowers as their subjects, and there are entries by those who have painted blooms as technical exercises. Time was when the painting of flowers was regarded as a rather charming weakness on the part of the gentler sex—but not any more. To paint them competently makes exacting demands that cannot be skirted or dodged—drawing, precise color sense, ability to compose effectively, the skill to suggest the fragility of petals and their subtle values in light and shadow. Further, flowers are the one subject—barring autumn landscapes—where the painter can let himself go in the matter of vivid color, and to all of them at some time comes the irresistible urge to "break out" in this direction. It relieves the feelings and also—the subject being approached seriously—calls for an exactitude that some may not have suspected.

Forgetting the early Dutchmen with their essays, that too often suggest the glass-domed wax flowers of an age fortunately past, and not overlooking the meticulous handling of the insects that they introduced as "human interest," admirable exponents of flower painting of our day are many—Fantin-Latour, Sir William Nicholson, Jacques E. Blanche, Philip Connard, Augustus John, to mention a few. These, with the exception of Fantin-Latour, have regarded such endeavors in the light of a change in artistic diet, and some fortunate picture collectors have become the richer by such excursions.

Here the same urge has been felt. Wearying for the nonce of the hum of wind and the roar of breaking waves, the late G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., signed some admirable flower pieces. As a change from figure subjects and Quebec landscapes, with lordly elms, the late William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., would tackle the tone problems of flowers, and in the present show his skill is evident in a glazed yellow bowl of wallflowers of the loveliest hues—yellow and reds that verge on terra cotta tones. From stretches of snowclad country and winter wood interiors with logging teams, F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., turns to blooms. Rain-bound for nearly a week at Melbourne years ago, he, and his wife, a competent painter now dead, "tried their hand" at flowers and an array of beauty was the result. Here he is represented by a rosy pink gladiolus in a black bottle-like vase. It is beautifully arranged this leaning spray of blooms and spear-like vertical leaf, and with what gusto has he splashed the gleaming high-light on the vase.

Marion Long, R.C.A., Toronto, reveals the skilled hand in daffodils in a blue vase, and in "Summer Flowers"—an arrangement of roses. Clara S. Hagarty, A.R.C.A., Toronto, is very happy with a bunch of trilliums; yellow roses in a green jug; and marigolds and yellow daisies in a blue bowl. Kenneth Forbes, R.C.A., has flowers and incidental objects in a work called "Decoration." Jean Forbes has a well arranged still life with a lobster in rather muted tones, and F. O. Call shows peonies marked by careful drawing and true color. Berthe DesClayes has glowing color in "Spring Flowers"—daffodils, iris and pussy willow, against a sun-lit curtain, and sounds a lower note in white roses on a tray, with jewel box and green beads.

Pastels by K. S. Brydon-Jack reveal free, crisp handling and a good decorative sense in the sprawling bunch of tulips, and in white daisies in a tall vase against a blue background. Ida Beck, working in the same medium, has red and white peonies, and also red roses in a bowl. Mixed blooms interest Ruth M. Dingle—gladioli and delphiniums in one work, and orange lilies, phlox and gladioli in another. Ruby Le Boutillier has a cleanly handled watercolor of white peonies, and, in oils, rosy petunias, both of which are sincere and effective works.

Lillian Hingston shows her talent in a painting of some gay geraniums, and also in gladioli, the last-named being also the flower that has interested M. Maksolly. Chrysanthemums, as well as another arrangement of daffodils and narcissi, are from the brush of C. McKiel, and Moira Drummond's contributions include yellow roses and yellow iris with a porcelain dove as a decorative incidental. Marion N. Hawthorne is effective with some fringed asters, and K.

Liebich introduces a spray of autumn leaves into a still life. F. Sweeney has two broadly handled watercolor studies of carnations—red and pink—that show able arrangement, and F. B. Sweeney is effective with tulips in the same medium. Eric Riordon shows roses, Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., offers a mass of mixed blooms, and Paul Caron in "Doulton and Roses" has a maddened elephant flanked by pink blossoms. Other contributors include B. M. Long and T. R. MacDonald and there are also works by W. H. Burger—pansies and big poppies—and Davis Richter, whose ability to truthfully simulate the textures of silver, china and lustre ware is recognized.

Flowers Make A Gay Show at Watson's Gallery Star April 21/37

There is again this year, as there was last year, a promise of Spring exhibition at the Watson Galleries on Sherbrooke street, to which many painters have sent pictures of flowers, some of which we may hope to see alive before long. Nearly thirty painters are represented by works in oil, water color and pastel. Some of them are well known as flower painters and among these are Clara S. Hagarty, Lillian Hingston, Ruy Le-Boutillier, H. Davis Richter, and Brydone Jack; others, past and present, have painted flowers as a sort of diversion, and there are works in this exhibition by William Brymner, F. S. Coburn, Berthe DesClayes, Paul Caron, Marion Long, Moira Drummond, Alexander Bercovitch, Harold Beament and Eric Riordon. Flowers of all sorts are to be seen here, painted and drawn in all sorts of ways—in formal decoration, in naturalistic pictures and as parts of still life composition—and they fill the gallery with gay color. Ruth M. Dingle, F. B. Sweeney, B. M. Long, M. Maksolly, E. G. Richardson, Ida Beck, Christian McKiel, K. Sweeney, M. M. Hawthorne, Jean Forbes, W. H. Berger, F. O. Call, K. Liebich and M. M. Duffield are other contributors to this cheerful and seasonable exhibition.

Two Exhibitions At the Montreal Art Association Star April 22, 1937

In the big gallery upstairs in the Art Association of Montreal there is at present a memorial exhibition of pictures by the late Thomas Mower Martin, R.C.A., who, though he died only three years ago, was a link with the earliest painters in Canada. Born in 1838, he was in the beginning of his career as a painter, which continued till the last years of his life, a contemporary of Kriehoff and Jacobi; Turner, Ingres and Delacroix were still alive and painting at the same time; he was only a few years younger than Manet and Whistler and older than Claude Monet and Renoir. He was one of the original members of the Royal Canadian Academy, which received its charter in 1880. His pictures belong to the middle of the nineteenth century, and his manner seems to have changed very little, even in the work done when he was ninety years old. The pictures in this exhibition have the quiet tones and the rather stiff precision which belong to the earlier part of Mower Martin's life, and have another interest as records of Canadian scenery, from the Rocky Mountains to the Ontario woods, which were his principal subjects.

A quite different exhibition is in the print room of the Art Association. The water colors of B. Cory Kilvert are thoroughly modern in the breadth of the painting and the vividness of the color. These are large drawings, with a strength and richness of color which suggest oil painting more than water color; they are of places in Canada and the northern United States, and Mr. Kilvert seems to work better when he is on or near the sea than when he is inland. There are some very good studies of rough seas and breaking waves

EXHIBIT OF WORKS BY MOWER MARTIN

Gazette 19/37
Canvases by Ontario Artist,
Who Died at 96, at
Art Gallery

In the central gallery of the Art Association of Montreal is an exhibition of paintings by the late T. Mower Martin, R.C.A. It represents considerable industry and an honest effort to reproduce the things seen, but it is art of an older day and the generally sombre color and heaviness of touch are not inspiring. But in these days of a cleaner, gayer palette, when the aim is to capture atmosphere and the fugitive effect, and the modern artist can draw on the knowledge with which the Impressionists and other sincere experimenters have enriched painting, tribute to Mower Martin is deserved.

Born in London in 1838, he was mainly self-taught. He came to Canada in 1862, and ten years later was a charter member of the Ontario Society of Artists, and of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts in 1880. Besides his connection with these recognized art bodies, he was the first director of the Ontario Government Art Schools.

His influence was great at a time when Canada was beginning to produce more artists of her own, and there is no gainsaying that he stood for thorough grounding and hard work. It was not particularly an age when the student got out of hand, nor had he been fired with the zeal to be an innovator, was the taste of the Canadian picture collectors sufficiently tolerant to accept pictorial departures from the accepted thing. In 1937, the art of Mower Martin may seem a bit "tame," but the imposition of reasonable discipline might not hurt the solid development of painting if it were applied today.

There are angles of the present exhibition which are interesting—the paintings give glimpses of a time when labor-savers were unknown. The axe backed by manpower felled the trees for the home and fire and horse or ox did the hauling. Some of the works deal with these aspects of pioneer life. Then, too, there are Indian encampments with teepees, canoes, figures, and fish being "smoked." "The Portage, Muskoka"—Indian carrying canoe with two pack-bearers following, is a scene when the birchbark canoe was more common. "Winter Morning, Ontario," houses, barns, horse and sleigh, ox-team hauling wood and incidental figures, is full of incident, but since then the painter has found more subtle values in snow. "Beech Woods, York Mills" has sun-splashed cattle in a big stretch of shade. Cattle move along a road, edged by bare trees, towards water backed by a hill, in "Spring, Don Valley," and "End of the Day" shows a woman and child at the fence, greeting the farmer who drives a team of oxen from the darkening wood—a narrative picture, beloved by a multitude, that persists in some academies even today.

There are paintings of the Rockies—"Mount Sir Donald," men and horses crossing an improvised bridge; "Great Glaciers" with waterfalls and mountain sheep; "Where the Fraser River Rises, mountains, sheep, and the river winding in the wooded valley beneath; "Indians Crossing the Emerald River," noble trees edging the trail, mountains, and horses bearing packs and figures in the fast stream. In these the height of the peaks is well suggested, but the bulk and volume are missing. Of this group the most satisfying is the small "Source of Glacial Stream" in which the mountains are solidly anchored and the scattered boulders have weight.

There are some dead birds that show careful observation—three mallards, and a pair each of ruffed grouse, red head ducks, and mallard ducks.

"The Taxidermist's Shop"—men at work, with snow-covered roofs beyond the window—introduces a variety of trophies, prepared or awaiting attention.

Mower Martin, painting almost to the last, died in 1934.

BELGIAN ART SHOW TO OPEN NEXT WEEK

April 22/37

Morgan's to Exhibit Painting and Sculpture of Modern Flemish School

The exhibition of modern Belgian art, which is being held for a period of three weeks on the fifth floor of Henry Morgan and Company's store in conjunction with the forthcoming Belgian trade mission to Canada, will be opened Tuesday next by the Governor-General, Lord Tweedsmuir. The arrangement of the exhibition is under the direction of Antoine Courtens and Fred Greban, and Baron Sivercruyts, Belgian Minister at Ottawa, has consented to act as patron. It is being organized by the Belgium-Canada Association, of which Baron Louis Empain is the president.

The exhibition will consist for the most part of 130 paintings of the modern Belgian school, by such distinguished artists as Victor Gilsoul, Armand Jamar, Herman Courtens, and Georges Frederic. Contemporary pottery, Val St. Lambert crystals, and sculptures by De Soete and others will also be shown. Two seventeenth-century Brussels tapestries and a small collection of renaissance furniture will demonstrate Belgian craftsmanship of former times, and a special section will be devoted to the native handicrafts of the Belgian Congo. In the commercial section, a number of products, including cutlery, silverware, tiles and chinaware, will be exhibited.

The city of Antwerp has consented to allow its original coat-of-arms, set with diamonds and valued at $5,000, to be placed on exhibition, and has also provided a series of photographs depicting the maritime life of the city.

Prints by I. Friedlander

April 22/37

A very interesting collection of etchings and wood engravings by Isaac Friedlander is being shown in Eaton's galleries. These are, for the most part, scenes of New York and of life in New York, and especially in its poorer and more crowded parts. The wood engravings are the larger and decidedly the better part of the exhibition and there are among these some fine compositions with excellent arrangements of masses of black and white and very good patterns of line. There is a good print of a group of olive trees, but the prints with figures in them are better still. Two very striking ones are "Exodus," a fine procession of men from darkness into light, and "The last journey," a funeral procession of almost shapeless black figures in a gloomy landscape. There are some quite remarkable effects in the black prints, with only a sparing use of white, "In the dark," a sleeping figure in heavy shadow, "Cornered" a group of figures crouching under a shed, "Downhill" a splendid figure of an old man in silhouette, and "Despair," a very expressive study of a girl. In the prints of groups or crowds of figures, particularly of negroes, there are admirable life and movement; "Rhapsody in black," of a man dancing in front of a band, "City cry," "Revival" and "Merry-go-round," are some of the best of these. "Accordion player" and "2 A.M.," a study of a row of people waiting for a ferry, are simpler but quite as good as designs and as studies of character. Twelve wood engravings made to illustrate Shakespeare's sonnets, have the same good qualities of design and massing of light and shade, and are very interesting as illustrations.

Montrealer April 15/37

IRISH housemaids were not the only ones filled with a sense of propriety in those days. When Samuel Butler came to Canada in 1875, he paid a visit to the Montreal Museum of Natural History, which was housed on Mountain Street, between St. Catherine and Sherbrooke. Going through the exhibits he wandered down to the basement, where he found two plaster casts of famous statuary in the nude—the Antinous and the Discobolus—"banished," as he wrote, "from public view to a room where were all manner of skins, plants, snakes, insects, etc., and in the middle of these an old man stuffing an owl." "Why," Butler queried of the old man, who turned out to be the custodian, "weren't these antiques put where people could see them?"

The old man looked at Butler disapprovingly. "They're vulgar," he admonished, adding with relevant pride, that his brother was a haberdasher.

As a result of their conversation Butler wrote his "Psalm of Montreal" which we've copied in part from a manuscript copy in the Osler Library. (Incidentally, the manuscript is endorsed by Sir William Osler "I knew old Passmore well and the room with the Discobolus. Quaint old Cornishman.")

Stowed away in a Montreal lumber room
The Discobolus standeth and turneth his face to the wall;

Dusty, cobweb-covered, maimed and set at naught,

Beauty crieth in an attic and no man
regardeth:

O God! O Montreal!

Beginning tomorrow, an exhibition of paintings and drawings by

WATERCOLORS ON VIEW

May 25, 1937

Eaton's Shows Works by Walter J. Phillips

An exhibition of water colors by Walter J. Phillips, R.C.A., has opened in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, and will be on view for a week. There are about 40 works, most of them painted for Mr. Phillips's book "Color in the Canadian Rockies," which will be on sale, with the artist present to autograph copies.

Amy Stone Exhibits

Before she sails for England, to to paint the rough seas of Devon and Cornwall, Miss Amy B. Stone is holding an exhibition of her water colors—about fifty of them—at 18 Severn avenue. It is not surprising to hear that she intends to give a good deal of time in future to stormy waves, because some of the best work in her show is of the substantial rocks and breaking seas of the Maine coast. She also exhibits scenes from Brixham and Cornwall—boats and old houses. It is a big jump from the battering ocean to delicate flowers in vases, but Miss Stone makes it and she carries some of her strength and sense of volume into the smaller subjects. This is particularly noticeable in her full-bodied calla lilies. On the other hand, she paints peonies and chrysanthemums and mixed bouquets with airiness and gets charming decorations out of trilliums and cyclamens.

Knowlton, Brome Lake and the Laurentians give her opportunities to make pleasant landscapes, some of them snowy, with cottages or railway cars to make them cosy and add bright spots of color, and with skiers to help accentuate their rhythms.

The exhibition will be open to the public until June 21.

And I turned to the man of skins and said to him, "O thou man of skins, Wherefore hast thou done thus to shame the beauty of the Discobolus?"

But the Lord had hardened the heart of the man of skins

And he answered, "My brother-in-law is haberdasher to Mr. Spurgeon."

O God! O Montreal!

"The Discobolus is put here because he is vulgar,

He hath neither vest nor pants with which to cover his limbs;

I, Sir, am a person of most respectable connections—

My brother-in-law is haberdasher to Mr. Spurgeon."

O God! O Montreal!

Then I said "O brother-in-law to Mr. Spurgeon's haberdasher

Who seasonest also the skins of Canadian owls, Thou callest trousers 'pants' whereas I call them 'trousers,'

Therefore thou art in hell-fire and may the Lord pity thee!"

O God! O Montreal! etc.

Montrealers have kept this poem pretty much in the dark, as you may imagine, although it has been printed and reprinted in England from time to time. But then a lot of things are kept in the dark. We have it on reliable authority, for example, that in a dark drawer in Montreal's Art Museum, there are a whole flock of metal fig leaves, for use on nudes.

Pictures by
F. H. Varley at Scott's Gallery
Star May 27/37

Frederick H. Varley, some of whose work is now being shown at Scott's gallery on Drummond street, was one of the original members of the late Group of Seven of Toronto, and he was one of its most experimentally inclined members, and one of the best colourists. He has lived for some years in British Columbia, and the pictures in this exhibition show him maintaining his old ideas in landscape of the mountains and coast of that part of Canada. People who demand literal truth in landscapes will not find it here. These pictures are experiments in composition and color used for decorative ends; some of them are quite beautiful, others are rather puzzling, but none of them are dull. Mr. Varley uses nature in his own way and when he departs from facts he goes far enough to leave no confusion between fact and imagination. There are only a few large pictures in this exhibition; some of these are older and none of them are so interesting as the smaller ones.

There are no portraits in the exhibition, but there are several very good studies of heads—fine in drawing and painting, and excellent studies of life, though Mr. Varley's way of using bright greens in painting flesh is sometimes disconcerting. Some more very good studies of heads and figures are among a small collection of drawings, which are not hung on the walls; there is less imagination in these but they are admirable drawings; there are also a few water color landscapes, some of which are even better than the oil pictures.

MANY ARCHITECTS ARE REPRESENTED IN SPRING SHOW

Renovation Projects Bulk Largely in Exhibition at Montreal

VARIETY OF WORKS

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

MONTREAL, Mar. 28.—The profession of architecture is again well represented at the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, 1379 Sherbrooke street west, at the fifty-fourth spring exhibition. The exhibition continues for the general public through Sunday, April 11.

The trend towards home rehabilitation, low cost housing, and modern design in the so-called international style is apparent. Typical of what Montreal architects are doing today is the photograph of alterations to basement space for A. T. Henderson, M.D., by Noel Chipman. The remarkable change from useless space to a charming and comfortable extra room is strikingly shown in before and after photos of the alterations. Wilson and Auld exhibit perspectives of an historic residence at Carillon, Que., as it stood until a few weeks ago, and as it will appear when the reconstruction work now in progress is completed. The modernization of the exterior is equally as marked as the interior modernization must be.

Typical of the smaller, lower cost home designed in the modern manner are the suburban residence by Newstead A. Allen, design for a seven room house by Richard E. Bolton, two Hampstead residences by Franco Consiglio, residences at Ville La Salle and at Warwick, Que., by Henri S. Labelle, and design for a small brick house by P. Roy Wilson.

Other residential designs exhibited comprise house for Mr. J. P. Aston by Richard E. Bolton, a garden view of the V. M. Lynch-Staunton residence by Noel Chipman, a third Hampstead residence by Franco Consiglio, houses for C. S. Bradeen and Philip D. Magor by Chrystie L. Douglas, the Boyden Kinsey, Jr., residence in Hampstead by Frank R. Findlay and P. Roy Wilson, an Outremont residence by Henri S. Labelle, Paul M. Lemieux' competitive design for a home of Breton tradition, two water colors of proposed Montreal residences by W. K. Gordon Lyman, a water color of a country house by Maxwell and Pitts, the Dr. Simon Kirsch residence in Outremont by Mayerovitch and Bernstein, a decidedly modern residence, Sunnyside avenue, Westmount, by J. Cecil McDougall, a country residence and a Madison avenue residence by Thomas McLaren, J. Melville Miller's water color of a private residence, the Dr. Victor Jekill and the Major Edward T. Renouf residences in Westmount by Perry and Luke, a country house by Shorey and Ritchie, residences at St. Andrew's East and in Westmount, including an interior view of the latter, by Grattan D. Thompson, proposed residences in Outremont and in Westmount by H. Ross Wiggs, and the proposed Charles E. Frost, Jr.,

Wide Variety.

The division of architecture, however, is by no means restricted to residential design. A drawing of Douglass Hall by Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford is shown. Maxwell and Pitts have submitted a water color of the Ephraim Scott Presbyterian Church. A photograph of the Brownsburg, Que., post office indicates the design of Grattan D. Thompson. The Abbey, a perspective of the proposed mausoleum, Montreal Memorial Park, by Lawson and Little, reveals a large two storey stone monumental structure. The infirmery building at Bishop's College School, Lennoxville, by Chrystie L. Douglas, is exhibited. Henri S. Labelle also displays a water color of the front elevation of the Saint Antoine de Padoue church at Timmins, Ont. Mayerovitch and Bernstein are represented by a perspective of the modern Hungarian Recreational and Cultural Centre, Montreal; Perry and Luke, by perspectives of the United Church and of the Astor Theatre, both at St. Lambert, Que.; and Shorey and Ritchie by a perspective of the completed Iona avenue school.

Two views of a proposed memorial chapel showing the narthex and an interior are by Philip J. Turner. A topical design is a suggestion by Percy E. Nobbs for the George V Memorial, King George's Acre; Professor Nobbs also exhibits the Abbot Arms, a design for champeve enamel. Edgar Marrotte displays a photograph of the W. M. Tomkin cabin at the Seignior Club; Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford, also show exterior and interior photos of the ski lodge at Ste. Marguerite of Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Timmins. Other works shown are a photograph of Christ Church Cathedral lighting by Noel Chipman, one of the living room of the E. J. Trott residence by Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford, the Robert Lafleur residence, colored drawings of a study of a tower and of the Parliament of Southern Rhodesia by George M. Stewart.

Other Subjects.

Among the oil paintings, water colors and pastels are two water-colors by Chrystie L. Douglas, of autumn trees and of early spring, a water color of the meeting by D. H. MacFarlane, another water-color by J. Melville Miller of a winter afternoon, mixed geraniums, a water color by Percy E. Nobbs, three paintings by Hugh A. Peck, two of scenes on the Gaspé Highway and the third of a Quebec by-way, one of early spring at Ste. Marguerite, Que., by A. Leslie Perry, by Charles J. Saxe a painting of an old bridge at Ste. Marguerite, and two water colors of continental scenes by P. Roy Wilson, one of the gothic bridge, the other of the Church of San Pedro, Avila, Spain.

A drawing, entitled Portrait of a Lily, by Harry Mayerovitch, and two crayon drawings of winter at St. Joseph du Lac, Que., by J. Roxburgh Smith, are included among the etchings, drawings and designs. The familiar personality of George H. Duggan, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Dominion Bridge Company, Limited, is captured by Miss Marjorie S. Winslow, whose plaster sculpture shows Mr. Duggan with pipe firmly gripped.

TWO KINGS' PORTRAITS HANG SIDE BY SIDE

Star April 28/37

Two Kings, father and son, are placed side by side in the central hall of the Royal Academy at Burlington House, London, at a special exhibit in honor of the Coronation. The painting of King George V is by S. Arthur S. Cope, K.C.V.O., and of King George VI by Simon Elwes.

Drawings of Jewish Life

By Saul Raskin

An exhibition, which is very well worth seeing, of pictures, drawings and prints by Saul Raskin of New York, is being held for two weeks in the Jacoby Studios, 1500 Bishop Street. Mr. Raskin, whose work is much better known in the United States than in Canada, was born in Russia and has travelled in Palestine, and has made a special study of Jewish types and Jewish life. He shows work in nearly every medium, and all are admirably used. The oil pictures are the less important part of the exhibition, and there are not many of them. The drawings are some of them water colors, some are in black and white, and some are drawings tinted with water color or wash. Mr. Raskin uses all sorts of methods and sometimes combines them; color is often used only sparingly but always in a way that seems to fit the case exactly.

The remarkable technical qualities of Mr. Raskin's work is not less interesting than the fine composition of some of the drawings and stories which they have to tell. There are many fine Jewish types and scenes of Jewish life, eastern and western, — some splendid portraits of old men and groups of children. Some of the drawings and etchings of crowds and gatherings of people are specially good, — full of life and movement and composed into effective designs, and in all of these drawings there is real character, evidently true to life. A few landscapes in Palestine and America and some water colors of workmen and of groups of cows are quite as good in their way.

Among etchings, which are in an upstairs room, there is a set of twelve of the Hebrew prophets, — admirable as etchings, full of dignity, and most interesting as fine

BEAUTY OF ROCKIES SHOWN BY PAINTER

Gazette May 27/37
Collection of Watercolors by Walter J. Phillips, R.C.A.,
at Eaton's

MUCH COUNTRY COVERED

Exhibition Contains Originals of Plates Used to Illustrate "Colour in the Canadian Rockies"

Montreal picture-lovers require no introduction to the watercolors of Walter J. Phillips, R.C.A., of Winnipeg, for his skill in this medium has been revealed here in exhibitions at local galleries in past years, when he has shown us the sprawling prairie towns, with the dominating grain elevators, and the pile wharves, sheds, canneries, lumber mills, Indian canoes and totem poles on the wilder stretches of the British Columbia coast. Now his work, displayed in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, deals with the Rockies, the watercolors being the originals of the full page plates that illustrate "Colour in the Canadian Rockies" — a book for which the letter press was written by Frederick Niven.

Mr. Phillips has painted much in that region, and has found there subjects that served admirably for those wood engravings and color prints which the discerning connoisseur so treasures. In the present show we have mountains in plenty — but without monotony. The scenes are beautiful in themselves and the painter's handling of the medium will appeal to the student and the amateur.

As a watercolorist Mr. Phillips ranks high. It is a medium much favored by him, and it is questionable if there is anything he cannot do with it. He finds Nature as it is, eminently good and paintable. His color is good and his drawing sound, and he does an honest job without exaggerations or marked mannerisms. He invests his mountains with a sense of bulk, height and grandeur, and he is usually happy in the selection of his pictorial material.

PEAKS AT VARYING HOURS.

These mighty peaks Mr. Phillips shows at varying hours — "Burgess enveloped in Clouds" gives but a glimpse of purple rock piercing a mass of moving vapor; "Lake Louise, Dawn," with the ring of heights mirrored in the water and the sun gilding the mountains in the background, is poetic and impressive; "Emerald Lake and Mount Burgess," the mountain rising above shadowed timber that goes down to the water which mirrors floating mist; "Moonrise, Mount Victoria," with noble trees, the roof of a log cabin and, above the bulk of the dark mountain, a clump of clouds that catch the silver of the hidden moon.

There is moisture in the clouds above "Mistaya Valley" with its mountain peaks stretching into the distance, and a fine day nears its end in "Wapta and the Slate Mountains" — the irregular range showing a rosy pink against the warm sky banded with color which is reflected in the nearby water. A rosy cloud swings into the sky behind the blue peaks in "Cathedral and Lake O'Hara," where, almost screened by trees at the water edge, some lucky mortal has pitched his tent. Grey clouds hang over the blue mountains in "The Sawback," and the sunlight is dazzlingly bright on the bare and snow-patched massiveness of "Mount Fay." The tracery of white cascades, against a mountain that blocks out the sky, is faintly discernible in "Seven Sister Falls," as seen from across Lake O'Hara, with noble trees on the near shore.

For those who love mountains, here is a feast, and no one the same in form and effect — Mount Lefroy, Mount Stephen, Mount Biddle, Sulphur Mountain, and all the heights that mass against the sky about Lake Louise, Windermere, Lake Agnes, Bow Lake, Moraine Lake, Wenkchemna Lake, and Lake O'Hara, which is also seen from a height as a circular pool of emerald ringed by sunlit and shadowed mountains with snow upon their peaks.

Also shown are "Mount Field and The Kicking Horse" — the mountain jutting its pointed peak into the sky, while the river rushes white between timbered banks; "In the Valley of the Peaks" with its sharply defined rock formation, spruce, shattered log and distant mountains; "Falls in Yoho Valley," big boulders, rock and turbulent water; "Hamilton Falls," white water dropping from a height into a rocky basin. There are falls big and little, the mighty boulders from rock-slides and rocks that show the scars of torrents, stones and grit, as in "Pipstone Creek," and as a contrast to all this mighty majesty, Mr. Phillips reveals the beauty of clumps of fireweed, tall grasses and evergreens about a tiny waterfall.

CANADIAN ART LAGS ON DAY'S PROBLEMS

Andre Bieler Gives Opinion at Canadian-American Conference

Kingston, Ont., June 16. — (P) — As Canadians "are less conscious of their social problems" so does Canadian art lag behind that of the United States in the reflection of social consciousness, states Andre Bieler, resident artist at Queen's University here. Mr. Bieler gave an informal talk today on contemporary American and Canadian painting in connection with the conference on Canadian-American affairs.

Mexico contributed largely to the contemporary scene in its revival of mural decoration and "even when the main themes of the frescoes are fiercely intense social questions, these remain fine works of art," he said. He added:

"The importance of the Mexican contribution to American art is, I think, twofold, consisting in:

"First, the revival of mural paintings, many under the Public Works Administration projects (in the United States) whose activity has been of great value in that it has set up, in the minds of the public the idea that the artist can and should function as a normally necessary member of national life.

"Secondly, using these large decorations for social and political propaganda, thus reversing the Freudian concept that subject matter weakens the aesthetic appeal of a work of art. This was a revelation to a group of painters who in the school of abstractionism, cubism and symbolism had acquired a strong sense of composition and design. This school is very much alive and of importance in this socially-conscious time."

Mr. Bieler described two schools of art in the United States. One he called the New York school "whose artists paint throbbing life of the city with a fine sense of form and new color harmonies. The other was the Middle West school "less conscious of the ever changing rhythm that so profoundly influences the east, painting in a rather anecdotal way to portray the vastness of the prairies."

The National Gallery of Canada, with help from the British Film Institute and from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences of Hollywood and the co-operation of the National Film Society of Canada, has brought together a collection of more than a hundred pieces of Original Work by Cinema Art Directors, and this collection is now being shown in an upper gallery of the Art Association of Montreal.

The works which make up the exhibition are all designs for settings or scenes with figures in films which have been shown in recent years, and people who attend motion picture theatres regularly will recognize many old friends and will also notice many differences between the designs and the scenes as they appeared in the films. A number of the designs are accompanied by photographs of the scene as presented and show how much change was made in some cases, often for obviously practical reasons.

Alfred Junge, of the British Gaumont Corporation has the largest collection of designs; there are fifty-five, from seventeen different films, which include "I was a Spy," "The Constant Nymph," "Head over heels in Love," and "King Solomon's Mines"; they are fine, broadly washed-in drawings in black and white which make a remarkable variety of good scenic ideas, and they were evidently well planned for their purpose, since the photographs show how closely the scenes followed the designs. In the case of Vincent Korda's designs for "Rembrandt" the photographed scenes are very different from the drawings; Andre Andreiev's five designs for "The Beloved Vagabond" are the only other British drawings.

Cedric Gibbons has the largest group among the American designs; some of these are small drawings, showing arrangements of figures in scenes, but there are also scenic designs for "The Great Ziegfeld" and "Romeo and Juliet," some of them rather fantastic arrangements in which, as photographs show, considerable changes were made. Stephen Goossens of Columbia, John Harkrider of Universal and William S. Darling of 20th Century Fox Studio have drawings in color—very interesting, imaginative and rather fantastic designs, in which many changes were made before they got to the screen. Hans Peters and Van Nest Polglase are the other American exhibitors.

Two very interesting small groups are by German art directors and, in both cases, they are of photographs of finished results, not designs. These are of Welter Roehrig's settings for the famous "Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" and Lotte Reiniger's oriental silhouettes for "The Adventures of Prince Achmed," and they are very original and very different from the works of the other exhibitors.

Background of Films Revealed In Art Show

June 2, '37 Gazette

Pictures behind the pictures, more than 100 of them, make up an exhibition, now in the Montreal Art Association gallery, which should be of great interest to film-goers. Brought to Canada by the National Gallery with the co-operation of the British Film Institute and the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, the show consists of original drawings by art directors of the great film companies of England and Hollywood.

Behind all films are drawings to scale for the use of carpenters and painters, and behind these plans are such sketches as are now on view.

The artist most represented is Alfred Junge of Great Britain, with his very free and flourishing preliminaries for such films as "Jew Suss," "King Solomon's Mines," "Evergreen," "The Iron Duke," "Waltz Time," "Jack Ahoy" and "The Constant Nymph." There are half a dozen interiors and exteriors for "Rembrandt," by Vincent Korda. Cedric Gibbons of Hollywood shows a group of small illustrations for "Fury," some elegant backgrounds for "The Great Ziegfeld," a setting for "Camille" and several scenes for "Romeo and Juliet." Andre Andreiev uses a broad, sweeping black and white style in "The Beloved Vagabond;" William S. Darling and Stephen Goossens ("Pennies from Heaven," "Wake Up and Live" and so on) work in water colors, and John Harkrider shows a modern approach in his "Top of the Town" series.

Photographic "stills" are contrasted with the drawings in some cases and of particular interest to students of the cinema are the six stills from Welter Roehrig's famous "Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" and the six from the enchanting silhouette film "The Adventures of Prince Achmed" by Lotte Reiniger. The last two are German films.

The exhibition will be open for about 10 days.

An Exhibition of Room Decoration

The Montreal School of Interior Decoration is holding its annual exhibition of students' work this week at 1411 Crescent Street. The exhibits consist chiefly of small models of rooms, decorated and furnished in a variety of periods and styles, designed and made by students. These models give a good idea of how the rooms would look, the designs are thoroughly practical, for comfortable rooms, they show a good deal of originality and, above all, very good taste. New patterns of wall papers are used in many of these plans, and in some cases the full-sized designs for the papers are also shown. One of the most interesting parts of the exhibition is a combined model, to which several students have contributed, of a top floor apartment, with a roof garden. This apartment is a circular construction, to go on the top of another building; it has a large, circular, central sitting room, which is surrounded by the other rooms,—bedrooms, dining room, library and kitchen. All the rooms have outside windows, except the central room, which has clerestory windows, high up in its walls; they are rooms of interestingly unusual shapes, and the problem of decorating them has been worked out cleverly and with some very good results. Some museum studies by younger students have a good range of subjects and show a fine free use of water color.

Amy B. Stone's Work Praised by La Revue Moderne

Amy B. Stone is holding an exhibition of her water colors at her studio, 18 Severn street, Westmount, from 2 to 8.30 p.m., until the end of the week. It is open to the public. Of her work, La Revue Moderne, Paris, said: "Miss Amy B. Stone has attained classic balance by using modern methods with restraint. . . she has brought to her work sensitiveness, originality and a feeling for design which harmonizes with the whole composition."

HIGH PRAISE GIVEN TO CANADIAN ART

LONDON, May 31—(C.P.)—Eric Newton in the Evening Standard praised a collection of Canadian landscapes exhibited at the Royal Institute Galleries in Piccadilly. "The landscapes are no mere literal transcription of the Canadian scene," he wrote. "They are strongly emotional. They have even a rather savage quality. The pioneer spirit of Canadian life seems to have got into them, and the fierce cold of the winter and the dry heat of the summer is reflected in their violent color schemes."

Burial at Arthabaska — Noted Artist Died in Florida.

The funeral of Marc-Aurele de Foy Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., who died at Daytona Beach, Fla., last January 29, was held this morning at the chapel of Jos. C. Wray and Bro. The remains left on the 10 o'clock train from Bonaventure station for interment at Arthabaska, Que.

Mr. Suzor-Cote was an outstanding Canadian painter and sculptor. He had resided in Florida since 1929 when he suffered a paralytic stroke necessitating a change of climate.

He was appointed a full member of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1914 and much of his work is represented at the National Art Gallery at Ottawa.

Most of his paintings depict rural Quebec life and the daily tasks of the habitants, although he painted many historical compositions dealing with Canada's early days.

Montreal artists and art lovers turned out in large number to pay final tribute to the great French-Canadian painter, Suzor-Cote attracted much renown throughout the world by the mastery shown in his paintings.

SUZOR-COTE FUNERAL

Artist to Be Buried in Arthabaska

The funeral of Marc-Aurele de Foy Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., who died at Daytona Beach, Fla., on January 29, will be held from the chapel of Jos. C. Wray and Bro., 1234 Mountain street, at 8.15 this morning. The remains will leave the chapel at 8.30, to be taken for interment to Arthabaska, Que., on the 10 a.m. train from Bonaventure station.

An outstanding French-Canadian painter and sculptor, the late Mr. Suzor-Cote had lived in Florida since he suffered a paralytic stroke in 1929. He was elected a full member of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1914, and his work is well represented at the National Gallery in Ottawa as well as in many private collections in North America and Europe. He found his material largely in the countryside of the Province of Quebec and the daily tasks of the habitants. The color of the French regime also attracted him, and he did many historical compositions dealing with Canada's early days. A few years ago an important loan collection of his works was exhibited in Montreal.

The Canadian Water Color Society

Star June 16/37
The tenth annual exhibition of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Colours opened at Toronto in April and is now being sent on tour by the National Gallery of Canada; it has just arrived, rather late in the season, at the Art Association of Montreal. This exhibition, in which nearly sixty members are represented, shows well how the use of water colour is spreading and improving in Canada, and a great many of the exhibitors are people whose work is not known in Montreal exhibitions.

Of the better known Canadian water colour painters, W. J. Phillips, Frank Carmichael and A. J. Casson have drawings in this collection, but they are not very important. F. H. Bridgen is one of the more conservative painters and his three landscapes are good examples of his work, and several other painters show work of the traditional water colour kind, drawings with clean washes of colour; Robert Hyndman and H. McDonic are two of these, and there is delightful simplicity in two drawings by Eric Aldwinckle. A more modern formality of drawing and composition is in the work of J. de N. Kennedy, especially one in which a pattern of branches fill the picture, Avery Shaw and Peter Haworth. Among other more interesting drawings are W. A. Winter's interior of a brick kiln and Ian MacIver's heavy evening clouds at Muskoka. Andre Lapine's studies of horses are full of life and movement, and George Pepper's figures are full of character.

There are a number of drawings of a less conventional kind. Charles Comfort uses water colour in an unusual way in his enormous drawing of a lily, and Pegi Nicol, using water colour like oil paint, has got a surprising amount of action into her three clever crowd studies of "Pavement People." Charles W. Jeffreys shows "An experiment in abstract expression," which is a very happy colour composition; J. Syd Hallam's drawing of a boy's head and other things is abstract in its composition, and Fritz Brandtner's drawings are among those which are decidedly abstract in some of their colour.

Gazette Pictures Loaned July 17th—1937

For the summer months, Mr. and Mrs. Murray Chipman have loaned five of their paintings to the Montreal Art Association and they are now on exhibition. There are two Morriscoes—a beach scene, "Plage, St. Malo," and a golden-glowing Venice. Cezanne's "Auvers," red roofs in fresh green trees, with clouds overhead, is to be seen; one of Utrillo's from the "white period"—a short street with red roofs against a pale sky, called "Versigny," and Derain's "Le Mur Rose," warm, full-bodied buildings, rounded forms and a white steeple. This and the Cezanne will be remembered from a recent exhibition at W. Scott and Son's gallery.

HANDICRAFTS PLAN FOSTERED BY CITY

Industrial Bureau Sets Up Workshop Corporation as Co-operative

USE SKILLED ARTISANS

Shops to Be in Charge of Experts—Marketing to Be Put on Profit-sharing
Gazette, July 17th
1937.

Following an organization meeting held at the Chambre de Commerce under the chairmanship of Valmore Gratton, managing secretary of the city's Industrial, Commercial and Economic Bureau, announcement was made yesterday of formation of the Canadian Workshop Corporation, a co-operative enterprise to encourage the making and selling of handicraft production in Montreal.

It was determined that workshops be established in Montreal for the production of hand-made articles of wood, metal, glass and plastic materials; either carved, plated, embossed or cast in wide variety to replace at competitive prices those articles at present imported for general use. In addition, original articles peculiar to Montreal or the Province of Quebec will be produced for the general market; as well as articles of special interest to tourists. Over two hundred articles have been classified as suitable for immediate production.

Each shop, of which a number are planned, will be in charge of a skilled artisan, with master craftsmen, general workers and apprentices. Supplementary to the workshops will be home craftsmen, working in their homes with materials and tools furnished by the shops. These workers will produce original, as well as standard, objects of the arts and crafts.

PROFIT-SHARING SCHEME.

An efficient selling organization will find or create markets for the output of workshops and home craftsmen; and workers will share in the profits of the enterprise, in addition to being paid for their work as produced.

Competitions, with liberal prizes, are to be held for the submission of original drawings and models of articles suitable for handicraft production. This will assist in maintaining a wide diversification, as the quantity of each article is to be strictly limited to assure exclusiveness. All articles will bear the mark or name of the maker, and the label of the Canadian Workshop.

While the plan of encouraging domestic arts and crafts is to be conducted by private capital and enterprise, it will be under the guidance and supervision of the Industrial-Commercial and Economic Bureau. Mr. Gratton is of the opinion that the plan will prove a boon to such of Montreal's unemployed as are able to do work of this kind, or who will undertake to acquire the requisite skill, and should be a definite factor in the industrial situation locally.

The co-operative enterprise will be known in French as L'Artisanat Canadien. Only French-speaking people interested in the project were present at the first meeting, but it is planned to bring in English-speaking citizens as well. As Mr. Gratton explained, it is expected that more than 90 per cent. of the handicrafts work will be done by French-Canadian hands.

ART INTEREST GROWS

Trustees of National Gallery of Canada Issue Report

Ottawa, July 21.—(U.P.)—A definite increase in the growth of art interest throughout the Dominion was reported in the annual report of trustees of the National Gallery of Canada released tonight.

"General growth of art interest throughout the country has not only been maintained but has very definitely increased," the report said, "showing that Canadians are progressively realizing that an understanding of the fine arts and all that they include is an essential factor in the art of daily living."

Work being done in the Vancouver Art Gallery received special mention in the report, as did the active programme being carried on by the Winnipeg gallery.

Departments of fine arts have been established in the University of Saskatchewan, University of Toronto, McMaster University, Hamilton and Acadia Universities.

"It would be difficult to overestimate the immediate and future value of these steps," the report said.

Regarding a National Art Gallery building, the report said "expansion of activities indicated in the beginning of this report demonstrated that the commencement of an adequate home for the national gallery cannot be safely delayed."

"Necessity for a National Gallery building has been fully established in previous reports and the trustees are confident the subject is receiving the attention it deserves on the part of the Government."

It added: "Canada's status as a nation depends as much upon her attitude towards the arts as upon any other single factor, and a suitable building for the National Gallery, including possibly adequate provision also for music and drama, located in the centre of the Capital would signalize the high position of the arts in Canada."

GALLERIES OF the Arts Association of Montreal will remain closed until October 1 in order to carry out repairs and redecoration in the building.

Montreal Association To Sponsor Talks During Winter Season

Opportunities for education in the arts and crafts will be given Montrealeers of all ages during the coming winter season by the Art Association of Montreal which today announced its plans following an almost complete renovation of the Gallery at 1379 Sherbrooke street west.

A transformation has been made in the basement, which will now be utilized for educational purposes. This class, called the "Children's Hour," will take place on Saturday mornings.

SUBJECTS OF LECTURES

Once a week in the afternoons there will be topics of art for pupils between the ages of 14 and 17 years. Some of the subjects are: Temples and tombs of ancient Egypt; daily life of the Egyptians—ancient and modern; digging into the past; the pottery maker; visit to the armour galleries; glass blowing; the etcher's art; making a stained glass window; facts on sculpture; from clay to bronze; making of wrought iron.

NATURAL HISTORY

There will also be illustrated talks on plant life and bird life. The children's classes will be under the direction of Miss Anne Savage.

In addition to these classes there will be weekly or fortnightly lectures or informal talks on topics of art by twenty or more experts, who will present once a week or fortnightly illustrated talks on subjects on which they are competent to speak.

It is hoped in this way to stimulate a greater interest on the part of local people in the gallery and its activities. Later on it is planned to have a few evening receptions, some perhaps with chamber music, which will give more social interest in the Art Gallery's program.

The Art Association authorities have also in mind presenting frequently special objects of art, obtained from various sources, illustrating one or more treasures of art, so that the visitors to the Gallery may see something new very frequently. These will be exhibited in a special alcove of the building.

During the winter, there will probably be one big loan exhibition, either of pictures or ceramics.

EXTENSIVE REPAIRS

The repairs and decoration throughout the building have been made possible through donations from special friends of the gallery. Further funds will be needed to carry out the full program initiated by Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the Art Association, and his associates.

The repairs to the building include a complete renovation of the exterior, such as repointing of marble and renewal of stucco and brick work, repairing of the roof, and renovation of the skylights.

The interiors of all the studios are being cleaned and repainted. All the galleries are also being re-tinted and new wall coverings are being put on.

Several thousands of dollars have been spent on this work already and more expenditures are planned in order to make the Art Gallery a centre for all citizens desiring an education in the arts and crafts.

AVERY SHAW'S WORK WILL BE EXHIBITED

The print room of the Montreal Art Association is to be opened on Friday for an exhibition of water colors by Avery Shaw. Other galleries of the association will not be opened for several weeks, until completion of extensive repairs now being made.

Avery Shaw, the artist, was born in the West Indies, of English and Canadian parents. He was educated in Canada, and his early training was in architecture. For several years he carried on his profession in New York, prior to going to Nova Scotia, his present residence. He is a member of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Color.

On Monday afternoon at 5 o'clock, Sheriff Scott will give a talk on this collection in the library of the Art Association.

ART GALLERY SHUT FOR REPAIRS WORK

Gazette—Sept. 23/37

Renovation Undertaken on Extensive Scale—Educational Plans Made

Renovation of the gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, is now in progress, and the entire building will remain closed until October 1. The work has entailed a large expenditure for redecoration and rebuilding both outside and within the gallery, and in view of the fact that much still remains to be done, only the museum, the Canadian picture gallery, and one or two rooms where a collection of water colors by Avery Shaw will be displayed, will be opened to visitors by the first of next month.

New wall coverings are being installed, the woodwork repaired, and the studios renovated. A large room on the lower floor has been newly painted and lighted, for the purpose of housing the forthcoming "children's hour" classes during the autumn and winter. It is hoped that the galleries on the upper floor will be open for visitors during the Canadian Handicrafts Exhibition, which is being held from October 16 to October 31.

An extensive educational programme is being fostered for the coming season, which will include not only the usual speeches, but also a series of informal talks, which will be given by local experts on the arts and crafts. Contributing speakers will include professors from McGill University, technical experts and local artists. The talks will be illustrated by slides and moving pictures. The Association is also planning to give classes on art appreciation and instruction for children.

A series of exhibitions of paintings and objets d'art, both from the gallery and from outside sources, will be given this year. It is hoped in addition to hold periodical exhibitions of collections from various sources, and there will be at least one important loan exhibit during the season. Several displays have been arranged for the autumn and early winter, including an exhibition of costume design by Ruth Dingle from October 16 to October 24; a group of sketches by Milton Osborne, of Winnipeg, of colonial architectural subjects, from October 30 to November 14; and the Royal Canadian Academy exhibition from November 18 to December 12.

During the summer months the Association acquired several hundred Holbein drawings and a large collection of photographs from the galleries of Europe. In addition a library of films and lantern slides for lecture purposes is being formed.

SHAW PAINTINGS SHOWN

Nova Scotia's Water-Colors

Introduced to Public

The Montreal Art Association began a new policy, that of introducing the artist personally to his public, when A. Sheriff Scott, R.C.A., spoke yesterday afternoon to introduce Avery Shaw, who is exhibiting his water-color work at the Sherbrooke Street Galleries. Mr. Scott, speaking in the library of the Art Association, touched briefly on Mr. Shaw's career, his achievements and his artistic tenets.

The distinguishing features of this artist's approach to his work were his desire to subordinate himself to his work, avoiding the autobiographical in his painting, and his refusal to associate himself with any general principles or modes originated by any other artist or group of artists, said Mr. Scott.

The exhibition, which is now open to the public, shows Mr. Shaw's water-colors to be marked by strong design and rather harsh coloring with a rather indiscriminate use of stylization.

His subject-matter is drawn from the Nova Scotia country, more especially from the district of Lunenburg County. His most successful work lies in the treatment of the architectural features of that district, though he is also showing some flower-studies that give free range to his talents and which are handled without sentimentality.

Outstanding among the landscapes are his "Old Barn," "Lunenburg Farm," softer in handling than most of his work, and "Le Havre Light-house," a boldly executed finely designed canvas.

Reviews of Book

THE JACK PINE, by Tom Thomson, in the National Gallery of Canada at Ottawa, is a work that impresses by the direct, simple manner in which this painter has captured the spirit and austerity of the Northland which he loved. It is big in feeling and dignified in pattern, and there is a tapestry-like quality in the broken horizontal brush work employed for the water and sky. The color is clean, rich and harmonious—rusty green in the foliage of the pine, glowing orange banding the sky above the distant hills which show snowcapped ledges, while in the foreground there are splashes of scarlet which might be drifted autumn leaves.

Tom Thomson, Painter of the Wilds, Lost to Canadian Art 20 Years Ago

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

Winds with a keener edge by now sweep Canoe Lake, in Algonquin Park, and whistle about the cairn of stones erected to the memory of Tom Thomson, the young Canadian painter who lost his life in those waters twenty years ago when his work bore promise of reaching a higher place in the art of the Dominion. Artist, guide and woodsman, at home in the wilds and equally alive to its beauties and its dangers, Thomson died tragically and alone. None knows the manner of his passing—an empty canoe drifting on the lake caused alarm, and a week's search resulted in the recovery of his body.

All this happened when the public mind was concerned with the fortunes of the Great War—when many Canadian painters were at the front on active service wielding weapons—or brushes for the Canadian War Memorials. Those who knew his talent sensed the loss to painting, though Thomson's work was not well known in Montreal until, in March, 1919, an exhibition of his canvases and panels shown at the Arts Club, Victoria street, excited so much interest that, before they were returned to Toronto—the bulk of the sketches coming from the private collection of Dr. James M. MacCallum, who had encouraged and befriended him—they were shown to a wider public in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal.

This first exhibition was refreshing and it revealed a painter with an individual outlook who found the North country rich in pictorial material to which he was sympathetic. Some large works were shown, the well-known "Pine Islands" among them, but to painters at least the chief charm of the show lay in the panels that recorded impressions of fleeting atmospheric effects, two in particular being distinctly out of the ordinary—"Wind Clouds (Spring-Wildgeese Clouds)" and "Snow Pillars in the Sky," odd perpendicular cloud formations. For the rest, the scenes were those of which lovers of the out-of-doors never tire: "The Brook, Fall," with foaming rapid and glowing hillside suggesting the season when an earlier darkening of the trail counsels reaching camp before night falls; "Afterglow," with stretch of water, distant blue hill, and yellow sky, recalling that period of rest, yarning and a quiet smoke at the end of a day well spent; "Burnt Country, Evening"—a bit of travel to be done while the light is good; "Chill November," snow-flecked hills, primrose sky, with a flock of geese overhead, in an atmosphere that urged the precaution of an extra blanket and the replenishing of the fire outside the tent.

In that show, too, were "Breaking the Ice," "Parry Sound Harbor," "Red and Gold (Hillside, Autumn)," "Northern Lights," "Lumber Camp, Night," "The Marsh, Springtime," and "The Opening of the River," to mention a few. That exhibition was an unusual treat—and such a show would be welcomed here again.

A. Y. Jackson, who wrote the Foreword to the Arts Club catalogue of the exhibition, being a friend of Thomson's who had camped and painted with him, recalled that he was in Toronto in 1913 when Thomson came down from Canoe Lake, where he had been fishing, working as a guide, and sketching. Thomson's sketches showed knowledge of the country, were faithful and painstaking, but were not remarkable. He went north in 1914, and in the fall of that year Jackson worked with him at Canoe Lake. "Thomson," said Jackson, "no longer handicapped by literal representation, was transposing, eliminating, designing, finding happy color motives amid tangle and confusion, reveling in paint, and intensely interested."

The character of the country where Thomson worked and where he lost his life in July 1917 was the subject by Jackson of the following pointed paragraph:

"Round Canoe Lake is a ragged piece of Nature, hacked up many years ago by a lumber company that went broke. It is fire-swept, dammed by both man and beaver, and overrun with wolves."

Incidentally, that was Jackson's last sketching trip with Thomson or on his own, for soon afterwards he was heading for the war zone with a rifle.

Thomson, born near Owen Sound, was a commercial artist in Toronto, and made his first trip into the Ontario wilds in 1912, returning to the city and commercial routine in the winter. Jackson, who had the advantage of art training in Montreal and Europe, was helpful in showing Thomson the way to a broader handling of paint, while essential material encouragement to carry on was accorded by Dr. James MacCallum, who was a friend of both artists.

Thomson viewed the wilds with sympathy and employed a fine color sense in setting down his impressions, without exaggeration or distortion. While stamped with his individuality, the scenes are those which always impress lovers of the silent places.

With the ripening of his art he enjoyed the patronage of private collectors as well as of public galleries. Among his works in the National Gallery at Ottawa are "Moonlight, Early Evening," "Northern River," "Spring Ice," "The Jack Pine" and "Autumn's Garland."

DOUGLAS, MCGILL'S NEW PRINCIPAL, ONCE MENTIONED FOR WHITE HOUSE

Beatty Announces Naming of Former U.S. Budget Director

HAS QUEBEC BACKGROUND

Father and Grandfather
Were Born Here—Is Rockefeller Foundation Trustee

Gazette - October 6th, 1937.

DR. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS

New York, October 4.—Lewis W. Douglas is two men: the fighter and the scholar.

One is the man with as consistent a record of fighting for those things in which he believes as any man in public life.

The other is the quiet young man—he is only 43 now—who as a second lieutenant of the 347th Field Artillery, A.E.F., who in off duty spells, amid the roar of guns, read his Palgrave's Golden Treasury.

"I am not a specialist," he says.

One is the Hon. L. W. Douglas, a Representative of Arizona, who fought his party and his state in behalf of a sound financial policy and who, as director of the budget, worked 18 hours a day to line it up; who cut the huge sum of $400,000,000 out of the benefits, allowances and pensions of 1,100,000 veterans and their dependents, and who resisted the efforts of veterans' organizations to get some, at least, of those cuts restored.

The other is the "Lew" Douglas whom dogs and children like, for whose hook fish leap clear out of the water, whom men—not to mention women—admire.

Once there was—two generations ago—a certain James Douglas carrying his books up and down the steep—intellectual and otherwise—of Edinburgh. He was one of the best of the scientific students in that ancient seat of learning. He lectured afterward, on scientific subjects, at Oxford.

Also when he was not working at science he was working at music—he was a fine pianist. He also was an omnivorous reader. He lectured at Oxford on history. And, lecturing, he went on to Queen's University in Canada. He wrote books of history. But music and metallurgy were his minor and major passions. And it was the metallurgy that took him to Arizona by way of New York, in the '70s—for the hard, practical reason that his father had willed him a lot of debts and he had to forsake the graces for the realities. So he went to Arizona and started the first electrolytic refinery and realized the prospector's dream—the discovery of a world-beating mine, the "Bisbee Queen," which seemed to pour forth more copper than all the prospectors in the world had ever imagined. And the town of Douglas, Arizona, was born and christened and grew up.

All this story of his grandfather—and much more, no doubt—is essential to the understanding of "Lew" Douglas. Because it was his grandfather who was his most intimate friend and companion right up into his manhood, and it is his grandfather who remains his hero and ideal.

At Amherst Douglas read history and literature; at Massachusetts Tech, mining and metallurgy. He was studying at Massachusetts Tech when the U.S. entered the war. He promptly went to the Officers' Training Camp at the Presidio in San Francisco. By July of '18 that lowest form of military life, a second lieutenant, he was off (with a copy of Palgrave's Golden Treasury in his pocket) for France, where his outfit, the 347th Field Artillery, stationed its guns in the Argonne. Soon he was transferred to the Communications Service with headquarters of the 91st Division, given the job of organizing and co-ordinating the personnel of the runners in the front lines. He got a promotion. He was cited by Pershing during the Argonne offensive. He was decorated by Belgium during Lys-Escourt.

After the war, when Douglas was beginning to get fit again, he taught history at Amherst for a time. But the west and mining were in his blood. "Lew" Douglas went after lead. For two years he worked as a laborer in the mines. At night he read—history and economics. He likes books such as Salter's "Recovery," Beard's "American Civilization," Taylor's "Medieval Mind."

He did some experimenting at new processes, made some discoveries on his own. Funny thing, too, he says:

"It was partly a success, partly a failure. What people said would work, didn't. What they said wouldn't succeed did. Reclaiming the dumps worked. The new lead mines were a failure."

Meanwhile he married pretty Peggy Zinssner, daughter of the New York scientist, F. G. Zinssner, and niece of the scientist. Hans Zinssner, who has been widely publicized in connection with his work on typhus. Mrs. Douglas is a Smith girl. Her house in Georgetown, Washington, wears the neat air of perfection and sun and flowers. It is gay with the presence of their children.

She set up housekeeping first in Phoenix, Arizona, and loves the country she has left behind. She was interested in her husband's first campaign—for the State Legislature—interested in the people and the problems the Legislature offered.

Her husband's philosophies of politics had been developed in his own mind. He seems to think he would like to try them out more widely in the laboratory of experience.

Mr. Douglas' reputation as a fighter is hard-won. As a young congressman from Arizona, as a protagonist of President Roosevelt in the 1932 campaign and as director of the Federal Budget in 1933 and 1934 he talked and fought so valiantly for economy that his name almost became synonymous with the word.

When the first Economy Bill he helped draft was scuttled, when the President turned from Douglas philosophy of a balanced budget as a program of increased spending, he declined to go along, resigned in September, 1934, from his powerful post as the "eleventh member" of the Roosevelt cabinet and since has been one of the New Deal's most severe critics.

His resignation and his subsequent highly vocal opposition are fully in line with his character as expressed publicly through his six years as a congressman and his year and a half as budget director.

A world war veteran, he opposed the Adjusted Compensation Act, or bonus bill, as unnecessary and an unwarranted burden on the government. As a new member of a usually inarticulate House of Representatives he stood against the then speaker, John N. Garner, with such quiet courage that he drew the admiring comment from Cactus Jack: "That boy has guts."

As director of the budget he stood against the President and most of Roosevelt's other advisers until such time as he saw he could do little to stem the tide. When it was popular to be "dry" he was for repeal of the Eighteenth amendment and when an attempt was made to boo and hiss him off the stump in Arizona because of his unpopular bonus stand he shouted that they didn't have to vote for him but they had to listen to him and in that and subsequent speeches so impressed his views on the voters that they returned him to Congress.

Modern French Pictures at Scott's Gallery

The exhibition season opened at Scott's galleries on Saturday with the annual exhibition of work by French painters of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The twenty painters who are represented in it provide a fairly wide variety of styles of painting and by several of them are pictures which are rather out of the ordinary. There are, for instance two pictures by Gauguin, fairly early works, not of the south seas but Brittany landscapes, quiet and green. Six pictures by Camille Pissarro range from a big landscape, painted in the sixties,—a fine picture, which is much more typical of its time than of its painter,—through some small pictures of the Seine and of London to a quite late study of light and atmosphere at Dieppe.

There are eight works by Renoir in this exhibition, the most important of which is a portrait of a woman in a large hat, a very good example of his later work; there are several small figure pictures and two flower pictures,—a very good one of lilacs in a jar and formal arrangement of a festoon of red and yellow roses. The most striking of seven pictures by Cezanne is a large one of a village and church, left as an unfinished suggestion; there are similar suggestions of a landscape and the merest beginning of a water color of some flowers, and a picture of three skulls, which is the only one of the seven which is finished in the ordinary sense of the word. By Boudin there are one of his admirable little sketches of fashionably dressed people at Trouville, a fine landscape of the citadel at Villefranche, an interesting picture of Rouen in greys and browns and three others. A green river scene, a good study of snow and a broadly and strongly painted picture of cliffs and shore at Hastings represent Sisley.

There are two very interesting pictures by Toulouse-Lautrec; the kinder of them is a portrait of a poet in a tall hat, the other "L'Accroche-cœur" is a brutally true study of a woman. Modigliani is well represented by a portrait, in which he labels another painter. A woman's head by Picasso is of interest as a study in solid geometry, and by him are also a small abstraction which includes an open window, and a quite normal figure sketch. Dufy's shorthand painting is amusing in a picture of Deauville, but does not come off in a picture of an old house among trees.

A little sketch of a girl by Corot, a rather decorative formal landscape by Lucrat, a very slight sketch of a sailing boat by Degas, three typical street scenes by Utrillo, and works by Matisse, Bonnard, Redon, Jongkind, and Cuillard are also in this exhibition, which comes from the Reid and Lefevre galleries in London.

Last Sending in Date For R.C.A. Is Nov. 6

Notices and entry forms for the 58th annual exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts have been sent out by E. Dyonnet, R.C.A. secretary. The show, to be held in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, will open on November 18, and the forms filled out and signed must be returned to Mr. Dyonnet, 1207 Bleury street, Montreal, on or before November 6.—also the last sending in date for paintings, sculpture, architectural drawings, etchings, drawings and designs, which must be delivered to The Art Association of Montreal, 1379 Sherbrooke street, west, Montreal. Works sent in after November 6 will not be received.

Mr. Dyonnet at the Royal Canadian Academy dinner here two years ago touched on the tribulations of a secretary when express men and other delivery services knocked at his studio door and announced the presence in the street below of crates of paintings. The secretary welcomes entries to the R.C.A. show, but he wants only the signed forms, while the Art Association is waiting for the actual works. Gazette, 25th Sep 1937.

THE OPENING lecture of the season at the Art Association will take place on Monday, when Huger Elliot, Director of the Department of Education at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, will speak.

New Pictures By M. A. Fortin

At Eaton's galleries Marc Aurele Fortin has an exhibition which contains some of the best work that he has done. Mr. Fortin has always his own way of seeing and painting nature, which he translates into a language of his own, and in these new pictures he has found a consistency and a sort of balance between parts which was sometimes wanting in his former work. In a few of these pictures, particularly in the smaller ones, he approaches nature more closely. A little sketch of barges at Pointe aux Trembles and among the bigger ones, a group of trees at Ste. Rose, keep fairly close to nature, but in most of his larger work he makes formalized patterns out of the natural materials and some of them are decidedly striking decorations. One of the best, which is quite unlike all the others is of a group of trees in autumn,—a really decorative arrangement of reds and yellows. In most of the others he keeps chiefly to strong greens, whites and blacks,—often with very good effect. In these pictures there are fewer of the black skies, to which he was addicted in some of his former work, but in one or two of them there are portentous clouds and terrific storms, which are parts of the composition.

The pictures are mostly oil paintings. Two pastels are simple and bright arrangements of color, a little hard but rather successful. These are on tinted grounds instead of the black, which Mr. Fortin uses in most of his oil pictures. The water colors of which there are a few, are not so good, and Mr. Fortin has not yet quite succeeded in adapting his way of painting to figures and animals.

Portraits and Landscapes by Sherriff Scott

Star — 22.10.37

The exhibition of works by Adam Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., which is being shown at the Watson Gallery on Sherbrooke Street, has a very pleasant diversity of subjects and a good deal of variety in the ways of painting them. There are, of course, some portraits and portrait studies of the kind that Mr. Scott always does very well; the striking half length of "Le Quebecois" and a very good "Study in brown and grey" is in this exhibition, as well as some good studies of heads of men; one of the best is a head, strong and full of character, of "The old Lobsterman."

Most of the pictures here are landscapes and seascapes, and there are some interesting differences in the ways,—ancient and modern,—in which Mr. Scott has treated the landscapes. One, of a mill pool at Georgeville, Que., has an oldish and quite English quality in its painting; a little picture, with a certain suggestion of Barbizon, of two men cutting up a big tree, is a good one and might well be a study for a bigger picture. These and a few others may be experiments and most of the landscapes are painted in a more modern way, and there are good composition, colour and light among them. A study of shaded water under trees in "The sand scow," a group of maples on a hill top and a little picture of a covered bridge at Fitch Bay are some of the best of these.

Shore pictures are an important part of this exhibition. Some of these are of places on the Maine coast, and some pictures of breaking seas and wet rocks are outstanding among these,—good compositions and remarkable studies of moving spray. There is a pleasant little view of docks at Booth Bay and there are several good pictures of boats; one of a yacht in a shed has a very happy effect of light and shade and there is a nice pattern in a group of boats at a pier at Georgeville. A few very successful flower pictures complete this interesting collection.

Drawings by Milton Osborne

Star — 3.10.37

In the print room of the Art Association of Montreal an exhibition of drawings by Milton S. Osborne, F.A.I.C., professor of architecture in the University of Manitoba, has just been opened. Most of these are quite slight pencil drawings with occasional touches of color, and seem to be the travel sketches and diversions of an architect. Some are studies of details of old buildings, chiefly in New England and California, but most of the drawings are impressions of modern buildings and groups of buildings, skyscrapers and others, in New York, Chicago and other cities, with a few of Vancouver, Montreal and Winnipeg. There are pleasant, and sometimes pretty, effects of grouping and distance in many of them. There are a few good drawings of totem poles in British Columbia, and some water colors of houses and landscapes, but these have the quality of the new.

PORTRAIT OF BENEFACTOR UNVEILED

Shown above is the portrait of Dr. James Douglas, donor of the bequest which made possible the erection of the Douglas Hall of Residence, and grandfather of the newly-appointed principal, Dr. Lewis Williams Douglas.

The portrait, executed by Sir Wylie Grier, R.C.A., was unveiled this afternoon by Lord Tweedsmuir, Visitor to the university, in the refectory of the new residence for men following its official opening by His Excellency the Governor-General.

Surrealistic Art to Be Exhibited Here

It is promised that Canada's most modern artists will reveal their skill at the National Produced in Canada Exhibition, in the Sun Life Building next month, where a feature will be a Gallery of Advanced Art. Pictures that are considered too "modern" for official art galleries but which typify the newest in Canadian art will provide the display.

In charge of selections for this exhibit is Fritz Brandtner whose work is recognized as outstanding among the modern group. He is now receiving entries from artists in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal.

Many of the pictures to be displayed will, it is said, be daring in conception and far removed from the traditional Canadian school, the subjects to include landscapes, portraits, studies and abstract designs. In Montreal paintings are being selected by Mr. Brandtner while in Toronto entries are being submitted through the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Color.

In the collection will be Canadian works which are the nearest approach in this country to Surrealism, says the advance notice.

Norwell Exhibits at Johnson Galleries

Paintings by Graham Norwell, of Montreal, are on view today at the Johnson Art Galleries, 1340 St. Catherine street west, and the show should add materially to the number of admirers of this artist's work. Norwell, who favors Laurentian and Gatineau Valley scenery at all seasons, shows his particular bent for watercolors, though there are some good forceful examples in oils. He was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, and came to Canada in 1914. In 1924 he was elected a member of the Ontario Society of Artists. Norwell is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by an oil entitled "Winter."

HANDICRAFT WORK ON MEDIEVAL BASIS

Gazette Oct. 18.37.
Effort to Perpetuate Native Skill Stressed by Dr. C. F. Martin at Opening

The true purpose of art is perfection in the making of an object; things not well made display a lack of imagination and a mind not in good working order. Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the Art Association of Montreal, stated at the official opening of the annual exhibition and prize competition of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild in the galleries of the association on Saturday afternoon.

There was a deeper significance in the display than many could imagine, he said. It was not merely an exhibition of labor, but an effort to perpetuate a skill and technique distinctive to Canada. The organization could be compared to the medieval guilds, representing as it did work of a high order that should stimulate future generations to continue the high standards of the present.

In congratulating the exhibitors, Dr. Martin stressed the point that they were not only helping Canada directly by their work, but also were encouraging settlers in this country to continue the particular domestic handicrafts learned in their native land. There was a pride of achievement, he added, in creating something which through technical skill and beauty could not put a hallmark on the work of a people; anything well made was a work of art, whether a building, an engine or a basket.

The exhibition covers a wide variety of goods sent from all sections of the country, although the greater part originated in the Province of Quebec. Textile goods of different types make up the majority of the exhibits, hand woven blankets and rugs being particularly noticeable through their intricate designs and bright colors. Other forms of domestic industry are well represented, however, including pottery, leather work, metal work and woodcarving. It is expected that this year's display, which will remain here until the end of the month, will prove to be of even greater interest to the public than the exhibitions of other years.

Dr. Martin was introduced at Saturday's opening by A. T. Galt Durnford, president of the Quebec branch of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild. Among the members of the committee who attended were: Mrs. C. F. Martin, Mrs. A. T. Galt Durnford, Colonel and Mrs. Wilfrid Bovey, Dr. and Mrs. W. D. Lighthall, Dr. and Mrs. F. M. G. Johnson, Mrs. N. K. Laflamme, Colonel and Mrs. Gerald Birks, Professor and Mrs. John Hughes, Mr. and Mrs. L. St. J. Haskell, Mr. and Mrs. Lionel Judah, Mr. and Mrs. G. S. Currie, and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Patch.

A. SHERRIFF SCOTT HAS ONE-MAN SHOW

Local Painter Reveals Skill and Versatility in Exhibition at Watson's

MANY IN ATTENDANCE
Gazette 18.10.37
Collection Includes Portraits, Landscapes, Marines, Interiors, Flowers and Still Life—On Till Oct. 30

Adam Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., is holding his first "one-man" show in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, and he must have been encouraged by the attendance which marked the opening on Saturday, and cheered even more by the presence of the ruby disc that indicated purchase.

Sherriff Scott has long been recognized as a sincere painter of sound performance. Over a period of years he has been represented in the Spring shows of the Art Association of Montreal, and at the Royal Canadian Academy exhibitions, but the present occasion gives him a chance to display his versatility. In this collection of around fifty works there is not a dull note, and the sense of monotony is entirely absent. He has the faculty of finding paintable material everywhere—flowers, still life, marines, beach scenes, lake and mountain, old buildings, interiors, landscapes, country roads and portraiture.

With portraiture he is uniformly successful in likeness, placing and in color harmonies. A striking example is "Le Quebecois," here reproduced, in which the subject of virile type is set against a reddish brown background. Wearing a fur hat and a belted fur-trimmed coat, the man is running no risks in the cold, for a red scarf supplies additional warmth—and the high color note, and modernity, is revealed in the zipper fastening of the windbreaker. The head is capably modelled and the expression a bit quizzical. "Studio Visitor" is marked by dignity and fresh color—a lady in a red dress and a fur coat looking at a framed painting. "Harmony in Brown and Grey"—a woman seated at a table and fingering a wine glass, is an arrangement in tones that is completely satisfying.

The lectures for young people will be given on Thursday at 4:15 p.m., starting this week. They are as follows: "A Trip Down the Nile—The Tombs and Temples of Egypt," with motion pictures, Miss Anne Savage; "A Visit to Chartres Cathedral—the Making of Stained Glass," with motion pictures, Miss Anne Savage; "Art in Nature—A Talk on Flowers," with lantern slides, Prof. R. D. Gill, McGill; and "The Making of an Etching," with motion pictures, R. W. Pilot, R.C.A.

The program of art education got under way Saturday morning when 80 selected pupils from Montreal and Westmount schools attended the new "Children's Hour" when they were given art instruction by Miss Anne Savage.

There is a portrait, too, of Mrs. Harry Clapperton which, with other examples, will please the discerning.

This Montreal artist's flair for subjects is evident in the oil entitled "Yacht in a Shed"—rather uncompromising material from which Sherriff Scott has conjured interest—the gleaming prow touched by the light from a window, the glint of sunlit grass suggested by glimpses through a crack and the broken base of a plank, a small keg, the inevitable litter of such a place and the overturned canoe in the loft. All these objects are capably painted and right in value. Less of an artistic "find," but in every way quite as capable, is "In the Blacksmith's Shop," with the usual equipment of a farrier.

Ogunquit, Maine, where the painter was this year, has supplied good subjects—"The Gulley," a rocky cleft in a wooded rise in sunlight that sparkles on the fresh green foliage. "Solitude"—a spacious summer sky and the sea breaking in gentle waves upon the sandy beach; "Rose Cove," with a change in the weather's temper—sea, spray, squared rocks and wheeling gulls; "An Offshore Wind," with weight and turbulence to the sea and the spray being whipped off in the blow. For free summary treatment of rocks and surf piling over them, "Incoming Tide" says all that need be said in the simplest and most convincing manner. In spirit, tone and technique it is sound and satisfying. "Booth Bay Harbor, Me.," is a characteristic bit, with shored buildings, pile wharves, boats and reflections.

Nearer at home, the artist has found good subjects in "The Narrows Bridge, Fitch Bay"—an old covered structure with fenced approaches, stone piers at both shores which are mirrored in the placid water; "The Road to Fitch Bay," with a noble sprawling tree that throws a transparent shadow across the road, a stretch of landscape and a distant blue ridge; "Heath; Owl's Head and Mount Orford," as seen across the stretch of blue lake from a sun-splashed wharf in the foreground; "Owl's Head from the Narrows" shows the blue peak above a ridge screened by trees; "The Beach, Macpherson Bay, Georgeville," has a boat beached beside a derelict section of a larger craft. At Georgeville, Sherriff Scott painted one of his most effective works, "After the Shower"—figures in bathing dress on a wharf, at which are moored several boats. This is done in a direct, sure manner, the design and fine values marking it as an outstanding performance.

There is sound, solid painting in "The Fallen Giant, Isle of Orleans"—men chopping limbs from a huge uprooted tree, and of the same locale is "Loading Hay" with oxen hitched to the wagon.

This exhibition, which for the first time shows the many phases of Sherriff Scott's art, is, according to present plans, to last until October 30.

GRAHAM NORWELL SHOW AT JOHNSON'S

Hilly Country in Laurentians and Gatineau Region Interests Montreal Artist

FIRST "ONE-MAN" SHOW
Gazette, 18.10.37
Collection Reveals Painter's
Skill in Both Oils and Watercolors—Exhibition On Three Weeks

In the Johnson Art Galleries, Limited, 1340 St. Catherine street west, Graham Norwell, who, incidentally, this year won the Jessie Dow Prize for oils at the spring exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, is holding his first "one-man" show in this city. Norwell, who paints with competence in oils and watercolors, has found his favorite subjects in the Laurentians and in the Gatineau Valley. He knows these regions thoroughly, and while it is the winter season that chiefly interests him, he has included some glowing examples of autumn. Ability is shown in his treatment of rolling hills, and he has not ignored the decorative possibilities of tall, spindly spruces.

Norwell has an effective group of oils—"Laurentian Homestead," a building with partly melted snow on the roof, spruces, sunlit hills and a bridge over a creek; "Northern River," the stream winding beneath massive wooded hills, with tall spruces in the foreground; "Sunshine," a house, birches that throw shadows on the snow, and rolling hills; "Lake Nipissing," with stretch of water, ice, bold barren hills flecked with snow, and bare snow-edged trees in the foreground. These pictorial elements figure, too, in "Northern Lake."

Autumn is the season of "Rain," which breaks on the hills above a blue lake; while a more dramatic note is struck in "Storm," where lightning streaks the sky above hills that drop down to the ruffled water, a tree in the foreground, bending to the blast. "Laurentian Lake, Fall," shows plenty of rolling wooded hills gay with autumn foliage, water that mirrors the landscape, and nearby birches. A smaller version of "Lake Nipissing" is painted with force and simplicity—a bold headland in sunlight and shadow, blue hills, a stormy cloud and distant falling rain. "Moonlight" will appeal to many—a house with lighted windows, glimpse of lake, winding road with fence and darkened spruces. In oils, too, is an impression of Mont Tremblant, its massive sides glowing in autumn color.

The watercolors reveal Norwell's flair for this medium. Impressive is "Northern Lights"—log house in silhouette, lighted windows, spindly spruces and from horizon to zenith an expanse of "lights" of the waving ribbon type. Fenced road and a house figure in "On the Ottawa River," where the bush glows in the sunlight. "Near Baie St. Paul" is another attractive subject, while a series of rolling wooded hills and a glimpse of stream feature "Devil's River." The Gatineau country has furnished many interesting subjects at different seasons, while for vivid color "Autumn," with trees edging a little brook, is a bold performance. The Laurentian region figures in the watercolor group—in some skiers being introduced.

"Lac Ouimet," here reproduced, is a large watercolor handled with clarity and freedom—a house set against spruces edging the water that stretches to the base of the rolling heights about Mont Tremblant, and, in the foreground, a little wooden bridge over a creek winding between banks deep in snow.

"Falling Snow," with its bare birches, spruces, water and distant hills, is lovely in tone and poetic in conception. "March Day" well suggests, in the foreground, melting snow and moist earth.

Simpler in its elements and bolder in the breadth of treatment is "Northern Farm"—buildings with nearby woodpile, a mound of hay with poles to support the protecting tarpaulin, fence, spruces and the odd tree almost stripped of golden leaf, and, in the background, a noble mountain dark against a sky, brightening after a squall of rain that is moving away. In manner it is different from the bulk of the other paintings, which reveal Norwell's ability to set down vast expanses of hilly country, and has been so uniformly successful that the painter will undoubtedly employ it again in works where only a few close-up objects are the pictorial elements.

The show, which, according to present plans, is to last three weeks, is one that will interest those who love hill country, lakes and bits of off-the-track wilds. It represents considerable industry, and the level of excellence is generally maintained.

Sally Ryan, Young City Artist, To Show Sculptures in New York

Gazette, Oct. 18.37

New York, October 17.—(P)—Sally Ryan, an accepted artist at 21, will open her first United States' showing of sculpture here tomorrow after only four years of work and a scant three months of formal training.

Five years ago she was a school girl in Montreal, scribbling figures and faces in her textbooks. Today, she is an avowedly professional artist with dreams of doing something big and grand in stone some day.

"You never know when bronzes will be turned into ammunition," she says.

Grand daughter of the Thomas Fortune Ryan whose name represented $200,000,000 in industry and finance, she is an assured young woman with short-clipped blond hair, clear blue eyes and a firm hand clasp.

The talent in those hands was discovered quite accidentally. Her brother needed help in modelling a plasticine relief map for his geography lessons and, she said, "I found it was more fun working in the round than with pencil and paper."

After three months of study, she had the head of a laborer accepted for a Royal Canadian Academy of Arts show in Toronto. At 17 she was invited to show three pieces under the auspices of the Art Association of Montreal and went to Europe with her mother soon afterwards to begin work seriously.

Nearly all of her work since that time is included in the new exhibition. It was shown in London in July, shortly before she returned to America to spend a holiday at Banff, Alta.

In the group of 17 pieces are portraits of Miss Tilda Hammond, of Banff; Ellen Ballon, pianist of Montreal, who is here with Miss Ryan, and Ralph Gustafson, Canadian poet.

Very proud of having her work exhibited in New York, where she was born, Miss Ryan nevertheless was a little anxious about it today as she lunched with her father, Allan A. Ryan, tall and hale.

"I hope this showing will be successful," she said, "for his sake"

Costume And Scenic Designs To Be Shown On Moyse Hall Stage

AN exhibition which provides a graphic illustration of the work that is being done by the drama classes of English 13 and 22 in the Department of English at McGill University is to be inaugurated on the stage of Moyse Hall tomorrow. This will consist of a display of costume and scenic designs by both instructors and students. These designs were on view recently at the Art Gallery and so much interest was aroused by them that it was decided to extend the public showing of them at Moyse Hall for a fortnight.

The designs were either prepared or supervised by instructors in the drama section to act as guides for the numerous productions undertaken by the English Department in the course of the past few seasons. Apart from the intrinsic interest in the designs themselves, they speak highly for the care and thought which has been put into the teaching of practical dramatics at the university.

Art Instruction Provided Free For Talented Montreal Children

Following a lead given by England and the United States, a new movement in the art education of children has been inaugurated here, Dr. Charles F. Martin, president of the Art Association of Montreal, announced yesterday. The movement, which got under way officially Saturday morning at the Art Association building at 1379 Sherbrooke street west, seeks to give talented juveniles a chance to further their progress in artistic fields with no financial burden.

Earlier in the year, stated Dr. Martin, "circulars were distributed to principals of some 40 Protestant schools in Montreal and Westmount, asking that each select two of their most promising pupils, possessing ability in any of the creative arts. Yesterday 80 youngsters reported for the new "Children's Hour" in a study room in the association building. They were supervised by Miss Anne Savage, well-known artist and teacher, with the assistance of Miss Ethel Seath, a teacher of the "Montreal Study."

The children, who were provided with camp stools and other materials, will sit in the gallery and will be given free instruction in drawing, painting and modelling, as in all the large U.S. museums. A dark room has been specially fitted up off the gallery where films on art subjects will be shown.

This new method of art instruction, Dr. Martin stressed, marked a significant advance in the art education of children locally, as a very selective class of pupil was obtained. He noted the assistance rendered by Mrs. K. M. Winslow, who has charge of one of the art sections of the Junior League, in furthering the new movement here.

As well as the Saturday morning "Children's Hours," he added, an illustrated talk for children of association members will be given every Thursday afternoon at 4.15. The Saturday morning features will begin at 9.30 o'clock.

Children's Lecture at The Art Association

A lecture for young people, on Egypt by Miss Anne Savage, at the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday afternoon, attracted an audience which was too big for the small lecture room in which it was given. Many members of the audience were no longer very young, but they evidently were quite as much interested as the children.

Miss Savage began with a number of pictures of Egyptian monuments and works of art, which she described and explained in a way to stir up the imaginations of her hearers. She then went on to a moving picture film of modern Egyptian scenery and life, made for the Metropolitan Museum, which showed, among other things, how much the modern Egyptian peasant is like his ancestors.

This lecture, which was just the sort of thing to teach a little and make its hearers want to learn more, was the first of a series of afternoon lectures which the Art Association has arranged for this winter.

COLOR PRINTS EXHIBITED Gazette - 2.11.37

Display of Caricatures Being Shown at McGill

An exhibition containing some 300 examples of the work of British, American and foreign caricaturists, the majority of which are in color, was opened yesterday at the Redpath Library, McGill University. The display, which ranges in its scope from Hogarth to Peter Arno, will remain on view until the end of the year.

Most of the caricatures are representative of the phase of graphic art popular during the late 18th and early 19th centuries. Political and otherwise, cartoons by Rowlandson, Gilray, Cruikshank, Daumier, Max Beerbohm, "Ape" and "Spy" are shown, supplemented by a few examples of similar work in other hands.

Dr. G. H. Lomer, University Librarian, stated yesterday that he believed the exhibition to be the most comprehensive of its kind ever to be seen in Montreal. A few of the prints were loaned to McGill for the occasion, he said, but the greater part had been acquired by the University during the past few years with the assistance of a fund provided for the purpose by Lady Roddick.

Huger Elliott Speaks At Art Gallery Monday

On Monday afternoon at 4.45 o'clock will be held the opening lecture of the season at the Art Association, and it promises to be one of the important contributions of the series.

Huger Elliott, the lecturer, is Director of the Department of Education at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York. Son of a professor in the University of Tennessee, he attended Tulane University at New Orleans, when he followed with special interest the work in arts and crafts. He graduated from the School of Architecture at Columbia University, and subsequently became a teacher of art in the University of Pennsylvania.

He practised his profession in New York for some time, and then devoted two and a half years to further study at L'Ecole des Beaux Arts in Paris, where he also studied painting under Albert Besson. For some time he was a teacher also at Harvard, and in 1908 was appointed Director of Rhode Island School of Design. In 1911 he married Elizabeth Shippen Green, famous as an artist—more particularly interested in design. For many years her drawings and illustrations in various magazines created interest throughout America.

Huger Elliott is recognized as a lecturer of the first rank. For eight years he assumed charge of the educational work at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, and then transferred to the Pennsylvania Museum in Philadelphia.

For the last twelve years, as Director of Education in the Metropolitan Museum of New York, he has developed a scheme of art instruction which has been an example to other museums throughout the country.

Eastern and Western Art Were Compared in Lecture on Monday

The lecture season of the Art Association of Montreal began on Monday afternoon with a lecture by Huger Elliott, Director of Education in the Metropolitan Museum, New York, whose subject was the comparison of Eastern and Western art. Dealing only with pictures, which were shown in a number of lantern slides, Mr. Elliott showed the eastern artists concerned with mental and spiritual representation, and the western ones, since the more primitive painters, with visual representation. In many slides he showed the similarity between Chinese and early European painting in the absence of perspective and of light and shade, and he showed the development of these through such painters as Crivelli, Holbein, Rubens and Turner to modern Western painting. Some examples of Sargent's work were held up for, rather reluctant, admiration; some quite modern abstractions were held up as horrid warnings. The spirit and beauty of Chinese painting, of which many fine examples were shown in black and white, was the real subject of the lecture.

Next Thursday afternoon at 4:15 an additional lecture in the course for young people will be given at the Art Association by Miss Anne Savage. This will be a continuation of the lecture on Egypt, which she gave last week, and will be given in the library, which will hold more people than the downstairs lecture room.

Pictures by Eric Riordon

A collection of landscapes, which are quite as much studies of skies and atmosphere as pictures of places, by Eric Riordon is being shown at the Continental Galleries on St. Catherine street till the end of next week. There are a number of scenes in the Laurentian mountains, which are good in a familiar way; the effects of color in two of them—"A Laurentian Lake" and "Autumn afternoon, North River"—are particularly good; but Mr. Riordon has found in the White Mountains and in Gaspe some subjects which suit him much better and has done with them some of the best work that he has shown so far. The bolder and simpler shapes of the mountains have been used to very good purpose in "Solitude, Mount Washington, July," and in "Mount Washington, July," both with quite fine effects of space and distance. Two excellent skies, with light from the sun behind big hills are in "North Shore, Gaspe" and "Riviere a Claude," and there are more good skies in "Rain over Gaspe," "Clouds over Ste. Therese" and "Evening sun over Ste. Sauveur." The sky is also one of the good parts of a nice moonlight picture of a Gloucester schooner at anchor, as it is of a picture of an ice jam below the harbor bridge at Montreal. Two seashore pictures of waves breaking on rocks are very successful studies, and two other good sketches, which are quite unlike the rest of the exhibition are "The Lake," a view of a tree and almost empty space with a remarkable effect of atmosphere, and "Beach Prout's Neck," an open shore in bright sunlight, dotted with distant figures.

Huger Elliott Extols Eastern Abstract Art

The difference between the art of the East and that of the West is a difference of underlying concept, the difference taking the forms of an appeal to the "eye of the mind" in the case of the Chinese and Japanese, and an appeal to the physical eye in that of the West.

Choosing to delve no further back than Giotto, though the straining towards representation may be noticed earlier, Mr. Elliott did not suggest that this was at all a dominant factor in that master's work. An illustration to the contrary was shown from one of the painter's scenes from the Life of St. Francis in the Upper Church at Assisi. The slide illustrated the facade of the Roman temple at Assisi as Giotto used it and another showed actual building, which still stands. The Roman builder included six columns, while the artist felt the need of only five in his composition. An approach of selection, untroubled by the necessity of any methodical reproduction, showed the Western artist closely allied to the Chinese and Japanese painters.

Tracing the introduction and development of perspective, and the changes of chiaroscuro in its development, the speaker showed that the art of the West, as opposed to that of the East, was turning to the province of the physical eye which in its final end must only suffer defeat at the hands of the photographer. The early Italians, the linear qualities of Holbein and the contrasting work of Rubens, the paintings of Velasquez and those of Sargent (the latter he admired as almost a peak of realism) all tend to defeat their purposes in the striving towards this realism, claimed Mr. Elliott. He found the creating of an effect of movement disturbing to the beholder after the first impression.

But while deploring this lamentable feature in painting, he gained no consolation from the abstractionist schools of the present century, claiming that they did not stem fundamentally from nature as did the abstract painting of the East. Having thus rejected the representational and realist schools, and the reactionary developments which succeed them, Mr. Elliott turns to the delicate work of Eastern artists for a complete satisfaction. He showed the perfection of an abstract art that still had its roots in nature in displaying a Hokusai print, one of the Views of Fujiyama series, "The Wave," which he found to be the acme of all that in which the East excelled over the product of occidental civilization.

Women's Art Society Showing at Eaton's

There is evidence of industry and serious approach in the exhibition of work by members of the Women's Art Society of Montreal being held in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. Variety marks the subject matter which is interpreted in oils, watercolors and pastel. As usual, there are some good examples of flower painting—Lillian Hingston, with Zinnias and imposing lilies; Ida M. Huddell, who shows roses, besides landscape work; Mary E. Mullally, whose entry is a bowl of lilac; Francis Sweeney with boldly handled geraniums, and trilliums; Edith Glen who shows cyclamen; Eleanor W. Earle who finds violets interesting; Ethel Derrick, whose still life features flowers; Ida Beck with roses; Marjorie Allan, who fancies phlox, and "Anemones" and "Love in the Mist," from the brush of Mrs. Gordon Burgoyne.

There are a number of portrait studies, to which section the contributors are Ida Beck, Effie G. Richardson, Jean Pierce with a painting called "Dudley and Judy," and also a winter landscape, showing confidence and freedom, entitled "Lake at Morin Heights."

By Mrs. R. O. Sweeney are "Woodland Path," and "Harvest"; Mrs. G. Trim is effective with hills and lake called "A Cloudy Day," and has invested with atmosphere "The Canal." Annie Pringle brings autumn tones to "A Country Lane," and "Over the Bridge to Chertsey," and Ruth Henshaw has a sparkling watercolor of transparent qualities called "September Day." Beryl Forbes is effective in her oil called "The Henhouse Door," and "The Cottage Door" has been effectively treated by Vivian Walker.

Margaret C. Thompson has imparted weight to the breaking waves in "Storm Breakers—the Atlantic Coast," fresh air to the surf scene called "The Fishing Cove," and shows a nice appreciation of the watercolor medium in "Sunlit Shores."

The show is due to close November 25.

Painting by Holgate For Art Association

"The Bathers," by Montreal Artist, Acquired from W. Scott & Sons

"The Bathers," by Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., was acquired yesterday for the Art Association of Montreal from W. Scott and Sons, 1490 Drummond street, where the Montreal artist is holding a "one-man" show. It is an important picture, well arranged and marked by good tone, showing two young women in glowing light at the edge of a lake. The modelling of the nude figures is done without any tendency to sculptural treatment and the color scheme is one of subtle harmonies. It is a painting that will strengthen the representation by Canadian artists at the local Art Gallery.

Edwin Headley Holgate, R.C.A., was born at Allandale, Ont., and studied his profession under William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., at the classes of the Art Association of Montreal, and in Paris at l'Academie de la Grande Chaumiere, at the Julian Academy, and the Academie Colarossi under Millman. He has shown at the Paris Salon, in the important Canadian and American exhibitions, and his work is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa. He became the eighth member of the "Group of Seven," which has since been enlarged and bears another name.

The Women's Art Society's Show

The annual exhibition of the Women's Art Society of Montreal is being held again this year in the gallery of the Eaton Company, and is to remain open till next week. The society progresses, and in the sixty pictures which are shown the quality of work is higher than in previous exhibitions. Landscapes, of course, are the majority of the pictures and there are some good ones by Beryl Forbes, Mrs. G. Trim, R. Birmingham, Mrs. R. O. Sweeney, Margaret C. Thompson, Vivian Walker, and Evelyn Cunningham, with others in oil, water color or pastel by Winifred Lewis, Eleanor W. Earle, Ruth Henshaw, Jean Pierce, Edith M. Snaith, Marilla Adams, Kathleen Liebich, Amy Mulock, Margaret J. Sanborn, and Norah Smyth.

There are, as usual, many good flower pictures. Some of the more outstanding of these are by Lillian Hingston, Mrs. Gordon Burgoyne, Edith Glen and Ida Beck, with others by Marjorie Allan, Ida M. Huddell, Frances Sweeney and Mary E. Mullally. Some good still life studies are by Ethel Derrick, Beatrice M. Long and Norah Smyth. The portraits and figure pictures are only few; a notable one is Effie G. Richardson; and there is a good study of two small dogs by Annie Pringle.

Pictures by Star, 17.11.37

There is plenty of cheerful color of Canadian autumn in the exhibition of pictures, in oil and pastel, by Miss Berthe des Clayes, which is now being shown in the Watson galleries on Sherbrooke street. Many of these pictures, and the more striking of them, are true Quebec landscapes, at the best time of the year, with big masses of red and yellow foliage—the sort of pictures that are good to see in the winter, when all color and warmth are gone. Color is generally Miss des Clayes' principal subject, and there is more of it in the few flower pictures in this exhibition, cheerful compositions, freely and simply treated—and even in the pictures of winter or early spring, full of soft snow, but with some beautiful effects of color in skies and distances. Besides the landscapes there are some pictures of boats and figures in this gay exhibition. Miss des Clayes always paints boats very sympathetically and there are some good ones here, particularly in a little picture called Blue Rocks Harbour. One of the figure pictures is a very happy sketch of a man with two small children on the deck of a boat; the other is of two girls sitting on a cottage doorstep—a very light and vivid little picture.

BEAUTY OF AUTUMN WELL INTERPRETED

Berthe Des Clayes Reveals Versatility in Exhibition at Watson Art Galleries

FALL FAVORED SEASON

Montreal Painter Also Shows Ability in Flower Pieces, Winter Scenes and Quaint Harbors

Paintings in oil and pastel by Berthe Des Clayes bring many gay notes to the walls of the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, for the major theme is "Celebrating the Beauty of Autumn." Miss Des Clayes has always been a admirer of the Canadian fall, has had the courage to revel in vivid but controlled color, and is generally successful with the flaming scarlet peculiar to the maples.

It is a happy show—no dismal gloom. Even the deepening dusk of sundown seems to bear promise of a morrow with smiling blue skies. Further, the exhibition more than usual reveals the artist's versatility. There are some paintings in which children figure, as in "The Captain and the Crew," and "In a Nova Scotia Orchard," with a girl feeding turkeys. In the background is an apple tree in blossom—once a much favored theme. In fact if memory serves, Miss Des Clayes showed fruit trees in bloom the first time she exhibited in Montreal, at the old Art Gallery on Phillips Square. Then, too, her brush has found congenial subjects in the quiet ports of Cornwall—Nevagissey, with old houses, stone quays and moored fishing boats; Pentewen, with a schooner at the wharf, quayside houses, backed by a wooded rise, and water a-dance with reflections, and, judging by the wooden piles, of this country, "The Blue Schooner," with a background of rambling wooden buildings and figures on the wharf; "Low Tide," boats at edge of a stretch of water; and the gleaming water, boats, and buildings of a quiet cove at sunset, done at Blue Rocks Harbor. There are also a couple of paintings of blooms—"An Arrangement of Flowers" being effective in its high color notes and convincing suggestion of zinnias and asters in a bowl.

AUTUMN AND WINTER.

Coming to the season when foliage flares, there are many examples that show a genuine love for this phase of the passing year—"The Golden Elm," noble and vivid above the maples at its base; "Plowing near Melbourne"—vivid trees edging a sweep of river, and the plowman and his horses approaching rising ground; "A Hillside Pasture, Indian Summer Day," with cows in yellowing pasture, backed by gold and scarlet maples under a blue sky; "A Country Road, Autumn"—houses amidst gay foliage; "Golden October," maples and a low ridge, farmhouse and a farmer tending his horses at the edge of plowed land; "Old Red House, Melbourne Valley," and "The Outlet from the Lake, St. Agathe," to mention some of the subjects.

Of a more inclement season are "Maple Sugar House, Rougemont"—men gathering sap, horse with barrel on sleigh and the shack in the bush; "Hauling Ice, St. Francis River"—team with its load being led up a tree-edged rise and in the distance open water where the ice is being cut; "The Road to Ste. Agathe, Evening," with team disappearing down the tree-lined road; a variant of this scene being "Winter Afternoon," with distant hills. Houses, bare trees and open water are the pictorial elements of "Melting Ice on the North River," and it is moist, muddy going for the two-horse wagon in "A Sunny March Day, Como." "The Village Store, St. Andrews East" with its sleigh, figures and buildings is effective, and of winter in the city is "Dominion Square"—men shovelling snow into sleighs on Dorchester street, with the Bourget monument and St. George's Church seen beyond the trees.

The works, which represent praise-worthy industry and an evidently sincere appreciation of the subjects depicted, remain on view until November 27.

DR. LEWIS DOUGLAS PAYS VISIT TO CITY

McGill's Principal Stops Here for a Day on Private Gazette Business 17.11. 1937

IS KEEN FOR NEW POST

Has No Specific Plans for University, But States Belief in Non-Dogmatic Education System

"I have never been as enthusiastic over any job as I am over this new one. I am very keen, and my only fear is that I may not do justice to it."

Thus modestly Dr. Lewis Williams Douglas, of New York and Phoenix, Arizona, former director of the U. S. budget in the Roosevelt Administration, spoke yesterday of his new appointment as Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University.

Interviewed at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, Dr. Douglas, who was only in town for the day and that on personal business not connected with McGill, stated that he had not had time to visit the university; he does not take over from Acting-Principal Dr. W. H. Brittain until January 1. But he did have something to say about McGill.

"McGill," stated the grandson of the late Dr. James Douglas, formerly Chancellor of Queen's University at Kingston, Ont., and benefactor of McGill, "has a reputation in my country that is second to none. Not only her scholastic standing, which is everywhere respected as authoritative, compels respect, but the graduates she has produced can take their place with credit in any line of endeavor. My only hope is that as Principal I will be able to do justice to the red and white."

The incoming Principal and Vice-Chancellor, whose father and grandfather were both born in Quebec, was loath to talk about his policies and any new plans he might entertain.

"I don't know anything about that yet," he explained, "for I will have to go over the ground very carefully. But I am very keen because I feel it is going to be the biggest thing in my life."

BELIEVES IN OPEN MIND.

The educationist, who does not plan to give up his American citizenship while holding the post as head of McGill, is not a believer in that school of thought which seeks to set up a type, or which urges students to work along given premisses.

"I think," he stated, "that thinking along definite premisses has given rise to a great many of the troubles that afflict us today. I like to see an open mind on any subject. What is wanted, I believe, is more analysis, more good sound thought and study given to a question before an opinion is formed. There is an awful lot of jumping to conclusions and wishful thinking going on today."

Dr. Douglas is a trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation, the General Education Board, Amherst College, the American Museum of Natural History, the Memorial Hospital of New York and the Teachers' Insurance and Annuity Association of America. He served in France as a first lieutenant with the 91st Division, winning the Belgian Croix de Guerre and a citation from General Pershing. He played baseball at Amherst, and while in Congress pitched for the Democratic members of the House against the Republican team. His career has been so varied that he modestly disclaims any profession, and he has often been described as "a practical economist who believes in economy."

Mrs. Douglas accompanied him on his brief visit here, returning with him to New York.

Named Academy Trustee

(Special from The New York Times to The Gazette.)

New York, November 16. — Dr. Lewis W. Douglas, principal of McGill university and former director of the budget, was elected a trustee of the Academy of Political Science at a meeting of the board of trustees today.

National Gallery of Canada Buys Eighth Robinson

SUNDAY IN THE COUNTRY, painted by Albert H. Robinson, R.C.A., which has been acquired by the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, from the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street, west, Montreal, is a broadly handled interpretation of a typical rural Quebec scene. This painting, which has "Return from Mass" as an alternative title, is marked by agreeable color and is effective in design. The acquisition brings the works of this painter in the National Gallery of Canada to eight, the others being "The Thames at Westminster," "Evening Lights," "Winter Sunrise," "Village on the Gulf," "Melting Snows, Laurentians," "A Church in Westmount," "Noontime in the Hills." He is also represented in Le Musée National du Luxembourg, Paris.

Albert Henry Robinson, R.C.A., was born at Hamilton, Ont., and first studied under John S. Gordon, A.R.C.A. Later in Paris he continued his studies at the Académie Julian under Bouguereau and Baschet; and at the Ecole des Beaux-Arts under Gabriel Ferrier. Returning to Canada, Mr. Robinson for a time taught at the Hamilton Art School. He was elected A.R.C.A., 1911, and R.C.A., 1921. He worked for the Canadian War Memorials in 1918. Mr. Robinson's studio is in Montreal.

R.C.A. President and Council Receive at Art Association

The President and Council of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts entertained last evening at a reception for the opening of the 58th annual exhibition of the Academy in the Galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, when more than 800 guests attended. Sir Wyly Grier, of Toronto, president of the Royal Canadian Academy, and his daughter, Mrs. W. V. Scully, of Toronto, received, assisted by Mr. W. S. Maxwell, vice-president, and Mrs. Maxwell.

Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the Art Association of Montreal, opened the exhibition. In a few remarks he explained that the primary function of all art museums was to increase an appreciation of art and to develop something creative for the benefit of the artistic life of the community. He believed that the day had long since passed when an art gallery was a mere storehouse of treasures. Today the displays of objects in a museum of arts must envisage something more than delight to the eye, he said. It must have educational value, and for that reason the setting in many galleries was contemporaneous with the periods of the matter exhibited.

ART ASSOCIATION TO OPEN GALLERY

Improvements and Repairs Made Throughout Building

Tonight the art gallery of the Montreal Art Association on Sherbrooke Street West will be open to members for the first time in history from its skylit attic studios to its newly established art study rooms for children in the basement.

The occasion is the opening of the Royal Canadian Academy exhibition of paintings in five of the halls. It is also the first chance that members of the Montreal Art Association will have of judging the improvements and repairs just completed under the supervision of Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the association.

These alterations have been extensive and their expense has been defrayed by several prominent Montrealers who realized that the building and its appointments had suffered with the years.

NEW EFFORTS

Last night Dr. Martin told of new efforts to spread the appreciation of art among Montrealers, already undertaken by the association.

He told of a class of 100 boys and girls, most of them from the public schools of the city, who now meet on Saturday mornings in the basement to hear lectures and see lantern slides of famous paintings and statuary, and of efforts being made to teach them how to draw and model in clay.

He described a series of lectures on Thursday afternoons intended at first for young people, but already attended by many adults; lectures which describe various phases of artistic activity, such as etching, pottery making, and the casting of bronzes, all illustrated with motion picture films.

"We hope," he continued, "to borrow and beg individual works of art from the homes of Montrealers, to exhibit them for a week at a time in a special nook. We'll call these exhibits the 'Treasure of the Week,' and I am certain that in them Montreal will be able to see many beautiful things which now are accessible to only a few people."

BRONZES EXHIBITED AT ART GALLERY

More than 2,500 persons visited an exhibition of 17 bronzes by Miss Sally Ryan in the Print Room of the Montreal Art Association, during Saturday and Sunday. The exhibition is to continue for two weeks. Miss Ryan, well known in Montreal, has had one of her bronze heads shown in the Paris Salon.

Acquisition by the association of colored reproductions of several of the Old Masters has been announced, the reproductions to be hung at a later date.

Royal Canadian Academy Show Is Opened at Art Association

Portraiture Represented by Good Examples and Landscapes as Usual Predominate—
High Standard Set for 58th Exhibition—Renovated Galleries
Make Splendid Setting Gazette,
Nov. 19th.37

High is the level of the paintings and other works in the 48th exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, which opened with a private view in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal last night. Embellishments made to the appointments of the galleries—the lighting and especially the new neutral tone of the walls, serve to show what is good at its best. The hanging is admirable, and the jury of selection has shown the usual open mind—is not tied in its tastes to any one type of painting, but admits examples of individual interpretation, granted that sincerity, promise and technical knowledge are revealed.

As usual, there is a strong representation of portraiture. Sir Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., sends three—John A. Pearson, R.C.A., the Toronto architect, in academic gown of red and gold, holding in one hand a blueprint, the other hand touching a portfolio from which it was taken. It is handled in a direct confident manner. Miss Jessie K. Wilson is another successful subject, and lent by McGill University is a portrait of Dr. James Douglas, in robes, a dignified and sympathetically handled work. Incidentally Dr.

ing of the vari-colored covering to the reclining nude, called "Chinoiserie" stands high. He is also represented by "Carloffa," a portrait. F. W. Hutchison, has a typical rural Quebec scene in "The Melting Snow"—old houses with wide verandahs, children, sleighs in the road and a stretch of snowy landscape. Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., has a sunlit snowy landscape called "The Hillside Farm, Isle Jesus." J. W. Beatty, R.C.A., reveals his customary vigorous touch and rich color in "Rock Beech and Maple," a more solemn note in "Across the Valley, Autumn," and a glimpse of wild country in "Rampikes, Canoe Lake"—the old trees in the foreground, stretch of water, and a distant wooded shore. Fred S. Haines, R.C.A., shows a sunlit winter scene with snow-laden spruces, called "Zero Weather," and also "Cranberry Lake" with its wooded irregular shores and distant blue mountains, as seen from a rocky rise with pines in the foreground. R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., besides a vivid and freely handled Baie St. Paul scene—an open-air oven, with turkeys nearby, shows "October, St. Urbain, Que.," done in the same region—blue and purple mountains, ruddy brush, a glimpse of lake, and trees in autumn leaf in the foreground, under a grey illuminates country and buildings and throws a rainbow against the passing storm in the background. Frederick S. Challener, R.C.A., shows a group of mounted Indians, called "In the Days of Paul Kane." Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., shows a rather bleak scene called "A Northern Lake," and a typical rural bit in "The Old Farm." Charles De Belle, A.R.C.A., has a couple of low-toned pastels, and Frank Hennessey, A.R.C.A., is effective with his winter scene with horse and sleigh, entitled "Ice Cutting on the Pickenock."

An Old Country scene is the offering of Stanley Royle, A.R.C.A.,—cottages and a rocky landscape, entitled "Derbyshire, England." Manley Macdonald, A.R.C.A., sends three, "Forest Mills"—old mill with leaking flume, autumn trees and a stream, being good in tone. H. Mabel May, A.R.C.A., is represented by "The Lake," and Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A., besides two city vistas has a winter scene with church, buildings and sleighs, called "St. Sauveur, Quebec." Lawrence A. C. Pantou, A.R.C.A., goes imaginative in "Ocean Elegy," and Alice Innes, A.R.C.A., is effective with the rocks, road and brush in "Easter Time, Willistville." Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., shows Mountain Hill, Quebec, and another view of the Ancient Capital with grassy mound, Dorothy Hoover, John Humphries, Leonard Hutchison, Katharine T. Ide, Mrs. Eleanor Izard, Barbara Jeffreys, Freda Johnston, Hugh G. Jones, Ronald Kerr, Jean Langois, André Lapine, A.R.C.A., Patrick Larking, Dimitry S. Licushine, T. R. Macdonald, Mary Mack, Richard W. Major, Maximilian Maksolky, H. L. Masson, Helen McClain, Mrs. Christian McKiel, Bernard Middleton, Andre Morency, Mrs. Florence M. Mortimer, Rita Mount, Mrs. Jean Munro, Rowley Murphy, Alex. J. Musgrove, Frank Panabaker, W. J. Patterson, George Pepper, W. J. Phillips, R.C.A., with two attractive watercolors: Narcisse Poirier, Anne Pringle, May V. Procnier, Harry E. G. Ricketts, Eric Riordon, with sun-flushed snow, stream and trees—a North River scene; Goodridge Roberts, Tom Roberts, Mrs. Beatrice Robertson, Hugh D. Robertson, Charles H. Scott, Marguerite Scott, R. S. Scott, Ethel Seath, Avery Shaw, Leslie H. Smith, Owen Staples, Mrs. R. W. Steele, Joseph de Papp Sulyok, P. H. Tacon, James R. Tate, Maurice Thomas, Romeo Vincelette, Wm. P. Weston, A.R.C.A., Elizabeth Wilkes, Ethelreda Margaret Wilson.

Those exhibiting in the Architecture section are: Ernest I. Barott, A.R.C.A.; Richard E. Bolton, Noel Chipman, Fetherstonhaugh and

Pictures by Charles Kelsey Star 23.11.37

A little exhibition of pictures, chiefly in oil and water color, by Charles W. Kelsey is now being shown at the Jacoby Studio on Bishop street. The pictures are of many kinds, landscapes, townscapes and figure subjects. Some of the most attractive of the landscapes are the water colors of English scenery, some very happy views of the south coast, near Rye and other places and some of rural scenery in Sussex. The village street at Rodmill, Rye Harbour, a Buckinghamshire lane and a drawing of a man ploughing in Sussex, are the subjects of some of the best of these drawings. There are a few interesting water colors of street scenes in Montreal but most of the Canadian landscapes are oil sketches; one of a view from Mount Royal, and others of Lake Memphremagog and Val Morin are some of the more notable of these. Another effective oil sketch is of flowers by lamplight. The most important of the figure subjects, which are mostly in water color, is a large one of "Oberon and Titania", a very decorative composition of line and color. "Preparing for the bath" is a fine figure study with good color, and there are similar qualities of drawing and color in illustrations of "The sleeping beauty", "Old Mortality" and others.

Sculpture by Sally Ryan Star 25.11.37

A collection of heads, mostly in bronze, by Miss Sally Ryan is now being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal; some of these are portraits, some are studies of models, and in all of them there is a sense of life and strength. Miss Ryan, who now works in London, lived formerly in Montreal, where she began her work as a pupil of H. McRae Miller. One of the best and strongest of the portraits is that of the singer, Paul Robeson, which like several of the heads of men, is larger than life-size. There is life in the portraits of Val Gielgud and Ralph Gustafson, and the portraits of men are perhaps a little more successful than those of women, though the head of Miss Tilda Hammond is as good as any of them, and there is character in the bust of Miss Ellen Ballon. A big head of Arturo Toscanini is an impression, not a portrait, but has life and looks as Toscanini should look. Two of the best things in the collection, however, are studies of models,—the head of a cockney man, a sharp London type, and, better still, the head of a negress, called "La Martinique," made three years ago which is an excellent accent from the hand under the chin and the big knot of the handkerchief at the back of the head.

Sally Ryan Show Opens

An exhibition of the work of Sally Ryan, young Canadian sculptress, is now on display in the print room of the Art Association gallery on Sherbrooke street. Miss Ryan, who is the daughter of Mrs. S. Tack Ryan of Montreal and Allan A. Ryan of New York, recently showed her sculpture in New York. Earlier she also had an exhibition in London. Gazette, 23.11.37

Portrait of Florence H. McGillivray, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., by Marion Long, R.C.A.

Douglas was the grandfather of the new Principal of McGill. Alphonse Jongsers has a breezy portrait of Sir James Dunn, Bart., in yellow sweater, blue blazer, holding a pipe, and of the Marquis de Simone, much be-medalled and holding a cigarette. Kenneth Forbes, R.C.A., beside the portrait of a comely girl holding two trout, called "The Catch," is represented by an official portrait of President H. J. Cody, M.A., D.D., LL.D., University of Toronto. Archibald Barnes, R.C.A., has a dignified portrait of a lady in black; some cleverly painted dress material in "Havana," and a portrait of Miss Rowcliffe, against a black background. "Decoration" reveals his skill as a painter of flowers in a colored jug. Ernest Fosbery, R.C.A., is represented by a portrait of Miss Ruth Hughson, and R. S. Hewton, R.C.A., besides the portrait of Miss Benedicta Caverhill in a gaily colored figured dress, paints a girl in sunshine with massed irises as a background.

Marion Long, R.C.A., sends a capital portrait of the painter Florence H. McGillivray, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., seated in a chair, blue cushion at her back, jug, brushes and palette on a table, and a painting on the wall. From the brush of Mrs. Lillias Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., are a portrait in robes of Dr. H. M. Tory—lent by the Research Council, Ottawa—and one of Mrs. A. H. S. Gillson, nicely arranged and competently painted. Ernest J. Sampson, is represented by "Jeanne," a girl in a shimmering salmon-colored dress, and Adam Sherrieff Scott, A.R.C.A., has a portrait of A. McCa. Murphy. Louis Muhlstock shows a distinct advance in tone and handling in the portrait of Isaac Levine.

MANY GOOD LANDSCAPES.

Landscapes make a good showing, with F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., in "Winter Evening"—logging team in a snowy landscape with distant hills—introducing a dog following the team. For lovely values, the paint-sky. G. A. Reid, R.C.A., in "Harmony in Blue and Gold" screens a bit of blue lake with a line of spruce, a glimpse of autumn coloring being visible on the distant shore. Mary E. Wrinch, A.R.C.A., paints wooded shores and reflections, in "Landlocked Lake," and Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A., in "City Docks, Toronto" shows a tug in ice and snow. Tranquil in mood is his "Evening"—rocky wooded ridge above water, with campers and a fire on an island. Hal Ross Perrigard, A.R.C.A., invests with air and glowing color "A Bit of Old Gloucester," and A. C. Leighton, A.R.C.A., shows a vigorous touch in the mountain scene, "On The Simpson, Canadian Rockies." Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., still shows his interest in cloud effects in "Ascutey Mountain"—bold and blue in the distance, with a brook running into the foreground, and in "Along the River"—rolling country, houses, and distant hills.

Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., has a striking subject from the Far North—"Utakijut (The Waiting Ones)," done up in the Baffin Island region when putting in his annual naval training on H.M.S. Scarborough this year. The natives, men and women, are grouped on a high rock, below is the sea and beyond rocky headlands dropping sheer to the water. It is well composed and striking in effect. The warmth of summer permeates his other subject—mill and buildings at Huberdeau in the Laurentians. Harry Britton, R.C.A., shows his usual ability in capturing atmospheric effects over the sea. In "Early Morning," a group of boats are moored in water that glistens in the rising sun. Frank Carmichael, A.R.C.A., in "Hilltops" shows a strong sense of design and unusual pattern in the scattered clouds. A. J. Casson, A.R.C.A., besides a village mill in sunlight, sounds a dramatic note in "Passing Storm, October," successfully catching the ugly, livid light that sunlit houses and an expanse of river. Mrs. Hortense M. Gordon, A.R.C.A., in "Early Thaw, near Hamilton," has an impression of trees, snow and moisture that suggests spring, and Franklin Arbuckle, A.R.C.A., amuses with "Private View and Interview"—an art gallery scene with a rich assortment of types painted with a tolerant humor. George Thomson gives convincing glitter to the water in "Morning Among the Islands," and Thurston Topham has a sparkling autumn scene, "Lost River Valley."

Among the water colors there are some excellent examples, the section being contributed to by F. H. Bridgen, A.R.C.A., "Midsummer, Valley of the Don"; Charles F. Comfort, A.R.C.A., two freely handled sketches of dancers; Frederick G. Cross, battle on snowy plain, called "Heading for the Feed-lot"; John S. Gordon, A.R.C.A., with "Mont-Orgueil Castle, Jersey, C.I."; Peter Haworth, with Gulf of the St. Lawrence scenes; Charles W. Jeffreys, R.C.A., "Cymbal Fantasia," featuring colored men showing noisy jubilation; Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A., with a South African coast scene, and "Native Dancers, South Africa"; Graham Norwell with a wide expanse of mountains as seen from Mont Tremblant; Paul Caron with winter scenes featuring habitants and their sleighs; Henry J. JAMES W. MORRICE EXHIBITION HELD

Paintings By Dead Canadian Are Gathered

Star In Ottawa 26.11.

OTTAWA, Nov. 25—(C.P.)—The National Gallery last night held a preview of its latest annual historical Canadian art exhibition, a one-man show for the late James Wilson Morrice, law student who turned artist and became known as this country's first great painter, even though he did most of his work abroad.

From 49 galleries and private collectors all over the world National Gallery officials, acting in co-operation with the Art Gallery of Toronto and the Art Association of Montreal, gathered 131 of Morrice's works, painted in Canada, Europe, Africa and the West Indies.

Morrice, son of David Morrice, was born at Montreal in 1865. His father, merchant, philanthropist and art patron, picked a legal career for him. Morrice, painter-hobbyist, stomachached the law till 1890, then went to Europe, wandered through Holland and Belgium before settling down in Paris, his home for the rest of his life.

WAR PAINTING

His best war painting, Canadian soldiers climbing a low, snowclad hill, with three aircraft flying overhead, is hung to face the visitor entering the show.

His Canadian pieces are scattered throughout the exhibition. Most of them are scenes of the Lower St. Lawrence, near Quebec. They include a view of the Citadel, apparently painted from the west end of Little Champlain Street; Levis from the Quebec Ferry Dock with a fat steamer puffing its way through loose ice; entrance to a Quebec village, winter, with pink and brown houses and a bright blue sleigh.

Sculpture by Sally Ryan

Star 25.11.37

A collection of heads, mostly in bronze, by Miss Sally Ryan is now being shown in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal; some of these are portraits, some are studies of models, and in all of them there is a sense of life and strength. Miss Ryan, who now works in London, lived formerly in Montreal, where she began her work as a pupil of H. McRae Miller. One of the best and strongest of the portraits is that of the singer, Paul Robeson, which like several of the heads of men, is larger than lifesize. There is life in the portraits of Val Gielgud and Ralph Gustafson, and the portraits of men are perhaps a little more successful than those of women, though the head of Miss Tilda Hammond is as good as any of them, and there is character in the bust of Miss Ellen Ballon. A big head of Arturo Toscanini is an impression, not a portrait, but has life and looks as Toscanini should look. Two of the best things in the collection, however, are studies of models,—the head of a cockney man, a sharp London type, and, better still, the head of a negress, called "La Martinique," made three years ago which is an excellent head and gets an additional accent from the hand under the chin and the big knot of the handkerchief at the back of the head.

Painting Presented To Art Association

Canvas by Adam Sheriff Scott, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, is Gift of R. W. Steele

Gazette 27.11.37

"Harmony in Brown and Grey," by Adam Sheriff Scott, A.R.C.A., has been added to the permanent collection of the Art Association of Montreal by gift from R. W. Steele, who acquired it from the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, when the Montreal artist was holding his first "one-man" show in these galleries.

Sheriff Scott is usually effective in his color harmonies, and the present example ranks with his best. Well composed and capably painted, the work shows a woman seated at a table and fingering a wine glass. The sitter—as in most of his happiest efforts in this genre—is his wife.

The painter who was born in Perth, Scotland, and came to Canada in 1912, was elected A.R.C.A. in 1935. His work is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by "The Green Hat," and "Decorative Panel," the latter a watercolor.

New Lands Need New Artists, Claims Algernon Talmage, R.A.

Gazette

20.11.37

The great pioneers of the past, who built what are now mighty Dominions by the strength of their hands, and fortified them with the courage of their hearts, had to improvise, writes Algernon Talmage, R.A., in Overseas, the monthly journal of the Over-Seas League. They faced enemies who would not wait to parley, human enemies, beasts of the forest, and Nature herself—Nature who might be persuaded in time to change from foe into friend, but only if she were confronted with the highest in human intelligence and determination.

Canada and Australia, New Zealand and South Africa were won by men and women who had no time to spare for the graces of life. Every hour of their day had to go in securing the basic necessities, food and shelter.

What of today when security has been attained? The widening development of transport and communications has brought every corner of the British Empire into intimate touch with its heart and focus in Great Britain. The disturbed conditions, the tense restlessness and spirit of revolt nearly everywhere in the world outside, have made the need for unity of outlook, ideas and purpose throughout the British Commonwealth of Nations more essential than ever it was; essential not merely to the safety of the Empire itself, but to the peace of the entire civilized world.

Unity of purpose is a comprehensive term. It includes everything in its striving after the highest standards of national achievement. Therefore the artist has his part to play, no less than the soldier, the statesman, the merchant, the craftsman, the cultivator of the soil.

Is it not time that the Dominions and Dependencies paid more attention to creative art in all its branches? To literature, to music and to painting? Where are the really great names in these fields to be found over the period of the last hundred years?

Australia's greatest poet is Adam Lindsay Gordon. Canada gave us Robert W. Service. Both these men did notable work. But are they in the class and category of Shakespeare and Milton, of Dryden and Pope, of Shelley, Keats, Wordsworth? Can they be mentioned in the same breath with Browning, Tennyson and Kipling?

Where are the novelists of the Dominions to take rank with Fielding, Smollett, Jane Austen, Dickens, Thackeray, to set beside Hardy and Meredith, or even beside the most distinguished of living authors.

If creative literature is not easy in the new countries, poetry should flow freely enough, but prose romance may be more difficult to bring to flower. Why are there no great historians in the Dominions, writers comparable with Macaulay and Hume and Green? Where are their biographers of genius? Surely here is a fruitful field untilled, and mines as rich as those of the Rand itself? We know the names of the great men who founded Canada and Australia and South Africa, and brought a hundred other new lands under the Union Jack. Biographers and historians of the Motherland have written the lives of these men. But where are the tributes by the sons and daughters of the lands which they upbuilt?

In my own art it is the same. We look in vain for great names. Australia has produced not a few black-and-white artists of front rank in modern times. I could name two or three who need fear no comparison with any of their contemporaries. But when it comes to classifying them as great artists, one hesitates. Their work, though admirable, scarcely reaches to that height. And in the field of portrait or landscape painting, what have they achieved? Is there a Gainsborough or a Turner amongst them?

In the Dominions and the Colonies, where are our masters of graphic art? George Lambert, A.R.A., was one; the greatest artist Australia ever produced. But are there any others of his quality? Yet Australia is by far the best patron of art of all the Dominions.

In music, both Australia and Canada have given the world singers of top rank; sometimes, as with Melba, the world's best. But what have they done in the sphere of music composition? Can one name, even in these times when English music is experiencing its greatest revival since the palmy days of Elizabeth, a single Empire composer of note, much less genius?

What is to be done to stimulate the spirit of creative art in the new countries? Patrons are not lacking, nor good teachers, nor official support for artists. In Australia, the only one of the overseas countries of which, through many friends, I have some special knowledge, much is being done.

Wider education, chiefly by means of exhibitions, and more conscience in criticism, more knowledge amongst the critics, will help. I admit incidentally that these points apply to Great Britain also, even with our 400 years of artistic activity behind us. The Dominions have hardly a century of such tradition. In the course of time, unless our standards degenerate, we shall have our roll of great Empire artists.

Standards in the Dominions are not likely to degenerate. And certainly, with the growing pride and closer kinship amongst the members of the British Commonwealth, we shall see less in our midst of that curious habit of preferring the work of foreigners to that of our own men and women.

A truly national art is always the best for any country, and national pride will in time produce great creative artists to adorn still further the pages of history in the British Empire.

CHILDREN'S FANCIES HELD BASE OF ART

Gazette 23.11.37

Arthur Lismer Urges Fostering of the Young Imagination

A child's concept of art and that of an adult are two different things, according to Arthur Lismer, who spoke on "Art and the Community" at the Art Association yesterday. "We must encourage the child to continue his child-life imagination as far into life as he wants," maintained Mr. Lismer, "for essentially it is the same thing as the imagination of the artist."

An art gallery must be a place for education. It is no longer a showcase for Sundays, a building with a beautiful staircase and a picture of a girl, with a fly on her arm, at the top of it. In fact, the speaker said, most art galleries today are not suited to these present-day needs. He spoke of movements all over the world to allow the child to express himself which he had observed in his travels of the last year and a half. "No longer must we persuade him to learn the things that we want him to learn."

Mr. Lismer paralleled the life of the child with the growth of civilization. The first scribbles were the drawings of the cave-man, his adolescence was likened to the Renaissance, and in later years there should come a period for enjoyment. He advocated the beginning of a child's education at the age of three, that he need not waste those valuable formative years. And it must be an education in life and art.

At the close of his talk, Mr. Lismer showed illustrations of the various reflections of life in the art of the various countries and ages. He included the works of modern Canadian artists, Holgate, Thomson, Macdonald, Cullen and Newton, as examples of the expression of Canada through her painters. Then he concluded with the work of young children, indicating their similar affinities to their environment.

Arthur Lismer Lectures On Children and Art

"Art and the Community" was the title which Arthur Lismer, A. R. C. A., of Toronto, gave to his lecture on Monday afternoon at the Art Association of Montreal, a lecture which was a plea for the education of children in art. He began with a survey of modern life, with examples from many countries in which he has travelled. Mr. Lismer has visited South Africa, Australia and other countries in connection with art teaching, and his survey contained some unflattering comparisons between the life and art of South African natives and those of Canada and similar countries.

Mr. Lismer demanded the use of new methods in the artistic education of children; methods in which children learn, never by copying, but by working out their own ideas and tastes; and these methods have already been adopted both in Toronto and in Montreal. He showed lantern slides of a number of examples, some of them remarkably interesting, of work done by children working in this way. His big collection of lantern slides, which were run through very quickly, included specimens of painting, sculpture and architecture of many periods and places, but the much more important ones were those of work done by children and of children at work, drawing, painting, making mural decorations, and making and using historical costumes and other objects. A chief purpose of this education is to develop in children the appreciation of beauty in their habits and surroundings. At the end of the lecture Miss Anne Savage expressed the thanks of the audience to the lecturer.

Sir Wyly Grier Is Academy Head; Fred S. Haines, Vice-President

Lilias Torrance Newton, of Montreal, Elected R.C.A., and Alphonse Jongers and Frederick G. Cross Are Associates—
Three Montreal Architects in List

Gazette

20.11.37

Sir Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., of Toronto, was re-elected head of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, and Fred S. Haines, R.C.A., of Toronto, was elected vice-president, at the annual meeting held here yesterday afternoon. Mr. Haines fills the vacancy caused by the resignation from that post of W. S. Maxwell, R.C.A., architect, of Montreal. Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., Montreal, and E. D. Dyonnet, R.C.A., Montreal, were re-elected treasurer and secretary, respectively.

One Academician painter was elected—the honor going to Mrs.

W. S. MAXWELL, R.C.A., architect, of Montreal, who has resigned as Vice-President of the Royal Canadian Academy. He was elected to the position in 1929.

Lilias Torrance Newton, A.R.C.A., of Montreal.

Election of Associate painters honored two—Alphonse Jongers, of Montreal, and Frederick G. Cross, of Lethbridge, Alta.

Academician architects elected were Ernest I. Barott, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, and A. S. Mathers, A.R.C.A., of Toronto.

Election of Associate architects brought recognition to two Montrealeers—Douglas Ritchie, and P. Roy Wilson.

F. H. Brigden, A.R.C.A., Toronto, was re-elected Associate advisory member of council.

New members of the council—two years—are: F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., Montreal; E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., Montreal; R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., Montreal; J. W. Beatty, Toronto; Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., Montreal, and Archibald Barnes, R.C.A., Toronto.

For one year: F. S. Haines, R.C.A., Toronto; C. W. Simpson, R.C.A., Montreal; Walter S. Allward, R.C.A., Toronto; Ernest Fosbery, R.C.A., Ottawa; Percy E. Nobbs, R.C.A., Montreal, and C. W. Jefferys, R.C.A., Toronto.

Frederick Stanley Haines, R.C.A., of Toronto, elected vice-president of the Royal Canadian Academy, was born at Meaford, Ont. He received his early training in art at the Central Ontario School of Art, and later at the Academy in Antwerp, where he was awarded a medal for figure painting. His favored subjects have been animals and Canadian landscape. He started etching in 1918 and had success in color aquatints. He formed the Canadian Society of Etchers, and was elected to the Chicago Society of Etchers, the California Society of Etchers, and Painter Gravers in Color of London, England. He is also an honorary member of the Royal Hungarian Society of Etchers.

In 1928, Mr. Haines was appointed Curator of the Art Gallery of Toronto, and five years later Principal of the Ontario College of Art. He was elected a member of the Ontario Society of Artists in 1905, and was president of that body in 1924. In 1919 he was elected A.R.C.A., and R.C.A., in 1933. He is Director of Art, Canadian National Exhibition. His art is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by "The Last Gleam."

A member of the Arts and Letters and the Rotary Clubs of Toronto, his pastime seems well indicated by membership in the Thornhill and Thistledown Golf Clubs.

Lilias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., of Montreal, was born in this city and studied under William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., and in Paris under Jacovlev. She was elected A.R.C.A., 1923. Her work is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by "Nonnie," "The Little Sisters," "Self-Portrait"—reproduced on this page—and a portrait of the late Dr. F. J. Shepherd, of Montreal.

Mrs. Newton's election to full membership in the R.C.A., follows the progressive step taken at the annual meeting held in November, 1933, when Marion Long, R.C.A., of Toronto, was accorded similar honor—the first full academicianship accorded a Canadian woman painter in over 50 years. The prior election of a woman as R.C.A., was in 1880, when Charlotte Schrieber, of Toronto, a painter of historical subjects was honored.

Alphonse Jongers, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, is recognized as a gifted portrait painter in Canada, the United States and in Europe. He was born in France in 1872, and studied painting at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Paris, until 1892. He went to Spain for further study in 1893, going to the United States in 1897, where he met with success. He has shown at the Paris Salon and at the Societe des Artistes Francaises, besides other important exhibitions. His works are at the Metropolitan Museum, New York City, and at the National Gallery, Washington. Among his awards were a silver medal at the St. Louis Exhibition and one at the Paris Salon. He is a Bachelor of Literature of the University of Paris, and in March this year was awarded the Legion of Honor by the French Government. He has been a resident of Montreal for some years. The list of those who have "sat" to him is long and includes His Excellency Lord Bessborough, when Governor-General of Canada, and outstanding figures in Law, Medicine, the Army and Commerce.

Frederick G. Cross, A.R.C.A., of Lethbridge, Alta., was born in Devonshire, England, and came to Alberta in 1906. He is a civil engineer, a member of the Engineering Institute of Canada, and a registered professional engineer in Alberta. He served overseas with the engineers and the 1st Battalion Canadian Railway Corps. He is at present superintendent of irrigation with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Lethbridge.

Self-taught in art, Mr. Cross won a dual competition with designs for a War Memorial and Record of Service, Engineering Institute of Canada. Both bronzes are erected in the E.I.C. headquarters at Montreal. A member of the Canadian Society of Painters in Watercolor, two of his works were accepted for a Canadian collection of watercolors in 1932, one for a Canadian collection sent to South Africa, and one in a Canadian exhibit in London during the Coronation. He is represented in the Birmingham city art gallery and in many private collections. He married, in 1914, Margery Hamar Greenwood, sister of Mrs. L. S. Amery, the Hon. Mrs. Simon Rodney and of Viscount Greenwood.

Ernest I. Barott, R.C.A., architect, of Montreal, was born in Syracuse, N.Y., and has been a resident of the C.P.R. at Vancouver. Mr. Barott was elected A.R.C.A., six years ago.

His firm has executed commissions that include the 48th Highlanders' War Memorial, Toronto; many buildings for the University of Toronto, Massey Hall and the University Club, Toronto. He was elected A.R.C.A. in 1928, and is a member of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, and of the Ontario Association of Architects.

Douglas Ritchie, A.R.C.A., architect, was born at Three Rivers, Que., but has spent most of his life in Montreal. He studied his profession in New York, and since 1919 has been associated with H. E. Shorey, under the style of Shorey and Ritchie. Among the commissions of this firm have been No. 10 Fire and Police Station, St. Matthew street, Montreal, which won a first award when plans were exhibited at the Royal Canadian Academy show a few years ago; a good deal of school work—the last completed commission being Iona School, Montreal—and the plans for the Provincial Transport Terminal Building, to occupy the site on Dorchester and Drummond streets of the old American Presbyterian Church.

P. Roy Wilson, A.R.C.A., architect, of Montreal, was born in England and came to this city in 1913, and has been for over five years on the staff of the Department of Architecture of McGill University. He is a member of the council of the Province of Quebec Architects' Association, and an Associate of the Royal Institute of British Architects. Among his commissions is the summer home of R. O. Sweezy at Kingston, Ont.

WHO KNOWS THIS INN? The painting by Kriehoff was found in Toronto by Albert H. Robson, whose volume on this early painter of Quebec will soon be published by The Ryerson Press, Toronto, in the Canadian Artists' Series. Measuring 30 1/4 by 48 1/2, it bears as title "The White Horse Inn by Moonlight," and was painted in 1851. "In the large canvas," writes Mr. Robson, "a multitude of facts are clearly visible which are lost in a small photographic reproduction. The swinging Inn sign over the roadway has a picture of a white horse and over the doorway of the Inn the words 'Post Office' appear. It is quite evident that two teams of horses were used to draw the coach through the winter drifts and relays are being brought out of the stable to change horses. In the distance through the trees a lake or river appears and a small cottage by the roadside shows on the left side of the canvas among the trees." The painting, the property of Eugene Coste, will be among the color plates in the forthcoming volume.

MacDonald's "Tangled Garden" For National Gallery of Canada

Gazette By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE 27.11.37

Centre of a storm of abusive criticism and sneering comment when it was first exhibited in Toronto 21 years ago, "The Tangled Garden," by the late J. E. H. MacDonald, R.C.A., has on its coming of age attained to high estate and found a permanent home in the National Gallery of Canada at Ottawa. Its translation to the Dominion's art collection—incidentally the eleventh MacDonald there—has been by gift from H. S. Southam, of Ottawa, chairman of the Board of Trustees, National Gallery of Canada; W. M. Southam, Ottawa; F. N. Southam, of Montreal, and William Southam, of Hamilton, as a memorial to their brother, the late Richard Southam, of Toronto.

"The Tangled Garden" at its first showing was a challenge and insulted the critics. How many of them have honestly remained insulted, after viewing what has been paraded before them as art in the past two decades, is questionable; certainly only the die-hards, who by now must be beside themselves over certain examples of painting from Europe and elsewhere. Undoubtedly, the critics were cut to the quick by the initial productions of the Group of Seven, of which MacDonald was an important member. It was so boulderish new and fresh. Much too self-assured. It shouted in the decorous galleries and played havoc with accepted paintings done in the accepted manner—and the writer knows what a vigorous storm on Georgian Bay did to a placid beach scene beside it. True, there were art movements abroad—some of the Scandinavians had kicked over the traces and were living down the arbitrary dicta of the Paris schools, and the heaven was working in other lands. In Canada the view seemed to be—it cannot happen here. It did, and the shock to the lovers of the academic and traditional was great—as if a stableman in working togs had "dropped in" at a formal tea. The painters kept on painting and the critics kept on "knocking," but the movement grew in strength, aided in no small measure by a rising generation of picture-lovers who had been out in the wilds and elsewhere and had seen things "just like that." Twenty years ago the critical catch words were "disgusting" and "revolting," today, "Don't you think . . . has lost something of the vigor of his earlier things?" It was a progressive phase in Canadian painting, but it does not warrant trashing all critical standards.

MacDonald's "Tangled Garden" looks very moderate today—heavy-headed sunflowers, some bereft of petals, drooping over a bed of gay blooms—blue, purple, orange and yellow, a bending apple tree and, beyond, a glimpse of a house.

Of this painting Albert H. Robson wrote in his book on J. E. H. MacDonald, in the Canadian Artists' Series:

"This picture with two other MacDonald canvases, 'Elements' and 'Rock and Maple,' were exhibited at the Ontario Society of Artists Exhibition in Toronto, 1916. They mark the date of the decided change which took place in MacDonald's painting. A definite swing towards richness of color, breadth of handling and accent of pattern. Up to this time he had been mastering his medium, and by careful and conscious labor had produced much fine work, but here the designer took full rein and with superb self-confidence painted a picture with the gorgeous decorative beauty of a fine Oriental rug. As a piece of all-over pattern and beautiful, full, opulent color it is superb. It is realism treated decoratively with the illusion of sufficient detail to stress the color pattern. Today we would consider it quite orthodox; we have become accustomed to accepting the decorative viewpoint as desirable if not actually desirable.

"When first exhibited it was so different from the conventional and academic painting of the time that it completely bewildered both press and public. Newspaper critics could not appraise it by old standards so they were loud in condemnation. It is of historical interest as a picture that caused more comment, for and against, than any landscape painted in Canada. Columns of newspaper space abused it in no gentle terms, and MacDonald answered in a letter to the press. . . . Our attitude towards painting has so changed during the last twenty years that it would call forth no adverse comment now."

Respecting the storm this picture caused, the late F. B. Housser, of Toronto, in his book "A Canadian Art Movement," published in 1926, wrote, in part:

"Perhaps it was that MacDonald's good academic reputation gave cause for the greater animosity at the alleged burst of radicalism which marked the appearance of his famous canvas 'The Tangled Garden' shown in that year. Whatever the cause, this picture received more publicity in the newspapers and more strongly impressed the work of the group on the minds of the Toronto public than any of the others which had yet appeared. From this time forth, for the next three years, MacDonald was looked upon as the most radical member of the group. . . .

"'Tangled Garden,' even today is a striking canvas of a garden in late summer when all the entourage of brilliantly coated bloom nods from a perennial border in dazzling summer glory. MacDonald painted what he felt of rhythm, color and decorative pattern submerging detailed representation perhaps more severely than it had yet been done by any Canadian artist. As a piece of design, it is an achievement. . . . It was astonishingly unconventional, but possessed no small amount of enthusiasm and feeling for riotous tangles of color. It does not look so radical today as it did in 1916."

Toronto critics were not kind—a like spirit animating some in Montreal—and one of the former, reviewing the 1916 Ontario Society of Artists' display in Toronto, wrote: "There are some samples of that rough, splashy, meaningless, blatant plastering and massing of unpleasant colors which seems to be a necessary evil in all Canadian art exhibitions now-a-days. It is quite unnecessary to particularize them. Nobody visiting the exhibition is likely to miss having his or her sense of color, composition, proportion and good taste violently affronted by some of these canvases; some large and some small but all tinged with the same blustering spirit of post-impressionism; all conveying the same impression that the artist was out to make a sensation, didn't know how to do it and wasted considerable good pigment in a disastrous attempt."

Another Toronto critic wrote: "If this be true and Canadian Nature essays to imitate some of the landscape to be seen at the O.S.A. exhibition, then we shall all have to wear smoked glasses." The same critic wrote of the group's work as a whole as "being inspired by no sincere passion for beauty hidden or revealed, but savoring of the ideal of the vaudeville manager whose motto is 'Hit 'em in the eye'."

MacDonald was also informed "that his 'Tangled Garden' was too large for the canvas; that the colors were crude; that it was not allied to anything known as art."

Finally MacDonald, as a leading member of the Group of Seven, sent an article to the Toronto Globe, which printed it under a box heading on the editorial page, with the title "Bouquets from a Tangled Garden."

In the article MacDonald, after describing the criticism of the show as "literary, sententious, eloquent and paternal" goes on to say: "One would think that if it is the function of the critic to see, the first duty of the critic is to understand what the artist saw. Yet they condemn apparently without understanding and without making an effort to understand, forgetful of Goethe's caution for doubtful cases, that a genuine work of art usually displeases at first sight, as it suggests a deficiency in the spectator!"

"One makes no claim that the 'Tangled Garden' and other pictures abusively condemned by the critics are genuine works of art, merely because of their effect upon them, but critics may be assured that they were honestly and sincerely produced. Their makers know when vaudeville ideals are in keeping. If they planned a hit anywhere it was in the heart of understanding."

James E. H. MacDonald, R.C.A., was born in Durham, England, of Canadian parents, and came to Canada in 1873. After thorough training as a commercial artist—painting in his spare time—he shortly after 1911 devoted his major energies to producing pictures. "The Tangled Garden" was painted from a sketch made in his garden at Thornhill. He was appointed Principal of the Ontario College of Art in 1928 and occupied that post at his death in 1932.

Lectures Next Week At The Art Association

Next Monday afternoon, November 29th, at 4.45, Prof. J. W. Bridges, of McGill University, will give a lecture at the Art Association of Montreal on "The Art of Peru". He will describe, with illustrations, the artistic achievements of four civilizations that arose in Peru in ancient times, and their influence on modern art will be indicated. Prof. Bridges has travelled frequently in Peru and speaks with authority on its ancient arts.

Next Thursday afternoon, December 2nd, at 4.30, Prof. R. D. Gibbs, of the department of Botany in McGill University, will lecture at the Art Association on "Art in Nature". He will illustrate his lecture with beautiful slides, showing the inter-relation of art and nature, as exemplified in the growth of plants. This lecture is intended for young people but adults are cordially invited.

Art of Peru Was Subject Of Lecture on Monday

The ancient art of Peru was described in a lecture, which was given and illustrated with many lantern slides, by Professor J. W. Bridges of McGill University, at the Art Association of Montreal on Monday afternoon. A description, which was of necessity very short, was given of the different districts of Peru in which forms of art originated, and of the different styles which came from them, with special attention to the, rather later, art of the Incas. The lantern slides, which were so many that they had to be shown very quickly, were of examples of all kinds of works of art, architecture, sculpture, pottery, paintings and textiles, and showed the adaptation of human figures, animals and other natural forms to the decorative designs. Prof. Bridges ended with some allusions to the influence of ancient Peruvian art on the modern art of the country, and even on art in some other countries.

WORLD OF ART

Toronto Saturday Night. BY GRAHAM MCINNES November 27th, 1937

UNDER the dynamic presidency of Dr. C. F. Martin, the Art Association of Montreal has suddenly become alive. Speaking at the opening of the Fifty-eighth Exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy last week, Dr. Martin showed a keen grasp of realities. A museum, he said, was no mere storehouse, but an educational institution thoroughly alive and in tune with contemporary activity. It should work along creative lines to bring art to the community, and to encourage its appreciation on the broadest possible basis. Such truths can bear repeating. But whether or not he was aware of it, Dr. Martin's remarks could have been applied equally well to the great majority of the pictures that were behind him on the walls as he spoke.

In the Art Gallery of Toronto, the Academy has sometimes appeared a little uneasy, but in Montreal it was usually more at home—the surroundings were familiar. But now that Dr. Martin has removed the old monks cloth from the walls, the Fifty-eighth Exhibition, while admirably hung, stands alone in its dullness. The showing, however, is of considerable interest for one event: the emergence of the new academicism. The old academicism is still in evidence, of course, as far as official portraiture is concerned; though there is enough poor painting to secure the rejection of many works even at Burlington House (Kenneth Forbes and Mrs. Newton—each in their own way—are exceptions). But in all else, the new academicism is well to the fore.

AT LONG last, the discoveries of the Group of Seven and the Montreal Group have become respectable enough to be freely admitted to official circles. After nearly twenty years (the normal time-lag) the broad design, the rhythmic flow and the light Impressionist palette have become conventionalized to the point where they are devoid of feeling and almost entirely meaningless. It is this development which has given rise to the strange misapprehension that the Academy has in some way become liberal. It is not the function of an academy to be liberal, for it represents the traditional and conservative elements in easel painting. Experiment and creative discovery are rightly left to independent artists. Some of their works may be seen at an Academy showing, but it is only as a concession which, in my opinion, progressive artists ought not to accept.

Those who expect to see anything new or vital at such a showing are doing the Academy a grave injustice. What one does expect, however, is some recognized level of competent craftsmanship. But it is precisely this which appears to be lacking. There are notable exceptions—the work, for instance, of Scott Carter, Leonard Hutchinson and Charles Comfort—but what strikes one most of all is that at an Academy show, one can almost always rely on seeing work which, even on technical grounds, would not be admitted to any other major exhibition. The Academy has gone a long way since the original pronouncements of the Marquis of Lorne, with their insistence upon the broadening of relations between art and the people. Unfortunately it has been a backward march, and the point has now been reached where any attempt at broadening the basis of inclusion leads almost automatically to a lowering of the standard of acceptance.

IN SUCH a showing it is extraordinarily hard to spot good work, because, contrary to general belief, a good painting does not shine through being placed between two bad ones. But I feel that Arthur Lismer's two water colors, Leonard Brooks' "Muggy January," Mabel May's lake and Sam Borenstein's "Tunnel Station" (not one of his best) deserve a second look. It is in the water color and graphic arts section that there is most spirit, as is usually the case. Among the oils Harold Beament is at least tackling new material, and Lawrence Panton's excursion into pointillism is instructive. But the complete absence of feeling—the dominant characteristic of the whole showing—is what depresses one. The sculpture section is dignified by Frances Loring's fine miner's head and Lillias Farley's woodcarvings. Montreal will be even more exciting if Messrs. Shorey and Ritchie's projected bus terminal ever goes up. But I miss the President's magnolias.

Jackson and Roberts Exhibiting at Scott's Star —15.1.38

Oils and watercolors by Goodridge Roberts will be on exhibition today in the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, 1490 Drummond street, where will also be shown a small collection of paintings and sketches by A. Y. Jackson. Both exhibits, which are certain to draw art-lovers, continue until January 29.

MONTREAL ART

BY ROBERT AYRE

UNDER the chairmanship of Dr. Charles F. Martin, the Art Association of Montreal has taken a new lease of life. Children's classes have begun under the direction of Miss Anne Savage, arrangements have been made for a succession of special lectures, and for several months past workmen have been busy making improvements in the building. It was a new gallery visitors saw when the Royal Canadian Academy show opened. Ceilings had been painted, skylights cleaned, walls covered with monks cloth and hessian and a modern system of indirect lighting installed.

An important step in the series of activities which has aroused public interest was the acquisition of The Bathers, a recent painting by Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A. First exhibited at Holgate's one-man show at the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, just closed, The Bathers attracted a great deal of attention by its large and well-built design and its fresh color. It will be a valuable addition to the Art Association's Canadian section.

Against a background of bright, blue water, broken by white, and with rock and weathered wood and the green of a far shore to give variety to the pattern, the two graceful nudes, one seated, one leaning toward her, make a circular rhythm that is steadily poised and satisfying to the eye. The picture is 32 inches square.

I am a little conscious of something approaching rigidity in much of Edwin Holgate's oil painting, as if the meticulous wood-engraver restrained him, and in this show there was the same careful disposition of colors and forms, almost too careful at times. Yet in The Bathers, and even more in the Little Nude—a girl with a towel—he breaks away into spontaneity, without losing any of the advantages of thoughtful planning. Usually more concerned with structure than with mood, he nevertheless showed in his exhibition that he is not uninterested in atmosphere. This was especially true in small sketches like Percé Green. It was free and full of character, it seemed to go deeper into human experience, to have more to say than, for instance, Gaspé Coast, a broad, almost poster, design. I found myself preferring such little notes as Percé Green, Sultry Weather, the one of Percé shore in a high wind and the interiors, Labrador Kitchen and Grand Union Hotel, to some of the portrait studies and some of the more formal landscapes.

This may be a personal preference. The effect of the whole show was one of freshness, brightness and good, straightforward well-being. Two fine, sensitive water colors—a Laurentian shoreline and a knitting woman realized in a lively, nervous line—and several pencil drawings—delicately outlined tree stumps, a vigorous profile of a splendid subject, André Bieler—brought it round to the half-dozen admirable wood cuts. Perfect in craftsmanship, they are never finicky: every stroke counts for strength and unity.

BY CANADIAN ARTISTS Gazette—6.12.37 Collection of Watercolors to Be Shown in Scotland

Ottawa, December 5.—The National Gallery of Canada announces that 70 Canadian watercolors would be sent to Edinburgh for exhibition there in January and possibly in other larger cities of the United Kingdom thereafter.

The exhibition, containing works of about 40 artists, will be the second of its kind to be shown in Scotland. The first, sent in 1933, attracted wide attention in the United Kingdom.

This show was arranged by the National Gallery in co-operation with the Royal Scottish Society of Painters in Watercolor and the Canadian Society of Painters in Watercolor, in response to a request from the Scottish society.

It was noted that the late Ramsay MacDonald, former British Labor Prime Minister, wrote the foreword for the catalogue of the last Canadian watercolor exhibition held in Scotland.

Thomas Stone, O.S.A., Exhibiting at Eaton's

Ontario Painter Partial to Winter—Wm. R. Haddock Also Shows Select Group

Paintings by Thomas Stone, O.S.A., have been drawing a steady attendance to the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company Limited of Montreal, where, in one of the smaller rooms, there is also on view a small selection of work by William R. Haddock. Both exhibitions are due to close on December 9, the following offering to be paintings by A. Maniech, who has not shown here for a number of years.

Thomas Stone is a painter who knows what will make an effective picture, and he sets down what he sees in a direct manner. He is partial to the winter scene, but not to the total exclusion of the other seasons. "Winter in Muskoka"—with sleigh coming up an incline and a spacious background of rolling hills, bush, spruces and cloudy evening sky, must be counted a successful effort, especially in the impressions of the gleam of waning sunlight on the snow. "Horse and Sleigh, Mattawa," is a successful and attractive work of full sunlight, with a rutted road beside the frozen river. "Ottawa River, near Mattawa," introduces a sleigh, with youngsters having a ride, on the road above the frozen stream.

"Winter Reflections, Mattawa," with its group of houses, wooded hill, snow and open water is a success, and the impression of sunlight on powdery snow is well conveyed in "A Bright Winter Morning" with its roadway, rails of a bridge and wooded bluff. "A Cold Draught" has its centre of interest in cows in a snowy landscape, drinking at an open brook, and "Pickanock River" introduces an old covered bridge, as seen from a high foreground, with mounds of snow, spruces and distant blue hills. Blue shadows make effective pattern in "Ski Trail," and also play their decorative part in "Sleigh in Mattawa Woods."

"Dog Team, Timagami" suggests the lonely places—wooded shores beneath a band of yellow sky and above a mass of small clouds. Day is almost done as the team travels on the snow-covered lake.

Of a warmer season is "Summer Shade" with a herd of cows ranged in the shelter of a big tree, and the gold and red of autumn glows in "Maple Lake," with its blue water vivid under a summer sky. "Early Autumn" is rich in gay hues—maple, spruce and poplar edging a small stream, and the bright livery of Fall is also evident in "Autumn Rapids."

WILLIAM R. HADDOCK.

Mr. Haddock shows much effective harmony in handling of color. Among the larger works are "Winter, Morin Heights"—houses, snowy road and distant hills; "Near St. Adèle" with hills and valley in autumn, under a cloudy sky; and "Morin Heights," hills with patches of snow and a cluster of houses. This region has supplied many attractive subjects, but in many cases there is more complete satisfaction in the smaller, spontaneous sketches—the study for "Sunny Afternoon," a snow scene; "Mill at Morin Heights," with its partly bare roof and gaunt telephone pole against a darkening sky; the church at Morin Heights in winter; "Dull Afternoon," with its barns and brush-covered hills, and the small version of "North River Rapids," an autumn impression.

There is a good effect of sunlight in the oil "Milton and University Streets," a city impression, and in the watercolor "Morning in the City." There is, too, a nice fluid quality in the watercolor of a steamer in the work called "Montreal Harbor."

The group is interesting throughout and the work holds out marked promise for the future.

Honor for F. G. Cross Pleasing to Lethbridge

Election of Frederick G. Cross, of Lethbridge, Alta., as an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts has been received with becoming pride in the western city. The action of the R.C.A. at its annual meeting in Montreal marked the second honor of like kind to go to a painter in the West—A. C. Leighton, of Calgary, being elected Associate a few years ago. The Pacific coast Associates are F. A. Varley and W. P. Weston, both of Vancouver.

Frederick G. Cross, A.R.C.A., though only a resident of Lethbridge for two years, has in that time seen a growing appreciation of art in the West and has made every effort to further it by reviewing books on painting and contributing timely articles on visiting artists and their work to the local press. He looks back with pleasure to the first sixteen years after the close of the Great War—in which he saw active service—when he took the opportunity to assist senior scholars in numerous rural schools throughout Southern Alberta with their drawing and art lessons, stopping at the various schools whenever possible and giving lessons, arranging competitions between the schools, supervising art exhibitions and lecturing to students and parents. He also gave a series of lessons in painting still-life studies and in outdoor sketching to those students who indicated talent and perseverance after leaving schools.

Voicing appreciation of the honor shown by the R.C.A. to Mr. Cross, Senator W. A. Buchanan, writing editorially in The Lethbridge Herald, said:

"The recognition of the contribution of F. G. Cross to art in his being elected an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy, the equivalent in Canada of the Royal Academy in London, England, is in many ways a unique tribute. Not in the recognition so much of a talented painter, but in the fact that such recognition is one which is different in the way of recognition bestowed on men and women of the city and district.

"There has been recognition of what individuals have done in agriculture and in other services, but it has remained for the first time for a citizen of Lethbridge to be given recognition in the world of art. On the prairies art has not met with sufficient recognition, generally speaking. We refer to the art of painting, sculpture, etc. There are individuals, it is true, who devote themselves to those things which, as opposed to material pursuits, embroider life. But the cultivation of art for art's sake is not so visible as it might be.

"So it is good to see art in our midst recognized. It serves to give it a meaning which otherwise it may not have. What is recognized is a distinct contribution to life in the part it plays in smoothing out its asperities and serving as wholesome leaven in the aspirations it leads to. So in the honor conferred on Mr. Cross there is also a distinction conferred on the community. We are reminded that art has its place in a nation, coming home to us in the recognition given a man known to all, to whom, outside the cares of his occupation, art has its appeal."

Private Tutor Had Had Many Prominent Montrealers as His Pupils

An outstanding figure of the Montreal Jewish Community and a learned Talmudic scholar, Isaac Levine died at his home, 773 Outremont avenue, Friday, after a brief illness.

Coming to Canada from Russia 30 years ago, Mr. Levine was a private tutor and had many prominent Montreal Jews as pupils. He continued to exercise his profession up to the time of his illness, several weeks ago.

Of patriarchal appearance, Mr. Levine inspired the painting recently done by the well known Montreal artist, Louis Muhlstock. The portrait, which depicts him wrapped in the Prayer Shawl as he appeared in the Bnai Jacob Synagogue when he opened the Ark for the closing prayer on his last Day of Atonement, is at present on exhibition at the Montreal Art Gallery and has received favorable comment for its subject and execution.

The funeral service was held yesterday at the Bnai Jacob Synagogue and was attended by prominent members of the Montreal Jewish community.

He is survived by two sons, Sam and Hyman Levine, four daughters, the Misses Mendel, Itkin, Cablentz and Shayne Levine, 19 grandchildren and four great-grandchildren. His wife died nine years ago.

The Castles of England In Lecture on Monday

At the Art Association of Montreal on Monday afternoon, Professor Philip Turner, of the department of architecture of McGill University, gave a lecture, descriptive and historical, on the Castles of England. With many good photographs to illustrate his lecture, Professor Turner covered the history of English castles, from the earliest defensive mounds, through the stage of big fortified towers and defensive surrounding walls to the latest castles, built for display when defense was no longer a necessity. This was followed by an account of the internal arrangement of some old castles and of certain important features of the planning for defense. His photographs showed many of the finest buildings of their kind in England, some of them places well known to tourists and many others which are seldom visited. Star.7.12.37

Portrait of SALLY RYAN by the celebrated sculptor, Jacob Epstein. An exhibition of Miss Ryan's sculpture is now being held at the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west. She recently held a "one-woman" show of her works in New York, following upon one in London, both of which won outstanding attention from the critics. The young sculptor, who only discovered her gift five years ago when she was a schoolgirl in Montreal, had her first work accepted for exhibition by the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts in Toronto. Shortly after, she was invited to exhibit at the Art Association of Montreal. Since that time her sculptures have been shown at the Royal Scottish Academy, the Royal Academy (London) and twice at the Paris Salon.

Among the heads by Miss Ryan now on view at the Art Association galleries is one of Arturo Toscanini, done from a photograph after she had seen him conducting at a concert in London. The Whitney Museum in New York has asked for this portrait for its annual exhibition of sculpture next March.

GIVES TALK ON CASTLES

Professor Turner Traces Its Development Through Ages

Admitting that the word "castle" has been linked to all manner of things from prehistoric earthworks down to preposterous buildings of the twentieth century with mock battlements and sham draw-bridges, Professor Phillip Turner, in his talk on the castles of England given yesterday afternoon before members of the Art Association, started by defining that word. He found that it must be limited to such fortified dwellings as are intended for purposes of residence and defence.

Illustrating his lecture with slides of the various castles, and including illustrations of trebuches and other siege engines, he continued by contrasting the castles with cathedrals, saying "The cathedral is the apotheosis of architecture, the castle is architecture fighting for its life. Yet it is probably no exaggeration to say that for every thousand visitors to the great English cathedrals or abbeys, there is one person who would stop his automobile in order to stroll through the ruins of a castle." This Professor Turner laid to the fact that castles are very complicated structures and the different parts composing them are not so easily understood as are those of a cathedral.

ARTIST GOING TO ARCTIC

Miss Shackleton to Sketch H.B.C. Pensioners, Natives

Christmas will be spent within the Arctic Circle by Miss Kathleen Shackleton, well-known artist, who left Montreal last night for Winnipeg, after visiting Quebec and Roberval.

Miss Shackleton is engaged in carrying out an unusual commission, making portraits of Hudson's Bay Company pensioners and natives in the Far North. When completed, she will take the collection to London, where it will be placed in Hudson's Bay House, headquarters of the famous old trading company which received its charter from King Charles II.

Miss Shackleton will spend Christmas at Coppermine, on Coronation Gulf, North West Territories, where she will do sketches of Eskimo types. The Eskimo come to the trading post at Coppermine at Christmas.

Many posts in the north were visited by Miss Shackleton earlier in the season, after which she came to Quebec. She will fly to Coppermine in a plane piloted by the celebrated "Wop" May, and expects to return here in the spring, en route to England with her collection of portraits and sketches.

Abraham Manievich Exhibiting at Eaton's

Gazette—11.12.37 Russian-born Painter Reveals Varied Techniques and Love for Color

Paintings by Abraham Manievich make a gay showing in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. It is many years since this artist has exhibited in this city, and there is plenty in the present show to satisfy those who love bold color and also those who are partial to subtle values. There is nothing timid in Manievich's methods—forms are firmly drawn and the paint is laid on lavishly. Some of the heavily painted works, seemingly rather jumbled at first glance, grow on the spectator. In this category, "October," "Landscape. Study in Green," and "Golden Autumn" are works that reveal considerable technical ability and mean something when closely studied.

In the paintings where quieter tones are employed there is much that is admirable—"Main Street, Peekskill, N.Y.," showing shops and parked autos almost blocking the narrow thoroughfare; "Street in Peekskill," with its safety sign for motorists; "Peekskill" on a drab day; and "After the Rain," a roadway and modest houses under a breaking sky, are works that indicate the born colorist.

"Newburg, N.Y.," is capably handled—buildings and figures in a street that slopes to the Hudson River, "Miner's Lane, Luzerne, Pa.," with its ramshackle houses on the edge of a steep hill is a scene characteristic of the region, and "Rural Lane"—rambling houses and sheds, trees and plot of grass where goats forage is a truthful transcript.

Manievich also essays the Canadian winter scene, boldly and with plenty of paint, and there are a number of capital flower pieces that amply repay study.

Abraham Manievich, born in Russia, studied painting in Kiev. A government grant enabled him to continue his training at the Munich Academy. Returning to Russia, his paintings were widely shown. In 1910 his first "one-man" exhibition was arranged by the Kiev Government Museum. Several paintings were bought by the Museum. From 1910 to 1912 he painted in Italy, France, Germany, Switzerland, and travelled widely. He attained early recognition with the group exhibitions of many European centres. In 1912 he participated at the Salon in Paris. In 1913 he exhibited at the Durand-Ruel Galleries in Paris. The French Government purchased a large canvas for the Luxembourg Museum. Invited to return to Russia, "one-man" shows were put on in Petrograd, Moscow, Kiev, Odessa, and other cities and many paintings were bought by notable museums and private collectors. In 1916 he was elected to a professorship in the Kiev Ukraine Academy of Art. In 1922 he came to the United States. He has exhibited independently in: 1923 at the Brooklyn Museum, New York; 1923 in Philadelphia sponsored by the Art Alliance; 1924 at the Babcock Galleries, New York; 1924 at the Peabody Institute of Art, Baltimore; 1925 at the Gordon Galleries, Detroit; 1925 at the Boston Art Club sponsored by the Copley Society; 1928 at the Durand-Ruel Galleries, New York; 1928 at the Baltimore Museum of Art; 1931 at the Balzac Galleries, New York; 1933 at the Academy of Allied Arts, New York; 1933 and 1934 at the Grace Horne Galleries, Boston; 1935, Stavoli Galleries, Hartford, Conn.; 1936 at the Fischer Galleries, New York; 1937 at the Everhart Museum, Scranton, Pa., and in many other cities.

In group exhibitions Manievich has participated at Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh; Philadelphia, Sesqui Exposition; Corcoran Gallery, Washington; Pennsylvania Academy, Philadelphia.

His paintings have been acquired by: Government Museum, and Tereschenko Museum, Kiev; Luxembourg Museum, Paris; Horvatt Gallery, Geneva; Kuindzi Museum, Petrograd; Government Museum, the Folk Museum, and the Tretyakov Gallery, Moscow; Museum of Art, Odessa; Brooklyn Museum of Art, New York, and by many individual European and American collectors.

The exhibition closes December 24.

DESIGN, ART DEFINED

Gazette—17.12.37 Prof. P. E. Nobbs Speaks at Mechanics Institute

To understand the meaning of either design or art, two things which are often so intimately related that it is difficult to say where one ends and the other begins, it is necessary to define them separately and not in terms of one another. This was the tenor of an address given by Professor Percy E. Nobbs on the subject "Design and Art" at the Mechanics Institute last night.

"Design is the discovery of form, and form, as revealed in nature, has always three elements: the purpose of the thing that has the form, the stuff this thing is made of, and the method by which this stuff is rendered obedient," said Professor Nobbs.

Art on the other hand, had the function of expressing emotion, so that its purpose was not cold-blooded statement. The artist having experienced a mood transmitted it to his public, not in all its integrity but more or less, by such means as the dance, painting, sculpture, or music.

French Pictures And a Van Gogh At Scott's Gallery

Star—16.12.37

An exhibition of works by modern French painters, which has just opened at Scott's galleries on Drummond street, is, for the most part, the collection, including pictures by Gauguin, Cezanne, Pissarro, Renoir, Modigliani, Lurcat and others, which was shown in the same gallery two months ago; and many people will be glad of another opportunity of seeing it. Some changes have been made in the collection and there are several additions.

By far the most striking addition is a picture by Vincent Van Gogh, which is probably the largest and most important work by him that has been shown in Montreal. It is the picture, called "Les nuages tourmentés," which is known from reproductions, of a sky of heavy, tumbled clouds above a bright green and yellow meadow. Though the foreground is full of colour, it is the clouds that dominate the picture, which is a brilliant piece of effect and a very good example of Van Gogh's astonishing method of painting.

The collection contains a number of small and very good examples of Boudin's work and the additions include some of Dufy's impudent sketches, of which one of a racecourse is quite characteristic.

This exhibition is to be open till the end of the month.

Pictures by A. Manievich

Star—16.12.37

Abraham Manievich, whose pictures are the larger part of the present exhibition in Eaton's galleries, is a Russian who, after painting in many countries, has been living for some years in the United States, and his pictures are mostly of places in that country, with a few places in Canada. His summer pictures have a slight suggestion of Van Gogh, but with a quite different sense of colour. In many of them the colour scheme, which seems to be distinctly Russian, is largely of string greens with a good deal of crimson and scarlet, which gives some striking decorative effects but makes them rather hot and heavy as pictures. There are a number of street scenes, in which there is more light and air, some of the best of them of Peekskill, N.Y., and other places in New York and Pennsylvania, and a few painted in Canada. These are pictures of mean houses, with some good effects of snow and of atmosphere after rain. The flower and still life pictures, of which there are about a dozen, are very unequal; one of the best as a piece of decoration, is a large one with some big red flowers. There are two portrait studies; "Lucie" which is the larger, is also the better; looks like a good portrait but is not a very satisfying composition.

In another room are a few pictures by Robert Sharpe. Among these are some little sketches of river and shore scenes, with boats, which are bright and cheerful, and an interesting study of breakers on a shore. The portraits and portrait studies include one of the painter and another of an old man, which have life and spirit; the other portraits have good drawing and painting but are a little stiff and lifeless.

A Lecture About The Making of Etchings

On Thursday afternoon at the Art Association of Montreal a lecture was given by Robert Pilot, R.C.A., on the making of an etching. This was one of the series of lectures which are intended for children and young people, but an audience, which was made up largely of grown-up people found it very interesting. Mr. Pilot began with an outline of the history of etching from its beginnings about the year 1500, and his illustrations included examples of works by several of the greatest etchers, as the greatest of whom he placed Rembrandt, Meryon and Whistler. In the middle of the lecture a moving picture, made by the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, was shown, of the whole making of an etching, from a preliminary pencil drawing to the finished print of its last state; a very good set of pictures, in which time was given to show every part of the process quite clearly. Mr. Pilot ended with some more examples of etching and with some practical suggestions to etchers.

Westmount Examiner Castles Are Described By Prof. Turner

Dec. 10, 1937

Local Resident Addresses Art Association, Talks on Ancient Form of Architecture

Castles must be defined as fortified dwellings that are intended for residence and defence, declared Professor Phillip J. Turner, in addressing the Art Association Monday. He admitted that the word "castle" had been linked to all manner of things from prehistoric earthworks down to preposterous buildings of the present century, with mock draw-bridges and sham battlements.

Professor Turner illustrated his lecture with lantern slides of various castles, and showing pictures of 'trebuches' and other siege engines of an age long passed.

He contrasted castles with cathedrals. "The cathedral is the apotheosis of architecture," he said, "whereas the castle is architecture fighting for its life. Yet it is no exaggeration to say that for every thousand visitors to the great English cathedrals or abbeys, there is one person who would stop his automobile to stroll through the ruins of a castle."

He explained this by saying that castles are very complicated pieces of architecture, and the different parts composing them are not so easily understood as are those of a cathedral.

Robert Sharps Shows Paintings at Eaton's

Gazette—11.12.37

Robert Sharps is holding a small exhibition of his paintings in one of the rooms of the Eaton Fine Art Galleries, and the collection indicates a sincere and conscientious artist with a taste for figure work. "The Problem"—a girl in a middie blouse poring over a book—is done with serious regard to drawing, a quality that is evident in "The Crimson Shawl" and the head of the white-haired and bearded man called "Habitant." Another straightforward canvas is "Margaret," in which the dress materials have interested the artist. There is also a self-portrait of the artist in a smock.

For the rest, the painter has found congenial material in harbor scenes—at Montreal with steamers, and at Edgartown and Cape Cod, Mass., where the fishing craft are the centre of interest.

LA PORTE DE COMPIEGNE, by Maurice Utrillo, the French modernist, which this week was purchased by the Art Association of Montreal for its permanent collection, is of this painter's "White Period" and was in the collection of paintings brought to Montreal by P. Eilers, of E. J. van Wisselingh & Company, of Amsterdam, Holland, and recently shown in the Johnson Art Galleries, 1340 St. Catherine street west.

It is an interesting work, done in a free, summary manner, and shows the gate to a French town rich in historical associations. Here, in 1430, Joan of Arc was taken prisoner by the Burgundians, the town was held for a time by the Prussians in the Franco-Prussian War in 1870, and also briefly by the Germans in 1914. In the adjacent forest of Compiègne, between Choisy-au-Bac and Rethondes, Marshal Foch on November 8, 1918, presented to the German parliament the Allies' armistice terms.

GALLERY HOURS CHANGE

Gazette 23.12.37
Art Association to Extend Time After New Year

It has been announced by Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the Art Association of Montreal, that the hours for visitors to the Gallery will be extended on and after January 2. Under the new arrangement, the Gallery will be open from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays; on other (free) days the Gallery will be open from 10 until five.

This year the usual New Year's reception will not be held, as the Galleries will be closed on New Year's Day. In its place an evening of chamber music will be held on January 11, coincident with the exhibition of the Canadian group of painters which comes to the Gallery on January 8.

The programme of lectures and exhibitions for January, February and March will be released in the near future, and will provide for at least six lectures per month. Gallery talks will be given in conjunction with each important exhibit. Lecturers for the winter season will include H. S. Ede, curator of the Tate Gallery, London, England; Julius Held, of New York University; and Dr. Martin Weinberger, formerly of the Old Pinakotek, Munich.

In pursuance of the plan of the Art Association to exhibit various masterpieces from time to time it is now showing an important painting by Ribera, entitled "The Martyrdom of St. Andrew." This painting, which was presented by J. W. McConnell, of Montreal, to the National Gallery at Ottawa, has been loaned to the Montreal Association for a period of two weeks.

ART GALLERY HOURS REVISION ANNOUNCED

Change Made For Public Convenience

A revised schedule of hours for the Sherbrooke street galleries of the Art Association of Montreal will become effective January 2, it was announced this morning.

The revised schedule is being adopted to make the galleries available to a greater number of people, particularly those who would like to visit them after business hours.

Commencing on that date, the galleries will be open on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of each week from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. instead of from 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. as formerly. On Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday of each week the galleries will be open from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

No New Year's reception will be held by the Association this year, but instead there will be an evening of chamber music on Tuesday, January 11, coincident with an exhibition of a group of Canadian paintings. Lectures by H. S. Ede, curator of the Tate Galleries of London, and by Dr. Weinberger formerly of Old Pinakotek of Munich, Germany, will be included in the lectures to be presented by the association during the first part of the new year.

JUVENILE ARTISTS EXHIBIT IN OTTAWA

Hundreds Attend Amazing
Show of Pictures at National Gallery

Ottawa, December 19. — (C) — Hundreds of persons visited the National Gallery today to see its amazing first exhibition of works by children of 10 cities from New Brunswick to British Columbia.

They saw 140 pictures, ranging in style from kindergarten cut outs and two-dimensional conventionalized drawings of five-year-olds to street scenes, landscapes and costume studies in water color, tempera and pastel by boys and girls up to 14 years of age.

The children's works occupy two galleries and are catalogued anonymously in a two-page folder with a foreword by Arthur Lismer, principal of the Ontario College of Art, Toronto. They come from Saint John, N.B.; the Children's Art Centre of Montreal, the Baron Byng High School of Montreal, The Study of Montreal, the National Gallery's classes for Children, Kingston, Ont., Art Association, The Art Gallery of Toronto, the Winnipeg Art Gallery Association, the Edmonton Museum of Arts and the Vancouver Art Gallery. Outstanding numerically and in quality are contributions from the three Montreal groups, the Art Gallery of Toronto and the Vancouver Art Gallery.

The exhibition contains pictures of steamboats, automobiles and buildings by small children who reduce objects to their simplest possible terms, drawing house fronts from bang in front so they won't be worried by perspective, and writing: "This is a house."

One Ottawa boy, apparently considering the front elevation of the Parliament Buildings' Centre Block unnecessarily complex, reduced the whole thing to a one-storey shack with a short tower like that of a village fire station. He got the driveway and stairways in and included the temporary cenotaph with wreaths.

A Vancouver girl produced a finely drawn scarlet dinosaur, apparently an iguanodon, cavorting among lush tropical trees. Circus scenes are numerous. A small boy, depicting the expulsion from Eden, shows an indignant angel pointing the way from above while Adam and Eve, apparently unrepentant, ride forth eating red apples aboard an elephant, preceded by an ostrich, followed by a giraffe and watched by a fat serpent.

There are pictures of animals and flowers, trains and street cars, one low-wing monoplane, waterfalls and mountains, a conventionalized street with the buildings labelled, "church" and "jail" next door to each other. There are no portraits but numerous pictures of people, including serious studies by those in the older age bracket.

Works by Deceased Press
Artist at National Gallery

Ottawa, December 19. — (C) — The National Gallery of Canada announces it plans an exhibition of works by the late Henri Julien, one-time cartoonist of the Montreal Star and the first cartoonist whose works will be hung in the National Art Institution.

Julien, native of Quebec who lived subsequently near Beauharnois, in Montreal and Toronto, died in 1908 at the age of 56, leaving a vast number of paintings, drawings and cartoons, among them a famous series on French Canadian habitants and a series of political cartoons known as "Songs of the Bytown Coons."

Julien was called the "artist of the habitant," but his works include lightning sketches of street incidents for newspaper illustration, a long series on Parliamentary life sketched from the Press Gallery. He sketched in Western Canada during a trip he started in 1871 and on which he hunted buffalo with the North West Mounted Police on the site of Calgary.

One of his most famous series, however, was the "coons," caricatures of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's cabinet early in the century. It depicted Laurier's cabinet members in the guise of Negro minstrels, then popular entertainers.

Paintings by Gagnon In Watson Galleries

Gazette—18.12.37

Two fine winter scenes by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., which have not been exhibited in Montreal before, are attracting attention at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. They are subjects done in the Baie St. Paul region, which, before his long sojourn in France, was always a favored painting ground with this artist.

"Laurentian Sunset" shows the typical old habitant house, with nearby well, and a glimpse of distant hills catching the glow of the sinking sun. The other, "Old Houses," shows the structures at the top of a hill, which is being crested by horse and sleigh—the attitude of the animal suggesting the labor of the climb. The scene was also done at Baie St. Paul.

Canadian Industrial Arts Show Planned

Display Under Royal Canadian Academy Auspices to Open in Toronto and Later in Gazette—Montreal—22.12.37

Dominion-wide in its scope, the Canadian Industrial Arts Exhibition, under the auspices of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, is exciting interest and already two prizes have been offered in competitions sponsored by firms that are participating in the show, which is to open in the Art Gallery of Toronto, next February, and later in Montreal and other important centres.

Introducing the important question of art in manufacturing, the R.C.A. circular states:

"Recently there has been in many of the principal manufacturing countries a growing interest in the artistic character of manufactured (machine-made) products of many kinds, more particularly those intended for domestic use and adornment. Extensive surveys and investigations into the cultural and trade values of art, as applied to manufacture, have been made, for example, by the Board of Trade in England, under the direction of Viscount Runciman. The Federation of British Industries has, as an important factor in its direction, an Advisory Council on Art, whose work has been successful in improving the standards of taste of the consumer in England and abroad; and, by encouraging greater attention to the need for finer design in manufactured products, has freed them of those defects which disqualified them in competition with the better designed articles of foreign make, securing for them markets they did not, up to that time, possess. Recently a number of successful exhibitions of products of this type have been held in London, under distinguished patronage, and the auspices of the Royal Academy and other eminent agencies.

"Parallel with the efforts of the manufacturing organizations are those of the educational authorities in the provision of wider opportunities for an art education which develops the consumer appreciation of art in the objects of his environment. A similar impetus is now being given to art education in Canada.

"The Royal Canadian Academy, the leading authority on art matters in Canada, and chartered by the Dominion Government to foster the Fine and Industrial Arts in this country, is convinced that the time has arrived when the interests of art, public taste and industry may be served by steps similar to those taken in other countries. It proposes, therefore, to give expression to the need for improvement in these fields by organizing a series of public exhibitions of manufactured products in which art is an essential element."

The Royal Canadian Academy of Arts plans to collect and assemble the best products of Canadian industry and craftsmanship; to present this material in a manner to awaken a consciousness of the quality of Canadian products in our public and stimulate a closer co-operation between the public, the designer and the manufacturer.

The conditions of the exhibition are:

Exhibits will be limited to articles manufactured in Canada. Designs may originate in Canada or abroad, but preference will be given to native designs.

The Academy, in pursuance of its aim to present articles of only the highest artistic and manufacturing standards, as judged by competent authorities, will reserve reasonable rights of selection, rejection and arrangement.

The exhibit will be planned with appropriate schemes of decoration and ample explanatory material. Full credits on the exhibit and in the catalogue will be given to exhibitors and designers.

Exhibitors will not be required to rent or in any way pay for space. Other necessary, but relatively small expenses of packing and shipping will be charged against the exhibitor.

A comprehensive educational programme of public lectures will be presented by speakers qualified by experience as designers and manufacturers, whenever such instruction is possible.

Whatever further particulars may be needed will be supplied by communicating with E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., secretary, Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, 1207 Bleury street, Montreal; Fred S. Haines, R.C.A., sectional chairman, Ontario College of Arts, Grange Park, Toronto; Robert Pilot, R.C.A., sectional chairman, 3531 Ste. Famille street, Montreal.

THE GALLERIES and museum of the Art Association of Montreal will be closed on New Year's Day, but will be open on Sunday, January 2 as usual.

Canadian Landscapes Start Their Painters

Since landscape painting has always been a very important part of all painting in Canada, the lecture at the Art Association of Montreal on Monday afternoon, by Miss Anne Savage covered more ground than its title, "The story of Landscape Painting in Canada," suggested. Landscape was her principal subject and she began her story by tracing origins of Canadian painting in work by Crome and Constable. In Canada she began with the early, immigrant painters, Paul Kane and Krieghoff, in whose work European influences still prevailed, and went on to trace the gradual development of a truly Canadian vision and feeling in landscape painting. Homer Watson, James Morrice, William Brymner and Clarence Gagnon were some of the painters whose work was specially mentioned and illustrated in this middle period. Miss Savage spoke very graphically and poetically of Canadian scenery and its influence on its painters. In the newer period in Canadian painting, the work of Tom Thomson was made a sort of centre round which the work of several other painters revolved, and Miss Savage had much of interest to point out in the pictures of many living Canadian painters. 21.12.37

Lectures This Week at Star The Art Association

Two lectures will be given this week at the Art Association of Montreal by Mr. H. S. Ede, curator of the Tate Gallery, London.

On Wednesday afternoon at 4.45 Mr. Ede will give a lecture—free to the public—with the title, "Pictures are like people," and on Thursday afternoon, at 4.45, he will lecture on "The sculpture of Henri Gaudier-Brzeska."

On the evening of Tuesday, January 11th, there will be an evening of chamber music at the Art Association. 5.1.38

A Lecture on the Art Of Gaudier-Brzeska

At the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday afternoon Mr. H. S. Ede of the Tate Gallery, London, gave a second lecture, this time on the life and work of the French sculptor, Henri Gaudier-Brzeska, who lived and worked chiefly in London and was killed, still a young man, fighting in the French army in the war. In his public lecture on Wednesday Mr. Ede had pointed out the impossibility of describing works of art in words, and he spoke more about Gaudier's strange life than about his work. The quantity of sculpture done by Gaudier was not great, but in the lecturer's view, his early death deprived the twentieth century of the chance of rivalling the sixteenth in possessing a great sculptor.

Some good photographs of sculpture by Gaudier were shown on the screen, but, as Mr. Ede pointed out, they could give only one side of works which, to be appreciated, must be seen from all sides. Some works by other sculptors were also shown in contrast, to make it clear Mr. Ede's claim that Gaudier's work grows from its material, as if the sculpture had been in the stone, and had merely been revealed by the sculptor's work. Some drawings by Gaudier were also shown, and the slides could, of course, give a much better idea of the beauty of the line and the simple expressiveness of the drawing. Star, 10.1.38

Music at Art Gallery

A concert of chamber music will be given tomorrow, Tuesday evening, at the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street, for members of the Association.

Space available for the concert will allow of the seating of only about 300. The music will be given by the Mozart Trio, and Lucille Laporte, soprano. The trio will play a number of pieces of old English music and some works by Haydn and by modern French composers. There will be harp solos, and Miss Laporte will sing old French and other songs.

A Musical Evening at The Art Association

The big lecture room of the Art Association of Montreal is quite admirably suited to the performance of chamber music, and it was used again for that purpose on Tuesday evening, after an interval of some years. The music on this occasion was given by an instrumental trio and a singer. The Mozart Trio, consisting of flute, violoncello and harp, played by Herve Baillargeon, Napoleon Dandereau and Juliette Drouin, is now a well established combination, and it has a repertory of cheerful music, mostly by older composers, which was quite the right sort of music for Tuesday's gathering. Miss Drouin also played some harp solos, which were as well liked as always. The singer, Miss Lucille Laporte, was heard in a number of Weckerlin's arrangements of old French songs, and had so much success that she had to make a number of additions to her program.

The galleries of the Art Association were all opened for the occasion, so that pictures and music together made an evening that members of the Art Association may be glad to have repeated.

McConnell Gift To National Gallery

Ottawa, Dec. 22. — (CP) — The National Gallery announced today J. W. McConnell, Montreal capitalist and philanthropist, had given it one of the finest works of the 17th century Spanish painter, Jusepe Ribera.

Ribera, known by contemporaries as "Lo Spagnoletto" (the Little Spaniard), was born near Valencia in 1588 and was acknowledged greatest master of the Neapolitan school of painting where he was supreme over all rivals during the first half of the 17th century. His pictures now are hung in most of the world's great galleries.

National Gallery officials saw the painting in the collection of the Duke of Rutland at Belvoir Castle in Lincolnshire and wanted it. Mr. McConnell undertook to buy it for them.

It will be shown during the Christmas season at the Art Association in Montreal and then will be brought here for permanent exhibition. Gazette, 22.12.37

J. M. Alfsen Holding Exhibition at Eaton's

Star, 15.1.38

John M. Alfsen, of Toronto, is holding an exhibition of portrait studies and the occasional landscape in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. There is every evidence of industry and sincerity in the items on view, but more discrimination in the selection of his young models would have tended to give greater spirit to the show. The artist has approached his task bravely, but in art as in nature too much of the small boy may excite irritation. The boys and girls Mr. Alfsen is partial to as models cannot, in the main, be said to be very distinctive. Race and color lines are ignored—"Tin Sing," with his black hair cut in a "bang," is Oriental, while "Emma," with plaited "pig-tails," is an effective Negro subject. "Violet," with a red headband shows some dignity, a sense the painter imparts to his more grown-up sitters.

Besides some landscapes with turbulent water as the centre of interest, Mr. Alfsen shows "Scarborough Bluffs," with figures near the lakeside; "Labelle, Que." featuring the big church, buildings, covered bridge, water and a jumble of logs; "Ottawa River," rocks, water and distant hills, and "Gatineau River," with tug manoeuvring timber rafts.

Mr. Alfsen spent three years studying his profession at the Ontario College of Art, Toronto, after which he spent a year travelling in Belgium, France and Italy, later going to the Art Students League in New York for further study. He is a member of the Ontario Society of Artists and of the Canadian Group of Painters.

Julius Held's Lectures At The Art Association

The second of the new series of public lectures at the Art Association of Montreal was given on Wednesday afternoon to an audience which quite filled the big lecture room. This was the first of two lectures by Dr. Julius Held, formerly of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin. His subject on this occasion was Franz Hals, but he introduced Hals with a short account of Dutch painting in the beginning of the seventeenth century. He described the conditions in which the Dutch painters worked; a community of rich merchants and manufacturers, collectors of pictures, who were little interested in the subjects or methods of earlier painters, and wanted pictures of themselves and their own surroundings. Dr. Held showed illustrations of the work of Jan Steen, Paul Potter and other painters and engravers, before going on to the work of Hals and, with slides of a number of his best portraits, showed the different manners in which he painted his very different subjects.

This, Thursday evening at 8.30, Dr. Held will lecture again at the Art Association on "Caravaggio, a too little known painter."

SHOW BY CANADIAN GROUP OF PAINTERS

Members of Enlarged Old Body of Seven Hold Characteristic Exhibition

OPENED AT ART GALLERY

Paintings Not Likely to Excite Old-Time Controversy—Works by Invited Contributors Included

Once the signal for critics and art commentators to whet their axes and to scan dictionaries for devastating adjectives, both subtle and direct, it must be frankly admitted that much that aroused ire and evoked abuse in the works of the Group of Seven seems to be absent from the exhibition of the Canadian Group of Painters—the enlargement of the parent body—which opened on Saturday in the Canadian Room of the Art Association of Montreal.

This does not mean that the paintings lack virility, individuality and originality, but rather that what twenty years ago was regarded as a deliberate affront to artistic decency has become so generally accepted—and deservedly so in view of what some European painters have since produced—that the present show neither shocks nor particularly thrills. Certainly there is nothing on view that calls for the application of the Padlock Law.

The works, effectively hung, have admirable setting in the renovated lecture hall, the neutral wall covering and improved lighting acting in a definitely fair manner to the painters.

A. Y. Jackson, a stalwart in the group, is as vigorous as ever in "Mining Town"—a cluster of houses under a stormy sky that invests the scene with a dispiriting grimness, and in "Gaspé Village," with its houses in a landscape of disturbed snow that stretches to the sea. Lillian Torrance Newton, R.C.A., is represented by soundly painted portraits—firmly modelled without undue emphasis on the sculptural; of Louis Muhlstock, the Montreal artist; Mrs. J. W. L. MacDermot, kindly of glance, with a glimpse of Laurentian hill and lake country as a background; and "Martha," healthy and fresh-looking in a flounced blouse and big straw hat in sunlight. Frank Carmichael, A.R.C.A., has an impressive and solidly painted mountain and lake landscape, called "Light and Shadow," and H. Mabel May, A.R.C.A., is more definite than usual in her treatment of "Sunshine and Shadow"—a snowy landscape with houses and a church on a plain.

A. J. Casson, A.R.C.A., is precise in his painting called "The Village Store," which is very true in its impression of strong sunlight, and Charles F. Comfort, A.R.C.A., has a big and impressive nocturne, in blacks and low tones, entitled "Lake Superior Village," with a patch of moon-lit water and dark buildings edging the lake.

Kathleen Daly finds Indian subjects eminently paintable, and invests the Indian woman and her baby, "Two-foes with Papoose," and also "Indian Playmates," with character. Prudence Heward has done well with tones of brown in "Hester," a nude Negro girl seated under a tree, and in "Young Colored Girl" who pinches her chin. Isabel McLaughlin's "Bayview Country" is reminiscent of Henri Rousseau, and she shows more individuality in "South from my Apartment"—sunlit roof amid trees, with skyscrapers in the background.

Randolph S. Hewton, R.C.A., has an agreeable color harmony in his figure study, a trifle Gauguinesque in inspiration, and Arthur Lisner, A.R.C.A., reveals the practised hand in his lake and mountain landscape—called "African Scene." Andre Bieler's "The Baroque Ford"—an antiquated and distorted auto outside a fruit market—leavens his interpretation with gentle humor, and Emily Carr brings a marked decorative sense to her paintings done on the Pacific coast. Flowers are the subject of "Spring," by Sarah H. Robertson, who also shows trees and gay flags, under the title of "Coronation," and a Laurentian scene, "July at the Lake" is the acceptable offering by Anne Savage. Children at play are painted with convincing action by Pegi Nicol, and both Paraskeva Clark and Carl Schaffer show individual interpretations of wheat fields.

Lauren Harris, under the titles of numbered "compositions," shows abstract paintings of angles and spheres, which may be intensely exciting to devotees of this phase, and B. Cogill Haworth has gone to Bic, P.Q., for his wave-like fields, houses and hills, called "Potatoes and Daisies." Bertram R. Brooker's haloed figures of "Entombment" rather suggest casting moulds. It is a work experimentally interesting, and may furnish some with a mild shock.

Others of the Group showing work are John Alfsen, Rody Kenny Courtice, Lemoine L. Fitzgerald, Bess Harris, J. W. G. Macdonald, Yvonne McK. Housser, George Pepper, Charles H. Scott, Gordon Webber, Wm. G. Weston and W. J. Wood.

Of the work by invited contributors, Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A., has a good study of a horse and sleigh in a shelter; Mabel I. Lockerby, an effective painting of a girl and a goat, called "Suzette and Juju"; Nora Collyer, rambling buildings and a wayside cross; Victor Huebert, still life of apples. Norman Bethune sees "Night Operation" from the upper seat of a theatre, and John Lyman sends "Lassitude"—a reclining nude of a hue that suggests a bad attack of sunburn. Fritz Brandtner recalls the dazzle camouflage of war days in his painting called "Hockey" in which a sense of speed is suggested. Caven Atkins sends capably painted tulips, Ethel Seath, a decoration entitled "Driftwood," and Philip H. Surrey, "going to work"—houses, pallid street lights, a figure, and mist banding the base of hills. The sense of dreariness in this work is rather jarred by the sky with its odd cloud. Louis Muhlstock shows "Summer Landscape", a watercolor of trees, stream and reflections, which falls short of his usual performance, and Jack Humphrey has a boldly handled "Draped Head."

The catalogue foreword explains the aims of the Group in militant tone, but references to "attacking prejudice and senile tradition"... "the worshippers of the sacred cows," and "rebellion against the Philistines", savor, in 1938, rather of the "Ya, ya" of the noisy urchin. The Group, now soundly established, surely needs no such devices to retain recognition.

Canadian Group's Pictures at the Art Association

Star, 13.1.38

The exhibition of pictures by the Canadian Group of Painters, the enlarged edition of the Group of Seven, which are now being shown at the Art Association, must have been more representative when it was shown in Toronto. Thirty-two of the thirty-six members appear in the catalogue, with twenty-three invited guests, some of whom are much better known by other activities than painting. Only about half of this original collection is exhibited here, but it may, no doubt, be taken as representing the group. On the whole this exhibition is slightly disappointing; it contains very little that is new or distinctively Canadian, and some of the exhibitors seem content to imitate other painters.

Portraits and figure studies are some of the best things in this collection. There are three good portraits by Lillian Torrance Newton, particularly one of Louis Muhlstock, and one of a girl in a shady hat. Prudence Heward has a very good study of a head of a coloured girl, but her full length of a nude negress, though clever, is exceedingly ugly. A strong study of a draped head is by Jack Humphrey, one of the group's guests. Kathleen Daly shows a lively pair of Indian children; her other picture of a girl and a papoose is less interesting. There is one of Pegi Nicol's bright studies of movement of children playing.

One of the best of the landscapes is Anne Savage's, slightly formalized "July at the Lake," which has good composition and color, and there are effective color and space in a landscape by Lauren Harris, Junior, a guest exhibitor, with symbolic forms of trees. A. Y. Jackson has a quite characteristic snow scene, and other good landscapes are the wheatfields of Carl Schaffer and Paraskeva Clark, and a view near Bic by B. Cogill Haworth.

A few members have succeeded in getting away from mere representation, without always quite arriving at anything else. A leader among these is Lauren Harris, Senior, whose numbered "compositions" are studies in solid geometry with a very restricted use of color. There are elements of geometry too in Bertram Brooker's diagram of the Entombment, an attempt at composition with a careful avoidance of detail or expression.

Others of the more interesting pictures in this exhibition are Charles Comfort's picture of a Lake Superior Village, with a rather fine effect of a little strong light and many black shadows, Sarah M. Robertson's picture of growing flowers, Andre Bieler's group of men in a street market, Isabel McLaughlin's view of roofs and trees, a still life by Gordon Webber, a sketch of a girl by Randolph Hewton and a swirl of green in a landscape sketch by Emily Carr.

Portraits of Great Canadian War Leaders To Be Exhibited

Star Jan. 14, 38

PAINTINGS of six famous Canadian generals including Sir Arthur Currie, which were executed in France during 1919 by Sir William Orpen, R.A., are to be on exhibition at the Art Gallery, 1379 Sherbrooke street, for the next two weeks. These famous canvases form part of the National collection at Ottawa.

Dr. C. E. Martin, President of the Art Association of Montreal, stated this morning that these paintings are part of a Treasure Series to be instituted every two weeks at the Gallery. The last Treasure was Ribera's The Martyrdom of St. Andrew, the picture presented by J. W. McConnell to the National collection.

The portraits are of:

Major Gen. L. J. Lipsett, C.M.G.
Maj. Gen. Sir David Watson, K.C., C.M.G.

Lt. Gen. Sir Arthur Currie, G.C.M.G., K.C.B.

Major Gen. Sir A. C. Macdonnell, K.C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O.

Maj. Gen. Sir F. O. W. Loomis, K.C.B., M.G., D.S.O.

Maj. Gen. Sir H. E. Burstall, K.C.B., K.C.M.G., A.D.C.

Of the six generals, two are still alive. Sir A. C. Macdonnell is living in retirement in Eastern Canada, while Sir H. E. Burstall lives in England, also in retirement.

Of those who have passed away, the most recent to go was Sir Frederick Loomis, who died only a few blocks away from where the exhibition is now housed.

The different types of face painted by Orpen, as he went about France during 1918 to do this work, are very interesting. Maj. Gen. Lipsett, the permanent force British officer loaned to Winnipeg before the war, was, for instance, the typical stern soldier. On the other hand, Sir David Watson, who once ran the Quebec Chronicle, has his hat on at a jaunty angle, and he seems ready to break into a smile at the idea of posing for a picture.

Macdonnell with his carefully waxed moustache tips, but with a kindly look to be detected back of the formidable martial air, also is a well done portrait.

This exhibition is not likely to be shown anywhere again, according to Dr. Martin.

Orpen Portraits Of Six Generals At Art Gallery

Star, Jan. 17th, 38

Six pictures, which have just been lent by the National Gallery of Canada to the Art Association of Montreal, are at the same time a fine record of six distinguished Canadian generals and a memorial of their painter, Sir William Orpen. They are true but not formal portraits—quick impressions made in France in intervals of active service. All canvases are more or less unfinished, but there is much art in the way in which they have been left unfinished and some of the roughness of the work seems to be the result of well calculated accident. The uniforms, if only sketched in, are probably quite exact, and there is no conflict between them and the much more carefully painted faces.

The portrait of Sir Arthur Currie, which is the most finished of these pictures, and that of General Lipsett are the most sedate. Sir Henry Burstall and, still more Sir David Watson appear more as men of action who could give the painter only a little time and wanted to get away, and their portraits are those in which there is most life and almost movement. The hastily painted backgrounds add to the vivid effect of the figures. Sir Archibald Macdonnell is much more restfully supported by a dark background, against which the face and figure are made all the more striking by blank canvass left at one side. Sir Frederick Loomis stands out strongly against nothing but the white priming of the canvas.

These pictures, which are fine examples of Orpen's work, are to be shown at the Art Gallery for two weeks.

FARMHOUSE, ST. URBAIN, by R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., which is a convincing interpretation of strong sunlight and transparent shadows. This is among the works by this Montreal painter on view in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west.

Works By R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., Reveal Variety at Watson Art Galleries

Star — 15. Jan. 38

From Ste. Marguerite on the North River to the Baie St. Paul district below Quebec, R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., has ranged in search of landscape subjects, and the products of his industry go on exhibition today in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west.

The show, looked forward to each year by picture-lovers, clearly reveals that this Montreal artist is not content to rest on past successes, but is making steady progress. While, as ever, not affected by extremes in experimentation, Mr. Pilot, in the course of a sane, normal development, yearly shows increasing skill in charging his landscapes with atmosphere. He is not afraid of vivid color, but the values are so true that there is no hint of mere gaudy paintiness, and only long and searching observation can account for the convincing transparency of his shadows.

Always capable in the arrangement of his material, Mr. Pilot is finding in the noble hills of the Baie St. Paul region subjects that lay a slightly greater stress on design. Nature there supplies a rich variety of pattern, and the scenery does not have to be distorted and tortured to fill a formula. In his treatment of these landscapes of miles of timbered hillside stretching to distant blue ridges, Mr. Pilot shows the practised hand, and he invests such subjects with dignity and a sense of spaciousness. "Autumn, St. Urbain," illustrated on this page, is typical of several scenes done in this neighborhood—bush, glimpse of lake, and timbered hills, blanketed by mountains.

"Mountains, St. Urbain," shows bold sombre mountains against a cloudy sky, with the timbered ridges touched with a ruddy light. "November," in the same area, is similar in theme, and a gayer note is sounded in "October, Near Baie St. Paul," where, beyond a farmhouse, rising timberland glows with vivid hues. "Autumn Evening, St. Urbain," gives a glimpse of winding tree-edged stream and distant blue hills silhouetted against a golden sky. "Grey Day" is marked by a fine cloudy sky above a house with figures on the verandah. It suggests a downpour of rain at any moment. In this neighborhood the painter found a fine subject in "Thatched Barn," with solitary figure, blue hills and a fine sky.

Some lovely tones of blue mark the distant mountains beyond fields and farmhouse in "Cloud Shadows, St. Urbain," and in this village the quaint painted wooden buildings, with figures on a verandah, gleam in the work called "Sunglow." Strong sunlight floods "Farm at Baie St. Paul"—trim house and barns backed by evergreens and edged by trees in autumn livery, and this neighborhood supplied "Outdoor Oven," with tree in yellow leaf near the smoking bakery, about which turkeys forage.

Turkeys hunt food in the grass near the solidly painted buildings, under bright sunlight against a low hill, in the canvas entitled "Farmhouse, St. Urbain," where a woman tends an outdoor oven, and the sunlight of a hot summer day envelops the homes, figures, rising ground and hills in "Village of St. Urbain."

Of a less clement season are some landscapes done nearer home—"North River, Mont Rolland," a Laurentian winter scene, with pines and spruces edging open water, and distant hills touched with snow; a bit of Ste. Adele showing the quaint church and nearby buildings, backed by bush, and the snow-covered river and almost smothered boat-house in the foreground; "Winter Stream, Montebello"—open water, birches and a snowy landscape stretching to blue hills; "Pine Tree, Mont Rolland," with blue shadows making tracery on the snow and a glimpse of open brook; "Rapids, North River," a jumble of broken snow and ice-fringed turbulent water with a mountain in the background. Birch and poplars screen the snow-covered rocky foreground in "Near Ste. Marguerite," and there are a number of other winter landscapes, done along the North River, which show this painter's versatility.

It is an exhibition that should widen the circle of admirers of this painter's work, for it is interesting in the variety of subjects and is marked by refreshing sincerity.

Some Pictures by A New Painter

Star — 8.2.38

A Montreal painter, Dimitry Licushine, whose work is hardly known here as yet, has an exhibition, which will remain open till the end of this week, in Eaton's gallery. Mr. Licushine shows himself in this collection to be a very able painter with good ideas of picture making and a fine sense of color. Some of the best of his painting is in still life studies, of which there are a number here; there are some very good ones, and one of a glass and a white table cloth is a particularly clever piece of painting. There is much cleverness, too, in two studies of pairs of shoes and all sorts of materials, including flowers and fruits have been used as subjects. Two pictures of interiors have excellent effects of sunlight through a big window, and there are some interesting sketches of Montreal streets and docks. Among the landscapes is one of hills with a very satisfactory arrangement of greens and blues, and there are a number of good scenes in the neighborhood of Perce. Mr. Licushine has even succeeded in finding a new impression of Perce Rock, as a sharp silhouette standing out among bright reflections from the sea.

PROF. PETER BREIGER TO TALK ON MURALS

"A History of Mural Painting," will be the subject of a lantern slide illustrated lecture at the Montreal Art Association's Gallery on Sherbrooke street on Monday at 4.45 p.m. The speaker will be Prof. Peter Breiger, of the Department of Fine Arts, University of Toronto.

On Thursday of next week at the same time Mrs. J. W. McLeod will give a motion picture film accompanied talk on "Knights in Armor," the lecture dealing with variations in medieval armor and the craftsmanship involved in making it.

Jack Beder Reveals Versatility and Skill

Star — 15.1.38
Montreal Artist, Holding Exhibition in Eaton Fine Art Galleries, Shows Marked Progress

Jack Beder, of Montreal, is holding a small exhibition of his oils in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, the items revealing very encouraging progress and much promise. Distinct advance is evident when one recalls the rather uncouth "Stone-cutter's Place, St. Lawrence Boulevard," shown in 1932, though progress was increasingly evident in his contributions to the Art Association Spring Show last year—"After the Rain," "Rooftops," and "View from a Roof." In the present paintings the touch is more confident, the color cleaner and the values more just.

Apart from excursions to Quebec, which supplied "Porte St. Louis," and also some old houses in a winter setting, and Ste. Anne de Beaupre, at the same season, which furnished a good subject in "La Maison Fortin," Mr. Beder has found Montreal rich in subjects. There is fine light in the painting of the Sun Life Building, and also in the robust sketch called "Boats in Harbor." Brick buildings, and the trunks of trees, rising from shadowed snow, catch the sunlight in "Marie Anne Park," which is a capital impression of place and hour, and one of his most successful examples of spontaneous painting. More sombre in mood is "Back Roofs"—rich red brick buildings, snow-covered roofs and rear galleries under a grey sky. A vivid impression is "Street after Rain"—buildings, tree, power poles and roadway wet and gleaming, and "Old Houses, Montreal" introduces the steep outside stairways that mean hard work after a snowfall.

Other interesting works—all of which are of companionable size—are "Village Church, Normandin, Lake St. John"; "Afternoon, Ste. Marguerite," with houses, and church; "Farm near Cartierville" in winter, and a hilly Laurentian landscape in full summer, in which the greens have been well managed.

NATIONAL GALLERY IS UNDER CRITICISM

Gazette — 17.1.38

Doubt Cast on Authenticity of Four Paintings Attributed to Giorgione

London, January 17.—(C)—Four small paintings, each about eight inches square, have suddenly become a magnet to the thousands who visit the National Gallery weekly to browse among its wealth of art treasures.

The pictures, acquired by the gallery directors last fall, were attributed to the great later-Renaissance Italian painter, Giorgione. Although the panels cost the nation £14,000 ($70,000), the purchase was hailed at first as a master stroke, for exclusive critics have long contended there are less than a dozen genuine works by the master in existence.

But a storm of controversy was unleashed following a statement by Dr. G. M. Richter, regarded as one of the greatest authorities on Giorgione, that the four pictures are actually the work of Andrea Previtali, a minor master. An authentic Previtali can be bought today for about £200.

On the other hand, Sir Kenneth Clark, director of the National Gallery, supported by the trustees, declared no hand but Giorgione's could have painted the panels.

"Any attribution to Giorgione is always open to question," Sir Kenneth said. "There are perhaps only two of his works that can be ascribed to him without question. These, with another 12 or so 'doubtful' specimens, form a kind of a nucleus of his work, and, in my opinion, the panels in the National Gallery can be added to that number. There is considerable evidence that they are actually from his own hand."

Sir Kenneth declared that before the panels were purchased, they were submitted to a number of outside judges whom the trustees considered well-qualified to assess their worth. They confirmed the opinion of the trustees.

The Duke of Rutland deplored the action of the National Gallery in purchasing the pictures, which he described as "poor examples" even if found to be genuine.

"Surely the policy to follow is to acquire only the finest examples of any master's work, and if necessary, to wait until a suitable opportunity arises," the duke said. "Why fritter away £14,000 on mediocre works which cannot even, with any certainty, be attributed to the artist in question?"

Giorgione was born in Castelfranco in 1477. His influence became felt before the turn of the century. In 1504 he was commissioned to paint the now-famous altarpiece to the memory of Matteo Costanzo in Castelfranco Cathedral. With contemporary artists he was employed in 1507-08 to decorate with frescos the exterior of the newly rebuilt German Merchant's Hall, in Venice.

In addition to other altarpieces and portraits, he painted a number of pictures, embodying in form and color moods of lyrical or romantic feeling. One of the most typical and prized works of the master is the "Sleeping Venus" in a Dresden collection. The artist died in 1510, a victim of the plague that ravaged parts of Italy.

A. Y. Jackson and Goodridge Roberts At Scott's Gallery

Star — 18.1.38

Two exhibitions are being held at present in Scott's galleries on Drummond street. One, the smaller of the two, is of pictures and sketches by A. Y. Jackson, most of them quite recently painted and all very good. There are not quite so many snow scenes as Mr. Jackson generally shows here, but there is one striking composition of ridges of snow rising to dark hills at St. Tite, and a few excellent snowy sketches. One of the most interesting of the larger pictures, "Beaver Dam" has a very good pattern of birch trees at the edge of water, which is in Mr. Jackson's best manner. There is lots of rich color in some of the small sketches; fine, full greens in a sketch of Tadoussac, and strong reds and browns in autumn sketches, particularly one of Go Home Bay.

Goodridge Roberts has an exhibition in the big gallery. Most of his work, and all the best of it, is in water color. His outdoor sketches are good examples of the effective use of the very simplest means. There are a number of views of streets and buildings in Montreal, which are mere suggestions, but are real suggestions, in which he has got all the essentials with a few brush-strokes. Some nice green landscapes, on the Mountain and in the Gatineau country, are just as good in their way, and just as simply painted, and a few of trees on the Mountain are specially good. In some of the larger landscapes there are fine effects of space and distance but the excessive heaviness of the skies throws them out of balance. Mr. Roberts' methods are sometimes unusual, but the results are extremely interesting and often very successful.

Birds Were Subject of Lecture on Thursday

"Art in Nature, a talk on Birds and Bird Minds" was the title of a lecture given at the Art Association of Montreal, on Thursday afternoon by Prof. Wynne-Edwards but this title covered only a part of the many interesting things about birds, and reptiles and other animals, which the lecturer had to tell. The markings and colourings of birds, for concealment or for other purposes took up a considerable part of the lecture and its many good illustrations, as examples of a sort of unconscious art, since birds, as the lecturer explained, with convincing instances, have well settled habits but little if any intelligence. Some phonograph records of the songs of birds were played at the end of the lecture and these songs, sung before mating, were explained by the lecturer as efforts of the bird to warn others away from his nesting place, in order that he may have room to feed his own family.

FRANZ HALS FORMS THEME OF LECTURE

Art Association Hears Dr.
J. Held, Columbia, on Great
Dutch Master
Gazette—20.1.38

The Dutch people of the time of the painter Franz Hals have well been named the "Yankees of the 17th century," said Dr. Julius Held, of Columbia University, in his lecture on that painter and his times, given yesterday afternoon in the Canadian Room of the Art Association building. He went on to state that in order to understand the school of painters, contemporary to Hals, it was necessary to comprehend the background of national life.

The amazing economic progress of the people of Holland at the beginning of the 17th century was paralleled by a new movement in art. Previous to about 1610, Dutch painting was almost completely without national characteristics. The artists painted subjects of a superficial romanticism, one example of which Dr. Held described as a "mythological pudding." Gheyn was one of the earliest to show signs of breaking away from this tradition, and Claus Jans Fischer was able to combine a straight-forward simplicity with description of facts handled with suitable modesty. The etching of Seghers was one of the major sources of no less an artist than Rembrandt.

At this period in Holland everyone was a collector of paintings, said the speaker, anywhere from 100 to 200 paintings being quite common to many houses. Paintings were used as money, and rent was often paid in this unusual tender. Even the humblest citizen had an appreciation of technical perfection in painting. It was this nation-wide interest in art that makes possible the comprehension of the popular qualities, in subject matter and in the wealth of incidental detail, of the period of the great painter, Hals.

Old Quebec Exhibits Star 9.2.38

THE Government of the Province of Quebec is going to place on view on February 18th in the large lecture hall gallery of the Montreal Art Association an exhibition of seventy-six photographic enlargements showing selected examples of old buildings of the Province of Quebec, many of which have not been shown before.

Accompanying them will be oil paintings by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., F. W. Hutchison, Hon. R.C.A., A. R. Robinson, R.C.A., and Horatio Walker, R.C.A. Sculpture by Philippe Hebert, R.C.A., A. Laliberte, R.C.A. and Suzor Cote, R.C.A. will also be shown in the form of statuettes.

The Government placed all matters, including selection of material and its arrangement, in the hands of the Province of Quebec Association of Architects, who appointed a committee of experts to organize and prepare the exhibition. Its purpose is to illustrate the beauty and appropriateness of our architectural heritage and to include scenes and subjects related to the occupation, environment and craftsmanship of the province.

THE oil paintings contribute, by their colour, a vision of the beauty of our villages and houses which only the accomplished artist can realize. The statuettes give a three-dimensional recreation of our habitants occupied in their daily tasks, and other sculpture portrays deeds of valour by characters enshrined in our memory. These small sculptures are characteristically Canadian and are classed among the finest work of their distinguished creators.

The Government plans to send the exhibits to other Canadian and American cities for exhibition in art galleries, Universities and public centers.

IN the past many a dignified and good-looking homestead, often of historic interest, has been ruined in appearance by so-called "up-to-date" additions, crudely conceived by persons lacking in taste and knowledge. The Government's exhibition, freely circulated in our province and accompanied by talks by competent persons, can exert a definite and uplifting influence on the taste of our citizens. Its potential value as means of attracting tourists is evident, and moving pictures in colour could with great advantage accompany the exhibition.

The Province of Quebec Association of Architects committee entrusted with the preparation of the Exhibition includes: Ludger P. P.Q.A.A., and W. S. Maxwell, P.Q.A.A., joint chairmen; Professor Ramsay Traquair, Hon. P.Q.A.A.; Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A.; Georges Roy, director, Province of Quebec Museum; and Z. Massicotte, Archaeologist, expert on our old architecture.

FRANKLY SPEAKING

By ASHLEY W. COOPER

A Billion-Dollar Idea

We're sitting up nights with a hefty supply of wet towels drumming the gray matter to find more ways to bring more tourists. And here's our own Painter Clarence Gagnon out with a proposition worth millions in tourist dollars but billions in soul-refreshment if we've only got sense enough to make it work and turn the Isle of Orleans into an all-time, outdoor "museum" where Old Quebec can retire to live graciously in an ungracious world.

Via the good offices of my news-nosy colleague, Alfred Ayotte, of Le Devoir, Mr. Gagnon tells us he wants someone to arrange that the idyllic islet below the Rock shall remain the Gem of the St. Lawrence we have always adored. He wants the delicate tracery of New France unsullied; the gorgeous French-school carving preserved; the mellow, field-stone homes in "sainted" villages remote from the rape of the jerry-builder. He wants one spot left in the Province of Quebec where the grand old atmosphere of la douce province will endure, safe from assaults of a civilization fast going Neon and Coca Cola.

But what's happened? Are the islanders cherishing history and artistry and loveliness? No. What's happened is that the Isle of Orleans is now politically tied to the rest of Montmorency County by a political bridge, now about three years old. One of these days I'm going to take a month off to find the gent who wanted that bridge. Meanwhile, it's "civilizing" the Isle of Bacchus, as explorers dubbed the grape-draped spot. The roads are paved; hot dogs and peanuts and patates frites shout their roadside horrors; twelve gas stations raise their hideous pumps, I'm told. La grande dame, which was the Isle of Orleans, is having her face lifted and underneath, it's not so good!

We can't tear down the bridge. We can't stop tourists from going on the Island. But we can stop the island from becoming half-Quebec, half-Broadway like so much of the rest of a province which we still boast is "different." We'd better. It's more than high time we did something to keep—for our humble selves if not for the dollarish foreigner—at least one glimpse of that finer life which started fading when we all moved into the Age of Watch-Your-Step. We are still proud Quebec. But it must be one sweet shock to the grocer from Podunk, Illinois, when he rounds a corner to run over a gum-chewing French-Canadian lumberjack in fedora—and don't forget the cute little N'Yawk feather! Or to go far north and see the gals wearing sheer silk hose under big rubber boots; French ladies of New France who pipe a jaunty "Hiya!" till the vacationist wonders whether he's missed New France and struck New Jersey. And what a jolt when you drink in one of those fine old open-air ovens and picture the bustling menagerie lading out crisp, dumpy things full of potato and flavor; but you cock an eye and there's the baker's auto at the front door and Madame's buying ugly, Anglo-Saxon loaves of milk-sugar-and-shortening bread!

It's not funny, the way we're being wasteful with the priceless assets given us by History, Art and the genius of the French. You knew the old island? If you didn't, you missed part of your education. The dainty little villages built around the cunning parish churches. The old houses which reek of big, blue cradles that never got a holiday for twenty years or more. The symphony of weathered field stone. Leafy ways, fairy dells, chummy trees, chummy houses, chummy people. Everything for the age of caleche and cutter. And in that world a people who moved apace, the pace of the XVIIIth century. They always had time. No wild-eyed neurotics, no taut beings straining for those three minutes. They lived long, gracefully, gently, and their life bred the best of home-loving old Quebecois whose simple sturdiness and faith in God built this province.

All that is menaced. The bridge is ruining the Island. Cars swish. The tempo quickens. You feel no more you're entering a better world. The people who've lived there for years—judges, lawyers, notaries, business men who take the ferry from Quebec and truly sail away from their worries once per twilight—they shake their heads. Before their eyes, they see decay of everything everybody loved about the Island.

Hail Gagnon! Our beloved painter proves the soul of the artist and the brain of the business man can team up. He wants someone to do something and do it now—before next touring season. Mr. Gagnon doesn't want a show-place island. He doesn't want quartettes around every corner in "traditional" costume barking "Alouette!" Nor the ploughman declaiming French verse at the tenth furrow. No. He wants someone to see that vile red brick won't sully the aristocracy of old stone; that gas is sold in stations which don't howl Pittsburgh and Houston; that things stay as they are to trap that rare, shy atmosphere which flourished when water really belted the Island and there was no political bridge.

The Gagnon idea: wonderful, I suggest! So rich for us; so alluring for the rest of the world; so profitable for the islanders. Long have Norway and Sweden done something like this; and Quebecois sail thousands of miles to see what? People living as they used to live: nothing more.

We need a law.
May I remind you the Legislature is now making laws?

J. W. Morrice and Clarence Gagnon At the Art Gallery

Star—7.2.38

The National Gallery of Canada has brought together a big collection of work by James W. Morrice, which, after being in Toronto, has just come to the Art Association of Montreal. The exhibition, which represents Morrice's work, early and late, has been gathered from many sources, and it is good to see from the catalogue how many of these pictures have their homes in Montreal. Two of the largest galleries are hung with the bigger pictures, with a small room full of water colours and sketches, and the order of arrangement shows the change of style from the earlier to the later pictures. In all of them Morrice is essentially a French painter, and even the pictures of Canada have caught the Canadian atmosphere when it was looking most European. The most Canadian of them is a picture of sunshine and snow on the citadel at Quebec, but there is a quite European feeling in the mist and twilight of some of the others. Morrice seems to have been most thoroughly at home in Paris and on the French coast, and there are many of the pictures which he painted in those places. A picture of Paris houses, seen through a haze—one of the pictures lent by the Luxembourg Gallery, another of the Tuilleries Gardens, some pictures of St. Malo and the fine view of the beach at Paramé, show him at his best. There are comparatively few of his pictures of Venice, but they are good ones; a few circus scenes, and a number of the later pictures of Algeria and the West Indies,—broad impressions of color and sunlight,—complete the collection. The small sketches are in their way quite as interesting as the big pictures. Among them are some wonderful little impressions of places and people, quickly made; one of a group of women in white caps, somewhere in France is particularly happy.

Downstairs, in the print room of the Art Association are Clarence Gagnon's illustrations made for Hemon's "Maria Chapdelaine," which, in their thoroughly Canadian quality, make an interesting contrast to the work of Morrice. They are pictures of Canada and its atmosphere and, quite as much, of its people. Excellent as illustrations of the book, they are not less good as pictures in their own right. They are pictures of real places and real people, full of life and delicious color, which give a true account of French Canada even to people who do not know Hemon's book. Most of them are delightful outdoor scenes, but the interiors, with the figures of Canadian types, are admirable in their composition, their lighting and their truth of detail. Utterly different from Morrice's work, they are quite as interesting and make an exhibition which should not be missed.

A Fellow-Painter on the Work of J. W. Morrice

An innovation at the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday afternoon was a lecture, or rather an address, given upstairs in the main picture gallery. The speaker was Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., whose subject was the work of J. W. Morrice, and he spoke in the middle of the Morrice exhibition, surrounded by the illustrations to his remarks, though he made no references to the particular pictures which are being shown. Mr. Gagnon started by saying that he would speak of Morrice's work and not of his life, and he referred respectfully to biographies of painters, filled with unnecessary details and occasional fiction. As an intimate friend, Mr. Gagnon spoke with knowledge of Morrice's aims and of his method, which he had worked out for himself. Morrice lacked thorough early training in painting and was always something of an amateur, who made some unwise experiments in the use of materials. He was never interested in exactness of fact or detail and painted his impressions of the atmosphere, colour and light of scenes. In Paris, and everywhere else that he painted, he spent much time wandering and making quick sketches of effects, which he found often in quite unlikely surroundings. His pictures are enlargements of these sketches and are always records of impressions, and not of literal fact. Though much of his earlier work was done out of doors, his later pictures were painted in the studio.

Morrice As Painter Analyzed By Gagnon

Montreal Artist Speaks on Collection of Paintings at Art Gallery

Gazette 12.2.38

An appreciation of the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., as a painter, given by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., in connection with the exhibition of Morrice's work now on view in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, covered wide ground and was especially interesting in that it dealt with matters of technique.

Pressure of space permits the printing of only portions of Mr. Gagnon's address, which read in part:

It is not often that we are given the opportunity of admiring such a comprehensive display of the precious records of an artist who has painted purely for love. My intention is not to give here an account of Morrice's life. With evident sincerity, Donald Buchanan has taken care of that in a biography which does him credit. Might I be permitted as a friend of Morrice's, who has known him for over two decades, to say that Buchanan in his haste to publish his book probably failed to check the authenticity of his information. There is much that found its way into print in that biographical sketch that should belong to the realm of fiction and back-door gossip. It has become a fad among modern young biographers to make stock of the exterior accidents which are found in every human existence. What do we care if Michelangelo allowed his socks to rot on his feet or whether Morrice drank absinthe or whisky? But what we do care is how Michelangelo conceived and executed the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel and Morrice his symphonies in color. After all what interests us in an artist's life is his ideas, his emotions, his dreams, all for which he lived for our benefit. In a word it is what he left to posterity which captivates our interest.

It would be easy to trace in the work of Morrice the various influences from Courbet down to Matisse, and also to lesser known artists. Amongst these was a Uruguayan painter, Pedro Figari, whom he introduced to me in Paris when this South American was showing some very interesting, gay, colorful, animated scenes of the creole life of Montevideo. Morrice was absolutely hypnotized by the richness and brilliancy of Figari's color. He insisted on calling my attention to the beautiful turquoise greens and salmon colored reds he was so fond of putting in his own pictures of Venice and the West Indies, and would say "Only a great artist can put down side by side such greens and reds."

What do we mean when we say that Morrice was a true artist? A true artist is one who succeeds in transmitting to us his own personal vision in such a way that we cannot but acquiesce. In order to do this he must combine sincerity and esthetic sensibility with a craftsmanship developed to where it has become the ideal vehicle for transmitting his vision. Craftsmanship alone can never produce a first rate work of art, inspiration alone without mastery of technical means is unlikely to do so. It is only by a blend of both that that can be achieved.

Morrice, like most artists, went out of doors for subjects to paint. His first pictures were painted directly from nature, but he could not be content with the mere translation of material things, or, in an exclusive naturalism. At first his art was all experimental. It changed from day to day, and it was not until he was at work for some ten years that he finally settled down to a method of his own.

The formulas of Cezanne and Matisse haunted him but he never permitted himself to be completely ruled by them. He preferred the honesty of the former, to his mannerism; and the latter's cult for pure color to his systematic deformation and willful awkwardness. As a matter of fact he remained aloof of the various theories which have followed one another in quick succession during his lifetime. Post-Impressionism, Cubism, Primitivism, Futurism, Expressionism, Vorticism, Abstract Art, Surrealism;—he saw in all of them nothing but a lack of competence, sincerity, purpose and vision. He had no use for his confrères who had not the necessary link between art and technique, in a word, artists who cannot art. He would close any argument dealing with these extremists and delivering a final word with a wave of his hand: "We refuse to be amused."

Was Morrice a realist? Many would no doubt deny his right to the title, for he certainly was never bent upon any exact rendering of nature, although he worked much in the open air; what he painted was not a particular scene but the very spirit of the scene itself. A dangerous method this and one that cannot be recommended to any young artists, but at the same time a method which is permissible to an artist sure of his own power for the reason that no unnecessary detail can interfere with his poetic conceptions. What he particularly looked for in nature was charm and atmosphere, light, exquisite color and delicacy of feeling; qualities that he considered of more importance than minuteness of detail, accuracy and skilfulness of execution.

Was Morrice an Impressionist? He was in the true sense of the term, but between his impressionism and that of Monet, Sisley and Seurat there is a remarkable difference. The modern impressionist professes to be true to his impression; his declared idea is to reproduce the broad effect of any scene upon his senses; but nevertheless his observation is supplemented by analysis, and his pictures are the result of a long process of justification as it were applied to the image first received. Such a proceeding was quite foreign to Morrice. With him the impression was everything. Once received it had to be justified, not by the truth underlying it, but by the splendor to which it led.

Was Morrice an excellent painter technically? It is difficult to classify him justly. His work lies outside the good sound work of the great masters. Like most artists of his time, he lacked thorough elementary training.

Mr. Gagnon held the view that a number of Morrice's paintings of a free, sketchy kind done in the later years of his life should not be regarded as his last "manner," but that they remained unfinished because death stayed his hand.

Was Morrice a Canadian artist in the true sense of the word? Like Whistler and Sargent, he was an example of the cosmopolitan in art whose artistic careers were altogether European. By the adoption of an essentially foreign style in his art, he lost the extremely important racial feeling, while he lacked other qualities the French possess. Had Morrice, gifted as he was, been able to give himself over without restraint to everyone of his fantasies as an artist, and like Maurice Culen, felt the romantic urge and full significance of putting his whole heart and soul to the rendering of the beauty of the land which first stirred his emotions and rising feelings, he probably would not have been the greater, for it, but he certainly would have made a priceless contribution to the art of his country. The fact that he came to Canada every year and even painted Canadian scenes while here is not sufficient to admit him in the ranks of the Canadian artists. If he had chosen to return to paint the beauty of his native land, it could not have been done without any sacrifice on his part. This, I am convinced, he was willing to do, even if he had not been possessed of a nature that enabled him to accept with bitterness the slight recognition that was his for years from his fellow-countrymen.

The works of Morrice have their mystery to which time also contributes its mystery. We can live and grow old in their company. They never are all drained at once of their feeling and sheer beauty. They are like certain friendships while slow to reveal themselves grow richer with time.

D. M. JOHNSON DIES HERE IN 80TH YEAR

Founder of Johnson Art Galleries Widely Known Throughout Canada

Gazette 14.2.38

One of the best known art dealers in Canada, David MacKenzie Johnson died at his home here Saturday in his 80th year after a lengthy illness.

Born in Montreal, Mr. Johnson as a young man worked for several years in Detroit and Chicago, but returned to this city to establish the Johnson Art Galleries fifty years ago. He first set up business on Victoria Square and later was one of the first business men to move to St. Catherine street.

Widely known across Canada, Mr. Johnson also had a large number of friends among art dealers in England and on the Continent, whom he visited every year.

He is survived by one son, MacKenzie Johnson, and four daughters, Mrs. R. C. Clark, Mrs. Martin Barford and the Misses Eleanor and Jean Johnson, all of Montreal.

The funeral service will be held at two o'clock tomorrow afternoon at Wray's funeral chapel, University street, and burial will take place in Mount Royal Cemetery.

THE ANNUAL meeting of the Art Association of Montreal will be held in the Art Galleries at 5 p.m. on Thursday, February 24.

J. S. BERGERON, of Quebec City, elected president of the Province of Quebec Architects Association at the annual meeting held in Montreal.

Clarence Gagnon Sympathetic To "Maria Chapdelaine" Theme

Gazette By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE, 12-2-38.

Looking at the originals of the illustrations Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., did for Louis Hemon's "Maria Chapdelaine," excites thought as to the eventual destination of this collection of vivid transcripts of habitant life now on view in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal. These small, highly finished paintings constitute an historical record of the life of the hardy pioneer which yearly grows more valuable. By going farther "in," such conditions can be experienced today. The settlers in virgin country encounter much the same obstacles that Mr. Gagnon's able brush depicts—land to be cleared, stumps to be removed, homes to be built and provisions to be hauled or packed through wild country. But today there are differences—snowroads will bear tractors, gasoline-driven saws can save labor, mechanical gadgets and dynamite can remove stumps, and if a party gets "bushed" there is, once word gets outside, less danger of death by starvation if airmen are sent in search.

Mr. Gagnon, however, deals with a region that, at the time Hemon's story was written, apparently enjoyed few of these conveniences and safeguards. The illustrations are a perfect complement to the text, and reveal conditions that are rapidly changing with the spread of motor travel and improved roads. The artist's skill is devoted to more elemental aspects of pioneering life off the beaten track—and it is rather refreshing to breathe the bracing country air, untainted by "gas" fumes.

In another medium, etching, Mr. Gagnon's skill is recognized here and abroad—his prints are in the collections of the leading English, continental and Canadian galleries—and, done mainly at a time when he went to France to further his art education, the subjects are foreign. If chance has kept him here, and he had roamed this province for subjects among the habitant, what an invaluable pictorial record of life and customs, fast-changing with the years, would have resulted. He is sympathetic to such subjects as any number of his oils show, and in illustrating "Maria Chapdelaine" he had an exceptional opportunity to demonstrate how ably he was equipped for the task. For task it was—three years of industry, many paintings, followed by a severe, critical appraisal by the artist of his work, the result being slightly over fifty examples to embellish a volume of which Mornay of Paris had every reason to be proud.

Covetousness is excited by a slow tour of the Print Room, there is so much that is lovely to see—from the small painting of lake and timber, which adorns the title page, to the more elaborate compositions. They are all so true of Quebec province these scenes that show the worshippers pouring out of church and walking to their waiting sleighs; Pere Chapdelaine and Maria in a red cutter drawn by "Charles-Eugene," who safely makes the bank as the river ice cracks; the humble interior, with woman mixing dough, while Mere Chapdelaine works at her loom; the family at prayer in the lamp-lit room; the outdoor life with men felling trees and pulling and burning stumps; woodsmen on the log drive, beneath hills banded with snow; loading the haycart; Maria seated on the verandah, dreaming over her knitting as the fire in the outdoor oven gleams in the gathering dusk; the cutting of the corn in a field edged by golden birches, backed by blue water and hills; the fall plowing with ox and horse yoked together; the slaughter of the pig; men sawing stove wood in the snow, or plowing and digging their way to the barn; Francois Paradis lost in the blinding snow that was to be his shroud; horse and cart travelling over a rough road sodden by a thaw; activity in the sugar bush; and spring with its blossoms and the work of ensuring another harvest. All scenes true to time and season, not to mention other paintings, that deal more directly with the action of the story, which are effective in design and color.

Seldom has an author been so fortunate in having his prose so aptly and admirably interpreted, and Hemon, regrettably, did not live to know it.

CANADIAN GROUP SHOWING OPENED

Star 16.2.38
Successors To Group Of Seven Hold Third Annual Exhibit

OTTAWA, Feb. 16 — (C.P.) — Seventy paintings and two drawings of 48 artists are displayed in the third annual exhibit by the Canadian Group of painters which opened yesterday in the National Gallery of Canada.

Successor to the "Group of Seven" the Canadian group of painters includes 36 Canadian artists, whose art and that of 23 other Canadian artists who were invited to exhibit, comprise this showing.

Lawren Harris, who has formerly shown a definite modernistic trend to his art, achieved true modernism in his unnamed abstraction of white shading to black. "Spring Foliage" by his son, Lawren Harris, Jr., shows also a decided modernistic treatment, although in more rounded expression.

LeMoine Fitzgerald showed two exquisite pencil studies of tree trunks in a garden.

Restful in its sweeping effect of brightness is "Wheat Field," by Paraskeva Clark, who in direct contrast exhibits "Petroushka," a Punch and Judy mob-scene against perilously leaning skyscrapers.

KEYNOTE OF SPEED

Speed is the keynote of Fritz Brandtner's "Hockey", wherein bright reds and blues of the diagonally-drawn figures striving to score a goal create an impression of tremendous power and swift movement.

N. Petroff, 22-year-old Toronto artist of Polish birth, shows an interesting and colorful study "Modern Times." It is a young girl studying a newspaper on the floor from her chair. This youthful artist won the recent International Drawing Competition and was chosen as one of Canada's representatives at the Paris Exposition last year.

Jack Humphreys achieves a realistic glow of life in his forceful study "Draped Head."

Budding flowers form the subject matter for an appealing study "Spring" by Sarah M. Robertson.

"African Scene" by Arthur Lismer, was lent for the exhibit by the Art Gallery of Toronto. Painted while the artist was in Africa two years ago, the unusual color effect is interesting amid an exhibition in which the landscapes are almost entirely of Canada.

Annual Meeting Thursday

The annual meeting of the Art Association of Montreal will be held at the galleries, Sherbrooke street west, on Thursday afternoon at 5 o'clock, when reports will be presented and the officers and council for 1938 will be elected.

Art of Many Countries And Times in the Museum of the Art Association

Star 16.2.38
At the Art Association of Montreal on Monday afternoon there was another lecture of a rather new kind, which dealt, not with any particular artist or period, but with art of many periods and countries, as illustrated in the Association's own museum. It was given by F. Cleveland Morgan, to whose imagination and energy the existence of this museum is largely due. It was not so much a lecture as an illustrated description of some of the best objects in the museum, some of which probably came as quite new and strange to many of the audience.

The museum, as Mr. Morgan pointed out, suffers badly from lack of space, which makes it impossible to bring together any large, general collections; it has to be a collection of things which are few, but good. Since the museum has no funds of its own to spend, it has had to depend on the generosity of benefactors, with whose help a very interesting museum, the beginning of something better still, has been made. Mr. Morgan showed specimens of work of many kinds;—in glass, of which the museum has a small but very valuable collection, in porcelain and pottery, in metal-work and in ivory carving. There were also examples of oriental painting, of textiles and of medieval stone-carving, and they came from all parts of the world. With some fifty lantern slides, some of them in color, Mr. Morgan was able, in a short time, to give a very good idea of the contents of this museum, which is already much more than a mere beginning.

STUDIO PRIZES GIVEN

Gazette 2.2.38
Awards Go to Miss R. Wiselberg and Miss N. Smyth

Prizes offered to members of the studio group of the Women's Art Society were awarded yesterday to Miss Rose Wiselberg and Miss Nora Smyth at a members' and studio day meeting held in Stevenson Hall. The presentations were made by Mrs. C. L. Scofield, president.

An unusual feature of the programme was provided by several examples of choral speaking, directed by Miss H. Mulvany Gray. The choral speaking group of the society gave an impressive rendition of I Corinthians 13. This they followed with a poem by Mrs. C. L. Henderson, entitled "The Careless Camper," then the 24th Psalm and "Widdicombe Fair." Miss Gray gave a reading of "The Micmac Woman" and "The Seagulls," by Mrs. George R. MacLeod.

Mrs. C. L. Henderson read four of her poems. Mrs. W. Boyd Carpenter spoke of the society's library. Prof. A. H. S. Gillson gave an address on the art life of Montreal.

Two violin selections were played by Mrs. F. J. Horning, accompanied by Mrs. Franklin J. Hodgson.

Those who took part in the programme were thanked by Mrs. George Dingle.

Pictures by Adam And Tade Styka At Eaton's

16.2.38

A second exhibition of pictures by the Hungarian painters, Adam and Tade Styka, is being held in the galleries of the Eaton Company. The work of Adam Styka consists again of pictures of scenes and people in Egypt; landscapes full of warm browns and reds, with some strong blues of sky and water. Some of the best of these are little pictures of groups of donkeys and there are a number of groups of Arabs wrinkled men and unveiled girls well drawn and painted. The work of Tade Styka has much less solidity except in a big picture of three eminent singers, Chaliapin, Caruso and Tita Rufo, sitting round a big table, in which the posing is rather stiff but the portraits very recognizable. His very clever and facile brushwork is used to produce a good deal of character in two portraits of old men, but most of his pictures are of beautiful ladies, and are remarkable feats of painting. These most of which are labelled only with initials and not with names, are imaginative studies of heads and figures rather than portraits of real people and there is much more skill of handling than reality in the ladies or their clothing. They are pretty and rather striking pictures, if less interesting than the work of his brother.

"Maria Chapdelaine" Illustrations Shown Gazette 5.2.38 Original Paintings By Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., at Art Association

When Mornay of Paris published a sumptuous edition of Louis Hemon's "Maria Chapdelaine" in 1933, the illustrations by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., of Montreal, attracted wide attention, and the hope was expressed that the originals might soon come to Canada for exhibition. They are now on view in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal, and during the next fortnight picture-lovers and students can enjoy themselves viewing the small-scale paintings of fine detail and finish. Mr. Gagnon, who knows the region where Hemon set the scenes of his book, convincingly interprets the spirit of the Peribonka region and graphically portrays the inhabitants at home, on the farm and in the bush. It is the rough and ready hard life of the pioneer settler that has captured his imagination, in a land where horse and ox together pull the plough, and the gasoline tractor was then unknown. Here the men "make" the stovewood without the aid of the "gas"-driven saw, and all work is done by muscular man-power. Bread is made at home and baked outside, men and women harvest and, in season, people the blueberry patches. Life beyond the settlement shows the trapper and dog-team at rest before a fire where he prepares a meal in the open; a man poles a canoe against a rapid current; lumberjacks are seen approaching a cabin as night falls. There are many intimate glimpses of home life—men chatting over their pipes, the impressive scene at the death-bed of Mme. Chapdelaine—standing surplined priest and the kneeling figures in the humble room. The show includes a number of good things that call for more extended comment later.

Monuments of Quebec Described in Lecture

At the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday afternoon a lecture was given by Henri Hebert, R.C.A., on the monuments of the province of Quebec. Mr. Hebert began with some general considerations on monuments, on the freedom which should be given to the sculptor and architect, not only in their work but also in the choice of site, and on the symbolism which is used in the design of monuments. He went on to describe, with lantern-slide illustrations, a number of the best monuments of the province, old and new, with many matters of fact and fable about the people to whose memory the monuments were erected. He showed and criticized examples from Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers and Chambly, and from the Nelson and McGill monuments down to some of the most recent. Among them were of course several by Philippe Hebert, including his finest work, the Maisonneuve monument in the Place d'Armes, which like many others has suffered from the changes in its surroundings.

Art of late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., In Wide Range at Art Gallery

Gazette By ST. GEORGE BURGEOYNE 5.2.38

On a grand and comprehensive scale, the art of the late James Wilson Morrice, R.C.A., can be viewed and enjoyed today in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west. Some years ago a memorial exhibition was held in this building, but the present occasion calls for catalogue acknowledgment to the Musée National du Luxembourg, Paris; Musée de Lyons, Tate Gallery, London; Mlle. Lea Cadoret, Paris; Jacques Dubourg, Paris; the collection of the late Franz Jourdain, Paris; Georges Manoury, Paris; Jacques Rouche, Paris; the Art Gallery of Toronto, Vancouver Art Gallery, and many private and public collections. The National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, has contributed generously, and the local Art Association's group should excite justifiable pride.

Montreal born, Toronto trained in law—which went overboard in favor of art and life in Paris—Morrice was highly regarded in France as a painter and long misunderstood at home, where his work sounded a new note—bold and discordant when compared with the quiet Dutch and Barbizon Schools then so greatly favored. Acceptance of his art, save by a few discerning collectors, was a matter of slow growth, a better understanding of his aims being quickened in later years by the enthusiasm of the younger painters who were staunch admirers, and didn't care who knew it.

Looking at the collection today—and every angle of his art is shown—there will still be those who prefer the lovely subtle harmonies of his French quayside scenes and the luscious glowing tones and the more solid touch of his Venetian subjects, to the flat color and more summarily treated arrangements done in Cuba and Trinidad, lovely in design though these are. After all, keeping an open mind and not being unduly influenced by purely technical excellence, a painting appeals through what it "does" to the spectator—the human interest in the subject may please, the perfection of the composition may delight, or the pattern made by fine color may thrill. These experiences await in three galleries where, admirably hung, are large canvases, small vivid oil sketches and watercolors, all done by an artist who had something to say and was admirably equipped to express himself in a clear, definite way.

There is a wealth of loveliness on these gallery walls, and certainly Morrice's art has never before been shown to such good advantage here. Works there are that even years of association with would still continue to reveal latent beauties—and the show lasts two weeks! But whether you peer closely or glance broadly, there is evidence everywhere that the years and even changing taste cannot fairly deny to this painter of marked, individual talent an important place in painting.

From the Luxembourg come two Paris scenes, "Bords de Seine"—buildings above the quay under a dark, cloudy sky, moored barge and, in the foreground, a man mounting a ladder; and "Quai des Grands Augustins," figures near bookstalls, trees, the funnel of a steamer and tall buildings touched with snow across the water. This subject, evidently a favored theme, is similar to the work of like title from the National Gallery of Canada, and "Quai de la Seine," from the Jourdain collection. The Musée de Lyons lends "Le Traineau—Effect de Neige," sparkling snow, a sleigh and a house under a blue sky. Besides watercolors, the Art Gallery of Toronto sends a fine painting of sunlight in "The Market Place, Concarneau," with its covered stalls and figures in a square edged by buildings. Among the group from the Ottawa gallery are "Venice, Night," figures seated at tables and a distant building above the dark water; and "Dieppe, The Beach, Grey Effect," with its pebbly beach, figures seated near a breakwater, sea breaking in foam and a low cloudy sky. Fine in its sweep is "View of Parame from the Beach"—figures on the sand in the foreground, and the distant town under a cloudy sky, and "The Promenade, Dieppe," has its lively color note in the striped umbrellas over figures seated at tables.

St. Malo, a favorite sketching ground, supplies a large group—"The Race Course," figures and a wooded rise in the background, rich in its range of summer greens; "View from the Ramparts," with its crowd, sea and bathers; "Yacht Race," showing the lighthouse at the end of a jetty, craft with billowing sails and spectators; "The Beach," with a glimpse of sea, figure-dotted sand and a high cliff in the background; "Beneath the Ramparts," with figures on the beach; "La Place Chateaubriand," with figures promenading or seated at tables under noble trees, and "Le Plage de Saint Malo," with bathing houses, a white horse, sand, figures and sea; "The Beach, Le Pouldu," introduces a white horse on the shore of a bay that curves to cliffs, sea breaking in foam and women seated on the sand; and "Cirque a Concarneau" shows figures watching a performer, a tent and the distant sails of ships; "The Bull Ring, Marseilles," shows the chief actors as seen beneath a screen of trees.

Besides the quayside scenes, Paris has proved fruitful—"The Bookstalls," with figures, and buildings on the opposite bank; "Flower Market, The Madeleine," where a woman sits besides her stall laden with blooms; "In the Tuilleries Garden," figures, nursemaids, a child with a hoop and a background of buildings; and "Notre Dame de Paris," with buildings under snow—an antiquated cab.

Lovely in rich glowing color are the Venetian scenes with magnificent buildings mirrored in the dancing water and gondolas moored or on the move—"Venice at the Golden Hour," "Golden Venice," "Palazzo Dario," "Le Grand Canal," to mention a few.

Quebec, too, proved an inspiration, as is revealed in "Winter, Ste. Anne de Beaupre," "Mountain Hill, Quebec," "View towards Levis from Quebec," "The Citadel, Quebec," "The Terrace, Quebec," and "Entrance to a Quebec Village, Winter"; while "Return from School," children walking a rutted snowy road in time of thaw, is true of the season. All these works are marked by distinction and fine tone of this group also being "The Ferry, Quebec," illustrated on this page.

There are scenes painted in Morocco, at Tangiers, and Algiers—buildings, figures, sweeping bays and water. Cuba has supplied subjects—Santiago and Havana, and Jamaica and Trinidad have not been overlooked, "Landscape, Trinidad," having been acquired for the national collection at Ottawa.

The exhibition emphasizes the loss painting suffered by Morrice's death in Tunis in 1924.

THE FERRY, QUEBEC, by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., acquired by the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, from W. Scott & Sons, Drummond street, is a vivid impression in a restricted range of tones, the highest color note being the red roof of the building on the left in the foreground. Broad in its brushwork and direct in handling, the painting is effective in design—distant Citadel and the steamer crossing the fice-dotted St. Lawrence River to the Levis wharf, where sleighs await "fares."

LANDSCAPE, TRINIDAD, by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., secured by the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, from W. Scott & Sons, Montreal, is in the later manner of this gifted colorist. Here pattern and color are of primary importance, the handling being free and almost sketchy. It is harmoniously attractive—rounded hill with trees of rich greens, curving bay with deep blue water, edged with foam on the bright sand.

OLD MONTREAL, painted by the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., and presented this week to the Art Association of Montreal by the Hon. Marguerite Shaughnessy in memory of her father and mother, is a work of lovely tone as well as being an historical record. The picture, exhibited in the Art Association Spring Show of 1909, depicts the group of buildings on Notre Dame street, at the corner of St. Vincent street, at nightfall in winter, when lighted windows and street lamps are seen through snow-charged atmosphere. The Montreal artist viewed this picturesque subject from the grass plot in front of the old Court House, and since it was painted the building on the right, from the party wall to the side street, has gone and on its site "La Sauvegarde" building rises ten storeys in the air. Though the remaining structures, now bearing the civic numbers 156, 158 and 160 Notre Dame street east, have seen better times, they date back to the French regime. Modest, quaint and fashionable in their day, they were erected between 1685 and 1723, and are of the same epoch as the house of Gedeon de Catalogne, which stood on St. Vincent street until demolished in 1921 to make way for the new Court House.

ARCHITECTS MEET IN ANNUAL SESSION

Representatives Gather For Royal Institute Con-
Star vention 18.2.

Prominent architects from the principal cities of Canada, construction men and representatives of art associations, met this morning for the inaugural session of the 31st annual convention of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada at the headquarters of the Province of Quebec Association of Architects, 627 Dorchester street west, W. L. Somerville, of Toronto, 1937-38 president of the R.A.I.C., is presiding at the sessions.

The convention will conclude with a dinner at the Cercle Universitaire, the guest of honor at which will be Hon. E. L. Patenaude Lieutenant-Governor of the province.

Matters dealing with the year's activities of the retiring executive of the Institute took up this morning's meeting.

After an informal luncheon delegates and members of the various bodies related to the Institute visited points of historic and architectural interest in the city, re-assembling at the Art Galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street, for inspection of a special exhibit of the Institute and the P. Q. A. A. of architectural sketches and a collection of old work. Today's activities will wind up with an informal dinner and entertainment at the Arts Club, Victoria street.

Reports of standing committees on architectural training, science and research in art, professional usages, public relations and other subjects, will be submitted at the session tomorrow morning. Election of officers for the ensuing year will take place tomorrow afternoon.

The convention committee is composed of H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, chairman; Charles David, W. S. Maxwell, Philip J. Turner, Ludger Venne, Henri S. Labelle, H. R. Little, W. L. Somerville, Alcide Chausse, E. I. Barott, Lucien Parent, A. C. Paine, Louis Amos, Oscar Beaulé and Henry Burden.

Paintings by Morrice Go on View Tuesday

Gazette—29.1.38
Tuesday will mark the opening in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal of a comprehensive collection of paintings by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., the Montrealer who made his home in Paris, where his art was regarded highly when here it was critically regarded as an acquired taste. It is a show that picture-lovers have long looked forward to, and it comes to Montreal through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, where the paintings created great interest.

It will be an exceptional privilege to see the art of Morrice in its varied phases. In past years, when he was working abroad, his paintings came to Montreal—some to local dealers and all too few to important public exhibitions. Sounding a note in painting new to Canada, his handling by critics was not always kind, nor always intelligent and fair, but there was never any indication that spleen jibes upset him. Individualistic and sincere in his convictions as a painter, he went his way—and in the intervening years there has arisen a public that understands his art. If his fine color and fluent brushwork have fired others to aspire to like heights—and flop, that cannot be held against him. At least his example made the younger painters do a little thinking on their own account.

The memorial exhibition, held in these galleries some years ago, was an event, but in the renovated setting these works—from public and private collections—should reveal beauties missed on the former occasion.

In connection with the exhibition, members of the association will, on February 10, hear Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., who long lived in Paris, talk on the pictures.

At the same time as the Morrice show, there will be an exhibition of 57 sketches by Mr. Gagnon illustrating "Marie Chapdelaine."

Painting By Hornel For Art Association

Gazette—19.2.38
"Children at Play," painted in 1906 by Edward Atkinson Hornel, who died in 1933, has come to the Art Association of Montreal by bequest of Sir Andrew T. Taylor, R.C.A., F.R.I.B.A., the architect who years ago practised his profession in Montreal, hospital, bank and university buildings being among his many commissions executed here. Sir Andrew died early last December in England, at the age of 87.

Typical in arrangement and treatment, the painting deals with care-free children, and in spirit is akin to the large work called "The Chase"—children playing on the seashore, near bushes in blossom, mellow and harmonious in coloring and with texture like old tapestry, which, in 1909, was bought for the Mount Royal Club, from the collection of British art, held under the auspices of the Royal British Colonial Society of Artists, shown in the old Art Gallery on Phillips Square.

TITTA RUFFO, CARUSO and CHALIAPINE, as seen by Tade Styka, the Polish painter, is typical of this artist's ability to interpret the character of his sitters. This painting, which commemorated the appearance together of these gifted singers, was painted in Paris in 1912, and later acquired by Styka when the collection to which it belonged was sold.

Paintings by Styka Brothers Viewed by Throngs at Eaton's

Gazette 19.2.38

When Tade Styka and Adam Styka, the Polish artists, last showed their paintings in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, they created a sensation. A collection of their work now in the same galleries is exciting even greater interest. The public likes the suavity of brushwork and spirited treatment of the portraits by Tade, and the glowing, vividly colored Egyptian scenes by Adam, are as highly regarded. Since the show opened, there have been occasions many times a day when the galleries were jammed, and in the coming final week there is not likely to be any falling off in attendance. Those who saw the former show are out again in force, and are bringing their friends with them. They seem astounded at the apparent ease with which both artists paint. Their taste for form and color is satisfied. They are not concerned with whether, having seen all there is to see at once, the works would continue to excite their imagination. These painters know their business. They can draw, know how to put paint on, compose acceptably and don't need to ask advice regarding color. If personal taste prefers work less high in key and is not partial to rose-flushed shores above an amply blue Nile—well the glitter of Adam won't intrigue, and, if in portraiture preference lies in the direction of the solid and ponderous, the deftness of Tade might seem superficial. But their performance, a blend of natural gifts and thorough grounding, cannot be ignored.

Tade knows how to paint a portrait, and his ability to capture a likeness and invest a sitter with distinction was proved in the former show, when a better chance to judge offered in the portraits of well-known personages—Paderewski, Flammarion, H.R.H. Prince Umberto and Major-General James G. Harbord, faces made familiar in the public prints. That the dexterity is more than a slap-dash affair is evident in the study of hands, holding a grey Persian cat, among the exhibits, as well as the freely treated portrait of Mr. W. Barnetti, with white hair and trim beard, rose in button-hole and cigar in hand against a warm, reddish-brown background. This has all the fire of a spontaneous sketch. Gracious in air is Mrs. Peabody, in a silver satin dress with a brown spaniel in her lap. It is effectively arranged on the canvas and the rendering of the material is masterly. Peggy Joyce in white does not make quite the same appeal, and Countess Zewuska, blonde of hair, has a pair of devastating eyes. Miss S.W., seen from the back with head turned is directly painted, the transparent black dress being capitally treated. White-haired Canon Caron, with his hand through his belt, is full of character, and the three singers—Ruffo, Caruso and Chaliapin, seated at a table, presented many difficulties that have been successfully overcome, as the illustration on this page shows.

Adam Styka finds plenty to paint in Egypt. He treats with considerable gusto the figures in typical dress—chatting, smoking or listening to honeyed whispers. The gleaming lights on metal ornaments give him opportunities, and the suggestion of wrinkled age on the faces of some of his men is effectively conveyed. "The Slaves of Love," "A Daring Compliment," "The Thrilling Secret" and "A Pleasant Meeting" are apt titles. When he gets to the Nile the color is laid on—deep blue rippled water, as in "Buffalo at the Philae Ruins"—boy mounted on the animal in the stream, and boy with a water bottle; and in "Donkeys at The Nile," with a distant boat under sail, and the drinking animals flushed with ruddy light. In "Washing Day" a woman labors over the linen in a pan in the water, with a donkey near by. "The Caravan from Afar, Colossus of Memnon," makes a good composition with its camels passing the gigantic figures and the smoke of distant fires. "Egyptian girl with her Donkey at the Gizeh Pyramids" is invested with strong sunlight that envelops the river, boats and shores. Donkeys standing in shallow sunlit water also make attractive subjects.

Civic Art Exhibition.

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—Following an announcement made in these columns on a former occasion about the proposed "Montreal-In-Art Exhibition," inquiries were received by the City Improvement League who are sponsoring this civic project. Artists and the general public evidenced keen interest, and leaders in civic and public welfare looked forward to this scheme with patient expectancy. It may now be told that it was this support that has prompted the League to continue to explore the possibilities of this civic art exhibition with the view of making it an artistic, educational, cultural, economic (for we did consider the material welfare of our artists) and civic success.

It is to be regretted that through circumstances beyond the control of the League, the effectuation of the project has been somewhat retarded. It is felt, moreover, that with renewed efforts on the part of the League, and with redoubled collaboration and effective encouragement and timely teamwork on the part of our public-spirited citizens, this "Montreal-In-Art Exhibition" could be organized and presented to the public of Montreal within a short period. Montreal has never had an art show of this kind. As a matter of fact it will be the first one of its description and of its civic objectives to be held in Canada.

This open letter is to be taken both as a reminder and as a reply to our correspondents, our League membership, and the public that this civic art project is in a very active committee stage, and that we can report substantial progress. We wish to assure the interested readers of The Gazette that the League stands by them and that this committee will release an important news item on this subject at an early date.

Architecture Past and Present Of This Province

Star—23.2.38

The annual exhibition of work by Canadian architects, which is now on view at the Art Association of Montreal, gives a very good idea of the new buildings which have lately been built in this country. They are by architects from all over Canada, and the buildings are in places from Halifax to Vancouver, and even in England, though most of them are in this province and designed by Quebec architects. Buildings, and interior decorations of all sorts are shown in these photographs, — churches, theatres, hospitals and houses, — and there are some unexpected views of buildings which are now fairly familiar.

Another part of this exhibition, which covers the walls of the Art Association's lecture room, is of photographs of old buildings of this province, part of a valuable record of buildings, some of which have been destroyed or changed and some are likely to disappear before long. These are typical Canadian houses and churches, of an architecture made in Canada and fitted to the country and its climate. The photographs show the buildings and many of their details, — doorways, panelled rooms and furniture. A few pictures of village scenes give an idea of the color of Quebec, to supplement the photographs. Some other photographs show the people for whom the houses were built, engaged in spinning, weaving and baking bread in outdoor ovens.

Architecture of P.Q. Shown at Art Gallery

Gazette—19.2.38

Old Quebec and its architecture and customs, as revealed by photographic enlargements, makes an interesting show in the Lecture Hall of the Art Association of Montreal. The material for the exhibition, which is held under the auspices of the provincial government, was selected by the Province of Quebec Architects Association, and fine judgment has been shown.

The entire province has been searched for pictorial subjects, and the result is a wide array of old churches, convents and houses, not to mention windmills for different purposes, and outdoor ovens. Among the Montreal buildings there is a fine print of Notre Dame de Bonsecours, when houses and little stores clustered about the walls of this historic church. Quebec City has proved a fruitful field, as well as the smaller towns beyond, while many fine examples of early architecture come from the Island of Orleans.

Spring Show March 17

Entry forms have gone out for the 55th annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, which is to be held in the galleries, Sherbrooke street, west, from March 17 to April 10. Forms must be received by the secretary, Miss Lilhel M. Pinkerton, 1379 Sherbrooke street west, not later than March 3, which is also the last sending-in day for the works intended for exhibition. It is stipulated that entries shall be works "which have not been publicly exhibited in Montreal."

Largest One-painter Show,

Says Toronto Writer

Commenting on the exhibition of paintings by J. W. Morrice—now being shown here—when it held the public interest in Toronto, an art writer there had the following to say:

"Largest of all one-painter shows ever staged in Canada is that of the late J. W. Morrice. The National Gallery collected more than 150 of his paintings and sketches from five Canadian cities, some from Paris, 82 from Montreal, 28 from Ottawa, 10 from Toronto. Only a few are for sale and Morrice prices are going up. The enlarged sketch on the catalogue cover—"Ferry at Quebec" shot up over $1,000 lately on its early 1937 price. At an auction this collection might aggregate half a million in dollars.

"Morrice studied law here. But he seldom painted Ontario. Canada pictures in this show are a mere bagatelle to the pageant of Paris, Venice and the sub-tropics. Morrice, son of a Scotch merchant in Montreal, was a cosmopolitan. His gallery show is the greatest international scenorama ever staged in Canada by one man; an enormous cycle of scenes in luxurious enchantment of harmonized colors."

THE EXHIBITION of "Illustrations, to Marie Chapdelaine" by Clarence Gagnon, now on view at the Art Gallery, is extended to Sunday, March 6.

ARCHITECTS URGED TO LOOK TO FUTURE

Hon. E. L. Patenaude Sets Up Distinctive Canadian Style as Goal

TALKS AT R.A.I.C. DINNER

Judges Award Medals to Local Firms, Others for Designs in Institute's Exhibition

Architects of Canada, while in no way neglecting the necessary study of the past, must now look forward specially to the future, to favor the development of an art which will be properly Canadian, Hon. E. L. Patenaude, Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, told members of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada at its 31st annual dinner, held on Saturday in the Cercle Universitaire.

Mr. Patenaude, who was introduced by W. S. Maxwell, welcomed the delegates to the province and expressed the hope that the houses and buildings of Montreal would reflect to them the traditions of Quebec. The architect must have an insight upon every subject; he must be acquainted with history to understand the monuments of former times, and must have a knowledge of the characteristics of various nations and the tendencies of different epochs. At the same time he could not be ignorant of the sciences, physical and social, which related to his art, the Lieutenant-Governor said.

"All the arts give to a nation their contribution for the creation of the beautiful, for the education of taste and for the value of its own civilization. But it seems to me that few arts possess for so doing the power of architecture. The most humble as well as the more fortunate of men can admire the equilibrium, the brilliance and the greatness of its realizations," Mr. Patenaude declared.

It was announced at the dinner that H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, of Montreal, had been elected to the presidency of the institute for 1938. Other officers elected were: Prof. M. S. Osborne, of Winnipeg, first vice-president; H. C. Mott, of St. John, N.B., second vice-president; Alcide Chausse, of Montreal, honorary secretary; and B. R. Coon, of Toronto, honorary treasurer. In addition to Mr. Fetherstonhaugh, Mr. Chausse and Mr. Coon, the new executive committee will comprise L. A. Amos, R. H. Macdonald, W. S. Maxwell and P. J. Turner, all of Montreal.

FELLOWSHIPS GRANTED.

The following were announced as having been granted fellowships in the institute: John M. Watt, London, Ont.; Mackenzie Waters, Toronto; Gordon Pitts, Montreal; A. J. Hazelgrove, Ottawa; James H. Craig, Toronto; and Lieut.-Col. F. H. Marani, Toronto.

The following awards were declared to have been made by the judges of the R.A.I.C. exhibition: Medals, Ross and Macdonald for the Holt, Renfrew building, Montreal, and Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford for Douglas Hall, Montreal. Honorable mention: Public buildings, George and Moorehouse for the Toronto Stock Exchange and J. Cecil McDougall for the Private Patients' Pavilion of the Montreal General Hospital; educational, Moody and Moore for a gymnasium in Fort Garry, Man.; industrial, L. A. and P. S. Amos for a brewery experimental plant, Montreal; commercial, Maxwell M. Kalman for a florist's shop in Cote St. Luc; domestic, Wilson and Auld for Parker house, Westmount, John D. Parker for a house in Surrey, England, E. I. Barott for Greenfields house in Montreal; details, Ross and Macdonald for Neurological Hospital doorway in Montreal, Mackenzie Waters for doorway of a Toronto residence; craftsmanship, A. D. Thacker for stalls in Halifax Cathedral; interiors, E. I. Barott and F. J. Macnab for Bell Telephone building in Ottawa, Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford for N.L.C. Mather house in Montreal.

Most of the official business of the two-day convention was transacted at Saturday morning's session, Friday having been set aside for the visiting of points of architectural interest in the neighborhood of Montreal. The following reports were read by the chairmen of the various standing committees: architectural training, Mackenzie Waters; scholarship, H. L. Fetherstonhaugh; art, science and research, Prof. M. S. Osborne; professional usages, W. L. Somerville; public relations, E. W. Haldenby; editorial board, B. R. Coon; joint committee, A. J. Hazelgrove; exhibitions and awards, E. I. Barott. A report of a committee on housing was read by J. Hazelgrove.

The following delegates from the component associations were elected to the 1938 council of the institute: Alberta Association of Architects, R. P. Blaky and J. Maillart; Architectural Institute of British Columbia, S. M. Eveleigh, W. F. Gardiner and George Nairne; Architects' Association of New Brunswick, J. K. Gillies and H. C. Convention Delegates Guests of P.Q.A.A.

A group of architects from many parts of the Dominion and members of the Province of Quebec Association of Architects, attending the 31st annual convention of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, were guests yesterday afternoon of the Art Association of Montreal and the P. Q. F. A. at the Art Gallery, 1375 Sherbrooke street west.

Dr. C. F. Martin

Inspection was made of many beautiful photographs representing practically every form of architectural expression, from the artistic religious edifice and stately office building to the individual home on the hillside. A large section was devoted to pictures of very old buildings which preserve the old French traditions of architecture. One of these was the old Seminary of Quebec building taken from the courtyard, which dates back to the middle of the 17th century and is said to be the oldest piece of architecture on the continent.

Speaking informally to delegates and students Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the Art Association of Montreal and Dean-emeritus of the Faculty of Medicine, McGill University, dwelt upon the increasing interest in art and architecture, which are so closely related, in comparison with a generation ago.

INTEREST GROWING

"Judging from opinions expressed on art one gets impressions on present-day artistic work far more than was the case 25 years ago," Dr. Martin said. "Views about modern art are so diverse that one stands aghast; it is different from the medieval fraternity where opinions are uniform, but in art they differ according to the individual taste."

The importance of bringing before the public the charm and glory of the old architecture of the province was stressed by Prof. Ramsay Traquair, director of the School of Architecture, McGill University. Quebec architecture represented one of the greatest traditional arts in North America, which was not generally realized, he said.

Other speakers included Victor Morin, K.C., who touched briefly on the excellence of the architectural work displayed.

R. H. Macdonald, vice-president of the P.Q.A.A., acted as chairman.

Sally Ryan Now Is Owner of Bronze 'Madonna and Child'

London, February 25.—(C.P. Cable)—The girl with the Epstein touch, Sally Ryan, who used to live in Montreal, has purchased the famous bronze group, "Madonna and Child," by the sculptor whose influence on her own work has been strongest.

It was disclosed today that Miss Ryan, a sculptress of international repute at 21, paid £1,500 ($7,500) for the group, which was completed 10 years ago.

The figures in the group all are larger than life size, and Epstein worked two years on them.

A granddaughter of Thomas Fortune Ryan, who presented a collection of Auguste Rodin's works to the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, Miss Ryan said she intends to leave the Epstein work in London's Tate Gallery indefinitely. The group already has been moved to the gallery.

Council Considers Appointment of Skilled Man to Spur Improvement Efforts, Annual Meeting Told

Aligning himself on the side of those who wished to make of the art gallery "a centre for art education in its broadest sense," Dr. C. F. Martin, in his presidential address before the Art Association of Montreal yesterday, reviewed what had been done in that direction during the past year. He was re-elected president for 1938 at the annual meeting of the Association, in the library of the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street west.

Among the objectives to which he believed the Council of the Association should direct its energies was the acquisition and display of the most suitable and appropriate works of art, not alone objects of beauty, but likewise those of an educational value; also toward the development of ever better facilities for art education in the widest application of the term.

Honorary vice-presidents for the year are H. B. Walker and W. B. Blackader; vice-presidents, first, J. W. A. Hickson, Ph.D., and second, Arthur Browning; honorary treasurer, G. W. S. Henderson; secretary of council, Miss E. M. Pinkerton.

As an aid in the effort to acquire works of art in a more systematic manner, and to clarify the technique in establishing better contacts to locate works of art available for the collection of the Association, Dr. Martin declared that the Council has under consideration the appointment of a skilled director as soon as this step was feasible. On the question of art education he remarked that "there is every need here under this roof of the highest type of leadership in our official classes, allowing no doubt or criticism, in order that our members and the public may be well served with all advantages of a practical education in the arts." The president felt that it might seem possible and advisable to link the educational activities with the Fine Arts Department in McGill University.

MORE LECTURES PLANNED.

He said the association hoped to offer more and better lectures, perhaps in series by experts, and also "make something of real value" of the library; to broaden the scope of entertainments, and offer more opportunities for chamber music.

The accommodation for the art treasures was all too limited, said Dr. Martin, and "compared with any other city of its size on the continent, the accommodation in the building measures up poorly," he added, citing as example the facilities of Toronto. In this connection he referred to the "two public spirited citizens who have come forward with a magnificent offer of $50,000 towards reasonable extension of our building if in a year or so we can find approximately a similar amount to carry on the project." This offer would soon receive the serious consideration of the council, the meeting was informed.

Liberal financial help had made possible a number of improvements in the Art Gallery which the report listed, and simultaneously progress had been made in the direction of education last year with a committee under Dr. J. W. A. Hickson arranging educational programmes along similar lines to those in better institutions elsewhere. The Carnegie Corporation of New York pledged a sum of $5,000 in the support of this committee's work. Dr. Martin stated. The popularity of the classes, had necessitated a limitation to 100 children.

Reference was made to the large number of new members enlisted during the closing weeks of 1937 and early this year.

In addition to a donation of $200 by Mrs. Arthur Drummond there were 56 volumes presented to the library according to the report of Howard Murray, chairman, library committee. The list of gifts to the Sustentation Fund, amounting to $5,507, was given by the chairman of the fund, Arthur Browning. Some important gaps in the collection of the museum were reported by F. Cleveland Morgan, chairman.

The maintenance account revenue was $20,997 in 1937 and expenditure $22,008, according to the financial statement of G. W. S. Henderson, honorary treasurer.

Members of council elected were: For three years: Arthur Browning, T. S. Gillespie, Elwood B. Hosmer, R. P. Jellitt, J. W. McConnell, F. Cleveland Morgan, Brig. Gen. E. de B. Panet and C. W. Colby.

For one year: Gordon W. MacDougall, K.C.; Ross H. McMaster, Lt. Col. Herbert Molson, C.M.G.; M.C.; W. J. Morrice, Harry A. Norton, R. W. Reford.

For two years: D. Forbes Angus, Philip S. Fisher, F. M. G. Johnson, Ph.D., G. Alfred Morris, Howard Murray, Professor Ramsay Traquair.

Standing committees will be selected by the Council later.

RIGAUD PAINTING GOING TO OTTAWA

Self-Portrait by French Artist Secured for National Gallery of Canada

London, February 25.—(C. P. Cable)—The High Commissioner's office announced today that the National Gallery of Canada has purchased one of Hyacinthe Rigaud's portraits of himself. The purchase was effected through High Commissioner Vincent Massey. The price was not disclosed.

Rigaud, who lived from 1659 to 1743, for 82 years did as many as 30 to 40 portraits a year. He was admitted to the French Academy in 1700. His portraits of Louis XIV, Bossuet, Le Brun, and Mignard, and of the sculptor Desjardins, as well as one of himself, are in the Louvre.

Of Historical Value

Ottawa, February 25.—(P)—Eric Brown, director of the National Gallery of Canada, today confirmed that the gallery had purchased one of Hyacinthe Rigaud's portraits of himself.

"It is a very good painting and quite large," he said, "and is supposed to consist of the painter himself, with his wife and daughter. It is entitled 'A Portrait Group of a Lady and Gentleman with their Daughter and a Lap-dog.'"

Apart from the intrinsic value of the picture it is of direct Canadian historical value, in that the period during which Rigaud painted was coincidental with a flourishing French development in Canada, and will take its place with other works of the time in the gallery, he said.

Newer British Painters at the Scott Galleries

Star 28.2.38

A collection of pictures and drawings by recent British painters, most of them still living, has been brought to Canada by Messrs. Reid and Lefevre of London, and is being shown at Scott's galleries on Drummond Street, and in most of them the painters have something to say and their own ways of saying it. James McBey, who is better known as an etcher and water colour painter has an English landscape and a group of figures in a Morocco street, which are admirably fresh in colour and, with their black outlines, are rather like tinted drawings done with oil paint. His portrait study of a Moorish woman is an excellent piece of colour decoration. There are some particularly interesting water colours by Leslie Hunter, very broad and free brush drawings, which are full of suggestion; his oil pictures are quite as interesting, especially a study of a blue houseboat, a little green landscape, a village street, full of warm sunshine, and a roughly painted but very effective portrait study. By Archibald MacGlashan there are two delightful studies of children's heads and a very good still life picture.

Two excellent studies of light, in a view of Toulon harbour and a sketch of Highgate, are by Duncan Grant, who has also some simply and freely painted pictures of still life and flowers. A policeman in uniform does not make a very attractive subject for a portrait study. Vanessa Bell's picture of an English garden and of an Italian fountain are full of good sunlight, and there is true atmosphere in a picture of the Pool of London, and these are much more successful as pictures than that of a girl in Spanish dress. Edward Le Bas, among other pictures, has a very good study of English winter climate. Some very successful little landscape compositions are by W. J. Steggle; Harold Steggle's small and formal pictures are not so original, but have pleasant colour and light. Sine Mackinnon has made himself a rather new way of painting, derived from various sources, mostly oriental. The pictures and drawings of Frances Hodgkins appear to be either abstractions or symbols, and judgment on them is best left to those who can understand them. Elwin Hawthorne's simple, quiet landscapes and street scenes, R. O. Dunlop's rather sad coloured landscapes, and sketches by S. J. Peplow and John Aldridge are other works in this exhibition.

The Hon. Gordon Scott and Mr. Jean Lallemand, vice-presidents of the Quebec Musical Competition Festival, will be hosts to members of the general executive, patrons, trophy donors and artists and their wives at the Montreal Art Association, Sherbrooke street west, Friday afternoon at five at an exhibition of trophies donated for the approaching festival. The trophies will remain at the Art Gallery over the week-end for public exhibition. Star, 28.2.38.

Old Mural Paintings Described in Lecture

The scratches, made on the walls of caves by prehistoric men, were the first beginnings of mural decoration, but Dr. Peter Breiger, of Toronto, in his lecture on the History of Mural Painting to the Art Association of Montreal on Monday afternoon, began at a much later time. He showed in his lantern slides some Roman wall paintings, but his examples were chiefly of the Christian period, starting with the frescoes of Giotto at Padua and Assisi. A principal point on which Dr. Breiger laid stress was the relation of the painting to the architecture of the place which it decorates, and some mural mosaics were shown as examples of similar decoration in a different material. The works of Michael Angelo and Raphael in the Vatican were taken as instances of the right adaptation of painting to architecture; these were followed by the quite different work of Tiepolo, which was made to produce the effect of an opening in the wall, through which the picture was seen. The similar work of Delacroix was contrasted with the more truly architectural decoration of Puvis de Chavannes. In recent times mural painting has become an American art, and Dr. Breiger ended his lecture with some examples of mural paintings by Thomas Benton and Boardman Robinson, in the United States.

MUSEUM TREASURES TOPIC OF LECTURE

F. Cleveland Morgan will address the Woman's Guild of Christ Church Cathedral, following the business session of the monthly meeting at the Parish House on Monday, March 7. His subject will be "Treasure Trove from the Museum of the Art Gallery" with illustrations. The lecture will begin at 3.45 o'clock and will be followed by tea. Star, 3.3.38.

Fabulous Hearst Art Treasures Going to Museums, Collectors

Gazette By THOMAS C. LINN, 2.3.38
(Special to The Gazette from The New York Times.)

New York, March 1.—The art collection of William Randolph Hearst, which has achieved almost fabulous proportions in popular report, is to be broken up.

Reports current in the art world that objects from this vast collection were being offered for sale privately were confirmed today by Joseph V. Connolly, president of King Features, a Hearst enterprise.

About a third of the collection is to be offered for sale to museums, Mr. Connolly said. He could not give the exact value of the works of art to be disposed of, but estimated it at several millions. Unable to reach Mr. Hearst in California by telephone, Mr. Connolly said that he did not know Mr. Hearst's reason for selling.

All the painting, sculpture, tapestries, armor, silver and other rare objects to be placed on the market will be offered through Parish-Watson and Co., Inc., New York, well-known company specializing in art of the Far and Near East.

This is the most important art collection on the market here since J. P. Morgan offered for sale some of the paintings from his collection in January, 1935, and in June of the same year sold his collection of miniatures at auction in London.

Mr. Connolly said he believed that Mr. Hearst intended to give some of his art to museums, but was unable to name the museums or to specify the objects.

As a collector Mr. Hearst has become almost a legendary figure because of the lavish scale on which he bought. In addition to the multitudinous objects that decorate his two residences in California, his

New York apartment and his castle in Wales, enough is left over to fill a vast warehouse in the Bronx and two warehouses on the Pacific Coast.

Those who know Mr. Hearst well say that mere pride of possession was by no means the motive for his collecting but that he is genuinely absorbed in art. Amid all the works of art by which he is constantly surrounded and the others which he has been constantly acquiring, he is said to be able to recall individual objects bought years ago and kept in storage since the purchase.

As purchased, every work of art is photographed and a master file of photographs is kept at San Simeon, Mr. Hearst's California estate. If the object should not fit into a decorative scheme pleasing to Mr. Hearst, it goes into storage. Of late years Mr. Hearst, now nearly 75 years old, is said to have given more and more time to art.

Many of the rare objects Mr. Hearst has bought himself in his travels about the world. Others he has acquired through agents and dealers, and a great quantity has come out of auction rooms.

The collection is so vast that Mr. Parish-Watson has been working on the catalogue since December and its completion is still in the future. In such a multifarious collection, the quality of individual objects must necessarily vary greatly, while some of the works in Mr. Hearst's collection are of minor importance, others attain the ranks of great masterpieces.

In some fields no other collectors have ever approached Mr. Hearst's record. For instance, Mr. Parish-Watson estimated yesterday that despite the many European period paneled rooms installed in Mr. Hearst's various homes, at least fifty more were in storage.

Religious Art to Be Exhibited at Quebec

Artists of Province Invited to Send in As Many Works As Desired

Gazette—5.3.38

In connection with the National Canadian Eucharistic Congress to be held at Quebec June 22 to 26, there is to be an exhibition of Christian Religious Art in the galleries of the Provincial Museum. This will be open to the public from June 19 until July 2. The official opening will be on June 18 at 9 p.m.

All the artists of the Province of Quebec are invited to participate and to send in as many works as they may desire, but they must be originals.

As to subjects, those especially suggested are:

1. A study or sketch in color for a large composition, suitable for the sanctuary or the main nave of a church or chapel in this province. This may be a mural, a mosaic or in stained glass.

2. A picture in oils, watercolors, gouache, etc., of a scene in the daily life of a Christian in the home or outside, the subject being left entirely to the imagination of the artist. Size is not limited, and drawings, engravings, etchings of this subject may be submitted.

3. Sculpture: Statue, statuette, bust, saints in high or low relief, founder or foundress of a community established in Quebec Province.

4. Designs for or the executed originals of sacred vessels, ornaments and appointments of a church, and funeral monuments.

5. Perspective, exterior or interior, of recent religious architectural projects—church or chapel constructed or planned. Photographs will not be accepted.

All items submitted should be addressed, insurance and carriage paid, to the Museum of Quebec not later than June 1, and should bear on the back a label giving the name of the artist, address, title of the work and price. Each artist, too, should send under separate cover to J. B. Soucy, director of the Ecole des Beaux-Arts of Quebec, a complete list of works submitted, with titles and prices, to facilitate classification and rapid printing of a catalogue of the works accepted by the jury of selection.

The management of the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, with the approval of the Hon. J. H. A. Paquette, M.D., Provincial Secretary, have placed at the disposition of the jury $200 to be awarded to three of the works exhibited.

Contemporary British Painters Holding Exhibition at Scott's

Gazette By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE, 5.3.38

Paintings by some contemporary British artists are drawing picture-lovers to the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, 1490 Drummond street, where the collection, organized in conjunction with Alex. Reid & Leveque, Limited, of London, England, gives Montrealers the opportunity of viewing the work of artists who have a strong following in the Old Country.

The keynote of the show is individuality. All the painters have ideas and the courage to express them. The message of some is not quite clear, and these works make strongest appeal to those who in this go-ahead age have the faculty of dismissing from mind the standards by which good painting was once judged. The right or wrong of this is a matter of personal conviction. Undeniably the more obscure works have qualities that attract attention, and undoubtedly can "grow" on the beholder. The sincerity of the painters need not be questioned—they probably see such things that way.

There are artists here that have won their place—Vanessa Bell, with a frank outlook and bold stroke, who shows the solidly painted black-garbed woman, with small fan, and a nosegay nearby, called "The Spanish Dress." She truthfully paints the effect of spring sunshine in "The Garden in April"—house, trees in bloom and a pathway, and is very direct in the handling of her Thames-side scene, entitled "The Pool of London," reproduced on this page. Duncan Grant, whose "Fort St. Louis, Toulon," is also reproduced, shows variety—"Autumn Flowers," gay-hued zinnias in a figured teapot; "Tulips," white, pink and red, against a gilt-framed picture, a delicious blue note being supplied by a scarf; and the portrait of a very English policeman of the eminently dependable kind. R. O. Dunlop handles the palette knife with vigor in "Biddford, Warwickshire," and "Clifton Bridge, Stratford-on-Avon," and Edward LeBas has three effective landscapes, impressionistic in spirit—"Landscape, Provence," with willows and a man assembling a faggot in sun-shot atmosphere; "Summer Afternoon," which shows a country house, dovecote, and fowls foraging in the garden; and "Winter, Near Ware," building and telegraph poles edging a canal, a barge and distant ridge under snow, charged with atmosphere that brings to mind raw piercing cold.

Harold Steggle paints in a precise, flat, clean manner in "Plymouth Hoe"—lighthouse, road and buildings, and much the same atmosphere pervades "Kimmeridge Bay, Dorset," sea, boats and houses. W. J. Steggle shows a nice sense of arrangement in the row of trees in "Blythburgh, Suffolk," and a richer color range in "Fambridge, Essex"—a house, creek and a boat. Elwin Hawthorne finds buildings interesting in "St. John's, Hampstead," and shows beached boats, buildings and the sea in "Brighton Front."

Sine Mackinnon, credited in the catalogue with "a considerable reputation in Paris," is individual in his outlook, and first-hand knowledge of the places he paints may make all the difference. Frances Hodgkins, too, will probably intrigue with "Green Jug and Jade Sea," "Wheelwright's Shop" and "The Colonel's House," to mention a few, but there is little distinction to the color and the scattered effect of the objects does not clarify the painter's aim. John Aldridge is more definite in statement in "The River Pant" and "Great Sampford." Archibald McGlashan has a capital work in "Child in Pram," done crisply and directly, shows free brushwork in "Sleeping Child," and really paints apples in his "Still Life."

S. J. Peplow, R.S.A., who died in 1935, is represented by works boldly designed and lovely in color—"Still Life," a rose in a vase above apples and grapes; red anemones in a vase, with a square of beautiful blue in the background; and "Landscape, Iona," with painted rocks on silver sand, a glimpse of curving bay, the sea and distant hills. This group reveals a painter of originality and great ability. James McBey, renowned as an etcher and probably best known by his plates of incidents seen as official artist to the Egyptian Expeditionary Force, 1917-18, does not make quite the same appeal as a painter, in oils at least. "Bury," with church, trees, road and figures, is unusual in treatment—dark outlined design with the spaces filled in with flat color. In less marked degree, the same formula is followed in "Suk Marrakesh," a crowd of robed figures in a market, with archway in the distance. The flat manner is also adopted in "El Marrakeshia"—a young woman in flowered dress of pinks and reds.

Leslie Hunter, who was the subject of a critical work by Dr. T. J. Honeyman, called "Introducing Leslie Hunter," is well represented by oils and sketches in colored crayons which show ability of a high order. The group includes "Street in Fife," with humble buildings and figures; "Houseboats, Loch Lomond," with one of the floating homes a daring blue which has been effectively employed; "Fifeshire Landscape," with noble tree, houses and figures, robustly handled, and the group of sketches that shows his manner of work. A vigorous freely handled watercolor is "Woman at Wash-tub," in which a crimson apron is the high color note.

National Gallery Exhibits Works of Dead Cartoonist

Star, 11.3.38
 OTTAWA, March 11 — (C.P.)—For the first time in its history the National Gallery of Canada yesterday opened an exhibition of a cartoonist's works—30 years after his death. A distinguished gathering heard Hon. P. J. A. Cardin open the exhibition and pay tribute to Henry Julien, one-time artist for The Montreal Daily Star and member of the Parliamentary Press Gallery.

The gathering saw 135 pen-and-ink, pencil and watercolor drawings depicting the political life of the century's turn and the homely gaiety of the French-Canadian habitant. It heard Mr. Cardin refer to Julien's love for his fellow-countrymen and his generosity of spirit.

The Minister, incidentally, referred to demands for a new building for the National Gallery and his own sentimental attachment to the present building, rising from the fact that in the National Museum auditorium which it contains Parliament sat after the great fire that destroyed the centre block of its own buildings.

Nevertheless, he said, "when the Finance Minister is disposed to show a little more generosity something may be done."

Julien's show which contained his famous political series, "The Bytown Coons," satirizing Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Cabinet, was hung alongside 54 amazing illustrations of Clarence Gagnon for Louis Hemon's book, "Maria Chapdelaine."

Gagnon, acknowledged to be one of the most brilliant of Canada's conservative painters, brought in his series the beauty of French-Canada, the color of its quaint, hard-working life, its deep religion, contrasting sharply with Julien's caricatures but harmonizing to a considerable degree with the cartoonist's watercolors of the quiet countryside and the quiet enjoyment of men fishing.

The visitors enjoyed both shows, chuckling at Julien's humor and admiring the beauty of Gagnon's little masterpieces.

Bennett to Receive Portrait Of Himself As Parting Gift

Star, 11.3.38
 OTTAWA, March 11—(C.P.)—Rt. Hon. R. B. Bennett will be presented with a portrait of himself on the occasion of his retirement from the leadership of the Conservative party, it has been decided by the committee which was named at the national Conservative conference here last week-end.

The portrait will be presented to the retiring Conservative chief at a dinner in his honor in Ottawa this summer. The rank and file of the Conservative party from all parts of Canada will join members of the House of Commons and Senators in contributing to the gift, it was stated.

It will be the first time Mr. Bennett has consented to have his portrait painted. Hitherto, the Conservative leader has resisted overtures in this direction, but his consent was obtained and the portrait will be started at an early date. The commission will be given to a prominent Canadian artist.

VALUABLE OIL PAINTING RECOVERED BY POLICE

Star, 11.3.38
Stolen From Home On Ontario Avenue
 A valuable oil painting which was stolen from the unoccupied home of Mrs. Thornley Hart, at 3464 Ontario avenue, on the night of March 2-3, has been recovered by the Montreal police and it is expected that an arrest will be made in the case within a few hours.

The canvas, entitled "La Belle Juive," is the work of a noted French artist, and was insured by Lloyds of London, whose agent here has been advised of its recovery. The thieves did not steal the whole picture but removed the painting from its frame and left the latter hanging on the wall. The burglars broke into the vacant house through the kitchen at the rear of the building.

Persistent work on the part of the detective department was finally rewarded yesterday, when Detectives Desmoureaux and Theoret walked into a store on St. Catherine street west and after questioning the proprietor, were shown the missing canvas, which they took to headquarters where it was later identified.

Ernest Neumann Spoke On The Art of Goya at the Art Association

A very good lecture was given to the Art Association of Montreal on Thursday afternoon by Ernest Neumann, on the art of Goya, the Spanish peasant, who was for a time both artist and bull-fighter and became a fashionable portrait painter. Mr. Neumann mentioned some of the many legends about the life of Goya, but put most of them aside as untrue or immaterial. He began with Goya's portraits, and described him as the last of a line of painters, in many countries, whose portraits told the truth about their subjects. Some of Goya's, brutally true, portraits of the Spanish king and queen and of other people, and some characteristic portraits of children were shown on the screen, and Mr. Neumann's remarks on them were very clear and often humorous.

The lecture went on to Goya's etchings, and, as an etcher, Mr. Neumann put him with Rembrandt and Whistler. Some of the Capriccios and of the etchings of the horrors of war were shown, but Mr. Neumann spared his audience some of the least pleasant of them. Attention was called to the existence in Montreal, in the Art Gallery and in private collections,—of a number of good examples of Goya's work.

Painting Will Be Done By Toronto Artist

A. Hebert, A.R.C.A., Heads The Arts Club Gazette—12.3.38

Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., was this week elected president of The Arts Club of Montreal, in succession to R. E. Bostrom, the other officers being: vice-president, D. Stuart Forbes; secretary, H. L. ART ASSOCIATION PLANS EXPANSION

Feb. 25, 1938.
Annual Meeting Hears Of Conditional Donations Of $50,000

Enlargement of the Art Association building on Sherbrooke street west is under consideration by the council, following an offer of donations of $50,000 if a like amount can be raised by subscription.

This announcement was made yesterday by Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the association, in his report presented at the annual meeting. Experts have told the council that the fund would permit the erection of another gallery equal in size to the present lecture hall and provide in addition four or six smaller rooms to house special collections.

Dr. Martin reported a year of great progress for the association and announced a program to make the association "a living spirit, a centre for art education in its broadest sense."

The association expressed its regret at the death of a number of benefactors and members, among them Lord Atholstan, and extended the meeting's sympathy to Lady Atholstan and the Hon. Mrs. Hallward.

Dr. Martin continues as president. Honorary vice-presidents for the year are H. B. Walker and W. B. Blackader; first vice-president, Dr. J. W. A. Hickson; second vice-president, Arthur Browning; honorary treasurer, G. W. S. Henderson; secretary of council, Miss E. M. Pinkerton.

Members of council elected were:

Lecture on Cezanne By Harold Beament

The art and something of the life of Paul Cezanne were described in a lecture, given by Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., to the Art Association of Montreal on Monday afternoon, and the lecture was illustrated by reproductions, mostly in colour, of works by Cezanne, some of which were hung on the walls and others shown on the screen. Mr. Beament recognized the difficulties which many people find in appreciating Cezanne's pictures and set himself, speaking as an admirer, to explain the pictures. Speaking first of the earlier and more eventful part of the painter's life, Mr. Beament called attention to his classical education and to his slight training as a painter. Cezanne, as the lecturer showed, derived something from Delacroix and the romantic painters, austerity from Courbet and a treatment of light and division of colour from the impressionist painters, and particularly from Pissarro, but his own personality remained in all his work. Some of Cezanne's painting could, in the lecturer's opinion, be overrated, but his influence on art could never be overrated. The illustrations to the lecture included some still life pictures, which Mr. Beament put among the best of the painter's work, a few portraits, chiefly self-portraits, and a number of landscapes, some in the painter's native Provence and others in the neighbourhood of Paris and Fontainebleau, and they showed the changes and developments of Cezanne's manner of painting.

 City Council considered a new Coat of Arms, shown at top, for the city yesterday. It appears that the one which Jacques Viger, first mayor of Montreal, had designed a little over a century ago, shown underneath the new one, is not in strict keeping with accepted principles of heraldry. The new one is. It has a red heraldic cross with a tiny white border on a field of silver. In the upper left field is the Fleur de Lys, emblematic of French-Canadians; upper right, the rose, and below the shamrock and thistle.

EDUCATION STRESSED

"We take it," Dr. Martin declared, "that the primary function of an art museum is to increase an appreciation of art and to develop something creative for the benefit of the community. The day has long since passed when an art gallery was merely a storehouse for its treasures. It must be rather, a living spirit, a centre for art education in its broadest sense."

Capital and income were augmented during 1937, Dr. Martin declared, but he added, "The fact remains that our income is still quite inadequate to meet the needs of annual maintenance; all the more so in view of the expansion of our activities."

It was encouraging, however, he continued, to note the large number of new members during the last weeks of 1937 and the early weeks of this year.

Arts Club Show Pays Homage To Work of Founder Members

Gazette By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE 12.3.38

Marking the 25th year of its existence, The Arts Club of Montreal, 2027 Victoria street, shows on its walls paintings by foundation members and those associated with the club in its early days. The assembling of this collection from various sources was a happy gesture, paying, as it does, homage to the art of a number who have since laid down brush and palette. Of these, there is "Golden Autumn," a representative example of the finest quality by the late William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., which is reproduced on this page. His ability as a watercolorist is revealed in "The Habitant, Ste. Famille," an interior with an old man enjoying a quiet pipe. Reproduced, too, is "Blizzard," by the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., a nobly conceived and vigorously painted impression of wild weather, while of his last period is a typical bit of Laurentian country with wooded hill powdered with hoarfrost, fast open water and snow-covered rocks. From the brush of the late G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., came the two spirited marines "Rising Tide"—breaking grey sky, rocks being pounded by waves, their crests being whipped off by the winds; and "Marine, Nova Scotia" which is charged with the hum of the fresh breeze that tosses the waves into white-caps and drives a schooner towards a lighthouse. "Full Sea," represents the art of the late George Fox—rocks, cliffs, and a blue sea that breaks in foam on distant rocks, a work big in feeling and sound in color. The late A. de F. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., with "La Pluie au Couchant"—a wooded landscape at sunset, with a rain-squall breaking, is not so happily represented, but there is more than a touch of sardonic humor in a canvas, catalogued "Picture," of a young nude woman affectingly holding a lily in one hand, while a bird on her shoulder whispers in her ear. It was painted for a "stunt" show, capably "took off" what was then an occasional tendency in some spheres of European painting and, properly trumpeted, might later have captured some substantial sum. "Winter's End"—a winding stream and hill, is a bit of Laurentian country by the late Wilkie Kilgour, and from the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, comes "Le Jardin de Lumiere," a large canvas of a garden, figures, paper lanterns, with dark trees contrasting a blaze of sunlight, by the late Arthur D. Rozaire, A.R.C.A.

Scanning these works and recalling to mind the painters, and what they stood for in art, emphasizes the fact that their balance and honest convictions could be profitably employed in guiding Canadian painting today.

Turning to the painters fortunately with us, E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., besides a little landscape with old barn and trees, done at St. Eustache, shows "Rosine," a crisply painted girl in a white blouse. Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., has "St. Malo, Cloud shadow"—sunlit town, a stretch of water and figures on the near-by cliffs, a work done some time ago. "Italian Girl," is by Joseph St. Charles, A.R.C.A., and W. H. Clapp, elected A.R.C.A., in 1911, and now living in California, is represented by "Bend of the River, Spain"—tall buildings atop a height in shadow, distant bridge spanning the stream, and trees in sunlight. Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., shows "Winter" a bit of open stream, snow-covered banks and spruces laden with snow, and Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A., among his contributions sees the picturesque in "Old House, Orleans Island"; suggests the chill of November in his landscape with barn, parched grass, patches of snow and breaking sky, and finds a gay color note in yellow houses, with poplars and a rose-flushed hill, in "Near Baie St. Paul." Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., paints a fine cloudy sky in "Along the River"—house, stream and range of distant mountains, and shows "The Lake" under a sunset sky. "Building of the New Highway, St. Urbain,"—carts in a rutted road, bordered by barns and houses, with a noble mountain in the distance is by F. W. Hutchison, N.A., and W. S. Maxwell, R.C.A., in "Harbor Scene"—dock-side houses and a yacht being provisioned, has a clean, freely-handled watercolor.

David McGill convincingly suggests lowering clouds about the distant mountains in "Late Summer, Lake Champlain," with its noble tree, ploughed land, house, other buildings being visible below on the shore that edges the stretch of water, and Guy Brock, now living on the Pacific Coast, shows a smoking tug and masted vessels in a stream, with a row of buildings blue against the golden sky. It is a fine study of atmosphere. Herbert Raine, R.C.A., in "Old Court Yard," apparently a drawing done in the area demolished to make way for the new Court House, shows his high talents as a draughtsman, and Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., paints a view of Oxford from the fields, the buildings light against a darkening sky. J. Melville Miller, R.C.A., has a wharfside scene in typical murky setting, called "Coal Loader," and Randolph Hewton, R.C.A., has a winter landscape—ice-edged open water, sleighs on a road near houses, and a distant rounded hill, a work marked by some lovely greys. D. H. MacFarlane, A.R.C.A., has an interior with coated, seated habitants smoking, a watercolor entitled "The Meeting," and A. Y. Jackson shows "Ste. Agnes, Que.," with modest church, adjacent buildings and wind-scored snow in the foreground. Paul Caron has "February, Baie St. Paul," with hills, houses, and men at a sleigh unloading cordwood into a shack.

Of the sculpture, Henri Hebert, R.C.A., has a miniature bust of the late G. Horne Russell, which is a good likeness; and A. Laliberte, R.C.A., in "La Feuille d'erable" shows a decoratively treated girl's head.

W. Scott & Sons Sells Gallery Property; Will Auction Works

Eighty-Year-Old Firm Plans to Re-open in Sherbrooke Street Galleries with

Gazette French Exhibition March 12.38

W. Scott and Sons, established nearly eighty years ago, has sold its property at 1490 Drummond street, will vacate the galleries as soon as possible, and will sell its entire stock of paintings and prints.

John Heaton, in making the announcement yesterday, stated that the firm would move to its property at 1316 Sherbrooke street west, a few doors west of Mountain street, and, on reopening, will inaugurate the new galleries with its annual exhibition of French paintings, arranged in conjunction with Alex. Reid and Lefevre, Limited, of London, in October.

The firm in future will devote its entire activities to paintings, dropping prints and picture framing.

Plans, not quite completed, call for the sale at auction, by Fraser Brothers, of 300 pictures in the Ball Room of the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, the dates being Friday night, April 1, Saturday afternoon, April 2, and Saturday afternoon, April 9. A catalogue is now being prepared.

The firm of W. Scott and Sons was founded in 1859 by the late William Scott, and for many years its premises were on Notre Dame street, near St. Francois Xavier street. Frank R. Heaton came from Yorkshire in 1890 and joined the firm. Walter A. Scott retiring from the firm in 1907, a few years after his father's death. John Heaton became connected with his father's firm on leaving McGill in 1913, and after going overseas in 1915 with the 24th Battalion, Victoria Rifles of Canada, and returning in 1919, has had active participation in the business. Frank Heaton, now in his 72nd year, retired in 1932.

It is safe to say that during the long life of this firm millions of dollars have changed hands. The fine qualities of its paintings attracted picture-lovers, and from these galleries works went into the private collections of many Montrealers, many since dead, such as Sir Edward Clouston, R. B. Angus,

C. R. Hosmer, Dr. William Gardner, Dr. F. J. Shepherd, E. B. Green-shields, James Ross, J. B. Learmont, William Learmont, James Reid Wilson, Mrs. Crathern McArthur, Sir George Drummond, Sir William Van Horne and the Hon. L. J. Forget, to mention a few. Paintings, too, have gone to public galleries.

Downtown conditions showing marked change, the firm early in 1930 moved to Drummond street, at the same time making provision for the Sherbrooke street property, to which it will move.

Eskimo Archaeological Treasures Safeguarded by New Canadian Act

Gazette

Ottawa, March 13.—No longer will scientists, archaeologists and explorers be able to excavate Eskimo ruins in Canada's Northwest Territories and carry off what they find.

New regulations, now effective, require all archaeological specimens to be submitted to the Dominion Government. Anything required by the National Museum of Canada will be retained and the remainder will be returned to the finder only on the condition that they be permanently deposited in some public institution, in Canada or elsewhere, where they will be available for study.

At one time the rule in archaeological research was "finders keepers." However, the League of Nations set to work and finally recommended to all countries in which excavation work was likely, a standard set of rules, chief aim being to ensure to each country the retention of anything dug up in its own domain if so desired.

In 1930, the council of the Northwest Territories adopted an ordinance for protection of Eskimo ruins. This required permits from the commissioner of the Territories for examination and excavation of archaeological sites and laid down various other regulations. It is these regulations which have now been supplemented by the addition of the clauses recommended by the League of Nations.

Egypt was the first to adopt the League's recommendation. Persons poking around the Pyramids or other places of archaeological interest must now submit to the new regulations, giving Egypt first chance to keep anything they find. Canada follows Egypt, only in her case the regulations apply to the Eskimo finds.

The new section in the Eskimo ruins ordinance, recently approved by the council of the Northwest Territories, follows:

"All archaeological specimens collected by the holder of a permit shall be submitted to the commissioner for examination by the archaeological officers of the Dominion Government. Whatever specimens are required to complete the collections of the National Museum of Canada shall become the property of that institution; the remainder shall be returned to the holder of the permit on condition that he undertakes to deposit them permanently in some public institution where they will be available for study.

"If the holder of the permit, however, requests permission to retain the entire collection for a reasonable period in order to facilitate its description in a scientific report, the commissioner is empowered to grant his request."

BERGERON ELECTED ARCHITECTS' HEAD

P.Q.A.A. Names Officers, Awards Medals of Esteem to Five Montrealers

Gazette 24.1.38

J. S. Bergeron, of Quebec City, was elected president of the Province of Quebec Association of Architects at the annual meeting Saturday while the association simultaneously presented medals to five Montreal architects in honor of their contributions to the profession.

Taking over from the retiring president, H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, Mr. Bergeron made a plea for greater co-operation among architects and urged that they establish higher fees. In the light of the services rendered, Mr. Bergeron did not consider that the rewards were sufficient.

The medals were presented to charter and elder members of the association as tokens of respect and esteem by Mr. Fetherstonhaugh on behalf of the other members. Those who received the honor were: Alcide Chausse and Robert Findlay, charter members; George W. Wood, J. Rawson Gardiner, and Arthur Vincent, elder members, who recalled past events in the architectural profession, which they had witnessed, and pointed out the many changes which had taken place during the years they had been in practice.

Mr. Fetherstonhaugh remarked at the presentation ceremony that it was owing to the work of W. S. Maxwell and Ernest Cormier that the medals and new seals for the diplomas of the association had been procured. The medals were struck at the Mint of France, from the design of a famous French sculptor.

Other official positions were filled as follows: R. H. Macdonald, of Montreal, vice-president; Jean J. Perrault, of Montreal, second vice-president; Maurice Payette, of Montreal, honorary secretary, and J. Roxborough Smith, treasurer.

The following councillors were elected: Oscar Boule and S. Brasseur, both of Quebec City; P. C. Amos, H. Lawson, G. McL. Pitts, H. Labelle, H. R. Wiggs, R. E. Boström, J. Crevier, and M. Parizeau, all of Montreal.

Delegates to the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada were: H. L. Fetherstonhaugh, W. S. Maxwell, L. A. Amos, Alcide Chausse, P. J. Turner and R. H. Macdonald.

Gazette 29.3.38

A large collection of pictures, which occupies all the available space in the house on Drummond Street, is being shown by Messrs. W. Scott and Sons; these, in consequence of the removal of Messrs. Scott from their present house, are all to be sold at the end of this and next week. There are more than three hundred works, including a few prints, and they represent the Canadian and all the principal modern European schools of painting, including even a few works by Russian painters. Nearly a quarter of them are Canadian, including the work of some seventeen painters. There are eight pictures, large and small by Kriehoff, with a number of his little studies of habitants and Indians and one of his larger landscapes. There is also one picture by his follower, Verner, and a remarkable view of a lake, attributed to Paul Kane. Among more recent Canadians, J. W. Morrice is the best represented, by twenty-five pictures and sketches, of both his earlier and of his later work, painted in Canada, Europe, Africa and the West Indies; most of these are landscapes but there are a few figure and portrait studies. Nine pictures by J. Y. Johnstone are all small and include some very good examples of his work, painted in Canada and Holland. Some good, earlier work by Maurice Cullen is among the four pictures and sketches by him; and Suzor Cote, John Hammond, F. W. Hutchison and several of the younger Canadian painters are well represented.

British pictures begin with a striking portrait by Raeburn, in very fine condition, and a figure study by Bonington. Frank Brangwyn, with two groups of figures, Sir John Lavery, with four good examples, Sir D. Y. Cameron, with a picture of purple Scottish hills and five other pictures, Wm. Shayer, Lamorna Birch, Russell Flint, Cecil Lawson, Bertram Priestman and Walter Greaves are among the other painters whose pictures are shown.

The modern Dutch school is well represented by a number of works by Willem and James Maris, Israels, Bosboom, Scherrewitz, de Hoog, Mastenbroek and others who, among them, have more than sixty pictures here. Work of French painters ranges all the way from Bonvin, Harpignies and Ribot to Utrillo and Raoul Dufy, and includes two pictures by Monticelli, one of them a very good picture in greens and browns, by Daubigny, Lhermitte, one of them a big picture of women gleaning, Theodore Rousseau, J. F. Millet, Cazin, Jacques, Roybet and several other well known French painters.

The Pictures

HERE are pictures taken by a Star staff photographer of Montreal's voluntary art school attended by 100 children every Saturday morning in the Montreal Art Association's gallery on Sherbrooke street. They come to the school; they give up part of their Saturday holiday because they like painting and modelling. None of the 100 pupils have dropped out since the school was started to bring out latent talent among Montreal schoolchildren.

Descriptions of the pictures follow:—

- (1) The Art Association of Montreal in which these classes are mobilized.
- (2) Three lessons in modelling with clay and the children produce statuettes.
- (3) Not old enough to be "easel people," the children paint on the floor. Miss A. M. C. Savage, instructress, is at top centre.
- (4) Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the Art Association of Montreal, who wants the Art Gallery to play a real part in Montreal life.
- (5) and (6) Girls and boys paint without bells "creatively."

Saskatchewan Rural Muni-

SASKATOON, March 5—(C.P.)

—A resolution asking the Dominion Government for a grain marketing board and a fixed minimum price for all grains not less than production costs, was passed yesterday at the annual convention of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities.

Production costs would be determined by the research bureau of the three Western universities, the resolution sets out, and Western grain producers should have "adequate" representation on the board.

Among 60 resolutions passed the association asked:

The proposed change in grading
Garnet wheat not to be made this year;

Dominion and Saskatchewan authorities to consider a crop insurance plan; consideration of regional tariffs; failing that, a general reduction of tariffs; reduction of freight rates on feed grain between points in Western Canada;

A change in the Land Title Act or interest when crop proceeds were less than $6 an acre;

That the Saskatchewan Government provide for a cancellation of

SPRUCE BEER ACCIDENT DAMAGES SET AT $900

Victim Found Partly Responsible

Injuries suffered by Zenon
Beaulieu when a spruce beer bottle exploded and sprayed him with glass and spruce beer, were partly his own fault and partly the fault of his employer, the keeper of the restaurant where the accident occurred, Mr. Justice Rheame decided in the Superior Court yesterday.

Beaulieu had sued his employer,
Olivier Harel, for $5,556.55 as a result of his injuries, which he considered had reduced his earning capacity to the extent of 35 per cent. His Lordship held both parties at fault. The restaurant keeper, he noted, had been warned that the spruce beer should be kept on ice but had neglected the precautions and kept it on a table at the rear of the restaurant, at the ordinary room temperature.

On the other hand, the employe knew of the dangers inherent in spruce beer and should have kept at a distance. His Lordship believed. As employer and employe were equally at fault, His Lordship divided the damage of $900 equally between them. Accordingly the employe will get $450.

By GEOFFREY HEWELCKE

SCHOOLBOYS — schoolgirls give up their Saturday morning holidays to take in some more schooling in Montreal! They don't have to do this. They're not forced to go to Saturday School. And yet they do just this incredible thing.
They go to school because they like it!

Where? What kind of school?

Well, it's a kind they don't find anywhere else in Montreal. It is the school in Art Appreciation, in drawing, in painting, and in modelling conducted by the Art Association of Montreal in the Sherbrooke street Art Gallery.

The school is something new. It started last November when Dr.
C. F. Martin, former Dean of Medicine at McGill, took charge of the Art Gallery as new president. Other museums in other cities are running classes to develop talent among their local youngsters.

"Why shouldn't we do the same thing here?" Dr. Martin asked.
And so when he campaigned among the generous citizens of Montreal for money last year to renovate the Art Gallery and Museum, he campaigning also for money to spread knowledge and appreciation of art among the school children of this city.

Junior League Helped

He found two "angels" for his idea. The Carnegie Foundation gave him a grant to start the teaching of drawing and painting.
The Junior League of Montreal offered to pay for the clay modelling. Further, the League offered to send up six of its members every Saturday forenoon to help in the various classes.

Then Dr. Martin asked the principals of 40 schools in Montreal to recommend a couple of students for each school who were really interested in drawing, painting or modelling and to tell these boys and girls that they could have free tuition in these subjects at the Art Gallery—provided they were willing to give up their free Saturday forenoon for this purpose.

This accounted for nearly 100 boys and girls, who were given something equivalent to a scholarship for the winter season. Members of the Art Association of Montreal who have children of school-age enrolled several others.

Four Score Drawing!

The two instructresses are Miss Anne Savage, who talks on art subjects and takes charge of classes in drawing and painting, and Miss Ethel Seath, who conducts the class in modelling.

I had a look at the school last Saturday.

There were four-score children sprawled on the floors of the three big studios on the top floor of the Art Gallery. Some were painting, some were drawing. The boys in two of the studios favored horses and ships at sea. The girls seemed to favor houses and landscapes.

"No," said Miss Savage, "they don't use easels. They're not easel people yet. They're children and children should learn as they play.
And the floor is the place for playing."

"But these horses and ships," the reporter said, "I don't see any models for them to draw from."

"There aren't any," Miss Savage said. "We're trying to develop their own creative qualities. We're ination. To draw as well as they can, and naturally we help them when they run into something that asking them to draw out of imag-they don't quite know how to handle by themselves."

Gee! This is Fun!

Then while The Star photographer was scrambling about a high ledge, trying to get pictures that would include the whole class, Miss Savage delivered a little lecture to the reporter.

"You see we try to stimulate the imaginations of the children," she said. "For instance we showed them pictures of animals and then we had Dr. Porter come and speak to them about life in the tropics. He showed them a movie and they saw what palms were like and what tropical vegetation was like.

"Then we asked them to draw pictures about the Garden of Eden and later to make little models in clay of animals..."

I wandered off into a corner and collected a small boy who was painting a scarlet ship against a cobalt sea.

"Do you mind giving up your Saturday morning for this?" I asked.

"Gee," he said. "Gosh, what a question? Say," he spread a large and gorgeous gob of red upon the ship's hull, "this is fun!"

Colors used by the youngsters are a little strong. That's natural enough. Children like strong colors.
And then their palettes made up of cupcake molds, stamped, eight at a time, into a plate of tin, and these do not permit them to mix their colors at all.

But while their pictures have the colors of circus posters they have very much more to them than the idle paint splashes of other youngsters. For in each case the painter has some talent to begin with and even in play the intent to produce a good picture is serious.

One Score Modelling

And so to my most untutored eye the bad drawing, the vivid colors appeared to be little different from exhibitions of ultra modern impressionists that I have seen. And, after all, impressionism is precisely the right term for the type of work that these children are producing.
—Their impressions of animals and films and lectures on the tropics, all woven into a Garden of Eden scene created by their own imaginations.

Upstairs there were 80 boys and girls at work in play. Down in the basement of the Art Gallery another group of 20 girls was engaged in modelling.

"We can't give them quite as much time in modelling as in drawing and painting," Miss Ethel Seath, instructress in clay, told me. "For one thing they need more individual attention when they're modelling, and so the group is smaller."

"Now this group here," she continued, "is having its third session
in modelling."

The photographer was getting clay on his trousers while I poked about. On a long, wide bench there were a number of clay figures completed by this class in its two previous lessons.

From across the room one squat, stooped figure caught my eye. It was one of the big apes. The hands swung low. The chest muscles bulged. The head was stooped as the beast was frozen in lurching stride.

Trial and Error

When I came closer I saw that most of what I had seen was suggestion. The figure was roughly modeled. Very roughly. It was unfinished. It was the work of a youngster who had had two lessons in modelling! Only two!

Near these were grouped clay figures already finished by the group now having its third lesson.
Some were bad. Some were mediocre. Some were surprisingly good with feeling for action and feeling for form. And in any event these children with three lessons behind them had already advanced to a further stage in finishing off their models.

"Say," said the photographer,
"these things are good, eh?"

"You've got clay on your pants,"
I whispered.

"Sez you," he said. "Look at your own."

I looked I had clay on mine too.

"We're saving some of these figures," Miss Seath said as I was brushing myself. "Naturally the youngsters just made a mess of the clay the first time they tried their hands at modelling. By the time the second lesson came around they did better. They're still improving."

"You're saving them, for what?"
I asked. "To let the children take them home?"

"No," she said. "Sometime in April we're going to hold an exhibition of the work done by the children. We're going to show the pictures and the clay figures, too."

"I'll be around to see them," I promised.

Dividends in Offing

Then class was over, and I went to see Dr. Martin.

"Some of the children miss the odd session," he told me. "Some of them catch colds just like other children, and so they have to stay away. But we haven't had any of them dropping out of the group.
They come back."

"And could you handle more of them?" I asked.

"Not at present," he said. "We have many more applicants than we can teach. Next fall—well, I've hopes of increasing the numbers.
Of course, money is always the problem. But I think I can raise some more of that because it seems evident that the children are getting something out of it. And so the Art Gallery is really doing something for Montreal."

"And we do want the Art Gallery to be a living force in this city."

Former Fire Station Now Houses Modern Verdun Art, Trade School

Gazette, 16.3.38

Known to residents of Verdun for some years as the No. 2 Fire Station, a building at the intersection of Verdun and Osborne Avenues has been remodelled completely and during the present winter has housed, in two classrooms and a workshop, 23 day pupils. The project is a Government one, and is known as the School of Arts and Trades of Verdun.

In addition to the 23 day pupils who are giving their full time to the learning of various arts and trades there are also 175 pupils attending the night classes that have been held at the school all winter, and which are coming to a close next week.

The time, space and equipment spent on the night classes will then be devoted to a group who have been selected under the Dr. Webster psychology tests of the Rogers-Bilodeau plan. This group were tested at the Southwestern branch of the Y.M.C.A.

Although rightly speaking there are but two classrooms and the machine shop in the building, these rooms are spacious and in fact the pupils use the entire building with the exception of the tower, which is still employed by the Verdun Fire Department for the drying of hose.

It is planned to enlarge the building next year, if money is forthcoming from the Government for the project, and Mayor Herve Ferland has stated that he is reasonably certain that the authorities will provide the necessary funds for the additions. It is possible that the renovations and additions will begin this summer. Additions are being planned to include a machine shop, a welding shop and a blacksmith shop. Investigation into the various industries has proven that these three trades are the ones in which properly-trained apprentices are most likely to find gainful employment.

At present the curriculum is divided into three general headings: Mathematics, science and shops. The teachers are H. Therrien, in charge of the mathematical work and mathematical drawing; Richard Dolan, in charge of the science branch and Georges Jacques who is in charge of the shops. In addition English is taught by A. T. Barnes and French by P. Gingras.

The boys have made their own desks and stools and other articles for the building, and for their homes, and are very proud of the fact that they recently received a Government order for a quantity of stools for the newly-opened Art and Trade School in Maisonneuve.

The boys are also taught physics and chemistry, and the science room contains a some modern apparatus and equipment for the teaching of these subjects.

ART OBJECTS SEEN IN LANTERN SLIDES

Works of Many Civilizations Described to Guild by Cleveland Morgan

Gazette—16.3.38

Objects of art produced by many civilizations were shown through lantern slide projection and described yesterday by Cleveland Morgan, when he addressed the Woman's Guild of Christ Church Cathedral on "Some Treasures from the Museum of the Art Gallery," at a meeting in the parish house. Mr. Morgan closed his lecture with an example of present-day art, a piece of Swedish glass, commenting that this age is so rich in meaning that no survey of the world's art should be restricted to the older forms. Egypt probably may claim to have been the first country to make glass, said the lecturer, who showed an ointment bottle dating about 1500 B.C. Next he showed a libation cup which he said was probably made in Alexandria in the first century A.D. Of slightly later date was an example of Coptic embroidery bearing a mummy portrait.

Examples of Greek art beginning with earlier forms reflecting the influence of the Minoan and Mycenaean civilizations, led up to works of the age of Pericles. Bronzes from Central Asia dating somewhere between 1500 and 500 B.C.—the exact period being unknown—were shown, these, Mr. Morgan pointing out, having much in common with Assyrian art. A bronze buckle from Siberia, dating about 250 to 300 B.C., showed strong Chinese influence.

Among objects of Chinese art depicted on the screen was a tombstone of the Han dynasty, and a painting, said to be original, from the Tang dynasty. A teapot, an example of the first known porcelain was seen, and a painting on silk of the time of Kublai Khan, when Marco Polo visited China. Early Japanese painting and a jar and bowl used in the tea ceremony were shown in slides.

A Cambodian head of Buddha from Angkor, when that city equalled imperial Rome in size and splendor, was displayed. Mr. Morgan pointed out that the deserted cities of Cambodia, overgrown by jungle, are now being excavated by the French Government.

Examples of ancient Indian and Persian art, Damascus glass were described. An illuminated vellum showed an evangelist writing his gospel. The slides also included a piece of stained glass of the 13th century which Mr. Morgan believed from his own investigation to have come from the church of St. Germain des Pres, in Paris. Of the same period was a Limoges enamel, and an ivory crucifixion of the 14th century, with other examples of French work were included. An English 17th century chalice, a silver tankard of the time of Charles II, and other English works were exhibited.

Mr. Morgan also showed views of Aztec art.

Mrs. Gordon MacDougall introduced Mr. Morgan and Mrs. W. B. Scott thanked him. Later a play performed by girls of the W.A. was attended by the guild members.

Ernest Newman Speaks On Painting of Goya

Goya's effect on painting was great, said Ernest Newman, speaking on the Spanish painter at the Art Association yesterday afternoon, but his effect on painters spiritually was even greater. In painting he furthered a more direct, more fluid method of working. On the artists that have followed him, Goya has given an encouragement, a knowledge that the use of "a little vinegar or acid" was more conducive to good work than the addition of syrup or eau de Cologne.

Mr. Newman gave an appreciation of the painter's work and briefly sketched his career. In 1746, Goya was born in Spain of poor parents. He was taught by Martinez. At the age of 18, he went to Madrid, and after that he went to France, where he met, among others, the painter David. He became a pupil of Bayeu, and later his son-in-law. This led him to the Court of Spain, then under the rulership of Charles IV.

Illustrating his talk with slides of Goya's paintings, Mr. Newman pointed out that the vulgarity was the vulgarity of the sitter rather than that of the painter, giving in contrast to this a certain modern instance. First making amusing comments on the sitters, the speaker then turned to the technical side of these paintings. He pointed out the beauty of Goya's painting of light. It had, he found, a shimmering, delicate, elusive quality. It was that quality that has been described as the "lost and found quality." There was no effort to emphasize the sculptural effect in a picture.

Mr. Newman then turned his attention, and that of his audience, to the etchings. He said that in his opinion Goya stood second in the trinity of etchers—Rembrandt, Goya and Whistler.

Mr. Newman closed his lecture with a discussion of the famous 'Caprichos,' commenting that he felt that his audience were sufficiently steeled by newsreels of present-day Spanish horrors to be able to appreciate these aquatints, of which it has been said "after these colors comes blood."

Harold Beament, A.R.C.A. Shows Haunts of Eskimo at Watson's

Gazette

Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., who intrigued picture-lovers with his picture of the Far North—"Utakijut" (The Waiting Ones) at the R.C.A. show here last November, has a series of small paintings of the same region in the exhibition of his work being held in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west. These paintings done when he went north for annual training on H.M.S. Scarborough, are marked by a rhythmic swing in design, and are much more agreeable in color than some that Jackson brought back from a trip to those regions. Beament finds in that country much to interest him in the bare, massive cliffs, generally well rounded at their tops, and succeeds in suggesting their volume. He is happy, too, in the placing of incidental figures, and if the Eskimos and their setting do sometimes suggest Rockwell Kent, it merely proves that both must be faithful recorders. Even with blue skies and bluer sea, the country is not hospitable—barren, treeless and vast, it makes one wonder why the Eskimo finds so much to laugh about.

In this group is the original sketch for "The Waiting Ones," the larger work now being in the Ontario Society of Artists' show in Toronto, and a number of engaging, confidently handled sketches of rocky shores, inlets and grim cliffs—"Wolstenholme"; "Nain, Labrador"; "Northern Lights, Baffin Land," with iceberg, rocks and a spirited display of "lights"; "Ice About, Nain, Labrador," with bold rocks and rolling, barren hills, with spiked ice piercing the water; "Settlement on Hudson Strait," stark cliffs, snow, and houses dotted along the shore; "Sunrise, Labrador," with the sun swinging up behind a massive mountain. There are, too, a portrait of an Eskimo mother and her child, and an impressive "Labrador Landscape."

From the chill of these scenes, the picture-lover can turn to the sun-flooded "Porto Rico Rhythm," with massive trees, the thatch of huts gleaming and a glimpse of blue water; and "West Indian Diving Boys" in boats or in the water, shadowed by the steamer, from the deck of which the sketch was made. It will be recalled that this painter found much congenial material in the old windmills, men sorting sponges or women washing linen in streams, when he painted, in this region.

Sunlight in this Dominion also interests him, as in "Otter Lake," with its green hill, with patches of bare rock, and a summer sky with clouds; another version of the subject being set down in June. House and barns, with the sprawling blue bulk of Mont Tremblant he found congenial in "St. Jovite," and he shows St. Sauveur with its sunlit hills glowing in summer green. The autumn season at Piedmont has furnished good subjects, but he cannot quite kill his weakness for winter.

Scott's Art Auction Set for Windsor Hotel

Gazette—19.3.38

The sale of works at auction, which had been planned by W. Scott & Sons, following disposal of their gallery property on Drummond street, to take place in the Ball Room of the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, has now been set for the York Room of the Windsor Hotel, on the dates originally announced.

Since this long-established art firm—of which Frank Heaton, who retired from active participation in 1932 due to ill-health, is a partner—does not leave its premises until May 1, it is planned to place on display in its galleries the works later to be auctioned. These will be on view on March 28 and 29, from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., and on the succeeding two days the exhibition will be open until 10 p.m. for inspection and private sale.

The auction sale will be held at the Windsor Hotel, Friday night, April 1, and Saturday afternoon, April 2, and Saturday afternoon, April 9.

a stretch of snowcovered hilly country, barns and houses and a road with a sleigh. "Clear weather, late winter," with a shadowed house in the foreground, open water, a steel bridge and distant hills carries a hint that the spring break-up is near. "Laurentian Thaw" has a picturesque wooden bridge, open water, reflections, hill and spruces, and "Sunny Day, Piedmont" has a good sun-shot sky, houses, barns and skiers. In "The End of the Line, Huberdeau," with its fence and snowy hill, the painter tries to find something comely in a water tank and railroad tracks.

It is an interesting exhibition and reveals a painter of versatility. St. G. B.

French Paintings On Exhibit at Eaton's

Gazette—19.3.38

Works by Better Known Contemporary Artists Included in Varied Collection

Examples of contemporary French painting are on view in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. The selection offers variety, but some of the works bring back disturbing memories—J. A. Muenier's portrait of Marshal Foch, standing before his desk, with a map of operations as a background; Charles Fouqueray's, "Douaumont Retaken, October 24, 1916"; Georges-Paul Leroux's "The Combatants, 1914-1918", Poilus, troops from France's colonies, tanks, horsemen, dogs—three competently painted pictures to add to the "jitters" news from Europe gives you.

But they are not all martial in spirit. Jean-Gabriel Domergue with "Cafe in Montparnasse"—figures at a table and a girl in a print dress and green feathered boa—drives all thought of carnage out of your mind. Death in less heroic form is possible in the bus and motor traffic in "Rue de Rome and Gare St. Lazare" by Jean Lefort.

By Henri LeSideran is "Venetian Canal" with moonlit buildings, mooring posts and a gondola in water atremble with reflections. Maurice Lobre shows the rich appointments of "Salon d'Hercule, Palais de Versailles," and Henri Montassier, in "Intimacy," shows a woman resting on a sofa, a foxterrier curled up nearby, in a dimly lighted room.

Bernard Boutet de Monvel in "Winter" has a formally arranged shuttered building, bare trees and an old woman with stick in the formal garden. Raoul du Gardier shows blazing sunlight, native canoes in the still water behind the reef, palms on the shore and a seated nude woman—a scene on Oualan Island, Carolines. Strong sunlight is well suggested in "The Hay Harvest, Ile de France," by Pierre Montezin, and there are fine greys in the shore scene, with houses and ships, done by Paul Monchain at Treboul in Brittany. Rich reds are the dominant notes in "Young Girl Sewing," by Henri Lebasque, and Pierre Luc-Rousseau, well suggests the fragility of the blooms in his flower piece. "Young Bather"—a girl swimming breast-stroke, is a capably painted work signed by Paul Chabas, who, long an artist of ability, only became widely known when American prudens insisted on pasting little garments on the reproductions of his famous "September Morn." "The Adversaries," by Hugues de Beaumont, is a human document—a country notary, and a woman in widow's weeds near by, apparently being exasperated by a country woman and a doltish looking man. They all seem bent on getting "their rights."

There are many interesting things in this collection of 47 works, and the exhibition remains open until March 26.

Following this—opening March 28 and lasting until April 9—there will be an exhibition of flower paintings by Alberta Cleland and Mrs. Lillian Hingston, of Montreal, and Beatrice Robertson, of Toronto.

Present plans call for an exhibition of paintings by Andre Morency, April 11-23.

On With the New

Montreal's new coat-of-arms, which officially comes into use today.

Star NEW CIVIC CREST COMES INTO USE

Old Coat-of-Arms Disappears After 106 Years Of Service

Montreal blossoms out in all the glory of a new heraldic coat-of-arms today.

Experts having declared that the old coat-of-arms was not properly designed, the new one has been devised and becomes official today. But Good Friday is a public holiday, so the seal will not be used for the first time until tomorrow.

The old coat-of-arms, in use since 1832, was an oval shield crossed diagonally. The new crest is a proper shield, bearing a St. George's cross instead of the Cross of St. Andrew and, in the four quarters, a rose, shamrock, thistle and fleur de lys. The fleur de lys was not shown in the old crest. The whole is surmounted by a beaver "couchant" and surrounded by a garland of maple leaves.

MOTTO RETAINED

The motto, Concordia Salus, has been retained.

With the adoption of the new crest it will be necessary to change buttons on policemen's and firemen's uniforms, and new stationery will have to be printed with the new coat-of-arms on it. Identity card stationery and cards will be the first to use the redesigned crest.

Eric Goldberg Shows Paintings at Scott's

Montreal Painter Reveals Subtle Color Harmonies in Oils and Watercolors

Eric Goldberg, who some nine years ago held a show of his work in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal, is now holding an exhibition of his oils and watercolors in the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, 1490 Drummond street. This collection, the last to be shown in these galleries, the property having been sold, should be of marked interest to those who admire the moderately advanced note in art. The artist has ideas and the technical equipment to present them, and it is true to say that those who appreciate his art like it very much, and that those who are indifferent will, keeping an open mind, probably find a latent charm that escapes them at first sight. There is much subtlety in his harmony of tones and refinement in the treatment of the figures, in such works as "The Kindergarten"—children at a wall overlooking water; "The Window" with a woman looking out, and another peering through a window; "Roof Garden," and Terrace. "Road to Avignon," with cart ascending the winding thoroughfare, and "Jerusalem," a mass of white buildings on a hill, are interesting, and his portrait sketch of Elaine Robinson in a red sweater, capably captures the youth of his sitter. There is dignity, too, in "Rose Sweater," the portrait of a blonde woman.

Among his watercolors, to which medium he is sympathetic, there are some flower pieces of engaging arrangement, form and tone—roses, tulips, hyacinths, daffodils, which are handled with attention to individual characteristics of the blooms, and some very effective harmonies have been attained.

In marked contrast to "St. Tropez," with its basin, shipping and distant mountains, done in an almost precise manner, are "On the Road, St. Donat," and a group of watercolors done at Ste. Agathe, "Wooden Bridge," with a girl crossing it; a man fishing from a bridge; and a series of bathers lolling about the shore near bathhouses. There is imagination in these scenes, and it must be accepted at once that arrangement and tone, rather than reproducing the atmosphere of this Laurentian resort, interested the painter.

The exhibition remains on view until April 23.

Artist Here Painting Sovereign by Memory

Gazette—28.3.38

Portrait painting by a sort of remote control system is what Montreal's prominent artist, Richard Jack, R.A., will be engaged in for the next month or two. Having come back to Canada, after a lengthy European stay—he arrived at Halifax Friday in the Canadian Pacific liner Duchess of Richmond—Mr. Jack will go to work on a portrait of Leopold, King of the Belgians, which he started some time ago in London.

It was erroneously reported to the press by friends of the painter recently that this portrait had been completed. Met by reporters when he arrived here Saturday night in the boat train from Halifax, Mr. Jack admitted he had only started the painting and that he had brought the canvas back to Canada with him. In due course he will return to Europe to complete the work but until then he will put the finishing touches on such lesser matters as background and minor details.

On his return to Europe Mr. Jack will arrange sittings with King Leopold and the characterful face of the Belgian ruler will be reproduced on canvas by one of Canada's most masterful brushes.

Just how long the job would take Mr. Jack could not say. "It's not a thing you can promise for half-past-five next Thursday," he said with a smile.

J. SMITH, PAINTER, INTERRED TODAY

Injuries Suffered Last Christmas Are Fatal
Star At Toronto 28.3.38

TORONTO, March 28.—(C.P.)—Funeral services for Joshua Smith, 58, internationally famous portrait painter, were held in Toronto today. He died in hospital here Saturday after an illness of several months.

Injured in an automobile accident at Christmas he seemed on the way to recovery when complications set in. He was operated on last week and never rallied.

A resident of Toronto for 19 years, Mr. Smith first won fame as a painter of miniature. English-born, he painted in what is known as the traditionally academic style of the British school with subdued color and fine detail.

His greatest distinction was gained in 1917 when he was commissioned to do an oil painting of the late King George V. This portrait was given the place of honor at the Royal Academy Exhibition that year. Other outstanding portraits by Mr. Smith include Lord Byng of Vimy, Sir William Mulock, retired Chief Justice of Ontario, and the late Sir Henry Thornton. A painting that Mr. Smith did of the late Robert Norwood hangs in King's College, Halifax. Dr. Norwood was a noted Canadian clergyman and poet.

Mr. Smith also won fame as a painter of children and his works have been consistently shown at the Canadian National Exhibition since 1920.

He was made a member of the Royal Society of British artists in 1914 and before coming to Canada five years later numbered many prominent Britons among his patrons.

He is survived by his widow, Ray Lewis, Toronto poetess and writer, and one son, James. Three sisters and three brothers, all in England, also survive. His ancestors on his mother's side were related to Israeli.

Spring Show Opens with Cut Of 276 Works Against 1937

Jury of Selection Wields Critical Axe at Art Gallery—Private View Inaugurates
55th Exhibition

"Somewhere a Voice is Calling" runs the old song—and the action probably holds good respecting many voices—calling the Jury of Selection unkind names. In the 55th Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, which opened with a private view for members in the Sherbrooke street galleries last night, the total of exhibits is 203. Last spring there were 479. This obviously means that there were quite a few rejections, and plenty of disappointments.

The Jury of Selection and Hanging Committee—and this is no secret, for the list prefaces the catalogue—was composed of the following: F. S. Coburn, R.C.A.; Clarence A. Gagnon, R.C.A.; Henri Hebert, R.C.A.; Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A.; Mrs. Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A.; Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A.; Orson Wheeler, and P. Roy Wilson, A.R.C.A. It is not reported whether these painters and sculptors have had to plug their telephones.

The result of this strict winnowing of works submitted, is a more companionable sort of show and one easier to look at. With few exceptions, there are no paintings above "the line." The entries from individual artists have been materially reduced, so that the works have been confined to the central and east galleries, the small black and white room, and the old water-color gallery, which houses all examples in that medium. The architectural exhibits find a place in the room usually used for Japanese prints, and the sculpture, displayed on freshly painted stands, is in the west gallery, with the important paintings of the permanent collection.

The paintings are well displayed, the neutral walls and improved lighting being eminently fair to the artists, and, despite the smaller show, there has been an open mind in selection—those who regard the academic as obsolete and are trying new trails have representation.

This step, boldly taken, promises well for the future in raising the standard of work submitted—the painter will concentrate on producing the few good, against the indifferent many, moreover, there is now the chance to remember what has been seen.

Portraiture is well represented, Alphonse Jongers, A.R.C.A., sending four—Dr. Charles F. Martin, in academic robe, with a luscious red high color note; Air Vice-Marshal W. A. Bishop, V.C., in air force uniform with his decorations; Vicomte Roger de Roumefort, in a soft hat and fur coat; and Mrs. Howard Pillow in a black fur coat and tam-like hat. They are all painted with this artist's customary ability, Adam Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., has a work of dignity and fine quality in "Anne," dressed in rich green with black cloak, holding a purse. The figure is well placed and painted with confidence. His other work is a portrait of W. M. Birks, true to the subject, in a gown with facings of a lovely blue. Manly MacDonald, A.R.C.A., sends a portrait of a seated woman, and F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., has imparted a convincing impression of movement to his "Portrait of a Dancer." Her dress embellished with large orange blooms sounds a rich color note and the glint on her silver sandals, bespeaks close observation and skill in rendering texture. Agnes Lefort has an engaging work in "La Femme au Divan Bleu," capably arranged and well painted, and T. R. MacDonald, besides the portrait of an artist in a smock, is successful with his ambitious "Girl in Blue." Stanley Royle, A.R.C.A., reveals character in Dr. George J. Trueman, president of Mount Allison University, and mention must be made of Kathleen Carswell's self-portrait, which is distinctly promising; Thelma M. Carter's portrait of a woman; Marion M. Hawthorne's portrait of a man; "Margaret" by Robert Sharps; "Elizabeth Reads in Bed," by Freda Pemberton Smith; "Immigrant Girl," in blue shawl, by Leslie Smith; the wistful "Little Jean," by Norah L. Smyth; and the confidently brushed in "Isobel," by Elaine Johnson. Paul Caron revels in the richly embroidered dress of a Chinese girl writing on a pad, and Aleksandre Bercovitch shows a crisply handled pastel of a girl, called "Ninel."

Landscapes, as ever, occupy important place, and Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., besides a winter scene—tree edged stream with patch of open sunlit water, called "The Frozen Pool," returns to the scene of some of his earlier successes—the harbor. In "Thin Ice" he shows a typical barge, under snow, about to be freed from the ice that has kept it prisoner during the winter. It is painted with a free stroke and is marked by a sound sense of atmosphere. Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., shows a stretch of autumn bush rising to noble blue mountains, a glimpse of spruce-edged lake, and, in the foreground, a farmer ploughing. This important canvas entitled: "October Ploughing, St. Agnes, P.Q." is the property of the Quebec Museum. It is from all angles a satisfactory performance. Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., sticks to the city for his inspiration—traffic on Bleury street, at St. Catherine, with hurrying pedestrians, man slipping on sidewalk, dogs and figures crossing street, and a tobacconist's shop with sign that should gladden the hearts of the manufacturers of a popular brand of cigarette. This canvas is called "La Rue. Soir."

His other work is "Le Marche"—the low-level bit of market adjacent to the Chateau de Ramezay, with sleighs and horses, the buildings across Jacques Cartier Square, a winter subject seen under the light of early morning sun.

E. H. Holgate, R.C.A., gives us a collection of snow-covered buildings, a figure, and a distant rounded hill, in "Lazy Snow," his other offerings being "Little Nude" and "A Study." Paul Caron shows typical horse and sleigh and distant sun-lit buildings, in "Upper Seigneurs Street, Montreal." Berthe DesClayes has a timely subject in her work called "In a Sugar Bush, Rougemont," and Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., paints his usual capable sky over church, buildings and hills in "New England Village." Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., shows another scene from the Far North in "Departure for the Hunt"—Eskimos putting out in their native craft, while women and dogs watch. The grim, rocky headlands are rendered with convincing bulk. Lorne Holland Bouchard has painted a fine stretch of country, with buildings in a view of Douglas-town, P.Q., and there is weight to the rocky peak in A. Cloutier's "Cap a l'Original, Winter." Marc A. Fortin has plenty of air in "April Shadows"—noble elm, houses and distant hills, but the very freely rendered horse and cart is disturbing. Of his watercolors, he succeeds with "Les Eboulements Landscape." Harry Hood, of Vancouver, is effective in "The Red Fence," which edges land and mill, and Elizabeth V. Kemp has a spirited oil, called "Hay Cart."

Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A., shows her usual broad touch in "Morin Heights, Que."—a winter scene with road descending to house, and distant hills, and Graham N. Norwell shows strength in his snow-covered hills, spruce and birch, near a stream, called "Winter." Eric Riordon sees the beauty of far-flung shadows on snow in "Afternoon Sun, near Ste. Adele," and Thurstan Topham in "Evening, Lac Croche, Chapeau Club"—men in a canoe fishing, with a big one "on," has a scene that will make the angler consult the calendar for the open season.

Paul S. Andrew has a street scene in low tones and Louise M. Allison in "Beach, Nova Scotia," shows good arrangement in her beached boats. Mary D. Bagley in "Trente de Beloeil"—cross and house in a field, shows a watercolor of good quality, and, in this medium Kent De Conde reveals a vigorous touch and clean wash in "Laurentian Mountains, Huberdeau." Joseph Dreany shows nice boldly handled watercolors in "Olan's Mill" and "The Brick Factory." Arline Genereux uses this medium for "In An Old Quarter of Quebec City," and Harry E. G. Ricketts reveals his usual free wash in "Roadside Farm," a winter scene with capably put in figures. Goodridge Roberts is individual in "Road in Sunlight," while the habitual fine drawing and good design mark Pont Valente, Cahors, the watercolor by P. R. Wilson, A.R.C.A. Ronald Kerr, in "Suburban Winter Scene," shows buildings in winter as seen from a sun porch, and Jean Langlois has a winter landscape called "Dimanche Matin, Rigaud." Paintings of flowers include works by Alberta Cleland, well drawn, nicely arranged and true in tone; Nora F. E. Collyer, with "Cyclamen"; Moira Drummond with "Kafir Lily"; Marion M. Hawthorne, with "White Azalea"; Beulah Jaenicke, with "Daffodils"; Jean Pierce, with a freely handled arrangement of gay blooms; Nancy Greenleese Rhind, with "Peonies" and "Zinnias"; Sarah M. Robertson, with a sketch of petunias; Jack F. Ross, with "Calendulas"; and F. O. Call with "Phlox," which shows steady progress by this painter.

Jack Beder goes back to night life in a well arranged and harmoniously colored crowd at tables watching a Negro orchestra in a big work, done in tempera, called "Cabaret." It is an ambitious undertaking and a record of the times.

R. W. Major is successful with "The Croaking Frog," a decorative panel, with girl sprawled at the edge of a stream, bananas nearby for refreshment, and a variety of exotic vegetation. It is well arranged and attains its aim.

Others exhibiting are John Bishop, Maude B. Blachford, P.E. Borduas, Miller Brittain, Mrs. Gertrude M. Burgoyne, Mrs. Lorna Burgoyne, St. George Burgoyne, Mrs. Chitta Caiserman, J. R. Clark, Sybil Covicy, Marie Davis, J. M. Donnell, Ruth M. Elliott, Louise Gadois, Albert Goodstone, Anthony C. Law, Jean Paul Lemieux, Mabel Lockerby, A. A. MacDonald, Harriet F. M. Weston, A.R.C.A., F. Wiselberg, Lillie Yane, and J. LeRoy Zwickler.

Those contributing to the architecture section are Richard E. Bolton and Norton A. Fellowes, Noel Chipman, A.R.I.B.A., Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford, Robert and F. R. Findlay, M. M. Kalman, Lawson and Little, Spencer and Mathias, C. R. Tetley, F.R.I.B.A., Wilson and Auld, P. R. Wilson, A.R.I.B.A., A.R.C.A.

The Spring Art Exhibition.

To the Editor of The Gazette:—

Sir,—It had been reported that the Selection Committee for the Spring Exhibition of the Montreal Art Association had been unusually severe this year, so that one could expect a display, perhaps smaller than usual, but certainly of super-excellence. As one who is not an artist, but who has studied art for over forty years, I visited this exhibition, and regret to say that never, anywhere, have I seen such a meagre and poor display. There are some works, outstanding for their excellence, Jongers' portraits of Mrs. Pillow, and Air Marshal Bishop; Sherriff Scott's of "Anne" and Wm. Birks, Esq.; Simpson's beautiful winter scenes; Pilot's "October Ploughing"; Coburn's "Dancer," Macdonald's "Girl in Blue" and some others. The watercolors, as a group, are very good, but one of the best is hung in a corridor. Apart from these, the general average is very low. There is an excess of small portraits, some with badly drawn arms and hands. One or two of the figure-paintings are pictures of figures roughly carved out of stone or wood, not of living beings. Easily, one could give specific examples of harshly-colored distortions. The prevailing school is modernistic, but certainly not modern.

Why was there nothing from Kenneth Forbes, Panabaker, DeBelle and others? Did they not think it worth while to send in, or did this wonderful jury reject them? The artists are not to blame for this lamentable display, because, I understand, the usual number of works of art were sent in, and Canadian artists have not suddenly degenerated in the last twelve months. At the 1937 exhibition there were 479 works of art of all kinds; at this one there are 203. Of oil painting and watercolors there were 323 exhibited in 1937, the usual number; at this one there are 128. This means that there are about two hundred pictures which would have been passed by the jury of a year ago, but which were rejected by this jury. Does this new board expect us to believe that the previous board would have made about 200 blunders in oil paintings and water-colors alone? A very brief inspection of the present exhibition shows that its blunders and mediocre works occur in groups.

The terrible thing is that among the rejected there must be about 40 professional artists who are doing good and sound work, but are not modernistic. These artists depend on their art for their living and on this exhibition for getting known. One of the principal functions of the Montreal Art Association should be to encourage the development of art of all kinds and schools; but in this exhibition it has not merely failed but done the reverse, as this happening will act as a profound discouragement to many artists of first-class talent. Of course, it is very evident that there is some over-bearing modernistic influence at work on or in the jury, trying to discourage and keep out all schools but its own. It is certain that, if this kind of thing is to continue, the Montreal Art Association can look forward to a series of dull, uninteresting and depressing exhibitions which will make it a laughing stock.

New Policy of Showing More Carefully Selected
Pieces Followed by Association

A new policy has been adopted by the Art Association of Montreal in its fifty-fifth Spring Exhibition which is open to the public from today. The selection of the pictures has been made much more strictly than ever before, and comparatively few of the works which were sent in have been accepted. This must have caused much grief to the many people whose work has been rejected, but it has resulted in a smaller and better exhibition, in which everything can be seen well and comfortably, and everything has some good claim to be shown.

MORE PORTRAITS

In consequence of the reduction of the exhibition, portraits and portrait studies are more conspicuous than usual. Outstanding among these are four by Alphonse Jongers, led by the portrait of Dr. Martin, Adam Sherriff Scott's large picture of "Ann," and the "Portrait Study" by F. S. Coburn; others are the sketches by Max Schulz and Elaine Johnson, Paul Caron's study in water color, Kathleen Carswell's self portrait, J. L. Zwicker's "Brodder Keeler" and Leslie Smith's "Immigrant Girl." Some of the more conspicuous landscapes, townscapes and outdoor scenes are the autumn landscape by Robert Pilot, winter scenes by Charles Simpson, a picture of spring by M. A. Fortin and others by W. J. Phillips, Wilfred Barnes, Graham Norwell and Adrien Hebert. Harold Beament's picture of Eskimos, R. W. Major's decorative panel, Jack Beder's crowd in a cabaret, and the flower pictures of Nancy G. Rhind, Moira Drummond and F. O. Call are among the others which demand attention.

Exhibitors of pictures in oil, water color and pastel are: Louise M. Allison, Paul S. Andrew, Mary D. Bagley, Wilfred M. FOUR SELECTIONS FROM THE "SPRING EXHIBITION"

Standard - March 19th, 1938.

Art Association's Spring Exhibition

PORTRAIT STUDIES ESPECIALLY GOOD; FEWER LANDSCAPES

TWO surprises await visitors to this year's Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal. The greater of these is the smallness of the exhibition, since the jury, a quite representative and impartial body, has, by thorough and careful selection, reduced the exhibits to not very much more than half of the number that has been shown in most recent years. Another surprise is that landscapes are far less conspicuous than usual. Many previous exhibitions have shown Canada as a country chiefly of landscape painters,—as indeed it has been; this year the selection of landscapes seems to have been specially thorough, and those that have reached the walls are relatively few but worthy.

Landscapes

One of the most striking landscapes is a fine arrangement of autumnal purples and blues in typical piece of Quebec scenery by Robert Pilot. C. W. Simpson has two good winter scenes, one a landscape, nearly all white, with very pale yellows and blues, the other a harbour picture, with a fine play of colors on broken ice. M. A. Fortin, with some good water colors, has a large oil picture, "April Shadows," which is quite one of his best,—a landscape with trees, freely designed and painted and with an effective, slightly formal, sky. Graham Norwell's sombre pastel of "Winter" is a telling study of snow in dull light; there are other good snow pictures by Berthe des Claves and A. Cloutier, and Ronald Kerr has got a true effect of light in a pastel of a snow street seen through windows. J. P. Weston's "Glencoe" is a rather formalized view of a lakeshore seen from a height at an uncomfortable angle; Wilfred Barnes has painted pleasant greens in New England, and there are fresh color and atmosphere in the pictures of Anthony

Law, Lorne H. Bouchard, Jean Langlois and Harry Hood. Adrien Hebert has two street scenes; the larger and more interesting has a very true study of winter grayness in Montreal. Harold Beament's "Departure for the hunt" is a convincing study of bleak northern landscape, full of Eskimo life. Several good outdoor pictures are among the water colors, some of the more notable being a fine sky by W. J. Phillips, Kent de Conde's Laurentian drawings, and those by Harry E. G. Rickets, Joseph Dreany and St. George Burgoyne.

Portraits

Portraits and portrait studies rather take charge of the exhibition and there are some particularly successful ones among them. Alphonse Jongers has four, one of which, the genial portrait of Dr. C. F. Martin, hangs in a central place to welcome visitors. The portrait of Mrs. Howard Pillow is a good picture, in which the painter seems to pay his respects to Holbein; that of the Vicomte de Roumefort is more broadly and vividly painted. A. Sheriff Scott's big full-length of

"Anne" stands well and makes a restful and dignified picture, well relieved by the flash of bright green of the dress. Stanley Royle has given somewhat more dignity than life to the President of Mount Allison University. F. S. Coburn's "Portrait of a dancer" stands out by its attractive arrangement of line and its fine color, but though the figure is dancing, it seems to show a pose rather than arrested movement. T. R. Macdonald's "Girl in blue" is a well painted full-length study, in which the clothes seem more important than their wearer. A clever and lively self-portrait is by Kathleen Carswell; Leslie Smith's "Immigrant girl" is an interesting color composition; LeRoy Zwicker's head of a negro against the bright light of a window, and Jean Paul Lemieux's study of a head in front of a wide landscape make unusual and successful pictures. Other good portrait studies are by Elaine Johnson, Max Schulz, Harriet F. M. Mathias, Freda Pemberton Smith and Agnes Lefort. Philip Surrey's so-called "Noumenal construction" is a figure of a woman who seems to be made of wood. An attractive study of a girl in a Chinese dress is a water color by Paul Caron.

Flowers

Flower pictures are not so many but as good as usual. Nancy Greenleese Rhind's "Peonies" is a very nice picture in tones of white with a little blue; Nora Drummond's "Kafir Lily" is strong and simple; there are good studies of flowers by Sarah Robertson, Alberta Cleland, Jean Pierce and F. O. Call, and of still life with flowers by Maurice G. Thomas. Mrs. Lorna Burgoyne has a little collection of miniatures.

Black and White

Work in black and white takes up no great space in this exhibition but is all interesting in one way or another. Some of the more notable exhibits are the drawings by Ernst Neumann, Frederick B. Taylor and Miller Brittain, a wood-cut in color by W. J. Phillips, Leonard Hutchinson's wood engravings and Elizabeth Kemp's etchings.

Sculpture

The sculpture section of these exhibitions generally consists chiefly of busts, and this exhibition follows custom. There are only fifteen exhibits, among which are a portrait of the late Suzor Cote by A. Laliberte, one of Warwick Chipman by Orson Wheeler, a negro's head by Agnes Fisher and H. M. Miller's "Retrospect," which are more particularly worth notice. These have all been placed in the western gallery. Architecture, represented by a quite small collection of drawings and photographs, is shown in the little room at the north corner of the galleries.

RESIDENTIAL WORK

(From Our Own Correspondent).

MONTREAL, Mar. 23. — Lack of customary quality and quantity, corresponding to the remainder of the hangings, is apparent in the section of Architecture at the fifty-fifth spring exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal at its Sherbrooke west galleries. Present shortcomings may be attributed to two recent architectural competitions, to the recent gold medal competition of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, possibly to increased working-plan activity in architectural offices. The exhibition opened last Thursday evening with a private viewing by members of the Association, and continues for the public through April 10.

Of particular interest in the section of Architecture are two photographs taken before and after alterations to the library in the home of R. E. Thorne by Noel Chipman, A.R.I.B.A. The importance to the public of this field of architecture has not been sufficiently emphasized in recent years. Mr. Chipman's work is suggestive of the increasingly important role of the architect in the improvement of present buildings, as well as in the design of new ones. Perspectives of a cottage at Ste. Agathe for B. M. Hallward and of the C. G. Bronson residence, with inset typical floor plans, are also exhibited by Mr. Chipman.

A perspective of a portion of the front elevation of Laird House, Town of Mount Royal, a modern apartment house, is the work of Richard E. Bolton and Norton A. Fellowes. The much admired residence of W. B. Converse on Queen Mary Road, the work of C. Reginald Tetley, F.R.I.B.A., is photographed and on display in the section. P. Roy Wilson, A.R.I.B.A., A.R.C.A., a member of the jury of selection and hanging committee, exhibits a perspective of his own recently built home in Westmount.

Photographs of two particularly interesting lighting fixtures at Douglas Hall, as well as photographs of houses at St. Sauveur and at Piedmont represent the office of Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford, Lawson and Little have a drawing of a proposed office building, and sketches of a country house and of the Stanley Stanger residence in Hampstead. A drawing of a thoroughly modern residence is prepared by Spence and Mathias.

Perspectives of residential work by Wilson and Auld are the L. C. McQuat residence at Ste. Marie and a stable and groom's house at Ste. Genevieve. Photographs of the southeast corner and of a distant view of the Murray Park pavilion, Westmount, portray the design of Robert and F. R. Findlay. Maxwell M. Kalman displays two perspective drawings of residences.

Among the oil paintings, water colors and pastels is a water color by P. Roy Wilson of Pont Valentre. However, visitors to the exhibition would do well to inspect the Alphonse Jongers portraits of Mrs. Howard Pillow, of Vicomte Roger de Roumefort, of Doctor Charles F. Martin and of Air Vice-Marshal Bishop.

THE MONTREAL SPRING EXHIBITION

Sir,—It had been reported that the Selection Committee for the Spring Exhibition of the Montreal Art Association had been universally severe this year, so that one could expect a display, perhaps smaller than usual, but certainly of super-excellence. As one who is not an artist, but who has studied art for over forty years, I visited this Exhibition, and regret to say that never, anywhere, have I seen such a meagre and poor display. There are some works outstanding for their excellence, Jongers' portraits of Mrs. Pillow, and Air Marshal Bishop; Sheriff Scott's of "Anne" and Wm. Birks, Esq.; Simpson's beautiful winter scenes; Pilot's "October Ploughing," Coburn's "Dancer," MacDonald's "Girl in Blue," and some others. The water-colours, as a group, are very good, but one of the best is hung in a corridor. Apart from these, the general average is very low. There is an excess of small portraits, some with badly drawn arms and hands. One or two of the figure-paintings, are pictures of figures roughly carved out of stone or wood, not of living beings. Easily, one could give specific examples of harshly-coloured distortions. The prevailing school is modernistic, but certainly not modern.

Why was there nothing from Kenneth Forbes, Panabaker, De Belle and others? Did they not think it worth while to send in, or did the jury reject them? The artists are not to blame for this lamentable display, because, I understand, the usual number of works of Art were sent in, and Canadian Artists have not suddenly degenerated in the last twelve months. At the 1937 Exhibition there were 479 works of art of all kinds: at this one there are 203. Of oil paintings and water colors there were 323 exhibited in 1937, the usual number: at this one there are 128. This means that there are about two hundred pictures, which would have been passed by the jury of a year ago, but which were rejected by this jury. Does this new board expect us to believe that the previous board would have made about 200 blunders in oil paintings and water colors alone? A very brief inspection of the present exhibition shows that its blunders and mediocre works occur in groups.

The terrible thing is that among the rejected there must be about 40 professional artists who are doing good and sound work, but are not modernistic. These artists depend on their art for their living and on this Exhibition for getting known. One of the principal functions of the Montreal Art Association should be to encourage the development of Art of all kinds and schools; but in this Exhibition it has not merely failed but done the reverse, as this happening will act as a profound discouragement to many artists of first class talent.

It is certain that, if this kind of thing is to continue, the Montreal Art Association can look forward to a series of dull, uninteresting and depressing exhibitions which will make it a laughing stock.

I. MORIN.

The Spring Exhibition.

To the Editor of The Gazette:
Sir,—The letter by Mr. I. Morin, under the above heading, published in your paper March 30, I quote in part: "One of the principal functions of the Montreal Art Association should be to encourage the development of art of all kinds and schools; but in this exhibition it has not merely failed, but done the reverse, as this happening will act as a profound discouragement to many artists of first class talent."

Perhaps Mr. Morin and many others are not cognizant of the fact that the Montreal Art Association gladly gives its galleries and time to these "Spring Exhibitions," but has nothing whatever to do with the selection of art works submitted; its only responsibility in this matter is the difficult yearly problem of securing a jury, who are artists themselves, so it is clear any complaints are the fault of the jury and not the Art Gallery. This year, apparently, there were more of the Modern School than of the Academic School, hence the result complained of. Under the present system of private financial support, the Art Association is doing miracles in spreading signification of the beautiful. If Mr. Morin is not a member of the Art Gallery I suggest he immediately join and so help the good cause.

Three Women Painters of Flowers Holding Exhibition at Eaton's Gazette April 2.38

Paintings of flowers by Beatrice Robertson, of Toronto, and Lillian Hingston and Alberta Cleland, of Montreal, hold the walls of the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and the show is attracting many local picture-lovers. It is a gay exhibition, and the painters being distinctly sympathetic to their subjects and able to express themselves, the collection escapes monotony. Obviously the flower painter loves color, and since the vivid hues of marigolds, zinnias and kindred bloom are opportunities that cannot be overlooked and are not the special preserve of anyone—you will see several examples of them. Though each of these painters has an individual manner of interpretation.

Mrs. Robertson is usually happy in her arrangements, true in color, and apparently finds plenty of enjoyment in the paintings of the urns and vases that hold the blooms. She succeeds, too, in surrounding her flowers with atmosphere, and shows skill in selecting the tones of her backgrounds.

Among the many effective examples shown, must be mentioned two circular canvases—one of phlox and the other of petunias. These are capital in arrangement and despite the marked difference in the character of forms, she has managed to make an effective pair. Her knowledge of flowers is evident in all she does—tulips in a green bowl; roses, pink, yellow and flame; marigolds in a green vase; gladioli white, yellow, crimson, scarlet and pink; gorgeous peonies in a white bowl; a spray of pink orchids; pink and white petunias; chrysanthemums; red and purple tulips; and yellow, red and pink zinnias, to mention a few.

All are set down with understanding, tell the truth about the flower, and satisfy a taste for color. The performance looks very simple, but only close study and plentiful practice bring that touch which suggests the fragility of petals in light and shadow.

Mrs. Hingston's work as a painter of flowers is well known to Montrealers—for years she has contributed to the shows of the Women's Art Society and other exhibitions. The beauty of the humbler blooms has not escaped her—trilliums in a blue bowl, early spring blossoms such as daffodils, narcissus and freesias. The contrast of white mallow and lupins has appealed, and she has boldly tackled a mass of blue hydrangea in a pot. Delphinium as well as sweet peas have given her opportunities, and she has made a successful arrangement of nasturtiums with a figured screen for a background. In "March Window" daffodils have been the favored flower on a sill, with a glimpse of buildings seen through the glass. In "Midsummer Window," in much the same setting, tulips and freesias are the blooms.

Miss Cleland shows a marked knowledge of flowers, though as a painter she has not confined her activities to this branch. Bright color appeals to her, and she finds it in zinnias alone in a jade jar, or in company with delphiniums. The varied hues of phlox present problems she likes to solve, and the peony is another flower to which she is partial. This painter is equally effective when she tackles masses of flowers—zinnias, from lemon to crimson, with larkspur as a foil. The painting of the bowls, vases and copper mugs is done with her accustomed skill.

The exhibition remains open until April 9.

Students Show Work At Art Association Gazette 2.4.38 Creditable Showing by Classes Under Direction of Adam Sheriff Scott, A.R.C.A.

Students of the Art Association classes, under the direction of Adam Sheriff Scott, A.R.C.A., are exhibiting their work in oils, water colors, charcoal and pencil in the Lecture Hall, and the collection contains a number of good things. A distinctly encouraging note is sounded in the more marked insistence on the importance of drawing. Those conversant with Mr. Scott's work as a portraitist, landscape and marine painter, will readily understand that sloppy line and scamped form cannot be condoned in his pupils, and, mercifully, there is an encouraging trend away from the free and easy, slipshod work that not so long ago, the world over, threatened to submerge really worth-while art. The diversion of efforts into right channels cannot be easy, but in the work on view there is ample evidence that the trends are sound and that the students are being solidly grounded.

As work by students, it is an attractive show. Talent is evident in much of the work, and in the balance there is indication that honest effort has been made.

Work in the beginner's and advance classes is shown, home work, color competition and the paintings. K. N. B. Carswell shows marked promise in a girl dressed in blue, and also her ability to handle water-color in a bold, free way, in a beach scene with boats, and a barn near a stream. Peggy Shaw, too, shows spirit in her figures in charcoal. Francoise Archambault and Sydney Steele reveal skill in the painting of marigolds, and B. K. Joudry sets down landscapes in a direct manner. F. Pagnuolo, among his items, has a good study of a room with chair and bookcase.

There are many other interesting items, but the absence of signatures makes it impossible to particularize.

LHERMITTE CANVAS SOLD ON $2,000 BID

Harvest Landscape Takes Top Price in Auction of W. Scott and Sons Gazette 2.4.38

Top price fetched last night at the opening session of the auction sale of oil paintings and water colors from the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, held in the York Room of the Windsor Hotel, was $2,000, for an example from the brush of the French painter, Leon Lhermitte—"The Gleaners." Opened at $1,500, the picture was successively bid up to that final selling price.

The auction is being continued this afternoon at 2 o'clock and again next Saturday afternoon at the same hour.

The Lhermitte canvas, flushed with warm sunlight, shows a harvest scene with grain in stacks, with a wagon being loaded in the background, while in the foreground women are retrieving grain overlooked.

In contrast to the prediction shown for this outdoor scene, was the moderately warm reception accorded a portrait of Sir John Sinclair, Bt., as a young man, by the famous Scottish artist, Sir Henry Raeburn. This oil opened at $500 with no immediate takers, was offered at $300 and then built up to the original $500 asking price.

A nude by the French painter, J. J. Henner, which started at $300, went to the final bidder for $500.

The example by Henri Harpignies, "The Valley," which when it came from the Sir James Murray collection sold from Christie's at $3,250, opened at $500 and was bid up to $750.

Two works by Frank Brangwyn, R.A.,—one called "The Game of Euchre," showing sailors playing cards on the deck of a ship, done in his earlier precise manner, and another, "The Chess Players," an Eastern scene, painted considerably later with a free, bold touch and rich, opulent color—did not receive the attention they deserved and both, opening at $300, were withdrawn.

Brangwyn, world famous as etcher, painter and mural designer, counts among his works the decorations for Rockefeller Center, New York.

A typical loch scene by Sir David Y. Cameron, R.A., opened at $200 and was sold for $350—a distinct find.

"Afterglow," by Sir John Lavery, R.A., a port scene with shipping under a cloudy sky, opened at $100 and sold at the moderate price of $150. "Fete Champetre," a signed oil on panel by the French painter, A. J. T. Monticelli, opened, at $300 and was sold for $525.

In the section of works by Canadian painters, "Maisons, Cuba," by J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., brought spirited bidding and finally went at $875. "Paysage," by the same artist, opened at $300 and went for $800. A nude, also by Morrice, an oil on panel, unsigned, opened at $50, dropped to $25 and was finally sold at $40. Three other Morrice paintings were disposed of—"Woman in Brown" at $175; "Washing Day" at $130; and "The Woman in the Gray Hat" for $250.

"Indian Encampment, Early Morning," an unsigned oil on canvas attributed to Paul Kane, opened at $150 and sold for $225.

Maurice Cullen's "Afternoon, Early Winter," sold for $150 and "The Bush Near Arthabaska," by A. Suzor-Cote, opened at $100 and went at $110.

The signed oil on canvas "Crossing the Ice, Quebec," by Cornelius Krieghoff, opened at $200 and sold for $450. Another signed canvas from the same brush—"Indians and Squaws, Winter,"—opened at $200 and was bid in at $425.

In the print section, which included etchings and mezzotints by artists recognized as masters in those media, there were some distinct bargains. Fraser Bros., Ltd., were the auctioneers.

ARTS AND CRAFTS URGED IN SCHOOLS

Star 7.4.38.
Canadian Handicrafts Guilds Sends Memorandum to Survey Board

A more prominent position for arts and crafts in the schools is recommended by the Quebec Branch of the Canadian Handicrafts Guild in a memorandum submitted to the Quebec Protestant Education survey this morning.

The Guild recommends: The establishment for rural schools of a program based on rural requirements and allowing a considerable proportion of time for arts and crafts.

The addition of arts and crafts to the High School course as carried out in Nova Scotia.

The training in arts and crafts of all rural school teachers and an adequate number of High School teachers.

The appointment of one or more special officers in the Department of Education and of one or more special inspectors to develop and supervise this activity.

Co-operation is offered in any plan to establish these courses in the schools.

TWO HEADS

The whole question, the Guild suggests, must be considered under two heads: The economic and intellectual value of handicrafts.

"In the country even more than in the city," its memorandum declares, "an increasingly important economic place is being taken by arts, and increasing recognition of the intellectual value of work in arts and crafts is being given in other countries and provinces of Canada. Both these changes are closely connected with the rehabilitation of rural life towards which is directed the main effort of the present Quebec Government."

The Guild contends that life is moving back to the country. For a hundred years, it declares, life in the city, as compared with life in the country, grew more desirable. Now the pendulum has begun to swing in the other direction.

RURAL LIFE

"Taking everything together," it adds, "there is good reason to hold that within a measurable period life in the country will have as many artificial amenities and far more natural ones than life in the city, and that the economic and social level of rural life will be at least equal to, and probably above, that of the city."

Handicrafts, the Guild insists, is not for women alone. There is plenty of scope for woodwork and wrought iron work.

Learning handicraft work will teach the boy and girl how to live. "There is some intellectual value in craft work which carries you away, just as there is in any other form of art," it was said.

For these and other reasons the Guild feels justified in saying that, from the intellectual point of view as well as from the vocational, handicrafts should have a recognized place in every educational system.

The memorandum is signed by A. T. Galt Durnford, president of the Quebec branch, and Dr. Wilfrid Bovey, honorary vice-president of the Canadian Guild.

MONTREAL'S NEW SEAL EFFECTIVE APRIL 15

Star 30.3.38
Years Required To Make All Necessary Changes

Montreal's new coat of arms will go into effect officially on April 15, it was learned at the city hall today. The city clerk's new seal replacing that used since 1832 will be a heraldic shield, quartered, with the four emblems, rose, fleur de lys, thistle and shamrock. The whole is surmounted by a beaver and surrounded by a garland of maple leaves. The motto remains the same, "Concordia Salus."

The French version was prepared by Dr. Victor Morin, president of the Heraldic College of the Historical Numismatic Society, and the English version, by Dr. W. D. Lighthall.

It will take four or five years before all city hall stationery, stamps, regalia, decorations, buttons and crests on police and firemen's uniforms and caps, and on other uniforms, are changed.

The official heraldic designation now accepted for the new coat of arms is as follows: "Argent, a cross gules, quartered of the first, a fleur de lys azure; of the second, a rose gules, stemmed, foliated and pointed vert; of the third, a thistle of the same, flory purple; of the fourth, a trefoil of vert. Timbre, a beaver couchant on a branch natural. The shield surrounded by a spray of maple leaves vert. Motto, 'Concordia salus.'"

How Sally Ryan Became Famous

Star 6.4.38
Sculptor's Career Began in Montreal—Is Proud Possessor of an Epstein

LONDON. — (C.P.) — Five years ago a tousle-headed but deadly in earnest school girl—then resident in Montreal—persuaded Herbert Miller, a sculptor of that city, to let her dabble with clay in his studio. This was Sally Ryan, daughter of Allan T. Ryan, New York financier. At 16 she exhibited at the Toronto Art Gallery.

Recently Sally Ryan, sculptor, aged 21, with one gesture amazed London and established herself as a true grand-daughter of the late art-loving millionaire, Thomas Fortune Ryan of New York. She bought an Epstein statue for a four-figure sum and lent it to be shown for the world to admire.

If the bust of the successful old American made by Rodin and now treasured in the Tate Gallery, London, could move, it would doubtless nod energetic approval. Thomas Ryan bought Rodin's collection of sculpture for the New York Metropolitan Museum at a time when that sculptor was frowned upon by the more conservative. His grand-daughter has used a large sum from her inheritance from him to acquire the most discussed "Epstein" in the world today: "Madonna and Child."

What would perhaps please her connoisseur grandfather even more is that a bronze by Sally herself has also been accepted by the Tate for exhibition and "Martinique," her study of a creole woman, which has won honors both in the Royal Academy and in the Paris Salon, will be the third item in the great gallery provided by the Ryan family for the admiration of the general public.

After winning Paris and Royal Academy honors the young artist was a frequent visitor at Epstein's studio, where neglected in a corner his more-than-life size "Madonna and Child" drew her admiration. Epstein had shown it at his show in 1927 and 1923 but since it has been set to one side.

"I wanted more people to see and admire this work considered one of Epstein's best," is what Sally Ryan says is the real reason I bought it. She adds: "There is no time limit on my loan to the Tate."

Her home is a quiet flat high up in a modern building in the centre of Belgravia.

"Don Flats" Is Interesting Item Shown at Sidney Carter Art Galleries

There has been a good attendance at the Sidney Carter Art Galleries, 2025 Victoria street, to inspect the etchings by Rembrandt, Meryon, Cameron and Walcott, lithographs by Daumier, examples of the great 18th century masters of the Japanese print, and old Chinese paintings now on view. From China are pottery and porcelain vases and figures, including horses, carved jade figures from the Ming Dynasty, and tomb figures from the Tang Dynasty.

Coming considerably nearer the present, there is a watercolor, lovely in its quiet harmonies, of "Don Flats"—trees, cattle and stretch of meadow, under a quiet sky, done by J. W. Morrice in 1889. It is a decidedly interesting item, as marking a phase in the development of this Canadian painter, now recognized here and abroad as a distinctive colorist of note.

Andre Morency's Show At Eaton's on Monday

Gazette 9.4.38

Today marks the closing of the annual exhibition of flower paintings by Alberta Cleland, Lillian Hingston and Beatrice Robertson, which has drawn a good attendance to the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal.

On Monday an exhibition of oils, watercolors and pastels by Andre Morency will open here. Morency, whose work has shown steady progress, is partial to landscapes, and has found congenial material in the Laurentians and in the Baie St. Paul district.

At the same time Reed Muir will hold an exhibition of watercolors, in which a keen appreciation of architecture is evident. Public buildings and local church interiors will be among the works shown. Both exhibitions will remain on view until April 23, following which Oscar De Lall will display a number of his portraits.

Alyne G. Charlebois Exhibits Etchings

Gazette 9.4.38

Etchings by Alyne Gauthier Charlebois hold the walls of The Arts Club, 2027 Victoria street, and the carefully selected collection contains some interesting work. Generally speaking, the line employed is more that of the engraver than the etcher, there being in many of the prints a tendency to over-work cross-hatching. Most successful in suggesting atmosphere is the print of carpenters at work, with a stretch of landscape in the background. A glimpse of a court as seen through an arch, with nearby shadowed figures, is also effective. Humor is not lacking in a group of women at tea, and also in the print of a woman reprimanding a child. There is bold line and good arrangement in the print of a girl attending a washing machine, and a tug in the harbor has merit. Buildings form the bulk of the subjects. The work holds promise of more important efforts in the future.

Final Session Today Of Scott Auction Sale

Canadian, English and Continental Painters Represented in Lots Up at Windsor Hotel

In the York Room of the Windsor Hotel this afternoon at 2 o'clock, will start the third and final session of the auction by Fraser Bros., Ltd., of the balance of pictures and prints from the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, the sale being dictated by their disposal of the Drummond street property, and removal to premises on Sherbrooke street, near Mountain street.

The sessions a week ago were not marked by much exciting bidding; despite the quality of the paintings offered.

Today the lots include work by outstanding men—Sir George Clausen, R.A., Waissenbruch, Scherrewitz, Th. De Bock, Steelink, Willem Maris, James Maris, Sir John Lavery, R.A., J. W. Morrice, Cazin, Kreighoff, Jongkind, Bosboom, Boudin, Lhermitte, Sir David Y. Cameron, R.A., W. Russell Flint, R.A., Daubigny, Cullen, Ter Meulen, De Hoog, to mention a few.

WORKS BY MORRICE GAIN HIGH PRICES

Gazette 11.4.38
Regatta Scene Brings $1,200 and "Tangiers" $1,050 at Final Auction

Two works by J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., fetched the highest prices of the afternoon at the concluding session of the sale by auction of prints and paintings from the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, held in the York Room of the Windsor Hotel on Saturday. "Tangiers," an upright canvas, with figure and sweep of bay, as seen from a building, handled in a direct and spontaneous manner, went for $1,050, and "The Regatta at Cancale"—ships under sail in blue water, capped with foam, under a cloud-filled sky, with spectators in the foreground, opened at $500 and jumped by bids of $100 to $1,200. Other paintings by this artist included "Louise Seated," $275; "Algerian Girl," $100; "Landscape and Buildings," $100; "Landscape and Cattle," Le Poldu," $90; and "Woman in Brown," $50.

Interest was shown in some European artists, with a typical Bosboom, "Haarlem Church," bringing $850; "View of Rotterdam," a fine quality Boudin, going at $950, and "The Field of Grain," and "Purse en Marne," two crisply-handled pastels by Lhermitte, fetching $325 and $250, respectively.

"View of a Town," by James Maris, a watercolor done with his usual freedom and boldness, ran up to $650, while "Landscape with Shepherd and Sheep on the Dunes," by Scherrewitz, brought $450, a like price being realized for "Return of the Flock," by Ter Meulen. Another Scherrewitz entitled "Milking Time, Landscape and Cows," brought $375, and "Canal a L'Oueq," by Jongkind, went at $400. "On the Oise," by Daubigny, reached $225, and "Interior, Minding Baby," by Jacob Kever, brought $250.

"French Gunboats, Tangier Bay"—figures on the shore, horsemen in the surf, a stretch of sea and distant war vessels, by Sir John Lavery, R.A., ran up to $500, and "Market Place, Tangiers," from the same brush, went for $250.

"The Sound of Moll," by Sir David Y. Cameron, R.A., fetched $400; and watercolors by this painter brought the following prices: "The Ochills," $135; "Kinloch Hills," $125; and "Loch Arlenas," $175. "Field Worker's Quarters," and "A Young Iberian," watercolors by W. Russell Flint, R.A., went, respectively, for $450 and $175.

Some animation was shown in the bidding for "Indian Trapper on Snowshoes," by Kriehoff, which brought $175, and a unsigned canvas by this painter, called "Indians Around Campfire, Moonlight," went for $525. "Landscape, Winter," done by Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., in 1896, brought $350.

Morrice Paintings For Art Association

Gazette 16.4.38

Three works by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., have been acquired for the permanent collection of the Art Association of Montreal, the examples strengthening the representation of this Montreal painter's art in the local gallery.

The oil, "Maisons, Cuba," was one of the canvases shown at the Morrice exhibition held at the Art Gallery earlier this year, and is a broadly handled work, with three figures near the building, and a colored girl sitting at the base of a palm tree. It is bold and fresh in color. The watercolors are a landscape, with a group of white buildings on a height, distant mountains and a sunset sky; and "Don Flats," a landscape with a low ridge, trees, and cattle in a meadow, all done in delicate tones. This latter work was painted in 1889.

Another oil acquired was "Market Place, Tangiers," by Sir John Lavery, R.A., a mass of white-robed figures in a square, lined with buildings.

Work of Children's Classes and Montreal Camera Club Prints Arranged

Gazette 30.4.38

Opening today in the north-east gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, will be an exhibition of children's work of the Art Association Saturday morning classes, which are under the direction of Miss Anne Savage and Miss Ethel Seath. This show remains on view until May 8.

Tomorrow closes the exhibition of modern prints and drawings, arranged by courtesy of the Contemporary Art Society and the Empire Art Loan Collections.

In the Print Room, the Montreal Camera Club's fifth annual exhibition opens today with 60 prints selected from 200 entries. This show is due to close on May 14.

The exhibition of work by students of the McGill School of Architecture, originally set for today, will open on Tuesday in the Learmont Gallery. It will last until May 9.

DEPARTURE FOR THE HUNT, by Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., is one of the most striking canvases in the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal. The Eskimo are putting off in their native kayaks while women and dogs are spectators. The grim grandeur of the inhospitable looking scenery has been well observed by this Montreal artist. A wider variety of this type of country formed an interesting Far North group in the collection of this artist's paintings recently shown in the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west.

LE MARCHE, by Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., which shows the buildings across Jacques Cartier Square in winter time. It is on view at the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, which closes tomorrow.

LES EBOULEMENT LANDSCAPE, by Marc Fortin.

LAZY SNOW, by Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A.

Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., Marc Fortin Are Awarded Jessie Dow Prizes

Former wins in oils for winter landscape "Lazy Snow," and latter successful with watercolor called "Les Ebolement Landscape"

Gazette

April 9th, '38.

Awards for the Jessie Dow prizes for oils and watercolors, exhibited at the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, due to close tomorrow, have been made by a jury, named by the council of the association, to Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., for his oil entitled "Lazy Snow," and to Marc A. Fortin, for his watercolor called "Les Ebolement Landscape."

Those making the selection—Dr. F. M. G. Johnson, Professor Ramsay Traquair, Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., and Albert H. Robinson, R.C.A.—had in choosing the oil to be governed by stipulations connected with the grant, which is $200, with $100 in the case of the watercolor.

"Lazy Snow," by Holgate, is in this painter's typical vein when depicting an overcast day in winter. A cluster of buildings, a figure, and a distant rounded hill look a trifle forlorn in the grey light. Large flakes of snow fall tardily, and the whole work well expresses the title.

Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., last November had his oil, "The Bathers," acquired for the permanent collection of the Art Association of Montreal, and his art is represented at the National Gallery of Canada, by "Suzy" and "Nude in Landscape."

"Les Ebolements Landscape," by Marc A. Fortin, is a watercolor, freely handled and big in feeling—buildings, farms, distant hills, and a glimpse of river. It is done with something of the bold touch that marks his work in oils. Fortin, who was born at Ste. Rose, P.Q., studied at the Chicago Art Institute, and later did some work in France. He is represented at the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by a watercolor entitled "Landscape Hochelaga."

The 55th Spring Show has been well attended, and it will be remembered for a long time as the occasion when the Jury of Selection decided to prune with a firm hand—cutting the exhibits to 276, as against 479 in 1937. This action caused many disappointments and not a little feeling, but criticism of the judges' action is hardly likely to deter future juries from endeavoring to form a collection moderate in size and uniformly high in quality.

With the possibility of rejection facing the artist, it is believed that effort will be made to concentrate on a few good works, rather than on the indifferent many.

Formal statement of policy governing future exhibitions is not forthcoming, but Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the association, voiced this view at the annual meeting: "It should be, too, in the interest of this association to cultivate more interest in our Canadian national art, to at least exhibit, if we cannot always acquire, its best examples—but only the best."

There is nothing ambiguous about that!

DIMANCHE MATIN, RIGAUD, by Jean Langlois, while a trifle hard in treatment, is a very creditable effort by one of Montreal's younger artists. It suggests a clear winter day with "snappy" temperature, and more careful drawing of the horses and a juster sense of proportion in some of the figures would have added to its effectiveness. The painting is on view at the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal.

Portraits by Oscar de Lall

Gazette 27.4.38

Many people who go to Eaton's gallery this week or next will find familiar faces on its walls, and will be able to see how well Oscar de Lall gets likeness to his subjects in his portraits. Not all of them are equally good, and the portraits of women are generally better than those of men, but in all of them there is individuality, with good color and life. But while these works are good as portraits, Mr. de Lall has not always succeeded in making them interesting as pictures, and the exhibition, as a whole, suffers from the fact that the canvases are all of about the same size, nearly all are of seated half lengths, and the poses of the sitters are very much like one another and this gives the collection a certain stiffness. In a room there is a collection of Mr. de Lall's portrait drawings, which are even better than the oil pictures, but there is in this room an oil study of a girl, "Lydia," which is better than any of the pictures in the other room. The drawings are a little unequal but most of them are very good, with plenty of character. Here again there are faces which many people will know, but the best of all is an unnamed study of a man's head, which is a good portrait and a good drawing. The exhibition shows Mr. de Lall as an honest, and never too flattering recorder of facts, whose portraits will be more attractive when he gives them more value as pictures.

Prints and Drawings In Learmont Gallery Gazette—16.4.38 Exhibit Lent by Contemporary Art Society and Empire Art Loan Collections Shown

Inevitably in the come and go of a season's exhibitions the spectator views, among the good, a considerable amount of slovenly work. Railing against it too often proves good "publicity", and some of these lapses from a high standard of competence hardly to be wondered at when, in other lands, many works that attract the eye and win the buyers are often notoriously lacking in those elements that once constituted the fundamentals of a solidly grounded draughtsman's education.

A welcome relief is supplied by the exhibition of modern prints and drawings, lent by the Contemporary Art Society and Empire Art Loan Collections, on view in the Learmont Gallery, of the Art Association of Montreal.

Viewing these works convinces the beholder that their creators have thoroughly learned their business—that the sketchy suggestion in some of the prints is the product of knowledge attained after years of study. Summarization and impression, seemingly so simple, are obviously the result of a long period of drawing all that was there. Some idea of the serious approach to his subjects is furnished by the studies of heads and hands for his plates by Stanley Anderson, A.R.A., R.E. His line-engravings include a self-portrait, "The Hedger," lopping saplings, and "The Gleaners" is a group looking for treasure at an old book stall. "Timm's Smithy, Thame," shows his ability with the drypoint. "Still Life, Perugia"—pots and pans at the base of pillars on a public square, shows the characteristic precision of R. S. Auston, R.E., as a line-engraver. A wealth of detail marks the etchings, "Mill Street, W." and "Priory Pond," by S. R. Badmin, A.R.E., A.R.W.S., and there is movement to the figures in the etching by Leonard Beaumont, called "The Wine Cask."

Edmund Blampied, R.E., invests with atmosphere "Misty Morning"—horses being watered at a stream, edged with willows, and there is character and good drawing in his portrait of J. S. Lander, standing before his easel. Emma Bormann is masculine in the strong handling of her woodcut, "St. Peter's, Rome," and Benvenuto Disertori spared no lines in his etching of buildings as seen from a window, topped by a trellis with vines heavy with grapes. Robert Gibbings is direct in his wood-engravings of a sea-gull, and of tropical fish, and William Giles employs lovely color in his print of a jay on the wing. F. L. Griggs, R.A., R.E., in his etchings "Lanterns of Sarraz," and "Owpen Manor" shows his usual authority and dignity in design.

Dame Laura Knight, R.A., R.W.S., R.E., is represented by an aquatint of two nude boys, backed by stars, entitled "Gemini," and Clare Leighton, R.E., by a winter lumbering scene—men limbing a felled tree. This is one of the series of wood-engravings she did from sketches made on a visit to Canada. Erwin Lang shows a vigorous woodcut, "Tower of St. Stephens, Vienna," and by the late Max Liebermann is a spirited little pen and ink sketch, "Rider on the Sands." In watercolor, etching and woodcuts, Anton Lock shows his ability to draw horses, and Ernest S. Lumsden, R.S.A., has an etching of impressive design in "Walls of a Monastery, Leh." Other masters of etching include Malcolm Osborne, R.A., R.E.; Henry Rushbury, R.A., R.E., who shows drypoints of buildings; Louis Conrad Rosenberg, R.E., and William Washington, A.R.E.; with an effective plate of the demolition of St. Olave's, Southwark. Joseph Simpson has an effective etching of Bernard Shaw, and Walter J. Phillips has two wood-engravings.

There are any number of good things in this collection, which numbers 120 items, and will remain on view until April 30. — St. G. B.

Beaux Arts Students Holding Fourth Show Gazette—16.4.38 Oils, Watercolors and Sculpture Occupy Gallery of Art Association of Montreal

Paintings by the Anciens des Beaux-Arts are on view in the north-east gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, and the exhibition, the fourth of its kind, is drawing a good attendance of interested picture-lovers. It contains nothing of particular originality, and in a very few of the works is there any experimentation in technique. The line followed is sound, and there is evident sincerity in the efforts of these young painters.

Alyne Gauthier-Charlebois, who, incidentally, is showing etchings at The Arts Club, Victoria street, has among her contributions a directly handled portrait of "Madame M.P." in a blue blouse. It is painted with freedom and the modelling is effective. Rene Chicoine, displaying versatility in his subject matter, has a meritorious "Self Portrait." Fleurimond Constantineau, besides an ambitious portrait of an old lady, and a spirited sketch of a coatless man enjoying his pipe, has an engaging winter landscape with house, trees and distant hills, called "Maison a Mont Rolland."

Stanley Cosgrove seems at home with a variety of subjects, and, in a decorative way, is happy in his "Paysage, Oka,"—distant hills, stretch of landscape and pond edged by a fence, and is capably free and fresh in his elms against a cloudy sky, called "Printemps, Mont Royal." Marie Davis sends two Paris scenes, "Pont Neuf" with trees in summer leaf, and church and buildings, called "Saint Germain des Pres." Simone Denechaud has two versions of "Rue sous le Cap, Quebec," which effectively treat the old structures in this old thoroughfare, but the woman, in one, does not add to its effectiveness, and, in the other, the man leaning against the light pole need not have been quite so slovenly about the legs. There is animation in the children at play in this work. Madeleine Desrosiers is free in the treatment of the buildings, trees and snow in "Le Jardin du Fort," with a nun, accompanied by a little girl, having a promenade. Jean Charles Faucher gives a good impression of industry in his painting of factories, smoking chimneys, and tanks, called "Usine a Gaz," and sounds a quieter note in "Quebec"—the city as seen from the river. It is a work marked by engaging values. Maurice Raymond shows an effective portrait of "Melle. R." in a wine-colored dress, and his "Saint Tite des Caps," with its horse in a pasture, houses and distant hills under a cloudy sky, has merit. Irene Senecal in "Au Quai" shows men eating their meal on a wharf, lumber barge moored nearby, a stretch of water and mountains.

Roland Scotte in "Rue St. Paul" shows distant Bonsecours Church and a glimpse of the market, as seen from Jacques Cartier Square, and imparts animation to her figures in "Chevaux de Bois"—a merry-go-round.

Maurice Raymond shows distinct sympathy for the watercolor medium in "Four a Pain"—an outdoor oven in a landscape, and in "Lac Maskinonge," with its tree-lined water and distant ridge. In this medium, Cecile Gravel shows proficiency in two village scenes—"Saint Irene," and "Sainte Fidele." Francoise Dansereau shows marked ability in her pastel portrait of a young man smoking a pipe. There are two pieces of sculpture—women's heads by Sylvia Daoust and Armand Filion.

Others exhibiting in the painting section are Remi Arbour, Jean Paul Lemieux, Betty Kemp Maxwell and Raymond Pellus.

The show remains open until April 28.

Andre Morency Shows Paintings at Eaton's Gazette—16.4.38 Montreal Artist Finds Subjects in Quebec Province—Water- colors by Reed Muir

Andre Morency is showing a collection of his paintings in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. He is a young artist of evident sincerity and considerable industry, and he finds his material in Quebec province. His color is generally agreeable, and he knows what will make an attractive picture.

Among his works done in the Laurentians, "The Old Bridge, Mont Rolland,"—ice, snow and open water, with hills in the distance is effective in its suggestion of sunlight, and "Solitude, North River," with shadow-streaked high banks, water and sun-flushed trees, is true to the country. "Fall of the Day," a pastel of brush, spruces, snow and open water, backed by a rounded hill, while a trifle reminiscent in theme, does express a mood.

Perce Rock gleaming in strong sunlight, wheeling gulls, surf and shadowed foreground, is an ambitious effort, and in "Perce de la Cote," is seen the famous rock, distant Bonaventure Island, and the settlement as viewed from a height. "Three Sisters, Perce," is the subject of a sunset, with golden water and boats on the beach. A variant of this scene has been freely handled in watercolor. "Pointe au Pic, Murray Bay," shows the church spire above the cluster of buildings, the wharf, and, in the background, high timbered hills. "Cap a l'Aigle" furnishes another good subject, and "Morning, St. Simeon," with its houses, winding road, children and water, gave the artist opportunities. Another painting at the same place, introducing the church, displays a rainbow which lacks convincing transparency. Morency bravely essayed a difficult task. "Cote Bellevue, Pointe au Pic," with its houses, fences, trees and road, is engaging, and "Mont St. Pierre," bare and rocky at its conical peak, makes a good composition. "Etude"—breaking seas and gulls, is a good impression of movement.

"Autumn, Mount Royal"—birches, saplings, rocks and flaming foliage is well handled, and "First Leaves"—trees edging a brook in spate, with distant bridge, is truly spring-like in spirit.

WATERCOLORS BY REED MUIR.

Reed Muir in his group of watercolors seems happiest when painting interiors. An exterior view of Bonsecours Church is rather gloomy in its grey atmosphere, and something has gone wrong with the proportions of its steeple in the view, looking west on St. Paul street, introducing the dome of Bonsecours market. The landscapes shown seem to lack the solid structure that Muir does succeed in imparting to his interiors. These subjects include Wray's Chapel, Mountain street; the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul; the Seminary of the Sulpicians; the Church of St. John the Evangelist; St. Mark's Church, Longueuil; Christ Church Cathedral; Church of the Ascension.

St. James Cathedral as seen from Ste. Cecile street, is not without effectiveness, but the vista of Sherbrooke street introducing the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul, the gallery of the Art Association of Montreal and buildings east, is not uniformly successful.

Past Students of Beaux Arts at the Art Association

Gazette—16.4.38

The exhibition of work by Les Anciens des Beaux Arts, which is now in one of the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, is not only good as an exhibition but important as a first occasion of co-operation between the two most important art institutions in Montreal. This is the fourth exhibition held by Les Anciens and, though it is not large and the pictures are mostly small, it contains some very good work by nearly 20 exhibitors, French and English.

A vigorous portrait of an old woman and a clever portrait sketch of a man, as well as some good winter landscape sketches are shown by Fleurimond Constantineau; some decorative landscapes and two interesting portraits are shown by Rolande Scotte; a very good portrait sketch of a man's head is the only exhibit of Francoise M. Dansereau. There is good painting in some landscapes and portraits by Rene Chicoine and in a still life by Alyne Gauthier-Charlebois. Stanley Cosgrove, who has his own, rather experimental, way of painting, shows a number of landscape studies and a very successful sketch of a woman's head; Remi Arbour has good atmospheric effect in an autumn sketch and there is freshness and light in the landscapes of Irepe Senecal. Some interesting landscapes and a charming little study of a head are by Jean Charles Faucher; there is sound painting in the landscapes and portrait by Maurice Raymond and in the views of a Quebec street by Simone Denechaud. Other oil pictures of interest are by Betty Kemp Maxwell, Madeleine Desrosiers and Jean Paul Lemieux.

A few good water colors are shown by Maurice Raymond, Cecile Gravel and Raymond Pellus, and there are two well modelled busts by Sylvia Daoust and Armand Filion. A small collection of pottery represents another activity of the Ecole des Beaux Arts.

ART ASSOCIATION TO HAVE SCHOOL

Well-Known Artists To Hold Classes Beginning Star In Autumn 18.4.3

The Art Association of Montreal will assume charge of the teaching in its own studios this fall, it was announced today by Dr. Charles F. Martin, president of the association.

"Up to the present," Dr. Martin said, "the studios of the Art Gallery have been utilized by artists who had received the permission of the Art Association to conduct their own classes there. At a recent meeting of the council of the association, a new policy was adopted and the association will now have its own school sponsored by the council with the purpose of establishing a school of fine arts."

"The autumn classes will be established to teach fundamentals of drawing, painting and design, and with these developments will ultimately be included teaching in sculpture, etching, wood carving and in industrial design. Indeed it is hoped that as a school of design it will later take a leading position for the development of fine arts in all its phases."

"The school has been fortunate in obtaining the services of Edwin Holgate, the well-known artist and teacher, and Mrs. Lillias Newton, equally well-known as a portrait painter, to organize and direct this project. With them will be an assistant."

QUICK SKETCHING

"In addition to the usual classes in drawing and painting, it is proposed to have a 'quick sketching class' between the hours of 5 and 6:30 p.m. for students who cannot avail themselves of the opportunities of instruction in the ordinary hours of the day. Arrangements will also be made for a Saturday afternoon class for those to whom the week days give no opportunity for study. Outdoor classes in landscape painting will also be arranged."

"In addition to the regular staff I have already mentioned, it is hoped that visiting teachers from among other local artists will contribute to the program."

"Classes in sculpture will be offered as soon as feasible."

The children's courses, under the direction of Miss Savage, in drawing and painting, and the course in modelling under Miss Seath, will be continued next year.

"A syllabus will shortly be prepared indicating the opportunities to be offered in the autumn so that prospective students will be enabled to make application in ample time," Dr. Martin concluded.

Modern Prints Are Shown at the Art Association

Star—18.4.38

For some years past the Contemporary Art Society, of England, has been buying British and foreign prints and drawings, to be given to the British Museum, and collections of these, before going to the museum, have been sent on tour for exhibition. Through the help of the Empire Art Loan Collections Society one of these collections has just reached Montreal, on its way home from Australia, and is now being shown in one of the upstairs galleries of the Art Association.

All the work in this exhibition is recent and nearly all by living artists, mostly British, though ten other countries are represented among the 120 exhibits. There is one Canadian, W. J. Phillips. There are examples of nearly every method of print making, and, as might be expected, all are of high quality. Among the many wood engravings there are some very good ones by C. W. Taylor and Clare Leighton, clean black and white patterns by Eric Gill and Robert Gibbings and good use of white lines by F. C. Medworth and others. An exceptionally large print by Edwin Greenman gives much of the quality of the picture by El Greco, after which it is made. Another very large and effective print, a woodcut, is by Erwin Lang. There are a few color prints from wood blocks; William Giles' print of a bird is a remarkable piece of printing, with much shading of color, a print by Ian Cheyne shows much Japanese influence, and there are good color patterns in lino-cuts by Lill Tschudi and Cyril Power.

There are many good etchings; the works of F. L. Griggs, Leonard Brammer, Leonard Beaumont and Ernest Lumsden have fine gradations of tone; some excellent and simpler work, with much economy of line, is shown by Carl Vilhelm Stubbe, J. E. Laboureur and Anton Lock; there are good dry point etchings by Stanley Anderson and Job Nixon. Works in aquatint are a remarkable feature of this collection. Ludwig Michalek has a good example of combined etching and aquatint, but even more interesting are the depths of light and shade got with pure aquatint by Charles Potter, Laura Knight and Nathaniel Sparks. Max Pollak has some admirable colored aquatints. There are only a few line engravings, but they are very good, by Stanley Anderson and William Washington. Among the lithographs a portrait by Edmund Blampied, A. S. Hartrick's print of a burning haystack and Pearl Binder's study of a crowd are outstanding.

A few very good drawings are shown; among them are two studies of heads by Stanley Anderson, a pen and ink sketch by Max Liebermann and a brush drawing by Ludwig Jungnickel. Some of the best of the few water colors are by Albert Rutherton, Anton Lock and, two odd but interesting ones, by Lucien Pissarro.

ETCHING DISCUSSED IN TALK BY ARTIST

Gazette—21.4.38
Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., Is Heard by Maritime
Women's Club

Examples of the work of celebrated artists since the discovery of etching were shown and commented upon by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., noted Canadian painter, at a meeting of the Maritime Women's Club held yesterday evening in the Windsor Hotel. Mr. Pilot remarked that the date when the process of etching was discovered was uncertain, but he quoted the British Museum as authority for placing it in the year 1496.

Among the painters whose work in etching was described were Van Dyck, Rembrandt, Whistler, Forain and Muirhead Bone. Mr. Pilot, himself an etcher of distinction, spoke of the Montrealer, Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., as one of the greatest living etchers, and showed slides of several examples of his work. Herbert Raine, R.C.A., also was represented by several etchings of Montreal scenes, and Mr. Pilot remarked not only on his craftsmanship but also on the fact that his work will do much to preserve the memory of picturesque and charming bits of the city which gradually are being pulled down. Montreal, he commented, has enormous value for the etcher.

A film was shown by Mr. Pilot, in which the processes in producing an etching were seen in detail, the pictures having been taken in the studio of Frank W. Benson at Salem, Mass.

Examples of arts and crafts from the Maritime Provinces were on exhibition, many dating from several generations ago. They included needlepoint, samplers, woolwork, quilting, leather and metal work and photography.

Mrs. George R. MacLeod presided. Mr. Pilot was thanked by Miss Paige Pinneo, chairman of the arts and letters committee, by which the programme was arranged.

Philadelphia, April 28.—(P)—Dr. Robert Tait McKenzie, distinguished Canadian-born sculptor and physician, died suddenly at his home here today. He was 70.

Dr. McKenzie was for many years director of physical education at the University of Pennsylvania. He had been in apparent good health and planned a dinner downtown with his wife. As he walked from his study he collapsed. A physician said death was caused by a heart ailment.

Dr. McKenzie achieved distinction in two separate fields. In his career in medicine and physical training he rose to high office in the University of Pennsylvania, after being medical director of physical training in McGill University, Montreal, more than 30 years ago.

In sculpture he produced in stone and bronze the figures of heroes and athletes. He executed the memorial to commemorate 60 years of Confederation which stands in the House of Commons at Ottawa.

Also in the Parliament Buildings is the Baker Memorial. The King's collection of art at Balmoral Castle, Scotland, includes his "Blighy." In the Princes' Street Gardens, Edinburgh, is his statue, "The Call," a killed warrior ready to go to Flanders' fields.

The Sprinter, waiting for the starting gun, in Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, England; and The Plunger, ready to dive in Boston's University Club, were his.

His also were the Delano Memorial at Washington and the General James Wolfe statue in Greenwich Royal Park, London. Other work is permanently shown in the Canadian National Gallery, Ottawa, the Montreal Art Gallery, Oxford University and a number of United States museums and colleges.

Dr. McKenzie was born in Almonte, Ont., in May, 1868, the son of Rev. William McKenzie and Catherine Shields McKenzie. Educated first at the Ottawa Collegiate Institute, Dr. McKenzie graduated in medicine from McGill University in 1892.

Subsequently he was a house surgeon at the Montreal General Hospital, a ship's surgeon, and house physician to the Earl and Countess of Aberdeen at Rideau Hall, Ottawa, when Lord Aberdeen was Governor-General in 1897.

He was awarded the King's Medal by Gustavus V. of Sweden for distinguished service in sculpture at the 1912 Olympic Games, and was a member of the Royal Canadian Academy and the American Medical Association.

Dr. McKenzie was a former president of the American Physical Education Association, president of the Society of Directors of Physical Education in Colleges and a Fellow of the Philadelphia College of Physicians and Surgeons.

His statue of General Wolfe was given to the people of England as a gift from the people of Canada.

Dr. McKenzie wrote widely, chiefly on medical and physical education subjects.

He lived near the University of Pennsylvania with which he was connected since 1904 and spent his summers at Kintail, his summer resort at Almonte.

During the Great War he was a temporary major in the Royal Army Medical Corps.

Premier Expresses Regret

Ottawa, April 28, — (P) — Prime Minister Mackenzie King tonight expressed keen regret on receiving word of the death in Philadelphia of Dr. Tait McKenzie, world renowned sculptor who was a native of Almonte, Ont., and was widely known in Canada.

The Canadian Government a short time ago commissioned Dr. McKenzie to complete a memorial to the late Sir Charles Doughty, Dominion archivist, which was to take the form of a seated figure to be erected in the grounds of the Public Archives.

Dr. McKenzie had completed a model of the memorial and was coming to Ottawa to discuss its erection. Mr. King felt there would be general satisfaction the work had advanced to the model stage and intimated that, if possible, Dr. McKenzie's model would be utilized so that the Doughty memorial would bear the imprint of his genius.

During the late years of the 19th Century while Dr. Tait McKenzie was attending McGill University, Faculty of Medicine, he earned his tuition by acting as gymnastic instructor at the college gymnasium then situated on University street, near Dorchester. He also acted as instructor in anatomy at the college.

Shortly after his graduation as an M.D., Dr. McKenzie took up residence at the corner of Drummond and Dorchester street. His home became the centre of an artistic and literary group. He became a member of the Pen and Pencil Club, an association of writers and artists, at that time. It was during this period that Dr. McKenzie began modelling in clay for his own amusement. His friends reported that he had a natural bent for sculpture which was intensified by his study of anatomy in art.

His most favored models were studies of athletes in action, during races or contest, and in very arrested poses of power or exhaustion.

One of his most renowned works, "The Brothers of the Wind," a plaque of speed skaters, has been donated to McGill University and will be hung in the new gymnasium. The first medal of the Intercollegiate Winter Sports Union was struck from a figure in this group.

Dr. McKenzie was a pioneer in the medical control of students and in the development of physical capacity to its maximum. He attained fame in that subject when he left Montreal shortly after the turn of the century to take up the first post as "physical culture instructor" at the University of Pennsylvania. It was a text book written at that time which first brought him world-wide attention in what was then a new subject.

It was while he was in Montreal that Dr. McKenzie first began to take the thousands of measurements of students and athletes to study and establish types for various activities in that realm. His work in physical culture among students here and his reputation as a trainer of physique and sculptor won him the attention of the American institution which was his first step to world fame.

Well-known professional men of Montreal who were students in his classes in the Nineties report that Dr. McKenzie, while being a good instructor, was also a beautiful gymnast and that his flowing movements might have formed models for the studies he later was to give the world.

One of the accomplishments of which he was most proud while here was the learnings of the chanter, the Scottish bag-pipes without the bag. He taught himself to play the instrument and would inflict it upon the artistic group which made his home the centre of activity and University men about town who had a penchant toward art or literature.

Mrs. McKenzie, the former Ethel O'Neil of Hamilton, Ont., survives as do two brothers, Rev. William P. McKenzie, Boston, and Bertram Stewart McKenzie, Ottawa, and a sister, Mrs. Gilbert Pritchard, Boston.

Premier King Expresses Regret

OTTAWA, April 29 — (C.P.) — Premier Mackenzie King expressed keen regret on receiving word of the death in Philadelphia of Dr. Tait McKenzie.

Mr. King said he had known Dr. McKenzie for some 30 years and regarded him as one of his closest friends. The news was a shock to the Prime Minister as he had looked forward to meeting the sculptor here early in the coming week.

The Canadian Government a short time ago commissioned Dr. McKenzie to complete a memorial to the late Sir Charles Doughty, Dominion archivist, which was to take the form of a seated figure to be erected in the grounds of the public archives.

Dr. McKenzie had completed a model of the memorial and was coming to Ottawa to discuss the erection. Mr. King felt there would be general satisfaction the work had advanced to the model stage and intimated that, if possible, Dr. McKenzie's model would be utilized so that the Doughty Memorial would bear the imprint of his genius.

The Canadian Parliament buildings contain an example of Dr. McKenzie's work, the memorial to 60 years of Confederation erected in the Hall of Fame as the gift of Canadians resident in the United States.

The Doughty Memorial gave promise of being one of his best works and Mr. King said he knew the enthusiasm with which he looked forward to its erection in the capital of his native country.

The Prime Minister expressed to Mrs. McKenzie his keen sympathy as well as that of Dr. McKenzie's many friends in the capital.

Death Of Noted Graduate Causes Regret At McGill

Universal regret was expressed on the McGill University campus today at the death of Dr. McKenzie, who was one of the university's most distinguished graduates. Dr. McKenzie continued his interest in his university unabated. He recently visited the campus and met Dr. Lewis Douglas, principal and vice-chancellor, with whom he had a friendly chat.

The university in 1921 bestowed on Dr. McKenzie its highest honor. At that centennial celebration of the founding of McGill, and in the presence of hundreds of returned graduates, the distinguished sculptor and former physical director of the university received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. This was his third degree from McGill. He received his Bachelor's degree here in 1889 and his medical degree three years later.

At a recent banquet of the McGill Graduates' Athletic Club, when Dr. Fred J. Tees was the guest of honor, frequent mention was made of Dr. McKenzie. Dr. Tees recalled that he and three other students, the late Percival Molson, John Morrow and L. O. Howard, served as models for Dr. McKenzie's first work "in the round." This was his famous statuette, "The Sprinter," of which a copy was presented to Dr. Tees at the banquet.

WORKS WERE LIFE-LIKE

Memories are retained by several Montrealers, who knew the sculptor in his early days, of his painstaking effort to achieve true likeness to life. Dr. McKenzie took hundreds of pictures at the old M.A.A.A. grounds of athletes finishing a race. The expression of supreme effort and exhaustion were caught in dramatic likeness on his early frieze work.

One of his masterpieces, "The Brothers of the Wind," is now in the possession of the university. It was given by Dr. McKenzie for the projected Sir Arthur Currie Memorial Gymnasium and Armory. It will remain in the Douglas Hall of Residence until the gymnasium is built.

Dr. McKenzie came to McGill first as a student in 1885. He was a lecturer in anatomy and physical education, and physical director at the university from 1894 to 1904. He left to become physical director at the University of Pennsylvania. After his graduation at McGill he made his home at Drummond and Dorchester streets. His home immediately became a centre of an artistic and literary group.

DR. LAMB'S TRIBUTE

Dr. A. S. Lamb, director of physical education at McGill, said in tribute today:

"Dr. McKenzie achieved fame internationally not only as an artist and sculptor but as an outstanding authority on problems of health and physical education. During his visit to Montreal only a few weeks ago he reviewed in some detail the program now being carried on for the student body and offered many helpful suggestions. McGill University has lost one of its most accomplished and loyal sons."

Sir Andrew Macphail, whose warm friendship with Dr. McKenzie dates back 50 years to the time they were undergraduates together, was informed by telephone of the sculptor's death last night. Sir Andrew, in his tribute, said:

"Dr. McKenzie's career was a triumph in industry, devotion and knowledge. Besides his artistic quality, he had a beautiful nature, simple and sincere, with a vast capacity for friendship with all men. He even counted a King among his friends, and all of Scotland was open to him. He will be missed and mourned throughout the world."

Sir Andrew received a letter from Dr. McKenzie only yesterday. Plans were discussed in the letter for a week's visit to Almonte at Dr. McKenzie's old home.

DOCTOR TAIT MACKENZIE

THE death of Dr. Robert Tait Mackenzie, which occurred with such shocking suddenness yesterday, removes a man of unusual ability and versatility. Many men have attained distinction in more than one field, but seldom in lines of endeavour which bear as little relation one to the other as medicine and sculpture. It was, however, medical science as it bears on the care and development of the human body which Dr. Mackenzie made his specialty and some of his finest work in bronze and marble came from his attempt to catch and set down in imperishable mediums the beauty of line and form that the trained, athletic body displays.

Doctor Mackenzie was another of those men whom we would fain have kept in Canada. It was here that he discovered in himself artistic aptitudes which, coming to fruition afterward, brought him fame. Such a man not only brings distinction to the place where he does his work but he is therein a centre of inspiration to others. Tait Mackenzie was on the way to do that in Montreal when he left here for Philadelphia, where the rest of his life was to be spent. The children of his genius stand in many places about the world in stone and metal that will not pass away. They brought him honours and rewards from kings and governments and—what he doubtless liked better—the admiration and well-earned praise of his fellow-craftsmen. Canada has, fortunately, a fair representation of his art: it is a pity that we have not more; that McGill, for instance, does not possess one of his major works. Although for so many years withdrawn from Canada, he brought honour to his native land.

NEW TATE GALLERY Star HEAD APPOINTED

LONDON, May 5 — (C.P. Cable) — The Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury last night appointed J. K. M. Rothenstein as director and keeper of the Tate Gallery, succeeding J. B. Manson, retired.

The Tate Gallery, so called because Sir Henry Tate bore the cost of erection, £80,000 ($400,000), and contributed the nucleus of the collection, was opened in 1897. It houses the "Turner Wing" and also a gallery for modern foreign art and a gallery of Sargent's work. J. B. Manson, himself a noted painter and writer on art, has been keeper since 1930. His successor has been director of City Art Galleries and the Ruskin Museum at Sheffield since 1933.

Camera Club Show Has Artistic Merit

Gazette, 2.5.38

General technical excellence, fewer "trick shots" and snow scenes, and some graceful figure studies characterizes the present showing of the Montreal Camera Club, which is now being held in the Print Room of The Art Association Gallery.

The exhibition includes many examples of good picture-making, the compositions being interesting and in many cases of decided artistic merit. The matching of an atmosphere of dramatic values is another feature common to many of the pictures shown.

Amongst the outstanding photographs are R. King's "The Drill Press," a composition of roofs and church tower labelled "The Church Clock," by J. S. Campbell, and a figure study, "Joie de Vivre," by G. Nabashwhi. This last work has been exhibited in the States and abroad. Another is "Siesta," a picture of boats and reflections in an interesting repetition of parallel curves by E. S. Booth.

A. S. Hayden, F.R.P.S., shows a color photograph of dark green leaves and red berries, a rather conventional study of a child and "Motor Nerve Cells."

Of the snow scenes, that of Groulx's Farm at St. Adele, by A. R. Winn, with the emphasis on the crisp texture of the snow, and the feathery "October Snow," by Blossom and Ray Caron, are perhaps the most interesting.

C. Downman exhibits a picture of Dominion Square in the twilight, with St. James Cathedral as background, and another, a pattern of crossing skis, called "She-Ing." Edith Croft's "The Late Train," E. Gould's "Racing Results" and a charming child study, "La Joie de vivre qui s'ignore," by G. C. Papineau-Couture are also representative of the work being done by this group.

Two Exhibitions at The Art Association

Star 4th May

An exhibition of work done by students of the School of Architecture of McGill University was opened on Tuesday in one of the upstairs galleries of the Art Association of Montreal. It may take an architect to appreciate, perhaps even to understand architectural drawings, but there is some other work which is of more general interest, in this collection. There are some sound drawings from the antique, there are a few water colours of still life and flowers, which have good colour and a good use of the medium, and there are some effective heraldic decorations, with good use of shields and mantlings.

The problems set to the architecture students of earlier years include some practical houses, with sensible designs, a Canadian exhibition building, in which some ingenuity has been used and a civic auditorium, something which is so much needed in Montreal. The fifth year students have had to design a big residential boys' school, which includes design and planning of buildings and their arrangement in the school grounds, and a civic opera house, for which some practical and dignified designs have been made.

In the gallery next to the architects there is a collection of the efforts of children, who attended the Art Association's classes for children this winter, and the results show that the classes were well worth their while. Most of the work consists of paintings by children who have a fine taste in good, strong, primary colours, and use it in many cases with a quite sound sense of design. Many of these pictures show plenty of enterprise and imagination, and in a few of them there is drawing which is quite good for young beginners. Ships and horses are very popular as subjects. There are also some designs of patterns in colours, which are of course simple and formal, but show in several cases good ideas of the choice and arrangement of colour.

There is also quite a big collection of clay models made by the children, and these are quite as successful and as interesting as the paintings, and show that many of the children have a real sense of form. A few are human figures but most of the models, and some of the best of them, are of animals, and several of these are distinctly good for the work of children, most of whom are from ten to thirteen years old.

SCULPTOR'S WILL FILED

Mrs. Tait McKenzie Gets

Bulk of Estate, 5.38

Philadelphia, May 8.—(AP)—Dr. R. Tait McKenzie, famous sculptor who died April 28, gave the bulk of his estate to his wife for her lifetime in his will filed for probate Saturday. Dr. McKenzie was a native of Almonte, Ont.

He gave his extensive library to found the Tait McKenzie Library of Physical Education at the University of Pennsylvania, with which he was affiliated for years.

All his sculptures were given to the widow. A bequest of $25 a month was made to Dr. McKenzie's mother, Agnes E. Pritchard, Cambridge, Mass.

CLASSES DEVELOP ART IN CHILDREN

Exhibition of Work by Boys and Girls Being Held at

Art Gallery
Gazette 6.5.38

Sunday is set for the closing of an exhibition of children's work in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, where, effectively arranged, the exhibits, in painting and in clay-modelling, are the result of free classes in art, held on Saturday mornings last winter, under the directorship of Miss Anne Savage.

The girls and boys, drawn from the public and private schools and settlements in the city, have shown promising ability in color and design in their painting, some of the efforts deserving particular praise. The modelling in clay showed imagination and originality in the varied choice of subjects, those attracting special attention, perhaps, being animals and figure groups in color, done by twelve-year-old students.

The clay-modelling, supervised by Miss Ethel Seath, has been financed by the Junior League, through the co-operation of Mrs. Kenneth Winslow, art section chairman, and members of the Junior League also acted as monitors at the Saturday classes.

The exhibition is unique in interest and has drawn a good attendance.

Work by Henri Julien Due Here Next Week

Exhibit of Children's Art and Architectural Drawings Nearing Close—Camera Show Continues

Gazette 7.5.38

Next week will mark the opening of the exhibition of work by the late Henri Julien, which comes to the Art Association of Montreal by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, which was also instrumental in sending to these galleries the exhibition of modern prints and drawings, secured by arrangement with the Contemporary Art Society, and Empire Art Loan Collections, which closed at the end of April.

The Julien exhibition attracted favorable notice when shown in Ottawa and Toronto, and should draw interested crowds here by reason of the fact that the artist, recognized as one of the best press draughtsmen in America, was a Montreal resident and long connected with a local newspaper. He died suddenly and in harness.

Skilled in the use of a clean, free line that reproduced to perfection, his talent was much employed in illustrating books dealing with habitant life and Quebec folklore. He knew rural Quebec intimately, and also the settlers and farmers at their yearly round—driving fence posts, clearing land, "making" cord wood, working in the sugar bush, plowing, seeding and harvesting—with the odd hour off to sit patiently in moored square-ended boats with a few fishing lines in the water. The religious festivals and old-time customs found in him a faithful interpreter in line, watercolors and oils. In the political field, his cartoons called the Bytown Coons—outstanding figures in the federal cabinet of Laurier's time, showed his marked skill in catching a likeness and suggesting action.

This exhibition will be hung in the Learmont Gallery, where architectural drawings by students of the McGill School of Architecture are now being shown. This show, which lasts into early next week, contains much interesting work—plans and elevations of a competitive nature, some excellently drawn examples of heraldry, ornament, design, watercolors and charcoal drawings. There is variety to the entries, which reveal the capital training afforded by this department of the university.

Tomorrow will be the last day of the exhibition of work done by the children's classes of the Art Association of Montreal. Modelling and painting do not lack devotees, and there is much that is engaging in the work shown. The young students are allowed to express themselves, and the results suggest that they enjoyed themselves in the process.

All next week the Montreal Camera Club exhibition will hold the walls of the Print Room. This is a show to be lingered over and enjoyed. The standard set is uniformly high, and the keynote is one of pictorial reasonableness. There is nothing emphatically extreme, but plenty of evidence that before the shutter clicked, study and thought had gone into the arrangement of the subject. Among the more effective subjects are some winter scenes in which the textures are particularly engaging. A fine print is that of trees laden with thick ice after a sleet storm.

Works by Suzor-Cote At Eaton's on Monday

Gazette 7.5.38

Plaster Studies for Bronzes,
Oils, Pastels and Charcoal Drawings in Collection

On Monday a retrospective show of work by the late A. de F. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., opens in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. The art of this well-known Montreal painter, who after a long period of failing health, died in Florida on January 29, 1937, will be represented by a series of studies in plaster for some of his bronzes, that are so highly regarded, charcoal drawings of distinctive habitant characters—fine types of an older day which yearly are disappearing; pastels of nudes, figure subjects and landscapes, and oil sketches of landscapes done in Brittany and Canada.

Born in Arthabaska, Que., Suzor-Cote, after travel and study abroad, devoted his considerable talent to painting subjects in Quebec, besides portraits and works of an historical nature. He is well represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by "Autumn Landscape, Sunset," "Return from the Harvest Field," "Stormy Sea," "The Settlement on the Hillside," "Youth and Sunlight," and "Nude Study," the last-named a work in pastel.

Drawings by Star - Henri Julien at The Art Association by H.P. Bell

The exhibition of work by Henri Julien, which has just been opened at the Art Association of Montreal, is in most respects the same, with some additions, as the exhibition which was held here, at the Arts Club, about a year and a half ago. It is an exhibition which is well worth seeing, and worth seeing again by those who saw it before. This present collection has been made by the National Gallery of Canada and, after being shown at Ottawa, is now travelling to other cities.

Some thirty or forty additions which have been made to the former exhibition are, for the most part, political portraits and sketches of events, which have special interest in Ottawa, where the people shown in them were best known, and in Montreal, where many of them were printed in The Star. Some of them are of interest as illustrations of Canadian history and life and as portraits of people who were active in politics and other public affairs at the time of the Laurier Government. Sir Wilfrid himself was a favorite subject for Julien and there are many studies of him in all sorts of moods.

The best of Julien's work, however, is in the studies which he made of Quebec people. The little picture of a water carrier is the best of the oil pictures, though the portraits of old Canadian types are very interesting, and there are several good water colors of an old man fishing; but the sketches, many of them quite quickly made in pencil, are even better for their truth and freedom. Julien put real life into these sketches of Quebec men and even more into the sketches of their horses, and these will be, to many people, the best part of the exhibition.

NATIONAL GALLERY SHOW Gazette 10.5.38 Etchings, Linocuts, Woodcuts From Overseas on View

Ottawa, May 9.—Following the recent exhibition of watercolors by the Royal Scottish Society of Painters, a show of etchings, engravings, lithographs, wood-engravings, color linocuts and woodcuts from the British Society opened today at the National Gallery.

Fifty-two artists, including recent youthful recruits from Glasgow, have contributed to the selection of 122 prints embracing landscapes, religious subjects, portraits, book and fable illustrations and life and animal studies. There are clean-cut engravings, "Women in Church," "The Bellringer's Wife," and "The Letter," by Robert Austin, and small, but exquisite in detail, are Gwendolen Raverat's wood-engravings, "Crossroads," and "The Village Queen."

Three etchings, portraying the rugged Scottish landscape, by William Wilson, are included in the collection.

After several weeks' display in Ottawa, the exhibit will be shown in cities across Canada.

INTERNATIONAL PHOTO EXHIBITION TO BE HELD

19 Countries Represented In Works

Two hundred photographs selected from over a thousand submitted by picture-takers from nineteen countries and other interesting features reflecting the latest developments in amateur photography and photo equipment will highlight the International Exhibit for 1938 which will be open to the public from 11 a.m. to 10 p.m. on May 18, 19, 20 and 21, in the Salle Doree at the Mount Royal Hotel.

The exhibit was first opened to the public at Rockefeller Centre in New York on February 9, 1938, and since then has been shown in Boston, Philadelphia, Buffalo, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Washington, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Columbus, Cincinnati and Toronto.

Planned especially to aid and inspire the amateur photographer, the exhibit includes 160 outstanding pictorial prints, and in addition, many color prints on paper made from direct color transparencies by the Wash-Off Relief Process. Infra-Red photography, which has opened up an entirely new field and has contributed particularly to scientific, landscape, aerial and documentary work, is included with spectacular representative photographs. In addition to amateur motion pictures in full color there will be demonstrations of 16 mm. sound-on-film.

An Exhibition Of Sketches By Suzor-Cote

Star 11.5.38
A collection of the work, mostly of sketches and studies, by the late M. A. Suzor Cote, R.C.A., is to be seen at Eaton's galleries this week and next. It is a large collection of small works of many kinds, in black and white, pastels and oils. There are a few finished pictures, and among them are a large pastel of a Breton interior, with a charming tenderness of tone and color, and a pastel of a river in winter near Arthabaska. The oil sketches, some of them just studies of fine color effects, are mostly of landscapes, some in Brittany and some in Canada, and all very interesting.

There are several portrait heads of Canadian types; Mr. Cote made many fine studies of this kind and there are some of his best in this collection, drawings full of truth and character. The figure studies, of which there are many, are in both pastel and in black and white and for the most part of female figures, but there were two very good ones of men. With these are a number of costume studies, of men dressed in clothes of the time of Jacques Cartier, with others of Indians, evidently studies for pictures and very interesting as drawings.

An oil portrait of an old man, and a big pastel of a girl's head are other things worth seeing in this exhibition, and, for completeness, there are a few of Mr. Cote's statuettes.

MODERNISTIC ART HELD DEGENERATE

LONDON, Ont., May 14.—(C. P.)—Many trends in modernistic art are "degenerate" and favorable criticisms of such work are, in many instances, mere "paid propaganda," Sir Wylie Grier, noted Canadian artist, said in an address here last night.

Speaking to the Baconian Club, Sir Wylie urged the "man in the street" not to "swallow" what he was confronted with in this regard and to disregard many of the favorable criticisms of modernistic art.

The Toronto artist said there was an exhibition in progress in Toronto of work of children from three to 12 years of age, "and for the life of me, I cannot tell it from the work of some of my modernistic friends." Star. 14.5.38

Landscapes by R. H. Lindsay Star 13.5.1938

The diversity of effects of color and light that are to be found in Canadian scenery can be well seen in the little collection of sketches by the late R. H. Lindsay, which is now being shown at the Arts Club, where much of his work was exhibited in his lifetime. Mr. Lindsay was an amateur in the best sense of that word; everything that he painted shows an enjoyment of what he saw and an interest in his own, sometimes experimental, way of painting it. All the work in this exhibition seems to have been painted out of doors and the larger and better part of it consists of quite small sketches no bigger than postcards. Among the few larger works are some good ones, generally full of color and sunlight; a field with bright streaks of grain against dark bluish trees; an autumn scene in woods with bright red leaves; many others with fine skies and good cloud patterns; and one of open fields on a grey day with misty trees in the distance. The little sketches cover every sort of landscape of this side of Canada, mountains and woods and even one of the sea; and in all of them there is an abundance of light and color, which is in a few cases even too strong for the balance of the design but is always vivid and cheerful.

More than two hundred and fifty guests attended the luncheon held by the Junior League of Montreal yesterday at the Ritz-Carlton, when Mr. F. Cleveland Morgan spoke on "The Museum in the Galleries of the Art Association of Montreal." The guests at the head table were Mr. F. Cleveland Morgan, Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, and Mr. R. P. Jellett. Exhibit of Henri Julien's Art Shows Versatility and Talent

Portraits, Political Scenes, Memorable Happenings, Landscapes and Incidents of Habitant Life on View at Art Association of Montreal Gazette 14.5.38

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

Thirty years after his death, the art of Henri Julien is the subject of an exhibition in the Learmont Gallery of the Art Association of Montreal. This show, which comes to the city where he worked so long as a press artist, has been made possible through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, the catalogue containing a justly eulogistic foreword by Eric Brown, director of the gallery, and more intimate biographical notes by Marius Barbeau.

It is admitted that absence of more important works has made the present show lack completeness, but the closely hung walls give an adequate idea of the talent this Quebec-born artist possessed.

Oils, watercolors, chalks, charcoal, pencil and pen and ink are the media which Julien commanded, and the collection reveals his versatility. As a pen and ink draughtsman he ranked so high that flattering offers came to him from across the border, but attractive as these were, the lure of a bit of fishing at Ste. Rose was stronger—and he remained in his native province.

Scanning the political portraits and sketches is like looking into past history—very upsetting to those who have determined to forget their birthdays! "The Mintos Arrive at Quebec"—now, that wasn't yesterday, neither was "Countess and Earl Grey at the Theatre des Nouveautés," or "Hon. Mr. Borden Presented in the House of Commons by Hon. Mr. Foster and Hon. Mr. Monk." Then there is "Sir Wilfrid Laurier Delivering An Address to the Prince of Wales (George V.) at King's Wharf, Quebec." Maybe, some of us prefer to just dimly remember that occasion! But it is no use—there are here too many characters of our day who played their part in public affairs—Hon. A. G. Blair, Hon. Edward Blake, Sir Richard Cartwright, Hon. Louis Davies, K.C., Hon. W. S. Fielding, Hon. Sydney Fisher, Hon. Sir George Eulas Foster, Hon. Sir Henri Joly de Lotbiniere, Hon. John Oliver, Hon. Joseph Israel Tarte, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick and Sir Mackenzie Bowell, to mention a few that Julien's pen and pencil "caught" so deftly. There are also "The By-Town Coons"—the ministers of Laurier's time in power, all up to some antics and capably captured as to likeness—and Captain Bernier, who favored Arctic exploration, at a Canadian Club luncheon; Andrew Carnegie before the same club; the Bishop of London preaching in Montreal.

In the realm of memorable events there are "Return of Canadian Troops from South Africa," "The Masquerade, Montreal Ice Palace," "Bringing in the Haggis, St. Andrew's Ball, Montreal," "Montreal Horse Show, May, 1901," and "Celebration of the Tercentenary of Quebec, 1908," all vivid drawings done in a day before the camera and the halftone engraving elbowed out the artist.

Julien was called on at short notice to do a variety of things, many of them far from inspiring—the House of Commons Post Office, the interior of the Montreal Stock Exchange, drawings of carnival floats, and criminal court scenes without end, and in his types in the dock he was direct, open-minded and abstained from dramatics. The villains of the piece, from wife-beaters to murderers, were set down without exaggeration—ordinary every-day citizens who had done something and had been caught at it.

Admirable and valuable as are these records of the day by day happenings, many will prefer the drawings, oils and watercolors he did in the rural sections of this province. Here he found subjects that yearly are undergoing change—wagon or sleigh brought farm produce to market, or carried holiday-makers from home to home. The smart cutter bore the couples to the village and the church. There was no quick jump into auto or truck and a spurt away in a cloud of smoke. These sketches were done before the era of rush. The years, too, have seen transformation in the matter of costume, but record of what once was worn is preserved in Julien's sketches—as faithful of his time as Kriehoff's paintings of an earlier day.

Among the watercolors, which in the landscapes have something of the precision and attention to essential detail which mark his pen and ink drawings, there is a group which shows the habitant trying his luck with many fishing lines at the edge of reeds and lily-pads. These are invested with calm, and some of the anglers, placidly smoking their pipes, have had luck. "Le Petit Coup" and "L'Aperitif"—both social and solitary—are admirable character studies, and the types in the crowd at the auction of fowls outside the church door are capably caught. There is animation in the figures at a dance, and action to the horses in impromptu races between sleighs.

Ancient history is touched in two drawings of "Dollard au Long Sault"—surprise and attack, and "Un Vieux de 1837," a watercolor of a habitant, with ancient gun and powder-horn, starting out to do his bit for a cause, and a set of illustrations for the Rebellion of 1837, recall an episode in later day history that is better forgotten.

Variants in pen and ink, and the oil lent by the Quebec Provincial Museum, reveal Julien's imaginative powers in "La Chasse Galerie"—the shouting, gesticulating lumbermen in the devil-guided and devil-steered canoe, flying through the air above wild woodland, a legend that has come down from a far distant past.

This only touches the fringe of a quantity of good work that should be of peculiar interest to Montrealers.

Besides some self-portraits, there is a striking likeness of the artist painted by E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., of Montreal, and lent by Chas. W. Simpson, R.C.A. It is a fresh bit of color and a good portrait of the man, clear of eye, healthy in complexion and very alert and alive.

Marius Barbeau, in his biographical sketch, writes: "Julien, thirty years after his death, challenges attention and upon the public verdict now depends his place in Canadian art. Does he really deserve a niche in the small gallery of our creative artists? And upon what grounds does his work commend itself in the critical estimate of a century different from his and endowed with a wider outlook?"

Recalling the man, it is a safe assumption that the public verdict was something that did not greatly worry Julien. He was sincere, put the best he was capable of into his work, lived a busy life and died in harness. His fellow-artists valued his work, and this critical appreciation was what meant most to him.

Eric Brown quotes the following appreciation by the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A.: "He was widely appreciated both personally and through his work, the last of which made him many friends who had the pleasure of coming under the influence of his kindly nature and broad philosophy. As a newspaper artist he was the greatest of his day; he was endowed with wonderful natural talent and his drawing was very fine."

A very just tribute and true. "His kindly nature" never seemed to get mislaid. He generally seemed to have time to look over drawings by the beginner who, taking his courage in his hands, went to him for advice. He really inspected the work submitted, made helpful suggestions, urged hard work along lines that showed the most promise, and invited a return call. And it was all done in a frank, friendly spirit. He did not see in the struggling and perplexed youngster a possible rival of tomorrow, or just one more candidate in an overcrowded field. No. Here was another artist in the family—and he must be welcomed, guided and helped.

Paintings by Utrillo and Modigliani and Drawings by Picasso on View

Drawings by Picasso, paintings by Utrillo and Modigliani, and a small unfinished study of a woman by Renoir, are among the interesting works on view in the Sidney Carter Art Galleries, 2025 Victoria street. The Picasso drawings in crayon and pen and ink are of figures, Utrillo treats building in his characteristic manner, and the head of a man and of a woman are the examples by Modigliani.

VIEW OF PARAME FROM THE BEACH, by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., is one of the many fine paintings this Canadian artist did about St. Malo. It is a work of lovely tone and effective composition—curving sandy beach, bathing shelters, incidental figures and a stretch of buildings in sunlight, under a summer sky filled with floating clouds. This work, which was acquired from the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, was loaned by Mr. and Mrs. Murray R. Chipman, of Montreal, to the important exhibition of paintings by Morrice, shown here, in Ottawa and Toronto. This canvas was reproduced in "The Fine Arts in Canada," by Newton MacTavish.

A. de F. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., a sterling painter, whose contributions to the Royal Canadian Academy exhibitions and the spring shows of the Art Association of Montreal, always strengthened the representation of the older artists on such occasions, died in Florida last year, after a long period of failing health. Now, in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, is being held a retrospective exhibition of his work, the collection of oils, pastels and charcoal drawings covering every phase of his versatility. In some respects it is more interesting than the exhibition held a few years ago in the Ecole des Beaux Arts, St. Urbain street, since, while it contains fewer "important" pictures, it takes the spectator back to the days when this Montreal painter was studying his profession in Europe. His ability to draw the undraped figure—marked in later years by a series of female nudes in pastels and oils—is revealed here by charcoal drawings done while a student in France, when, apparently, he was able to give a very good account of himself in stiff competition. Here, too, are many attractive bits of church interiors and landscapes done in Brittany, as well as the odd item painted in Spain.

Among the small oils done in Brittany, there is good subdued color in "La Chapelle de Port Blanc," showing the side of the building, a stretch of sward and a cross against a warm sky; direct, firm brushwork in the painting of a pulpit in a Breton chapel, and some lovely greys in "Autel de la Vierge, Chapelle de Porz, Brittany," with its pillar and low beams, the altar being set against a window. The beach at Porz, shows a curving bay and blue water, and an old cottage at Barbizon, France, is broadly painted. There is a good suggestion of sunlight in the painting of hayricks at Beauce, France, and in a small marine the effect of a rain squall is convincingly rendered. A study of rocks and trees has solid qualities.

Of this province are "La Riviere Gosselin, Arthabaska," a pastel of water winding between wooded banks under snow; "Le Vieux Pont Bourbeau," water, ice and distant snow-covered barns, in the same medium, and "Old Sugar Camp." In oil, are "Indian Summer"—rank vegetation, a poplar and distant blue hills, under a rosy sky; men sawing a log in the woods, a work direct and freely handled; and "Vue du Village d'Arthabaska," the painter's birthplace, with buildings and church, backed by a low hill, and a tortuous stream in the meadow in the foreground. In pastel are "Indian Girl Caughnawaga"—the maiden in red holding an apple; and "The Little Sick Girl," the subject propped against a pillow and looking wistful. There are also some capably drawn nudes.

The charcoal drawings, done with a vigorous stroke and not concerned with the subtle values of those done in his art class days, form a fine gallery of varied types—a hunter in buckskins charging a muzzle-loader; an old lumberman with an axe; an organ grinder; a coachman in winter garb; a habitant smoking a pipe; and a drawing of Old Pere Taillon, which is the study for the vigorous portrait in oils in the permanent collection of the Art Association of Montreal. The group of old peasants is a very interesting section, and there are, too, many studies of officers and gentry of the French regime, which he required for his paintings of an historical character.

Busy Spring Season For Art Association

Gazette — 21.5.38
Henri Julien Show Ends Series of Exhibitions Until the Autumn

With the closing of the exhibition of paintings and drawings by the late Henri Julien, in the Learmont Gallery of the Art Association of Montreal next week—the date set being Wednesday, though it may be extended for a few days—the activities of the association in the matter of shows will probably mark time until the autumn. It has been an interesting season as regards exhibitions and lectures.

In January the offerings included work by the Canadian Group of Painters, and portraits of Canadian war generals by Sir William Orpen, R.A.

February was marked by the important exhibition of works by J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., the original paintings illustrating Louis Hemon's "Maria Chapdelaine," by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., and the exhibition of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, and the Province of Quebec Association of Architects.

The annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal occupied a part of March and April, and in the latter month there was a show of work by the students of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Montreal; modern prints and drawings by British artists from overseas; and an exhibition of work by the children's classes of the Art Association.

In May there was an exhibition of drawings by the students of the McGill School of Architecture, prints by members of the Montreal Camera Club, and the Julien show.

Among the visiting lecturers were H. S. Ede, from London; Dr. Julius Held, of New York University; Dr. Martin Weinberger, formerly of the Old Pinakotek, Munich, and Peter Breiger, Ph.D., of the University of Toronto. The Montrealers who spoke on various phases of art were Miss Anne Savage, Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., F. Cleveland Morgan, Henri Hebert, R.C.A., Ernst Neumann, and Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., Professor Wynne-Edwards, Professor T. H. Clarke, and E. L. Wren.

OLD CRAFT WORK SHOWN

Gazette — 15.6.38
Tweedsmuir Opens I.O.D.E.—
Conducted Museum

Quebec, June 15.—(C)—Lord Tweedsmuir opened officially today a little St. Peter street museum sponsored by the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire. The Governor-General was accompanied by A. S. Redfern and Captain G. P. Campbell-Preston.

The museum is contained in a what was once Quebec's business district. Built by a Madame Fargues about 1780, the large building was decorated during the best period of Canadian woodcarving, and panelling in its walls and ceilings are some of the period's finest examples.

Preserved in the museum, which will be devoted to collection of early French-Canadian craft work, are ancient fireplaces, wrought iron utensils and interior decorations no longer common here.

NEWTON MacTAVISH, author of "Ars Longa," a new book of reminiscences dealing with artists.

Big Company of Canadian Artists Surveyed by Newton MacTavish

"Ars Longa," by Toronto Author, Rich in Pithy Anecdotes, Authentic in Substance and Critical in Its Occasional Revelations

Gazette

21.5.38

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

Frankly admitting that his earliest recollection of meeting an artist—William N. Cresswell, alternately sketching and angling from the bank of the Bayfield River, near Seaford, Ont.—takes him back into the eighties of the last century, Newton MacTavish has put his taste for the fine arts and his association with painters to capital use in his book, "Ars Longa," now off the presses of The Ontario Publishing Co., Limited, Toronto.

It is a bright, lively book and infinitely more illuminating than a "Who's Who," which publications, while generally reliable in basic facts, leave out the most vital aspects of the subjects' lives—their struggles to gain a place, what they did in their lighter moments, and how they stood with their fellow artists. In reminiscent vein, MacTavish's volume manages to make you one of the party at the various incidents he describes, and from cover to cover the interest is maintained without apparent effort. Of course, it cannot be quite as easy as that, but with "The Fine Arts in Canada," an authentic book of reference, and a volume of humorous essays, called "Thrown In," behind him, not to mention a long career as journalist and editor, he brings experience, judgment and an effective style to the work under review.

While, in the main, it deals with artists, there is ample warrant a welcome from a much wider circle, for it is rich in pithy anecdotes that concern personages in other walks of life—the disarranged attire of Sir John A. Macdonald when A. Dickson Patterson was painting him; how the author manoeuvred Goldwin Smith into having John Russell paint his portrait; the awful fate that the combination of pet robin and juicy strawberries brought to the illuminated address that Miss I. M. D. Sutherland was doing for presentation to the Prince of Wales, now the Duke of Windsor, until peroxide saved the precious vellum, to mention a few at random. William Cruikshank's opinion of Toronto, too, will hardly be resented in Quebec—a province that, above all, admires truth and frankness!

Giving a backward glance at Toronto of forty years ago, MacTavish touches on a numerous company, Manly, Gagen, Gertrude Cutts, G. A. and Mary H. Reid, Beatty, Verner, Sir Wylie Grier, Jefferys, F. McGillivray Knowles, Elizabeth McGillivray Knowles, and many others who later won high place, and his mention of Montreal collectors introduces Sir William Van Horne, Sir George Drummond, James Ross, Lord Strathcona, E. B. Greenshields and David Morrice.

In a chapter on etching as a fine art, the author has something interesting to say about its leading exponents—Gagnon, Phillips, Turner and Dorothy Stevens, and deals with sterner matters when handling "The Contretemps with Sir Edmund Walker," and the friction between members of the Royal Canadian Academy and the banker chairman of the Board of Trustees of the National Gallery of Canada—a chapter that introduces Williamson, Brymner, Cullen and Horatio Walker.

Tom Thomson and the band of painters with a new vision are not overlooked, and his meetings with Morrice are recorded. Cartoonists, too, come within his ken—Kyle, McConnell, Sam Hunter, Bengough, Julien and Racey.

Horatio Walker and the Island of Orleans bring the author to rural Quebec, and then to the metropolis, where Suzor-Cote, "Maria Chapdelaine" and Sir Andrew Macphail's and W. H. Blake's translations of Hemon's book are dealt with.

MacTavish's associations have been many—Ontario and its painters are thoroughly dealt with, Montreal artists of yesterday and today are done justice to, and Canadians in New York have not escaped his notice.

Touching on purchases for the National Gallery of Canada, the author says in part: "... There is no secret about these prices. They are all published in the records. And scarcely ever has a painting been bought from a Canadian without there being first a reduction in the price. This applies to practically every purchase by the National Gallery, including paintings by Williamson, Morrice, Walker, Atkinson, Watson, Ahrens, Brymner, Cote, Russell, Jefferys, Challener, Kerr Lawson and Ernest Lawson, though both the last are expatriated; Charles F. Comfort, A. J. Casson, Franz Johnston and many others."

An unusual feature of the book is the reproduction in facsimile of the signatures of many of the artists.

Newton MacTavish writes of the artists from personal knowledge. He was on the Toronto Globe about eight years, being for a considerable period its Montreal correspondent; editor of The Canadian Magazine twenty years, and it was during that time that Canadian painting was given a fair "show," through articles and reproductions in color, tint and black and white; Civil Service Commissioner for seven years, and a Trustee of the National Gallery of Canada ten years. Besides being a Master of Arts, he is Doctor of Letters (Acadia).

Summer Show at The Arts Club

Star — 22.6.38

This year's annual summer exhibition at the Arts Club contains work by seventeen members of the club, and is as interesting as the club's exhibitions generally are. Most of the works shown are oil pictures and sketches, with only quite a few drawings and water colours.

Conspicuous among the drawings is a very fine study of a negro's head by E. H. Holgate, R.C.A., who has two oil studies of heads, one very good of a girl in a blue dress. A. Hebert, A.R.C.A., shows a good brush drawing of a landscape with trees and a large oil picture of a street, lighted from shop windows. Paul Caron has a pleasant water colour of some old Montreal houses and a fine piece of colour in a portrait of a girl in a Chinese dress. There are four water colours by L. G. Morris, with a happy effect of green in one of the Chateaugay River.

Two amusing studies in oil by H. Leslie Smith are of groups of figures, one in a cafe and the other at a lunch counter. There is a striking effect of light in T. Topham's picture of sunrise at Lost River; his other sunrise, with snow and tumbling water at Val David, is not so convincing. Little pictures of autumn, at St. Urbain and Baie St. Paul, by R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., have good and vivid colour, and there is a nice arrangement of greens and white in his sketch of pine trees among snow. An unrestful Quebec landscape by A. Cloutier, a flower picture by D. R. Morrice, an interior and a study of a head by P. Andrew, a snow picture by E. Lemieux and a cold evening landscape by R. Vincelette are worth notice, as are still life pictures by T. R. Macdonald and R. G. Mackay, a rather literal scene in Montreal by R. Sharp and sketches by W. H. Taylor, and T. Garside.

Canadian Painters Exhibit at Eaton's

Works by Canadian painters hold the walls of the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and they do not lack in variety.

R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., shows two works of different seasons—"House at Senneville," with trees in sparse autumn leaf about the residence and the outbuildings, and in "Perce, Quebec," with its noble rock, beach and boats, he has a summer scene charged with sunlight. Frank Hennessey, A.R.C.A., has some broadly handled pastels—"October After Rain," with its flaming maples and cloudy sky; "Winter Road," which well suggests the depth of the snow about the evergreens and bush, under a blue sky; and "Day with Blue Water," a stream edged by snow-banks and alders, true of the season and boldly set down. Another direct performance is "Oaks and Maples." George Thomson has a capably painted landscape, and Thurstan Topham, in "Montreal from Laprairie, Moonlight," convincingly suggests night. The moon rides in a cloudy sky, the river stretches to the distant lights of the city, and in the foreground is a man putting off in a canoe. Clark Middleton-Hope shows landscapes with interesting qualities—"Fresh Greens of Midsummer," which features an old mill on a narrow stream; "Mountains After Rain," with a range of hills backing a timbered valley; and "Passing Clouds," with distant hill and glimpse of lake.

Paul Caron has typical winter scenes with quaint houses and the usual horse, sleigh and figures, done with the free, clean wash that characterizes this artist's watercolors, and A. M. Pattison, besides a winter scene, showing traffic, figures and St. George's Church and the C.P.R. Station, is successful with his "October Snow, Town of Mount Royal," in which the early flurry has covered the fields and caught trees still in autumn leaf. It is effective in arrangement and has some nice values.

There is a nice tone in "Fishing Schooners, Gloucester, Mass.," by James McCorkindale, and Tom Stone, besides the gay-colored "Autumn Rapids," shows sterner country in a winter scene with a poplar-dotted landscape and distant hills. Joseph Guinta shows "Nature's Myth"—a landscape with trees and stream at sunset, and "Winter, Laurentians," with snow-laden spruces, a lake glowing beneath a sunset sky, and mountains. J. M. Donnell finds the picturesque in "Old House, Mayor Street," and M. Reinblatt shows "Street in Ste. Agathe."

Of this country by association and frequent visits, when he has found good material in the Rockies and the Laurentians, Richard Jack, R.A., is represented by "Lac des Isles"—building, blue water and hills, under a summer sky, a work that shows the mature, practised hand.

Rita Mount, besides some shore scenes with fishing boats, is distinctly successful with "Winding Road, Petit Cap," with its old buildings edging the road which climbs to the peak of the distant hill. Mary Grant goes to the sea for her inspiration, and shows surf, sunlit rocks and a solitary gull in "The Restless Sea," her other attractive items being "Surf at Grand Manan," and "Surf and Seaweed, New Brunswick." Miriam Holland is represented by a wharf scene with fishing boats and dancing reflections, called "Grand River," and a tree in gay leaf in a work entitled "Autumn Near Piedmont." Agnes Lefort shows a liking for white water in "Les Chutes Shawinigan"—the river boiling down over rocks, with the spray rising from the falls. Freda Pemberton Smith reveals a bold touch in "Oak Trees, Mount Royal," a study of sunlight and shadow, and Lorna Lomer Macaulay has a number of effective works in pastel and opaque watercolor—"On the Quebec Road," a summer scene with trees casting shadows on an old white house; "Stowe, Vermont, After Rain," a winding stream, trees and a mountain with mist about its peak; and two good winter scenes called "On the Beauport Road" and "On Ste. Genevieve Road," respectively.

Mrs. Jean Maclean shows a flower piece, entitled "Delphiniums"; Lillian Hingston finds trilliums interesting, and Alberta Cleland, going in for gayer blooms, is partial to zinnias, in copper pots or bowls of a lovely blue. She also shows a pastel portrait of a comely child, and an autumn landscape, "September Day, North River."

BENNETT CHARGES ART GALLERY BIAS

Star — 8.6.38
Tells Commons Several Worthy Canadians Not Represented by Works Shown

Ottawa, June 7.—(C.P.)—Wider representation of Canadian artists in the National Gallery at Ottawa was urged in the House of Commons tonight by Opposition Leader Bennett. His remarks came during consideration of a vote of $115,000 for the Gallery.

Mr. Bennett thought several ranking Canadian artists had been overlooked and that there were some pictures on display that did not "dignify" the gallery. He also suggested one picture labelled "Van Dyck" which he thought should have the word "after" placed in front of the artist's name.

Works Minister Cardin agreed Canadian artists should be encouraged to every possible extent. He would refer Mr. Bennett's remarks to the board of trustees.

"The last time I visited the gallery," Mr. Bennett said, "I certainly found a dearth of pictures by one or two artists who, I think, might fairly be classified as ranking Canadian artists."

"There is a substantial number of Canadian artists who are not at all adequately represented in the gallery. On my last visit I tried to make effective my criticism of some pictures there but did not succeed."

"Certainly they do not dignify the gallery, whereas some of the paintings by those who are not represented would ornament almost any gallery in the world. It would be unfair to particularize."

"We have ample funds with which to purchase Canadian pictures. We have representations of most of the great artists and I am not for a moment suggesting that we should limit our purchases."

"In my opinion, however, the principle is wrong of selecting merely a certain type of picture that apparently merits the approval of a certain type of mind and does not commend itself to others. Representation should be of all schools."

"I admit we have not produced many great pictures in this country but at the same time there are one or two of our artists who have achieved very fine landscapes."

"Let me assure the Minister that what I am saying does not refer particularly to his administration; in fact it refers with equal, if not greater force to the administration that preceded this." (Mr. Bennett's government.)

Louis Sarbonne, of Montreal, is at work on the Eucharistic Congress Repository, constructing four 15-foot figures which will form the capitals of the Repository altar columns. He has also made the figures which will surmount the baldachin over the congress altar, and the above reproduction gives an excellent idea of his work. The figures, it will be noted, are of moderate modernistic treatment, with classical lines, and represent two angels in a devout attitude, face to face, holding a receptacle enclosing the Sacred Host.

National Gallery of Canada Extends Cultural Activities

Gazette By ST. GEORGE BURGOWNE. 18.6.38

"By arrangement with," "by courtesy of," "in co-operation with"—a few words of credit to the National Gallery of Canada, for sending to cities and towns collections of paintings, etchings, prints and reproductions, which in the ordinary course the mass interested in art would never see, sometimes noted in connection with reports of such events, give no inkling of the extent and importance of the work being done in this connection by the Ottawa institution. Meritorious shows are held in the galleries of the local art dealers—really the places where just estimates can be formed of what native painters are doing from day to day—and there are always the permanent collections and fixed annual exhibitions of the Art Association of Montreal to attract the art-lover, but it must be admitted that the pictorial year would often be very "thin" without the loan displays that come from the Capital.

Some indication of the scope of the work of the National Gallery of Canada, under the direction of Eric Brown, may be gathered from the annual report of the Board of Trustees of the gallery, of which H. S. Southam is chairman. "Loan exhibitions," it reads in part, "have been more extensive than at any time in the history of the institution and the number of lectures given in cities throughout the Dominion by distinguished scholars, working under National Gallery auspices, was larger than in any previous year. At the same time the National Gallery has been called upon to arrange important exhibitions of Canadian art abroad, notably in the United Kingdom and in the British Dominions." Incidentally, the report, with the happy nonchalance that marks Governmental publications, covers the fiscal year ending March 31, 1937.

"For example," the report goes on, "last year 151 lectures were given under the auspices of the National Gallery. This year the number has increased to 218, and of these 16 were given in Ottawa and the remainder in other cities throughout the Dominion. By courtesy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a number of radio addresses were given over the national network."

"Loan exhibitions totalled 128, as compared with 101 in the previous year."

Mention is made of the collection of 104 Canadian pictures sent to the Empire Exhibition in Johannesburg, later going to Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, Grahamstown and Durban—three of the works being acquired for the National Gallery of South Africa. Expenses in circulating the collection were met from the British Empire Fund of the Carnegie Corporation.

His Excellency the Governor-General wrote the following foreword to the catalogue:

"I am greatly interested in the scheme, which the Carnegie Corporation has made possible, to arrange for an Exhibition of Canadian painting in the different Dominions, for I am a strong believer in the value of such exchanges on the cultural development of the Empire. I have long followed with interest the movement among Canadian artists to provide a fresh and idiomatic interpretation of Canada's wonderful and most varied landscape. They have been pioneers in as real a sense as those who first tamed the wilds for human purposes. We have in Canada much good work done in the traditional manner, and we are not forgetful of the inspiration of the classical British and French schools. But our younger artists have, most rightly, insisted on looking at landscape with their own eyes, and in devising a technique suitable to new conditions. Artists in the other British Dominions have to face the same problem, and I cannot but feel that this proof of what Canada is doing, will stimulate those who are seeking to interpret in painting the very different landscapes of South Africa, Australia and New Zealand. It is a contribution to that common stock of intellectual and artistic ideals, which is vital to the spiritual unity of the Empire.

"TWEEDSMUIR."

"Gleams on the Hills"

While several notable purchases by the National Gallery of Canada are recorded in the annual report of the Board of Trustees, space at this time precludes mention of more than one—"Gleams on the Hills," by the late J. E. H. MacDonald, R.C.A., which is illustrated on this page. It is a work that admirably demonstrates the point that found favor in Lord Tweedsmuir's catalogue foreword—"... looking at landscapes with their own eyes, and... devising a technique suitable to new conditions..."

The title of the painting does not definitely "place" the scene, but it might well be a bit of Algoma country done when, as related by Albert H. Robson, in his illustrated volume on the painter, issued by The Ryerson Press, Toronto, MacDonald went into that region in the fall of 1918, using Algoma Central Railway work-car No. 10557 as movable headquarters. It is in its decorative design and solidly painted forms reminiscent in spirit of "The Solomn Land," an Algoma inspiration, and, one might hazard, more impressive by reason of the mountains' scale and the narrower waterway. Lacking the vigor and freshness of the color—the breaks in the cloudy sky and the sunlight on the distant ridges rather challenge each other in the reproduction—the pattern and strength of the painting do single this work out as an example that the National Gallery was fortunate in acquiring. It is a noble patch of Canada off the beaten track, and certainly not the place to get lost in.

Robson's comment on "The Solomn Land" applies with equal force to "Gleams on the Hills"—MacDonald "... was not concerned with charming detail, his horizon was much wider; he was striving for the sense of sublime vastness, the majesty, dignity and grandeur which he felt..."

Two Hogarths for 2,400 Guineas

Canadians are partial to landscapes and not over excited by story-telling pictures, but in England the latter type of work still makes strong appeal. Hogarth came into the limelight at Christie's in London towards the end of last month. Two pictures of grouped figures, "Night" and "Morning"—two of the set of four entitled "The Four Times of the Day," which Sir William Heathcote bought from the painter for £48 6s, started a spirited duel at the sale of the Heathcote Heirlooms. The opening bid was 300 guineas, a few scattered bids followed, and then Messrs. Knoedler's representative and Sir Alec Martin, acting for an English collector, made things lively. Sir Alec capturing the pair for 2,400 guineas.

Bennett Doubtful Painting Authentic

Star — 8.6.38

OTTAWA, June 8.—(C.P.)—Rt. Hon. R. B. Bennett doubts the authenticity of a Van Dyck painting which he saw in the National Gallery here.

In the House of Commons last night during debate on the gallery estimate, he said: "I am bound to say that there is one picture which has not impressed me as being authentic."

"It would seem to be regarded as a Van Dyck, and while I am not at all an expert I am inclined to think that it might be well if the word 'after' were placed before the name Van Dyck on this particular portrait."

National Gallery officials said that there was no Van Dyck portrait in the gallery at present and would not comment on Mr. Bennett's observations.

Canada to Show Century of Art At Tate Gallery, London, in Fall

Gazette 11.6.38 By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

From the Canadian High Commissioner in London comes word that the art of the Dominion is, in October, to be the subject of an exhibition at the Tate Gallery, under the title of "A Century of Canadian Art." The show is to last two months in this gallery, which incidentally includes in its permanent collection a painting by J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., and one by A. Y. Jackson, and later will probably go to some of the larger provincial art galleries.

This promises to be a more than ordinary event. H.R.H. the Duke of Kent will open it, and since, according to the cable, about 200 pictures and sculpture items are to be chosen, this suggests that there will be no undue dominance of any particular style of painting—a feature of some past collections sent abroad, which led to friction and considerable bitterness over the manner of selection, and brought into question the fundamental functions of the Royal Canadian Academy. The famous Wembley exhibition of 1924, which excited so much enthusiasm among the English critics, was a contemporary one covering a period of ten years, and the one now projected should show the English picture-lover that the Canadian scene is capable of many and varied interpretations.

In the nature of an historical survey of Canadian art, the collection will be drawn from the National Gallery of Canada, and other private and public sources in the Dominion.

The committee of artists includes Sir Wyly Grier, president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts; A. Y. Jackson, president of the Canadian Group of Painters; Elizabeth Wyn Wood, A.R.C.A., president of the Sculptors' Society, and Peter Haworth, president of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Colors. Also assisting the National Gallery are Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., of Montreal, and Martin Baldwin, curator of the Toronto Art Gallery. Certainly a group that can be counted on to ensure a worthy and diversified collection being sent overseas. It is to be hoped that this exhibition will be shown in Canadian cities after its return from abroad, because it will be of considerable interest to see what was being done by the earlier men—Berthon, Fowler, Jacobi, Kane—Kriehoff's art, by reason of revived interest in his paintings, being now well known and even better appreciated.

Honors for Painters

It is impossible to repress a feeling of satisfaction when the King's birthday or New Year's honor lists carry the name of a painter. On Thursday two were recognized—Arnesby Brown, R.A., with a knighthood, and Frank O. Salisbury, who was made a Commander of the Royal Victorian Order. Both have risen high in widely divergent subjects that have always made strong appeal to the English picture-lover—the former in landscape, and the latter in portraiture and historical painting.

Sir Arnesby Brown's landscapes are virile performances—strong brush work, solid modelling, sure drawing, and accomplished in rendering the shimmer of sun-charged haze. His cattle are noble beasts, his trees are deep-rooted, and his treatment of cloud-filled skies is masterly. Looking far back, "Royal Academy Pictures" carried a small reproduction of a field with flooded furrows, clump of trees, sheep, and a rainbow—a really transparent arc that you could see through. If it had only been in color! The chance to see this painter's color came later with "The Gate"—cattle, painted with an anatomical accuracy above criticism, standing near the barrier, awaiting the milkmaid or a change of pasture, in the late afternoon, when everything was bathed in a soft haze. The canvas, which had been shown in the larger European capitals and had won an Honorable Mention at the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, was one of a collection of British pictures being shown, under the auspices of the Royal British Colonial Society of Artists, in the old galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, on Phillips Square, in November, 1909.

"The Gate" was a picture that impressed and evoked enthusiasm—and there was no need to hide it when another in the gallery asked how the work appealed. He was singularly well informed regarding it, and with the performances of many other painters whose work was on view, and naturally so respecting "The Gate," since it was the painter's brother—Eric Brown, now Director of the National Gallery of Canada, just commencing his connection with the art life of the Dominion.

Sir Arnesby Brown, then A.R.A., was elected a full Academician in 1915, and his art is represented in the Tate Gallery, the Guildhall permanent collection, Manchester, Auckland (New Zealand), Birmingham, Nottingham (where the painter was born), Walker Art Gallery, Liverpool; National Gallery of Canada, and the National Gallery, Brisbane, to mention a few.

Frank O. Salisbury has painted the King, the Queen, the Prince of Wales, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the late President Coolidge, among many important sitters. His historical works range from "Katherine of Aragon Before the Consistory Courts at Blackfriars" to "The Burial of the Unknown Warrior, Westminster Abbey, 11 November, 1920." He painted, too, "John Travers Cornwall, V.C., in the Battle of Jutland"; "King George V and Queen Mary Visiting the Battle Districts of France"; "The Princess Mary's Wedding in Buckingham Palace"; "The Heart of the Empire, May 6, 1935—The Jubilee Service at St. Paul's," and more recently the official picture of the Coronation of the King and Queen.

Fine Draughtsman Passes

Frederick L. M. Griggs, R.A., R.E., who died at the age of 62 in Chipping Campden, England, earlier this week, was an etcher of high attainments, and two of his prints, marked by his uniformly fine drawing—

SIR WYLY GRIER, P.R.C.A., who is on the committee selecting works for "A Century of Canadian Art," to be exhibited at the Tate Gallery, London, in October.

"Lanterns of Sarraz" and "Owlpen Manor," were included in the loan collection of modern prints and drawings lent by The Contemporary Art Society, and shown at the Art Association of Montreal by arrangement with the National Gallery of Canada, which owns several of his important prints. He was an honorary Associate of the Royal Institute of British Architects, and his work is in the British Museum, Victoria and Albert Museum, and the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, besides English provincial galleries, and the National Galleries of Wales, Canada and Australia, and the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.

While many of his etchings are marked by a rather precise line, his ability to suggest atmosphere in pencil and pen and ink has been effectively revealed in sketches of buildings and landscapes he did to illustrate books describing rambles through various English counties.

Photographic Art Exhibit Is Planned

Fifth Canadian International Salon Set For Ottawa—Conditions Are Announced

Steps have been taken towards forming the fifth Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art, which is to be held in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, from October 21 to November 13, and afterwards in other Canadian cities.

The conditions of this exhibition have been announced as follows:

1. The aim of the committee is to provide a representative exhibition of pictorial photography to be circulated as an educational feature among art galleries in the leading cities of Canada. Only prints the interest of which is chiefly aesthetic will be considered and must be the work of the sender.
2. Multi-colored prints will not be eligible.

3. No entry fee nor return postage is required.

4. Entry form, properly filled out in block letters, should be addressed and mailed separately to Exhibition Secretary, Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art, the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, Canada.

Prints should bear on the back, number to agree with entry form, title, process and the name of the artist. No price should appear on the print.

Prints should be sent by post and addressed to Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art, the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

Both prints and entry form should arrive in Ottawa before September 10, 1938.

Packages containing prints should be clearly marked "Photographs—No Commercial Value—For Exhibition—To be returned to Sender."

5. All parcels containing prints, except Canadian domestic, should be sent by parcel post only. Parcels must not exceed the size established by International Post Regulations. Those countries having parcel post service with Canada may send parcels up to approximately 28" x 20" x 2" maximum (viz:—the combined length and girth must not exceed 6 feet). Prints if sent at "Printed Matter" rate may be sent in packages up to a maximum size of 19" x 15" x 2" (viz:—the combined length, width and thickness must not exceed 3 feet). Larger prints may be sent unmounted in "roll" form.

6. Due to the fact that the Salon will be hung under glass, prints may be sent mounted or unmounted. All accepted prints will be masked and framed in one of the following sizes, 14" x 18", 16" x 20", 22" x 28". In masking all possible care will be taken to protect exhibitors' mounts. Some trimming may be necessary to fit the frames; it should be stated therefore on the entry form if there is any objection to a slight trimming of the mount if it appears advisable.

7. Accepted prints will be on exhibition in various cities for approximately ten months, therefore early return should not be expected. Entrants having no prints accepted will have their package returned post free shortly after the Salon opens.

8. A postal notice will be sent to each entrant immediately after the judging. No other notice will be sent.

9. A well illustrated catalogue will be produced and one free copy sent to each exhibitor after the Salon has opened. Extra copies will be obtainable at 25c. each post paid.

10. Unless otherwise specified permission to reproduce is presumed.

11. Great care will be exercised in the handling of exhibits, but the committee does not accept any responsibility for loss or damage. Sufficient packing should be included for protection in transit to and from the Salon.

12. All prints submitted will be placed before the jury whose decision shall be final.

13. The Gallery cannot undertake the sale of prints, but the artist's address will be given to anyone who may be interested in direct negotiations. For this reason it is suggested that the price should be indicated on the entry form only, if copies are for sale.

ART ASSOCIATION EXTENDING RANGE

Commercial Art Classes to Be Conducted by William
Gazette Ogilvie 21.6.38

Arrangements have now been completed for the various courses to be commenced next October in the Art Studios of the Art Association of Montreal. The work will be under the direction of Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., and Mrs. Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A.

An important addition to the staff has just been made in the appointment of William Ogilvie, recently of Toronto, at one time associated with Charles Comfort of that city, and lately engaged to design and execute a mural decoration for the Chapel of Hart House, in the University of Toronto.

This new appointment makes it possible for the Art School to offer, in addition to the regular classes in drawing and painting, a fundamental and comprehensive education in commercial art.

Mr. Ogilvie is a South African, and while resident there pursued his studies and practice of commercial art and independent painting in oils and water colors. Later he studied and worked in London, England, and since coming to America he studied for some years in New York in the Art Students' League under Nicolaides.

From 1925 he lived in Toronto, was associated with the important groups of painters, and his work is represented in The National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, and in private collections. For a time in Toronto he was engaged in work with Bridgens, Limited.

With Mr. Ogilvie's wide experience and training in commercial art, the Art Association is in a position to offer both elementary and advanced instruction in this subject—not only in technical processes, but also in the theory and principles of pictorial advertising.

The course offered by Mr. Holgate and Mrs. Newton in the Fine Arts will comprise training in life and antique drawing, portrait and still life painting, and this work will be so arranged as to dovetail with the courses given by Mr. Ogilvie.

In addition, during the week there will be two periods in the late afternoons, devoted to quick-sketching classes from life. These will be offered to the public for a nominal fee.

A detailed syllabus is in course of preparation, and will be issued shortly by the Art Association, giving the necessary information as to fees, means of registration, hours of study, etc.

Owing to the restricted accommodation all classes will be limited as to number.

The "Children's Hour"—on Saturday mornings—a class in drawing, painting and modelling for children between the ages of ten and fourteen, conducted with such signal success by Miss Anne Savage and Miss Ethel Seath, and which was filled to capacity last year, will be continued.

Prehistory Story Told On Mural

Star 20.7.38

TORONTO, July 20—(C.P.)—Story of the 24 periods of prehistory is told on a large mural painting completed here yesterday by 77-year-old G. A. Reid, R.C.A., well-known Canadian artist, who has given four years of his life to the task.

The mural, which covers an entire wall at the Royal Ontario Museum of Palaeontology, consists of 34 panels, the largest of which measures nine by 35 feet.

Mr. Reid said his imagination was originally fired by a motion picture, "The Lost World," which showed early geological landscape and the varied development of plants and animals.

The painting depicts in fascinating array the milky way, the birth of the solar system, formation of the earth-moon system and early development of a plant, water, insect and reptile life. Toothed birds are shown beside giant plant-eating dinosaurs.

"I was afraid I wouldn't live to complete the task," Mr. Reid said. "It was an enormous work to undertake almost at the end of one's life."

Acquisitions Show Open Mind— Veronese to Old Group of Seven

Gazette 25.6.38

Accessions to the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, display a distinctly catholic taste. According to the annual report of the Board of Trustees the following oil paintings were added:

"Saint Francis in Meditation," El Greco (Domenico Theotocopoulos), 1542-1614.

"The Rest on the Flight into Egypt," Paolo Veronese (Paolo Caliari), 1528-1588.

"Ruined Buildings," John Crome, 1769-1821.

"Tea in the Garden," Margaret Fisher Prout.

"Upper Ottawa, near Mattawa," Franklin Carmichael, A.R.C.A.

"Blunden Harbour," "Heina," "Sky," Emily Carr.

"Valley of the Devil River," Maurice G. Cullen, R.C.A., 1866-1934.

"Bylot Island," Lawren S. Harris, "October on the North Shore,"

"Nova Scotia Fishing Village," Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A.

"Gleams on the Hills," (reproduced on this page last Saturday) and Six Sketches, J. E. H. MacDonald, R.C.A., 1873-1932.

"Green Valley," "Field Township, Normandie," Carl Schaefer.

Painted Dish, Tom Thomson, 1877-1917.

Portrait of H. S. Southam, C.M.G., F. H. Varley, A.R.C.A.

Diploma Works: "Interior," Archibald Barnes, R.C.A.; "Peace Tower, Ottawa," John A. Pearson, R.C.A.

Commenting on the El Greco and the Veronese the report says, "...

The earliest in point of date is a large and brilliantly painted composition, "The Rest on the Flight into Egypt" by Paolo Veronese (Paolo Caliari), 1528-1588. It contains one of the most beautiful and natural interpretations of the Holy Family ever painted, while the animals and landscape are treated in that easy, decorative manner typical of the artist and closely connected with the two other works by this artist in the National Gallery collection, the large "Christ with Angels" and "The Repentant Magdalen." These three important examples by the great Venetian master give the National Gallery one of the finest representations of his work outside European collections.

"The National Gallery picture, which is in oil on canvas, ten feet by six feet, is from the collection of Sir Timothy Eden. Windlestone, Durham, whose ancestor acquired it in Spain in 1830, where it is believed to have been brought from Genoa.

"Saint Francis in Meditation" by the Spanish artist Domenico Theotocopoulos, called El Greco, 1542-1614, is also an outstanding accession. El Greco was born in the island of Crete and came to Spain via Italy, where he studied for a time with Tintoretto. Saint Francis was one of his favorite subjects and he painted the saint either alone or with attendants on many occasions.

"The National Gallery picture comes from the Church of Nambrosa in Toledo. It is referred to in Dr. A. L. Mayer's "El Greco," 1931, as one of the finest and best preserved of the Saint Francis versions painted by the artist."

The following prints and drawings were also acquired:

16th Century: Augustin Hirschvogel (1503-1553?), River Scene with a Wooden Bridge, etching.

17th Century: Wenzel Hollar (1607-1677), Muffs, Collar, Gloves, Mask and Fan, etching.

Adriaen van Ostade (1610-1685), The Angler, B. 26, etching.

18th Century: Francisco Goya y Lucientes, The Woman Carried off by a Horse, etching and aquatint.

20th Century: Albert Besnard (1849-1934), Le Dejeuner, G. 50, etching.

Frederick L. Griggs, The Cross Hands, etching.

Canadian Prints and Drawings: Laurence Hyde, Frontispiece to Macbeth, wood engraving.

Thoreau MacDonald, Loons, wash drawing.

David B. Milne, Barns, color dry-point.

James Wilson Morrice, 1865-1924, Two sketch books.

Walter J. Phillips, R.C.A., Hnusa, color woodcut.

F. H. Varley, A.R.C.A., Head of a Girl, drawing.

The school is under the direct supervision of the Art Association, and occupies an important place in its large-scale plans for the encouragement and development of art in all its phases in the community.

With the aid of instructors of high achievement and wide recognition, a comprehensive syllabus of instruction in drawing, painting and commercial art is offered, and this, in conjunction with the opportunities of free study in the association's galleries, museum and library, give the students not only a training in technical excellence, but a background of appreciation of the greatest conceivable value in their own creative work.

In addition, lectures are given from time to time by authorities upon various branches of art and applications to modern life.

Prizes and scholarships are available for successful students.

The instructors for the coming year are Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A.; Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A.; and William Ogilvie, who will conduct the commercial art classes.

The schedule of classes as at present drawn up include:

Commercial Art Classes: Instructor: Mr. Ogilvie. Elementary and Advanced Courses, leading to a comprehensive professional training.

Quick Sketching from Life: This class will be open to pupils and public Tuesday and Thursday afternoons from 5 to 6.30, and will not include instruction.

William Ogilvie comes here from Toronto, where he has just designed and executed an important mural decoration for the chapel in Hart House, Toronto University.

Elementary and advanced courses in commercial art will be given. The former will consist of instruction in elementary decorative design and the processes of reproduction, photo-engraving, and zinc and line engraving. The advanced classes will give instruction in the preparation of drawings for various processes of color reproduction, newspaper and magazine advertising, direct mail advertising, booklets, poster design, window display cards, modern packaging design, fashion drawing, etc. In addition, lectures will be held on the general theories and principle of advertising, and advanced students will be encouraged to do special projects in the field for which they show particular aptitude.

Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., of Montreal, was born at Allandale, Ont., and studied at the School of the Art Association of Montreal under William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A. Awarded scholarship in drawing, 1907. In Paris 1912, studied under Castelucchio and later with Lucien Simon and Rene Menard. Returning to Paris in 1920, studied with A. Milman. Exhibited at Salon d'Automne 1922. Elected A.R.C.A. 1935 and R.C.A. 1936. A member of the Group of Seven, 1931-1933.

His works in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, include "Suzy," and "Nude in Landscape." His canvas "The Bathers" was acquired by the Art Association of Montreal last year.

Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., was born at Montreal and studied at Montreal Art Association Schools under William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A. Awarded scholarships in Elementary and Life Classes. Mrs. Newton's works in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, are: "Nonnie," "The Little Sisters," "Anna," "Self Portrait" and a portrait of the late Dr. F. J. Shepherd, of Montreal, who was a former chairman of the Advisory Arts Council of the National Gallery of Canada.

William Ogilvie was born in South Africa and came to Canada in 1925. Studied at Art Students' League, New York. Has practised Commercial Art and painting in London and New York. Went to Toronto, and was for several years a member of staff of Brigidens Limited. He is a member of the Canadian Society of Graphic Art. His work in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, is "African Day," a watercolor.

Gagnon Illustrations Return

A series of paintings by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., illustrating "Maria Chapdelaine," Louis Hemon's story of the Peribonka country, will be again put on exhibition in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal this month. This is due to the desire of the association to give summer visitors a chance of seeing these paintings. The exhibition will last through August.

Eaton Gift to Library

The Library of the Art Association has benefited by many gifts during the past few months, apart from the usual acquisitions of the Association. A special series of shelves is being devoted to the display of the new books secured. A noteworthy contribution to the library was a recent gift of six handsome leather chairs, three reading tables and three reading lamps, which have added materially to the appearance and comfort of the room. They are the gift of the T. Eaton Company Limited, of Montreal.

H. Leslie Smith is interested in the daily life about him, as is evidenced by "Cafe" and "Lunch Counter" in which his types are not beautified, and there is directness in the painting of "Back Street, Caughnawaga," by A. Cloutier, and "Sketch at Cartierville"—trees, house and well-sweep, by T. Gar-side. L. G. Morris has four good works of small size—"Oka," "Tugboats, Lachine," "Chateauguay River" and "Bath Houses, Lachine," and D. R. Morrice has an effectively handled painting of a geranium, and also a Negro's head. P. Andrew shows a man's head and also a studio interior, and T. R. Macdonald reveals his usual ability in a still life, featuring a plaster cast with a chipped nose. R. Sharps, is clear and direct in his painting of "The Chapter House, Christ Church Cathedral, Montreal." R. G. Mackay is a trifle sombre in his "Beaver Hall Hill," which gives a glimpse of St. Patrick's Church, and Paul Caron has a typical watercolor called "17th Century Houses, Montreal," the awnings of the old buildings enlivening the color.

Interesting Works Shown at Arts Club

Gazette 25.6.38
Summer Exhibition by Members Is Varied in Its Offerings
In Different Media

At The Arts Club, 2027 Victoria street, the summer exhibition of work by members contains much that is interesting and meritorious. R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., shows landscapes—"Hills at St. Urbain, Autumn," "Autumn, Baie St. Paul, Que." and "Pine Trees, Mont Roland," the last-named being a winter scene, with the trees, a glimpse of open brook, and blue shadows making a capital interpretation of the season. E. H. Holgate, R.C.A., has an attractive painting of a girl in a blue blouse, and Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., the club's president, besides a house amidst trees, done in sepia, shows a typical street scene in winter—the tobacconist's shop at the corner of Bleury and St. Catherine streets, with pedestrians at night. W. H. Taylor has a number of cove and wharf scenes done at Lunenburg and Peggy's Cove in Nova Scotia, and T. Topham besides "Winter Sunrise, Lost River, P.Q."—hills and snow catching the first gleams, and the stream pouring from the ice-covered lake, is successful with the effect of sunlit spray and white water dashing down a narrow channel between noble hills in "Sunrise, North River Rapids, Val David," also a winter scene. Quieter in mood is "Neige"—birches and evergreen edging a frozen lake with hills beyond, by E. Lemieux, as is also "Val Morin, North River," by R. Vincelette.

The Art Association 2.7.38 St. Extends Its Courses

The art classes, which the Art Association of Montreal has carried on for many years, are to be much developed next season, and a prospectus of the new plans is just issued. In addition to the former courses in drawing and painting, courses in pictorial composition and commercial art will be given.

Next season's teaching will be carried on by Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., and Lillian Torrance Newton, R.C.A., two of the best known artists in Canada, and by William Ogilvie, Mr. Ogilvie, who was born in South Africa and received his training at the Art Students' League, New York, has practiced commercial art and painting in London and New York, and came in 1925 to Toronto, where he was for some years on the staff of Brigidens, Ltd. One of his latest works was an important mural decoration in the chapel of Hart House, University of Toronto.

Classes in Drawing from Life and the Antique will be directed by Mr. Holgate, assisted by Mr. Ogilvie. Classes in portrait and still life painting will be directed by Mrs. Newton, assisted by Mr. Ogilvie. Mr. Ogilvie will also direct a course in pictorial composition and two courses, elementary and advanced, in commercial art, which will cover the principal forms of illustrative and advertising work and the processes used in reproduction and printing. Another new course will be in quick sketching from the living model, and this will be open to the public as well as to regular students.

The work will be carried on in two terms of twelve weeks each, from October 3 to December 23, and from January 9 to March 31. Students are required to apply not later than September 26, to the secretary of the school at the Ontario street entrance of the Art Gallery on Sherbrooke street.

Carill Hay Shaw Makes Progress in England

Gazette 4.7.38
Graduate of Ecole des Beaux Arts, Montreal, Specializes in Wood Engravings

Montrealers who remember Carill Hay Shaw's achievement in winning a scholarship in the Empire-wide competition of Industrial Design held by the Royal Society of Arts, London, in 1929, writes a correspondent from Farnham, Surrey, England, will be interested in the following extract printed in a recent issue of the Farnham Herald, which was included in a lengthy report of the annual Exhibition of Arts and Crafts held by the Alton Art Society.

The extract, after mentioning a wood engraving of "Dunster Castle," goes on: "Mr. Hay Shaw also had a 'Portrait Head,' a wood engraving, 'Nativity,' and 'Cottage in the Quantocks.' Yellow light shining from the windows of a dark church tower, with a great star in the background drew a gaze to 'Church Windows,' and a vessel on mud-flats at low tide, with fog all around, was entitled 'Thames Barge.' All Mr. Hay Shaw's work bore the stamp of ability."

Mr. Hay Shaw, who is a graduate of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Montreal, has resided in England since he completed his course of study at the Royal College of Arts, London, and has specialised in commissioned wood engravings and pencil drawings of homes and gardens. During the week preceding the Alton Exhibition he held a very successful show of his work at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Eric Walker, Headon Cottage, Farnham, Surrey, which also included water-color sketches and portraits in oils and pastels. Of special interest to Montrealers were an engraving of Hatch Court, Somerset, the home of Lt.-Col. and Mrs. Hamilton Gault, and two drawings of Sheafayne Manor, near Honiton, Devon, where Col. Gault's sister, Mrs. Percy Benson, and her husband reside. Of more wide-spread appeal was an intimate engraving of the fireside in the London flat occupied for many years by the late Sir Percival Phillips, the famous war correspondent, and a large engraving of the historic Castle of Dunstar, Somerset, specially commissioned by Geoffrey Luttrell, whose family have occupied it for five hundred years. Mr. Hay Shaw's commissions for the current year include two drawings to be made in the gardens of Sir Malcolm Fraser, Pix-holme Court, Dorking, Surrey. These gardens are noted throughout Southern England for their beauty and are thrown open to the public once every summer.

Art Association Classes

This week the prospectus of the School of the Art Association of Montreal was ready for distribution. The first term will open October 3, and close December 23, and the second term is to open on January 9, and conclude March 31. The instructors are Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A.; Mrs. Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., and William Ogilvie, the last-named conducting the commercial art class, which is a new department.

Owing to the restricted accommodation, all classes will be limited as to number. Pupils are requested to apply to the secretary of the school, Miss A. Puls, not later than September 26.

ERIC NEWTON, B.A.

Eric Newton Writes Of Christopher Wood

Gazette 4.7.38
English Critic, Who Lectured
Here, Pens Memorial
Volume on Young
British Painter

Eric Newton, northern art critic of the Manchester Guardian, who in February, 1937, gave an illustrated lecture on "The Meaning of Modern Art" to members of the Art Association of Montreal, has recently written a book on the young English painter Christopher Wood, 1901-1930, for the Redfern Gallery, London.

A critic writing in The Times Literary Supplement has this to say:

"This memorial volume was designed for a recent exhibition of Christopher Wood's paintings organized by the Redfern Gallery. It contains a number of reproductions in color, and a smaller number in monochrome, a chronological list of the pictures, a table giving details of the artist's travels, and an account of his life and works by Mr. Eric Newton. This last was evidently a difficult task; as Mr. Newton observes, what amounts to a legend has grown up around Wood, the result of his individual character and early death. Mr. Newton is confident of his subject's genius, though perhaps not always convincingly so, but he discusses candidly enough Wood's imitativeness, and has much that is interesting to say about his development and method of painting."

Eric Newton, B.A. (1913); mosaic artist, decorative painter; member Art Workers' Guild; northern art critic to the Manchester Guardian, was born at Marple Bridge, April 28, 1893. He has exhibited at the Paris exhibition of Decorative Art, at the Royal Academy, and is official purchaser for the Rutherford Collection, Manchester. His work has been illustrated in The Studio (decorative drawings, mosaics, etc.) Other principal works include an altar-piece at the Church of Our Lady and St. Edward, Chiswick, (for Sir G. Gilbert Scott). Publications include reprints of lectures on art in The Listener, Arundel Society's Journal, while an article on Van Gogh was re-printed as a leaflet. He is also author of the book "The Artist and His Public." In 1935 he gave a series of twelve lectures for the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Hamilton MacCarthy, Canadian Sculptor, Enjoys 92nd Birthday

July 29th 1938.

OTTAWA, July 29 — (C.P.) —

Hamilton MacCarthy, outstanding Canadian sculptor, whose work in bronze and stone adorns many homes and public places here and abroad, yesterday celebrated his 92nd birthday. He is hale, hearty and happy.

Since Christmas Mr. MacCarthy, whose pointed white beard and tall, slim frame make him a distinguished figure, has spent most of his days in bed. This is not because of ill health, for he eats well, reads intently and hears clearly; but, he says, he is "tired." He has decided to await the century before having another large party such as featured the passing of his 90th milestone.

Mr. MacCarthy has placed his mark in Ottawa. On Nepean Point, overlooking the Ottawa River, stands his bronze Champlain statue; crowning the entrance to the Royal Canadian mint is his last work, the Dominion's coat-of-arms; and in City Hall square is his memorial to Ottawa soldiers killed in the South African War. He executed this in collaboration with Philippe Hebert.

Monuments created by Mr. MacCarthy also abound in other Canadian cities. That to Sir John A. MacDonald in Queen's Park, Toronto, is one of his works.

Prior to making his name in Canada, the famous dean of Canadian sculptors won acclaim in England where he molded life-size portrait busts of Queen Victoria, the Duke of Cambridge, Disraeli, the Duke of Wellington and many others. He won favor with Leopold, King of the Belgians, who engaged him to execute several works.

Music and reading are Mr. MacCarthy's pleasures. A talented actor in his youth, he delights in listening to plays and operas over the radio. Current affairs do not interest him greatly although he is conversant with them. Rather, he prefers to read modern books on sculpturing and the Bible.

CLARENCE GAGNON

The Standard, 2.7.38

FOREMOST PAINTER OF FRENCH-CANADA

BY RICHARD H. HAVILAND

FIRST and foremost, Clarence A. Gagnon, D.Litt., R.C.A., is the artist. For years, in-between his long sojourns in Paris, he has been interpreting the colorful life and customs of the habitants of Quebec with keen insight and sympathy. Today he stands unquestionably as the foremost painter of French Canada, and his work as a painter, etcher and illustrator holds a high place in Europe as well as in Canada.

But more than this, he is a fisherman of repute. And no quiet, nearby lakes for him. The spots he loves are the wild, inaccessible rivers and streams of the North. He is an adventurer at heart, and dislikes the advent of the aeroplane, which now gives easy access to all parts of the northland. "Going in that way you miss all the fun," he says.

Varied Enthusiasms

In his fifty-seventh year, and somewhat short of stature, he is still wonderfully active. He is a man of enthusiasms and many interests, and attractively combines old world courtesy and charm of manner with new world vitality of action and thought. His long art career has trained him to observe, and an hour's conversation with him is as instructive as it is entertaining, and may cover such widely variegated subjects as the sunsets in Lapland, a new school of art in the United States, fishing in Norway, the "art racket" in Paris, and the origin of the French-Canadian handicraft patterns and designs. He loves the countries of the North, and has made many visits to Norway, Sweden and Lapland.

It is generally agreed that his most outstanding work is the wonderful set of 54 illustrations he completed a few years ago for Louis Hemon's epic story of rural home life in French Canada, "Maria Chapdelaine," which now ranks as a classic. The originals of this delightful set of illustrations will be on view for the second time at the gallery of the Art Association of Montreal during the summer months, and no one should miss the opportunity of seeing them.

Another outstanding work of Mr. Gagnon's that must be mentioned is the colorful and captivating series of illustrations for "Le Grand Silence Blanc," a tale of the Far North by the French writer, Louis Frederic Rouquette.

Montreal and Paris

Born in Montreal, on November 8, 1881, the son of Alphonse E. Gagnon, of this city, and Sarah Ann Willford, of Boston, England, Clarence Gagnon received his early art education at the Art Association of Montreal, and then went to Paris in 1904, where he studied at the famous Academie Julian, under Jean Paul Laurens.

In 1904 he had won a medal in the Fine Arts Section at the St. Louis Exposition with a painting entitled "Oxen Ploughing," but his first pronounced success was in etching, in which art he received honorable mention at the Paris Salon in 1906.

Since then he has been a regular exhibitor at the Paris Salons, and his paintings and etchings have been exhibited and hung in more foreign galleries than those of probably any other living Canadian painter. At various times works of his have been purchased by the Petit Palais, Paris; South Kensington Museum, London; Walker Art Gallery, Liverpool; and by galleries in Dresden, Florence, Rome, Venice, The Hague, and Mulhausen. In Canada a number of his works are represented at the National Art Gallery, Ottawa, and in the gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, as well as in the galleries of Toronto, Saint John, Halifax and Quebec.

Academician in 1921

He was elected an associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1910, and a full academician in 1921. He was also elected a member of the Salmagundi Club of New York City in 1921, where, two years later, he won the Trevor Prize for the best picture in the annual exhibition of the club. He is a life member of the Art Club of Montreal and only last month he was awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Literature by the University of Montreal.

In 1919 he married Lucille Rodier, daughter of Leopold Rodier, of Westmount.

Of late years he has been exhibiting paintings almost exclusively, his Quebec landscapes being specially noteworthy for their sumptuous color and fine pattern. Art lovers in Canada are thankful that he is back living in Montreal, but still regret the long periods he spent on the Continent etching scenes in France, Spain and Italy, when he might have been roaming our own countryside, leaving a more complete pictorial record of the life and customs of the habitants than has been possible in the comparatively short periods he has spent on this side.

MR. GAGNON AT HIS DESK

For Isle of Orleans

At the present time his great interest is in his scheme for making the beautiful and historic Isle of Orleans, just below Quebec City, into a great national "outdoor museum," where the spirit of old French-Canada could be preserved in a natural setting, safe from such modern "improvements" as hot dog stands, gas stations and bill boards. Here, among the fine old French-Canadian homes and churches, he would found a school for the preservation of the native French-Canadian arts and crafts. He would also have a great annual festival on the island, during which there would be exhibitions on handicraft, folksongs, plays, music, and so on. And, as well as saving the age-old customs and traditions and arts of the habitants from possible oblivion, it would, as he points out, provide one of the greatest imaginable tourist attractions.

Lady Floud on Art

(Special to The Gazette.)
Victoria, B.C., July 9.—One of the most stimulating of people to interview because of her varied interests, balanced outlook, sincere and vivid personality, Lady Floud, wife of Sir Francis Floud, British High Commissioner to Canada, on arrival at the Empress Hotel, Victoria, B.C., where with her husband she is spending several days, announced her hope of visiting and seeing the work of Miss Emily Carr, internationally known local artist.

An artist (ex Slade) Lady Floud has exhibited at the New English Art Club, London. Since her arrival in Ottawa two and a half years ago, she has become president of the Art Association of that city, and is painting the Canadian scene as she sees it. Her "Sorting Logs on the Gatineau," was done on a raft in the river. Another picture, "Sawing Ice on Rideau River," she says presented difficulties. She drove her car as near the scene as possible, stayed as long as she could each day without getting frozen and, having persuaded some of the men to pose for her, finished the work in her town studio. She hopes to see her, raking while in Victoria and make her notes for a picture of it.

Frederick Varley, A.R.C.A., at present in Montreal, she thinks is as brilliant a teacher as the late Professor Tonks of the Slade. In the course of conversation she revealed the fact that Eric Newton, art critic of The Manchester Guardian was asked to call on Miss Carr while in Victoria by art authorities in England.

With her vocation painting, Lady Floud is also a distinguished speaker, usually on art subjects and occasionally over the radio. She spoke recently on a coast-to-coast international hookup.

Work of Assembling Canadian Paintings for London Under Way

Art Association of Montreal and Local Collectors Approached Respecting Loans for Exhibition at Tate Gallery in Autumn
Gazette 9.7.38

Work has begun in making the collection of paintings for the exhibition of "A Century of Canadian Art," which is to open in the Tate Gallery, London, in October. Already some Montreal picture-lovers have been approached with a view to securing loans of work, and the Art Association of Montreal has received word from the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa,—which is directing the choice and assembling of the pictures—that its collection of Canadian paintings may be drawn on.

The works to go overseas later promise to be representative of the products of artists in the Dominion over a long period of years, and that an open mind will be shown in their choice is evident by the composition of the committee which has this work in hand.

The committee of artists includes Sir Wyly Grier, president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts; A. Y. Jackson, president of the Canadian Group of Painters; Elizabeth Wyn Wood, A.R.C.A., president of the Sculptors' Society, and Peter Haworth, president of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Colors. Also assisting the National Gallery are Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., of Montreal, and Martin Baldwin, curator of the Toronto Art Gallery.

Art Library Enlarged

Recent acquisitions to the growing collection of reference books and prints by the Art Association of Montreal, include 3,000 large-size photographic prints of ancient and modern masterpieces in the European galleries and in the Royal Galleries of England. Another collection of value to the student is the set of reproductions of drawings by Holbein. These acquisitions were made possible by a gift from a benefactor of the association. In the library, too, provision has been made for the current art books, so that they can be consulted without delay.

The large collection of remarkably faithful reproductions in color of paintings by the older and modern artists, which are periodically changed and exhibited in the library or the Print Room, are proving of value. Selections of these are loaned to outside educational institutions, groups recently having been placed at the disposal of Macdonald College and Douglas Hall.

Paintings by Gagnon

There is no abatement of interest in the fifty odd paintings that Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., did for Louis Hemon's "Maria Chapdelaine." They grace the walls of the Print Room of the Art Association, and, newly matted, look even more alluring than they did when shown earlier this year. Mr. Gagnon knows the Peribonka country—indeed, rural Quebec life in general—and in every item of this outstanding collection there is evidence of complete understanding of his subject. It was a long and sympathetic task interpreting Hemon's story, but one that was crowned with complete success. These paintings are being shown again in the belief that Montreal art-lovers welcome them back, as well as the knowledge that among the summer visitors to the galleries there are certain to be many who attended the recent ceremonies at Peribonka, the setting of the book, and Chapleau, where Hemon died.

Canadian Art and Artists

SIR EDMUND WYLY GRIER

PRESIDENT ROYAL CANADIAN ACADEMY SINCE 1929

Standard, 9.7.38

BY RICHARD H. HAVILAND

SIR Edmund Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., President of the Royal Canadian Academy for the past nine years, needs little introduction to Canadians. For nearly half a century he has been closely identified with the arts and interests of the Dominion, and he holds an outstanding place all his own in portrait painting. No one in Canada has given us more faithful and admirable portraiture than Sir Wyly Grier, and none has been so prolific.

Following the tradition of the great portrait painter of the past, such as Vandyke, Reynolds, Velasquez, Gainsborough, Romney, Sargent, and others whose canvasses have left us a priceless picture of their day and age such as can never be found in the colorless words of a history book, Sir Wyly has already given us a record of his contemporaries which as time goes on will comprise a most important contribution of our times to the age ahead.

For 40 Years and More

HAPPY in his chosen career of art, he has worked away industriously for 40 years and more. During this time very few of our outstanding men, especially in the area of Toronto, have missed sitting for him. His long list of subjects include such names as Hon. Edward Blake, Sir John Macdonald, Sir Glenholme Falconbridge, Sir Oliver Mowat, Sir William Meredith, Sir William Mulock, Sir Sanford Fleming, General S. G. Mewburn, and scores of others. These are to be found in public and private collections from coast to coast, including several studies in the National Art Gallery, Ottawa.

One of the finest and most interesting examples of his work is the portrait of Dr. James Douglas (grandfather of Dr. William Lewis Douglas, Principal of McGill University) after whom Douglas Hall, the new residence for men at McGill University is named. It was painted from a study made by Sir Wyly before Dr. Douglas' death, and was unveiled by Lord Tweedsmuir at the official opening of Douglas Hall in October 1937.

SIR E. WYLY GRIER

Born in Australia

ALTHOUGH he has lived most of his life in the Dominion, Sir Wyly is not a Canadian by birth, but hails from "down under." He was born in Melbourne, Australia, in 1862, the son of Charles Grier, a native of Caven, Ireland, and a doctor by profession. He was taken to England at the age of four, where he was educated at private schools. On coming to Canada at the age of 14, he became a pupil at Upper Canada College, Toronto.

He had early shown a marked aptitude for drawing, and, pursuing his artistic ambitions, eventually became a pupil at the Slade Art School in London, in 1879, where he had an excellent teacher in Alphonse Legros, and the friendship and advice of George Frederic Watts, R.A. He also studied at the Scuola Libera in Rome, Italy, and at the famous Julian Academy in Paris, under Bougereau and Tony Robert-Fleury. He won distinction at all these schools, and in 1886, at the age of 24, had a full length portrait exhibited at the Royal Academy in London, where he continued to exhibit until 1896. In 1890 he won a gold medal for a picture called "Bereft" at the Paris Salon, and in 1901, at the Pan American Exhibition in Buffalo, N.Y., received a silver medal for a portrait of the late Frederick Wyld.

Knighted in 1935

AFTER about 10 years of study and painting on the Continent, Sir Wyly returned to Toronto, and soon became known as a painter of portraits. He was made an associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1893, a full academician in 1894, and, more recently, has been president of the Academy since 1929. He was likewise president of the Ontario Society of Artists from 1908 to 1913. In 1934 he was awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law by the University of Bishop's College, and in 1935 was honored by the King with a Knight Bachelorhood.

His interests have by no means been confined to art. From 1897 to 1905 he served with the Royal Canadian Artillery, rising to be Major in Command of the 9th Field Battery, and in 1903 he was vice-president of the Canadian Military Institute. He is also a keen outdoor sportsman, his favorite pastimes being riding, shooting, fishing and canoeing.

Writer and Lecturer

SIR WYLY has always done his utmost to further the cause of art, however, and has written and lectured extensively on the subject. For more than a year he was art editor of "The Week," a magazine inaugurated by the late Goldwyn Smith.

In 1895 he married Florence Geale Dickson, daughter of J. Geale Dickson, and they have three sons and two daughters. His eldest son, Crawford Grier, is headmaster of Bishop's College School, Lennoxville, Que., while Miss Stella Grier, A.R.C.A., following in her father's footsteps, is devoted to art.

Sir Wyly is wonderfully active, with a vigorous, youthful appearance that belies his 75 years — for which he likely has his fondness for sports to thank — and his energy and skill are still unabated, so that admirers of his work may look forward to many more productions from his brush.

Lady Hickson

(Contributed.)

A lady of charm and distinction has passed away. Lady Hickson, in the first years of her marriage to Sir Joseph Hickson (which occurred in 1869), became immediately associated with the leading statesmen and prominent citizens of her day. Confederation was then just born and the construction of the railways, the reform and codification of the laws and particularly the harmonizing of the racial elements composing the population of the country were then vital to the existence of the new Constitution. Sir Joseph Hickson was intimately connected with all the leaders and Sir Georges Etienne Cartier and Sir Adolphe Chapleau, to mention only two of them, were frequent guests at the Hickson house. Lady Hickson's charming hospitality, her perfect understanding of the serious problems discussed in her presence and her tactful support of her distinguished husband, contributed more than the people of our generation know to the solving of our national problems.

To the prestige which she held with the mighty may be added her understanding and sympathy with the poor and suffering. Although prominently identified with many public charitable institutions, it was her generosity in dispensing without ostentation her benefactions to the individual which brought the word of gratitude to the lips and the smile of happiness to the face of the forgotten man and woman.

Her personality was striking and those who were privileged to be received in the intimacy of her home felt that the dignity of the "grand dame" was softened by the sweetness of her disposition and sincerity of her friendship. Lady Hickson has gone but she has left a standard of life which, even if it is not attained, may well be emulated.

LADY HICKSON DIES
IN HER 95TH YEAR

Gazette 12.7.38
Was Prominent in Social and Charitable Life of City—
End Came Suddenly

Lady Hickson, member of one of Montreal's oldest families and widow of the late Sir Joseph Hickson, among Canada's leading railway magnates of the last century died suddenly early yesterday afternoon at her residence, 3428 Ontario avenue, in her 95th year. She had been ill for only three days.

Born in Montreal in 1844, the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Dow, and niece of the late William Dow, founder of Dow's Brewery, she was educated at local private schools. In 1869 she married Joseph Hickson, who was knighted in 1890 by Queen Victoria for valuable national services.

Early in life she became recognized as a hostess of charm, and her home was a centre of hospitality for many years. But her talents were not confined to the social field. Her attention to charitable work never wavered throughout the years. She was one of the promoters of the Royal Edward Institute, and was prominently identified with the Montreal League for the Prevention of Tuberculosis. She was a leading member of the Ladies Benevolent Society, devoting many years of service to the work of that organization, and for a period held the vice-presidency of the Montreal branch of the Needlework Guild of Canada.

Her interest in church work was conducted with equal sincerity. She was a member of old St. Andrew's Church on Beaver Hall Hill which later amalgamated with St. Paul's Church to become the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul, of which she was the oldest member.

Throughout her long life, she enjoyed excellent health, and remained active socially until five years ago when she met with an accident, from which she never fully recovered.

Her husband, the late Sir Joseph Hickson, general manager of the old Grand Trunk Railway, who died in 1897, came to Canada in 1861 from Manchester, England, where he was assistant to the general manager of the Manchester Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway. His railway career in Canada was one of the most remarkable on record, being characterized by rapid promotion and unusual success. He became general manager of the old Grand Trunk Railway in 1874 and retired in 1891.

He was either president, vice-president or director of nearly 20 companies. He was appointed president of the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic in 1895. He was also interested in various banking, manufacturing and industrial enterprises.

Lady Hickson is survived by three daughters Miss Beatrice Hickson, Miss Mabel Hickson, both of Montreal; and Mrs. W. J. Allan, of Chilliwack, British Columbia; and two sons, Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, formerly of McGill University, and R. N. Hickson, both of Montreal.

Another son, Claud Hickson, K.C., a brilliant lawyer, died some years ago.

Mrs. J. J. Hay Browne, who on Sunday, August 7, celebrates her 102nd birthday anniversary. The photograph was taken by a Star photographer yesterday afternoon at Mrs. Browne's summer cottage at Como.

ATTAINS TWO YEARS
OVER CENTURY MARK

Mrs. Hay Browne 102
Years Old Next Sunday

A well-known resident of Montreal since the year of Confederation, Mrs. J. J. Hay Browne celebrates her 102nd birthday on Sunday next at her summer home at Como, where during the afternoon she will receive some of her old friends.

Born at Leith, Scotland, on August 7th, 1836, Mrs. Browne was the third daughter of Thomas Hay and his wife, Agnes Dunlop Hunter. She came to Canada to visit her sister, Mrs. George Winks, arriving at Quebec on August 3, 1867. One of the first persons she met soon after her arrival was John James Browne, and they were married at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George Winks on Dorchester street, December 19, 1867. Mr. Browne, a well-known architect in Montreal, died in 1893. Two daughters, Miss A. D. Hay Browne and Miss Daisy Hay Browne, live with their mother. A third daughter is Mrs. C. E. Winks, of Winnipeg. There is one granddaughter, Mrs. James Ross Jenkins, and two great granddaughters. Mrs. Browne has one surviving sister, Miss Hay, of Edinburgh, who is eighty-nine years old.

Mrs. Browne has lived in six reigns—under William IV, Queen Victoria, Edward VII, George V, Edward VIII and George VI. In none of them, perhaps, was she more interested than in the present young King, to whose coronation last year she listened over the radio with close attention. When Queen Elizabeth's mother died she wanted to know all details.

After they were first married, Mr. and Mrs. Browne lived for a time at St. Lawrence Hall, then the foremost residential hotel in the city. When Mr. Browne built the family residence on St. Luke street horse-drawn cars ran only as far as Guy street, and where St. Cote St. Antoine road is now was "in the country."

While most people of advanced age live mainly in the past Mrs. Browne has always been interested in her surroundings and in happenings of the present. Until an illness about four years ago she was a member of the Women's Canadian Club, and attended many of its lectures. She has also been for many years a member of the Women's Art Society. Although her eyesight is failing, she still does a good deal of knitting and made two afghans in the past year.

She is looking forward to her birthday on Sunday afternoon, although she is not able to have as large a party as she had when she celebrated her hundredth anniversary two years ago. Age is taking its toll but a remarkable constitution has enabled her to make a good recovery from an illness of the past winter, and from effects of heat prostration earlier in the summer.

STUDIES SCHOOLS HERE

Visiting Canada for the first time, Mr. and Mrs. P. C. Floud, of London, are shown here on board the Cunarder Aulonia, on which they reached Montreal last evening. Mr. Floud is a son of Sir Francis Floud, British High Commissioner to Canada. While here he will study the relation between museums and schools in the Dominion.

Undertakes Task

In Canada to study the connection between Canadian museums and Canadian schools, P. C. Floud, of London, son of Sir Francis Floud, British High Commissioner to Canada, arrived in Montreal last night with his wife on the Cunard White Star liner Aulonia.

Mr. Floud, who is connected with the Victoria and Albert Museum, said that he would study the situation in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, particularly in the arts and sciences side.

"I believe that in Canada the borrowing of objects from museums by schools is carried out more extensively than in Great Britain. I understand that such practice is carried on with still greater emphasis in the United States."

DENIES DEATH-BED
WISH OF SCULPTOR

Edinburgh Opposes Burial of Tait McKenzie's Heart
Near War Memorial

(Special to The Gazette.)

Brockville, August 14.—According to a report received at Almonte, where he was born and where he maintained a summer studio, the corporation of the City of Edinburgh has declined to meet a death-bed wish of Dr. R. Tait McKenzie, celebrated sculptor who was a graduate of McGill University, that his heart should be buried in front of the Scottish-American War Memorial, in Princes Street Gardens, Edinburgh, of which he was the sculptor.

The wish was expressed to the corporation by Dr. J. Norman Henry, president of the Scottish-American Memorial Association, which asked permission to dig a grave in the gardens for the sculptor's heart.

The request was refused, but facilities were offered for interment of the heart in St. Cuthbert's burying-ground, less than half a mile from the memorial.

Canadian Artists Showing Work In Eaton's Fine Art Galleries

Gazette, 6. 8. 38

Paintings by Canadian painters hold the walls of the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and many interesting items are displayed. During the course of the show, which lasts until September 10, there will be a weekly change in the works on exhibition. The opening collection, while a bit uneven in quality, generally reveals considerable conscientious endeavor, and, effectively hung, gives a number of the younger artists an exceptional opportunity to show their work to advantage.

There is variety in the subjects, and, barring a couple of works by Sam Borenstein, attention is given to accepted form and color. While Borenstein expresses his individual view, his painting of the wharf-front, showing the old Harbor Commission building, is not enhanced by squeezing the proportions of the Royal Bank of Canada Building.

A. Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., has some engaging things which reveal the finished painter—"The Back Door," in sunlight and shadow, with a figure and flowers in bloom; and "Old House, Cote de Liesse Road," a substantial old-time structure in sunlight with a woman tending the garden.

Kathleen Morris, A.R.C.A., shows her usual bold brushwork in "Beaver Hall Hill," as seen from Craig street, with the Bell Telephone Building dominating the adjacent structures.

Berthe DesClayes contributes two characteristic winter scenes—"The Red Sleigh," and "The Last Load," which are marked by pleasing tone.

William Rigg is represented by two watercolors—"Coutou's Dam, near St. Donat," with water tumbling over rocks and a hint of autumn in the tones of the bordering trees; and "Old Laurentian Road," which is rich in picturesque qualities.

Watercolors, too, are the entries by Goodridge Roberts, with "Trees on Mount Royal," done boldly in flat washy tones; and St. James Cathedral, boldly handled and sound in its sense of solidity. The view, as seen from Cathedral street, introduces the Sun Life Building. This medium also appeals to John Humphries, who has four examples which show competent handling—"A Lower St. Lawrence Port," with wharf, shipping and a fine cloudy sky; "Evening, Lower St. Lawrence," with boats and shacks at sunset; "A Bend in the North River," with wooded shore, white water and distant wooded hill in autumn, which suggests the stretch of fast river near Val Morin Station; and "Ramparts of Mountain Stream," which shows the river lower down where it pours down in a waterfall of respectable size.

The more solid medium is used by A. M. Pattison for his winter scene "On Mount Royal," with sleigh on the road and the Park-ranger's house in the white waste. Dimitry S. Licushine has handled

"Spring in Laurentians" in a bold direct manner—a girl standing near a noble tree, hills and a snow-patched landscape. Shipping and chimneys are the theme of "Along the Canal," by Phillip Davis, and Robert Sharps shows wharf, house and boats in "Edgartown, Mass."

John Fenwick Ross shows "Farm-house, Chenneville," and Francoise Archambault expresses a mood in "Solitude"—an old house, backed by distant hills. "Abandoned," by Beatrice Day, sounds the sombre note—a house, with the door hanging by one hinge. Jean Langlois has effectively handled the greens in the wooded hills beyond a stretch of muddy water, and Freda Pemberton Smith suggests the chill of winter in "The Sheep Shed" set among trees in a snowy landscape. She also shows "Jane," a young girl, painted in a direct, free manner.

"Evening Sun, Gulf Stream" is an ambitious oil by Renee Vautelet, in which the painting of the ship's deck and the following sea, gleaming in the sun are convincingly set down.

There are some good flower pieces—"Gladioli" by Mrs. Jean Maclean; "White Peonies" and "Calla Lilies," by Amy B. Stone, who handles watercolor with competence; "Delphinium," by F. O. Call, a variety of lovely blues, confidently handled, beautifully clean in tone and effectively placed on a windowsill, with a stretch of water and distant hills in the background. Miriam Scott shows a nice sense of arrangement in her decoratively designed study called "Milkweed."

Agnes Lefort in "Sunday at the Harbor" shows a group of tugs, with Notre Dame de Bonsecours church in the background. Allan Harrison shows "Le Louvre et la Seine," and "Sacre Coeur, Montmartre," two subjects that deserve less summary treatment.

Frederick B. Taylor, in "Portrait of Miss Jean Ritchie," shows a good deal of character and directness, and Beryl G. Forbes, besides a man's head, is effective in her "Russian Girl." There are promising qualities in the study of a girl's head by Pauline Rochon, and Harry McOwen shows ability in his "Study of a Girl." The drawing of a man's head on grey paper by Mimi Guay is a creditable and sincere effort.

Pictures by Canadians at Eaton's Gallery Star, 18.8.38

A second summer exhibition of works by Canadian painters is open in the galleries of the T. Eaton Company this week. Most of the pictures and sketches are by painters who are well known here, though there are a few by people whose work is seldom seen. Among the more conspicuous works are those by Freda Pemberton Smith, which include a restful picture in browns and whites of a sheep-shed among trees, a strong effect of sunlight on a house in Westmount, a broadly painted landscape sketch and an interesting study of a child's head. Norah Smythe shows a well lighted interior of a blacksmith's shop and a portrait of a girl. Three striking pictures are by Marian Scott, of which two are good pattern designs, one of two escalators crossing, with simplified figures, the other, also simplified and formalized, of a plant. A harbour with boats by Rita Mount, an autumn scene with fine color of trees and reflections by Berthe Des Claves and a group of farm buildings by Adam Sherriff Scott are good examples of familiar work.

Two landscape studies by Goodridge Roberts have imagination, but are not of his best; big and freely painted sketches are shown by Louis Muhlstock and Sam Borenstein. There are some vivid little landscapes by Renee Vautelet; Adelaide Munn shows a remarkable sky study, and other meritorious landscapes are by Eric Riordon, Dimitry Licushine, Jack Fenwick Ross and Emile Lemieux. There is much decorative color in the flower pictures of Ruby Le Boutillier, Ida Beck, A. Kyle, Elizabeth Parker, Margot Menard, Mrs. Jean Maclean and George Phipps.

Paintings by Canadian Artists Change at Eaton's, August 24 Gazette-Aug. 20.38

Marked interest is being shown in the exhibition of paintings by Canadian artists being held in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal. The collection at present on view maintains the standard of the inaugural show, and the items remain in place until August 24, when they will make way for other works.

The pictures exhibited are uneven in quality, but, in the main, do reveal praise-worthy sincerity and industry. Further, these changing collections are giving the younger artists the chance of showing what they can do—and some are doing very promising work. The paintings are displayed to the best possible advantage, and, generally speaking, the painters have shown appreciation of the opportunity accorded them by submitting creditable efforts. Getting the chance to show what they can do has often been the younger painters' problem, and these galleries in granting them wall space have imposed no restrictions, only very properly exacting that the best available examples be submitted.

There is no dictation as to subject or style. The subjects may be treated in the precise and literal manner, or may show marked abandon and individuality. This results in welcome variety, and, possibly, gives rise to discussion among the visitors to the galleries. The move certainly gives encouragement to those working to get a footing, and many of the examples suggest that, with the years, a number of those now tentatively feeling their way will benefit by this help and justify the consideration now shown.

The three galleries reveal many interesting things. Freda Pemberton Smith shows increasing confidence and freedom in her brushwork, and reveals marked sympathy with her subject in "Elizabeth reads in Bed." "Willow and Water"—a tree edged stream in sunlight and shadow is another spirited performance from the same brush, her ability to handle masses also being evident in "Old house in Westmount," which reveals skill in the management of the shadow beneath the eaves.

Rita Mount continues to draw her inspiration from port scenes, and has invested her "Late Afternoon, Glace Bay" with luminous color. Buildings on a ridge are blue against a golden sky, while beneath a row of cottages are a wharf and moored boats.

Renee Vautelet, besides "Beach at Sunrise, Ogonguit," with ruddy sunlit rocks and a gentle wave breaking on the golden sand, shows two landscapes of a rugged nature—"Little River Labreque," and "Marcotte Lake," in which the greens of the trees, rushes and distant timbered hills have been competently managed. The rich greens of mid-summer present plenty of problems, but Mme. Vautelet has reason to be satisfied. The tones of the water and the blue skies with incidental clouds proclaim the season in both these landscapes.

Berthe DesClayes shows "Autumn Reflections," marked by her usual ability to paint the maple in scarlet leaf convincingly, and her sister

Gertrude DesClayes, A.R.C.A., has an engaging portrait of a jolly smiling boy, called "Paddy from Donaghadee."

Adelaide Munn shows a strong sense of design in "October on the Ottawa"—rather "mannered" trees on the near shore, a stretch of water dark hills backed by a mound of sunlit cloud, the sky above being banded with dark clouds. This work would have had added effectiveness if the types of clouds had not been mixed, but it can be counted impressive and well considered in arrangement.

Many of the women artists find flowers congenial. Ruby LeBoutillier paints tulips and irises in a green glass vase with a sound regard to their decorative qualities. Snapdragons have interested Mrs. Jean Maclean. A. Kyle shows a flower subject sound in arrangement and values, and Ida Beck does white peonies in pastel. Summer blooms intrigued Elizabeth Perkins, and Margot Menard used watercolor for her poppies. Miriam Scott is concerned with decorative qualities in her precise paintings of a flower, and of a plant—varieties unnamed—and like striving for design is evident in her figures on an escalator. Francoise Archambault has a beach scene with figure and blue shelter, called "Cabane Bleu." By Norah Smyth is a girl in a red head-dress called "Olga," and the interior of a blacksmith's shop, and Pauline Rochon sends two portrait heads in pastel.

Kathleen Morris, A.R.C.A., shows Belmont Street, looking west, with snow-patched ground, automobiles and, in the distance, the dome of the Basilica.

"Winter Landscape," by Emile Lemieux, brush, snow-covered hills and a winding stream is done with nice regard to values and handled with directness. Eric Riordon in "Winter, near Ste. Adele" shows his usual facility in suggesting the glow of sunlight on snowy wastes and

CANADIAN POET RETURNS

Star, 13.8.38

Ralph Gustafson, the Canadian poet, who has earned praise from two successive Poets Laureate, has come back to Canada where he intends to stay and write a while. During his recent stay in England, by way of contrast to his verse, he has completed a three-act comedy entitled "Ten A Penny." It is a play of school life with a Canadian setting, and Mr. Gustafson hopes to see it produced in London at the end of this year, or early in 1939. He is negotiating for a simultaneous production in America. The play is of a bronze head of the poet by Sally Ryan.

Many Students Unaware

Of Change In Date

The Ecole des Beaux Arts opened its doors to day but to less than 50 per cent of the ordinary enrolment, because many students were not aware of the re-opening.

The institution ordinarily resumes its classes about October 1 but a decision of the provincial Government set the re-opening date for September 15. Not only were a number of students unaware of today's activities but even several members of the staff were reported not to have been notified.

The normal enrolment figure is expected to be reached in a few days.

Exhibition of Early Quebec Furniture Placed on Display at Henry Morgan's

Standard, July 30th, 1938.

Temporary Museum Illustrating Pioneer Days Sponsored by Art Association, McGill University and Tourist Bureau

BY ROBERT AYRE

IT would be a good idea, it seems to me, if Montrealers would sometimes play at being tourists in their own city. I mean get about the town and look at things as if they had never seen them before; visit Notre Dame once in a while, and the museum behind it; the Basilica; little Bonsecours and some of the other old buildings along the waterfront; the Shrine and perhaps the waxworks across the street (I confess I have never seen its Roman Catacombs, although I have admired the Dionne Quintuplets and two-nosed Madame Trahan and the other wonders in the Musée Eden); spend a few hours in the Chateau de Ramezay and the McGill museums; become acquainted with the permanent collection in the Art Association galleries instead of waiting for the special exhibition; and so on. Many do, of course, but I am afraid most of us take these amenities of our city for granted, the way the citizens of Paris take the Folies Bergeres and the people of Chicago their famous Stockyards.

For the benefit of the Mahomets who don't get round to these various mountains, as well for Montreal's summer visitors, a temporary museum illustrating old Quebec life has been assembled in the Henry Morgan & Company Ltd. building. It is an exhibition of furniture and it has behind it the authority and the collections of the Art Association, McGill University and the provincial Tourist Bureau.

Two-Way Pleasure

There are two ways of looking at a show of this kind. One is to go as a specialist, or at least as an enthusiast, in furniture; as a collector knowing all about periods and styles, about the subtle twists of table-legs, the curves of chair-backs and what they signify, the differences in woods and polishes. The other way is to go not possessed of a great deal of technical information but warmly, perhaps romantically, interested in the past and able to get some fun out of reconstructing it from the relics that remained. Of course this interest is more than archaeological. I used the words warmly and romantically on purpose, as implying an emotional approach. Reconstructing 18th Century Quebec from an old chest of drawers or a chimney-piece is not at all the same thing, as reconstructing a mastodon from a few dead bones. The furniture gives pleasure for its own sake, because it is beautiful or bizarre, or comical, as well as because of its associations. The exhibition in Morgan's auditorium gives pleasure both to the furniture fanciers and to the others.

TYPICAL EXAMPLES OF PIONEER STYLES

Ingenuity Misplaced

Can furniture be funny? You have only to look at some of the Victorian flights of fancy to see that it can. Whether it should be or not is another question. I don't think it should. Neither did the Victorians for the most part and that makes their caprices all the more comical. Ingenuity misplaced with heavy seriousness. There is one funny piece in the French-Canadian exhibition, a massive chest of drawers from La Prairie, sumptuously swollen and standing impenetrably on feet in the shape of Wellington boots. Its very aplomb makes it ridiculous. Amusing in quite another way is the gilt church chandelier from St. Jerome. It is childlike rather than pretentious and therefore quite charming—as a Christmas tree is charming—with its tassels and acorns and strings of little golden apples.

Some of the exhibits came, or probably came, from France. Among these are a pottery charcoal stove and a pewter cistern and bowl, which brought a morsel of 18th Century elegance to New France. Chairs, tables, armoires, cupboards and commodes and panelings were made here by native craftsmen, but many of them show the influence of English and French styles, even if they were a few years behind the fashion and made out of pine. There is a delicate ladder-back chair that recalls Chippendale; a corner cupboard painted blue and white has a touch of the old Adam, as has the large 1786 mantelpiece from the house of Simon McTavish of the Hudson's Bay Company, which is of value historically. There are modifications, naturally, as in the introduction of the "morceau de gâteau" motif, which I see as a square pie cut into four slices rather than as a cake.

Honesty and Satisfaction

I liked particularly the long convent table, built for the Rev. Mother Gamelin, Soeur de Providence, and used for years in the old convent at the corner of St. Catherine street and St. Hubert. Each nun had a drawer for her pewter bowl. I liked the narrow chairs standing around it, and the little stool, padded and covered with a scrap out of an old Brittany petticoat. There is a good honest oak chest with a pine top and strap hinges and lock; a plain and useful monk's bench with a back that tilts forward to make a table, and a folding bed-bench are pieces that satisfy because of their lack of nonsense; doors and panelings and wrought-iron finials and a certain brass door-handle and latch are worthy of the expense of some time. By the same token, the whole is not an exhibition to be skimmed but to be savored.

The Portraits

The contemporary portraits on view may not be important as works of art, but they give us an idea of the sort of people who sat on these chairs and ate from these dishes and who packed their clothes away in these chests of drawers; they tell us, too, what the clothes were like.

The reconstruction of the past of French Canada is further facilitated by an admirable gallery of photographs. Loving huntsmen like Professor Ramsay Traquair, Edgar Garipey, A. T. Galt Durnford, S. J. Hayward and William Notman have caught for us some of the finest architecture of Quebec, such dwellings and institutions as house the furniture; churches, too, their altars and other details of Canadian craftsmanship.

The exhibition gives a very good opportunity to learn something of your own community, and knowing your own community isn't a bad idea.

ART ASSOCIATION PLANS FULL YEAR

Lectures, Art Courses and Exhibitions Arranged As New Season Opens

Seasonal activities will be in full swing in the Art Gallery within the next few weeks, arrangements being well under way for an interesting program of lectures, art courses, commercial classes, children's hour and special exhibitions.

The opening lecture of the season will be given on October 31 by W. G. Constable, formerly assistant director of the National Gallery, and formerly head of the Courtauld Institute, London, England. Last year Mr. Constable was called to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts as director of that institution. He will lecture here on Turner, Constable and Bonington.

DR. HELD TO SPEAK

Dr. Julius Held of New York University will be among the other lecturers who will follow Mr. Constable. These lectures will be held in the late afternoon so as to afford those in the business world an opportunity of attending.

In addition, there will be popular illustrated lectures on one afternoon a week during the winter months. These lectures will deal with nature studies and with topics of art, and will be for members of the association, both adults and young people.

Arrangements are being made to provide a guide service, once or twice a week, in order that members may, at specified hours, get an intelligent explanation of the various exhibits in the galleries and museum.

Beginning in the first week of November there will be art treasures exhibited from time to time, borrowed from the collections of private citizens, in order that the public may see a few of the treasures of art in the private collections of Montreal.

William Ogilvie, who is the instructor in commercial art, is preparing an exhibition of commercial design which will be on view shortly. His classes will open early in October, in conjunction with the classes under Edwin Holgate and Mrs. Newton.

The children's hour on Saturday mornings, for painting and modeling, will open late in October, under the guidance of Miss Savage and Miss Seath.

Exhibitions have been arranged for and will arrive in approximately the following order: Pictures by children, through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada; international photographic exhibition also by courtesy of the National Gallery; exhibition of samplers, sculptors by Boris Lovet-Lorsky, 19th century landscape painters, theatre art, by courtesy of the National Gallery, and a Canadian Group of Painters exhibition.

First Incorporated Museum in Canada Was Founded in April, 1860

In 1937 there were 39,789 visitors to the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, which, incidentally, was the first incorporated museum in Canada. It was founded on April 23, 1860, as the outcome of an effort on the part of the Montreal Society of Artists (1848).

Its collection was first housed in the Mercantile Library building in Phillips Square. The present building was erected in 1912.

The Association receives no grant, either from the Province or from the Federal Government.

Membership in the Art Association is open to any citizen who cares to subscribe.

The number of members in 1937 was 1,212, and the income from these members was $11,559. Other income is derived from, (a) Endowment funds—gifts from bequests and from generous citizens; (b) from a fund known as the Sustentation Fund, to which a number of citizens subscribe, for the specific purpose of overcoming the deficit; (c) from entrance fees.

The operating expenses last year were $22,000.

Life in Old Quebec

The Beautiful, The Bizarre, Even The Comical Are Well Illustrated In a Display Of Early French-Canadian Furniture Now On Exhibition

A RARE picture of life in old Quebec is now being given in an exhibition, that has behind it the authority and collections of McGill University, the Art Association and the Provincial Tourist Bureau, arranged in the Henry Morgan & Company, Limited Building. In a temporary museum are gathered a carefully chosen collection of old French-Canadian furniture as used in the province in times gone by.

The beautiful, the bizarre, even the comical, are all well illustrated in the exhibition. One particularly unusual piece is a massive chest of drawers from Laprairie standing on feet that are in the form of Wellington boots. Another unusual exhibit is a gilt church chandelier from St. Jerome, with tassels and acorns and little golden apples.

OLD WORLD INFLUENCE

Some of the exhibits probably came from France. Among these are a pottery charcoal stove and a pewter cistern-like bowl. Most of the chairs, tables, armoires, cupboards, commodes and panellings on exhibition must have been made by craftsmen in Canada but many of them show the influence of Old World French and English styles, although made of Canadian pine.

There is a delicate ladder-back chair that recalls Chippendale; a corner cupboard painted blue and white which has very attractive lines, as has a mantelpiece, made in 1786, from the house of Simon McTavish, of the Hudson's Bay Company. The "morceau de gâteau" motif comes in many of the pieces in different variations.

CONVENT TABLE

One of the outstanding exhibits is the long convent table, built for the Rev. Mother Gamelin, of the Soeurs de Providence convent at the corner of St. Catherine and St. Hubert streets. Around it stand narrow chairs and there is a little stool padded and covered with a scrap of old Brittany petticoat.

There is a good honest oak chest with pine top, strap hinges and lock; a plain and useful monk's bench with a back that tilts forward to make a table, and a folding bed-bench. Doors and panellings and wrought-iron finials and a certain brass door-handle and latch are well worth a careful inspection too. In fact the whole exhibition is one to be savored, not skimmed.

PORTRAITS ON VIEW

The contemporary portraits on view may not be important as works of art, but they give us an idea of the sort of people who sat on these chairs and ate from these dishes and who packed their clothes away in these chests of drawers; they tell us, too, what the clothes were like in those days.

$100,000 Extension to Art Gallery Planned

"Star" Aug. 31/38

ADDITION PLANNED FOR ART GALLERY

Contract Let and Work To Start At Once On $100,000 Extension

An extension to the Montreal Art Gallery, at a cost of $100,000 will be started immediately, it was announced today after a meeting last night of the council of the Art Association under the presidency of Dr. Charles F. Martin.

The contract has been let to the Anglin-Norcross Construction Company following the preparation of plans by Fetherstonhaugh & Durnford, architects. An immediate start of the work is planned in order to complete the structure early in the new year.

The addition will consist of a basement and two storeys at the northwest corner of the Art Gallery, built in such a way as to conform with the present structure.

FUNDS PROVIDED

The new structure, which will be hidden from view from Sherbrooke street by the front of the gallery, was made possible by a gift of $60,000 from H. A. Norton of Ayer's Cliff and his sister, Miss Norton of Coaticook, the gift being conditional upon an immediate start of the work. This sum was augmented by a portion of an unconditional bequest from the late Mrs. Charles Meredith and generous donations from friends of the gallery.

The extension will provide additional gallery space for loan collections. Hitherto it has been necessary to remove the permanent collection from the galleries in order to show the loan exhibitions, of which there have been as many as 10 in 12 months. It will also fill other needs.

As a part of the reconstruction, a modern system of ventilation will be installed in both the old and new buildings. A new stairway in the extension will provide more ready access to the gallery.

As a result of the enlargement of the building students will be afforded greater facilities than before.

WORK ON BUILDING TO START AT ONCE, FINISH BY JANUARY

Numerous Donations Make Possible Long-Needed Addition to Space

NEW WING TO BE BUILT

Full-Time Exhibition of Many Objects Now Stored in Basement Will Soon Be Feasible

Without delay, work is to be commenced on an extension to the building of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, to cost $100,000. This decision was reached late yesterday afternoon at a meeting of the council of the Art Association, under the presidency of Dr. Charles F. Martin. The architects of the new wing, to be built at the northwest side and behind the facade of the present structure, are Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford, and the contractors are Anglin-Norcross.

For several years the Art Association has felt the urgent need of increased accommodation for the many exhibits which are offered from time to time throughout the year, and the present move has been made possible through the initial generosity of H. A. Norton, of Ayer's Cliff, and of Miss Norton, of Coaticook. The gift has been supplemented by part of a bequest from the late Mrs. Charles Meredith, and other donations from J. W. McConnell and friends who have always given tangible support to the association and its work.

It is hoped that the new addition, which will be built of cement brick in a tone to harmonize with the present building, will be ready for use by the end of January. The original gift was conditional on an early start being made with the work.

The new wing, which will be added to the building on its western elevation, will provide a number of rooms and a basement—some of the basement rooms for the use of students, some for workshops, and a large room, with new equipment, for the storage of paintings and of museum objects which, for the time being, may not find accommodation in the galleries and museum.

NEW ROOMS PLANNED.

On the ground floor a number of new rooms will be added, for the housing of a number of objects of art which are now either crowded together in the existing space of one museum room, or kept in the basement, where the public has not an opportunity of viewing them.

On the ground floor the existing museum, which is already overcrowded with objects of art of all kinds, will be dedicated chiefly to students of design, and will house woodwork, ironwork, and similar objects of art which are of use to the pupils in the schools, and to the public in general. Other rooms will be allotted for museum exhibits.

The new space on this floor will be devoted to the segregation of art objects according to periods or schools, and will be utilized to demonstrate the development of art in its various phases. Two large new galleries on this floor, about 60 feet long, will contain removable partitions, in order that exhibits of various sizes may be shown—whether they be paintings or museum objects. This will afford an opportunity, for the first time, of letting the public see to advantage the many treasures of the museum, which at present are practically unknown, even to the members of the Association.

On the first floor three new galleries will be constructed for the purpose of the special exhibitions which come to the Association from various sources, on loan. A new stairway will be erected at the western end of the large hall, and will afford much easier access than is offered by present facilities to the upper floor and to the basement.

Under existing conditions the space is so limited that whenever an exhibition of any proportions is presented, the Council has been obliged to remove from the walls the permanent collection, secured through the gifts of generous citizens, through the purchase of pictures, from endowment funds, and from other sources.

So frequent and so interesting have been many of the exhibitions, that the public are deprived of the opportunity of seeing this permanent collection for many months of each year. With the increased activities in the Art Association, and the educational value which is placed upon it by the members, the Council has felt more and more the urgent need of an extension.

It is felt that with these additional rooms, both the members of the Association, and the public generally, will better realize the value of the permanent collections—both in paintings, and in the museum objects of art—and that the students in the school of art will have advantages that will make the school more popular and more profitable than before.

Named

E. R. Hunter, assistant curator of the Toronto Art Gallery, has been appointed technical adviser to the local Art Gallery, it was announced today by the council of the Montreal Art Association.

Mr. Hunter has had a wide experience in all matters relating to art and his services will be particularly valuable, council members stated today, during the period of construction and the re-assembly of material for exhibition.

He is a nephew of H. B. Walker, formerly president of the Montreal Art Association, and a grandson of the late Sir Edmund Walker of Toronto, well-known as a patron of art. Mr. Walker has had several years' study in European art galleries.

Star" — Aug. 31/38 ART GALLERY EXTENSION HERE

THE significance of the part played in the cultural life of the community by the Art Association of Montreal is not, perhaps, as fully appreciated by the general public as it might be. Yet that institution does a great deal of unobtrusive work the value of which is not to be estimated in so many words, and the influence of which is spread over a wider area than that embraced by the city limits. Since the galleries have been open to the public over the week ends, there has been manifest a steady increase in popular interest, and a visit any Sunday afternoon might prove an eye-opener to many who have hitherto taken the Association "in their stride," so to speak.

For some considerable time past the necessity for additional gallery space has made itself felt. In particular is this desirable in order to make room for the many visiting exhibitions, some of which are of the greatest interest and often represent the most important events in the art year. At present, whenever an exhibit visits Montreal, it has been found necessary to remove at least a part of the permanent exhibition in order to provide adequate accommodation, with the result that the casual visitor who goes to see the pictures brought here for a brief period often misses the permanent collection entirely.

Fortunately, through the generosity of a group of friends and supporters of the Art Association, it has now been made possible to add a new wing to the present building on Sherbrooke street, and work upon this is to begin at once. This extension will be added on the western elevation. It will provide three new galleries especially for the use of visiting exhibitions, as well as a number of rooms and a basement. In addition, there will be two new galleries on the ground floor in which pictures at present stored in the basement because of lack of accommodation will be hung and will thus be added to the permanent collection on exhibition for the first time. A redistribution of both museum objects and other treasures of the Association will also be made possible through the additional space available. The work will be completed, it is expected, by the end of January, 1939.

With these increased facilities, the scope of the Association's activities should be materially extended, and public interest may be confidently anticipated to grow as the value of the institution is made more and more apparent.

Changes in Exhibit Of Canadian's Work

Interest Maintained in Collection on View at Eaton's Fine Art Galleries

Changes have been made in the exhibition of paintings by Canadian artists in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, the examples now on view following the policy of giving place to works by those of experience as well as to others who are making a promising start.

This show, with its periodic changes of the items, has drawn a large attendance and excited considerable interest at a season that is generally regarded as "dead" as far as paintings are concerned. It has been a worthy move that has justified itself.

Adani Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., who has found much congenial material in the Eastern Townships, is represented by "Laid Aside"—the interior of a shed with a canoe in the loft and a white boat, and by "Near North Halloway," an autumn study of houses, barns and road, a work sound in tone and true of the season.

"Montreal from Laprairie, Moonlight," by Thurston Topham, is an excellent impression of night, with clouds moving across the moon, a nearby figure in a canoe, stretch of dark water and distant Mount Royal.

Rita Mount sends a painting done at Glace Bay, showing distant house, wharf, schooner, boats and lighthouse, characteristic in color and treatment.

Frank Hennessey, A.R.C.A., is represented by pastels, done in a bold, crisp manner—"Oaks and Maples," which gives a chance to employ vivid color, and "October After Rain," which is also an autumnal study.

A. J. Casson, A.R.C.A., in "The Hayfield Gate," shows his usual clean, bold handling of watercolor in the stretch of rolling field, backed by noble blue hills.

Tom Stone, O.S.A., sends two winter scenes—"Poplar Trees, Kamistiquia," which faithfully translates the title, and "Beaver Island," with steep rocks, spruce, snow and a glimpse of open water.

Alice DesClayes, A.R.C.A., is represented in an English scene—"Dartmoor Ponies," showing the animals grouped in foreground, with a rounded hill in the distance. Her sister, Berthe DesClayes, sends a colorful oil called "Winter Afternoon"—trees, houses and snow, with a logging team in the road.

"On the Quebec Road," a watercolor by Lorna Lomer Macaulay, features a picturesque house with the shadow of a large tree making pattern on its white walls.

Paul Caron shows typical watercolors with houses, sleighs and figures, called "Hill from Baie St. Paul," and "Baie St. Paul," both done with his characteristic clean, fluid color.

Watercolor, too, is the medium employed by John Humphries for "Majestic Montmorency"—showing the noble falls, and "Cottages of Kamouraska," with shadowed buildings, boat and a distant wharf.

William Rigg shows his ability as a watercolorist in a pastoral scene; a bit done on the Cornish coast, and "Grey Nuns Garden" with a house amidst big trees.

Among the flower pieces, there is the capital oil of phlox by F. O. Call; peonies by B. MacGivern Smith, and white peonies in a glass vase, a watercolor by Ruby LeBoutillier.

"The Arts Building, McGill," with figures is a faithfully rendered oil by Frederic B. Taylor, who for contrast shows a skier on a snowy slope, called "Practice Slalom Run."

There is a glitter to the light in J. Beder's "Sun Life Building," a winter scene, and also to his street scene, entitled "View from Roof."

Among the offerings by Dimitry Licushine is a solidly handled "Perce," with house, sweep of beach and figures, and "Corner of Studio," which features a plaster cast and books.

Arthur E. Sharing manages his values effectively in "October Evening"—a hill, bare trees, a bit of bush in autumn leaf and a path, simply set down and true of hour and season.

B. Mulligan shows direct handling of pastel in four portraits of girls, and Norah L. Smyth is equally direct in her oil study of a man's head.

Pauline Rochon shows two pastel studies of girls' heads that hold promise. They are effectively placed, are soundly drawn and, with increasing confidence, a bolder attack will probably replace the tendency to rob the chalks of their sparkle by rubbing.

Scott & Sons Re-open In Their New Premises

Galleries on Sherbrooke Street West, Near Mountain Street —Exhibition Plans
Gazette — 17.9.38

This week W. Scott & Sons re-opened in their new premises, 1316 Sherbrooke street west, the move following their sale earlier this year of the gallery building on Drummond street. In the new place, a few doors west of Mountain street, the main gallery on the ground floor has been tastefully decorated, the paintings being illuminated by the most modern type of lights in troughs. On this floor is a storage room, storage accommodation also being available on the first floor, where there is a small gallery and the business office.

Back only a short time from a visit abroad, John Heaton stated that the exhibition season in these galleries will open on October 8 with the fifth annual show of French paintings of the 19th and 20th centuries—"From Delacroix to Dufy." This exhibition, in common with those in the past, has been arranged in conjunction with Alex. Reid & Lefevre, Limited, of London, England, and Dr. T. J. Honeyman will bring the collection to Montreal. Among the painters to be represented will be Pissarro, Sisley, Manet, Renoir, Cezanne, Delacroix, Dufy, Derain and Utrillo, to mention a few.

ARTHUR LISMER'S DEPARTURE

Toronto Saturday Night
THE appointment of Mr. Arthur Lismer as Professor of Fine Arts at Teachers' College, Columbia University, is a fitting climax to more than a quarter of a century's work on behalf of the visual arts in this country. Mr. Lismer came here in 1911, and from that day to this has always been identified with progressive movements in painting and art education. That the culminating honor of his career comes from a country other than his own should be taken rather as proof of the international value of his work than as a comment on the myopia of his countrymen. His remarkable pioneer work at the Children's Art Centre, no less than his own vigorous painting and his passionate espousal of the advancement of art in Canada, have won him the admiration and affection of art lovers in all parts of the Dominion. As far as the Centre is concerned, the financial generosity of the Carnegie Corporation gave Mr. Lismer the sinews of war; but the battle he fought for the recognition of child art education, the new methods he evolved, and the marked success he achieved, were all his own. The Centre has become internationally known, and the staff—imbued with his ideas and his enthusiasm—have been frequently called afield to supervise similar projects, in Detroit, Chicago, even in South Africa. It is to be hoped that the Centre, strong in the traditions which he formed, will continue to prosper now that he has left it, and to find among the public the support which it deserves. In the meantime, Mr. Lismer carries with him to his new post the best wishes of all Canadian art lovers. Though he is no longer among us, he will still be of us, and we may hope that his position will perhaps allow him to devote more time to his painting than he was able to do while attending to the urgent demands of the Centre; for to those familiar with his art, and the part he played in the formation of the Group of Seven, his enforced desertion of the brush for the podium seemed almost criminal. In any case, we may be sure that Mr. Lismer's value to Columbia and to art education in the States will be very great, while his appointment confers an honor on the Dominion. 10.9.38

Educational Policy To Show Art Trends

Art Association Council Explains Stand on Exhibits That May Please or Irritate

During the coming year a number of interesting exhibitions are to be held in the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, and in this connection the Council, expressing the belief that Loan Exhibitions play a very important part in a movement which is rapidly growing in its tendency to make art a more personal part of daily life, states its stand respecting the showing of works that excite the enthusiasm of some picture-lovers, and—to put it mildly—irritate the feelings of others.

Following are the views expressed:

Exhibitions should not only intensify our interest in art, but should add to the encouragement of the younger and progressive producers.

It is essentially important not only to endeavor to develop the best kind of taste in matters of art, but to create where possible an interest in whatever movements are afoot.

The Association places these various collections on its walls not necessarily because it believes that these represent the best in art, or that they always sponsor the type of work that is expected, but rather as an educational policy to show its members the tendencies and the tastes that are developing in the artistic world.

No little stimulus is derived from the extent to which art has become a subject of widespread discussion as well as of severe criticism. Modern interpretations of the artistic sense are not always uniformly acceptable, but it should be remembered that in matters of taste—and to a large extent art is a matter of taste—discussion is futile; but there would seem to be no reason why the efforts of some budding artist, which may not please all people, should be the butt of acrimonious criticism.

The ultra-modernist is surely entitled to subject his work to the view and the critical opinion of the public and, inasmuch as the art gallery does not exist merely to exhibit the beautiful according to accepted standards, it is entitled to expose to the public the efforts of a variety of artists, even though some of their vagaries may not appeal to one organized group of sincere artists.

These exhibitions express a point of view. It is generally agreed among the members of the Council of the Art Association that the ultra-modernists with so many grotesque examples of expression do themselves no little harm when they sponsor work that is not of a very definite standard. After all there are standards in art, in craftsmanship, in the application of color, in perspective, and so many other qualities which are fundamental to any successful effort.

Modern art should not be accepted or rejected as a whole, for everyone surely believes that we should adhere to that which is good and reject that which is conspicuously bad. The jurists who control the destinies of modern art will do their art no greater service than by casting out whatever is pathological in art, or examples of the false and poisonous in modernism. In that way alone real worthiness will not suffer through contagion. It will reinforce its own position, which by now it has justly acquired.

It is sometimes a strain on one's tolerance to take a sympathetic interest in what may be a mosaic of colored patches, without structural coherence and representing no well defined architectural framework. Apparently to many modern artists, aesthetic criteria have undergone a change, for it would seem that fidelity to appearance is, in their eyes no longer a measure of art.

The present leaders in our art school are stressing the need of fundamental training, as a prerequisite of worthy achievement. They totally disregard the impatience of those who look for short cuts in the career of an artist.

It will be the business and the intention of the Art Association to make a place for young artists, whether in the field of design or illustration, the decorative arts, in teaching, in laboratory drawings, in fashion and what not.

The need obviously exists for a higher standard in all these lines—most of all, perhaps, in what is called Commercial Art.

Montreal Sends Four Paintings

Great Exhibition in London to Have Works by Men Who Worked Here

FOUR PAINTINGS from the gallery of the Art Association of Montreal are being carefully packed for shipment to London. They are the Montreal Gallery's contribution to the great exhibition entitled "A Century of Canadian Art", representing Canada's achievements in painting and sculpture during the past 100 years, which is to be held at the Tate Gallery in London this fall. The exhibition promises to be a notable one, and is to be opened on October 14 by H.R.H. the Duke of Kent.

Arrangements for the exhibition have been made in close co-operation with the National Gallery at Ottawa and the High Commissioner's office in London.

The four canvases chosen from the Montreal Art Association Gallery for the exhibition are: "Canadian Autumn," by Otto R. Jacobi (1812-1901), which has been on loan to the gallery for some time by the owner, R. O. Sweezy, through whose courtesy it goes to London; "In the Northland," by Tom Thomson (1877-1917); "Quebec from Levis," by Maurice Cullen (1866-1934), and "The Bathers," by Mr. Edwin Holgate, of Montreal.

Collaborating with the National Gallery on the choice of pictures has been an advisory committee composed of the presidents of the Canadian artists' societies, including Sir Wylie Grier, president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts; A. Y. Jackson, president of the Canadian Group of Painters; Elizabeth Wyn Wood, president of the Sculptors' Society, and Peter Haworth, president of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Colors. Also assisting, are Clarence Gagnon, of Montreal, and Martin Baldwin, curator of the Toronto Art Gallery.

Items From Canada

The exhibition will be the most notable showing of Canadian art ever seen in England. Although an exhibition was held at Wembley in 1924 which excited much comment and enthusiasm among English critics, it was a contemporary one, largely representative of the modern school, and only covered a period of 10 years. The present one, however, which will contain about 200 paintings and sculpture items, will be more truly representative of the different periods and styles of painting in the history of art in Canada during the past 100 years.

The collection, which will be shown in the Tate Gallery for two months, after which it will very likely be sent to some of the larger provincial art galleries in Great Britain, is being drawn from the National Gallery and from public and private collections throughout the Dominion.

It might be mentioned that the Tate Gallery already possesses two Canadian canvases in its permanent collection; one by J. W. Morrice, and one by A. Y. Jackson.

The Artists

A word now about the artists whose paintings are going across from Montreal to the exhibition:

Otto Reinhold Jacobi ("Canadian Autumn") was a German, born in Prussia in 1812, who came to Canada in 1860 with an established reputation. He was the most accomplished painter at this time in Canada and produced many fine canvases of great technical excellence. He was particularly fond of painting waterfalls and sunsets. Unfortunately, his thorough German training was too deeply rooted and too often he missed the spirit of the country. The atmosphere and color of his paintings are essentially European, although the topography is excellent. He died in 1901.

Maurice G. Cullen ("Quebec from Levis") was born at St. John's Newfoundland, in 1866, and studied in France. For many years he made his home in Montreal, and was the first Canadian artist of real ability to portray the beauties of the winter landscape. Both by his works and as a teacher he had a lasting and healthy influence on Canadian painting. He died in 1934.

Tom Thomson ("In the Northland") was born near Owen Sound, Ont., in 1877. He was a first-rate commercial artist, and it was not until near the end of his life that he turned seriously to landscape painting. But when he did, he burst forth with an amazing series of canvases that place him in a unique position in the landscape art of Canada. Closely associated with the former Group of Seven, he used a technique that was both personal and brilliant. In five short years he made a significant contribution to Canadian painting. He was accidentally drowned in Canoe Lake, Algonquin Park, in 1917.

Edwin Holgate is an accomplished Montreal artist and teacher whose work shows marked individuality and versatility. An artist in woodblocks and pen and ink, a portrait and landscape painter, a mural decorator, and an illustrator, he is also an excellent teacher and is director of the Art School of the Montreal Art Association. His work is of the modernist school and he was a member of the former Group of Seven. He was born at Allandale, Ont., in 1892.

Camera Art of Nakash Exhibited at Eaton's Gazette—17.9.38 Photographer Represented By Portraiture, Subject Pictures and Summer and Winter Landscapes

Photographic studies by A. G. Nakash of Eaton's Portrait Studio are on exhibition in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and the excellence of the work merits the fine setting given these prints. The vogue for photography at the present time can truthfully be called "terrific," and the range of its application is wider than ever before. The technical improvement made to equipment has enabled the "man in the street" to be less "fluky" with his results, and in this, as in almost every other line of endeavor, there is no better form of guidance than inspecting what the practised hand, allied to sound selection, good taste and artistic knowledge, can do with the camera.

A few decades ago it was the habit of the superior person to seriously question whether or not photography could properly be designated as an art. All that has now died down, because the artist with the camera has effectively shown that photography is a form of pictorial expression to be seriously regarded.

Nakash seems singularly happy in the varied phases of his art—his men of art, letters and affairs have character, his women have grace, his children, which are among his most engaging subjects, have been "caught" in poses that reveal natural characteristics and entirely lack the frozen with fright expression, or the forced "look at the pretty birdie" smile. His landscapes are composed with a knowledge that appeals to the painter, and his still lifes are unusually felicitous.

The portraits of men make a rich collection—local artists, E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., the secretary of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts; F. S. Coburn, R.C.A.; Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A.; Emile Lemieux and Max Solly, are these subjects to the life. Alfred Laliberte, the musician, is here, as are J. Murray Gibbon, novelist and publicist; Col. Wilfrid Bovey, writer and educationist; Dr. Fraser Gurd, Rev. Dr. Reid, Rev. Dr. Leslie Pidgeon, Rev. Dr. Norwood, of the City Temple, London; Dr. Willems, of Brussels, F. B. Walls, general manager of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, and Thomas Archer, Drama and Music Critic of The Gazette, to mention a few.

In the realm of feminine portraiture, there is a strikingly beautiful profile of Mrs. Charles Hunt of Newfoundland, admirably placed and capably lighted; Mme. Pierre Casgrain, alert and gracious, makes a successful study, and there are a number of other examples that arrest the attention. These studies capture the characteristics of the sitters and have an air of spontaneity—though it is far from being as easy as all that. Such satisfying effects don't just "happen."

Among Nakash's subject pictures it would be hard to find one more sympathetic than the "Mother and Child," a circular composition that plainly reveals that the parent is not indifferent to her offspring. "The Thinker"—a white-bearded man, his brow wrinkled with concentration, could have no other title. In Oriental costume is "The Chieftain," who is conscious of the dignity of his position. A fine study of age is "Pioneer's Mate," a much wrinkled woman who knows hard times and has not quit.

Among the landscapes is one of noble trees shadowing a sun-lit road on which figures promenade, some winter scenes with the shadows of trees and bushes playing their decorative part, and "Snowwhite"—powdery snow smothering stones and banks edging winding open water. Grace in arrangement and a convincing suggestion of the fragility of the bloom mark a spray of iris with buds.

The exhibition, according to present plans, is due to close on September 28.

To Be Exhibited In London

"In the Northland," by the late Tom Thomson, of Toronto. One of the paintings chosen from the Gallery of the Art Association of Montreal to be shown in the exhibition entitled "A Century of Canadian Art," which opens on October 14 in the famous Tate Gallery in London, England. Tom Thomson, whose genius for color and vigorous execution made it possible for him to capture the spirit of the Canadian north woods in his work, was seldom happier in his interpretation of a season's mood than in this beautiful autumn study, which needs to be seen in color to be appreciated. It is a prized possession of the Art Association of Montreal, whose galleries, along with those of the National Gallery of Canada and the Art Gallery of Toronto, share the permanent record of this artist's work. Thomson was a native of Owen Sound, Ont. He died a tragic death in 1917, at the age of 40, and was buried near the shore of one of his beloved north-land lakes.

Thoreau MacDonald Illustrates Edition of 'Maria Chapdelaine'

Blake's Translation of Louis Hemon's Story Gives Toronto Artist Opportunity to Show Sympathetic Understanding
Gazette 17.9.38

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

Thoreau MacDonald, of Toronto, evidently found illustrating W. H. Blake's translation of Louis Hemon's "Maria Chapdelaine" a task much to his liking. Son of the late J. E. H. MacDonald, R.C.A., the Canadian artist whose work, in common with that of a band of kindred painters, was woefully misunderstood and consistently abused before its qualities were appreciated, Thoreau MacDonald in these black and white drawings reveals the decorative sense that marked his parent's work.

MacDonald, thoroughly atune to the spirit of this tale of French Canada, has attempted no grand flights. Simple drawings illustrate a story that wins by its simplicity and truth. With telling line and effective masses the artist shows Napoleon Laliberte announcing the parish news from the steps outside the church; the horse Charles Eugene pulling the cutter through the woods; the family saying grace in the lamp-lit home; the spring break-up on the Peribonka—ice-floes sweeping down on swollen waters that curl in foam, a dark wooded shore and geese winging northward; stumps being pulled from the ground in the clearing; lumbermen on the drive; a boy making the essential smudge outside the log home; Wendigo pursuing the trespassing hunter; blueberry picking in the bush amidst charred trees; scenes of sowing and harvest; sawing wood for fuel; Francois Paradis hauling his toboggan in the grim winter woods that were to vanquish him; Chapdelaine driving out at night to bring the doctor to his dying wife—all the salient incidents are set down and they truly illustrate the story.

This task done, some satisfaction should be the artist's lot—having accomplished the work for the first illustrated edition of the Blake translation bearing the imprint of The Macmillan Company of Canada Limited, Toronto.

Hugh Eyars in his historical introduction sketches Hemon's life and the circumstances of the writing of this tale of the Lake St. John country. Mr. Eyars in mentioning his connection with the Canadian Macmillan Company, which first gave this translation to the world in 1921, writes that . . . "This book has thus been (it is not too much to say) affectionately thought of as the Book of the House." In touching on various editions of the work, he also mentions the sumptuous French edition illustrated by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A. These originals in color, shown in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, are again gracing the walls of the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal.

Without pretending to present a complete list of the editions of this romance of the Lake St. John country, mention might be made of those bearing illustrations—the translation by Sir Andrew Macphail, published by A. T. Chapman, Montreal, in 1921, which contained reproductions of charcoal drawings by the late A. de F. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., who as a painter found his happiest inspiration in scenes of rural life in Quebec province. He was particularly successful in the rugged types selected to portray the Chapdelaines, this couple later modelled and cast being among his most successful bronzes. In 1924 the New York house of Macmillan put out an illustrated edition, the work having appealed strongly to American readers.

The edition, in the original French text, published by Mornay, Paris, in 1933, gave Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., an exceptional opportunity and three year's hard work. Gagnon, in following the incidents of the narrative, was enabled to present in full colors a pictorial record not merely of the fortunes of the Chapdelaines and their circle but of a habitant life in almost any pioneer settlement in this province.

"Maria Chapdelaine" was also published by Artheme Fayard & Cie, Paris, in the series known as Le Livre de Demain, with woodcut illustrations by Jean Lebedeff. The artist refrained from depicting much incident, just "got by" in suggesting the types of buildings, and, as a frontispiece showed a quaint conception of the rock of Quebec considering the date of Hemon's story.

A Nelson French edition was illustrated in black and white by Jean Routier who did little to give the readers any idea of the country in which Hemon set his story.

This new edition done by Rous & Mann, Toronto, for the Macmillan firm, issued in the year when relatives of Hemon visited Canada in connection with ceremonies paying tribute to the author, is a comely book. MacDonald has shown a sympathetic understanding of his subject in illustrating the narrative, and skill in the small drawings that end chapters and also appear as incidental embellishments. The title page, too, with its hand-lettered text is a finished piece of work. The plain cover bears a nicely placed drawing in silhouette, and the drawing on the wrapper certainly prompts the casual beholder to browse through the pages.

Toronto Exhibition's Art Gallery Provided "Something For All Tastes"

The Standard - Sep. 17th, 1938.

BY ROBERT AYRE

ALONG the outside walls of the art gallery building in Toronto's Canadian National Exhibition—the famous "Ex," as they call it in Ontario—now 60 years old—are written high the names of the great. Veronese, I read, followed by Titian, then Raphael, Michelangelo and Giotto, winding up with Alma Tadema. I don't know what the names are on the other wall, but I guarantee the list could not possibly do better for disorder and anticlimax. The indiscriminate symbolizes the sort of art shows they have at the Ex from year to year.

Now I don't want to be too critical. After all, in the midst of a great agricultural and industrial exhibition, where the crowds go to see pigs and pickles, horses and hardware and the freaks of the Midway, an art show must be a hodge-podge. It's a credit to the Ex that it has an art show at all and a credit to the throngs that they go to see it. But there must be something for all tastes and there must be something sensational, to vie with the barkers outside.

In past years, the sensation has usually been a notorious nude. What happened to John Russell this year, I don't know; many's the controversy he's raised in the newspapers about the propriety of exposing females to the abashed gaze of modest Ontario and, without, I am sure, any desire for publicity, he has enticed thousands into the art gallery. This year, there were only two or three nudes and John Russell's young ladies were not among them.

Surrealism

The sensation was, of all things, a room devoted to Surrealism. The crowds were bewildered; they were disgusted—though not with the pleasurable disgust you can have with a naughty nude; they were amused, oh how they were amused! But I shall have more to say about the Surrealists next week; they are worth an article to themselves.

The rest of the show consisted of Canadian paintings, British paintings, miniatures and—happy idea borrowed from New York—an outdoor exhibition of Canadian sculpture. Over in another building were displayed examples of British and Canadian graphic art, an admirable exhibition of theatre designs loaned by the National Gallery, porcelain and pottery, and the 47th annual Toronto Salon of Photography.

His Majesty the King, in gorgeous Coronation robes, sat in the midst of the British paintings, and it was marvellous how his eyes followed you. "See, Ella! Walk over here. They look straight at you, wherever you are!" What an experience for Peel and Durham and Glengarry and York, and the other counties, as they passed through the Ex with their arms full of samples, to be watched by the gentle eyes of the King! It was Frank O. Salisbury's portrait, of course, N.F.S., and Lord Louis Mountbatten lent the State Procession, and Salisbury's sketch for the Coronation was also on view.

The grand old days when two and two were four and there was none of your new-fangled nonsense about Relativity and the Subconscious, were poignantly recalled by Edwin Abbey's "O Mistress mine, where are you roaming?" (loaned by the Corporation of Liverpool); Ford Madox Brown's "The Coat of Many Colors" (from the same source); Sir George Clausen's "The Girl at the Gate" (from the Tate); Frith's railway station; Lord Leighton's "Bath of Psyche" and Millais' "North West Passage" (both from the Tate).

At Random!

R.I.P. I have nothing to say about them. I was more interested in Orpen's amusing period piece, "A Bloomsbury Family" and Augustus John's rather rococo still life "In Memoriam; Amadeo Modigliani" (which may join them some day) and the John Nash and Ethelbert White landscapes. R. G. Eves sent a lively head of Leslie Howard and there was a portrait of Grey Owl by Sir John Lavery, which I seem to have missed. These exhibitions are so crowded and time is so short. I can only mention that such worthy painters were included as Anna Airy, Lamorna Birch, Arnesby Brown, David Jagger (this was the Nude of the Year), Munnings the horse painter, Bertram Nicholls, Dod Proctor, Wilson Steer and Norman Wilkinson. A fair enough cross-section of contemporary British painting but with notable omissions. None of the young moderns except those in the Surrealist room. I think it might be a good idea, too, to have a show some time with some direction instead of just grabbing pictures at random.

The Canadians

The Canadian section covered a good deal of ground and while some of the works were familiar many of them were new to me. I had never seen A. Y. Jackson's "Smoke Fantasy." In subject and treatment—He goes a little pointilliste—it is not the Jackson we know, but the whirling rhythms are there. Charles Comfort has quite a different way of handling smokestacks and smoke in "Smelter Stacks, Coppercliff." There is tremendous force in the upthrust of the great columns and the belching of the almost solid mass of black smoke. Transverse clouds fortify a composition that is mountainous in construction.

Of Montreal!

It was pleasant to come upon the Montrealers. Andre Bieler, now of Queen's University, brought Quebec quite definitely to Ontario in "Before the Auction." The 1937 winner of the Jessie Dow Prize, Thurstan Topham's "Grey Day, Montreal," was there and one of Harold Beament's Eskimo pictures; Robert Pilot showed his St. Urbain farm and "Gruffe River" (I wonder if it shouldn't be "Gouffre"?); there were drawings by Philip Surrey; Fritz Brandtner, sent a bold design made from an aspect of the road through Woodlands and a group of colored ink drawings called "The Other Side of Life"; Louis Muhstock was in both the water color section, with three delightful landscapes, and in the graphic arts show with several of his charcoal drawings. "Three Heads" was reproduced in the catalogue.

Choses du temps

Nécessaire audace "Le Canada"
Sept. 15, 1938

Les bourgeois amateurs d'art ont trop souvent le goût réactionnaire. Ils repoussent volontiers et courent de leur mépris les oeuvres d'art qui expriment un sentiment profond de l'éternelle nouveauté du monde. Comme ils souhaitent la stabilisation des mœurs, ils demandent l'immobilité de l'art à l'encontre de telle formule qui enchante leur jeunesse. Tant de gens veulent vivre du souvenir et ignorer que la vie est mouvement ou perpétuelle transformation; tant de gens ne se sont pas donné la peine d'apprendre que tout arrête dans le flot vivant de la création artistique est le signe certain de la décadence et de la mort. L'art reste mouvement, évolution, changement, il est création, s'il n'est pas la figure du néant. L'humanité a vu cela en Egypte, en Grèce, en Russie, au Japon, dans l'Italie du XIXe siècle: dès que la vie artistique se nourrit de formules, les oeuvres n'ont pas plus d'intérêt ou de valeur esthétique que les herbes mortes d'un herbier.

Ne nous excusons point de rappeler une vérité aussi évidente, lorsque l'Art Association de Montréal prend de multiples précautions pour annoncer aux amateurs d'art qu'elle entend désormais accorder une plus large place aux oeuvres nouvelles dans ses salles d'exposition. Le fait cependant nous intéresse seul: l'Art Association, comme nous l'avons constaté au dernier Salon du Printemps, semble renaître ou plutôt naître à la vie esthétique. On ne sait trop pourquoi cette magnifiée et si nécessaire institution a pris tant d'années à percer l'écorce épaisse (ô combien!) des préjugés et des traditions défuntées. Nous voyons que tout cela devient chose du passé, que des hommes d'une forte intelligence et d'une haute culture sont enfin parvenus à diriger l'Art Association, que ces personnes de goût s'emploient actuellement à donner à l'Art Gallery l'atmosphère d'un temple du beau.

Pictures In London
Draw Exceptional
Attendance

HALIFAX, Dec. 19 — (C.P.) — Canada's art show — "Century of Canadian Art" — in London's famed Tate Gallery has been a pronounced success, H. C. McCurry of Ottawa, assistant director of the National Gallery of Canada, said here Saturday. The exhibition includes canvases painted in every province in the last 100 years.

Mr. McCurry, who arrived from England on the liner Montrose, said the Canadian group was the first Dominion's exhibit to be honored with a place in the Tate Gallery. It drew a greater attendance than any recent exhibition there, and the closing date had to be extended twice. The show will close in January.

Invitations to show the Canadian pictures in other large British cities and in Brussels, had to be declined because many of the important works were borrowed from other Canadian collections and could not be loaned for a more extended period, he said.

The show was opened on schedule on October 14 by the Duke of Kent despite the international crisis which had made preparations difficult.

Mr. McCurry, who made preliminary arrangements for the exhibition, said British art experts are taking a keen interest in the best Canadian work "and it would not be surprising if more Canadian pictures are acquired by British galleries as one result of the exhibition."

While in London, Mr. McCurry said he made arrangements for several important exhibitions of British art to come to Canada in 1939 and 1940. These collections will be shown in all parts of Canada under auspices of the National Gallery.

More Exhibition Galleries and Storage Space Provided for By Addition to Art Association

Expansion Made Possible Through Gifts From Members — History of Movement Now 78 Years in Existence

Sunday Openings And Lost Bequest

BY H P. BELL

TO a good many people the Art Gallery on Sherbrooke Street is just a place where pictures can be looked at for nothing on Sunday afternoon, but, though the building is one of the most conspicuous in Montreal, there are still many people in the city who have never been inside it and hardly know what it is or what it contains. It is a public gallery in the sense that it is open to the public on every day of the week for most of the year, but, unlike the public galleries of other cities, it is not publicly owned and has never received any support from public funds, either provincial or municipal; it is owned by a body of subscribers and depends entirely on subscriptions, gifts and the income from funds which have, from time to time, been left as bequests to the Art Association. Presently a much-needed addition is under construction.

The Art Association of Montreal, which owns and controls the gallery, is now 78 years old. It was founded in the days when art exhibitions, like everything else, happened down town, in places where there is now little art to be found. The earliest artistic organization, of which any record can be found in Montreal, was the Montreal Society of Artists, formed in 1847, which held exhibitions, first in Bonaventure Hall on Bonaventure Street and later in the rooms of the Mercantile Library Association. Cornelius Krieghoff was one of the members of this society. Bonaventure or St. Bonaventure Street was then the name of the part of St. James Street which runs west from Victoria Square to the Bonaventure Station; Victoria Square did not get its present name till 1860; before that the lower part was Commissioners' Square and the upper part Hay Market Square. The Mercantile Library on St. James Street was in a building which was cleared away a few years ago, when the new Royal Bank was built.

Founded by Art Lovers

The success of these earlier exhibitions led to the formation of the Art Association, which was founded, not by artists, but by art lovers. The Bishop of Montreal, the Right Reverend Francis Fulford, was the leader of them and became the first president of the association; the other charter members were the Rev. W. T. Leach, W. H. A. Davies, T. D. King and John Leeming. The Association was incorporated by provincial act of Parliament on April 23rd, 1860. Its only business then was to hold exhibitions, which were given at first in the Mechanics Hall or the Mercantile Library Association. To begin with they were loan exhibitions, but in the Association's regulations, printed in 1864, the first rule is,—"An exhibition of Works of Art upon Canadian Subjects or executed by Artists resident in British North America shall be held (if practicable) in each year." At least one exhibition has been held every year since then.

After the Association had been in existence for nearly twenty years better quarters were needed. In 1878 the old Windsor Hall on Stanley Street was used for the exhibition and in the following year the Association opened a new building of its own. It was enabled to do this by the will of Mr. Benajah Gibb, who left to it a plot of land on Phillips Square and

William Ogilvie by Charles F. Comfort

William Ogilvie, who comes to Montreal from Toronto to be instructor in the new commercial art classes of the School of the Art Association of Montreal, and to assist Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., and Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., in their fine arts courses. The first term will begin on October 3.

Mr. Ogilvie was born in South Africa and has practised commercial art in London, New York and Toronto. He is well-known for his sensitive work in both oils and water color and his mural in the Hart House Chapel, Toronto, brought him further distinction.

The above spirited portrait of Mr. Ogilvie is by Charles F. Comfort, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., one of the most outstanding of Canada's younger painters.

$8,000. The building, of which the architects were J. W. Hopkins and A. T. Taylor, stood on the north-east side of the square at the corner of St. Catherine Street; part of it still remains, though it has been altered considerably. It cost $22,000, and was opened by the Governor-General, the Marquis of Lorne, on May 26th, 1879. The building had room for larger exhibitions than had been held before;—the catalogue of one of the earliest exhibitions, in 1864, shows that there were only 123 oil pictures, as well as some water colors and a few bronzes.

Mr. Gibb's bequest included some pictures and bronzes, in addition to the land and money, and, with the opening of the new building, the Association started its permanent collections, so that there was something for its members to see even when there was no special exhibition.

R.C.A. Exhibition of 1882

Beside the Association's own regular exhibitions, many special shows were given in the Phillips Square galleries. The Royal Canadian Academy, which was founded in 1880, gave its third exhibition there in April 1882, and has occupied galleries at the Art Association every few years since then. Some pictures which were sent from London or New York were shown here; among them was Millet's "Angelus," which had been bought by an American for what was then a record price.

When the Phillips Square building was opened it was well up town and many of the best residences in Montreal were on Beaver Hall Square and Dorchester Street. Thirty years later, when the Association was fifty years old, the site was no longer the best for an art gallery and the building was found to be too small. A site for a new building was found in the Holton property on Sherbrooke Street. A picture of the old Holton house, by the late J. W. Morrice, now belongs to the Art Association. The new building, the present art gallery, was built from designs by Edward and W. S. Maxwell and the cost of it was partly met by the sale of the old building, which brought $275,000 in 1910, and partly by special subscriptions, amounting to more than $278,000, of which the late James Ross gave $125,000. The last and in December of that year the new building was opened by the Governor-General, H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught, who had been patron of the Art Association since 1880.

Addition to Building Began

The present building has twice as much exhibition space as there was in the old one and, when it was built, was more than large enough for the permanent collections of the Association, but these have increased so much in the past twenty-six years that they have outgrown the galleries, apart from the fact that, whenever a special exhibition has been held, a part, sometimes the larger part, of the permanent collections has had to be put away in the cellars. To overcome this inconvenience an addition to the building is now under construction, from designs by Messrs. Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford, architects; this is at the back of the building on the side next to the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul and will contain several exhibition galleries as well as additional storage space. This work has been made possible by a generous gift from Mr. H. A. Norton of Ayer's Cliff and Miss Norton of Coaticook, with gifts from other benefactors and a part of the money left to the Association by Mrs. Charles Meredith.

The growth of the permanent collection is chiefly due to gifts and bequests, the largest of which was the Learmont bequest, a big collection of pictures, which have to be kept together and not mixed with other pictures and have one of the principal galleries given over to them. Other important additions have come from the collections of Mr. James Ross, Sir George Drummond, Mr. R. B. Angus, Lord Strathcona and others. The ordinary income of the Association does not allow of much buying of works of art but there is fortunately some income available from the proceeds of special bequests, of which the Tempest bequest is the most important. In the permanent collection of pictures, which now are about 700 in number, many schools of painting are represented. Works by Canadian painters of course make a considerable part of it, and another, and important, part is the group of pictures by modern French painters.

Classes for Adults and Children

The Association has received bequests for its general funds from time to time. Mr. James Ross left $100,000 to the Association, in addition to the large sum which he had already given towards the cost of the new building. Other important bequests have been the Tempest bequest, already mentioned, of more than $64,000, the Gilman Cheney bequest of nearly $54,000, and, the most recent, the bequest of $100,000 by Mrs. Charles Meredith. The Orkney bequest of $45,000 was left on the condition that the art gallery should not be opened on Sundays; when it was seen in 1922 that Sunday opening was desirable, it was necessary to pay the amount of the bequest, under the terms of the will, to the Verdun Protestant Hospital; the Association was enabled to do this by a special subscription of its members, and the galleries have been open free on Sunday afternoons since then.

Art education has always been one of the functions of the Association, and for this purpose there is a series of studios on the top floor of the Ontario Avenue side of the building. In the season, which is now beginning, classes are to be held daily, by a small but highly efficient staff of teachers, in drawing, painting, modelling and applied and commercial art. In addition to these there will be the valuable classes for children, begun last year, on Saturday mornings.

Figures Indicate Public Interest

The progress of the Association and of the use of the Galleries, which had been fairly steady since the foundation, increased rapidly after the move up to Sherbrooke Street. In 1880 there were 277 members, and the number of visits to the galleries in the year was 18,247; by 1887 the number of members had risen to 497, and the number of visits to 31,247, of which 12,439 were by members. In 1927, after the new building had been open for 15 years and Sunday opening had been going on for four years, the number of members was 1,611 and the number of visits to the galleries 64,078, of which only 11,741 were by members and 27,142 by the public on Sunday afternoons. The largest number of members was 1,770 in 1929 and in the following years of depression there was a falling off in the membership and, strange to say, in the number of visits to the galleries. There was, however, an exception in the year 1933, in which the attendance amounted to 74,871, of which 34,840 came in the three weeks in which the Van Horne collection of pictures was on exhibition.

R.C.A. Show in Toronto

On November 18, the 59th annual exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts will open in The Art Gallery of Toronto, 26 Grange road, and works of art intended for exhibition must be consigned to that address not later than November 5. Signed entry forms must be returned to the secretary, E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., 1207 Bligny street, Montreal, by November 5.

Marc A. Fortin Exhibition

Next Thursday in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company Limited of Montreal, and lasting until October 26, will open an exhibition of paintings by Marc A. Fortin, a painter of distinct individuality who has shown his work before in these galleries. Boldness and freedom mark the work of Fortin, who has found an immense amount of paintable material about Hochelaga, and on those country roads which are dotted with ancient stone houses, shadowed by noble trees.

ARTHUR LISMER, A. R. C. A.

Leaving Canada to Accept Appointment As Professor of Fine Arts At Columbia

BY RICHARD H. HAVILAND

THIS is by way of bidding adieu to Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A., of Toronto, who was recently honored by being appointed Professor of Fine Arts at Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York, and who will be leaving shortly to take up his new position.

For more than 25 years Arthur Lismer has been actively identified with progressive movements in painting and art education in the Dominion. His own vigorous painting, his remarkable pioneer work in children's art education, and his unceasing efforts for the advancement of art generally have gained him a place in the art world of Canada that will be difficult to fill, and it is to be hoped that some day, before his life's work is over, he will return to this country.

A painter of the modernist school—he was a member of the former Group of Seven,—his work shows strength, vitality and solid technical ability. Perhaps his most important painting is "September Gale," now the property of the National Gallery, Ottawa. But he has to a credit a large number of other canvasses truly interpretative of the Canadian landscape, with a fine sense of design and bold summary of forms.

His chosen work, however, has not been painting but lecturing and teaching, and it is likely that time will show that his best work has been done among the young people of Toronto. He has been Canada's foremost exponent of the necessity for art in education and was the first to put the idea into practice in this country. The new methods he evolved and his remarkable success at the Children's Art Centre in the Art Gallery of Toronto, have made the Centre internationally known. Other countries have come to him for advice, and in 1937 he went to South Africa by invitation to introduce a children's art training program and to reorganize art education in the schools throughout the Union.

His object has been not so much to train the children to be artists, but to build their characters and enrich their lives. His method is to encourage them to express their own thoughts in their own way, and to develop their own natural gifts of observation, memory and imagination.

Born in 1885 in Sheffield, England, Arthur Lismer received his early art training at the Sheffield

School of Art, and later studied at the Royal Academy of Fine Arts in Antwerp, Belgium. Coming to Canada in 1911, he settled in Toronto and became a member of the commercial art firm of Grip Limited, where he met the late Tom Thomson and a number of those whom he later joined to form the now famous Group of Seven.

Sketching and tramping through the northern woods, he submerged to a surprising degree the viewpoint of his early English training and entered freely into the spirit of his adopted country. His reputation grew steadily, and in 1915 he became principal of the Nova Scotia College of Art, at Halifax. While there he was commissioned to paint a number of pictures of patrol fleets and camouflaged vessels for the Canadian War Records Department. One of the most notable of these was "Olympic with Returned Soldiers."

In 1919 he returned to Toronto to become vice-principal at the Ontario College of Art, a position he retained until 1928 when he became educational director of the Art Gallery of Toronto. He now leaves the Art Gallery to become Professor of Fine Arts at Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York.

During these years he also acted as art director of Hart House, Toronto, from 1924 to 1926, and as principal of the teacher training course of the Ontario Department of Education from 1920 to 1933. He was elected a member of the Ontario Society of Artists in 1913, and an associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1919.

But the great value of his work among the children of Toronto is incalculable, more than 6,500 having passed through his classes at the Art Gallery of Toronto. Moreover, largely due to his ideas and his enthusiasm, the child art movement, which he pioneered in Toronto, has been spreading throughout the Dominion, and is now rapidly reaching significant proportions.

Technical Advisor

E. R. Hunter, appointed technical advisor to the Art Association of Montreal for the winter season of 1938-39. He received his fundamental training in archaeology and art during two years at the Royal Museum of Archaeology under Professor Curdell and studied two years at the Courtauld Institute of Art, London, where he acquired an academic diploma in Fine Arts, in 1935. After this, he spent a year studying in the European galleries and another year in the National Gallery at Ottawa, learning administration and enlarging his knowledge of Canadian art. During the past year he has been on the staff of the Art Gallery of Toronto. There is an added interest in Mr. Hunter's appointment in that he is a grandson of Sir Edmund Walker and a nephew of H. B. Walker, former president of the Art Association. Standard. 1/10/38 things, he edited the Canadian Medical Association Journal, the Montreal Medical Journal and the University Magazine. His creative literary achievements included "Essays in Puritanism," "Essays in Politics," "The Book of Sorrow," a biography of John McCrae, the medical man and poet who wrote "In Flanders Fields," etc. Sir Andrew rendered fine service to a host of readers by translating Louis Hemon's "Maria Chapdelaine." This translation into the English quickly won popular favor and is still widely read in Canada, the United States, Great Britain and wherever English is spoken. In 1921 he was commissioned to write a history of the part played by the Canadian forces in the war. In "The Medical Services" he gave no bald record, rather did he tell of the war as he saw it, without fear or favor. Some of his statements were challenged, but Sir Andrew stuck to his guns. He could be brilliant and caustic, but generally there was reason for whatever severity he indulged in with his pen. Where honor was due he gave it freely and honestly. To the beginner in poetry or prose he was considerate and kindly, pointing out the faults and praising the good. He lent every encouragement to Canadian art and letters, and altogether was a constructive force in the realm of culture. Of Sir Andrew Macphail it can truly be said that he touched the life of Canada at many points and enriched it. The disappearance of his familiar figure from the streets of Montreal will be regretted by his wide circle of friends and acquaintances in all walks of society. His death will also be mourned by many in other parts of Canada, in the British Isles, in the United States and over in France and Belgium, where he served as a medical officer. He was a patriotic and very useful citizen and a staunch Britisher.

Sir Andrew's last book was "Three Persons," published in 1929. The work was hailed in literary circles with such adjectives as "brilliant," "caustic," "devastating," "vitriolic." A one-act play from his pen was presented in Moyses Hall, McGill University, in 1932, by the Montreal Repertory Theatre. Viscount Duncannon, son of Their Excellencies, the then Governor-General and Lady Bessborough, was seen in one of the principal roles.

Sir Andrew was created a knight bachelor in 1918. He was also decorated with the Order of the British Empire. In 1893 he married Miss Georgina Burland, daughter of the late C. B. Burland, of Montreal, who predeceased him many years ago. He is survived by one son, Jeffrey B. Macphail, and one daughter, Mrs. L. M. Lindsay.

The funeral will be held Monday afternoon at Christ Church Cathedral.

Pilot, R.C.A., and a work by Prudence Heward.

Works, too, have gone from Ottawa and other points, and everything points to a representative collection, the selection of the works having been in charge of a committee which included Sir Wyly Grier, president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts; A. Y. Jackson, president of the Canadian Group of Painters; Elizabeth Wyn Wood, A.R.C.A., president of the Sculptors' Society, and Peter Haworth, president of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Colors. SIR ANDREW MACPHAIL.

Sir Andrew Macphail, who has passed away at the age of 74, was one of many sons of McGill University who achieved fame both within and without his profession. Like Osler, Roddick and Shepherd, he practised and taught medicine in Montreal and achieved a reputation that extended over the international boundary and across the sea. Early in his career he became noted as a physician, professor of medicine and author and critic. He had an enormous appetite for work, was indefatigable in the pursuit of knowledge and went thoroughly into every subject that caught his fancy. This capacity for earnest study and hard practice was shown throughout his long span, both in civilian life and in the World War. For his services in that tremendous struggle he was honored by the King with a knighthood.

Sir Andrew Macphail was born in Prince Edward Island, where he received his early education. As a youth he came to Montreal to study medicine at McGill, where he earned his degrees of B.A., M.D., and C.M. Then he continued his medical studies in England and was an interne in a London hospital. Returning to Canada, he took up practice. For a while he was principal of a grammar school and was on the editorial staff of The Gazette. He was professor of pathology in Bishop's College, was connected with the Protestant Hospital for the Insane, and later professor of the history of medicine at McGill and Cavendish lecturer of art. He was a Fellow of McGill and of the Royal Society of Canada. Numerous other honors came his way in connection with his profession.

Sir Andrew always had a flair for literature and soon made a name for himself as author, critic and editor. Among other

HAD FINE WAR RECORD.

Sir Andrew served overseas throughout the Great War as a medical officer with the 6th Field Ambulance and at headquarters. "On the recommendation of the Chief of General Staff and under the authority of an Order in Council dated October 7, 1921," Sir Andrew was commissioned to write "a comprehensive history for official publication" of the part played by the Canadian Forces in the war. In 1925 the first volume, "The Medical Services," appeared. Those who expected a strictly official account couched in carefully chosen words were disappointed. Sir Andrew wrote of the war exactly as he had seen and felt it, and the result was an absorbing if not always conventional narrative.

H. WALKER PASSES ON ORLEANS ISLAND

Famous Canadian Artist, 80,

Quebec, September 27. — (P) — French-Canadian neighbors mourned tonight for their artist friend, Horatio Walker, who died today at his home at St. Petronille on the Isle of Orleans at the age of 80. Death followed a paralytic stroke more than a month ago.

Born in Listowel, Ont., May 12, 1858, and educated there, he began his art studies in Toronto, and after further studies in the United States and Europe settled down on historic Isle of Orleans to put on canvas the placid, colorful French-Canadian habitant farmer and his surroundings.

Mr. Walker became acquainted with rural Quebec on sketching trips while he was studying in New York. When he married Miss Jeanette Pretty of Toronto in 1883, he brought his bride to a comfortable home on a point of Isle of Orleans in the St. Lawrence River six miles below Quebec.

For more than half a century, Mr. Walker painted rural Quebec, the sturdy, hardworking French-Canadian farmers and their families and the daily scenes of their stables and farmyards. He toured the province making sketches and richly colored paintings. He learned to speak the homely French of the habitant and his neighbors at St. Petronille soon became old friends.

There were few exhibitions of Walker paintings, but specimens of his work hang in a score of public art galleries and museums. One of his canvases, "Oxen Drinking," hangs in the national art gallery at Ottawa. New York, Philadelphia, Boston, St. Louis and other cities also know his works, such as "Ave Marie," "Barnyard at Moonlight," and "Stable Interior."

Earlier this year the University of Laval here bestowed upon Mr. Walker, a doctorate of arts in recognition of his "frank and clear depiction of French-Canadian life." He ended his days in his house overlooking the river with a view of Quebec's granite citadel, distant Montmorency Falls and the rolling Laurentian Hills.

His widow was ill in Toronto at the time of his death. They had two children, a son and daughter, both of whom died some years ago.

Horatio Walker, the distinguished Canadian painter, was born at Listowel, Ont., May 12, 1858. His father, Thomas Walker, and his mother, Jeanne Maurice, were both natives of England, who had come to Canada in 1856. On landing at Quebec, Thomas Walker and his brother Andrew were taken in hand by two affable agents who sold them a plot of forest land in western Ontario, receiving therefor all the money the Walkers possessed, several thousand dollars. The newcomers then settled at Listowel, a backwoods hamlet, and by hard work erected a sawmill and engaged in lumbering.

Horatio Walker was raised in comparative comfort, and his father had the good sense to recognize and encourage the boy's taste and talent in art. He was educated at Listowel public and high schools, and in 1873 went to Toronto, where he commenced the study of art with Robert F. Gagen, then a young painter. Before leaving home Walker's aptitude in drawing was evident, and his first commission was to paint an Orange banner for the local lodge, for which he received the staggering reward of $100.

Walker left Toronto in 1876, visiting the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia and painting some portraits. He then spent a year and a half in Rochester, N.Y., and in 1878 reached New York, where he launched out as an artist, opening a studio there at the age of twenty. During an early trip with his father to Quebec, on timber business, the boy had been impressed with the beautiful scenery and quaint life of French Canada, and he then formed a desire to live there. He went up from New York on short sketching tours, which were later expanded into a life work. He sought out the art of other countries and times by visits to the great galleries of Europe, where he was particularly impressed with Turner, Velasquez and Michelangelo. Visits to Europe continued to be frequent until 1913.

AT ORLEANS IN 1883.

In 1883 Mr. Walker realized his ambition by moving to French Canada, establishing his home on the upper point of the Island of Orleans, facing Quebec six miles below the city, surrounded by the great panorama of the Ancient City, the St. Lawrence, the Laurentians and Montmorency Falls. There he has lived ever since, when not travelling, having a large comfortable house, garden, and separate studio building. He always loved the old French-Canadian habitants, and he set out to master them as a painter. Summer after summer he tramped with his sketching materials through the counties of the North Shore as well as the Island itself. He lived with the farmers, talked their own tongue like a native, and set down in line and color the record of their primitive but happy lives. One year he spent May to November sketching from L'Epiphany, near Montreal, to Quebec, recording the simple farmers, the razor-back hogs, the plowman, sower, harvester, the children at play, and the wild fowl as they passed north, then south, in their migrations. Years of these tours gave the young painter a mastery of the life of French Canada possessed by no other artist.

HORATIO WALKER, R.C.A., N.A.

Such a foundation was certain of results. His first picture from Quebec life was of a swineherd and hogs. It won a prize of $300 at the American Water Color Society, which at once made him a member. It was sold for $300 to the Museum at Northampton, Mass., thus starting the artist on his international career. Mr. A. Walker became a member of the Society of American Artists next year, and then of the National Academy of Design. He was now established, and has had a steady and profitable market ever since. One of his pictures was sold a few years ago for $18,000, a high price for the work of a living artist anywhere.

Though he has diverted at times to portraits and mythological subjects, Mr. Walker's work has been mainly a record and interpretation of rural French Canada. He has been called the "Canadian Millet," but while there is resemblance there is strong contrast. Both painted peasant life, but the peasants of Millet, the French artist, are more discouraged and downtrodden; those of Walker are hardworking, but in their life there is sunlight and the glory of accomplishment. Millet painted the hopeless face of the "Man with the Hoe," Walker painted cheery people, with bright costumes, under spacious skies and luminous surroundings. His method has ever been conservative based on careful drawing and understanding of the fundamentals. He shows little sympathy with modernism in art, but yet was ever a brilliant colorist, and even at times ventured on effects slightly theatrical.

One of Horatio Walker's greatest pictures is "Oxen Drinking," in the National Gallery, Ottawa. Here is a description of it by Charles H. Caffin, in his book, "American Masters of Painting."

"Besides the quality of force in Walker and his art, there is the other one of persuasiveness. You may remember his 'Oxen Drinking'—the two broad-fronted, patient heads side by side at the water trough, their driver, in blue shirt, standing by them, and the rich or brown backs of the massive beasts showing against the dark-grey horizon. For the sky, reaching far up above the group, has been whipped into turbulence by the wind; it is slaty-hued, threatening storm. How grandiose, this elemental fermentation! How significant the bulk and solidity of the beasts! There is force all through the picture, the force of disturbance and the force of immobility; for the beasts are grounded like boulders, the man, motionless. It is a force that compels attention and communicates its own strength to one's self; and then succeeds an infinite suggestion of restfulness. The heavens may labor, but for man and oxen the appointed task is done, and they enter into their rest."

Mr. Walker was married at the age of 20 to Miss Jeanette Pretty of Toronto. They had a son and a daughter, but both died some years ago.

Walker as a young man hiked into the Quebec region, painting as he went. The animals of the meadows and fowl of the barnyard intrigued him, and he found new beauties in the humble pig. This experience awakened an interest in rural life which has not dulled with the years, and of all Canadian painters, he has made such subjects peculiarly his own. In Quebec Province he found all he wanted, and a later tour through Europe did nothing to change his opinion.

EXHIBITED HERE EARLY.

While his confreres were alive to the fine qualities of his work, the Montreal art-loving public had its first chance to appreciate its range in an exhibition held in the old galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, on Phillips Square, over thirty years ago. Here the strength of his drawing and the power of his color were revealed in a show that had the city talking. Powerful oxen hauled the plow at break of day, turkeys foraged in fields, flocks and herds were watched, crops were sown and garnered, trees were felled, logs were hauled and sawn, habitants stood mute and uncovered at the ringing of the Angelus, or paused in silent prayer as, homeward bound, they passed a wayside cross. Cows were milked, there were activities at the outdoor oven, provender was carried to the barn for the stock, ice was cut and stored and bemuddled passengers crowded gay cutters and sleighs speeding on the river road behind sturdy horses.

The exhibition, a revelation to Montrealers, was Walker's first important introduction to the general public here, the next opportunity to get a retrospective survey of his work being the comprehensive show of paintings, watercolors and drawings held a few years ago at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, St. Urbain street, the first of a series of exhibitions arranged by the then Provincial Secretary, the Hon. Athanase David, the other painters honored being Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., and A. de F. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., both of whom have since died.

These collections made clear the zest and vitality of the man, his ability to compose effectively and to set down the most ordinary incident and invest it with distinction.

His skill as a watercolorist was adequately shown in an exhibition held in the Watson Art Galleries in November, 1925. It was the first showing here of a collection of his work in this medium. Rural Quebec was the main theme at different seasons—"A Barnyard in Early Spring," with thatched-roof buildings, trees breaking into blossom and fowls hunting food; the same season with two calves, near a bloom-laden tree, enjoying the gentle warmth of the sun which flushed the nearby barn. Warmth, too, bathed a barnyard where an old sow enjoyed a siesta beneath a hayrick, her flattened bulk protecting white piglets almost buried in the hay. Of the fall of the year, was a painting of a straw-hatted, red-skirted woman milking a Holstein cow. White horses towed a hayboat; a woodcutter in red-banded tunic, blue shirt and loose coat sat filling his pipe in the woodshed; a woman poured milk into a can; a boy in a kitchen stirred the contents of a steaming pot. Among the works, too, were three that had been shown at the Brooklyn Museum—"Potato Gatherers," Millet-like in spirit, with a soft-hatted man pouring the vegetable from a basket into a sack, held open by a woman wearing a rough dress and red sunbonnet, while in the background a kneeling woman probed the soil. Sunset was the hour of "Girl Feeding Calves," in which the dominant color note was the young woman's red skirt. The third item, called "Unloading the Hayboat, Sunset," showed against the glowing sky, flecked with colored clouds, a man with pitch-fork tossing the hay from the bulky boat to the high wharf, where a comrade was loading a horse-drawn cart. It was a collection rich in lovely things, soundly drawn, washed in with freedom, enveloped in atmosphere and handled with vigor and authority.

GIVEN MANY HONORS.

Walker has not lacked honors during his career—admitted to the National Academy of Design in 1891; elected a Royal Canadian Academician in 1918; awarded a bronze medal at the Paris Exhibition, 1889; gold medal and diploma at the Columbia Exhibition, Chicago, 1893; a gold medal at the Pan-American Exhibition, Buffalo, 1901; at Charleston Exhibition, 1902; at the Universal Exhibition, St. Louis, 1904; a gold medal of honor at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, 1906; a gold medal at the Panama Pacific International Exhibition, San Francisco, 1915.

His work is represented in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and the National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.; the Peabody Institute, Baltimore; the Buffalo Fine Arts Academy; the City Art Museum, St. Louis; the Toledo Museum of Art, and the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh. At the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, his canvas is "Oxen Drinking." His work also has a place in other public and private collections.

Besides being R.C.A. and N.A., he is a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, New York; the American Water Color Society; the Royal Institute of Painters in Watercolors, England; L'Union Internationale des Beaux-Arts et des Lettres, Paris.

Laval University conferred on him an honorary degree of Doctor of Arts at a convocation on May 31, 1938, and in thanking Mgr. Camille Roy, retiring rector of the Quebec City University, for the honor, Mr. Walker said the French-Canadian institution's approval of his work was its "crowning."

Habitant Neighbours Crowd to Anglican Service for Noted Artist

St. Petronille, Que., September 30. — (P) — The French-Canada he knew and painted sympathetically for a half century bade farewell today to Horatio Walker, its neighbor of gifted brush and canvas.

In a vault beneath the little Anglican chapel of St. Mary on the historic Island of Orleans, a few miles below old Quebec City, the 80-year-old painter of the habitants was buried with simple service within the sound of crashing Montmorency Falls.

Walking side by side with the sturdy habitant folk whose characteristics the Ontario-born artist transmitted to canvas with the artistry that earned him the title of "the Canadian Millet," prominent citizens of Quebec and this little settlement followed Walker to the grave.

From the vine-fronted cottage where the old artist lived the quiet, retired life he adopted after coming here in 1883, the cortege wound first along a slanting beach road beside the broad St. Lawrence River and then through leaf-dotted village streets to the tiny wooden chapel.

It was the quaint, rustic setting that Walker, the countryside-roaming artist, loved in life. Only a few minutes before the solemn procession got under way, villagers had covered the route to clear it of cattle and other wandering livestock.

Burial of the painter under the hillside church, crowded to the doors for the brief service by Rev. Gerald Hibbert, culminated a notable story of his adoption of rural Quebec as home.

The young painter's first glimpse of the old French province was a brief one, but it was love at first sight with Walker. In Quebec on timber business with his father, the young native of Listowel, Ont., was struck with the countryside's picturesque atmosphere and a few years later he made his decision.

From New York where he had established an art studio, Walker transferred his home to the upper point of this island and settled down to his work surrounded by the great panorama of ancient Quebec, the towering Laurentians and the mighty falls.

Walker almost at once was at home for soon he had mastered the language of his neighbors. He lived their simple farmer life and it was not long before the newcomer's work began to attract attention. Walker's painting had captured the sturdy, optimistic spirit of rural French-Canada with a swiftness and sure dexterity.

For days he tramped the countryside, recording with his brush the primitive but happy life of the habitant. The razorback hog, the harvester at work, children at play and other humble subjects gave the artist his greatest inspiration.

One of Walker's canvases drew $18,000

PHOTOGRAPHY DISPLAY HELD IN ART GALLERY

Pictures of Many Countries To Be Viewed Here

Nearly 200 examples of photographic art, representing some of the best work in pictorial photography throughout the world, will go on display next week in the Montreal Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street west.

The exhibit is known as the Salon of International Art and is one of a series which is sent annually to all the principal Canadian art centres by the National Gallery of Canada.

The photographic art of various European continental countries is shown, as well as that of Great Britain, the United States, the Dominions and some from Japan.

The photographs, in the view of experts, have greatly improved from an artistic sense during the years in which these exhibitions have been given. Each photograph in the exhibit has achieved distinction in the country of origin.

"Art, and its influence on the community life" is the subject of a radio address to be given tonight at 9:30 over CFCF by Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the Art Association of Montreal. The broadcast will be under the auspices of the City Improvement League and the Municipal Service Bureau.

Former McGill Dean Of Medicine Honored By Society In Convention

Dr. Charles Martin, former dean of medicine at McGill University, was this morning named honorary president of the Canadian Association of Occupational Therapy at the convention of this organization in the Mount Royal Hotel.

The honor was conferred upon him during the election of officers when Dr. Goldwin W. Howland, Toronto, president of the association ever since its foundation eight years ago, was re-elected.

Dr. Howland in his presidential address declared that there seems to be a shortage of aides with sufficient training in occupational therapy to manage new hospital departments devoted to the work of rehabilitating those who have lost their value in the world of labor as a result of either accident or sickness.

He pointed out, also, that there were many vocational shops being opened and that these will require the services of aides familiar with industrial operations.

U.S. AGENT SPEAKS

Chief speaker at the meeting this morning was Terry C. Foster, research agent of the U. S. office of Education, Washington, D.C., who discussed the various methods of development of employability through vocational guidance and training.

He pointed out that the whole purpose of work therapy was to repair the human machine and its nervous system to maximum work utility.

"In a recent study of the unemployed in the United States," he said, "it was found that of those classified as unemployable by far the greater number were so classified because of defective personality, and nothing can be done to remedy the situation. It is too late."

"The significance of this to us is that if we wish to serve the handicapped to best advantage, we must provide adequate personality training and guidance as early as possible after disability occurs whether that be in childhood or after reaching adulthood. This means that our program for the handicapped must extend over all age groups and all disability groups, and counsel and advisement in acceptable habits, attitudes, and behavior must be an integral part of every step in the care, cure, education, and vocational preparation of those whom we serve."

The members of the association went to the Verdun Protestant Hospital for lunch and held their afternoon session there too.

OTHER OFFICERS NAMED

Other officers elected this morning were the following: Vice presidents: Dr. B. T. McGhie, Deputy Minister of Hospital, Toronto; Dr. Robert G. Armour, president of the Toronto Occupational Therapy Association; Sir George MacLaren Brown, president of the Hamilton Association; Honorary secretary W. J. Dunlop; Secretary, Miss Helen P. Levesconte; Honorary treasurer, H. H. Loosemore; Treasurer, Miss Elizabeth A. Hull; Organizing Secretary, B. Evan Parry; Assistant Organizing Secretary, Mrs. Alastair Macdonald.

The board of management of the association for Quebec will consist of: Dr. F. L. Phillips, Miss K. Suter, Dr. Gaston de Bellefeuille and Miss H. T. Lambert.

OBITUARY

LORD SHAUGHNESSY
DEAD HERE AGED 5516-Year-Old Son Succeeds to Second Baron's

Gazette Title 5.10.38

DEATH COMES SUDDENLY

Prominent Industrialist, Formerly Active in Legal and Military Circles, Ill Only a Few Days

Rt. Hon. Lord William James Shaughnessy, widely known industrialist and respected citizen, died early yesterday morning in the Royal Victoria Hospital after an illness of only a few days. He was in his 56th year.

A prominent business man and former practising member of the Bar, Lord Shaughnessy played a prominent part in the administration of affairs of many Canadian industrial and manufacturing firms, being a director of a large number.

The second Baron Shaughnessy, he was born in Montreal on September 29, 1883, the son of the late Lord Thomas George Shaughnessy and Lady Shaughnessy, the former Elizabeth Bridget Nagle. He attended Bishop's College School, Lennoxville, and later continued his studies at McGill University. Leaving the latter institution he went over to England to pursue his studies at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was a student in the faculty of arts. He returned to this city and entered the faculty of law at the old Laval University, the present University of Montreal, where he graduated in 1910 with a LL.M. degree.

He was admitted to the Bar the same year he graduated from university and joined the firm of Meredith, Macpherson, Hague and Holden. He was admitted as a partner in the firm one year later.

On November 16, 1911, he married Marion Laura Graham, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. R. K. Graham, of this city. Lady Shaughnessy, who was a niece of the late Lord Atholstan, predeceased her husband two years ago.

Lord Shaughnessy joined the old 55th Irish Rangers in 1914 when the Great War broke out as Captain-adjutant of that unit. He became adjutant of the 199th Rangers when it was formed in 1916 and acted as aide-de-camp to the late General Sir Arthur Currie, former principal of McGill University. A brilliant soldier, he was well liked by his men and fellow officers and was mentioned in despatches.

After the armistice he returned to Montreal and was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in 1920 upon the amalgamation of the Irish-Canadian Rangers with the 199th Irish Rangers. He held the command of this regiment until 1926.

BECAME C.P.R. DIRECTOR.

A short time after he returned from France Lord Shaughnessy was elected to the directorate of the Canadian Pacific Railway and in a few years was playing an important role in Canadian business affairs. Later he became connected with many of the directorates of the Davis companies and served on the board of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Canada Salt Company Limited, West Kootenay Power and Light Company, Canadian Explosives Limited, Canadian Industrial Alcohol Company Limited, Lake of the Woods Milling Company Limited and acted as chairman of the Canadian Board of Directors, Yorkshire Insurance Company Limited.

Upon the death of his father in 1923, Lord Shaughnessy succeeded to his title and in 1927 went to London, England where he fulfilled one of the many traditional functions of his office when he took his seat in the House of Lords.

Launched into a strenuous business career in the early part of post war years he resigned his interest in the practice of law and devoted his full time to the administration of the numerous banking, industrial and manufacturing houses he was connected with. Shortly after he gave up law, Lord Shaughnessy became affiliated with the firm of Sir Mortimer Davis, Incorporated, as a director and chief counsel. While he had not practiced his chosen profession since 1924 he was always in a position to offer legal advice to the corporations with which he was connected.

A keen enthusiast of both golf and tennis, Lord Shaughnessy was a member of numerous clubs around Montreal including the Mount Royal Club, the St. James Club, the Montreal Jockey Club, the Montreal Club, the Carlton Club and the Marlborough Club, London, England.

Well known as a philanthropist he took a devoted interest in many local charitable institutions including the Catholic and Federated Charities.

Subject of Book by A. H. RobsonWork of Montreal Painter in Varied Media
Dealt With By Toronto Author in Fourth
Volume of Canadian Artists Series

Gazette

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

8.10.38

Carrying on the good work begun with his compact, full-color illustrated volumes on Kriehoff, Thomson and MacDonald, Albert H. Robson, author of "Canadian Landscape Painters," adds to the Canadian Artists Series a work on Clarence A. Gagnon, R.C.A., LL.D., of Montreal. This book, published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto, is soon to be followed by Paul Kane and A. Y. Jackson, with other volumes in preparation.

As usual, size and scope being considered, Robson has done a thorough job, dealing with performance, for, on the personal side, Gagnon's career has been one of orderly, progressive development, after a start that hints at no early privations and struggles. With Kriehoff, Robson, without straining the point, had a rich "human interest" subject—a German immigrant who saw the pictorial possibilities of the Quebec habitant, painted him and his daily round and made this province his home. With Thomson there was the evolution of a commercial designer into a painter of the Canadian wilds with individuality and a fresh vision, a somewhat similar parallel being the life and art of J. E. H. MacDonald, R.C.A., with the added spice of a painter who was to bear the bulk of the abuse that fell on the group of which he was a member. Undeniably, such backgrounds help a writer, but such color is absent in the case of Gagnon, who from the first knew what he wanted to do, set a course and held to it.

Born in Montreal, ten years residence in Ste. Rose, a thorough grounding under William Brynner, R.C.A., at the School of the Art Association of Montreal, where his promise was noticed by James Morgan, who sent him to Paris to study under Jean-Paul Laurens at the Academie Julian, about covers his early "struggles," and from then on it has been a case of hard work to attain the position he has gained.

Robson deftly sketches Gagnon's development from the early Ste. Rose days when he copied illustrations by Gustave Dore, his trips abroad and his painting excursions at home, where his interest in the handicrafts of Quebec has been keen and practical, and is undisguised in his admiration for the artist's thoroughness in everything he does—deep study of his etchings, his paintings, to ensure the permanence of which he has ground his own colors since 1915, and his belief that art requires for its successful pursuit application, intelligence, initiative and knowledge.

Of the important position Gagnon holds as a Canadian artist, Robson writes: "He is one of that small group of Montreal painters who introduced impressionism into Canada in the early years of the century. Along with Maurice Cullen and Suzor-Cote, he did much to open the eyes of Canadians to the beauty and brilliancy of color and light in the Canadian scene."

Gagnon's essays in illustration—"Le Grand Silence Blanc" and "Moria Chapdelaine," both published by Mornay of Paris, sumptuous editions in full color that show the artist at the peak of performance, are touched on. Of the latter volume Robson writes: "... In this series of pictures, for pictures they are, Gagnon found ample scope to express his intimate and sympathetic knowledge of peasant life and the Quebec countryside."

The ten illustrations in this volume, remarkably true in color, are: "The Clearing," by courtesy of W. C. Laidlaw; "Quebec House in Winter," a sketch in the artist's possession; "March in the Birch Woods," The Art Gallery of Toronto; "Spring Thaw," Vancouver Art Gallery; "Horse Racing on the Ice," The Art Gallery of Toronto; "Village in the Laurentian Mountains," The National Gallery, Ottawa; "Village Street," courtesy of R. S. McLaughlin; and three illustrations from Hemon's "Moria Chapdelaine."

The frontispiece is a typical portrait of the painter, and the table of biographical notes covers the years from his birth in 1881 to 1938 when he received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Montreal. A partial list of paintings in public collections is supplied, as is a guide to where his etchings have found permanent homes—Petit Palais, Paris; Victoria and Albert Museum, London; Dresden, Florence, Venice, Mulhausen, The Hague, Walker Gallery, Liverpool; The National Gallery, Ottawa; Montreal Art Association, The Art Gallery of Toronto, Saint John, Halifax, and Quebec Museum.

This addition to the series is as rich in facts as those previously published. The group to date has distinct educational value, a quality that is certain to mark those yet to come from Robson's pen. Concise and authentic, they contain essential data that will inform the picture-lover and would seem to have a definite place in all newspaper libraries, since Canadian art is more and more becoming "news."

Amy B. Stone Exhibits
Studies of Flowers

Montreal Artist Also Shows
Landscapes and Spirited
Marines in Watercolors

Amy B. Stone, whose paintings are on view in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company Limited of Montreal, shows skill in the handling of watercolor. Her main offering is an engaging range of flower studies in which she reveals a nice sense of arrangement, fidelity as to color and ability in suggesting the fragile nature of the blooms. Tonal schemes are uniformly harmonious, the touch is bold and free, and the color is fluid and clean.

Delphiniums gave an opportunity to employ a variety of blues, and bolder hues are in evidence in "Mixed Tulips," which is among the most effective of her works. Miss Stone finds most flowers interesting—Calla lilies, Japanese iris, cyclamen, Easter lilies, red and white peonies, zinnias, gladioli, carysanthemums are all subjects for her brush, and there is no timidity in her method of painting them.

In her other works, landscapes and marines, Miss Stone is equally vigorous but not always so happy. "Rough Sea, Maine," with its curling waves and rocks, while sound in the free washy manner of handling the watercolor medium, could have stood a bit more definition in form to emphasize the solidity of the rocks and the volume and weight of the water.

"Barns, Booth Bay, Me."—buildings on a curving shore; "Fisher's Point," with its birch and pine on rocks; "Windy Day, Prince Edward Island"; "Coast of Maine"; "Polperro Cornwall," with buildings, boats and reflections, are interesting subjects, and of the winter season are "Ski Hills," with figure and bare trees throwing shadows on the snow; and "Mountain Avenue, Westmount."

This exhibition is due to close on Wednesday.

Landscapes by Two Montreal Painters

Star

18.10.38

Two exhibitions, which are now open, show the work of Montreal painters, who have entirely different ideas about the treatment of landscape. Pictures by Marc Aurele Fortin are being shown at Eaton's gallery and a collection of work by Albert Cloutier is at the Arts Club.

Mr. Fortin's works are, as usual with him, planned pictures and not sketches; he makes use of nature in his own way to make decorative panels which are always interesting and sometimes very successful. He has kept closer to nature in one of the most effective of the pictures in this exhibition, of a big elm tree at Cartierville; another elm tree, at St. Martin, has been rather more formally treated and is not quite so satisfying. A very decorative effect is in "Crepuscule, fin d'Octobre," in which cottages and trees stand out brown in a good pattern against a yellow sky, and a remarkable blaze of light from a sunset sky is in a big picture of Hochelaga. There are several smaller pictures of Montreal harbor, in which good arrangements have been made of ships against clouds of black smoke; a large yellow tree in "Opulent Autumn," a grey autumn landscape, a gaily colored picture of St. Germain and a quiet landscape near Ste. Rose are other of the more notable works in this exhibition.

The works by Mr. Cloutier are mostly small oil sketches of Quebec landscapes, which seem to have been made on the spot; his larger pictures are much less successful and their composition, with many conflicting lines and masses is not satisfying. The sketches are distinctly Canadian, with characteristic color and light, but a few have come off much better than the others. One of the best is "Bonnes femmes dorees," of bright yellow wheat sheaves in front of strong blue hills, and another, not so striking in color but very good, is of a snake fence with blue hills in the distance. There is good color in "Nuances d'Automne," a pleasant effect of sunlight in a sketch of the back river road, and a happy and quiet study of evening light in the "Lone shack at sundown."

MADAME THURNEYSSEN ET SON FILS Courtesy of W. Scott & Sons. This is one of the most important examples of portraiture by Auguste Renoir ever shown in Montreal. The silvery white dress of the woman gave this French Impressionist a good opportunity to reveal his skill in handling tones, and the modelling of the features and limbs is done in his typical manner. It is one of the canvases in the exhibition of French art opening today in the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, 1316 Sherbrooke street west.

"From Delacroix to Dufy" Show Opens in Scott's New Galleries

Work by French Impressionists and Post Impressionists Well Represented in Collection From London

Gazette

8.10.38

Opening today in the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, 1316 Sherbrooke street west, is an exhibition of French art under the title "From Delacroix to Dufy." There is one example by Delacroix and several by Dufy with many lovely works by painters within that period. The show, which officially inaugurates this Montreal firm's new galleries, has been arranged in conjunction with Alex Reid & Lefevre, Limited, of London, England—another in a series of such exhibitions to which Montreal picture-lovers look forward each autumn.

By the French Impressionists there are a number of fine examples. Sisley is here with a painting of the bridge and church at Moret under a sunset sky. In "The Village of Veneux-Nadon," with houses and figures in the street, there is a beautiful, luminous quality to the spacious sky. It is an exceptionally choice example of this painter's skill. By Pissarro there is a typical landscape with vines and apple tree; a scene on the banks of the Oise, with barge, buildings and trees under a cloudy, grey sky, and an English scene "Bedford Park Railway Station," with figures fence and foliage. Last year among the works by this painter was shown a glimpse of the Crystal Palace, done in 1871, when he found refuge in England during the Franco-Prussian War.

One example represents Manet—peonies in a grey vase on a red tray, which is a powerful piece of painting. There are several works by Renoir, other than the portrait of "Madame Thurneyssen et son fils," which is reproduced on this page, including a broadly handled path through a wood in Normandy; chrysanthemums in a blue vase; flowers in a yellow vase; houses, bridge and stream with seated men looking at ducks; and a scene on the banks of the Cagnes. "Rehearsal for the Ballet" is a small work by Degas, and "Sultan du Maroc" is the painting by Delacroix, the forerunner of the Impressionists. The mounted potentate, surrounded by his guards and attendants, is about to receive a French official in a space outside the walled city.

It is a vivid impression boldly handled.

Fantini-Latour is represented by a vase of flowers painted with characteristic skill and sympathy, and by "Music" a draped woman about to write on a panel already inscribed with the names of Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner and Brahms. By Courbet is a shore scene in Normandy.

Fruit on a table is from the brush of Gauguin, and there are three works by Cezanne—a wood interior; "Spring Morning, St. Anthonin," a roadway done in typical patchy manner but suggesting the season, and "Mont St. Victoire" with the bold barren rock against a blue sky flecked with thin clouds. There are also five watercolors by this painter.

A small oil, with glistening water and figures in the shade of trees, is by Seurat.

Derain, besides some small flower pieces, shows some vigorous London scenes—"The Thames Embankment," with the distant Houses of Parliament; St. Paul's Cathedral, as seen from the river, and "Pool of London" with shipping and the Tower Bridge in the distance. The color is gay and lively and forms are very freely suggested.

By Soutin is "The Groom," a man in a rich red uniform, whose ears are only slightly less prominent than those of this painter's much-reproduced painting called "The Cook."

Modigliani is represented by a portrait of a black-garbed servant girl; a nude that is relatively modest, and "Elvira," a portrait of a dark-haired, dark-eyed woman with personality.

Among the works by Dufy is "Le Manoir du Vallon," rather strident in its reds and blues, and Utrillo shows "Rue de la Mairie, Gargenville," a street scene in quiet tones, and "Montmartre," with distant church. There is a shore scene by Lurcat, "Rue du Rivoli" is a work of nice tone by Max Jacob, and by Baubant are several flower pieces precise and quaint in treatment.

The exhibition lasts until the end of this month.

Canadian Art Show Is Praised

London Taken By Storm at Opening of Exhibition

CRITICS ARDENT

LONDON, Oct. 15 — (C.P. Cable)—Canada's "Century of Art" exhibition which yesterday began its two-months run at historic Tate Gallery has taken London by storm.

Following the opening ceremonies which were attended by London's elite, including representatives of the entire diplomatic corps, crowds thronged the Thames-side gallery today to view the highly-praised Canadian paintings and sculpture.

"England has vaguely known for some years that Canada has a mind of her own in matters artistic," says The Manchester Guardian, which describes the exhibition as "vigorous and extraordinarily interesting."

Canadian School Declared Founded

"Whatever may be happening in other corners of the Empire Canada alone can claim to have founded an independent school of painting," The Manchester Guardian adds.

"The exhibition covers its field more completely than any previously held in Europe, or even in Canada itself," says T. W. Earp, The Daily Telegraph art critic. "There are no untutored efforts of vision workmanship. From the beginning, Canadian art, given the difference of environment, runs parallel with that of Europe."

The Yorkshire Post declares it is not surprising that the exhibition as a whole should give an impression of freshness and open air. With a continent at their doors, the paper says, artists have obeyed constant advice to seek communion with nature, without turning to impressionism.

Yorkshire Post Reports Progress

"Much of the contemporary work, confronted by the necessity for objectivity, is apt to over-emphasize decorative values, but there are elements promising healthy progress in modern Canadian Art," the Yorkshire Post comments.

The Times pays tribute to the high general standard of the exhibition and gives a prominent place to such pictures as Tom Thomson's "The Jack Pine" and "Totem Poles," and "Kitwangi," by G. D. Pepper.

In the opinion of Sir Evan Charteris, a trustee of the Tate Gallery, the Canadian show will prove an important factor in advancing the cause of art. The policy of interchange of exhibitions was also certain to strengthen friendships and mutual understanding between nations. The trustees, he said, welcomed an opportunity of showing the march of Canadian art.

Lectures to the Public at the Art Association

Lectures, which are open, free, to the public, are being given at least once a week in November and December at the Art Association of Montreal, and the second of these was given on Wednesday afternoon by Professor P. F. McCullagh of McGill University. His subject was the Acropolis at Athens, with which he dealt as fully as limited time allowed. He spoke mostly on the history of Athens and the Acropolis, with many quotations from Thucydides, Plutarch and Ruskin. The subject was well illustrated by a number of lantern slides, which showed many details and unfamiliar features of the Parthenon and other buildings, but time did not allow the lecturer to describe or name them all.

Professor McCullagh will give another public lecture, on "The Gothic Cathedral" next Wednesday afternoon. These lectures begin punctually at five o'clock.

Photographic Art From Many Sources
Gazette—15.10.38
Fourth Canadian International Salon Being Held in Gallery of Art Association

There is plenty to interest in the scant two hundred prints that comprise the fourth Canadian International Salon of Photographic Art, now being shown at the Art Association of Montreal by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa. To suggest that there is a vogue for photography is to understate the case—it verges on a "craze." Even the brief foreword to the catalogue hints at the hold it now has on the general public. "The great popularity," it reads in part, "of the National Gallery's Salon and the consequent length of its tours in visiting the principal Canadian art centres, may result in its change to a biennial event, which would tend to strengthen the representation and illustrate concrete progress without lessening the interest."

In this show, which displays outstanding examples by the camera artists of the United Kingdom, Europe, Australia and the United States, the representation and work by Canadians evoke justifiable pride.

It is an exhibition that warrants many visits—one to browse over slowly and enjoy the evidences of taste in subjects and the skill exercised in composition. The collection, too, is refreshing. Gone are the days when artistic photography was expressed in the mink and shadow of the soot and whitewash era. Now, with some exceptions, the aim seems to be to reveal how wonderfully precise and searching the modern lens can be to capture the texture of skin, as in "Donna Abbyssinia," by Dr. Giorgio Bianchi, of Florence, Italy, and "The Ear," and "A Steady Gaze," by Jun Yoshida, Mukden, Manchuko. The grain of broken snow is caught in "Sunlight in Winter," by F. Veress, Budapest, Hungary, and the slippery texture of ice is realistically reproduced in "Ice Herd"—a print, not without imagination, of icy hummocks and crystal-coated branches at a stream edge, by H. W. Wagner, Worcester, Mass. Texture of rock in sunlight has interested Mrs. F. S. Crawford, Beverley Hills, Calif., in "Stone Drapery," and "Morning Dew" on iris leaves gave W. G. Briggs, F.R.P.S., of London, England, a good subject, who also in "Water Butt" records gleaming wet leaves and water spouting from a pipe. The texture of sliced bread is evident in "The Staff of Life," by Leon E. Foreman, of Madison, Wis., and only will power and breeding prevent the spectator from drooling over the syrup-coated "Cherries," by Bela Malnasy, of Miskolc, Hungary.

There are from these finished exponents of the camera art many excellent things—some purely pictorial and others with ideas. In "A Natural," by Charles W. Roland, Pontiac, Mich., an effectively placed hand has just shot the dice for seven; from England and Australia there are human interest character studies. The pattern of shadows thrown by skaters intrigued C. J. Cray, A.R.P.S., of Warren, Pa., in "Lake Placid Club," and La Mar Mumar, of Pennsburg, Pa., sends "Aeroplane Pattern"—the aircraft as seen from the rear.

Among the Canadian entries must be mentioned the capably posed young woman "Carina," by Anna Vanderpant, of Vancouver, while John Vanderpant, F.R.P.S., with "The Breaker," "White Desire," "Passion" and "Urge," has made use of graceful plant forms. Mrs. R. O. Bethune, of Berwick, N.S., found piled hollow tiles and sleet a comely subject, and J. Henders, F.R.P.S. Ottawa, in "Pool No. 1," scents the pictorial possibilities of a grain elevator and elevated railway track. George Marchell, of London, Ont., in "Excursionaires," caught the shadows of the trippers on the wharf against the white hull of the ship. Frank A. Halliday, of Calgary, in "Prairie Patriarch" found an impressive Indian. A reclining nude, "Maid of Athens" (not Ontario), is the contribution of H. F. Kelis, Ottawa, while other Ottawa entries are by C. M. Johnston, F.R.P.S.; Yousuf Karsh and James Kelly.

Albert Cloutier Has Show at The Arts Club

Quebec Province Subjects Favored by Painter of Group of Vigorous Sketches

Gazette—15.10.38

Albert Cloutier, who is holding an exhibition of his oils and watercolors at The Arts Club, 2027 Victoria street, is loyal to the Province of Quebec when selecting subjects, and just under fifty works indicate industry, an open mind as to seasons and not a little travel in search of paintable material. Most of the paintings shown are sketches, handled with vigor and generally agreeable in color. These have the effect of being more direct and spontaneous than the larger works, which are distinctly marked by individuality and serious regard for design. Of these latter works, "Village Boarding House"—typical building with intersecting streets and figures, tells the truth. "Cap a l'Original, Winter," gives a good suggestion of the massive, wooded promontory, and "North Shore Road, Murray Bay," with houses and the hilly roadway in sunlight, is not without attraction. "Woodland Pool, Early Spring," and "August: Landscape, Laurentians," are the other paintings of larger scale.

The sketches cover a wide range in place, hour and season. "In the Sugar Bush" introduces figures and the typical shacks; "Wet Spring Day, St. Faustin," has snow-patched hill backing buildings and barns; "Grey Day, St. Arsene," shows the church dominating adjacent buildings, and a modern windmill, not on Dutch lines. "Threatening Sky, Murray Valley," promises a downpour at any moment; "Sun Rays Through Clouds" promises a change in the weather, and "Clearing at Murray Bay" introduces bright color notes. "The Snake Fence," with dark spruces, blue hills and evening coming on, is an effective bit at St. Agnes, the same place supplying "Silver Steeple." "Chapel at Petit Lac," "La Maison du Notaire," "Back Street, Caughnawaga," "The White Barn, St. Hilaire," "Chamard's Hill, Pointe au Pic," "Laurentian Farm House, Silhouette," "On Back River Road," with old houses Macaskill, Halifax; Burke J. Martin, London, Ont.; Andrew McCullagh, Toronto; John Morris, Toronto; Hubert Norbury, Edmonton; W. B. Piers, Haney, B.C.; Richard H. Raiton, North Bay; J. P. Skillen, Hamilton; and Gordon M. Tranter, Calgary.

William Lathrop, N.A. Lost Life in Hurricane

American Painter Had Just Finished Sketch on Sailboat When Storm Broke

Gazette—15.10.38

William L. Lathrop, N.A., of New Hope, who was lost from his sailboat at Montauk, L.I., during the recent hurricane, had expected to spend another week aboard his boat painting before returning home for the winter. He had just finished a sketch of the impending storm when its full fury broke, according to The New York Times.

Mr. Lathrop's home was in the art colony he founded at New Hope. Ten years ago he built the Widge, which he had sailed every summer since. Although 79 years old, he sailed alone and lived aboard his boat, except while visiting friends and relatives.

The artist was born at Warren, Ill., in 1859. When he was four his family moved to Painesville, Ohio, where he spent his youth. He came to New York in the late eighties, won recognition for his etchings and became a friend of John Twachtman and J. Alden Weir, through whom he became a member of the Society of American Artists (later merged with the National Academy). In 1888, on the advice of William Chase, he went abroad to travel and sketch. While in England he married Annie Burt of Oxford and returned to live at Georgetown, Conn.

Water-colors were becoming popular, so Lathrop entered this field and in 1896 won the Evans prize of the American Water-Color Society and the following year the gold medal of the Art Club of Philadelphia. In 1897 he moved to New Hope, Pa., where he became the pioneer of the colony that has grown to national recognition. He began painting in oil about 1899, and had since gained a reputation for his quiet emotional landscapes.

Canadian Salon Of Photography

Gazette—18.10.38

The fourth of the Canadian International Salons of Photographic Art, organized by the National Gallery of Canada, has arrived in Montreal and is now to be seen at the Art Association. While it is still quite international, with photographs from all parts of the world, the exhibition is more Canadian than before, in both the proportion and the quality of the Canadian exhibits.

The tendency in all the work shown is more and more back to straight photography, with careful choice of subjects and clever choice or arrangement of lighting. This to be seen even in the portraits, and lighting is well used in Dr. Julian Smith's head of a man and in a portrait by Yousuf Karsh. A portrait by R. R. Raiton is of shadows outlined in light; a similar effect is very well used in S. F. Harris' photograph of a black cat in the dark and Leonard Davis' picture of a haymaker is a composition of shadows. Will Till's "The Mirror" is a good study of interior lighting; George Marchell has an amusing view of shadows thrown on the side of a ship. There are an interesting effect of reflections on the ice at Prague by Grete Popper, and a fine study of winter atmosphere by W. Bogacki.

Patterns of line are the subjects of many of these photographs. Of the natural patterns, one of dew-drops on curving leaves by W. G. Briggs, and several arrangements of the lines of leaves by John Vanderpant are specially good; there is a nice composition of lines in J. Henders' photograph of a grain elevator and railway tracks, and James Kelly and La Mar Mumar get patterns with drain pipes and an aeroplane. And with these there are very many good photographs of a more old-fashioned and more strictly pictorial kind.

PORTRAITS OF WAR-TIME LEADERS SHOWN

Exhibited for this week in the galleries of the Montreal Art Association on Sherbrooke street west are the two portraits shown above of Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Borden (left), war-time Premier of Canada, and of General Sir Arthur Currie, war-time commander of the Canadian military forces.

Both portraits are loaned by E. Hodgson Smart, their painter, who is in Montreal on a visit.

Mr. Smart is believed to have painted Sir Arthur Currie either during the Great War or shortly after, while his portrait of Sir Robert Borden was made a few years later.

Mr. Smart has painted portraits of a number of war-time leaders, including Marshal Foch and Newton Baker, U.S. Secretary of the Navy.

CARILLON EXHIBIT OPENING TOMORROW

Gazette 21.10.38
Distinguished Guests to Attend Historical Society Ceremony in Barracks

The annual loan exhibit of the Argenteuil Historical Society, to be held in the Carillon Barracks, now under construction as a Museum, will be officially opened to the public at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon, it was announced in Montreal yesterday.

Dr. H. B. Cushing, president of the society, will preside at the opening ceremony and short addresses will be delivered by Archibald Kains, of Ottawa, honorary president; Victor Morin, LL.D., president of the Royal Society of Canada; Senator A. K. Huggessen and other distinguished guests. Following the opening event, the exhibits and building will be inspected by the party. Admission is free and the exhibition will remain open until October 29.

The barracks were taken over from the Historical Society of Argenteuil County by the federal Government about three months ago, with the understanding that building and grounds would be reconstructed at an estimated cost of $18,000, and that the Government lease these to the society at a nominal rental for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a local historical museum.

The big stone building, situated on the north bank of the Ottawa River and known as the Carillon Barracks, was erected about 1833 for military purposes by Commissary-General Forbes, of Bellevue, Carillon, a veteran officer of the Duke of Wellington's staff during the Napoleonic Wars, and, according to the archives at Ottawa, the building housed 108 soldiers and a proportionate number of officers during the Rebellion of 1837-39. It was donated to the historical society 18 months ago by Felix Hungerbuhler, present owner of the Bellevue estates, and was transferred to the Dominion Government by deed of gift to the Crown under the aforementioned conditions.

The work of repairing and reconstructing the historic old building and grounds has been under the direction of Prof. P. E. Nobbs, of McGill University, who was especially commissioned by the Government for the purpose.

Dr. Martin Sees Surrealist Trend In New Styles in Women's Hats

Gazette 15.10.38

Increasing interest of the public in art to the point where the aesthetic is being considered along with the practical, was noted last night by C. F. Martin, M.D., LL.D., president of the Art Association of Montreal in a radio address. He spoke over station CFCF under the auspices of the City Improvement League and the Municipal Service Bureau.

A look at the average display window in the shops, he said, will show how remarkable an influence modern art has affected on the business world.

"If you are familiar with post-impressionism," he stated, "you will realize how this influence has come to bear upon the commercial decorations and designs, emphasizing, as it does, the importance of light and shadow.... Take heed of the head-dress of the women of today, and their general attire, and you will convince yourself that surrealism has made a definite and significant impact on our private lives."

"It is only through the medium of education and example that we can influence, by sound guidance and suitable direction, the art achievement of the future. It is the most cogent argument for our galleries and museums and schools of art, and for the amount of money we spend on them. The educational value of such institutions raises their influence far beyond the exhibition of a few pictures and frames and objects of art."

The present council of the Art Association feels that its progress and welfare depends not only on the standard and scope of its collections, but even more on the degree to which it can successfully hold the interest and support of those whom it serves."

Dr. Martin described the extension of the Art Association building to provide more room for a constantly changing series of exhibits, the setting aside of one special room for the study of design, enhancement of the value of the art library, the Saturday morning classes for children and the Art School with its new staff and improved facilities.

During the coming season, he said, the council is providing a programme of illustrated lectures and popular talks with discussions, for members and the public generally; 15 will be given before the New Year and an equal number in the latter part of the season.

DATES FROM ABOUT 1833

The huge stone building on the north bank of the Ottawa river was erected in about 1833 by Commissary-General Forbes, a veteran officer on the Duke of Wellington's staff during the Napoleonic wars. It housed troops during the Rebellion of 1837.

The building was donated to the society by Felix Hungerbuhler, owner of the estate on which it is situated. The barracks contain many apartments which are to be fitted up as rooms depicting various periods, ranging from seigniorial to mid-Victorian. The Sir John Abbott room is dedicated to the memory of the first Canadian-born Prime Minister of the Dominion, who was a native of Argenteuil county.

In honor of Dr. Benjamin Wales, founder and first president of the society, a library bearing his name will be established.

Old Canadian furniture, textiles, portraits and other historical objects will be on view at the exhibition opening on Sunday.

Pictures by Children Shown at Art Gallery

Gazette 22.10.38
Examples From Saint John to Vancouver by 5 to 14-Year-Old Students

Pictures by Canadian Children hold the walls of the Learmont Gallery of the Art Association of Montreal and are certain to interest those who like variety in their art. This collection, shown here by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, are works done in various media by youngsters from five to 14 years of age. It is a case of the boys and girls being allowed to express themselves—very laudable in its way, but it does on occasion reveal a similarity of outlook and treatment that might almost suggest discipline. If this is so, there might be some discipline imposed in the matter of forms. The imaginative scribbles of a five-year-old may seem marvellous, but at 14 years the youth might be gently steered in a safe and sound channel—that is if he is at all serious about the matter.

In these galleries some years ago an exhibition of work by Montreal children was held, and this collection seemed the natural expression of infantile minds. There was some real imagination in the manner in which fairy tales and nursery rhymes were illustrated, and there was no hint of prompting.

Daron Byng High School gives a good account of itself with some decoratively treated fish and water plants; a quaint conception of the Finding of Moses—very lusty bull-rushes edging the infant, who is protected from the damp by a pink coverlet; and a group of figures on the seashore is done with vigor and a good sense of arrangement.

From Edmonton comes "Lady Scrubbing Floor," her expression suggesting that the task is little to her taste. Among the contributions from Vancouver is an effective block print on cotton, while "Summer Sing Song"—children grouped about a bonfire, is innocent enough. Ottawa contributions include a drawing of a yacht and also an airplane. Winnipeg sends a pioneer with sleigh under a cold winter sky, and "Motorboat Race" is a serious effort. The Toronto group is large and shows variety.

Arthur Lismer, A.R.C.A., former educational supervisor of The Art Gallery of Toronto, and more recently Professor of Fine Arts at Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York City, writes the catalogue foreword.

LEAF JUDGING TO START

Charles W. Simpson, Paul Caron, J. Crockett Chosen

Three prominent Canadian artists, Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., Paul Caron, and James Crockett, all of Montreal, will soon make a start on the task of selecting the most beautiful of the more than 3,000 leaves entered in the sixth annual maple leaf competition held jointly by the Canadian Travel Bureau at Ottawa, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Canadian National Railways.

The contest closed on November 1 but entries continued to pour in for the following week from all parts of Canada, several mail bags packed with leaves being as yet unopened. There is still considerable work to be done before the artists are called in to select the five most beautiful leaves. In the first place the entries have to be numbered, and then preserved as they are sent on a nationwide tour following the contest.

The three artists will study the hundreds and hundreds of entries to select the five most beautiful, for which prizes of $100, $40, $20, $10 and $5—a total of $175—will be awarded. The engineering departments of the Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian National Railways will decide on the largest leaves, for which prizes of $30 and $10 will be awarded.

Montreal Artist in Sixth Annual Exhibition Displays Landscapes, Vistas of Hochelaga and Wharf-front Scenes

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE

Marc A. Fortin, a painter of strength and individuality, is holding his sixth annual exhibition in the Fine Art Galleries of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, of Montreal, the works to remain on view until October 26.

This Montreal painter's works, and especially those of large scale, are rather in the nature of an acquired taste. The breadth of the brush-work and the boldness of the color are at first inclined to startle, but a fair and open-minded survey of the collection will moderate the initial impression. That what he expresses could be couched in quieter terms is a matter of personal opinion, but Fortin holds firmly to his convictions and compromise to capture buyers is something shunned. A slight unbending might sometimes make the fight less hard. His massive trees—and the majestic elm has long been a favored motif—despite the "big" method of handling are true to type, but, having attained that, it is unfortunate that something of the same observation does not extend to the figures and wagons that play their parts in his pictures. "L'Orme à St. Martin"—tree against a cloudy sky, house and fields, would have lost nothing by closer attention to form in the loaded wagon, and this summary treatment of objects weakens several of the works. "Etude d'Ormes, Cartierville," reproduced on this page, escapes this failing. The cow, being milked in the shade of the tree, is adequately suggested. This painting of noble scale is one of the most uniformly successful works that Fortin has signed in many years. Indeed, throughout all the works there is less of the dismal grey that he was once prone to employ, and there is distinct evidence of having captured a mood in his two vistas of unromantic Hochelaga at sunrise and at sunset.

Long a recorder of the church, factories, railroad tracks, homes and open spaces of Hochelaga, Fortin yearly seems to find some new pictorial angle, and is very successful in some watercolors of this area. The wharf-front, too, has proved fruitful, one painting showing moored freighters beneath the just-commenced Jacques Cartier Bridge. Some of the smaller harbor scenes are distinctly effective.

St. Rose, the artist's birth-place has not been ignored, and one work showing houses screened by trees in autumn leaf has engaging qualities. "Opulent Autumn" also prompted gayer color. Bright tones, too, find place in "Old Stone House, Laurentians," with the ancient structure edging a steep road, fields and distant hills in autumn. "Street, Bay St. Paul," with hill and houses, has some rich greens, and of a less clement season are "Neige de Mars," "Neige de Novembre" and "Winter Study, Montreal."

Marc A. Fortin, who first studied art in the school of the Council of Arts and Manufacturers in the Monument National, Montreal, under E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., and in the schools of the Catholic Commission, later spent a year at the Chicago Art Institute, followed by a year in Paris. While abroad he travelled in the south of France, landscape chiefly interesting him. His taste for the country has increased with the years, the Province of Quebec now being his chief sketching ground.

Fortin is represented in the Quebec Provincial Museum, and in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, his example in the latter place being "Landscape, Hochelaga," a watercolor. This year Fortin won the Jessie Dow prize for watercolor at the Spring Show of the Art Association of Montreal with "Les Eboulements Landscape."

ART GALLERY HELD AID TO EDUCATION

Efforts to Show Collections to Children Described by Miss K. Fenwick

Gazette 2.11.38

Holding that the public art gallery should stand in the same relation to national life as the universities, schools and libraries, Miss Kathleen Fenwick, in charge of the prints and drawings department, National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, yesterday advocated that such galleries should be incorporated into the educational system. Miss Fenwick, formerly on the staff of Goldsmiths' College, University of London, addressed a meeting of the Montreal Women's Club held at the Mount Royal Hotel.

Speaking on "The National Gallery and its Collections," Miss Fenwick stated that while the majority of national art galleries were within easy reach of the population as a whole, the National Gallery at Ottawa had been faced with the problem of reaching as many people in the Dominion as possible. As a result a system of loan exhibits was started as early as 1913, and had been expanded widely since that time. A great deal had been done to bring the gallery as close to children as possible, for it was realized that the children of today would be the public of tomorrow.

Miss Fenwick described the coming-of-age of Canadian art, stating that in producing a genuinely Canadian art, Canada has made a distinct contribution to creative art. The Canadian public is now awakening to the fact that it has artists of which it has every right to be proud, she added.

Referring to the subject of national galleries in general, Miss Fenwick said that the national art gallery should have as catholic a collection as possible, ranging from early to contemporary times, for only through knowledge of the past could the present be judged. Few would question the necessity of the public art gallery, she said, for it was a means of providing some response to the need for beauty.

Miss Fenwick showed and described some of the pictures in the permanent collection of the National Gallery.

Mrs. Guy Lapraik, chairman of the arts and literature department of the club, introduced the speaker.

Dr. J. A. MacDonald made an appeal on behalf of the Federated Charities, stressing the preventive work done by the various agencies.

Jack Cantor, cellist, played, accompanied by Mrs. F. J. Hodgson. Mrs. C. B. Powter, the president, opened the meeting.

Canadian Art and Artists

ROBERT W. PILOT, R.C.A.

Prominent Montreal Painter and Youngest Member of the Royal Canadian Academy
Standard, 22.10.38
BY RICHARD H. HAVILAND

ROBERT W. Pilot, R.C.A.,

youngest member of the Royal Canadian Academy, can be called the foremost of the younger Canadian landscape painters without much fear of contradiction. During the past ten or fifteen years, Montreal picture-lovers have come to look forward to his annual exhibition, which is always pleasing, of great interest, and yearly shows evidence of steady progress. He is also an accomplished etcher, and mural decorator.

Although he has painted some notable marines along the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coastline, as well as landscapes in Newfoundland, Spain and Northern Africa, Mr. Pilot has found his favorite painting grounds at Les Eboulements, Baie St. Paul, and other such spots in Charlevoix County, Quebec. He has also painted a great number of winter scenes in the Laurentians north of Montreal, and many consider these amongst his finest work.

Influenced by Cullen

His early work was greatly influenced by his step-father, the late well-known painter and teacher, Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., but he has since struck out and developed his own style. His work is distinctly original in flavor, as well as being cleverly interpretative, and in the last few years has featured much richer coloring and a greater boldness of treatment.

He has a keen appreciation of the quaint character of the Habitant farm, and his many scenes of the unspoiled French-Canadian countryside in Charlevoix County will yearly increase in value, for each year now, more and more of these picturesque dwellings are being torn down, while others are losing their "old-world" appearance from so-called modern improvements.

Born at St. John's, Newfoundland, on October 9, 1898, the son of Edward Frederick Pilot and Barbara Merchant, he was brought to Montreal at the age of nine, and received his early education at local schools.

Studied in Montreal

In 1915 he left the Montreal High School to devote his full time to the study of art. He entered the Art Association of Montreal school, where he studied under his step-father, the late Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., and the late William Brymner, R.C.A. He also studied at the Monument National under Edmond Dyonnet, R.C.A., secretary of the Royal Academy.

Robert W. Pilot, one of the younger Canadian Artists of rich promise, who holds the distinction of being the youngest member of the Royal Canadian Academy.

His studies were interrupted, however, when he joined the 5th Division Artillery, with which he served overseas from 1916 to 1918, seeing a considerable amount of service in France.

After being demobilized, he turned once more to his chosen career, and studied for three years in Paris at the Julian Academy under Pierre Laurens. In 1922 he exhibited at the Paris Salon, before returning to Montreal, where he opened a studio.

He was elected an associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1925, and 1935 became a full academician. He has twice won the Jessie Dow Prize, in 1932 and again in 1934.

Went to Europe

In 1927 he went to Europe, and after visiting France, worked his way down through Spain to Northern Africa. On this trip he spent time in Toledo, Madrid, Tangiers, Tetuan and in parts of the Riffian country. The brilliant colors of Northern Africa proved of particular interest to him, and he brought back some successful and striking canvases.

His work is represented at the National Gallery in Ottawa, by two scenes of Quebec and a series of water-colors, while the Provincial Museum in Quebec City possesses five of his paintings.

Examples of his mural decorations are to be seen in the chalet on top of Mount Royal, in the Montreal High School, and in the homes of Jules Timmins, and John Molson. He has also illustrated "Storied Streets of Quebec," and "The Patriot," by J. Guyon.

He has been teaching etching at the Beaux Arts for the last four years, but is able to do little of this work himself now, finding it too hard on his eyes.

A Lecture on the Work Of Auguste Renoir

The second of Ernst Neumann's lectures at the Art Association of Montreal, given on Monday afternoon, dealt with the work of Auguste Renoir. The very clear and well illustrated lecture gave an account of the painter's work from his earliest, imitative, period to the end of his long life, when he could no longer hold in his fingers the brushes with which he did some of his most important work. The lecturer laid emphasis on the gaiety of Renoir's pictures and his love of qualities and textures, and explained Renoir's methods with some examples of the differences between impressionism and other theories and methods of painting. As illustrations of the subject, in addition to the lantern slides which were shown with the lecture, two pictures by Renoir, which have been lent for exhibition, and a number of reproductions of Renoir's work are being shown in one of the lower galleries and in the library of the Art Association.

Mr. Neumann's third lecture, which will deal with the work of Van Gogh, will be given at five o'clock next Monday afternoon.

A lecture, open to the public, on "The Gothic Cathedral," will be given at the Art Association on Professor P. F. McCullagh at five o'clock on Wednesday.

MODERN ART DISPLAY ATTRACTS ATTENTION

Star 2.11.38
Redpath Museum Show Continues Till Dec. 31

Modern painting over which much controversy rages is illustrated by an exhibition of colored prints and books which has just been opened in the gallery of the Redpath Library, McGill University.

While not approving all that has been displayed in the current exhibition in the Redpath Library, university art experts agree that the public should have an opportunity of judging for itself what is good art and what might be considered bad.

The exhibit includes 404 prints, of which 227 are in color, and represents the work of 67 artists ranging from that of De Toulouse-Lautrec and Renoir down to Picasso. Most of the prints were presented to the library by Lady Roddick.

The largest representation is of the work of Van Gogh, Cezanne and Gauguin. There is also a small display of typical forms of modern art such as cubism and surrealism. The pictures are supplemented by a representative collection of books on modern art movements in English, French and German.

The exhibit will be on to the end of the year daily on weekdays from 9 a.m. to 10 p.m. except Saturdays when the hours are from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

A Century Of Canadian Art

The Citizen Written for The Citizen by GRAHAM McINNES 17.10.38

A little over fifty years ago the first exhibition of Canadian art ever to go to England attracted a handful of curious observers to the Indian and Colonial Exposition. Among those present was a member of the Royal Academy who had been asked to make a report on the Canadian section. This Mr. Hodgson was a man of sound common sense, and after examining the paintings, and noting how much they owed to European influences, he concluded his report as follows: "I should like to see Canadian art Canadian to the backbone."

Of course it is obvious that though an art may be "Canadian to the backbone" it will not necessarily be good art. But it is equally true that until Canadian painters learned to see their country through their own eyes, their work was apt to be pale and imitative. Many tubes of paint have been squeezed onto canvas since then, and if Mr. Hodgson were alive today, he would find that his wish was fulfilled. For in the exhibition "A Century of Canadian Art," which is being opened by the Duke of Kent at the Tate Gallery in London on October 15, the dominant note is one of vigorous and imaginative Canadianism. During the past fifty years Canadian painters and sculptors have learned to see their land through their own eyes, and in doing so their art has developed a vigor and a vitality which are real and original contributions to the world of art.

The present exhibition is the largest and most representative ever to leave Canadian shores. The fact that five tons of works of art were crated for shipment, while it gives little idea of the quality of the show, is indicative of the scale on which it has been planned. But the quality is there too; for the exhibition represents not only the finest work available from coast to coast, but is also a complete cross-section of Canadian achievement in the world of art over the last hundred years.

Starting with Canada's first articulate artists, Cornelius Krieghoff and Paul Kane, who painted the French-Canadians and the Indians of the West, the exhibition moves on through the work of the first pioneer professionals. Of these the most important are J. A. Fraser—whose magnificent view of the Rogers Pass in the Selkirk still ranks as one of the best mountain pictures ever painted here—Daniel Fowler and Robert Gagen. These are followed by the Impressionists, men like Maurice Cullen and J. W. Morrice, who were the first to discover the beauty of the snowscape. Next come the young men who, in discovering the North Country, were the first to see Canada through Canadian eyes and to develop new techniques and a new approach to meet the needs of a new vision.

Tom Thomson has five of his striking, decorative canvases and the members of the Group of Seven each contribute their own variant of stark mass, swirling line and strong rhythmic pattern. This art is indeed Canadian to the backbone—so much so that for a time its imitators tended to turn its new methods into mannerisms. But the moderns, while keeping the drive of their masters, have sought out new angles of approach; and the contemporary Canadian scene is vividly portrayed in landscape, figure work and portraiture, studies of industry and commerce. Sculpture shows a similar progression, from the fine religious carving of Francois Baillargé to the semi-abstract work of such a modern as Elizabeth Wyn Wood. Altogether the exhibition numbers over 360 works of art by 120 living and deceased artists spread through the Dominion from New Brunswick to the Pacific coast.

It is not often that art makes news—though it does so more frequently than of old—but an exhibition such as this is news in a very vital sense. It is not merely that it sums up and puts on display the creative effort of a young nation; it gives the more art-conscious British public an opportunity to appraise us in terms of our own cultural achievement. A charge too often levelled against Canada by unthinking persons is that she is too preoccupied with material civilization to care for the spiritual side of life. This exhibition is a potent witness to the contrary. "A Century of Canadian Art" will be on view in London right through the so-called "little season," up to December 15th; after that most of the works will be taken on tour through the leading provincial galleries in Great Britain. The last time a large Canadian showing went overseas was to the Wembley Exhibition in 1924-25. At that time, the public and the critics were loud in their praise of the forcefulness and brilliance of our art. If the present showing is as popular as its predecessor, thousands of Englishmen will have an opportunity to gain a better knowledge not only of our art but of ourselves. And already it is safe to say that in addition to force and brilliance they will find that latest and best of all ingredients that go to make up a national art—the emergence of a true painterly approach.

Exhibition of Canadian Art Is Opened Today by Duke of Kent

Evening Citizen Associated Press 14.10.38

LONDON, Oct. 14.—The Duke of Kent today opened the Canadian art exhibition at the Tate Gallery. With the High Commissioner for Canada and Mrs. Vincent Massey he toured the unusual show of pictures by Canadian painters whose joint activities have extended over more than a century.

Under the guidance of Eric Brown, director of the National Gallery, Ottawa, almost 300 pictures by Canadian artists were hung and bronze and marble statues placed to best advantage.

Art galleries in every large city in Canada lent paintings. Particularly noteworthy contributions were made by those in Montreal, Toronto, Regina and Vancouver.

Mr. Massey sent a large proportion of his collection of Canadian paintings from his London residence to the Tate Gallery.

First in Ten Years

There had not been a major show of Canadian artists' work in London for more than 10 years and there never had been an attempt at a retrospective presentation such as this.

Several paintings displayed were painted in the 1700's. There was a selected group of paintings by Cornelius Krieghoff, whose delineation of Quebec life in the early 19th century became internationally famous.

Paul Kane, Toronto furniture maker who went west under the patronage of the Hudson's Bay Company almost a century ago to paint Indian chieftains, was well represented. The work of Paul Peel, painter of children and patronized by royalty, was shown by one striking canvas.

Honors Evenly Shared

Care was taken not to stress any one phase of Canadian art. The early portraitists were as much to the fore as the Group of Seven and every province was given a fair share of honor.

Landscapes were the favorites of the few who saw the pictures prior to the opening for the general public. Canadian colors, whether brilliant in autumn or clear and vivid in spring, found favor in English eyes, accustomed to more subdued tones.

Last night Mr. and Mrs. Massey held a reception at the Tate Gallery. Graham McInnes, of Toronto, broadcast a description of the exhibition and the pictures for the British Broadcasting Commission.

A. CAMERON, SCULPTOR, SUCCUMBS TO ILLNESS

Allan Archibald Cameron, eldest son of T. L. Cameron, of St. Lambert, died yesterday at the western division of the Montreal General Hospital. He was in the 34th year of his age.

A grandson of the late Allan Cameron, of Westmount, he was born in Chicago, but came to Montreal at an early age. After graduating from the Montreal High School he took a course in sculpture at the Beaux Arts, Montreal, and later studied at the Art Institute of Chicago. Returning to Montreal he worked in the studio of the late F. Hill, R.C.A., and exhibited samples of his work at the Montreal Art Gallery and the National Gallery at Ottawa. His largest work was the Beggs Memorial Fountain which stands in the public park at Orillia, Ont.

He is survived by his father, T. L. Cameron, of St. Lambert, and two brothers, Thomas Laird and George Scott Cameron, of Chicago.

Montreal Painter's "Ludovine" Used to Announce Century of Canadian Art Show

Gazette — 12.11.38

Announcing The Century of Canadian Art Exhibition, now being held in the Tate Gallery, London, is the forceful painting of a girl, by Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., of Montreal, entitled, "Ludovine." The broadly handled portrait, reproduced in colors as a poster, shows a ruddy-faced, dark-garbed figure seated on a sofa, against a blue wall. The poster was received by the Art Association of Montreal from the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

London Gives Fine Welcome To Canadian Art Exhibit

Ottawa Evening Citizen Associated Press 15.10.38

LONDON, Oct. 15.—Canada's "Century of Art" exhibition which yesterday began its two-months run at historic Tate Gallery has taken London by storm.

Following the opening ceremonies, which were attended by London's elite, including representatives of the entire diplomatic corps, crowds thronged the Thames-side gallery today to view the highly-praised Canadian paintings and sculpture.

"England has vaguely known for some years that Canada has a mind of her own in matters artistic," says the Manchester Guardian, which describes the exhibition as "vigorous and extraordinarily interesting."

Found Independent School

"Whatever may be happening in other corners of the Empire, Canada alone can claim to have founded an independent school of painting," the Manchester Guardian adds.

"The exhibition covers its field more completely than any previously held in Europe, or even in Canada itself," says T. W. Earp, the Daily Telegraph art critic. "There are no untutored efforts of vision workmanship. From the beginning, Canadian art, given the difference of environment, runs parallel with that of Europe."

The Yorkshire Post declares it is not surprising that the exhibition as a whole should give an impression of freshness and open air. With a continent at their doors, the paper says, artists have obeyed Constable's advice to seek communion with nature, without turning to impressionism.

"Much of the contemporary work, confronted by the necessity for objectivity, is apt to over-emphasize decorative values, but there are elements promising healthy progress in modern Canadian art," the Yorkshire Post comments.

Times Pays Tribute

The Times pays tribute to the general standard of the exhibition and gives a prominent place to pictures as Tom Thomson's "Jack Pine" and "Totem Pole," and "Kitwangi," by G. D.

In the opinion of Sir Evan Charteris, a trustee of the Tate Gallery, the Canadian show will prove an important factor in advancing the cause of art. The policy of interchange of exhibitions was also certain to strengthen friendships and mutual understanding between nations. The trustees, he said, welcomed an opportunity of showing the march of Canadian art.

MUSEUM COSTS LISTED

Dominion Government Pays Half of Total Charges

Ottawa, November 4.—(P)—Of total expenditure on museums in Canada, the Dominion Government pays half, the Ontario Government one quarter and the other eight provinces combined one-tenth, it was disclosed today in the first report on Canadian museums to be issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics' Education Branch. Associations or endowments provide another one-tenth while the remainder is made by cities, non-provincial universities and commercial establishments.

Expenditure on museums with permanent staffs, including archives and art galleries as well as museums in the narrower sense, is between $800,000 and $900,000. On a per capita basis, expenditure on museums is eight or nine cents compared with about 18 cents for public libraries and $3.77 for motion pictures. Gazette 5.11.38

Canadian Art Exhibition Is Praised by the Duke of Kent

Canadian Press.

LONDON, Oct. 14.—Before one of the most distinguished and representative assemblies of Great Britain's cultural life, the Duke of Kent today opened the Century of Canadian Art Exhibition.

In a brief speech the Duke paid a tribute to those responsible for organizing the exhibition which, he said, afforded Britons their first opportunity of viewing representative Canadian art.

It indicated the deep significance of Canada's contribution to the world of painting. European painters, he declared, had been studied and certain principles absorbed but the work showed little imitation or flattering adoption of principles.

"A Happy Event"

Vincent Massey, Canadian High Commissioner, responding, referred to the exhibition as "a very happy event" and declared that the Duke's presence at the opening would be sincerely and deeply appreciated throughout Canada.

"Nearly 300 canvases from the Dominion have replaced for the time being pictures which normally hang in several important rooms of this famous gallery," said Mr. Massey.

"May we hope that the strong sun from our prairies and the winds from our northern hills will not have unduly disturbed the classic repose of so historic a place."

The Tate collection of masterpieces form a subdued, tinted background for the vivid and robust Canadian pictures. This is particularly evident in the water color collection which was hung in the salon next to misty Turners and dominated by Charles

Comfort's striking "Portrait of a Young Canadian."

Occupies Six Galleries

The Canadian show occupies six galleries. One is devoted exclusively to sculpture and gives the feature place to Elizabeth Wyn Wood's "Reef and Rainbow" in shining metal mounted on black marble.

Through a vista of five doorways "The Jack Pine" by Tom Thompson is the first painting to meet the eye. Its blending of brilliant blue and gold of Northern Ontario wilds attracted popular attention.

POLISH WEAVING AND PRINTS SHOWN

Star 21.10.38
Interesting Exhibition Opens in National Gallery of Canada Before Tour

Ottawa, October 21.—(P)—Prints of a religious nature characteristic of traditional decoration of peasants' cottages feature the second exhibition of Polish wood-cuts, engravings and etchings opened at the National Gallery here today.

Work of 47 artists is included in the display which shows a general tendency to concentrate on technique and ingenuity of approach rather than force of expression as noted in the first exhibition shown here in 1930.

Included with the prints are some intricately woven hangings and rugs. These are patterned minutely with spiders' webs, ships, birds, flowers or ears of corn and are woven in wool, silk, flax in dull shades of red, green and maize. Recently the art of weaving was elevated to rank with painting, engraving and sculpture in Poland from its previous position as a handicraft in trade schools.

A group of early wood-cuts, their style practically unchanged through the two centuries in which the craft flourished, represent figures of well-known saints.

Two narrow panel etchings in a blue-grey finish delicately portray St. Francis with his friends of the animal kingdom and St. Clare amid flowers.

Three wood-engraving portraits of a mountain shepherd, a beekeeper and a woman of the Bojko district, by Zofia Stankiewicz are noteworthy for their finely cut detail.

A modern trend is noticed in "ski-jump," an etching of a girl skier leaping into space with two graceful deer expressing the same movement in the distance.

When the exhibition closes here in several weeks it will probably go on tour across Canada.

Art, for Children, a Joy of Life Rather Than Stereotyped Drudgery

BY ROBERT AYRE

MANY an artist, I suppose, driven to exasperation by neglect, will be in heartfelt agreement with the painter Saul Raskin who lifted up his voice in the New York Times against the cult of the child in art. "Art is the activity of a mature body and soul, in full possession of all the faculties," he protested. "Art is the outcome of deeply stirred emotions and lofty conceptions. Art is the summing up of accumulated experience, of discipline, power of judgment, taste in selection, ability of organization. When does a child have the opportunity and ability to gather all that?"

I must be careful not to suggest that Mr. Raskin is one of the neglected, speaking out of strong personal feelings: I know nothing about him; perhaps he is just a serious-minded man jealous of the noble name of his mistress. For my part, I don't see how the exhibition of children's paintings, or even the growth of a fad about them, can injure art. Are the children injured? Mr. Raskin thinks they are. "Leave the child alone!" he exclaims. "Give it a quiet state of mind. Don't disturb it by sentimental talks, exhibitions, museum acquisitions, newspaper reproductions, prizes and other confusing nonsense. It is all forced upon the children and the public by our zealous art teachers eager to produce Shirley Temples everywhere, eager to encourage premature births of artists, instead of allowing them to grow naturally, in silence."

Make Art a Joy

Well, I think it is a matter of proportion. They do things more exuberantly in The States. It may be that they have gone too far, maybe some children are being spoiled. But even there I don't think the object, except perhaps in a few isolated instances, is to make infant prodigies. That was not the object of Dr. Cisek, who originated the movement; it certainly wasn't the aim of Arthur Lismer in Toronto; neither he, nor Fritz Brandtner of Montreal, had any idea of planting incipient artists under the glass of a forcing house. Quite the reverse, indeed. The idea is to liberate the child from the classroom and make art a joy of life rather than a stereotyped drudgery like the multiplication table.

"Viewing such an exhibition," says Arthur Lismer in his foreword to the catalogue of the show "Pictures by Children" now on view in the galleries of the Art Association, "one sees color, design, and illustrations all singing a valiant song of joy and creative vision." That valiant song is the important thing. The 148 pictures gathered together from nine Canadian communities were much more fun to do than the cylinders and maple leaves we painted in school when I was a boy. Much more fun to look at, too.

Enrich Their Lives

There is another argument against the movement. Are potential artists being injured because they are allowed to express themselves freely, to play, because training is withheld from them? I do not think so. The object, I repeat, is not to make artists, but to enrich the lives of future men and women by releasing the imagination and amplifying the perceptions. Those who are to become artists will be all the better for it and they will get their training when they are ready for it.

Much more fun to look at, too. Why should we look at them at all? Why should these childish daubs be elevated to the dignity of an exhibition in a public gallery? Well, in the first place, as Lismer points out, "They are important if only to tell us what kind of human creatures children are." They are also worth seeing for their own sake, as works of art, though we should not offend Mr. Raskin by putting them on the same plane as the products of maturity.

Zest and Innocence

Climb the stairs of the Art Association gallery and see for yourself. Joy is not the least important of the functions of art, whoever makes it, young or old, and many of our sober academicians, grown stale with tradition and learning, could learn something from the freshness and zest and innocence and daring of these young painters.

With a group of 50, Toronto has the biggest representation and it is an extremely interesting group, ranging all the way from the symbolism of the child of four—a battleship that doesn't look like a battleship but is a projection of noise, smoke and force; a porcupine covered with "pores"; (I remember a child who smeared his drawing all over to indicate the wind)—to landscapes and romantic viking ships with pink sails.

In the Montreal collection of 37, Anne Savage's Baron Byng High School group shows big designs of shells and fishes and flowers. Fritz Brandtner's Children's Art Centre is represented by circuses, gypsies, street scenes, crowds, men at work. Ethel Seath's Study children are more of the classroom, but there is a wonderful roller coaster.

It is interesting to notice the West Coast Indian motifs in the paintings from Vancouver and the influence of the Church in those from the Ecole des Beaux-Arts of Quebec City.

The exhibition was organized by the National Gallery of Canada and will be here until the end of the month.

Marc Aurele Fortin

YOU have until Wednesday of next week to see the 40 paintings of Marc Aurele Fortin in Eaton's Fine Art Galleries. I have my reservations, but I like Fortin for going his own way. The reservations include those colors which taste like the six delicious flavors, the surgery snow and ice on the roofs and eaves of some of his habitant houses, and his violent light. The skies are melodramatic in the Hochelaga sunrise and sunset. That luminous wool with which Fortin used to sew his landscapes in great loose stitches is not so evident in this exhibition. A view of St. Simeon, for instance, is clean-cut, as are the elms of Cartierville. The latter is more decorative, more graceful, than the elm at St. Martin, but it has less vitality. I liked the clear color of the small "Crepuscule d'Automne", and, although the composition was not altogether satisfying, the small Hochelaga landscape with blocks of color laid down soberly.

W. G. Constable, M.A. Will Lecture Monday

Eminent Authority on Art to Talk on Turner, Constable and Bonington at Art Gallery

Gazette—29.10.38

W. G. Constable, M.A., D.C.L., F.S.A., recognized as an outstanding authority on art, on Monday at 4.45 p.m. inaugurates the lecture programme of the Art Association of Montreal with a talk on "Turner, Constable and Bonington," open to members only.

The speaker, for years was director of the Courtauld Institute of Art in London, England; he was also the Slade Professor of Fine Arts at Cambridge, England; Assistant Director of The National Gallery in London; and from time to time was a lecturer on art in various universities in England.

He is the art critic of "The New Statesman" and the "Saturday Review," and one of the consultant editors of the "Burlington Magazine." Only last year he resigned from the Courtauld Institute to become curator of paintings at the Museum of Fine Arts, in Boston, and he is already wielding a great influence on art in the eastern States.

He has contributed widely to the literature of art, and has been responsible for the editing of many of the best catalogues of exhibits in the British and French fields. He has been honored by Italy and Belgium, and as a lecturer is rated one of the best exponents of his subject.

On Monday, too, the series of "Special Exhibits of the Week" will be held illustrating the work of the painters about whom Mr. Constable will speak.

On Wednesday, at 5 p.m., Miss Grace Cornell, of the Metropolitan Museum, New York, lectures on "Designs in Samplers." This is open to the public.

Coincident with this talk, a loan exhibition of Samplers opens in the Galleries on Tuesday. These were collected by the late Mrs. F. D. Adams during many years of travel. The examples range from 1700 until the middle of the 19th century. Samplers are literally "samples" of various stitches in needlework, and the chief producer of Samplers has been England, where for about 400 years young women and children have worked these squares of cloth.

Lectures Next Week At The Art Association

Two lectures will be given next week at the Art Association of Montreal.

On Monday afternoon at 5 o'clock a lecture, for members only, will be given by Ernst Neumann on "Degas."

On Wednesday at 5 o'clock a lecture, open to the public, will be given by Prof. P. F. McCullagh on "The Acropolis."

Morgan's Auditorium Has Exhibit of Photos

Gazette—22.10.38

Collection Includes Outstanding Examples by Camera Artists in Many Countries

Marked interest has been shown in the International Photographic Exhibition being held in the fifth floor auditorium of Henry Morgan and Company, Limited. The prints are by camera artists in various parts of the Empire, and European exponents are well represented. Canada's showing, too, is distinctly meritorious. Many of these prints were shown recently by the Art Association of Montreal, the exhibition being the subject of comment on this page last Saturday.

Among the portraits must be mentioned an admirably posed and dignified likeness of His Majesty the King, by Bertram Park, O.B.E., of London, while from the continent come good character studies—"Old Woman," by Jaroslav Bohacek, of Prague; "Donna Abbyssinia," by Dr. Giorgio Bianchi, of Florence, and "Hungarian Peasant Girl," by Laszlo Lengyl, of Miskolc, Hungary. Dr. Julian Smith, F.R.P.S., of East Melbourne, Australia, has character studies in "Old Firebrand" and "The Plot Thickens" and Anna Vanderpant, Vancouver, is effective with her gracefully posed woman, called "Carina," among many capital items by Canadians.

Paintings From Abroad

Two exhibitions are due to open in the Johnson Art Galleries, Limited, 1340 St. Catherine street west, next month. A collection of British and Continental paintings from the Carroll Galleries, of London and New York, will go on view from Saturday, November 5 until November 16.

On November 19, Peter Eilers of E. J. van Wisselingh & Co., Amsterdam, brings a selection of choice examples by Continental men, including van Gogh, Gauguin, Modigliani and others, as well as examples by Dutch painters. This show will last until December 10.

Plans are also being made to hold an exhibition of paintings from the Cooling Galleries, London, early next year.

ON THE NORTH RIVER, QUE., is a typical example of Laurentian country in winter by Eric Riordon. This Montreal painter has found the area fruitful in attractive subjects, and shows a varied group in the exhibition of his work, which opens today in the Continental Galleries of Fine Art, 1310 St. Catherine street west.

Laurentian and Lower Gulf Views By Eric Riordon Now on Exhibit

Montreal Painter Also Displays Harbor Scenes in Brittany at Fourth Annual Show in Continental Galleries

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE

While not deserting the Laurentian country, where he has found much congenial material, Eric Riordon, of Montreal, adds variety to his exhibition, opening today in the Continental Galleries of Fine Art, 1310 St. Catherine street west, by including scenes in the Lower St. Lawrence and port subjects done in Brittany.

This is the artist's fourth annual exhibition in these galleries, where in each successive year his displayed work has widened his circle of admirers.

On the whole, the collection maintains Riordon's usual standard. Naturally there is some unevenness—every shot cannot be a bullseye—and, while the departure is worthy, it is in some of the autumn scenes that the level of the winter landscapes is not always reached.

Winter would seem to be his season, and the faculty of capturing the clear, crisp air above sunlit snow in hilly country, which marked his previous efforts, is as evident as ever. He can give a convincing impression of "snappy," sunny days, and is no less successful in handling the more muted tones of shadowed valleys and waterways at dusk. Generally speaking, his work is losing the suggestion of slick ease that marked some of the earlier canvases. There is a sense of greater volume and solidity to his hills, and, as ever, his incidental buildings stand stoutly made to meet any kind of weather. These winter scenes are charged with light and air, and the selection of viewpoint always results in agreeable composition. Unless the fireside is the favored spot during winter, these Laurentian vistas are distinctly joyous in spirit and set you longing to be covering the white expanses on skis or snowshoes.

Generally typical of what appeals strongly to Riordon—and to increasing thousands every winter—is revealed in "On the North River, Que.," which is reproduced on this page. Simple in its elements—winding stream, dark spruces, snow-flecked hills, house with smoking chimney and a man shovelling a path, it has a fine sky with moving clouds and passages of shadow that are sound and convincing in value.

In passing, it might be said that this artist is finding the sky more interesting, and he puts in his clouds, with a deftness that gives motion to these masses of vapor.

The North River, so readily accessible to Montrealers, has been more favored than the Devil River, which in past years gave Riordon many good subjects. Of the former stream, the painter has several with sunlit, snowy stretches edging open water. The hills catch the gleam of the sun, and the shadows thrown by clumps of spruces play important parts in the design. "Skiers by the North River," with figures, blue water and hills, evokes pleasurable memories in those who love this country in the winter. Of this season, among others, are "Winter Morn, Laurentide Park," "Homeward Bound, Morin Heights Country," with skiers disappearing over a snowy mound, and a sunlit valley beyond; "Morning Sun, Morin Heights," spruces, shadows and open water; "Bright Day, St. Jovite," with open river, house, and fence almost buried in snow; "St. Sauveur," as seen from a wooded ridge, the village on the flat, and distant hills. The Laurentide National Park has supplied some effective scenes. "At Sundown"—with rocky hills, shadowed at their bases near water, and a moon swinging up; "Early Morning, Laurentide Park," a work of some subtle tones in the shadowed lake and timbered edge, with wooded hills bold against the sky. "White Face, Adirondacks" well suggests that massive mountain of lovely blue, rising above wooded land flushed with a ruddy glow.

St. Lawrence scenes include "Sunset from Cacouna"—road, spruces, the noble river and distant blue hills against a glowing sky; "Murray Bay from Cap a l'Aigle" is of the summer season, and spruces dot the landscape with rolling road and blue headlands rising above the river in "Near Bay St. Paul." The dramatic note is sounded in "Storm, Cap des Rosiers, Gaspé" with the lighthouse throwing its beams into a dark sky. Open blue water heaves in the painting of a Yarmouth trawler under sail, and there is action in the water in "Surf, Prout's Neck," with bathers set to "take" a breaking wave.

The paintings done in the quiet harbors of Brittany show careful attention to the forms of boats and ships, generally flooded with sunlight, agreeably composed and marked by summer skies with clouds.

Saturday, November 12 is the closing date of the exhibition.

ARTIST IS INJURED IN AUTO COLLISION

Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A.,
Badly Hurt When Car
Hits a Tram

Gazette 4.11.38

Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., 48-year-old artist of 309 Elm avenue, was severely cut about the left eye and two other men narrowly escaped serious injury early this morning, when an automobile in which they were riding collided with a street car at the intersection of Rachel and DesErables streets.

Mr. Hebert is a son of the late Philippe Hebert, C.M.G., R.C.A., eminent Canadian sculptor, and brother of Henri Hebert, R.C.A., the Montreal sculptor. He follows his profession as a painter and is also an instructor in art for the Catholic School Commission, Montreal. He is president of The Arts Club, Victoria street.

The accident occurred shortly after midnight. The automobile was driven by G. C. Papineau-Couture, K.C., of 428 Strathcona avenue, Westmount, who escaped injury as did Romeo Vincelette, 4480 DesErables street, the third occupant of the automobile.

The street car was going east on Rachel street, the automobile in the opposite direction, when the collision took place. As a result of the impact, the automobile swerved across the street and mounted the sidewalk, coming to a stop against the wall of a building. Hebert, badly cut by bits of broken glass, was taken to St. Luke Hospital, where he was to undergo an operation to save the injured eye.

Samplers at the Art Association

Star 3.11.38

The work of little girls of many countries is contained in the exhibition of samplers, from the collection of the late Mrs. F. D. Adams, which is to be seen till the fifteenth of this month in the print room of the Art Association. In connection with the opening of this exhibition a lecture on "Designs in Samplers," the first of the Art Association's public lectures, was given on Wednesday afternoon by Miss Grace Cornell, whose talk covered much of the history of embroidery.

While the chief purpose in the making of samplers was learning needlework, many other lessons could be brought in and in many samplers in the exhibition, and specially in the English ones, moral lessons were learnt by the makers. In some cases geography also came into sampler making and there are several very good embroidered maps in this collection. There are samplers from fourteen different countries, though the English ones are the most numerous. Some of the specimens shown seem to be rather unfinished embroideries than true samplers, though many of these are fine and decorative works of art. The Mexican samplers are particularly full of good pattern and color and many of the others are not far behind them.

MISS GRACE CORNELL of the Metropolitan Museum, New York City will lecture on samplers, an exhibition of which has been opened at the Art Gallery, tomorrow at 5 p.m., and not today as previously announced. The lecture is open to the public.

The Royal Canadian Academy of Arts and the Art Gallery of Toronto have sent out invitations for the opening of the 59th annual exhibition of the academy in the Art Gallery of Toronto by Professor Pelham Edgar the latter part of this week.

Landscapes by Eric Riordon

Star 1.11.38.

In the exhibition of his work, which is now at the Continental Gallery on St. Catherine Street, Eric Riordon has a rather wider range of subjects than in his previous shows. There are a number of pictures of winter scenes in Canada, more particularly in the Laurentian mountains, and they have much good light and atmosphere, with many excellent sky effects. Some specially good effects of evening light and richly colored sunset skies are in pictures of Baie St. Paul, of Cacouna and of places in the Laurentians. With these are some fine designs of mountain shapes in the Adirondacks, and a few European scenes, one of the best of the snow pictures is not of Canada but of the Tyrol.

Pictures of the sea and ships are an attractive part of this exhibition. Some of these are of the coast of Brittany, with calm water and fishing boats with brown sails, and these have some excellent effects of space and light. There is some good feeling of movement in several pictures of Nova Scotian schooners on blue rolling seas, pleasant pictures which will appeal to lovers of ships, with a certain strength in the painting which contrasts with the tenderness of some of the landscapes.

English Painters Were Subject of Lecture at The Art Association

The first of a series of lectures on a variety of subjects was given at the Art Association of Montreal on Monday afternoon. In the present month three more lectures for members of the association only will be given on Monday afternoons, and five lectures, which are open to the public, on Wednesday afternoons. All these lectures are to begin at five o'clock.

Monday's lecture, which was given by Mr. W. G. Constable, dealt with the three English landscape painters, Turner, Constable and Bonington. The lecture, which was illustrated with many lantern slides, spoke of the revolution in painting made by these painters, by their intensive study of nature, and of the great influence which their work had on painting not only in England but in Europe, and specially in France.

A picture of Salisbury Cathedral by Constable and two landscapes by Bonington, which also illustrate this lecture, and some prints of works by Bonington and Turner have been lent to the Art Association and are being exhibited in one of the galleries and in the library.

The public lecture on Wednesday afternoon will be given by Miss Grace Cornell on "Designs in samplers," in connection with an exhibition of samplers which will begin this week. Next Monday afternoon a lecture will be given by Ernest Neumann on Degas, for members only. Star 1.11.38

Mr. W. G. Constable, assistant-Director of the National Gallery in London, England, for many years and now pre-curator of paintings at the Boston, Mass., museum, will be in town today and will give an address this evening at the National Gallery.

EXHIBIT OF SAMPLES WILL OPEN TOMORROW

Star 31.10.38

Collection of Late Mrs. Adams To Be Shown

The first of a series of important exhibitions, which form part of the program this season of the Montreal Art Association, opens tomorrow at the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street west, in the form of a loan exhibit of samplers.

Samplers are quite literally "samples" of different kinds of stitches in needlework—often exquisitely fine and beautiful and always interesting. The chief producer of samplers has been England, where for about 400 years young women and children have worked these squares of cloth, leaving behind them a peculiarly individual record of the worker and the somewhat gloomy moral atmosphere in which they lived.

This collection was gathered by the late Mrs. Frank D. Adams over a long period of travel through many countries and contains a great many typical examples dating from 1700 until the middle of the nineteenth century, and ranges from England to Mexico.

Already considerable interest has been shown in this forthcoming exhibition and a lecture is to be given on the subject by Miss Grace Cornell, who is lecturer and head of the department of textiles in the Metropolitan Museum of New York. This lecture will take place in the Art Gallery, tomorrow at 5 p.m., and is open to the public.

Standard 29.10. Foremost Authority on Art Coming

The most important lecture of the year at the Art Association takes place on Monday, October 31st, at 4:45 p.m. by W. G. Constable, M.A., D.C.L., F.S.A. He will talk on "Turner, Constable and Bonington." Inasmuch as this lecturer is the outstanding authority on British art, probably in the world, and is recognized as a great figure in art in the whole British Empire, great interest is shown in his coming here.

For years he was director of the Courtauld Institute of Art in London, England; he was also the Slade Professor of Fine Art in Cambridge, England; Assistant Director of The National Gallery in London; and from time to time was a lecturer on art in various universities in England. He is the art critic of "The New Statesman" and the "Saturday Review", and one of the consultant editors of the "Burlington Magazine." Only last year he resigned from the Courtauld Institute to become curator of paintings at the Museum of Fine Arts, in Boston, Mass., and he is already wielding a great influence on art in the Eastern States.

He has contributed widely to the literature of art, and has been responsible for the editing of many of the best catalogues of exhibits in the British and French fields. He has been honored by Italy and Belgium, and as a lecturer is one of the best exponents of his subject.

On Monday the series of "Special Exhibits of the Week," will be held, illustrating the work of the painters about whom Mr. Constable will speak.

Gallery Talks by W. M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., will continue every Friday afternoon at 4.15. On November 2nd Miss Grace Cornell, of the Metropolitan Museum, New York, is going to lecture on samplers.

Works by Bonington And Constable Shown

Examples at Art Association
Soon to Make Way for
Other Treasures

Gazette 5.11.38

On view in the display hall outside the Lecture Hall of the Art Association of Montreal are a fine painting by John Constable and two works by R. P. Bonington. These pictures, shown in connection with the recent lecture by W. G. Constable, M.A., F.S.A., on "Turner, Constable and Bonington," are soon to be removed, to make room for other works to be selected as the Treasure of the Week.

The Constable, of a scale which often permits a painter to charge his work with greater sense of spontaneity than in canvases of larger size, is a painting of Salisbury Cathedral—the building with its fine towering spire being framed by magnificent elms, beneath which cattle drink at a pool. It is a work, marked by fine silvery greys in the building and a solid rich quality in the handling of the boles and foliage, by a painter who knew his trees. If memory does not err, it was among the outstanding works shown at the important loan exhibition held when H.R.H. Duke of Connaught opened the new Art Gallery on December 9, 1912.

The two oils by Bonington are typical of his finest period—clean, crisp and luminous. "Les Environs de Quilleboeu" shows two horses on a shore edging water with shipping, a distant hilly shore and a spacious sky; and "View over the Solent" gives a stretch of wooded country, distant water, a lowering cloud, and, in the foreground, a wagon with four horses descending an incline.

Current activities of the association include the exhibition in the Print Room of Samplers, collected by the late Mrs. F. D. Adams, and on Monday at 5 p.m., open to members only, an address on Degas by Ernst Neumann.

A Lecture on Degas at The Art Association

The second of the Art Association's lectures for its members was given on Monday afternoon by Ernst Neumann, who spoke on the life and work of Degas. A brief account of the life was followed by some observations on national characters in art and particularly by French art and of the influences which affected Degas' painting. The interesting lecture was illustrated with a selection of lantern slides of work by Degas, of which some reproductions are also being shown in the Art Association's library.

This was the first of three lectures by Mr. Neumann, who will lecture again on Renoir, next Monday afternoon.

Art News and Reviews

Rich Exhibition of Samplers Invites Estimates of Character Of Young Misses Who Did Them

BY ROBERT AYRE

"This little canvass gaily wrought Shows the effect of care and thought Would you your reputation raise Let these appear in all your ways"

SO stitched little Sarah Bradshaw, somewhere in England about a hundred years ago. But alas for care and thought and piety, Sarah never finished her sampler. Never even dated it. I fear it was that "gally" that was her downfall. So she comes through history a harum-scarum child and heaven knows what kind of woman she turned out to be. A bonny wife for some lucky man, I'll bet. I like her because she couldn't sit still long enough to preach with consistent, complete stitch for posterity. I like Alice Preston (1831) too, because she was, as the catalogue says, a "worker not very skilful at spacing her lines."

To do a sampler properly you mustn't take it lightly like Sarah and you must space skilfully, unlike Alice. You must take care and thought and have a solemn bent of mind, like Hannah Savidge (A.D. 1841), who warns us:

"Religion should our thoughts engage Amidst our youthful bloom I will fit us for declining age And for the awful tomb."

But I have my misgivings, even about Hannah. The prim flowering shrubs I can understand, but I'm worried by the small dogs. Could Hannah Savidge have been as earnest a little missionary as she seems? Perhaps most of the young ladies who patiently worked these samplers were children as human as Sarah and Alice, only their parents and governesses were more strict.

I'm talking about the exhibition of samplers—or may I use the delightful old spelling "saumplaie?"—in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. There are more than a hundred works, English (the greater part of them, for the sampler originated in England), American, Austrian, Belgian, Dutch, Finnish, French, German, Irish, Italian, Mexican, Spanish, Swiss and Welsh. Most of them are from the early years of the 19th Century, though some come from the 18th. They are

Samplers at the Star, 3.11.38 Art Association

The work of little girls of many countries is contained in the exhibition of samplers, from the collection of the late Mrs. F. D. Adams, which is to be seen till the fifteenth of this month in the print room of the Art Association. In connection with the opening of this exhibition a lecture on "Designs in Samplers", the first of the Art Association's public lectures, was given on Wednesday afternoon by Miss Grace Cornell, whose talk covered much of the history of embroidery.

While the chief purpose in the making of samplers was learning needlework, many other lessons could be brought in and in many samplers in the exhibition, and specially in the English ones, moral lessons were learnt by the makers. In some cases geography also came into sampler making and there are several very good embroidered maps in this collection. There are samplers from fourteen different countries, though the English ones are the most numerous. Some of the specimens shown seem to be rather unfinished embroideries than true samplers, though many of these are fine and decorative works of art. The Mexican samplers are particularly full of good pattern and color and many of the others are not far behind them.

from the collection of the late Mrs. Frank D. Adams and notes from one of her talks make an informative foreword to the catalogue.

You have until the 15th of the month to enjoy them. Give my regards to Sarah and Alice and Hannah. Don't miss the Greek figures, so different from the alphabets and verses and trim gardens of England and New England. Don't miss Anna Shaw's "Christ's Second Coming" and Charlotte Matilda Turmine's "Fragrant the Rose but it fades in Time."

And, above all, don't miss the woe of Mary Ann Parrott over the death of Lord Nelson. How gruesome the monument! How lugubrious the verse:

"Hark The Dismal Bell of Death Swell its Sad and sullen tone With iron tongs proclaims Lost Breath and Bids the mourner Weep alone . . ."

At Continental Galleries

RED stars show that Eric Riordon's annual exhibition at the Continental Galleries on St. Catherine street is going well and there will be more before it ends on November 12. It isn't hard to understand why Riordon is one of Montreal's most popular young painters. He gives the buyers nice, clean, tidy, cheerful landscapes with nothing to puzzle them, familiar scenes a little idealized or foreign places touched with glamor. His Laurentians are usually under spotless snow, with bright figures of skiers, snug cabins cosily trickling smoke, evergreens, half-buried fences—not the "picturesque" Laurentians of French Canada, but the Laurentians of the zestful skier. This year Riordon has added views from the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé, from the Adirondacks, and Maine; he shows some marines from Nova Scotia and Brittany—fishing ships with colored sails, schooners bowling along healthily—evening over jagged peaks in Switzerland, something from the Austrian Tyrol.

Today at the Johnson Art Galleries Luscombe Carroll opens his firm's 40th annual Canadian exhibition, consisting of nearly 200 paintings, mostly European. Some of the painters represented are George Morland, de Hoog, Burne Jones, Sir George Clausen, A. E. Bottomley, Orchardson, Lee-Hankey, and Marcus Stone. The show will be on until November 16.

Beginning on Saturday, November 26, the Eastern Group of Painters will hold its first exhibition, at the galleries of W. Scott and Sons, Sherbrooke street. John Lyman, Aleksandre Bercovitch, Eric Goldberg, Goodridge Roberts, Jori Smith and Jack Humphrey will show four paintings each.

Art Gallery Building Extension Will Permit Wider Programme

Gazette 12.11.38
Formal Opening By Lord Tweedsmuir on February 13 to Be Marked By Special Exhibition — Drawings By French Sculptors in December—Two Shows Next Week

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

An event being looked forward to is the formal opening of the new $100,000 extension of the building of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, by His Excellency Lord Tweedsmuir on February 13. The extension started early in September will be completed by January 1.

The additional accommodation, the need of which has long been felt, will enable the Association to accomplish its planned cultural programme without the handicaps it has long suffered by reason of lack of adequate space. It will permit the growing number of works which form its permanent collection to remain undisturbed, instead of having to be removed to make way for the annual Spring Show and the alternate yearly exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, not to mention the ever-welcome exhibitions of various phases of art which come here through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa. The Canadian Room and the Print Room alike have on occasion to be stripped to accommodate collections which, more and more, are being displayed for the benefit of art lovers.

Without at the moment knowing completely what the coming year is to hold in the way of offerings, the present season is rich in attractions.

Next Wednesday the Print Room will be the scene of an exhibition of Artists' Color Proofs, while on the Saturday of that week there will be a display of Polish Prints and Textiles, through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada. Both these shows will remain on view until December 1. On December 3, in the Print Room, there will be an exhibition of Holbein drawings, lasting until the 20th.

Early in December, too, from the National Gallery of Canada will come an exhibition of drawings by Contemporary French Sculptors. The collection of slightly under one hundred works is certain to excite interest, as many are by those who are exponents of the modern—Maillol, Despiau, Belmondo, Carton, Deluo, Kretz, Malfroy, Martinie, Parayre, Passon, Wlerick and Yencesse.

For 1939 one exhibition of marked interest has been arranged co-incidental with the inauguration of the new extension by the Governor-General—a collection of 19th Century Landscape Paintings. The pre-view will be held the evening that Their Excellencies are present for the formal opening of the new galleries, an event to be attended only by members, which, it is encouraging to note, are showing an increase. Joining the Association is not hedged about by vexatious conditions, much is being offered those seeking cultural development and consideration is being shown students and teachers.

Now on exhibition in the display hall are two fine paintings by Renoir—"Jeune Fille," a girl in a red-trimmed straw hat and red blouse, holding a bunch of flowers; and "Les Bords de la Cagnes," a freely handled tree-edged stream of fine color. Both come from a Montreal home, and are shown in connection with the lecture that Ernst Neumann is to give on Monday at 5 p.m. to members on that French painter. Recently, in the same setting, were shown two paintings by Bonington and a choice example by Constable, two of the painters dealt with in the lecture by W. G. Constable, M.A., F.S.A. This practice will be followed whenever practicable. Besides these original works on temporary display, reproductions of paintings by the artists who are the subjects of lectures are being shown in the reading room, the most recent authoritative books on these men being available for reference in the library, which is being kept up to the minute with works by competent authorities on the art of the day.

Show of Polish Prints May Open on Tuesday

Collection From National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, Coming to Art Association

Slight delay has arisen respecting the exhibition of Polish Prints and Textiles, coming to Montreal by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, which were to have opened today in the Learmont Gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west. The collection, which will be hung early next week, promises to be quite extensive and interesting. The prints will probably be in position on Tuesday.

At the moment there is an exhibition of Artists' Color Proofs in the Print Room, which is worthy of inspection.

On Monday at 5 p.m., open to members only, there will be a lecture on Van Gogh by Ernst Neumann, who has already dealt in a capable manner with Degas and Renoir.

"Color in Nature" is the title of a lecture by Professor D. L. Thomson, Ph.D., on Wednesday at 5 p.m. This is open to the public and there will be discussion.

Gazette—19.11.38
Varied Collection at Art Gallery Includes Two Prints of Province of Quebec Subjects

Interest is being shown in the exhibition of Artists' Color Proofs now holding the walls of the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal. This collection of lithographs in color will repay inspection, since little of this type of work is shown here. The prints are not terribly exciting, though some of the artists show individuality. Lynn T. Morgan, who takes a rather literal view of things, has come to this province for two of his subjects—"Souvenir of Gaspé," with building and church edging a road, backed by a blue hill; and "Perce Rock" which, for a change, is not seen from the usual height. "Empire State Building," against a rosy sky, gives him opportunities with the lighted windows, and "Brown Stone Front" shows a quickly passing type of structure, with wreckers busy on a top floor.

Louis Lozowick in "Silver and Gold" shows a lighthouse, stunted grass sprouting from sand, and distant ships under sail, and M. Schaezel treats flowers in a decorative manner.

There is action to Albert Carman's male dancer in action, and a more restful note is sounded in "Siesta," a straw-hatted Mexican with red scarf about to be engulfed by a cactus.

There is a distinctive touch to "Waitress," by Alice Tenney, in which the angularly treated woman is trying to spread a fractious table cloth.

Interesting, too, to the layman is the series of progressive color separations for the print by Thomas B. Jones, entitled "Equestrian and Maidens."

This show due to close on December 1, also has a number of other interesting prints.

Quick Sketch Class Three Times a Week

Innovation at Art Gallery Highly Popular and Extra Day Is Added

Open to all, on the simplest condition, the Quick Sketch Class from the living model at the Art Association of Montreal is gaining in popularity. Business men are finding the hour and a half of diversion much to their liking and work as keenly as the students who hope to follow painting as a profession. The class, from 5 to 6.30 p.m. on Tuesday and Thursday is proving inadequate to meet demands and, starting next week, it will be held on Wednesday as well. The model too, will pose thirty minutes at a time.

A. Hebert, A.R.C.A., Makes Good Recovery

Sight of Left Eye of Painter Gashed in Auto Smash Will Not Be Impaired

Encouraging news is heard of the recovery being made by Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., injured in a tram-auto collision a few weeks ago. The Montreal painter was badly cut by broken glass, his left eye being gashed. He has now left hospital, with the assurance of his physician that the sight of the injured eye will not be impaired. An artist of considerable industry, Hebert is represented at the Century of Canadian Art exhibition in the Tate Gallery, London, by "The Convent Garden," lent by W. R. Watson, of Montreal. He is president of the Arts Club, Victoria street.

Lecture on Van Gogh at The Art Association

The last of three lectures on modern painters by Ernst Neumann was given at the Art Association on Monday afternoon, and dealt with the work of Vincent Van Gogh. Some account was given by Mr. Neumann of the earlier part of Van Gogh's life but he passed over the sadder last years and spoke more of the painter's work, and specially of his drawing; some of the most interesting of the few lantern slides that were shown were of drawings. The lecturer went into the nature of good drawing as a means of expression, to confute the critics who said that Van Gogh could not draw.

Van Gogh's way of painting was explained with the help of some specially prepared slides, to show how he combined linear drawing with an impressionistic method of painting. Mr. Neumann, speaking with enthusiasm of Van Gogh's work, made comparisons with the banality of some of the other modern Dutch painters. The painter's ideals and intentions were illustrated by many extracts from his letters to his younger brother, Theo, who supported him for a large part of his short life.

A public lecture will be given at the Art Association tomorrow, Wednesday, afternoon at 5 o'clock by Professor D. L. Thomson on "Color in Nature."

Women's Art Society Holds Annual Show

Gazette—19.11.38
Progress Indicated in the Oils, Watercolors and Pastels in the Eaton Galleries

Much meritorious work marks the annual exhibition of the Women's Art Society of Montreal, being held in the Eaton galleries. The oils, watercolors and pastels deal with the usual variety of subjects, and the general spirit of the show is one of progress.

Phyllis Percival shows versatility in her entries—"Home of Pierre du Calvet," having historical interest, the strongly handled portrait called "Margot," and a still life of phlox and zinnias in a slender silver vase. While flower pieces are fewer than usual, there is worthy work by Lillian Hingston, with "White Hyacinths" and geranium in a pot; decoratively handled daisies, carnations and nasturtiums by Kathleen Liebich, whose treatment of these blooms suggests she would be successful with color block prints; Vivian Walker who besides a flower study shows broad treatment in her road with cottages. "Anemones" and "Finch Roses" are the offering by Gertrude M. Burgoyne. Margaret J. Sanborn paints delphiniums in a garden setting, and, also in watercolor, is very successful in the crisp treatment of houses, tress and still water in a work called "Yamaska River."

Norah L. Smyth goes for pattern in "Rangeley Lake, Maine," a like aiming at precise design being evident in "Old Iroquois Church, Caughnawaga." A Kanawaki Caddie, good in suggesting rugged character, and a seated boy in blue with a green balloon are among her other works. Frances B. Sweeney finds attractive subjects in "Cedar Grove," and "Reflections on the River," and Margaret C. Thompson, who is partial to marines, has a strong oil in "Pinnacle Rock." Annie Pringle besides showing straightforward portraits, invests with the chill of winter "Old Farm, Queen Mary Road." Of a more clement season is the green tree and building, entitled "Old Homestead, Law's Lane," by C. Marshall. It is clear that Jane C. Luke continues to show her preoccupation, capturing the shimmering atmosphere of autumn in "End of Village"—shadow-splashed cottages with cart on a road; and "October Morning, Terrebonne" with trees in rich leaf and glimpse of the church.

Beatrice M. Long has two good portraits—"Leighorn Hat," and "Russian Girl," the high color note in the latter being supplied by the head-dress. Winnifred Lewis has a forceful pastel of whitewashed barn and adjacent buildings, distant wooded hills, and patches of snow dotting grass and roadway called "Early Spring." Trees in a livery attracted Ida Huddell in a work entitled "On the Road to St. Therese," and Beryl Forbes, favoring bolder scenery, is effective in "Summer Hills"—spruce-dotted foreground, lake and hills beyond with a rain squall breaking in the distance. Evelyn Cunningham suggests the glitter of sunlight in "Sherbrooke Street," looking eastwards from Guy street. Beryl Butler has a boldly handled portrait sketch in watercolor, a succeeds with "Celery Field," trenched land, vegetables and a church on the horizon. Jean Baillie shows "The Long Ridge"; Marjorie D. Anderson has a shore scene called "Little Harbor, N.S.," and K. Trim has a portrait of a Montreal newspaperman looking pensive.

Paintings From Amsterdam

Gazette—19.11.38
Opening today in the John's Art Galleries, 1340 St. Catherine street west, will be an exhibition of a collection of works by 19th and 20th century French and Dutch painters, Impressionists and School of Paris, brought from the galleries of E. J. van Wisselingh, Amsterdam, by Peter Eilers. The show will last until December 10.

Water Colors

By Ron Clark

Star 22.11.38
A small exhibition is being held in the gallery of Sidney Carter on Victoria Street of works by a new painter, Ron Clark. Most of these, and the best of them, are in water color and Mr. Clark's subjects are generally places in or near Montreal. Many of them are of streets or houses, and they are sound in drawing and broadly and freely painted. One good drawing is of a view from the mountain, with an excellent effect of sky and distance and some rather symbolic trees in the foreground. In all the water colors there is a true feeling of the color and light of Montreal and, while some of the subjects are not very interesting the drawings are striking for the freedom of the brush-work and the effective use of water color.

ART

By JOHN LYMAN

CHILDREN AND ART

PICTURES by Children—such as those assembled by the National Gallery of Canada, and briefly shown for the past ten days at the Art Association—are no longer a novelty. So much the better. For several years international, national and local exhibitions, albums and books have been produced far and wide in an effort to popularize the new movement in child education. This is, however, but the second time it has been given much prominence in Montreal and the occasion is a pertinent reminder of the growing change of attitude toward it.

The movement, to be sure, is not so very new. I forget how many years it is since Prof. Cizek originated it in Vienna. It gradually spread to many countries of Europe and Asia and has recently received immense impetus in the United States, where modern art teaching (or, to be more precise, encouragement) is a regular department in innumerable public and private schools as well as being given in many special classes organized privately and by the W.P.A. Canada, always shy of anything new in the way of ideas, has been slower to adopt it. The only public school represented in this exhibition and, as far as I know, to have accomplished anything worth while in this direction is Montreal's Baron Byng High School, where the new method was introduced some years ago by Anne Savage, who last year extended her activities to week-end classes at the Art Association. Lismer pioneered it at the Art Gallery of Toronto, where his services have come to an end in default of a satisfactory arrangement to replace the expired subsidy from the Carnegie Corporation, and Lismer has joined the staff of Teachers College of Columbia University.

In all, the exhibition presented work from eleven groups in nine Canadian cities. Montreal was further represented by The Study, where Ethel Seath is in charge, and by Fritz Brandtner's Children's Art Centre. Saint John, N.B., sent pictures from the class of Jack Humphrey, Quebec from that of Jean Paul Lemieux at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Ottawa from that of Mabel May at the National Gallery, Kingston from that at the Art Association under the guidance of André Bieler, Resident Artist at Queen's University. From the West came work from the classes of the Winnipeg Art Gallery, the Edmonton Museum of Arts and the Vancouver Art Gallery.

Some of the classes are of recent formation. Some tend to compromise with the old-time drawing lessons, for the prejudices about art that have flourished among the people of this country, who got them from Victorian Britain, are by no means dead. There is still widely held a triple superstition: A—that enjoyment of art is a luxury and superfluity only to be indulged in when all material demands have been satisfied; B—that normal understanding is limited to photographic resemblance or what has been called (in an effort to explain a confusing dualism which reflects this misconception on a pedantic level) the representational side of Art, while the esthetic trimmings—design, "pure" art—are revealed only by special culture; C—that art in the school is a polite accomplishment of no practical value beyond the convenience of draughtsmanship. How such a superstition could arise is one of the major mysteries. One has only to look into a museum or abroad in the world to-day to see that the economic factor has no constant influence beyond enabling or deterring the potential artist. The arts are often a more vital part of existence in countries and classes with a low standard of living than with a high. Indeed a high standard too often involves, as Frank Lloyd Wright said, a transferring of slums from the body to the soul. Nor is this contradicted by the fact that sometimes in history both great art and prosperity have simultaneously resulted from the same collective outburst of energy.

Art is at the roots of life. It is no more a function of wealth and leisure than is procreation. Neither does responsiveness to it depend on higher learning, for it is not an esoteric embroidery on a canvas of correct data. The contrary notion is the obstacle that continually trips up people who try to understand it—a notion based on its decadence rather than on its origins, which the art of both children and primitives thoroughly explodes. And if these truths have become clouded in our time, it is because of a special way of life and a one-sided education that adapts us thereto. As Lismer writes in the preface to the catalogue of this exhibition, "Educational practice has over-emphasized the intellectual and documentary, or written, processes of learning, at the expense of the development of the eye and the hand as extensions of personality and as ways to a happier and enjoyable life." The whole task of enlightened art education centres round a need, not to inculcate what is at the roots of our being, but to prevent an artificially induced art-resistance, not to "teach" art to people who have lost the sense of it, but to check the sterilizing influences in the school and at home, to give the children some chance to resist the inhibitions that surround them, some chance to escape mutilation in one of the most useful parts of their humanity—useful not for book-keeping but for living. "How comes it," wrote Dumas fils, "that young children being so intelligent, the majority of adults are so dull? It must depend on education."

The argument people most commonly advance against the importance now given to child art is that the expressions of an undeveloped mind cannot possibly be valid art and to pretend they are significant is to throw confusion into all standards of professional work. These worried people put the shoe on the wrong foot. No intelligent advocate pretends the work of children is art in the complete sense, though it exceptionally is (just as exceptionally a child produces unmistakable poetry and music) and sometimes is very like it, often more like it than the work of many professionals. Training artists is not the aim. Yet children's work is valid and valuable in partaking of the innate and intuitive rudiments of art. They will have felt what art is. They will know, from having exercised their imagination, that it is not a sort of hand-made representation of things with a few technical arty trimmings but an impulse to embody the material of vivid experience in visual signs. They will, if not later shamed into apathy, help to make a coming generation with less impediments than the present one.

For this to become effective two things are needed that the new method should be generally adopted and that its influence should be preserved through adolescence. Later on there are facilities, though generally too pedantic, for studying art in history and esthetics, but in the interval youth is left at the mercy of the old one-sided education. There is still much work to be done.

THE ART GALLERY

Visitors to the Art Association will have noticed that the new addition to the building is well under way. When work is completed towards the end of the winter, there will be additional room for classes in the basement and three new galleries on each the ground and first floors providing abundant facilities for temporary exhibitions and much needed space for a logical presentation of the Museum's collections, which have been hitherto both cramped and dispersed. In the department of painting and sculpture it is to be hoped there will be a determined policy to match the accommodation with contents, for an art gallery is at least as much a collection of art as of buildings. Conceivably the pathetic spectacle of a gallery all dressed up and nowhere to go will move our philanthropists to action.

A museum of art is an educational institution or it is nothing. For the public the one important factor in the appreciation of painting is the painting. Without it lectures and lantern-slides are fertilizer on an unsown field. For art students it is even more essential. Every great painter assures us that the best part of his schooling came from the masters.

The lecture season opens with an address by Dr. Constable, director of the Boston Museum, late director of the Courtauld Institute. Dr. Julius Held will again be on the list at a later date.

In engaging E. R. Hunter for the newly created post of technical adviser, the Association has secured a valuable assistant. Lately assistant curator of the Toronto Art Gallery, Mr. Hunter pursued his studies at the Royal Ontario Museum, the Courtauld Institute and the National Gallery of Canada.

Stat HORATIO WALKER

GREAT Canadian artist has gone home.

A The death of Horatio Walker, at the ripe old age of eighty, brings to an end a career distinguished by noble achievement. For more than fifty years Mr. Walker, a native of Ontario, had been one of the most conspicuous and impressive interpreters of the French-Canadian scene, which he found intrigued him more than that of any other part of the Dominion, though he painted other landscapes besides those of his beloved Isle of Orleans. He was only a young man of twenty-five when he settled down at St. Petronille, where for the rest of his life, with a few intervals of travel, he was content to remain, studying the countryside and its people, seeking to win from Nature the secret of her incomparable Canadian autumn tints, and painting canvas after canvas that found their way far afield. When he left the island it was to tour through other parts of Quebec, and gradually he came to be recognized as an authority among that group of artists who devoted their time to the land of the Habitant.

Mr. Walker was fond of large canvases, though not so large as some of those utilised by the later groups of painters. He was a master of composition, and it was said of him that he could bring out more hidden beauties in the countryside than any one of his contemporaries. He saw a landscape as a whole, and he painted it as a vast panorama, in the main. At the same time there was no single phase of Habitant life that he did not portray, for he loved to mingle with the rural folk, and he came to know them well, and they learned to feel towards him a genuine affection.

The charge brought against him of late years, when the various cults and 'isms' and fetiches were having their full swing, was that he was conventional. To that he always replied that he preferred to paint Nature as he saw it and as it could be recognised by others, rather than as nobody could imagine it. He excelled in vast woodland autumnal scenes, and he had a superb technique in the handling of massed foliage and of wide sweeps of meadow, stream and forest. He invested the Quebec landscape with a calm beauty and a mellow tone that were greatly at variance with the starkness and glaring colours of the intransigents.

Some of his finest canvases were in low tones, but they held light and air and true colours that delighted the eye of the lover of Quebec. And his work received even wider recognition abroad than in his native land. He was the recipient of many honours from the United States, England and France, and he never had to worry about a market for his pictures. He lived a quiet, happy, uneventful life, rejoicing in his daily contact with Nature at the source, and giving increasing evidence as the years rolled by of his authority in and mastery of the art his genius adorned.

By JOHN LYMAN

THE INNOCENTS ABROAD

FOLLOWING the recent great burst of artistic ebullience, which Americans have hailed as a national Renaissance, there is presently from coast to coast of the Union a session of conscience-searching. "Have we a truly American art?" and "Do we accept it too indiscriminately?" are the questions being asked. It all began with the retrospective exhibitions of last summer, Three Centuries of American Art at the Jeu de Paume Museum in Paris and a smaller but representative show at the Wildenstein Gallery in London. It will be remembered that the English and French criticism was decidedly disappointing to our neighbours, both in its estimate of quality and in its recognition of a national quality. The first repercussion was a movement of indignation. The idea of those horrid Europeans looking down their nose at our poor darlings! Serves us right for sending them to that snooty party; we ought to have kept them at home where they belong, where no real American would question their accomplishments. But then Americans did begin to question, to exercise the faculty of self-criticism which they have developed in the last generation, and a more reflective attitude prevailed. Nothing more salutary could have happened.

Edward Alden Jewell of the New York Times led off with a series of weekly articles on the theme "Is There an American Art?", and was answered from all points south and west. In consensus the opinion was that there is an American art to the degree in which there is an American way of living and thinking, stemming from the European tradition, but inevitably modified by the artist who cleaves to his own soul. The important thing is that he, in the words of Walt Whitman, "sing what belongs to him or her and to no one else." The most derivative art in America, added Jewell, is the academic kind. "Yes, academism is a very versatile old dowager. Her wisecracks have all been uttered before, but she has the gift of speaking them in every language."

Then Howard Devree, over the air and in the Magazine of Art, attacked the prevalent indiscriminate acceptance of all sorts of theme exercises under the guise of art. "There are too many," said he, "who are blindly following some tradition or shibboleth or teacher or 'arrived' artist; too many who have partly absorbed outward things and superficialities and then spew it all back diluted in paint or clay . . . There is too much work that hides behind a formula: 'non-objective' or 'American scene' (what a band-wagon that has been!) or 'surrealism' or 'expressionism'." And Devree was supported by most of his brethren reviewers.

Curiously enough, immediately following the revolt of the critics, their determination to be less indulgent produced within the States a parallel to what had recently happened abroad. An exhibition at the Whitney Museum of Artists West of the Mississippi drew from the metropolitan reviewers the verdict that good art is pretty well confined east of the river and that, as Europe had said of American work as a whole, the regional character of the Westerners goes little beyond subject matter and their quality rarely beyond honest mediocrity. It was an application of Howard Devree's conclusion that "The time is past when the application of standards will disastrously dam the stream of art in America and the time has come for heart-searching."

That was the moral that came home from the proud parade abroad. Exhibitions have their uses, and none is more valuable than the disturbance of complacency. What moral will the exhibition of A Century of Canadian Art bring? Inevitably one is led to make a comparison with the American ventures which preceded it. In an earlier issue I ventured to predict that, imperial sentiment aiding, a more sympathetic welcome awaited us. There is a most-favoured-nation tariff for esthetics as well as for produce. The Americans got a cold douche, we, on the whole, a warm bath. It would be a mistake to let it put us to sleep.

Unfortunately very few Canadians know anything whatsoever about contemporary American art—and vice versa. Given our common interests and common destiny in the New World, this is indeed a curious situation, but as true as it is inexcusable. However, if you do happen to be one of the few, I ask you, is it possible to conclude that there is less quality in national expression to the south of the line than to the north, whether you consider that the national label belongs to the best artists (such as Marin, Sterne, Brook, Zorach) or to those who climb on the band-wagon of the "American scene" (such as Wood, Curry, Benton, Gropper)?

Perhaps an added reason for the discrepant verdicts is that in the American shows the English and French expected something as outlandish as a Hopi Indian blanket. But when it comes to a British colony or dominion, as Eric Newton said in the Times, "England tends to regard it with the condescending pride of a mother who discovers that her children—the pretty dears—have at last learned to read and write." And when she discovers that a child has a mind of its own, she marvels at its independence. "Canada," added Newton, "can stand on her own sturdy feet in the matter of painting." We hope so, and the U.S. too.

One of the most reasonable statements on the exhibition at the Tate is the foreword to the catalogue by the Hon. Sir Evan Charteris, of the board of trustees. He combines the urbanity incumbent on a host with terms that sensibly situate art in Canada to-day. Press dispatches were a travesty. Publicity has been enterprising and attendance excellent. Newspaper reviews were complimentary but not copious. The Telegraph allowed T. W. Earp less than half a column. "Canada's artistic life has been so active, uniformly attuned to wide but exacting cultural appreciation . . ." Glad to know it. "Beaucourt's 'Negro Slave,' dated 1786, is as serene and resourceful in fabric as a portrait by David." If that means anything at all, it doesn't give confidence in Mr. Earp's esthetic acumen. In the Sunday Times Eric Newton occupied a little more space—though considerably less than an article on "Bombers from Canada"—using that well-frayed convenience of letting the qualities of the subject matter stand for the subjective qualities of the artists. Newton reviewed the show similarly in the Manchester Guardian. If Jan Gordon wrote in the Observer, I failed to find it.

Of course, considering the conditions under which they write, newspaper reviewers cannot always be expected to be better than perfunctory. In the weeklies one expects something different. We got it, very, and we have to take the sulphur with the molasses. The anonymous critic of the New Statesman delivers himself thus: "A thinly populated country with a rigorous climate, Canada is unfortunately situated for the production of the visual arts. But the Tate exhibition of Canadian paintings makes us suspect the wisdom of its organizers. Possibly there may be less conventional painters in Canada who for some reason are not shown; quite certainly there are pictures here too worthless to represent a Dominion or to hang in a public gallery. A smaller exhibition must have made a less disappointing effect. Apart from a charming XVIIIth century portrait of a coloured girl, much of the best works are by a sensitive and accomplished artist called Morris (sic). Considerably depressed by this exhibition, we found some surprising consolations in . . ." Apparently the gentleman mistrusts official shows. Not long ago in this column I outlined their inherent disabilities that baffle even the best intentions, as in our own case, and produce exhibitions encumbered with the dead wood of convention to the exclusion of more interesting things. But apart from that, whether he be right or wrong, he has this much to his credit, that he alone marks appreciation of Morrice. Either way he is a wholesome corrective. After the warm bath a little douche will do no harm. It will annoy none but the complacent. It will put on his mettle any artist worth his salt.

NOTES

A new group of painters known as the Eastern Group will open its first exhibition in the gallery of W. Scott & Sons on November 26th. Those participating are: Jori Smith, Eric Goldberg, Jack Humphrey, A. Bercovitch, Goodridge Roberts and John Lyman.

The Redpath Library is featuring in its exhibition room until December 31st its collection of reproductions of and books on modern painting, drawing and sculpture. The reproductions represent a goodly share of the artists from Manet on. They range from excellent to libellous in the framed colour prints of the Impressionists. Some, of graphic work and water-colours, are good enough to be almost mistaken for originals. The special list of books issued for the occasion is a useful auxiliary to the catalogue, where search under the head of subject is not always easy.

Choice Collection Of Old Color Prints Gazette 10, 12, 38 Engravings After Morland, Reynolds, Lawrence and De Buecourt at Art Gallery

Holding the walls of the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal is a collection of old color prints. It is an interesting show, for the prints are fine examples by names that loomed large in that sphere of artistic activity in years gone by. There are an even dozen of prints after George Morland, his interpreters being J. R. Smith, E. Scott and F. D. Soiron. Of this number there are six depicting the false step and subsequent unhappiness of Letitia. In its day the whole distressing episode doubtless held some strong moral lesson, but the text would hardly impress the younger element of 1938. There is "The Elopement," where Letitia is seduced from her friends under a promise of marriage. Shame! Shown, too, is "The Tavern Door"—"Letitia deserted by her seducer is thrown on the town. Boo!! and so it goes—with 'Dressing for the Masquerade', 'Domestic Happiness', 'The Virtuous Parent', and 'The Fair Penitent.' Morland—a nice one to preach if all that is said of him is true—could with his brush certainly sound a plausible warning. Letitia, probably a "stunner" in her day, simply wouldn't do now, but the story served Morland well and Smith did wonders with his material.

Other works after Morland are valuable records of his time—types and dress and so on. "St. James's Park," engraved by Soiron, would mystify the Londoner of today, and "A Tea Garden," with its sense of domestic calm is to be preferred to the hustle, grab and choke of the modern hot dog stand. Scott engraved "Boys Robbing an Orchard" the youngsters making a quick getaway while a farmer, with a particularly mean-looking dog, glares across a fence. "Boys Skating," "Boys Bathing," and "The Angry Farmer." He is about to whip a boy, but a little girl appeals to the bully to desist. "The Sheltered Lamb," by R. Westall, engraved by T. Gauguin, is another subject that should prompt the silent tear. One so young showing consideration for a dumb animal is fearfully touching, but it may explain why some painters were finally driven to go modern.

"The Right Hon. Countess Spencer," and the Hon. Mrs. Bingham, by Reynolds, were engraved by Bartolozzi; Smith did "Chanters," after Rev. W. Peters; and S. E. Wilson engraved "The Red Boy," by Sir Thomas Lawrence. De Buecourt, good as a painter, was equally skilled as engraver and, moreover, knew what he wanted. This is evident in "La Promenade Publique," which presents a gallery of varied types: the rather pastoral "La Noce au Chateau," and the fine print called "Les Deux Baisers" which epitomises a circumstance that has proved an inspiration to makers of doll stores and writers of farces over many years—the old husband, the young spirited wife and, in this case, the artist merely kissing her hand as she stands behind her spouse who admires their portraits on an easel. This show, which it was anticipated would be held over this week-end, came down to make room for drawings by French sculptors.

NO NEW ASSOCIATES ELECTED BY R.C.A.

Excess of Candidates Over Vacancies Results in Spreading of Votes— 3.38
Gazette

4 NEW ACADEMICIANS

Alphonse Jongers, Frank Carmichael, Florence Wyle and W. L. Somerville Are Elected at Toronto Meeting

For the first time since its foundation 58 years ago, the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts at its annual meeting in Toronto on Saturday saw the election of no new Associates. The election is made on a two-thirds vote, and as there were more candidates than vacancies the votes were spread.

Two painters, a sculptor and an architect were elected full academicians, those honored being Alphonse Jongers, of Montreal; Frank Carmichael, of Toronto; Florence Wyle, of Toronto, and W. L. Somerville, of Toronto.

Sir Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., Toronto, was re-elected president; F. S. Haines, R.C.A., Toronto, vice-president; C. W. Simpson, R.C.A., Montreal, treasurer, and E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., Montreal, secretary.

The council was elected as follows: C. W. Simpson, R.C.A., P. E. Nobbs, R.C.A., W. S. Allward, R.C.A., E. H. Holgate, R.C.A., C. W. Jefferys, R.C.A., and H. S. Palmer, R.C.A.

FOUR NEW ACADEMICIANS.

Alphonse Jongers, R.C.A., portrait painter of Montreal, was born in Mezierres, France, November 17, 1872, and studied at l'Ecole des Beaux-Arts, Paris, under Delaunay and Gustave Moreau. He came to Canada in 1895, opening a studio and following his profession in Montreal until 1900, when he went to New York. He resided there until his return to Montreal in 1924. He was awarded a silver medal at the St. Louis Exhibition in 1904, and a silver medal by the Societe des Artistes Francaise in 1909. In 1910 he was made Chevalier de la Legion d'Honneur by the French Government, and in 1938 Italy showed him honor by making him Commendatore della Corona d'Italia. He was elected Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1937. His art is represented in the Metropolitan Museum, New York City, by two paintings, and at the National Gallery, Washington, D.C., by one.

Frank Carmichael, R.C.A., painter of Toronto, was born at Orillia, and studied at the Academie Royale des Beaux-Arts, Antwerp, and at the Ontario College of Art, Toronto. He was elected a member of the Ontario Society of Artists, in 1917, and an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1935. He was a member of the Group of Seven, 1919-1933—the body being now enlarged under the title of the Canadian Group of Painters. He is also a member of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Color. His art is represented at the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, and the National Gallery of South Africa, Cape Town.

Florence Wyle, R.C.A., sculptor of Toronto, was born at Trenton, Ill., November 27, 1881. She studied at the Chicago Art Institute, under C. J. Mulligan and John Vanderpoil. She came to Canada in 1911 and settled in Toronto. Elected an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1920, Miss Wyle in the same year was elected a member of the Ontario Society of Artists, from which body she resigned in 1933. She worked for the Canadian War Memorials, 1918-1919, and is a member of the Sculptors' Society of Canada. Twelve works represent her art in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, nine of this number being lent by the Canadian War Memorials Collection.

The election to full membership of Miss Wyle makes her the fourth woman so honored by the Canadian art body. Soon after the founding of the R.C.A. in 1880, Miss Charlotte Scriber was elected R.C.A., the others, after a long lapse of time, being Marion Long, R.C.A., painter, of Toronto; Lillas Torrance Newton, R.C.A., painter, of Montreal.

SIR WYLY GRIER, P.R.C.A., who on Saturday in Toronto was re-elected President of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts.

William Lyon Somerville, R.C.A., architect, of Toronto, was born in Hamilton, August 5, 1886. He studied at the Ecole des Beaux Arts of America and at the Atelier Provost, New York City. He was elected a member of the Ontario Association of Architects in 1919, being its president in 1926-1927; a member of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, 1919, and of the Royal Institute of British Architects in 1927. He was honorary treasurer of the R.A.I.C., 1926-1928. He is past president of the R.A.I.C.

In 1924 he won a competition held by the British Drama League for a design for a National Theatre in memory of Shakespeare. He was elected an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1928. Besides his commissions for public works, schools and university buildings, he is well known for his domestic work. He has contributed to magazines articles on phases of architecture, its history and application to modern conditions that have attracted wide attention by their authority and sound judgment.

Prints and Textiles By Polish Artists

Woodcuts, Engravings and Etchings From National Gallery
Shown at Art Association

Gazette — 26.11.38

Polish prints and textiles, shown here by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, hold the walls of the Learmont Gallery of the Art Association of Montreal. It is an interesting and distinctly instructive show which warrants leisurely and careful inspection. The catalogue has a comprehensive and informative introduction by Wiktoria J. Gorynska, vice-president of the Association of Polish Graphic Artists which is of distinct value as a record.

Of historical interest are the eleven old woodcuts, with religious subjects as their theme, which reveal bold, free treatment, and indicate how far the art has progressed since that day.

Many of the more modern prints show ingenuity and imagination and not a few flashes of fancy.

Skoczylas shows fine appreciation of character in his wood engraving called "Head of a Mountaineer," and firm treatment and good balance of masses in "Potato Digging, 1932," a woodcut. Bartolomejczyk in "To the Fields" shows a man leading oxen drawing a cart, as seen from above. Maria Dunin finds an interesting subject called "In the Circus Wings." Zofia Fijalkowska attains a wide variety of values in "Interior with a Cradle"; "Deer," in which the foliage and shade of the wood are convincingly realized; and "Concert."

Hulewicz is direct in "The Library," where a man is trying to interest himself by browsing in the book shelves, while a scantily dressed woman sits placidly in the foreground. Klopocka is broad in "Mountain Landscape," and Konarski shows a keen eye for pattern in a color wood engraving, called "Ski-Runners." Poltawski shows fine technical assurance in "Gate at Kierz," and Maria Ruzyska is engaging in her domestic scene called "In a Mountaineer's Cottage," and in "Ski-Runners' Spring," and "Rest," the latter also a skiing subject. Bold design and rhythm mark "Joah" by Sopocko, and there is simplicity and sincerity in Steller's "Mountain Shepherd" and "Bee-Keeper from Volhynia. Jan Walach shows his knowledge of textures in "Cherry Tree" and imagination and a strong decorative sense are evident in "Hunt" and "The Wolf of Gubbio," two etchings by Maria Wolska-Berezowska. Sznuik-Koskowska invests with spirit and pattern the etching "Ski-Jump," and Stankiewicz shows two etchings of rafts. The same medium is successfully employed by Pieniazek for the dignified "Church of Our Lady in Cracow," and by Mondral in "An Alley at Krzemieniec."

Florence Wyle, New R.C.A., Finds Abandoned Church Is Ideal Studio

Gazette

25th.11.38

Toronto, November 24.—(C)—A small abandoned church in Toronto's residential Rosedale district is the studio-home of Florence Wyle, latest of four women elected to the 58-year-old Royal Canadian Academy of Art, and "it's just the thing."

Like a landmark in a long line of modern homes on Glenrose avenue, the red building with its slanted, tar-papered roof and pointed windows shelters rows of bronze, stone and clay figures, the work of Miss Wyle and her partner, Frances Loring, president of the Women's Art Association of Canada.

They have lived and worked together there for 20 years, in the basement of the structure that once stood several blocks away on Yonge street. It was the First Church of Christ and was moved to make way for a bigger edifice.

Miss Wyle is working on a "record" figure of an eight-year-old Eskimo girl for the National Museum at Ottawa, and she paused yesterday to sit in a low rocking chair beside a big Quebec heater and discuss her life and her election to the R.C.A. at the annual meeting last week.

"I have been an associate member 20 years and you kind of look forward to becoming an academican," she smiled, rubbing clay from her hands on an apron.

Miss Wyle was born in 1881 at Trenton, Ill., and when she started out in her teens on a course in medicine she didn't know it would lead within a few years to a deep interest in art and a career as a sculptor.

She gave up her medical studies and, with little money, went to Chicago to study at the Art Institute. In her second year there she became assistant to Charles J. Mulligan, a famous teacher, and taught for "six or seven years; I never remember detail."

In 1910 Miss Wyle joined Miss Loring at New York and they came to Canada three years later, settling in Toronto, in the little unused church, because it was "just the thing and gave us what we wanted, good working room, head room and distance."

Miss Wyle has "about 12" works in the National Gallery at Ottawa, nine of them from the Canadian War Memorials collection. Most are bronze "record" figures of people who worked at home during the Great War, farm girls and workers in the munitions factories. She did the Edith Cavell monument in Toronto, "and fountains for people in town, a couple of bronze figures and general garden figures and portrait work."

"But I prefer figure work to portrait work because it is better sculpture as a rule. I do most of my own stone carving and a lot of wood carving, which is very interesting and more so than knitting."

Miss Wyle is the third woman elected to the Academy in three years. Marion Long, Toronto painter, was named three years ago and Lillas Torrance Newton, Montreal artist, was elected an R.C.A. last year. Charlotte Schreiber was the first woman academican, appointed soon after the R.C.A. was founded in 1880.

Fine Paintings of Many Schools On View in Johnson Galleries

Dutch and French Artists, Impressionists and School of Paris Represented—Examples by Van Gogh, Modigliani and Matisse on View

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

From Amsterdam come choice pictures which cover varying phases of art—French and Dutch paintings of the 19th and 20th centuries, examples by the Impressionists and work by men of the School of Paris Brought to Montreal by Peter Eilers, of E. J. van Wisselingh & Company. Amsterdam, the collection is on view at the Johnson Art Galleries, 1340 St. Catherine street west, and is due to remain here until December 10.

Of the Dutch School are many works that bring quiet contentment by the simplicity of their themes and the sincerity of their presentations—two typical interiors, the Bakenesser Church at Haarlem, in oils, and the St. Servaes Church at Maastricht, in watercolor, by Booboom; "River Scene," with mill and red-roofed houses, birds and a cloudy sky by Jacob Maris, an oil of solid qualities, like decision and directness being evident in the watercolor called "The Artist's Daughter"; a watercolor signed by Weissenbruch is "Enkhuizen"—a waterway, bridge and buildings with figures on the wharf, which is freely handled and very satisfying. By P. J. C. Gabriel, besides roses in a red vase, are two landscapes: "Farm on a Stream" with sunlit building amidst trees, and "Marshy Lands Near Kortenhof"—reeds, water and two sailing boats in a stiff breeze which stirs the water into little waves. The suggestion of wind is convincing.

By Dijsselhof is "Aquarium" with capillary painted lobster and fish. "Ballet Dancer" is a solidly painted watercolor by Breitner, and from the brush of Jongkind, who was linked with the French Impressionists, is "Effect de Lune en Hollande"—mills, waterside buildings, a boat under sail, and a man poling a boat near reeds in the moonlight. There is, too, a good group by Marius A. J. Bauer—"Arabian Cafe" with seated figures and a servant pouring coffee; "The Holy Ganges" with figures on the steps or in the water; a covered street with seated figure, a bit of Indo China; "Opium Smoker, Saigon," sketchily done but rather awful in its depravity, and "Walls of Jerusalem, Damascus Gate" with figures and camels at rest, the last four being watercolors. By Toon Kelder is a flower piece decoratively handled.

Of the French School, there are "La Vallee de la Loue" by Courbet—water falling in terraced cascades, pines, and a rocky cliff in the background, a fauvist scene in sunlight and shadow, by Jules Dupre; "Temps Orageux" by Daubigny, and four works by Fantin Latour—"La Source," a nude woman near a waterfall amidst trees; "La Nuit et les Songes," in which the figures have a light, airy quality; "Nature Morte," white chrysanthemums in a slender vase and green and dark grapes nearby; and a glass vase of mixed flowers, the bright color note being supplied by nasturtiums.

The Impressionists are worthily represented by two works by Claude Monet—"Verger en Fleurs," which is a convincing painting of an orchard in blossom, and "Falaises a Pourville," with green sea, beached boats and grass-topped cliffs in sunlight and shadow, a work in theme much like the picture in the Art Association collection. By Pissarro are a figure subject, "Pay-sanne au Bonnet Rouge," and "Matin d'Ete, Ferme a Eragny," a fine study of sun-lit trees, buildings and a woman in the garden. Sisley is represented by "Effet d'Automne," which is reproduced on this page.

A sliced apple and a cup are the subjects of a still life by Braque, while "La Plage de Varengeville," and "Paysage de Provence" represent Derain.

By Modigliani is a woman wearing a pendant, and "Odalisque a la Culotte Rouge" is from the brush of Matisse. By Van Gogh is "Le Bebe Roulin, much reproduced and described; a ballet dancer and attendant, with top-hatted figures in the background, is a pastel by Forain, and an interior, with the painter K. X. Roussel at work, is by Vuillard.

Spectators viewing players on a stage, framed by the floor of the balcony, is a small work by Daumier called "Le Drame."

Polish Art at the Star, 25.11.38 Art Association

The National Gallery of Canada has brought together, and is sending round the country for exhibition, a collection of Polish engravings, which is larger and still better than that which was seen here a few years ago. It covers almost every style and method of making prints, though, as in the former exhibition, the woodcuts and wood engravings are the most numerous and the most striking. Nearly fifty artists are represented and among them is Wladyslaw Skoczylas, whose cuts and engravings were among the best things in the first collection. The woodcuts, both in black and white and in color are quite remarkable and there are some exceptional wood engravings. Etchings are fewer but some of them are very interesting and there is some distinctly original and decorative work in lithography. The collection is full of things that are worth seeing.

In addition to the engravings the exhibition contains some examples of Polish textiles, in the forms of strips or rugs. These, in wool and flax, have simple but very ornamental patterns generally in dark or subdued colors which are very effective.

Watson Galleries To Hold Four Shows

Sherriff Scott, R. W. Pilot,
Henry Simpkins and Harold Beament Exhibiting in New Year

Gazette—26.11.38

Plans have been made for a number of exhibitions of paintings by Montreal artists, at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, after the approaching holidays.

Adam Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., is the first on the list, with a comprehensive show of his more recent work opening January 14 and closing at the end of that month.

The annual exhibition of work by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., is due to be held in February.

In March and April, respectively, there will be exhibitions of paintings by Henry Simpkins, and by Harold Beament, A.R.C.A.

Dr. Julius Held Speaks Today

"Proverbs in Painting" will be the subject of the lecture by Dr. Julius Held before the Art Association of Montreal this afternoon at 5 o'clock. The address, which is open to the public, will start promptly at that hour, and promises to be as interesting as this speaker's offering on Wednesday, when a large audience heard him talk on "Painters of the French Revolution."

Gazette 10.12.38

By ELIZABETH MONTIZAMBERT

Crossing from Dublin to Liverpool is like leaving fancy for fact, the past for the present. The very turf, that you mustn't call peat till you get to Scotland (in spite of the Oxford Dictionary), is an instance of the constant reminder of age-old things for ruins ("Ireland's characteristic architecture," as Mr. Stephen Gwynn says) and turf bogs are the two things most in evidence in Ireland. The red bog is the one that may move, as it did in Lord Dunsany's thrilling book, "The Curse of the Wise Woman"; the black bog is static, with its own peculiar beauty of magic pools and heather with the hills flaming with gorse in its season.

The owner of one of those gracious Georgian houses whose beauty of architecture and setting is reflected within, took us through a magnificent yew walk and up the softly rolling slopes of little hills to see the curious circular flint-built caves at the summit. Each one is supposed to be the temple of sun-worshipping people who built the narrow entrance so that the rising sun would strike on the stone altar. The age of these temples can be guessed at about two thousand years by the few inches change in the relative position of the earth and the sun in that time, but what amazed us most was the skill of the builders who constructed the curving roofs of flints that gradually took a vertical position and held it through 20 centuries without the aid of any mortar.

I turned away from this adorable country with deep regret. They have a Hate-Cult against England it is true, but it is fostered by the politicians chiefly to damp down the fires of internal quarrel, as Miss Cicely Hamilton points out in her admirable book, "Modern Ireland." In any case the visitors meet nothing but the greatest kindness and on my last day there I succeeded in getting one of those elusive opinions on the present regime that Lord Dunsany complained he chased in vain. After listening with sympathy to the tale of treatment by the Black and Tans in "The Trouble," I asked an Irish official if the people were any better off now than under the English Regime. He answered with a comprehending twinkle, "Divil a bit."

Coming back to London it seemed as if everyone I knew had written a book or a play. Robert Flaherty's clever book "The Captain's Chair" is having a good success, for everyone who was thrilled by his film "Nanook of the North" wants to read this vivid tale of Eskimo life. Jan Struther has just had published a collection of the witty essay and sketches that have appeared in many leading English magazines. It is called "Try Anything Twice" and I looked hastily to see if it held that incomparable sketch on "Week-end Visits" I once read in the Spectator and now find again to my delight.

The Canadian author whose pen-name is Caroline Seaford has written, "Dear Family" that will probably have as much success as its predecessors "Glory Jam" and "More than Kind." Another authoress with a Canadian connection and who spent last winter in Canada is Elizabeth Sprigge who has written a play based on the life of the Empress Elizabeth of Austria in collaboration with her sister-in-law Katrina Sprigge. It was produced at the Garrick Theatre with a new Austrian actress, Wanda Rotha, in the name part, Gyles Isham as the Emperor Franz Joseph and Richard Ainley as Ludwig of Bavaria Handicapped as it was by the inevitable necessity for telling the story of a long life in a series of short scenes, and by the gloom of the tragic events that made the stricken Emperor the saddest of European Monarchs, the young playwrights had done their difficult work so well, their dialogue was so crisp and their sense of the theatre so acute that one hopes the play will find its public quickly. Miss Wanda Rotha overcame the lack of the Empress's great beauty by her skilful personation. Richard Ainley gave the audience a shock by his extraordinary likeness to his brilliant father. In one short scene he gave an unforgettable picture of Ludwig's disordered mind filled with the beauty of its own imaginings.

One of the first Canadian places I went to on returning to London was the Tate Gallery where the Canadian pictures are hung in rooms on each side of the long sculpture gallery in which Rodin's magnificent gifts to the nation reign supreme. The London arts critics have united in welcoming this collection and giving it due praise; as Eric Newton said in the Sunday Times "It is big enough and bold enough to prove that Canada can stand on her own sturdy feet in the matter of painting." To an exiled Quebecer the pictures of Franklin Carmichael, Maurice Cullen, Clarence Gagnon, Kriehoff, H. Mabel May, James Morrice, K. M. Morris and A. H. Robinson brought a nostalgia evoked by their sensitive interpretation of the spirit of Canadian scenery, while one of the pictures that attracted me most was "The Little Bridge," painted by an old schoolfellow, Mary Wrinch.

The exhibition is so interesting that it seems churlish to ask for more but one cannot help regretting that, with the exception of two Chilkat robes, a few totem models and five specimens of old French-Canadian wood carving other forms of "Canadian Art" were not included. One would have liked to see some specimens of 18th century silversmiths, the work of such craftsmen as Levasseur, Ranvoys and Laurent Amyot, of Canadian pottery, miniatures and the finest Indian work.

The new director of the Tate Gallery has already done much to improve a place that before the opening of the new Sculpture wing used to be regarded as the Cinderella Art Gallery, only used for storing the "Picture of the Year." Mr. Rothenstein is a young man and has brought the energy of youth to bear on his new work. The present arrangement is an enchantment and walking through the room filled with stupendous Turners and, more quickly through the Sargent room, dominated by those numerous members of the Asher Wertheimer family, but redeemed by the Ribblesdale portrait there are countless treasures scattered about, portraits by the late Glyn Philpot, Whistler and Greaves and at one end James Ward's tremendous canvas of Goodale Scar, Yorkshire, and at another C. S. Jagger's poignant bronze relief of "No Man's Land."

The Eastern Group Exhibits at Scott's

Lyman, Roberts, Humphrey, Jori Smith, Goldberg and Bercovitch Show Individual Works

Under the title of The Eastern Group, Jori Smith, Jack Humphrey, Eric Goldberg, John Lyman, Goodridge Roberts and A. Bercovitch are holding an exhibition at W. Scott & Sons, 1316 Sherbrooke street west. The show closes December 10.

These painters, who have held individual exhibitions before, are represented by work that shows individuality.

John Lyman, besides a watercolor of horses being judged at Lachute Fair, and a landscape with a mountain, which is a vigorous oil, has a soundly painted work in "The Serial"—a woman reading a magazine to a boy. "The Procession," soldiers on the march as seen from a roof, is interesting in composition.

A. Bercovitch is successful with his autumn landscape, done in tempera. It is a boldly handled work that is marked by spontaneity. "Little Grandmother," a girl with white head-dress, is an oil of vigor.

Eric Goldberg has a competently painted portrait of Mrs. B. Robinson, and a watercolor of tulips on a window sill with glimpse of buildings beyond, and "By the Lake," bathers resting on a wharf, which has attractive values. He is also effective in his "Flowers in Basket."

Goodridge Roberts, besides two landscapes in watercolor, is individual and interesting in his stretch of landscape, glimpse of water and cloudy sky, called "Gatineau Country."

Jack Humphrey has a nice study of water-lilies, shows force in "Autumn Sketch," with its trees and houses backed by a hill, and calls his painting of young men, "Three Nondescripts."

Jori Smith is happiest in her studies of childhood, with "Fernand," a boy in a red sweater; "Gisele," a girl in a red dress and apron against a blue background, and "Boy With Blue Sweater."

History of Famous Vase Was Told in Lecture

This week's public lecture at the Art Association of Montreal, on Wednesday afternoon, was on "The Story of the Portland Vase" by Professor T. H. Clark of McGill University. Beginning with an account of ancient Egyptian and Roman glass, the lecturer explained the way of making the cameo glass, of which the Portland Vase is an example, and showed some other examples on the screen. The history of the famous Portland Vase was told to the time of its coming to the British Museum, how it was broken there by a man who was mad or drunk and repaired at the museum. Professor Clark ended with an account of the work of Josiah Wedgwood, of his numberless experiments in the making of porcelain and of his copies of the Portland Vase. Two of these copies were exhibited.

The public lecture next week at the Art Association will be given by Dr. Julius Held, on "Painters of the French Revolution."

Now on view in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal is a collection of drawings by contemporary French sculptors, which has come here by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa. The show, which will last two weeks, includes examples by Maillol, Despiau, Belmondo, Carton, Deluo, Kretz, Malfroy, Martinie, Parayre, Passon, Wierick and Yencesse.

The items number nearly one hundred. At Ottawa the exhibition excited interest, and it was favorably regarded when shown in London earlier this year.

JULIUS S. HELD, Ph.D.

Lectures Next Week
By Dr. Julius S. Held
Speaks Before Art Association on Wednesday and Saturday—Open to Public

Two events of interest to lovers of pictures are offered by the Art Association of Montreal next week in the lectures by Dr. Julius Held. On Wednesday, Dr. Held will speak on "Painters of the French Revolution," and on Saturday his subject will be "Proverbs in Painting."

These lectures which start punctually at 5 p.m., are open to the public.

Dr. Julius S. Held born at Mosbach, Baden, Germany, April 15, 1905, was educated at the Universities of Heidelberg, Berlin, Freiburg and Vienna. He was assistant to Dr. Friedlaender at the Kaiser-Friedrich Museum, 1931-33; and Research Fellow and Lecturer on Fine Arts, New York University, New York, 1935-36. In 1930 the University of Freiburg honored him with the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

Much appreciated as an authority, Dr. Held is no stranger here, for in November and December, 1936, through the courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, he gave four illustrated lectures on "Great Masters of The Netherlands and Germany—Van Eyck to Rubens."

Painters Plan Aid To Spanish Refugees

To Hold Exhibition and Sale to Benefit Children in Barcelona Home

Announcement is made that the Montreal Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy is planning an exhibition and sale of pictures about the middle of this month. Such a show was held last February, when a group of Montreal artists contributed works which were sold to aid Spanish refugee children being cared for in a home near Barcelona, established and maintained by the Canadian Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy. Only able at present to look after 300 children, the committee, in view of the increasingly serious food situation, is anxious to give aid to a greater number.

The committee sponsoring the exhibition is composed of Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., Goodridge Roberts, Anne Savage and Philip Surrey.

Dr. W. D. Lighthall is honorary chairman of the Montreal committee, and Hazen Sise and Henning Sorrensen are honorary vice-chairmen.

Dr. Julius Held is to address the Art Association of Montreal this afternoon on "Painters of the French Revolution." The lecture is open to the public and commences promptly at 5 o'clock. Members of the association are reminded that the reserved accommodation is limited.

Dr. Held at the same hour on Saturday lectures at another public meeting on "Proverbs in Painting."

Art of the French
Revolutions 8.12.

A long period of art history was covered by the public lecture which Dr. Julius Held gave at the Art Association of Montreal on Wednesday afternoon on "Painters of the French Revolution." To show the changes which the Revolution produced in French art, he began with the work of some of the painters of the eighteenth century, Boucher, Chardin, Fragonard and Grueze, in a period of grace and frivolity with pictures painted to give pleasure without moral purpose. The beginnings of a classical revival were shown in the work of Poussin, and the introduction of moral ideas into pictures, often in scenes of the deaths of ancient and modern heroes, up to West's "Death of General Wolfe." Louis David was the revolutionary painter to whom Dr. Held gave most attention, as an example of strong design of figure pictures and simplicity of their accessories. The lecture went on to describe and illustrate works by Gerard, Prudhon, Girodet and other painters, and to show the romantic trend of some of their pictures, and the coming of an "escapist" tendency to sweetness and prettiness.

Dr. Held will give another lecture, open to the public, on "Proverbs in Painting," on Saturday afternoon at 5 o'clock. The last public lecture before the end of the year will be given at 5 o'clock next Wednesday, on "English Delft Ware" by Professor T. H. Clark.

Attractive Pictures Shown at The Arts Club

Works of Moderate Size and Varied Subjects Form Annual Christmas Exhibition

There are attractive items among the thirty paintings that constitute the Christmas Exhibition of The Arts Club, 2027 Victoria street, the collection generally being of works of moderate size. Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., the club's president, besides "Landscape, Rosemere"—buildings set amidst elms on a spacious lawn, an oil typical in handling, shows some of the capital charcoal drawings for which he is well-known. The works in this medium include a landscape, reminiscent of his oil, and "Chateau de Ramezay," the historic building being seen from above with grain elevators in the background. R. W. Pilot, R.C.A., besides a small sketch of a timbered lake-edge, is represented by "La Galette, P.Q., Autumn," in which woods in fall finery stretch to a noble hill. Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., in a watercolor called "Study" shows a girl in restful pose. T. Topham, besides a broadly painted glimpse of waterfall and trees, called "North Land Symphony," makes the fly-fisher envious with the prospect of good water in "Scroggie's Pool at the Right Time"—two men at dusk in a canoe in water shadowed by spruces, with the fisherman playing something worth landing.

D. H. Macfarlane with "The Grey Sea" has a spirited watercolor charged with movement, and, in the same medium, C. Douglas is especially successful with "Autumn Hillside"—a wooded rise, with shack, a work that convincingly interprets the season. He also shows "Laurentian Autumn," with a house and hills. A. Cloutier shows a broadly handled winter scene entitled "In the Sugar Bush." "Silvery Day, Laurentians," a subject of the same season, and "Country Kitchen." T. R. Macdonald, besides a still life, is represented by "Nude"—a young woman with back partly turned to the spectator, which is a work of grace, nice tone and competent painting. Another figure painting with engaging qualities is "Daisy in the Garden"—a young woman in a gay patterned dress, by H. L. Smith, who shows sympathy for the watercolor medium. "Laurentian Road," with barn and hill, is also a watercolor from his brush.

R. Vincelette in "From the Mountain, November," has a silvery, misty oil, and something of the same indefiniteness marks his small watercolor called "North River." "Evening," a clump of trees in snow, is a rather sombre pastel. Paul Caron shows one watercolor of horse and sleigh, figures and houses, entitled "Greetings, a Laurentian Scene," and R. Sharps finds a good portrait study in "Habitant."

D. R. Morrice, besides "Flowers," has an effectively arranged subject in "Cactus." L. G. Morris shows a landscape; P. Andrew offers a still life, K. H. Holmden shows a decorative panel, entitled "Edward III and Philipp" and "Old Maple Tree" is the contribution of T. Garside.

YOUNG MONTREAL LEARNS ART

Seen here giving criticism to a student in the life class is Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., under whose direction the school of the Art Association of Montreal is going ahead as never before. In the past classes held in the Sherbrooke Street Art Gallery were the result of private enterprise but they have now been made a part of the new broader program of the Association. Mr. Holgate himself takes the classes in drawing and painting from life and associated with him are Lilius Torrance Newton, R.C.A. who teaches portrait and still-life, and William Ogilvie, who gives instruction in Commercial Design and Illustration.

Every Saturday morning 125 youngsters gather at the Art Gallery for the classes in painting and modelling conducted by Anne Savage and her assistants, Ethel Seath, Mrs. Maxwell, Miss Goodall, Miss Powell, Miss Jackson, Miss Lucas and Miss Liebeck. About a hundred in the classes come from the public schools, being recommended as specially interested and the remainder are children of members of the association. Above you see Miss Seath showing a young sculptor a few things. Below Miss Savage is surrounded by terrifying masks made for a Hallowe'en project, designs of the Pacific Coast Indians being the motif.

Fine Paintings From Amsterdam
Now at Art Association Here

By ROBERT AYRE

YOU'LL find something worth while in the exhibition of French and Dutch paintings of the 19th and 20th centuries brought to the Johnson Art Galleries by Mr. Eilers of Amsterdam, but you'll have to hurry, for there's only another week. And the day I went, I found holes in the catalogue. An Utrillo, a Pissarro and two Marie Laurencins had been sold, they told me. I had to go over to the Art Association to see the Matisse odalisque and the Derain paysage. They looked very comfortable there. I don't know whether the canny acquisition committee will agree with me and far be it from a modest reviewer to try to influence such an august body. It has had plenty of opportunities this winter. What a feather it would be in Montreal's cap if the Matisse and the Derain stayed here! and if we had kept the Modigliani "Bonne" from the exhibition at Scott's and one of the Renoirs or a Redon from M. Dubourg's show at Watson's! Montreal is always talking about tourist attraction. Why not make one of them a collection of important paintings?

The red-trousered odalisque lying diagonally across the canvas, against a background of three upright panels—one blue overspread with pink roses and gold emblems, one pale green and covered with red roses, and the other really a shallow recess—is typically Matisse, a pure work of art with a life of its own and no reference to anything else.

The Derain has a life of its own, too, but it pertains—as Marin would say—to the sunburnt earth of Provence. It attains a great stillness and stability and you can look at it for a long time.

Of the living Frenchmen Mr. Eilers also shows a Braque still life, pleasant in design and color, and an interior by Vuillard: "Le Peintre K. X. Roussel dessinant," which is subdued in color and of a ghostliness that gives you the psychological experience of catching a glimpse of the past.

Among the other works are a summer landscape by Pissarro bristling with brushstrokes and vivid; a Sisley autumn effect; several Monets, including a quiet orchard and a brilliant seashore with more body than some of Monet's impressions; a Daubigny, a Dupre, a Jacque, a Lebourg; a Forain ballerine; a Daumier—"Le Drame."

I liked the upper part of the Modigliani, "Femme Rousse au Pendentif"—the inclined head, the red hair, the pensive expression; below the shoulders it seemed to slump. Nor did I think Vincent van Gogh at his best in "Le Bebe Roulin," a monstrously fat infant sitting in the frame like an unintelligent potentate. Vigorously painted, of course.

Fantin Latour is seen in two styles: on the one hand, "La Source," a nude against a backdrop and "La Nuit et les Songes," misty floating figures; on the other, solidly painted fruits and flowers gleaming on black.

There is a Courbet mountain picture, "La Vallée de la Loue," with trees and rocks so massively realized that the painter seems to have started inside and worked out.

In contrast to this landscape, which amounts to arrested violence, are the placid Dutchmen, Jongkind, Jacob, Maris, Bosboom, Weissenbruch, with Gabriel a little more lively and Dijsselhof showing a fanciful imagination in an aquarium. Toon Kelder (born in 1894) is bright and chintzy. Breiter's ballet dancer is a departure, too, and there are four freely handled water colors of the Orient by Bauer.

Polish Prints

If you missed the show of Polish prints and textiles sent to the Art Association by the National Gallery, you have reason for disappointment. They have gone to make way for an exhibition of Holbein drawings opening today. These Poles are brilliant craftsmen, brimming with imagination and vitality.

Drawing by Aristide Maillol
An accession to the Art Gallery's collection.

Maillol

IN the last issue of The Montrealer I took as an occasion to talk about the particular charm of drawings for the art lover in general, and their special suitability for the young or modest amateur, the exhibition of Drawings by French Sculptors held at the Art Gallery in the latter part of December. It was therefore a pleasure to learn that the Association purchased from that exhibition two drawings by Aristide Maillol, which, with the Segonzac drawing recently acquired, can well form the nucleus of a nascent collection.

These sketches by the French sculptor throw a glimmer of light on an artist who is otherwise unknown to Montrealers except those who travel. He is an old man now of seventy-seven, a native of the Catalan region of France, the Roussillon. The story of his development is curious, having found himself only at the mature age of forty. Previously he had been a painter, whom Gauguin had put on the path of art, trying his hand at ceramics, tapestry and graphic art, which he has continued to pursue in several mediums for book illustration. No other sculptor of his age can seriously dispute his supremacy; all the others suffered limitations that withheld them from completeness: Bourdelle, with his eloquent but theatrical gestures and his archaic reminiscences; Despiau, principally a portraitist, whose figures betray an uneasy effort at unity; Joseph Bernard, whose subtle slender grace fringes on mannerism; Gimond, a disciple of Maillol; Dejean, Pompon, Hernandez, Poisson, Clouff and many another, who, nevertheless, throw into the background such local reputations as those of Gaudier, the virtuoso Epstein or Mestrovic.

The only people who might contest Maillol's rank are the supporters of abstract sculpture, such as that of Henri Laurens and Lipschitz. I confess this is a matter in which I can't risk even a guess, for I can't imagine any possible basis of comparative appraisal.

But, speaking of abstraction, Maillol is far more abstract than the casual observer might suppose, in the same way that Ingres also is quite abstract, though very few people suspect it, so thoroughly are they taken in by the suavity of his painting. Indeed one almost has to be an artist to recognize it. It is nevertheless evident enough if one compares his Andromeda or Thetis and Jupiter with accurate sketches or photographs of the human figure—as abstract as an Egyptian statue, which explains why the Cubists took Ingres for a precursor and Picasso went through a classical-Ingresque phase. And perhaps this is the only kind of abstraction which can have an appeal outside the ranks of the cognoscenti. At any rate it goes to show how fundamentally abstract the plastic language, like all language, is—originating not in nature but in the hieroglyph—and how, when it denotes the visible in nature, people are inclined to take the sign for the reality. Even the most objective art—that is really art—is a problem of matching a subjective experience with a created form which has a significance of its own independent of whatever in nature it may happen to portray, and not a problem of possessing "the sum of knowledge to date" for the purpose of accurate representation, as the latter-day academies would have us believe.

This fact is illuminated by Maillol's method of work. His intercourse with nature takes place in these little drawings, which are not illustrations and not an end in themselves. They are informative conversations which he holds with a model; and the following days, in solitude with his clay, he begins to fashion the idea which he had conceived. At that time the act of observation would come between his hand and his thought. "For him," wrote his biographer, Judith Cladel, "the action of creating must take outside immediate contact with nature. Nature would impede his rise from the particular to the general. It would draw him back to the individual to the detriment of the type."

Renoir, whose power of generalization was as great as Maillol's, and who undoubtedly influenced and was influenced by him, continued to use the model as an habitual condition of work, but in his later life she was there for purely consultative purposes.

Maillol's favourite type is the Catalan woman of his own province, the personification of the Mediterranean race—the firm, full-bodied, short-legged woman we see in these drawings. He is the only artist who has been able to confer nobility on such a type without arbitrary elongation and refinement.

L. L. Fitzgerald

The Print Room was occupied during the first half of this month by an exhibition of the drawings of Lionel Lemoine Fitzgerald, Director of the Winnipeg School of Art. His qualities are refinement and delicacy. He is sensitive to wraith-like contours and gentle gradations of tone in black and white, but colour, as used in his chalk drawings, is a thing he knows only vicariously as tints called rose, yellow or green. It is the work of a chaste and frigid virgin of art.

Urbanism

Town planning is very much to the fore to-day, so acute has become the need for it in metropolitan areas and so evident have become its advantages to even small growing communities. In many countries it has received attention from governments, municipalities and industries on a scale involving the collaboration of engineers, architects and artists. But it concerns not only the various constructive technicians. It is a vast problem of physical and spiritual well-being—a problem at once esthetic, ethnological, sociological and economic, no one of whose elements can be satisfied without regard for the others. Indeed it is the philosophy of the urban agglomeration, co-ordinating all social activities. It is beginning to receive a good deal of attention here, not only from specialists including many younger architects and some older ones who have devoted study to low-cost housing projects, but from all far-sighted citizens, and it cannot leave indifferent the man in the street who stands to benefit by it.

Wherefore the exhibition of photographs and drawings showing the development of metropolitan parks systems, parkways and arteries in European and American cities, which will be held in the Art Gallery by the Department of Planning and Research of the Metropolitan Commission, should attract a great deal of interest. Invitations have been issued for the opening on the evening of January 17th, which will include an address by Eugène Beaudoin, chief architect of French government buildings and town planning authority. The exhibition will remain open until the 21st inclusive.

A notable exhibit will be an aerial mosaic of the Island of Montreal, the first of its kind of any large Canadian city—a composite aerial photograph on which our organic pathology and its hygiene can be studied more effectively than on draughted maps. It is an inventory of land usage, on which can easily be distinguished, among many things, our natural resources for a green-park belt and the logical course for the Trans-Island Boulevard. The plans and aerial views of cities elsewhere illustrate the modern tendency towards the pattern of a parent city and satellite towns set in a matrix of parks, with the higher-cost residential districts coming back towards the centre.

Town planning is no new art: in the ancient world it was practiced from China to Rome. The cities of older countries have their problems, too, due to rapid changes in their functions, but whereas, until the industrial revolution at least, they grew with organic growth, cities like ours have grown as a cancer. They have proliferated with no more inner logic than the interests of land speculators and builders. They are bad pictures. When our citizens and their elected representatives realize the necessity of ordering a more harmonious development they will find the Metropolitan Commission in possession of the requisite surveys and data.

By R. H. HAVILAND

PERHAPS because landscape is the most significant and Canadian of our arts, successful and outstanding artists in portraiture are very few in number in this country. But in Ottawa, for many years, now, Ernest G. Fosbery, R.C.A., has occupied a niche all his own in this field.

During the past 30 years or more, he has painted the portraits of a great number of well-known figures in public life. His paintings are to be seen from one end of Canada to the other, and three of his canvases hang in the National Gallery of Canada at Ottawa.

Although best known as a portrait and figure painter, in his earlier years he devoted considerable time to landscape, and he has some fine work in this branch of art to his credit.

A sound, accomplished painter of the traditional school, his work is particularly distinguished by its fine delineation. He began exhibiting at the Royal Academy as early as 1892, and at the Art Association of Montreal in 1894.

Interested in Sports

HE is a native of Ottawa, where he was born in 1874, and has lived the greater part of his life in that city. He received his early education there, and as a youth was actively interested in sports, his favorite games being hockey and football. He played hockey as a forward on the second Ottawa team, and also played quarterback on an Ottawa football team.

Following his artistic bent, he studied at the Ottawa Art School under Franklin Brownell, R.C.A., and later crossed to the Continent, where he studied in Paris under Fernand Cormon.

Soon after completing his studies Mr. Fosbery opened a studio in Boston. He remained there from 1900 until 1907, when he was appointed headmaster of the Art Students' League in Buffalo, N.Y., where he gave instruction in drawing from life and in painting until 1910. He then became instructor of the Art Guild of Buffalo, 1910-11.

He rendered varied service in the C.E.F. during the Great War. In December 1914 he secured a commission in the Governor-General's Foot Guards, and was attached to the 38th Battalion for a short time before it left for Bermuda. When the 77th Battalion was authorized, he was appointed to a command with that unit. Later he was transferred to the 87th Battalion. Finally he was appointed to the staff of the Depot Battalion of Kingston, Ont.

Won Awards

HE has won numerous honors during his career, being awarded medals for drawing and painting by the Department of Education of Ontario; the Fellowship Prize, Buffalo, in 1909; and the Society of Artists' Prize, Buffalo, in 1910. The following year he was elected a member of the Union Internationale des Beaux Arts et des Lettres, Paris. Elected an associate of the Royal Canadian Academy in 1912, he was raised to full membership in 1929.

Among the many well known people in public life whose portraits Mr. Fosbery has painted are Sir James Aitken, Sir James Grant, Thomas C. Keefer, C.M.G.; T. P. Foran, Thomas Ahearn, Ven. James John Bogert, Archdeacon of Ottawa; Hon. Hewitt Bostock, Dr. A. H. MacDougall, Dr. P. D. Ross, and Admiral Sir Charles Kingsmill.

Earlier this year he painted the portrait of Dr. Walter C. Murray, who was president of the University of Saskatchewan from 1908 to 1927. This was presented to Dr. Murray by the graduates at a special dinner in his honor last June.

His work is represented in the National Gallery at Ottawa by three paintings: "Breakfast," "Affy, Daughter of the Artist," and a portrait of Sir James Aitken.

Display of Drawings By French Sculptors Gazette—17.12.38 Work by Maillol and Despiau Among Examples Shown At Art Gallery

Drawings by contemporary French sculptors, which come here by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, are on exhibition in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal. The scant fifty examples should prove of marked interest to those partial to feminine nudes. There is variety in treatment—from the crisp, sketchy impression which is rich in suggestion, to the carefully modelled studies in red chalk which occupy Charles Malfray. For force and directness the works by Aristide Maillol and Charles Despiau are outstanding. Lying nudes are the subjects of the latter's drawings, and among the generous groups by Maillol there is every evidence that he has not shirked difficult tasks—nudes seated, nude seen from the back, bending down, crouched, striding; a firmly drawn "Female Bust"; a gracefully arranged "Female Figure Seated," the model being Mme. Maillol; "Lying Nude," a lithograph, and "Group of Two Figures," an etching.

Berthe Martinie, besides nudes in various postures, has pen and wash drawings of bulls, horses and donkeys. Pierre Poisson has a spontaneous sketch in pen and ink called "Nude Seated, Seen from Back," and "Draped Figure Standing," in red chalk, by Robert Wlerick is effective in its simple treatment.

Other drawings shown are by Hubert Yencense, Henri Parayre, Leopold Kretz, Andre Deluol, Jean Carton and Paul Belmondo.

Fitzgerald Drawings Showing in Print Room

Work by Winnipeg Artist at Art Association of Montreal
Is Marked by Delicacy

Gazette—24.12.38

Drawings by Lionel Lemoine Fitzgerald, of Winnipeg, are being shown in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal. This artist, who was a member of the Group of Seven, 1932-1933 and is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by "Late Fall, Manitoba"; "Williamson's Garage"; and "Doc. Snider's House," very evidently enjoys working in pencil, charcoal and watercolor, which he uses with facility. Those who like a simple, clean expressive line will find much to admire in his studies of tree-trunks, leaves, bulbs in bowls, tulips and poppies. There are, too, some drawings which feature clouds in spacious skies above level lands; barns and fences in snowy landscapes; and a still life in water color with apples as the subject. In his water colors he favors delicate tones—in fact delicacy is the characteristic note in all the works on view.

Fitzgerald, who was born in Winnipeg studied there at the Kesteven School of Art, and at the Art Students' League, New York. He is Director of the Winnipeg School of Art.

In the Century of Canadian Art show being held in the Tate Gallery, London, he is represented by "Summer," lent by Hart House, University of Toronto; "Landscape," and "Farmyard," the last named being lent by the Hon. Vincent and Mrs. Massey.

The galleries of the Art Association of Montreal will be closed on Christmas Day and on Monday.

The last public lecture of this year at the Art Association was given Wednesday afternoon by Prof. T. H. Clark, of McGill, on the subject of "English Delft Ware." Beginning by relating some of his own experiences as a collector, the lecturer gave a short history of the tin-enamelled pottery which was called Majolica, Faience or Delft, from early Persian times through its manufacture in Spain, Italy and Holland and its production in England from the 16th to the 18th centuries. He went on to describe and illustrate the forms and designs of many specimens of this English Delft pottery. The lecture was illustrated with lantern slides, with examples from Professor Clark's collection and with pieces belonging to the Art Association. Star, 15.12.38

OUR NEGLECTED ARTISTS

Sir,—In the interest of all concerned, the letter appearing in your paper under the above heading, written by Mr. J. W. Rief, is to say the least quite misleading, hence with your kind permission, this letter in reply.

Firstly, I quote: "It is only too true that Montreal artists are not receiving even a little recognition they deserve," etc. Perfectly true, the dealers, many from an altruistic motive have done, and are doing their utmost to help the artist by buying some of his paintings, advancing him cash, lending frames, and giving exhibitions at little or no cost. The dealer generally can recognize talent in its early stages, and is therefore always proud to help and show the beautiful. The final crash often comes when the public turn it down. Why? Apparently the faults of human nature creep in, to wit; they follow the crowd. At an exhibition we are fired with questions. How old is the artist, who is he; how long has he been painting? Are others buying his pictures? etc. The client will often say I will wait another year and perhaps get a better picture, and so the waiting goes on. In the meantime the artist has a hard time of it, and in due course passes to dust. Then as a rule the scramble begins: "They follow the crowd." Now if we go to a doctor or a lawyer, we generally take their advice, and are charged for it; but the art dealer gives his opinions to artist and public in a thousand ways, and all for nothing. Many do not take the dealer's advice, much to their loss.

Second: "It is almost impossible to reach the public without the aid of the dealer." Well we have The Art Association of Montreal on Sherbrooke street west which have given very many fine exhibitions, and every spring, a "Spring Exhibition" for the past 55 years, and here our artist should exhibit his best, and the public are kindly invited to view them for nothing, and buy if they wish.

Third: "It is neither noble nor very discerning however, to stultify both artist and public by dealing in rarities and reputations." This is a serious remark and cannot be proven, when as a matter of fact to my knowledge of many years' experience dealers and artists are on the best of terms and are always willing to help in the cause of art education. At the present time there are more than 30,000 artists in France alone, so Art Galleries and dealers come between to help the public. In the course of a year the dealer puts on different schools of art, for the different public taste. What is honey for one man, is poison for the other, so the infinite debates goes on. A. B. WATSON.

Some Drawings by J. L. Fitzgerald

In the print room of the Art Association of Montreal there is now a small exhibition of drawings by J. Lemoine Fitzgerald, the director of the Winnipeg School of Art. Most of these are pencil drawings, with a few in colour crayons. In most of the pencil drawings there is a use of very light and delicate line, which makes them much like old-fashioned silver point drawings. Mr. Fitzgerald uses this line very economically in drawings of flowers and leaves and in some simple suggestions of forms of trees. He has also some drawings of skies in which the same kind of line is combined with very soft and smooth shading of clouds. With these are a few landscapes in which there is a much bolder treatment with strong lines and shadows. In the colour drawings the colour is used tenderly and with much reserve, but often with very good effect.

OUR NEGLECTED ARTISTS

Sir,—It was pleasing to me to read Mr. A. J. Livinson's sympathetic letter in the columns of your paper, and I should consider it a fine courtesy if I were permitted to add my voice to his.

It is only too true that Montreal artists are not receiving even a little of the recognition they deserve. It is of course right that there should be more than one opinion as to the underlying reason—it is healthful to have opinions of any sort today—but I think it is a quite obvious fact that the standard of local work is not at fault. To say that rational standards must change with each individualized school, as the years remove it a little from some previously popular method of painting, is to forget that only synthetic environment is subject to change: Nature is always like herself. At least some part of Nature, or a natural thing, enters into the composition of every honest canvas, as a bit of reflection will surely prove. It is maddening to see tripe sold as art while genuinely talented and ambitious painters are ignored. I have always been sufficiently realistic to feel that, since human vision is fairly uniform the world over, any attempt to reproduce the objective form of a thing should be governed by a desire to make it universally recognizable for what it is. In other words, it seems logical to assume that the merit of an artist lies in his ability faithfully to copy the form and colour of his subject. A tree should look like a tree, not like a lame sparrow.

However, this attitude is not popular with the buying public. Montreal, like all other great cities, is infected with the vanity of acquisition. If some great painter, stumbling, had left the imprint of his frock on a fresh canvas, and had dedicated it singly to posterity, someone would pay a handsome price for it. Dalí's hysterical "Soft Construction with Boiled Beans" or Picasso's vomituous "Screaming Woman" would command a tidy sum in any local gallery. Nine times out of ten a buyer will consult a dealer's taste rather than his own, and will pay gladly for a mediocre work simply because his neighbor Jones possesses a contemporary work or is not fortunate enough to possess anything. But the native product is beneath notice. It is almost impossible to reach the public without the aid of the dealer, and the dealer, seldom to the enrichment of his faculties, educates the buyer. It is a circle as inescapable as the Wheel of Life.

The dealers, however, are not entirely to be blamed. Having educated their clientele to the appreciation of necessarily expensive things, which they themselves consciously believe to be the best, they cannot very well change that attitude which has so often proved effective in determining the buyer's desire and the consequent sale of material investments. That is good business merely. It is neither noble nor very discerning, however, to stultify both artist and public by dealing in rarities and reputations. Montreal is, as Bertie Wooster would put it, "simply reeking with talent." It is hard to understand why the buyers refuse to make contacts themselves there is nothing to lose everything to gain!

Addition To Art Gallery Nearing Completion

14,445 Square Feet Of Needed Space To Be Provided

Star — 7.1.39
THE new extension to the Art Gallery of the Art Association of Montreal, Sherbrooke street west, to provide a total of 14,445 square feet in the basement and two upper floors, will be completed at the end of this month, it was announced this morning by Dr. C. F. Martin, President of the Association.

Dr. C. F. Martin

The increased space will greatly facilitate the arrangements for non-permanent exhibitions, while an artistic wide stairway, provided with landings at intervals, will aid the communication system of the Gallery and lend it self admirably for the display of tapestries and presentation of artistic creations on the walls.

In the basement, which contains 4,746 square feet, a students' room will be provided, Dr. Martin said, as well as a workshop and auxiliary room for the library. The first or ground floor will be used as an extension of the museum with a long room for exhibitions of a temporary character. On the second floor provision will be made for the exhibition of paintings, water colors, etc. These will consist of "lone" exhibitions for the most part in order that the permanent gallery may be left undisturbed. In addition spacious hallways will provide added wall space for exhibits. The construction job was carried out by Anglin-Norcross Quebec Limited, under a general contract for approximately $100,000. Plans for the work were prepared by Fetherstonhaugh and Durnford, architects. The extension conforms to the traditional architecture of the main building, with provision in the plans for future expansion as conditions warrant.

Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., Showing Watercolors

Impressions Noted During Italian Travel and Laurentians Scenes Subjects at Art Association

Gazette — 14.1.39

An exhibition of watercolors by Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., F.R.I.B.A., opens this week-end in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal and will remain on view until the 30th. Mr. Jones, whose skill in this medium has long been recognized, has over a period of years held many shows of more than ordinary interest in that his pictures, done during travel at home and abroad, are rich in variety of subject. The present exhibition deals with scenes done during travel in Italy, as well as subjects done in the Laurentians.

Old English and Irish Glass

An outline of the history of glass making, particularly in England and Ireland, was given in a lecture to the members of the Art Association on Monday afternoon by F. St. G. Spendlove, of the Royal Ontario Museum. Beginning with Egypt and China, which Mr. Spendlove believed to be the only countries in which glass-making was indigenous, he traced the introduction of glass first to Venice and from there to England and other countries. Among the many very good illustrations shown on the screen were examples of early English glass, made in the Venetian manner, followed by examples of the work of Ravenscroft, the first great English glass maker, and of the lead glass, which was England's chief contribution to glass-making. Fine specimens of later English glass and of glass from Waterford and other Irish factories were illustrated, and some early nineteenth century cut glass, much of which, of very inferior design, was made for export to Persia, where some of the Shahs collected glass of a showy kind.

A lecture, open to the public, will be given at the Art Association on Wednesday afternoon, at 5 o'clock, by Professor J. W. Bridges, on "Mexican Art." Next Monday Professor P. F. McCullagh will give a lecture, open to the public, on "Spain, Gothic, Moorish, Roman."

CLARENCE GAGNON TO RECEIVE HONOR

Gazette — 2.1.39
Montreal Artist's Work Will Hang in Queen's Room at Ottawa

WANTS A MUSEUM HERE

Would Reconstruct Old Ville Marie as Part of 1942 Tercentenary Celebration

By KENNETH G. WRIGHT.

The originals of the famous illustrations in the Mornay edition of Louis Hemon's French-Canadian classic "Maria Chapdelaine" will hang in the sitting room of Rideau Hall, Ottawa, to be used by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth when the Royal couple visit Canada next summer, it was learned here last night. His Excellency the Governor-General has asked Clarence A. Gagnon, R.C.A., Montreal artist who painted the 54 original pictures used in the book, that a series hang in the viceregal residence during the Royal visit. Mr. Gagnon will go to Ottawa shortly to inspect the room in which the paintings are to be hung to see which ones would be the most suitable in the setting.

But you will have a hard time to get Mr. Gagnon, one of Canada's outstanding artists who is also widely known in Europe, to talk about this. To him a much more interesting topic is his proposal for an open-air museum of French-Canadian handicraft, folklore and antiques, preferably on the Island of Orleans. So far he has been unable to interest those he thinks should be interested in such a scheme—every resident of the province of Quebec—but the proposal may be taken up in another manner. It has been suggested to Mr. Gagnon that something of the sort be built in connection with Montreal's Tercentenary in 1942. The proposal is that in connection with the celebration there should be a reconstruction of Ville Marie, predecessor-village of Montreal. This would likely be on Mount Royal, and could easily be the basis for a permanent open-air museum, the artist believes.

Mr. Gagnon has long taken an intense interest in French Canada and its people. Albert H. Robson in a sketch of him (published by Ryerson, Toronto) points out that: "Back in 1643 three Gagnon brothers left Normandy to seek their fortunes in the New World. . . . Today their descendants are a numerous and important family scattered throughout the Province of Quebec." Clarence Gagnon was born in Montreal, son of a French-Canadian father and English mother. He studied first in Montreal, and then in Europe. He has visited every country in Europe but Russia, and, after Quebec, loves the Scandinavian countries better than any others. For more than 20 years his favorite sketching ground has been the Baie St. Paul district, but he has worked in nearly every part of the province.

WORK IS WIDELY KNOWN.

Considered among the three best living etchers, in latter years, Mr. Gagnon's talents have been turned to painting because he prefers using colors. His etchings hang in public collections in Paris, London, Dresden, Florence, Venice, Mulhausen, The Hague and Liverpool as well as in Ottawa and other Canadian cities. The National Gallery at Ottawa has eight of his paintings, and others are distributed throughout the country in public and private collections. He is a member of the Royal Canadian Academy, and last May the University of Montreal gave him an honorary LL.D. He has won a large number of prizes in competitions, and many special mentions for his work.

One of his proudest achievements are the Maria Chapdelaine illustrations, which took him five years to complete. Col. Wilfrid Bovey has called them "a document of Canadian life. . . . beyond price to him who knows Quebec."

Mr. Gagnon first got his enthusiasm for an open-air museum from his visits to Stockholm and the neighboring country. "There nearly every town has its museum. In Stockholm the site covers about 75 acres. The old houses, barns, stables and other buildings are scattered about in their natural settings—one would never know they hadn't been in the same spot for generations. The houses are furnished in keeping with the times they represent, with priceless relics of the old Scandinavia. Each district keeps its own type of architecture and culture down through the years."

"The perfect place for such a natural museum in Quebec would be on the Island of Orleans. It is now unspoiled, but even recently a small tourist settlement has been established. However, there are five original churches on the island alone, as well as all the old houses, much ancient furniture, most of which will be gone in a few more years."

MONTREAL ARTIST HONORED

CLARENCE A. GAGNON, R.C.A., originals of whose illustrations for "Maria Chapdelaine" will be hung in Queen Elizabeth's sitting room at Rideau Hall during the Royal visit next summer.

OLD THRESHER ABANDONED.

"In the Baie St. Paul district I found recently an old threshing machine. The largest section was a big wooden wheel, around which oxen tramped. It was beautifully primitive—all made of wood and bound together with leather. Probably constructed entirely with an axe, there wasn't a piece of metal in the whole thing. But it was in the barn of an abandoned farm, and the roof was falling in. Anyone could have saved it for French Canada who had the money to take it away and a place to keep it, and you probably couldn't find another one in the Province in working order. Yet by next summer it will likely have been destroyed by the elements and the falling barn."

"Why couldn't this be moved to Orleans or to some other spot where we had established a museum? Such a museum wouldn't take very much money, and probably even would pay for itself in a short time as a tourist attraction. All that is needed is for a group of men interested enough in such a proposal to provide the funds and name a committee of artists, sculptors, architects and others to carry it through. Think of the wonderful old handicrafts of Quebec which could be saved. Then there are old houses, windmills and other structures fast falling to pieces in all parts of the Province. These could be torn down carefully (they have an elaborate system of numbering and photographing the pieces in Sweden and Norway) and put up again on the site of the museum."

"Mount Royal would be a fine place for such an institution. People might say it would spoil the mountain, but it wouldn't, it would make it more beautiful. Could it possibly spoil any place to reconstruct there a village of Quebec of two or three hundred years ago? St. Helen's Island? No, that is spoiled now—commercialized. Mount Royal would be the place. And there could be festivals, featuring folk dancing and other similar arts each year—these would draw many thousands to any place they were held," said Mr. Gagnon.

Mr. Gagnon has talked to Leon Trepanier, head of the Tercentenary Commission, about his scheme, and is hopeful that something will be done, even before 1942 rolls around.

Lectures At The Art Association

Star 10.1.39

Lectures at the Art Association of Montreal began again on Monday afternoon, when Professor P. F. McCullagh, of McGill, spoke on "Artists and Architects of the Nile Valley." Professor McCullagh had many excellent lantern slides, chiefly of temples at Dendera, Luxor and Karnak and of the Pyramids, and he made references to some of these in the course of his lecture. Many of them were of unusual views of buildings, of which many views are known, and at the end of the series he showed photographs of ancient paintings and of modern Egyptians doing the same things in the same ways as their ancestors. In his lecture Professor McCullagh spoke generally of ancient Egyptian architecture and other arts, with many quotations, ranging from ancient texts and Herodotus to modern writers.

The first public lecture of the year at the Art Association will be given tomorrow, Wednesday, afternoon at 5 o'clock, when Professor J. W. Bridges will speak on "Mayan Art."

A. Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., Shows Work At Watson Art Galleries

Gazette 21.1.39
Local Painter Displays Versatility and Competence in Marines in Maine, Landscapes in Quebec and Effective Portraits

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

It is very clear that Adam Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., who is holding his third annual show at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, holds firmly to the view that paintings, being as it were members of a household, should soothe and not irritate. There is, of course, quite a mass of opinion against this view among those who believe that pictures should churn you up and make you think. Every-day life does more than a bit that way, and Sherriff Scott's art brings the required solace.

An artist who has not concerned himself with isms and movements, Sherriff Scott has industriously gone ahead, painting what is about him. He is no one-subject man—landscapes, marines and portraits alike interest him, and the present show is an indication of his open mind. His is an honest art, and he is not ashamed to make a tree look like a tree. This does not mean lack of imagination, but merely that his sincere approach to nature has convinced him Nature is good as it is.

It is a refreshing show and one that can be enjoyed, if your view of the world is truly normal. There is no guessing at what anything means—what he sees he sets down, engagingly and with confidence.

From Ogonquit come many scenes of rocks and seas—"Summer Heat," with its blue water and rocks in sunlight and shadow, a work that suggests the glitter and shimmer of a torrid day; "Off-Shore Wind," a spirited rendering of incoming waves and the spray whipped off by the breeze; "Rock Strata," with gulls wheeling in a cloudy sky; "Crow Rocks, Perkins Cove"; "The Gully"; "Noonday Light," a calm blue sea and the rocks illumined by the overhead sun; "Serried Rocks"; "After Showers," with moving grey clouds and a distant sail, and "The Nubble Light, Maine," to mention a few, not omitting the vigorously brushed in "Artist Sketching, Ogonquit," a woman in blue among the rocks working at her easel. In all these the rock forms are true and their bulk and solidity convincingly suggested.

Among the landscapes, "Covered Bridge, Fitch Bay," with its wooded hill of rich green and a boy with jar and fishing pole walking on the sunny road, has all the glare and heat of midsummer. Sunlight floods the field leading to the lake in "The Pasture, Georgeville," while at the same place was painted "Heath's Wharf," with nearby birches, glittering water and distant blue hills. "Barns Near North Hatley" suggests the waning year in the turning maple. "The Birches, Lake Memphremagog," is a boldly brushed in work, and of this area is "Owl's Head, Lake Memphremagog." This locality has been fruitful of many effective works. Fitch Bay and its covered bridge has intrigued the painter, who has also seen it on a day of blistering heat and set it down in vibrating colors. There is also the small sketch for this version.

Among scenes of winter are "Silver Lake, Laurel," a pastel of house, trees, lake, hills and billowy clouds in a blue sky; an Indian woman near a tepee on a wooded shore dipping water from a fast-moving stream; and "Sunny Winter Day, Laurel," reproduced on this page. It is a fine atmospheric rendering of "snappy" weather in the Laurentians, near Huberdeau. The group of buildings, trees and horse and sleigh, as seen from a rise, and the road that winds over the hill all make an effective composition, and Sherriff Scott has painted it with all the snap and sparkle that mark such a day in high country.

Among the portraits is a sympathetically painted one of his wife, graceful in arrangement and sound in tone; "Meditation," the head of a dark-haired girl in black with a crimson nower on her breast; a sketch of Mrs. R. R. Thompson in blue, with dark amber beads about her neck; and a portrait of Mrs. R. W. Steele in dark red, seated on a sofa, while nearby is a green vase and a spray of yellow and deep red chrysanthemums. It is very effective in arrangement and is a thorough and competent painting.

The exhibition, which has been well attended, indicates that Sherriff Scott is going ahead and by the sincerity of his work is winning a larger following.

Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., Shows Watercolors

Gazette 21.1.39
Records of Italian Travel and Laurentian Scenes at Art Association

Watercolors by Hugh G. Jones, R.C.A., F.R.I.B.A., have interested art-lovers before, and the collection on view in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal is proving as strong a magnet to the discerning as any of his shows in the past. Vivid jottings done during Italian travel and Laurentian scenes are the subjects of this collection, which is one of evenly high standard and rich in interest.

An architect, Hugh Jones by the very nature of his training can tackle buildings from any angle and do with refreshing abandon subjects that would present a mass of problems to many painters. So thoroughly is watercolor his medium that he gives the impression of having enjoyed every moment in the creation of these colorful records of days spent abroad. The drawing is there, but subtly indicated, and there is happily none of the tight precision that his profession exacts.

These notes of travel are of compact size. Just as Morrice found the thumb-box sketch the ideal size for the swift recording of tonal impressions, so Hugh Jones has been able to wash in, with spontaneity and transparency a multitude of "bits" that have seized his fancy and very definitely give enjoyment to those who view these. Not that their scale has cramped him. There are Italian vistas that carry the eye for miles across plain and hill, and the illusion of distance is convincingly conveyed.

In this group there is so much that is beautiful—in the selection of viewpoint, in the direct, free manner of treatment and in the harmonies of tones, that the selection of favorites presents a problem. Much better browse over them and enjoy them all, for the offering is a generous one.

From the porthole of his steamer he saw the majestic mass of Gibraltar with the crest of the Rock smothered in a dark cloud. Lisbon was not unfruitful, and when he reaches Rome subjects abound on every side—"Forum at Evening," "Caracalla Baths," buildings historic or picturesque and many fountains. Venice with its building-edges canals, gondolas, ships with rich-hued sails, bargemen, the vegetable men poling their laden craft, the Salute, San Giorgio, in evening light, "Lido, Color Study, Evening," streets with figures, shops—a rich array of impressions keenly observed and confidently set down.

Florence reveals its beauties, as do Assisi, Sienna and Perugia, and with what enthusiasm have their characteristic charms been captured. When travel can garner pictorial memories of this kind it means something.

Shown, too, are larger watercolor paintings done at and about Lake MacDonald, which show equal facility in straight landscape—birches and a glimpse of lake; a moored boat reflected in the water, with a capitol handled foreground; a beach, stranded tree trunk, and fast-moving blue water; a man standing in a boat with a wooded shore lit by wan sunlight, to mention a few.

This exhibition remains on view until January 30.

Spring Exhibition March 9 to April 2

Wide Representation of Various Tendencies in Art Aimed At—Sending-in Day Feb. 28

Entry forms are out for the 56th Annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, to be held from March 9 until April 2. Final sending-in day for forms and works to the galleries, 1379 Sherbrooke street west, is February 28. It is stipulated that works submitted shall have not already been publicly exhibited in Montreal.

In common with most general exhibitions, those under the auspices of the Art Association of Montreal have, down the years, not escaped criticism. An artist whose work has been rejected is prone to scent favoritism. Of course, there could be no other grounds for rejection! This spring, according to the pronouncement on the entry form, "the exhibition will be so arranged as to give a wide representation of various tendencies in art. In so doing the Art Association hopes to give the public as complete and orderly a presentation of contemporary modern art as is possible—while itself taking a purely non-partisan attitude."

The jury consists of the following artists: Andre Bleier, F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., Alphonse Jongers, R.C.A., William Ogilvie, Stanley Royle, R.C.A., Miss Anne Savage, Henri Hebert, R.C.A. (Sculpture) and P. R. Wilson, A.R.C.A. (Architectural Designs).

VILLAGE, WEST INDIES, by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A., is a good example of this Montreal painter's last manner, when emphasis on bold pattern was more marked than in the French and Venetian subjects of an earlier phase. This canvas, which approximates 31 by 25 inches, has been presented to the Art Association of Montreal by A. Sidney Dawes and is a valued acquisition to the Association's collection of works by Morrice. It is shown in the exhibition being held in the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, 1316 Sherbrooke street west.

Painting by J. W. Morrice Given To Art Association of Montreal

Gazette 4.2.39
"Village, West Indies," Gift of A. Sidney Dawes, Added to Permanent Collection—Two Oils, One Watercolor and a Drawing Purchased

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

During the present week the permanent collection of the Art Association of Montreal has grown slightly by gift and purchase—three oils, one watercolor and a drawing. Modest, perhaps, but promising at a time when money for buying works of art is not plentiful. The encouraging note is that, except for the gift from A. Sidney Dawes of "Village, West Indies," by the late J. W. Morrice, R.C.A.—which is reproduced on this page—the other works are by living Canadian painters.

Viewing paintings in a dealer's gallery recently, the inevitable remark was made—"the Art Gallery should have that." Then ways and means and vain hopes turned the talk to painters, and the name of Cezanne came up. What important gallery does not yearn for a worthwhile example? But a typical work of fine quality would make a big hole in a budget and constitute a major expenditure that would go a long way if applied to the purchase of paintings by Canadians not now in the local collection. The Montreal representation reveals gaps, and there might be no painters in Ontario judging by the showing. Even the old Group of Seven—the members of which came in for much critical mauling when first they showed here, but, despite that, have influenced the work of many local painters—does not show the Montrealer or the visitor what they stood for in painting, or hint at what all that old-time noise was about. Works both moderate and, judged by their time, extreme, are available now. What will be the opportunity and the cost a quarter of a century hence? All this presumes that a function of an art gallery as an educational institution is to show, if not stress, the work of native painters, granted, of course, that it possesses merit.

The generous gift of the Morrice, a work of his last manner, is a valuable addition to the representation of this Montreal painter which is important in its compass. All phases of his art are here, and, undoubtedly, in years to come will draw from afar the critic and the connoisseur who would study the work of this painter.

Added to the collection by purchase is "Market Scene, Place Jacques Cartier," by Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, who has found many good subjects about the older sections of the city. The scene is viewed from Notre Dame street, near the Chateau de Ramezay, and shows farmers' wagons and figures and, beyond, the irregular buildings on the west side of the square, harbor structures and the funnels of a docked liner.

Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., was born in Paris, France, a son of the late Philippe Hebert, C.M.G., R.C.A., the eminent Canadian sculptor, and studied art in Montreal under William Brymner, C.M.G., R.C.A., and at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Paris. Abroad, his art is represented in the galleries of Nimes and Le Havre.

"Posa del Mare," a Spanish scene, with trees, figure and buildings, is the work by Eric Goldberg, and is painted in rather misty tones.

Eric Goldberg was born in Berlin, and at the age of sixteen went to Paris, where he studied at the Ecole des Beaux Arts and at the Academie Julian. He held a "one-man" show at the Art Association of Montreal in 1928 and is again settled in Montreal. He is represented in the Art Museum of Cincinnati. Goldberg married Regina Seiden, who studied painting under William Brymner, R.C.A., and Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., and is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by three works.

"Old Tree," a vigorously handled watercolor, is the work by Louis Muhlstok, of Montreal, added to the collection. Muhlstok, who strongly favors work in charcoal, is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by a drawing of a gro's head done in t

An outstanding example of his work in oils was the portrait of Isaac Levine, shown at the Royal Canadian Academy exhibition here in 1937.

Louis Muhlstok was born in Nanajow, Poland, in 1904, coming to Montreal in 1911. He studied art at the Monument National, in the classes of the Art Association of Montreal under William Brymner, R.C.A., and also under E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., G. Horne Russell, R.C.A., Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., Maurice Cullen, R.C.A., and Albert H. Robinson, R.C.A. He has exhibited at the R.C.A., and Art Association Spring shows since 1925.

"Prairie Drawing" is the work by Lionel LeMoine FitzGerald, whose work is marked by extreme delicacy. Pencil, crayon, charcoal and watercolor—the last-named applied in pale washes—are his favored media. Three examples of his work found place in the Century of Canadian Art, held at the Tate Gallery, London, and "Late Fall, Manitoba," "Williamson's Garage," and "Doc Snider's House" represent his art in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

FitzGerald was born in Winnipeg in 1890, and studied at the Keszthelyi School of Art in that city; at the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, and in New York at the Art Students' League. A member of the former Group of Seven during its last year, 1932-33, he has been principal of the Winnipeg School of Art since 1929.

Modern Landscapes Subject of Lecture

Star 21.2.39
At the Art Association on Monday afternoon the first of two lectures on "Nineteenth Century Landscape Painters" was given by W. G. Constable, Curator of Paintings in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. Beginning with the English painters, Mr. Constable spoke of the work of Turner, Constable and Bonington and showed examples of their work on the screen; the lectures are also illustrated, as he pointed out, by the loan exhibition of landscapes, which is now being shown in three of the new galleries of the Art Association. Mr. Constable showed by examples the influence of 18th century French and 17th century Dutch painters on Turner and Constable, and then the influence of these two painters on French painting in the early 19th century. He passed on from these to the landscape painters of the Barbizon group, and ended his lecture with a discussion of the work of Corot and J. F. Millet.

In the second lecture, which will be given this afternoon at five o'clock, Mr. Constable will deal with the later French painters, the impressionists and the beginnings of post-impressionism.

Concert To Be Held By Art Association

A concert for members of the Art Association of Montreal will be held at 9 p.m. next Monday in the Art Association building on Sherbrooke street. Miss Emmy Heim, well known mezzo-soprano, will give a selection of German and French folk songs and Maurice Onderet, first violin with the Montreal Orchestra, will contribute a number of violin selections.

DR. MARTIN RE-ELECTED

Increases in Membership and Number of Visitors
Best in Five Years

Harry A. Norton was elected honorary president and Dr. C. F. Martin re-elected president of the Art Association of Montreal for 1939 at the annual meeting in the Art Gallery yesterday afternoon. H. B. Walker and W. B. Blackader were named honorary vice-presidents and Dr. J. W. A. Hickson and Arthur Browning elected vice-presidents. G. W. S. Henderson is honorary treasurer.

New members of the council are: H. William Molson, Professor A. H. Gillson, Huntly Drummond, Morris Wilson and Dr. G. Lomer.

It was stated that the finances of the association were in a satisfactory condition, and that the results of the year were very favorable. Mentioned particularly were the new building and many increased activities. The honorary treasurer, gave a resume of the maintenance account.

Dr. Martin said in his report that there had been an increase in membership that represented an advance over the past five years and brought the present number to approximately 1,460. Almost half these are family members, it was pointed out. Visitors, other than members, to the galleries were 43,000, and this again was a larger number than any in the past five years.

THANKS ARE GIVEN.

For aid in the new building and extensions to the educational programme thanks were rendered particularly to Mr. Norton, Miss Helen Norton and the late Mrs. Charles Meredith. The total cost of additions was $105,000, and practically the whole amount had been received already. Names of the friends of the association who contributed to this fund were printed in the annual report.

A new policy with respect to the educational programme had been instituted during the year to the effect that instead of an independent art teacher, the council had assumed control of and full responsibility for the work—engaging its own staff of instructors and undertaking to provide all the necessary equipment and facilities. Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., and Mrs. Lilius Newton, R.C.A., had been invited to assume charge of the teaching and had added to the staff William Ogilvie of Toronto. All the classes had been well attended it was reported. In addition, a new quick-sketching class for business men and women had been inaugurated and had proved successful. These were held three times weekly, with an average attendance of 35.

The Saturday morning class for children from 10 to 15 had been continued throughout the year and was crowded to capacity with a large waiting list. Thanks were given the Junior League for its help in this respect. The classes were under the administration of Miss Anne Savage and Miss Ethel Seath with Miss Wald assisting. The indebtedness of the association to Sir Charles Lindsay, Mrs. Alan Law, Mrs. R. MacD. Paterson and Miss Olive Hosmer for scholarships was reported.

Art classes under the auspices of the Royal Canadian Academy of Art were continued and various members of the Academy had assisted the Director, Edward Dyonnet, with the instruction.

The committee in charge of lectures, under the chairmanship of Dr. Hickson had prepared a programme that included twice as many addresses as in 1937 and it was felt that the quality was better than ever before. A series of gallery talks on Friday afternoons had been added to the attractions, it was stated, and had been successful.

23 exhibitions were provided during the year by the committee under the chairmanship of D. Forbes Angus, and had covered a wide range of interest. The attendance at these was conspicuously large. At the same time special exhibitions of the week were shown, either to illustrate the subject matter of lectures or to afford the public an opportunity of seeing works of art that might not have been available otherwise. The association had also been instrumental in benefitting many institutions through the loan of pictures.

Library facilities had been improved, it was felt, and a new catalogue of books was provided during the year. The museum report was presented by Cleveland Morgan. A list of acquisitions was also included in the report. In this respect it was noted that the council had adopted a new policy with regard to the purchase of new material. The acquisition committee is now divided into several small groups each with a special mission, and with authority to purchase art material within limits of an appropriation made in each instance by the council.

Fees for professional artists have been reduced and the hours of visiting have been altered and are now as follows: 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on free days and from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Standard Pictures Hung In Print Room Of Art Association Of Montreal

Interest Continues High In Standard's Offering Of Famous Reproductions

Interest of the general public and especially students in the Standard's series of reproductions of outstanding paintings continues high as requests for the pictures pour into the newspaper office. Some dealers have had to order extra supplies.

This week saw the last lecture given by Mr. Sise under the auspices of the National Committee for Art Appreciation to an audience of 300 school girls at Westmount High. Though he lectured for half an hour over the allotted time, he was greeted by a sigh of dismay when he finally concluded, whether the girls were missing latin classes or were entranced by the beauty of the pictures, remains an unsolved mystery.

Though all the staff of the Art Gallery were busy preparing for the opening of their New Wing on February 13 when Lord Tweedsmuir will officiate, they found time to co-operate with the Standard's plan to bring art within the reach of all Canadians, by hanging the complete set of reproductions in their print room. Neatly hung in sets of four in the order that readers of the Standard will get these prints, it seemed incredible that these paintings literally glittering from the sombre yet attractive colour of the walls of the Print Room could be obtained by anyone in Canada for just over a dime each.

Almost certainly it was the first time that prints which were within the purchasing power of the general public art had ever been exhibited in any art gallery in Canada.

Thanks to the work of the National Committee for Art Appreciation and the Press, it is now possible for the work of the famous masters of all time to be appreciated by everyone. An event which had not occurred since the Renaissance in Italy five centuries ago.

Big Response

The public have not been slow to respond to this revolutionary happening, not only taking full advantage in thousands of cases but writing in to the office of the Standard expressing their gratitude. Terse forceful comments are frequently found scrawled across the back of the coupons such as "Good work, keep it up" or "A grand idea—thank you."

One letter in particular deserves quoting. "I would like you to know how much I appreciate the efforts you are making in helping to bring art before the public. The pictures are really lovely and I am determined to secure the whole set. . . . Now I would like to know if it is possible for out of town people to secure the set. I have a friend in the United States and one in England, both of whom are art lovers and I am sure would like to obtain the set, if possible." Originally intended by the Standard only to cover Canada, it begins to appear that these paintings are going to find their way across the Atlantic.

Silversmiths Of Canada

A side of Canadian history, which has received little notice, was set forth in a public lecture on "Old Canadian Silver," which was given by Professor Ramsay Traquair of McGill at the Art Association on Monday afternoon. In the course of his studies of the architecture of this province, Professor Traquair has found many fine pieces of old silver, some of it French, or American, but very much of it made in the province of Quebec.

Silversmiths, as the lecturer showed, must have come to Canada very early in its history, at a time when silver stored up in the form of domestic plate held the place, as investment, now held by stocks and bonds. He has succeeded in tracing a long series of silversmiths, both French and English, who worked in the province, and in identifying many of them with the maker's marks on existing pieces of their work. Photographs of a number of these pieces were shown on the screen, — monstrosities, censers and chalices as well as drinking cups, spoons and other articles of silver, and the lecturer pointed out that, while they were often simpler in design than French work of the same time, they were as good as the work that was done in any other country.

Tomorrow, Wednesday, afternoon at 5 o'clock, a public lecture will be given at the Art Association on "Islamic Art in India," by Kenneth de B. Codrington of the Victoria and Albert Museum, London.

$100,000 Art Gallery Extension to Be Opened by Lord Tweedsmuir

Gazette Feb. 11th, 1939

Fourth Governor-General to Officiate at Art Association of Montreal Inaugurations —Loan Collection to Be Shown

By ST. GEORGE BURGEOYNE.

On Monday evening the Art Association of Montreal, in the 79th year of its history, will record another progressive step in its aim to widen its cultural activities when His Excellency Lord Tweedsmuir will formally inaugurate the $100,000 extension to the galleries on Sherbrooke street west.

Governors-General have always shown themselves sympathetic to the Art Association here. On May 26, 1879, the Marquis of Lorne, accompanied by H.R.H. the Princess Louise, opened the old Art Gallery on Phillips Square. In 1893 an addition to that gallery was opened on November 30 by Lord Aberdeen, and on December 9, 1912, the present galleries were inaugurated by H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught. These occasions were marked by the exhibition of important loan collections, and Monday night will be no exception, the offering being a loan exhibition of 19th century landscape paintings. This is due to remain on view until March 1. Incidentally, members of the association on February 20 and 21 will hear about the painters of this period from W. G. Constable, M.A., F.S.A., Curator of Paintings, Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

The present addition to the Art Gallery, built on the northwest side, was made possible through the initial generosity of H. A. Norton, of Ayers Cliff, Que., and of Miss Norton, of Coaticook. The gift of these two picture-lovers, who are discerning collectors, was supplemented by part of a bequest from the late Mrs. Charles Meredith, and other donations from J. W. McConnell and friends who have always given tangible support to the association and its work.

The new wing provides a number of rooms and a basement. In the basement there are rooms for the use of students, workshops and a large room for the storage of paintings. On the ground floor, besides rooms for the display of objects of art, hitherto crowded into one museum room, there are two galleries about 60 feet long. On the first floor are new galleries for special exhibitions which come from various sources on loan. These are reached by a new stairway erected at the western end of the large hall.

The architects of the new wing are Fetherstonhaugh & Durnford, and the work was carried out by Anglin-Norcross.

Contemporary Art Society Is Formed

Gazette—18.2.39

Body Headed by John Lyman of Montreal Outlines Its Objectives

Designed to develop interest in contemporary art in communities, large and small, throughout Canada and with the aim of taking modern, living art to the public, the Contemporary Art Society was founded in Montreal this week. It is stated that branches will be formed in principal Canadian centres and efforts will be made to secure wider public recognition for the more advanced school of Canadian painters who, the statement furnished the press says, are laying the groundwork for the Canadian art of tomorrow.

Preliminary meetings of the society in Montreal are said to have attracted more than 25 leading modern artists, but the movement will also be extended to laymen who are interested in national art development.

Officers of the society, elected this week, include: President, John Lyman; vice-president, L. P. Borduas; secretary, Fritz Brandtner; treasurer, Philip Surrey.

Plan Exhibition In Art Gallery

Metropolitan Commission Will Sponsor Exhibit.

An exhibition of photographs and drawings of metropolitan park system and parkways of different European and American cities will be sponsored by the Montreal Metropolitan Commission at the Art Gallery, 1379 Sherbrooke street west, commencing next Tuesday night.

The exhibition, first sponsored by the Commission since its founding in 1921, was run for five days and is being handled by the commission's department of planning and research.

First showing at 8.15 p.m. Tuesday will be for officials of Montreal and surrounding municipalities and will be on invitation only. Following this it will be open to the public.

Eugene Beaudoin, well-known town planning authority of Paris, France, will give explanations and comment on the exhibitions. They will be translated into English by Louis Francoeur, head of the planning and research department.

"Old Tree," by Louis Muhlstock, young Montreal artist. Well-known for his charcoal portraits and figure studies, he is rapidly developing as a landscape painter in oils and has taken to water colors with distinct success.

"Place Jacques Cartier" is a good example of the work of the Montreal painter Adrien Hebert, who finds his best inspiration in and about the city.

Etchings By Gagnon Shown in Print Room Gazette—18. 2. 39

Collection of Prints by Montreal Artist Contains French and Venetian Subjects

In the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal there is an exhibition of etchings by Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., of Montreal, which will appeal strongly to those who are partial to art possessing evidences of sound drawing and technical competence. In none of these prints will the lover of this exacting medium find a jarring note. Done years ago, these etchings reveal a very sincere regard for form, design and a real love for line, as becomes a pupil of the late William Brymner, R.C.A., then director of the Art Association Schools. Open-minded to the then somewhat incoherent tendencies that towards the end of his term as director were manifesting themselves in painting, Brymner, nevertheless, insisted on good drawing as a vital fundamental. From his student days, Gagnon has always held this view, and it is expressed in full measure in these plates, just as it has been in his later work as painter, and in his illustrations for "Le Grand Silence Blanc," and Louis Hémon's "Maria Chapdelaine."

It is a long time since such a group of etchings by Gagnon has been shown. Those who possess prints hold them jealously—and there has not been a new plate for years. With his gifts and sympathy for this medium, what might he not have done in picturing the rural life of Quebec Province? The Chapdelaine illustrations are proof of his understanding of this subject but, unfortunately, there is no indication that he will return to a medium in which his high attainments brought him early recognition—prints in the Petit Palace, Paris; South Kensington Museum, London; and in Dresden, Florence, Venice, Mulhausen and The Hague.

Many old favorites are here, as well as prints not so often seen. "Souvenir de Grenada"—narrow stream edged by houses in sunlight and shadow, with arched bridge, suggests sunlight and warmth. Of a cooler season is "Public Gardens, Venice," with its bare trees, and figures looking across the canal. Trees and doorways are reflected in the rippling water with gondolas in "Canal, San Agostino, Venice," while shadows play a decorative part on the water-edged houses in "Clair de Lune, Venice." Buildings, mooring posts, gondolas and distant church in broad daylight, very spacious in feeling, reveal the importance of the Grand Canal, and "Isola San Burano, Venice," with craft under sail, distant buildings, and in the foreground, a girl tending goat beneath trees is a print of effective contrasts.

In his wanderings Gagnon was quick to see good subjects—"Rue a Nemour," with its spired church cut at the base by an archway; "Old Houses at Caudebec," truly interprets the print's title; "Old Mill in Picardy" under a stormy sky; men cleaning the hull of a canted ship; "La Rue des Petits Degres, St. Malo," with figures on steps in a narrow street; "Porte du Jeryhual, Dinan," with its gate at the base of a massive circular tower; an old windmill at St. Briac; view of Rouen, with a distant church and a poplar in the foreground; and "L'Ourage," with a tall mill, adjacent old houses and poplars bending in the wind.

Plates rich in detail are "Porte de Bourgogne, Moret-sur-Loing," with the massive tower commanding the bridge, and, in the foreground, women washing clothes in the stream; and "Canal du Loing, Moret-sur-Loing" with its poplar-edged waterway, woman with yoke and buckets on the towpath, a moored barge and distant bridge. From Dinan are a market scene, and "Tour de L'Horloge."

"En Novembre" spells inclement weather—bare trees, the upper branches dotted with the nests of rooks, billowy clouds, hay ricks and a flock of sheep with dog and guardian; and Mont St. Michel, as seen from a muddy road edged with barns and cottages, suggests a foul day.

This touches on a few of many good things in a collection that warrants considerably more than a glance in passing.

W. G. CONSTABLE, M.A., D.C.L., Curator of Paintings, Boston Museum of Fine Arts, who on Monday and Tuesday will address the members of the Art Association of Montreal on "Nineteenth Century Landscape Painters." These lectures are given in connection with the exhibition of landscapes of this period on view in the newly-opened extension.

Art Association Of Montreal Announces Five Acquisitions; Lively Exhibition In Print Room

By ROBERT AYRE

THIS week the Art Association announces five new acquisitions which should be of great interest to all art lovers in Montreal. As a gift comes "Village, West Indies," by James Wilson Morrice, whose show at Scott's was reviewed on this page last Saturday. It will be a valuable addition to a proud collection. The painting was exhibited in the French Gallery, London, in 1925, at the Galleries Simonson, Paris, the following year and in the exhibition of Canadian Art in Paris in 1927, all after Morrice's death in Tunis.

The purchases are: "Place Jacques Cartier" by Adrien Hebert, painted in 1936 and exhibited in Mr. Hebert's one-man show in the Watson Galleries; "Possa del Mare," by Eric Goldberg, begun at this village near Barcelona about three years ago and finished in Montreal, reproduced in the Spanish publication "Art" and exhibited here and in New York; a water color, "Old Tree" by Louis Muhlstock, which was recently seen in an exhibition at the Faculty Club; and a prairie landscape, one of the pencil drawings by Lionel Lemoine Fitzgerald of Winnipeg, shown last month in the Association's print room.

William Ogilvie, teacher in the commercial art classes of the Association's school, has arranged a lively exhibition in the print room. Students and men and women engaged in the profession of advertising are bound to be attracted by it; they will get some new ideas, perhaps; and the men who use advertising to sell their products should see it, too. At the same time, the people who are influenced by the advertising to buy the goods ought to be interested. They will get a new insight into the imagination and skill that go into the modern presentation of commerce.

Most of these travel folders, maps, posters, catalogues, menus, calendars, almanacs and announcements come from the United States and Europe. Among the important artists represented are McKnight Kauffer, Eric Gill, Pierre Brissaud, Clare Leighton, John Armstrong, Clifford and Rosemary Ellis and Eric Taylor. Particularly striking are John Armstrong's Royal Mail poster, Eric Taylor's treatment of Telephone and Telegraph and the Ocean Cable by the Elises. A purely Canadian exhibition is planned for the near future.

MUSIC Star 28. 2. 39 Chamber Music at Art Association

There is no better place for chamber music in Montreal than the lecture room of the Art Association, which can only rarely be used for the purpose. A most pleasant concert was given there on Monday evening, with a program of songs by Madame Emmy Heim and violin and piano sonatas by Maurice Onderet and Edna Marie Hawkin, to a big audience of members of the Association, who were reminded by it of the very good concert room that they possess and that music has a right to a place, occasionally, in an art gallery.

Mr. Onderet and Mrs. Hawkin are always a quite admirable partnership, and they gave very effective performances, first of Cesar Franck's sonata and later of Grieg's sonata in C minor. Madame Heim began with German songs, three by Schubert and three by Wolf. The room suited her voice very well and she sang with her usual fine understanding of the songs. Her other group consisted of two French Bergerettes and some folk songs of various countries, ending with one in English. These were good songs delightfully sung; a Greek shepherd's lament was an especially good one. Mrs. Hawkin, who also was Mme. Heim's pianist, had much hard work to do all through the program, and did it admirably.

"Salisbury Cathedral," by Constable,—"looking light and airy in contrast with the massive arch of trees which frames it."

British, French and Dutch Artists Represented In Art Association's Loan Exhibition of 100 Landscapes

By ROBERT AYRE.

ART marches on. In these days of squandering billions on battleships and bombing planes and gas masks it is a good thing to know that Art is still alive and that a few citizens can think it worth while to spend some money on it. The new wing of the Art Association building, formally opened by the Governor-General on Monday night, should be reassuring to us all.

Monday night was of course no time for looking at pictures. It was a time for gowns and white gloves and daffodils, medals and jewels, conversation and speeches and supper, a time for parading through the new rooms and admiring their monkscloth wall-coverings and ceiling lights. So I went back on a quiet day during the week and had the pictures to myself.

The loan exhibition of Nineteenth Century landscapes comes from private collections in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, from one or two dealers, from the National Gallery of Canada and from the Art Gallery of Toronto. There are more than 100 paintings. The British section extends from Richard Wilson and Thomas Rowlandson to five men still alive—Sir George Clausen, Sir John Lavery, Sir David Y. Cameron, Sir Arnesby Brown and Frank Brangwyn; the French, from Corot and Delacroix to Charles Cottet and Henri le Sidaner; and there is a small group of Dutchmen—Bosboom, Tongkind, Weissenbruch, two Marises and Mauve.

Some important painters are missing altogether, some are not hitting on all cylinders in the works that represent them; but consider the handicaps under which a show like this is assembled in Canada and make the most of the good things you do get.

The powerful spirit of Constable surges through three paintings—Hampstead Heath, rough in conflict and monumental in equilibrium, the big Dedham Vale, and Salisbury Cathedral looking light and airy in contrast with the massive arch of trees that frames it. There are two solid Cromes, one of them, The Old Mill, all but indistinguishable, as if Crome were the father of the American Ryder. Cotman, Cox, Linnell, the romantic Wilson and several others whose beginnings were in the Eighteenth Century are to be seen. And of course Turner. Seven of them, including a rough sea at Rainham and The Sun of Venice by the Sea. Strictly speaking, the Rowlandson Fair isn't a landscape. Nor is it one of His Excellency's conversation pieces. Not with that kicking horse and the men and women spilling in all directions. It's fun to see it, though. There are five Boningtons, neat and clean.

Brangwyn is sumptuous in Bruges and Venice; Cameron is melancholy in his Scottish mountains; Clausen's Morning in November is light and delicate and almost impalpable; Arnesby Brown paints the Suffolk landscape in the grand manner, no doubts about anything; there is thickness and warmth in William Strang's Joy of Summer, with its semi-nudes, and placid space in Lavery's levels of sand and sea, with two figures to emphasize the loneliness. Precise, prim with a Douanier primness is Walter Greaves' Chelsea. Looking at his In the Dunes, it doesn't seem possible that Adrian Stokes was 90 when he died in 1935. William McTaggart's Through the Corn, S. J. Peplow's Iona (I think I should have included him among the living; he isn't in the catalogue) and Sir Alfred East's Greenwich are spirited impressions.

The only Canadian in the show is Morrice, represented by two handsome scenes from St. Malo.

There are five charming Corots. I found particularly satisfying Voisinlieu, pres Beauvaus, with its smoky trees. In another world are the two Delacroix—Christ on the lake in a storm, not so much Christ as storm and a fight with the elements; and the drowning Ophelia clinging to the bough of a tree. Courbet looms up with overwhelming weight. Boudin is clean-washed and bright.

The Cezannes, Monets and Renoirs are from different periods in the painters' lives and give you some clues to their development.

There are Monticellis, Sisleys and Pissarros worth seeing.

When you go to see the new wing, don't forget the museum rooms; re-arranged, some of the pieces take on new life; don't miss the exhibition of Clarence Gagnon's etchings in the print room; he shouldn't be taken too much for granted; and don't fail to go to the basement where the children's classes are held. There you'll see a rousing exhibition of joyous paintings and masks and clay modelling. What fun, to do a kangaroo with a pocket and a prehistoric dragon all broken out in spines and knobs!

Contemporary Arts Society

By-laws were drawn up, officers elected and future plans discussed at a meeting of the new Contemporary Arts Society held here during the week. John Lyman was elected president, P. E. Borduas vice president, Fritz Brandtner secretary and Philip Surrey treasurer. An honorary president will be chosen later.

Next month, the Society will hold an artists' masquerade ball to raise funds, and plans are being laid for an exhibition of non-Canadian contemporary paintings.

Anything that is afterwards recognized as significant in art always springs from a so-called "modern" movement and the Society's aim is to keep the new and vital before the public, without following any particular group or tendency.

When the Contemporary Arts Society holds exhibitions, the works will have to pass a jury appointed by the executive committee and, so that they will remain alive and flexible, the members will be subject to the same conditions as the non-members.

Canadian Group of Painters Drops Exhibition Due in April

Members to Contribute Works to Art Association Spring Show—Entries Close Tuesday—Derujinsky's Sculpture on View

Gazette

By ST. GEORGE BURGONE 25.2.39

This is much in the nature of a final warning—Tuesday is the last day for sending in entry forms and works for the 56th annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, which is to open on March 9. Only four works may be submitted, and these shall not have been publicly exhibited before in Montreal.

"No works will be received after the 28th of February," reads the entry form, and there is nothing ambiguous about that.

As announced by the Association, "the exhibition will be so arranged as to give a wide representation of various tendencies in art." This evidence of open mind should result in a varied and interesting show, especially since the exhibition, by the Canadian Group of Painters, originally planned for April, will not be held, the members instead sending their works to the Spring Show. The new galleries will be used for this exhibition, which will last until April 2.

As a final offering for this month, a concert will be held at the Art Gallery on Monday at 9 p.m. This is open to members only. The artists will be Emmy Heim, mezzo-soprano; Maurice Onderet, violinist, and Marie Hawkin, pianist.

Interest continues to be shown in the loan exhibition of 19th century landscape paintings, on view in three of the new upstairs galleries. The arrangement of the works is fine, and the lighting, of the very latest type, reveals the paintings in their true colors. This is due to close on March 1.

Downstairs in the Lecture Hall, and outside, there is a select exhibition of sculpture by Gleb W. Derujinsky, an artist of talent and sincerity. Born in Russia, Derujinsky studied at the Imperial Academy of Fine Art in Petrograd, and in Paris under Injalbert and Verlet. The Russian Revolution in 1919 suggested a change of scene and he went to New York, since making the United States his home. He has exhibited in London; in the Salon d'Automne in Paris; in the Palais des Beaux Arts in Brussels, and throughout the United States, winning at the Sesquicentennial Exposition, Philadelphia, in 1926, a gold medal for his sculpture called "Eve."

Writing of Derujinsky's show in London, the art critic of The Morning Post—now, alas, no more—wrote in the following vein:

"His work is naturalistic in outlook and classic in expression, not in the static calm of academic convention, but in the vital significance emanating from intimate study of life."

"His eye sees deep into the character of each sitter, and with well disciplined skill he represents personality, the mental and physical traits that distinguish and differentiate men and women. He is uncommonly successful in catching and retaining a likeness, the quick something which is profounder than the silence of mask-resemblance."

Among his examples at this show were Major the Hon. Maurice Baring, Prince Serge Obolensky, the Lady Loughborough, and Sir John Lavery, R.A.

In the present exhibition, Derujinsky reveals likeness-catching skill in the comely portrait of Miss Prudence Dawes, of Montreal, done in plaster; in the heroic head of Beethoven, and in the aesthetic-looking and bearded Tagore. Vitality and distinction mark the portrait busts of N. Pechin and G. Galock-vastof.

Characterized by grace is "Diana," with bow, hound and leaping deer, a work that hints a bit of Paul Manship, and there is action in "St. George," who prefers the sword to a spear for dragon slaying.

There are a couple of torsos—lateral and competent, and some more imagination and design find their way into two Pietas, and "Annunciation." A more decorative note, too, is shown in the wings of the Archangel Gabriel, busy with the trumpet. Leda and her swan are here, and distinctly effective in the arrangement of the limbs is "Woman Seated." "Cupid and Psyche" is another subject, and "Angel of Sorrow" well expresses the title. Two items called "Mother and Child" are straightforward, sincere works of a sturdy kind.

There should be increased interest in the Museum, with its new arrangement and lighting, on the ground floor. Now the items can be properly seen and studied, and will undoubtedly be made greater use of.

In connection with this department, F. Cleveland Morgan, chairman of the committee, said at the annual meeting of the Art Association on Thursday:

"The greatly improved accommodation which the new wing has made possible has enabled us for the first time to arrange the collections in something like historical sequence. But this very arrangement has made obvious the great number of gaps in these collections—gaps that must be filled if we are to have a teaching collection worthy of the name. However, before these additions are even contemplated, your committee hopes to reorganize and redecorate the original Museum in keeping with the rooms already opened."

Asking patient consideration of members and the public, Mr. Morgan said it was hoped in as short a time as possible to relabel and recatalogue the entire collections with the idea of making the labels brief but informative.

Art Exhibition Opens March 9

The 56th annual spring exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal will open on March 9, it was announced by the association today. The exhibition, open to works which have not already been publicly exhibited in Montreal, will conclude on April 2. Entries will close on February 28.

Artists may display four works in the exhibition, the classes of which are: (a) Paintings in oils, water-colors and pastels; (b) etchings, engravings and drawings; (c) architectural designs, and (d) sculpture.

The jury, which has full power to accept or reject any works submitted, includes Andre Bieier, F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., Alphonse Jongers, R.C.A., William Ogilvie, Stanley Royle, A.R.C.A., Miss Anne Savagé, Henri Hebert, R.C.A. (sculpture) and P. R. Wilson, A.R.C.A. (architectural designs).

Art Association Delays Spring Exhibition

The opening of the annual spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, which was to have taken place tonight, has been postponed until Thursday, March 9. It was found a few days ago that it would be impossible to have the exhibition ready by today. The usual formal opening will be on Thursday night and the exhibition will be open to the public next Friday, March 10.

LE MARCHE, by Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., is a sight that all can see about Jacques Cartier Square now that real winter conditions are here. The canvas shows a farmer bargaining with a customer, adjacent laden sleighs, and the buildings on the west side of the Square, at the lower end of which there is a burst of sunlight—more subtle in its values than the reproduction suggests. This work, much the same in arrangement, though at a different season, is similar to the painting by this Montreal artist recently purchased by the Art Association of Montreal for its permanent collection.

British and French Schools Strongly Represented at

WIDE PERIOD COVERED

Outstanding Examples by French Impressionists—
Dutch School and Watercolors Have Place

Embellishing the new galleries of the Art Association of Montreal, formally inaugurated by His Excellency Lord Tweedsmuir last night, is a loan exhibition of 19th century landscape paintings which should draw a record attendance before the show closes on March 1. On the occasion of the formal opening of the building on Sherbrooke street west by H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught in 1912, there was a loan exhibition of pictures by artists of many schools and many periods. It was drawn mainly from Montreal before the important Drummond and Ross collections were dispersed. In the present instance, while the Montreal representation is large, there are also works from Ottawa and Toronto public and private galleries. The manner in which the paintings have been hung—all on the line—could not be bettered, and the neutral tone of the walls and the admirable lighting set a high level in the art of display.

The British group contains sterling examples. Occupying the north wall is "In Suffolk," by Sir Arnesby Brown, a work of fresh, clean color and bold brushwork and definitely English—cattle in a field illumined by an overhead sun, luscious green trees and in the distance a town, above which storm clouds gather. Brangwyn, that master of so many arts, reveals his virile brushwork, sound color and effective composition in a crowd in a European marketplace, and a canal scene where the glowing colored sails supply the high note. Sir George Clausen has an impression of dawn—houses, noble trees and an overturned plough in a furrow. Sir D. Y. Cameron in "The Shadows of Chon" has an impressive Scottish scene—noble mountains, some in shadow and others flushed by the setting sun, mirrored in the still water. "Greenwich Park," by Sir Alfred East, is a sunny work, with trees and figures, and Sir John Lavery has a broadly painted Moroccan scene—two figures on the sand edging a stretch of sea.

William Strang's art is represented by "Joy of Summer," which shows how accomplished a figure painter this artist was. The women nude and draped move in a landscape with distant mountains and a glimpse of lake. W. McTaggart, the Scot who was captured by Impressionism, invested "Through the Corn" with dazzling sunlight. The grain is being tramped through by little children, and, fortunately, the farmer is not in sight. J. W. Morrice is here with a beach scene, and the large canvas entitled "La Place Chateaubriand, St. Malo," with figures seated at tables or promenading in the shadow of noble trees—an outstanding performance by this Canadian painter. Adrian Stokes captures the beauty of sun-lit silver sand reflected in a pool of blue water, in the work called "In the Dunes," and Greaves has a precisely painted walk edging water with skiffs.

Going back a bit, Constable is well represented with works rich in those qualities which place him so high in British art. There is the beautifully atmospheric painting of Salisbury Cathedral—the building, a range of silver and greys, as seen between noble trees which shadow a stream at which cattle drink. In the group, too, is a scene of Hampstead Heath, and a large vertical landscape with a clump of trees, beneath which a gypsy tends his cooking pot, distant Dedham church and, above rising ground, a cloud breaking in rain. By John Crome are "Norfolk Homestead"; and a mill by moonlight, and by Richard Wilson is a stream with boat and swans, ruins on a distant hill and, in the foreground, an angler trying his luck. "Greenwich Hospital" is the work by James Holland, and shipping and beach at sunset is the example by J. B. Pyne. Sheep at the edge of a river with barges at sunset represents John Sell Cotman. "The Sun of Venice Going to Sea"; sea breaking at the foot of chalk cliffs; and a storm with a ship at a dangerous list are small works by Turner. By Bonington are "Les Environs de Quilleboeuf," and "View Over the Solent," which were a featured exhibit in connection with a lecture recently, while there is also a beach scene with boat and shrimpers. There are, too, works by William Shayer, Sr., and John Linnell.

THE FRENCH PAINTINGS.

The French paintings make an alluring array, and here one could spend hours—and longer than that wondering why the Impressionists were handled so roughly by the critics and the official art powers. This collection in its range, however, more than hints that these moderns must have been a good deal of a headache to others who saw differently.

Monet is worthily represented in different manners—"Vetheuil" in Summer," from The Art Gallery of Toronto, a large canvas glowing with sunlight that gilds the red roofs of the houses and church on the hillside, and the moving water in the foreground; "A Stormy Sea," with cloud-flecked sky and foamy waves that spell a strong wind; massive sun-lit cliffs and sea is another work, painted in 1881, and there is a riverside town with a boat at sunset. Sisley, besides "Un Jour de Printemps," with figures in a country road, edged with budding trees that cast shadows, is represented by, among others, a waterside scene with rose-flushed trees and a nearby village; and a freely handled winter scene in pastel.

Pissarro's art is revealed in "Ruelle, Auvers-sur-Oise," with houses, garden, figures and wooded ridge; a garden scene in strong sunlight with a figure under a tree; and the large and animated painting of river and bridge with pedestrians. By Renoir is a girl doing her hair at the edge of a stream; a broadly painted bit on the Seine, with a house overlooking the water; and also a freely painted tree-edged stream. Among the works by Cezanne is a solidly handled painting of a road between trees. By Harpignies is a landscape with stream and sandbars in bright sunlight, and Rousseau, Dupre and Daubigny reveal their individual charms in characteristic works.

By Corot is "House, Trees and Water," a work of lovely, delicate quality; and also a canvas of figures in the dunes with sparse trees.

The solid and rather gloomy color of Courbet is revealed in a marine; hunters in a glade awaiting game; and deer in a snow-covered wood. Cottet in "Coast of Brittany" reveals accomplished design in the rocky coast, with dull green water edged with white where it beats against the shore.

"Brest Harbor" by Boudin shows his skill in painting shipping and skies; there is a scene of two ships being unloaded on a beach, and from this brush also came the house-edged placid water that mirrors poplars. By Lhermitte is a landscape at dusk with a winding road, on which a woman rides a donkey, while a man walks at her side, and also a crisp, sparkling stretch of sun-lit country done in pastel. Glowing and luscious are the colors in two examples by Monticelli—a walled country road with figure; and a fairy garden with trees, peopled with richly-dressed figures. Among the works by Delacroix is a Biblical subject.

DUTCH AND OTHERS.

In a third gallery is, among others, a group of Dutch paintings—"The Enchanted Castle," and a girl with kids by Matthew Maris, both works of characteristic delicacy. In marked contrast are the boldly handled paintings of his brothers—William, with a man and a boat and cattle, and James with a plowing scene, and a watercolor of a typical Dutch waterside town. A river with barge and windmill in moonlight, and skaters on a frozen stream are works by Jongkind, and by Mauve is a watercolor of seated man watching sheep in a grove, and a plowing scene in oils. By Weissenbruch is the impressive canvas called "A Storm, Coast of Zeeland."

In this gallery, too, there is a collection of watercolors which include, among others, David Cox, Samuel Prout, Bosboom, Weissenbruch, Turner, Cameron, Rowlandson and Brabazon.

Le 56e Salon du Printemps

Nos "Modernes" se sont annexé la Galerie des Arts. — Les catégories consacrées disparaissent. — La création d'un monde nouveau.

Vitalité indéniable

NOS "Modernes" se sont annexé la Galerie des Arts, le musée officiel de Montréal. Ils l'ont conquis tout à coup, du jour au lendemain, au moment où personne ne s'y attendait, — comme Hitler a conquis l'Autriche, — sans effusion d'encre ni de sang. Le 56e Salon du Printemps leur appartient. Ils y sont tous, ceux de l'avant-garde qui exposaient naguère encore avec les Indépendants ou à la Sun Life. Ce qui plus est, leur influence est manifeste dans tous les autres coins de l'exposition, au grand dam des académismes qui ne savent plus où se cacher. Il n'est peintre si radical qui ne se soit fait admettre avec les honneurs de la guerre au Salon du Printemps. Aimez-vous le "modernisme?", on en a mis partout. Vous trouverez jusqu'à ce cubisme passé de mode à Paris; tel tableau est fait de morceaux de carton et de papier savamment mêlés comme dans un casse-tête. Non seulement aucun des partisans de l'art "avancé" n'a été exclus des salles nouvelles, mais, bien au contraire, malgré que l'on ait rejeté moins d'envois que d'habitude, il s'est trouvé précisément que ce sont des envois plutôt conventionnels et académiques qui ont subi ce malheur.

A plus d'un égard, c'est une révolution. On se croirait au Salon des Indépendants. Free for all. OMNIUM. Tout est tendances, recherches, nouveautés. Le branle-bas est général: les catégories consacrées sont renversées, ignorées, inexistantes. La variété s'avère extrême. Plus de cénacle privilégié comme autrefois; plus de coin sacré, mais toutes les œuvres sur le même pied, sur une même ligne uniforme à la hauteur de l'œil, — distribuées à travers six salles et des bouts de corridors, sans encombrement, d'une manière si bien aérée que le visiteur se rend compte à peine qu'il est en présence de 476 envois, cette année, alors qu'il se croyait perdu au milieu des 275 du printemps 1938.

C'est un triomphe décisif pour le modernisme. Et des galeries Scott, en face, M. Heaton doit regarder d'un oeil mélancolique la victoire inattendue d'un mouvement dont il a tant contribué à dégager le sens par l'exemple de l'Ecole de Paris. — victoire qui arrive au moment même où les galeries Scott, après quatre-vingts années d'existence brillante, vont mourir de malemort.

Le premier résultat surprend. L'atmosphère n'est plus celle que nous avions accoutumé de voir au Salon du Printemps. Tout épelle la mort de la peinture bourgeoise et satisfaite. On cherche encore un peu d'instinct le salon d'honneur et son prestige, mais le démocratisation moderne a tout nivelé. Plus de grandes pièces; cela coûte trop cher en temps de crise. Moins de grands portraits. Rien de transcendant: même les genres les plus avancés ne peuvent nous surprendre ici, puisqu'ils s'affichaient ailleurs depuis quelques années. La surprise n'est que de voir tous les genres réunis d'un seul coup.

Or, le cœur peut sentir quelque regret pour les Salons de printemps de jadis, avec leur petit air conventionnel et académique dont il était si agréable de se moquer un tantinet. C'était beau, pourtant. Mais la raison raisonnable doit admettre que le Salon de mars 1939 claironne un renouveau très riche de promesses.

Le Dr C.-F. Martin et l'Art Association affirment leur volonté de collaborer à la création d'un monde nouveau. Ils veulent enrichir notre art anémié, par d'audacieuses transfusions de sang. S'ils font la part abondante aux artistes frais émus de l'immigration, ils font la place non moins large à plusieurs jeunes Canadiens-français qui ont abordé de grand cœur les formules de l'art contemporain. On ne saurait nier, à visiter le Salon du Printemps, que le "modernisme" enrichit le paysage. Il faut convenir du vif intérêt que suscite dans une époque si lourde d'angoisses ce besoin grandissant d'évasion dans le genre illustratif chargé d'allégories et d'humour. Individualistes et rouspetteurs parfois, mais sincères comme on ne l'est plus ailleurs, nos modernes à nous, — à l'instar de tous les Modernes, — donnent la sensation de la vie telle qu'elle est aujourd'hui. Est-ce leur faute si cette vie est décadente et désaxée? Une imagination parfois malade mais très active ne vaut-elle pas mieux en art que pas d'imagination du tout?

Ça va s'user vite? Peut-être. Mais la transition aura commencé des renouvellements. L'art étale souvent nos misères? Peut-être. Mais de là naissent toujours nos espoirs. Le seul danger serait que l'art moderne dès qu'elle ne sera plus persécutée s'installe dans son académisme à lui et finisse par croire, selon la formule de Taine, que la substance de l'âme est résoluble en choes nerveux. Cet art est encore trop neuf parmi nous pour en arriver à de pareilles conclusions. Il exprime pour l'heure la VITALITE. Et s'il reste fidèle à la formule de 1939, le Salon du Printemps promet d'être chaque année un contraste saisissant avec le Salon d'automne, alors qu'il n'en était jusqu'ici que le pendant. Si bien que... ouvrons l'œil.

RIEN ne sert de fournir une nomenclature, descriptive ou non. Les œuvres individuelles se fondent dans l'ensemble. Cette année, c'est la leçon de l'ensemble qui va compter.

Toutefois, d'une courte promenade à travers les salles nouvelles et anciennes, à l'éclairage perfectionné, — promenade effectuée sans catalogue et sans égard aux signatures connues, j'ai voulu retenir, pour certaines qualités qui tranchent dans l'ensemble, les quelques sujets suivants, — sans tenir beaucoup compte des personnalités d'ores et déjà consacrées:

Dans la première salle nouvelle, on remarque un paysage de Jean Langlois aux tons de ciel et de glace purs et frais; un Marc-Aurèle Fortin dans la rutilance touffue et agréable de sa dernière manière; — un portrait mélancolique et très expressif par Ernst Neumann; — un grand portrait de Vieux d'une tonalité accablante de sévérité, par Lawren Harris; — un amusant découpage picassien; — une scène de piquenique par Laurent Morin dont le coloris ensoleillé et vibrant retient l'attention.

Dans la deuxième salle neuve, on s'arrête devant un autre paysage de Jean Langlois, du A.-Y. Jackson en plus jeune et en plus frais; — une rugueuse et rutilante nature-morte de Charles-Emile Desautels; — des arbres à la lumière découpée peints par Bruce Mitchell; — une scène canadienne aux arbres tahitiens décrite par Pfeiffer; — une décorative et pittoresque Madone noire d'Agnès Lefort décrite dans une joie de coloris; de limpides paysages de Berthe Des Clayes; — un agréable coin d'hiver par Fleurimond Constantineau; — plusieurs bons portraits par Lindy (Isabelle Crooker) une nouvelle venue dont la "Miss Hampton Lee" est surtout attachante par son expression rêveuse et par le traitement souple de l'étoffe noire contre un arrière-plan olive.

Le troisième salon, — la pièce que les plus "purs" de nos Modernes se sont réservée, — présente un paysage tourmenté d'A.-Y. Jackson; une scène floue et rêveuse d'Eric Goldberg; un nu bronzé de Lyman; un pique-nique en tons pastels de Bieler; des paysages d'un fauvisme pénétrant par David Milne; des descriptions avec arbres curieusement duvetés par Dewey Albinston; un tableau noir et vert plein d'interprétations sinistres par Charles Comfort; un Lawren Harris consacré à des superpositions de plans (toile que l'Art Association va acheter); une scène de rue décrite par Muhlschlag d'un angle neuf et décoratif.

Dans la quatrième salle s'est réfugié ce qui reste d'académisme. Mais déjà beaucoup de cet académisme tourne au moderne. Remarquons, en tout cas, une scène de port par Stanley Royle (achetée par l'Art Association), habilement éclairée; de liquides marines de Rita Mount; des fleurs; un délicat Couvent dans la neige de Hal-Ross Berrigard; un cirque en taches mouvantes, par P.-C. Sheppard; une sleigh de Coburn qui sort avec entrain de la neige palpable et d'un firmament cristallin; de Coburn aussi, un nu couché, d'une chair plus soyeuse et plus animée que ses nus d'autrefois; de Jongers, un juge Greenshields et un garçonnet décrits avec l'extrême souplesse et la flatteuse ressemblance qui ont valu à l'artiste sa haute réputation de portraitiste fashionable; de Beaumont, une Coupe de la glace en tons nets et secs; et quatre portraits par L. Torrence Newton, dont on aime surtout la jeune femme en vert au visage ouvert et légèrement narquois, et le visage si aristocratique et un peu distant de la jeune fille en rouge.

EN HAUT: — Une savoureuse et décorative Madone noire, par Agnès Lefort. AU MILIEU: — Elégant et souple portrait de Miss Hampton Lee, par Isabelle Crooker (Lindy). EN BAS: — Un pique-nique au coloris ensoleillé, par Laurent Morin. Ces œuvres sont parmi les 476 exposées au Salon du Printemps, qui restera ouvert jusqu'au 2 avril à la Galerie des Arts, 1379-ouest, rue Sherbrooke. Admission gratuite les dimanches de 2 à 5 h., les mercredis et samedis de 10 à 5 h. Prix modique d'admission, les lundis, mardis, jeudi et vendredi, de 10 h à 6 h. (Clichés la "Presse").

Quatre dessins d'Antoine Burger dominent de haut le coin des gravures et dessins: son self-portrait, son Eglise S.-Pierre-de-Montmartre et son profil de garçonnet sont enlevés d'un crayon rapide, sûr, plein de mouvement: à chaque trait s'accroche une profondeur de rêve.

Mimi Guay présente une tête de femme dessinée avec acuité. Les gravures sur bois sont presque toutes excellentes.

Parmi les aquarelles on distingue celle où Topham a imaginé de curieux effets d'éclairage sur la neige verte; les monts enneigés de Simpkins; le coloris en taches fauves mais attachants de Sam Borenstein; des Paul Caron consacrés, cette fois, à décrire, avec la même distinction de touche que les vieux berlots rouges, des coins du Chinatown.

L'architecture n'occupe qu'un coin modeste et ne présente que des projets au modernisme très sage.

La sculpture, distribuée un peu partout à travers les salles et les corridors, est faite cette année de petites têtes surtout. On retrouve les noms familiers. La pièce la plus remarquable est le Saint Joseph de Silvia Daoust, dont le bel élan vertical se plie légèrement au sommet dans une attitude d'une tendre piété. Marjorie Winslow décrit avec un humour tendre une nouvelle scène enfantine: le petit gars qui apaise ses deux petits chiens. Dinah Lauterman a construit une tête à la coiffure haute et enflammée. Alonzo Cinq-Mars a réajusté une honnête ressemblance de feu Samuel Genest, dont la barbe chevelue se prêtait à la sculpture. Henri Hébert présente une tête solide, dépouillée de tout artifice. Le buste de jeune femme exécuté par Pierre Normandeau est d'une rondeur sereine.

Noms canadiens-français relevés dans la liste des exposants, outre ceux mentionnés ci-haut: Annette Sandoz De Bellefeuille, Madeleine Delfosse, Louise Gadbois, Arline Gendreau, Jeanne Leblanc, K. Delacourt Malcouronne, Mme Jean Raymond, Albert Rousseau, Josette Vaillancourt, Roger Viau, Henry-S. Labelle, architecte; Donald Morin; en sculpture, Mme G.-M. de Montigny-Lafontaine, Pierre Desrosiers, Robert Pelletier, Elzéar Soucy.

SPRING EXHIBITION MARKED BY VARIETY

Nearly Five Hundred Works at 56th Annual Art Association Show

PRIVATE VIEW IS HELD

Differing Schools of Artistic Thought Have Good Representation—Some Montreal
Painters Absent

There is plenty of variety in the works that compose the 56th annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal which opened in the galleries, Sherbrooke street west, with a private view to members last night. The catalogue lists 476 items, and, at that, a few of the regular Montreal exhibitors are absent.

In an exhibition of this size it cannot be pretended that all the entries are of even merit, but the occasion has given a number of the lesser-known aspirants a chance to show what they can do, and a leisurely survey of the many galleries will reveal much that is distinctly promising.

There are a number of portraits by painters known and lesser-known. Alphonse Jongers, R.C.A., shows three—Chief Justice Green-shields in academic gown; F. Ronald Graham; and Master Hugh Hallward, the latter a distinctly comely youngster in a blue shirt. Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., besides a portrait study entitled "Young Girl," has an attractive subject in Mrs. Alan B. Plaunt, of Ottawa, in a green sweater; the painter, A. Y. Jackson, against a snowy landscape with barns—the sort of scene he does so well; and a portrait of the Rt. Rev. J. C. Farthing, D.D., the former Lord Bishop of Montreal.

Lawren Harris, Jr., has a good study of character in "Amos"—a seated old man, and Paul Andrew succeeds with the seated girl called "Janet." Ernst Neumann has a good subject in Miss Beatrice Day. F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., besides a nude study, shows "The Old Carole"—old white horse drawing the sleigh, with running dog nearby, on a country road, with blue mountains in the distance. James L. Graham, A.R.C.A., in "January Thaw," shows figures, hackman's shelter, and a team in the darkening road. Hal Ross Perrigard, A.R.C.A., reveals nice tone in the old house, wayside cross and sleigh, in "Remnant of Old Days." Stanley Royle, R.B.A., A.R.C.A., shows his usual firm brushwork and drawing in his winter scenes in "Lumber Wharf, Halifax," and "Moonlight on Snow, Corfe Castle, England," and Peter C. Sheppard, A.R.C.A., expresses animation in the crowd at a Fair. W. M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., has a characteristic landscape in "The Hill Beyond."

A. Y. Jackson, among others, shows his typical bold touch and sense of design in "Great Bear Lake, Autumn," and "Spring in Algoma," and Lauren Harris handles in decorative manner "Lake Superior," and "A Lake in Labrador." Andre Bieler in "Before the Auction" shows figures gathered outside a house waiting for business to begin, and Nan Lawson Cheney has two sincere and excellently painted heads—Nikolai and Tina Semionoff, respectively. Charles F. Comfort, A.R.C.A., is more than usually grim in subject and dramatic in lighting in "Pioneer Survival," and Marc A. Fortin shows typical works done in Hochelaga, St. Simeon and St. Urbain. "Village, South of France," by Eric Goldberg, is characteristic of his delicate color, and "The Setting Sun" is the solitary exhibit by Frank Hennessey, A.R.C.A., O.S.A. H. Mabel May, A.R.C.A., reveals the decorative sense in "Old House by the Roadside," and Kathleen M. Morris, A.R.C.A., is effective with her ranks of sleighs in "Rural Quebec." Rita Mount shows her love for sunlight in "Perce Rock," and "On the Gaspé Coast," and Gordon C. Pfeiffer reveals his bold attack in "The Cabbage Patch." Quieter in spirit is the stretch of sun-lit sea, by Eric Riordon—a Gaspé scene called "Peace." "Autumn" is the offering of Anne Savage, and "Pink Fruit Dish" and "Studio Table" are from the brush of Ethel Seath. Harold Beament, A.R.C.A., shows "Ice Cutters."

Dewey Albinson, with a Quebec City address, is a new-comer of distinct talent, among his oils being "Habitant House," "Cap Diamant," and "Mountain Hill." F. O. Call reveals his sympathy for flower subjects in "Japanese Peonies," and Alberta Cleland has a pastel called "Susan." Berthe DesClayes shows typical landscapes of spring and winter, and Mrs. Lillian Hingston shows nice arrangement in "Melting Snow." Richard W. Major sees something majestic in a towering smoke stack in "Smelter at Copper Cliff, Ont.," and David McGill sounds a more poetic note in "June Evening, Chateauguay River, with the river and church seen through a screen of trees, Mrs. Sydney Pierce finds inspiration in Calla Lilies, Freda Pemberton Smith has a spirited performance in "West Wind, Choisy," Mabel Lockerby is decorative in her child with dog;

C. Anthony Law shows vigor in "Cold Winter Day," and Lorne Holland Bouchard, succeeds with her winter shore scene.

There are many good items among the watercolors. Paul Caron finds good pictorial material in the local Chinatown; Kent DeConde has winter scene done at Huberdeau; Wilfred J. Flood reveals a virile touch in "The Gatineau in March," and "Boiling the Sap, Sugar Bush"; Ruby Le Boutillier finds peonies a congenial subject, and Harry E. G. Ricketts shows "Autumn Roadside Sketch." Henry J. Simpkins, A.R.C.A., is impressive with his canal scene called "In the Locks," and does justice to a bit of noble country in the work entitled "In a Laurentian Valley." Campbell Tinning, who recently showed at the Carter Galleries, sends four characteristically vigorous works, and Thurston Topham shows "Castle in the Sky"—the Sun Life Building as seen from Victoria street at night.

La Galerie des Arts a inauguré hier soir son 56e Salon annuel du Printemps, avec deux fois plus de tableaux que l'année dernière. La variété des sujets est presque déconcertante, et les influences modernistes tiennent le haut bout. Parmi les œuvres exposées il y a: EN HAUT A GAUCHE: — Un paysage de JEAN LANGLOIS qui montre le jeune peintre en voie de se définir avec fermeté en se dégageant de certaines influences d'A.-Y. Jackson et Albert Cloutier; ce paysage est d'un coloris pur et frais. EN HAUT A DROITE: — Une statue de saint Joseph par SILVIA DAOUST, conçue dans un style très religieux, remarquable pour son élan dépouillé et par son attitude pieuse. AU CENTRE: — Une honnête ressemblance de feu Samuel Genest, buste exécuté par ALONZO CINQ-MARS. EN BAS A GAUCHE: — Un self portrait d'ERNEST NEUMANN a mis une mélancolie discrète et très expressive.

Le Salon du Printemps restera ouvert jusqu'au 2 avril. Le public est admis gratuitement à la Galerie des Arts, 1379-ouest, rue Sherbrooke, les dimanches de 2 à 5 h., les mercredis et samedi de 10 h. à 5 h. Il y a un prix modique d'admission les lundis, mardis, jeudis et vendredis, de 10 à 6 h. (Clichés la "Presse").

Evolution In Canadian Art Principal Message Of Exhibition 56th In Art Association's History

By ROBERT AYRE

I NEVER did like crowds. I might as well admit it at the outset. So to me the 56th annual Spring Exhibition of the Art Association was somewhat exhausting. When 345 pictures are all talking at once, babbling banalities, shouting vulgarities, showing off, holding forth tediously, repeating, like so many Charlie McCarthy's, what the men who pull the strings have said again and again, you long for a sanctuary. I did, anyway. I wished the Association had made provision in its new wing for a small quiet room with nothing whatever on the wall.

It was a more comfortable party last year. But even 128 guests can be too many. I like a small company, say about 20. Nevertheless, I grant you these big soirees have to be. The fault's in me for not being gregarious.

Now what I have said must not be taken as a sweeping denunciation of the 56th Spring Exhibition. In the midst of the hubbub I was able to pick out what were to me true voices. The pictures were not all vulgar and boring and silly. There was a gnarled tree from the Pacific Coast that nauseated me, there was the madonna and the monkeys, there were sentimentalities and trivialities, bad taste and bad painting, much that was well-meaning but ineffectual, but there was also some good painting. On the whole, I should say the show was much better than in former years. For one thing, it was open to some of the unacademic who have not been welcomed or who, at any rate, have not felt themselves welcome, in the past.

I shall make no attempt to go all round the walls with you, nor even to discuss the paintings that might generally be accepted as important; I shall simply indicate a few personal preferences.

For me, most of the interest centred in the small square gallery. There was Lawren Harris's calm Lake Superior, with its pure light. In it you have the Canada that is going out of fashion but that is still here and still profoundly stirring, the remote Canada without people. A step further and you have Charles Comfort's "Pioneer Survival," the same impressive forbidding Canada, with the people added. They have come into it, they have managed to dig up the tremendous roots, they have cleared a space and tacked on their shacks. Still they do not belong. The sky bears down on them, the rocks are hard, the roots they have forced out are more in the country's scale than they can ever be. More amenable to human action is the land in A. Y. Jackson's paintings, but it remains a tough land, strong in tone, vigorous in rhythm. In Anne Savage's "Autumn" it has been brought under cultivation, but the fight is still in it. A shift and you go right into the warm colored life of the folk in Andre Bieler's broad poster-like French-Canadian "Before the Auction." The country rocks in his "Wet Earth," but it is becoming individualized. Refinements are stealing in. And here is the city. Look at Louis Muhlstock's "View from a Window," and at Philip Surrey's "The Boardwalk." One brings out, with a sort of gentle nostalgia, all the warmth of crowded human habitations; the other is of the City, too, and at the same time it suggests to me an awareness of something beyond the immediate circumstance; not the underlying grim Canada, but something in the mind.

* * *

The refinements are coming in. We are quite away from the old Canada in the airy green landscapes of Paraskeva Clark, in the reticence of David Milne, in the sophistication of H. Eveleigh's portraits, in John Lyman's nude and Eric Goldberg's southern French village, in Marion Scott's stylized flowers, in Marie Davis's delicate little girl, in Prudence Heward's appealing Negro child "Clytie," in Avery Shaw's semi-abstract of a Halifax landscape.

In this one small room you pretty well run the gamut of Canada in painting. In other galleries you'll find Lillas Torrance Newton's handsome and lively portraits (I liked particularly her A. Y. Jackson and Mrs. Plaunt); Dewey Albinson's large and vigorous Quebec pieces; Allan Harrison's landscapes all of a glow and with features smoothed out; Fritz Brandtner's characteristic blue horses; Avery Shaw's collage, "Man with Accordion," a neat novelty for a Spring Show; the intimate — and shall I say frowsy? — Montreal of Jack Beder; Miller Brittain's bit of hoi polloi, "Promenade" — the Proletariat begins to make itself felt in Canadian painting; Sarah Robertson's fat farm seen between sunflowers; the decorations of Ethel Seath and Rody Kenny Courtice; Stanley Cosgrove's sensitive portrait and landscape; Cavin Atkins' clean arrangement of rooftops; Campbell Tinning's individual water colors.

These are some I remember. There are drawings and etchings not to be overlooked; there is sculpture, and there is the usual architecture section. The show continues through April 2.

The Arts Club Elects Architect as Head

Gazette—11.3.39

G. K. Crowe Assumes Presidency in Succession to Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., Montreal Painter

G. K. Crowe, architect, was elected president of The Arts Club, 2027 Victoria street, in succession to Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., painter, at the annual meeting held this week.

H. Leslie Smith was elected vice-president, and H. L. Witherow and Arthur Field were returned to office as secretary and treasurer respectively.

G. K. Crowe, A.R.I.B.A., was born at Guelph, Ont., educated at Guelph collegiate Institute, Upper Canada College, Royal Military College and the University of Toronto, graduating in architecture from the last-named institution in 1923. From 1923 till 1926 he was with York and Sawyer, of New York, — designers of the Royal Bank of Canada Building in Montreal — and spent the following year in Paris, where he continued his studies at the Atelier Georges Gromort, also studying sculpture under Felix Bénéteaux, and etching under Jacques Simon. From 1927 to 1929 he was in London with Septimus Warwick, F.R.I.B.A., formerly of Montreal, during the designing and construction of the London office of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.

Among Mr. Crowe's commissions are showroom and office buildings for the Shawinigan Water & Power Company at Shawinigan Falls, Louiseville, Thetford Mines and Valleyfield, and the High School for the Town of Mount Royal.

Lecture by Anne Savage

On Monday at 5 p.m. Miss Anne Savage, the Montreal artist, will give a lecture on "The Tree as a Motif in Painting," at the Art Gallery, Sherbrooke street west. This will be open to the public.

Young Painter of Promise

Lorne Holland Bouchard, whose oil entitled "Winter, Point St. Peter, P.Q." has evoked favorable comment at the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal, is a young painter of considerable promise. A pupil of Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, he started to exhibit when 16 years of age. He has been a steady contributor to the Spring Shows, and his work during the past few years has passed to judges of the Royal Canadian Academy. Gaspe has supplied him with many good subjects, and the canvas on view here at present was done about 18 miles from Gaspe Basin. Incidentally, Bouchard, who is assistant art director at Dennison's, Drummondville, will be 26 years of age on Sunday.

The sketches on exhibition show the company's new buildings in Ste. Anne de Bellevue and St. Johns, Que., and in Bracebridge and Gananoque, Ont. All four were designed by Hugh A. I. Valentine, of the Bell Telephone Company's architectural department.

JESSIE DOW PRIZES FOR ART AWARDED

Gazette—28.3.39

C. Anthony Law, Quebec, Wins in Oils, Goodridge Roberts, Montreal, Watercolors

Awards were made yesterday by a jury of the Art Association of Montreal of the Jessie Dow prizes for oils and watercolors, the former going to a resident of Quebec, and the latter to a Montrealer.

C. Anthony Law, of Quebec, carried off the major award with his only entry at the Spring Exhibition, now drawing to a close, entitled "Cold Winter Day, P. Q." The landscape, a distinctly meritorious piece of work, shows a Quebec farm with outbuildings, a man on a sleigh and a rounded hill in the background. It is handled in a bold, direct manner, is convincing in atmosphere and true in color, and marks the painter as a young artist of promise.

The prize for watercolor went to Goodridge Roberts for a freely handled and individual interpretation of landscape called "Gatineau Hills." The work of Mr. Roberts is well known here. He held an important exhibition in the galleries of W. Scott and Sons last autumn, and more recently showed a collection of his drawings at The Arts Club, Victoria street.

Anthony Law was born in London, England, 1916, of Canadian parents. He was self-taught until four years ago when he had a few lessons from Franklin Brownell, R.C.A., and Frank Varley, A.R.C.A. His art education also included a sketching trip with Frank Hennessey, A.R.C.A. For the last year he has been studying under Percival Tudor-Hart—who is now living in Quebec—at his studio in London, England. One picture "Contrasts" was chosen by the Royal Canadian Academy last autumn and is now touring Canada on exhibition. He has one work in Quebec Museum.

Goodridge Roberts, son of Theodore Goodridge Roberts, the Canadian writer and poet, was born in Barbados, B.W.I. He studied at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Montreal, 1925-26; at the Art Students League, New York, 1927-28; and, under a Carnegie grant, was Resident Artist, at Queen's University, Kingston, 1933-36. He has since resided in Montreal, where he is one of the principals of the Roberts-Neumann School of Art.

The Jessie Dow prizes for landscape are a money award.

Sunday Marks Close Of Spring Exhibition

Gazette—1.4.39

Over 10,000 Attended 56th Annual Show on Three Sunday Afternoons

On Sunday the 56th Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal will close, after a period that has witnessed some of the largest attendances in recent years.

As was inevitable, in view of its size and the uneven quality of some of the work shown, the exhibition has not escaped criticism—but then the Association wasn't exactly praised when, a few springs ago, it applied the axe to a terrific number of entries, reduced the size of the exhibition, raised the standard, and blighted the hopes of a lot of aspiring artists!

The Spring Exhibition at the moment—barring those able to successfully undertake "one man" shows—is the only opportunity for display that presents itself to the younger element feeling its way. It was regrettable that some of the seasoned painters, for various reasons, did not contribute. Their presence would have raised the level and served as a valuable example to many who look to them for guidance.

Certainly the jury of selection showed an open mind in admitting 476 works, and to expect all the contributions to be pure gold is craving for a miracle. It did not result in a show to be remembered by reason of its outstanding quality, but it is futile to pretend that the spirit of free-for-all kept people away—the last three Sundays showing respective attendances of 4,300, 2,500 and 3,600. It is questionable if ever before those galleries on three afternoons saw an attendance of over 10,000.

From the walls "Lake Superior," by Lawren Harris, and "Lumber Wharf, Halifax, N.S.," by Stanley Royle, R.B.A., A.R.C.A., went into the permanent collection of the Association, and encouragement was shown to two young painters when the Jessie Dow Prize for landscape went to C. Anthony Law, of Quebec, for his oil "Cold Winter Day, P.Q."—shown on this page—and to Goodridge Roberts, of Montreal, for "Gatineau Hills," a watercolor too subtle for successful reproduction.

The next activity will be, later next week, an exhibition of work by students of Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., Lillas Torrance Newton, R.C.A., and Will Ogilvie, who are in charge of the Art Association schools.

PICTURES FROM BRITAIN Montrealer, 1.3.39

An exhibition of paintings by Contemporary British Artists is on view at W. Scott & Sons' until April 12th. It is the last one scheduled by this gallery, which will, to the deep regret of the art-loving public, soon close its doors. Backing on a large scale the work of J. W. Morrice and that of pre-eminent modern European painters and sponsoring most of the best Canadian artists, it has played in recent years an important educational role.

Its present attraction is the smallest and the best exhibition of British painting Montreal has seen. British is a pretty elastic qualification according to its context, but in this case no one will mistake that it means painters hailing from the Isles, though one at least was born down under.

The meeting is presided over by the good old dean of English painters, Sickert, whose portrait of Fred Winter, first secretary of the New English Society, though it clearly belongs to the period between Whistler and the present century, is definitely Sickert and no one else. Matthew Smith is present in a landscape of Aix-en-Provence with his summary breadth and brio and sumptuous colour. There are three members of the Scottish modern group who often exhibited together: Fergusson, whose Mosque is delicately massed in luminous blond tones within a circular movement of foliage, while Craig Coinach is built robust and bright; Peploe, whose pale Iona was seen in the nineteenth-century landscape exhibition; Leslie Hunter, whose Still Life and Largo are typical of the work we saw to better advantage in the last British show. This time, instead of gouaches by Frances Hodgkins, we have two oils in which her fantasy is somewhat muffled. Ivon Hitchens's Path to the Sea in a tasteful gray-green key comes within the orbit of Bonnard and Vuillard. Duncan Grant seems to have lost his earlier distinction and his landscape and flowers displease by vulgarity of colour, while his spiritual mate, Vanessa Bell, holds her own in Flowers by the Lamp. Mark Gertler, who has tried everything, has a formalized Still Life and naturalistic Chrysanthemums. E. le Bas dogs the footsteps of the Impressionists. Ethel Walker's portrait of Elsa Lanchester and Summer Flowers are vivacious but not vigorous. Winifred Nicholson contributes mildly decorative flowers, the two Steggle's purified scenes of town and country, Elwin Hawthorne a stronger landscape in the same vein of simplification and reticence, Lady Patricia Ramsay a fuzzy landscape and John Armstrong two decorations, Green Glade and Funeral of a Lady, bred of Etruscan, Egyptian and cave-dweller wall paintings.

Who has what in the shops

IT sounds absurd doesn't it! . . . but at one time or another, we expect you have had a bath in water so soft that it felt like liquid satin against your skin. You find it sometimes in the depth of the country, but seldom, alas! in a big city. In order to remind you of this rarely experienced luxury, plus the delicate fragrance of Spring Flowers, we suggest you add a little Bath Satin to your daily tub. Soap and water dry the natural oils in the skin, leaving it harsh and rough; that is why one's bath should contain oil in order to preserve the delicate texture of the skin.

Should you desire a trial size of this delightful bath oil, write to Bath Satin Reg'd, 1434 St. Catherine Street W., stating which one of the following perfumes you prefer: Rose Geranium, Wood Violet, Lemon Verbena, Northern Pine, Mimosa and Gardenia. This gift is available only during April. Bath Satin is obtainable at leading Departmental Stores and Chemists. 45c to $2.75.

- When you feel a yen for something new about the house and would shop for it in surroundings at once leisurely and stimulating, then the time is ripe for a visit to Louis Mulligan's. Lamps are the specialty here, but other bright ideas abound. Just for instance, a blue and white Persian bowl with its teakwood stand painted red the more brilliant to make the blue appear. Incidentally, Mr. Mulligan is an interior decorator par excellence—which is something to bear in mind at this season. 1498 Drummond St. (in the Mitchell-Holland Building). L.A. 2034.
- If you are yet to be convinced of the charms of patterned wallpaper you have only to see what's being shown at Empire Wallpapers Limited,

ART

By JOHN LYMAN

THE SPRING ANNUAL

TO characterize in a word this year's Spring Exhibition, while it is decidedly better than any in the past, would take a James Joyce with the gift of fusing into one all the restrictive and private syllables of the language. It is a sort of bazaar "Au Petit Bonheur." Let us not mince words: there is a great deal more good painting than ever before, but the system of selection and hanging is a flop. There is a good deal of work beneath gallery par and a quantity of mediocre work seems to have been admitted with less question than that of higher quality. In many cases only two, one or none of the pictures submitted by generally considered outstanding painters were accepted. The jury may have had their reasons, with which one might have concurred in other circumstances, but certainly not in conjunction with the admission of pictures of indifferent quality to the number of three or four per exhibitor. Apparently, on the just tolerable product the jury was able to see eye to eye, but when it came to the upper levels, restrictions began to operate.

The jury for painting this year was a fifty-five one, divided between what are euphemistically termed conservatives and progressives. The alternative system of an exhibition in two sections, each with its own jury, has been adopted by a number of institutions, though the occasion for it is by no means general because (a) in important art centres the two classes of artists have each their own salons—generally in Europe (at least in pre-Nazi days) and in New York, where there is the National Academy show for the conservatives, the Armory show, the Whitney and many others for the moderns—and (b), except for the academies' own private affairs, there are hardly any exhibitions to-day that do not function in the interests of living art without concessions to restrictive views. I happened to notice, for instance, just lately the personnel of the jury appointed for the famous Annual of the Pennsylvania Academy, one of the most dignified and conservative galleries in the country. The chairman was Franklin Watkins, rated as an egregious modernist, and not an academic name was on the list. Where this unity of purpose is not definitely admitted, it is hard to see how both tendencies can be satisfactorily reconciled. The toleration required of a jury, half of which would normally profess one set of standards and half a contradictory set, is apt to work out in blind shuffles. Logically, such a body should about cancel itself out. Practically it is animated by a spirit of compromise, one side trying to lend itself to the other's point of view which it does not properly comprehend.

The hanging of the exhibition is as indeterminate as its selection. There seems to have been some intention of making a sort of Salon Carré of modern painting of the small square gallery in the new wing, but it was not consistently carried out.

The painting as a whole is very encouraging in comparison to the annuals of the past. There is plenty of life, heartiness and enterprise, but perhaps not enough meditation on the mysteries of truth and the complexities of the artistic problem. It is not mostly the artists' fault, for the difficulties resulting from lack of material encouragement are not conducive to the necessary state of mind. There is too much hitting the observer in the eye, and not enough of the subtle taking possession that makes art enduring. If art should hit you anywhere, Chester Dale, the New York collector, explains when he shows his pictures to his friends from the fire-station in his street, it should hit you in the middle. We strain too much after manners and systems and not enough after what we truly feel. Painting thus tends to become more a demonstration than a realization, more an assumption of postures than reliance on the attraction of personality. At the risk of passing for refined, I must say I prefer authentic style, even if not terribly robust, to that which Saroyan calls "simple, fake, colourful, false, vigorous and spurious."

There are always people who want to paint at the top of their voice, and in this, as in all such exhibitions, the better artists are shouted down by the vociferous. Many a good picture is damaged by promiscuous hanging. Salons are in many ways necessarily an evil. If they give beginners a chance to measure themselves, they also incite them to resort to insincere and rhetorical devices. They prevail on many artists, who know well the best pictures do not look the best in these bazaars, to paint in an unnatural way in order to force an effect. Are they really a necessary evil? Perhaps the same ground could be covered to better advantage by a series of small shows of congenial groups. It would be a worthy enterprise to try it.

Lack of space makes it necessary to reserve until the next issue further comment on the Spring Exhibition. It may be summed up by saying it leaves reasons for delight and regret, for a really excellent show could have been made with the available material.

formed, and in 1913, on graduation from McGill, Frank Heaton's son, John, became associated with the firm, though his active connection was broken by the Great War, when he went overseas as a lieutenant in the 24th Battalion, under Lieut.-Col. John A. Gunn. Back in Canada in 1919, John Heaton resumed his connection, and has been in charge since his father ceased active participation in 1927, due to indifferent health.

It was in 1930, following the trend of commerce uptown, that W. Scott & Sons moved from Notre Dame street, to the galleries on Drummond street, which they occupied until May, 1938. The closing here, when the property was purchased, was followed by a two-day auction sale of the firm's pictures in April of that year at the Windsor Hotel. In September, 1938, the firm entered the premises at 1316 Sherbrooke street west, purchased at the time a move uptown was indicated, and has held a series of exhibitions here ever since.

Dealing in fine pictures has presented problems in recent years. The group of picture-lovers who had the means to gratify their tastes have, in the main, passed on. The Ross and Drummond collections have been dispersed, as was that of the late Dr. Gardiner. The Van Horne collection, among others, remains intact, but the spirit of acquisition on the grand scale no longer exists. The market crash of 1929, too, aggravated the situation. From the earliest days, the Scott Galleries on Notre Dame street held a series of annual exhibitions that were noteworthy.

Looking over notes of 30 years ago reveals that in October, 1909 the first important one-man show of work by Lavery, now Sir John, was held here. Then were shown small portraits, scenes about Tangiers and in various parts of France, compositions that hinted at the Whistler influence, and "Mary in Green"—a seated girl dressed in dark green, a pearl grey scarf supplying the relief—which went to the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, for $3,500.

In December there were paintings from the French Gallery, London, brought here by W. L. Peacock—Dutch scenes and works by Jacques Lhermitte and other continental men. Indicative of the taste of the time, was a painting by Landseer of a fox terrier tentatively toying with a hedgehog. That year Harry Wallis, of the French Galleries, paid a visit, sailing for England by the Lusitania shortly before Christmas. Mr. Peacock died soon after the Great War, and annually from then on Mr. Wallis accompanied the collections to this country. These annual exhibitions of paintings from the French Gallery started in 1892.

At the end of that year, too, it is recorded that "The Four Mills" and "Feeding Chickens," two important examples by Matthew Maris, had found homes here. Also that the late Robert Meighen had acquired portraits of the Misses Hoppner by John Hoppner, R.A., when $28,000 was said to have changed hands.

Early in 1910, the English painter Sir Alfred East was in the city, on his way back from Pittsburgh where his work was exhibited, and about this time a collection of his watercolors was shown at Scott's.

In February, 1912, there was a show of work by Walter Greaves, an associate of Whistler in his Chelsea days, who had been "discovered" in London, and in October there was a large show of work by Suzor-Cote.

Down the intervening years there were a series of meritorious exhibitions—J. W. Morrice, Sir D. Y. Cameron, whose paintings included the impressive "Shadows of Chon," shown in the loan collection which was held in the new wing of the Art Association of Montreal last month; LeSider, Brangwyn, Lhermitte, F. W. Hutchinson; watercolors that included examples by Clausen, Martin Hardie, W. P. Robins, David Muirhead, Sir C. J. Holmes, D. S. McColl, Hester Frood, Sir David Y. Cameron, Henry Rushbury, James McBey, and Muirhead Bone, since knighted.

If memory does not err, this gallery also sponsored the exhibition of Holman Hunt's religious picture, "The Light of the World," which drew thousands to the lower hall of the Fraser Institute.

On moving to Drummond street, the firm in 1934 started a series of annual exhibitions of French masters of the 19th and 20th centuries, in conjunction with Alex. Reid and Lefevre, of London, England. Here were displayed examples by the Impressionists and Post-Impressionists, with, in 1936, a show of work by the men of the School of Paris.

Adrien Hebert Holds Charcoal Work Show

Gazette — 18.3.39
Montreal Artist is Partial to Historic Spots in Collection at Art Association

Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., of Montreal, long ago decided that charcoal was a sympathetic medium, and among the examples of his work in black and white on view in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal, he includes works done in pen and ink. These latter are handled in a bold, free manner, with, in the main, an absence of niggling unessential detail.

Hebert loves the old spots, but is also keenly alive to the pictorial possibilities of the modern—grain elevators on the harbor front can hardly be classed as poetic in spirit—and conscientiously is becoming the recorder of "bits" that any day may go by fire or "improvements."

Bonsecours Market and the Church of Notre Dame de Bonsecours, as seen from St. Paul street, make a fine sketch, done with admirable economy of line. The market, too, comes into a nocturne called "When Day Is Done," with two unsteady celebrants outside a hotel. The Chateau de Ramezay, with the dome of the market and grain elevators beyond, makes an interesting composition, as seen from the City Hall. In the neighborhood, too, are the buildings on the west side of Jacques Cartier Square—the subject of an oil recently acquired by the Art Association for its permanent collection—and the house of Pierre du Calvet, almost opposite Bonsecours Church. The chapel of the Hotel Dieu is among the examples in pen and ink.

Of harbor subjects, there are scenes on ships being loaded, men at the winches under a flare, the Duchess of Atholl putting out from her pier in a sudden squall that whips the water into waves and rocks the busy tugs attending her. Grain elevator No. 3 at Hochelaga makes an impressive composition, and of a distinctly older day is the first house of the Sisters of the Congregation of Notre Dame—1698—in Point St. Charles. The spire of the Grey Nunnery has attracted Hebert's attention, as has the church at Sault aux Reclots. The presbytery at Caughnawaga furnished a good subject, and the churches at St. Eustache and at Ste. Rose have not been overlooked. About Ste. Rose, where Hebert has a studio, he has found much effective material in which noble trees play an important part. Fort Lennox, at Ile-aux-Noix on the Richelieu River, is a sound impression of a decaying old-time military work of importance, while at Ste. Therese the old Monk Mill still looks solid at the edge of the Riviere au Chiens.

About Quebec, Hebert has done justice to the Chapel of the Seminary; the church at Ste. Famille on the Isle of Orleans; a bit of Quebec as seen from Dufferin Terrace; and picturesque roofs under the rain.

The collection also includes drawings of the birthplace of men famous in Canadian history—the home of Cardinal Taschereau at Ste. Marie de Beauce; Laurier's early home at St. Lin; the house of Louis Frechette at Levis; of Sir Joseph Adolphe Chapleau, at Ste. Therese de Blainville; of Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, at St. Antoine sur Richelieu; of Mgr. Edouard Charles Fabre, in the row of old buildings adjoining the Sauvegarde Building, opposite the old Court House in Montreal, and the home of Hebert's father, the late Philippe Hebert, C.M.G., R.C.A., sculptor and creator of the Maisonneuve monument on Place d'Armes, at Ste. Sophie d'Halifax, in Megantic County. This log cabin, with its fringe of poplars, was built by the grandfather of the painter who was a settler and cleared his own land. It is still standing, but reported to be getting a bit feeble.

There is one charcoal portrait, that of E. Z. Massicotte, archivist of Montreal, whose knowledge has proved invaluable to Hebert when on the hunt for the authentically historic.

Two Shows Opening At Art Association

Gazette — 15.4.39
Work by Former Beaux Arts Students and Examples of Theatre Art on View

Today will see the opening of two exhibitions in the new galleries of the Art Association of Montreal—two being devoted to Theatre Art, and a third to a display of paintings by former students of the Ecole des Beaux Arts of Montreal.

Two galleries are closely hung with contemporary stage and costume designs, the items, totalling nearly three hundred, being shown here by courtesy of the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

The countries represented are Great Britain, France, Russia, Hungary, Austria, Poland, Denmark and Latvia, the catalogue containing brief but competent surveys of theatre art in England by James Laver, of the Victoria and Albert Museum; of France, Russia and Hungary by Simon Lissim; of Austria by Professor Joseph Gregor, and of Poland by Dr. Mieczyslaw Treter.

W. Scott & Sons Leaving Business As Art Dealers in Firm's 80th Year

Many Masterpieces Handled in Long History — Enjoyed Clientele of Picture-lovers Who Built Up Collection That Made Montreal Envid

Gazette

By ST. GEORGE BURGONYNE.

Early in May the firm of W. Scott & Sons, Sherbrooke street west, is giving up business in the 80th year of its existence. The current show of gouaches by Jean Lurcat, lasting for a fortnight, will be succeeded by a display of contemporary British paintings. This, the last exhibition to be held by the firm, will be on view three weeks.

The passing from the business scene of W. Scott & Sons means the removal of what to the art world has been an institution. In its long history as dealers in fine pictures, many masterpieces have passed through these galleries into private collections in Montreal—collections that were the envy of other Canadian cities. With few exceptions many of these collections, due to various causes, have been dispersed.

The firm was founded in 1859 by the late William Scott and for many years the galleries at 99 Notre Dame street west were the gathering place of picture-lovers, both those who went to admire and those whose aim was to acquire the best that came from the studios of the United Kingdom and Europe. Frank Robert Heaton, the present senior member of the firm, came from Yorkshire, England, in 1887, and associated himself with W. Scott & Sons, William Scott then having Walter A. Scott as a partner. Mr. Heaton later became a partner, his associate being his brother, the late William Heaton. Frank R. Heaton, in 1891, married Anna Scott, daughter of William Scott.

With his brother, Mr. Heaton carried on the business in the palmy days when the important private collections in Montreal were being

Art Association of Montreal Adds to Canadian Collection

Acquires Halifax Scene By Stanley Royle, A.R.C.A., and Characteristic Example By Lawren Harris So Active in Original Group of Seven

Gazette 18.3.39

By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE.

This week the Art Association of Montreal strengthened the Canadian section of its permanent collection by the purchase of paintings by Stanley Royle, A.R.C.A., of Sackville, N.B., and by Lawren Harris, who was such an energetic figure in the original Group of Seven, when those Toronto painters were fighting for recognition and the critics were scanning dictionaries for harsh words of censure. For those with advanced leanings and a taste for the abstract in art, the acquisition of the Harris prompts cheers, but, whether or not one's tastes lie in that direction, it is clear to the open-minded that the Association's action, though tardy, merits approval.

Considering the abusive fuss made over this Group—and it was considerable—it was certainly due to present day Montrealers interested in art that they should have a chance to see what it was that caused all the rumpus. Not that the Harris of the purchase is a fair standard for all of the Seven. Each of them seemed to possess some individual viewpoint or technique that set the critics raging and made the more sedate type of picture-lover foam at the mouth. This did not kill the movement, and it must be frankly confessed that some of the paintings, once most abused, now look as orthodox as do many by the French Impressionists that in their day caused a tremendous stir. This Toronto movement made Art history in Canada, and examples by the Group have earned a place in any art gallery that pretends to educate by displaying what is going on in painting.

"Lake Superior," by Lawren Harris, is a piece of effective pattern, but it can hardly be called distinguished in color. It is simple in its pictorial elements, and looked at hurriedly might well suggest a stretch of water backed by snow-clad hills—but the suspended, moulded mass is a bank of clouds! Recalling his work called "The Corner Store," or, of a later day, "Country North of Lake Superior," it is clear that Harris is moving—and those sympathetic will undoubtedly read some great message into "Lake Superior."

Royle's "Lumber Wharf, Halifax, N.S." is a sincere effort to capture the effect of winter sunlight. Lost in reproduction are the subtleties of the partly shadowed planks on the wharf in the foreground, where a streak of sunlight glows on the woodpile. The masts of the fishing boat, and the snow-covered point and lighthouse across the water gleam in the sun. The tones of the weathered buildings and the movement of the water are well suggested.

Stanley Royle, R.B.A., A.R.W.A., A.R.C.A., Director of Art at Mount Allison University, Sackville, N.B., was born in Lancashire, England. He received his early art training at the Sheffield College of Art, where he won the King's Prize and the silver medal. He had three pictures accepted by the Royal Academy while still a student.

He painted for some years outside Leeds, made many sketching trips and became known for his snow scenes and old English villages. In 1920 he was elected a member of the Royal Society of British Artists, and in 1927 became an Associate of the Royal West of England Academy.

Royle came to Canada in December, 1930, as painting master at the School of Art in Halifax and returned to England in 1933. The following year he was appointed director of the Owens Art Museum and College of Art, professor of drawing and painting and lecturer in art at Mount Allison University, Sackville, N.B., a post he now holds.

In 1937 Royle was elected an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy.

His paintings are in the permanent collections of the galleries of Bristol, Blackpool, Oldham, Derby, Newcastle and Sheffield. His art is also represented in the Nova Scotia Museum of Fine Arts. A painting of Peggy's Cove, N.S., was his contribution to the Century of Canadian Art exhibition held in the Tate Gallery, London, late last autumn.

Four More Paintings For National Gallery

Works By Rembrandt, Lorrain, Bellini and Turner Hung at Ottawa

Gazette—1.4.39

Ottawa, March 31. — (P) — Four newly-acquired paintings by old masters were hung today at the National Art Gallery here adding works by Dutch, English, French and Italian artists to the extensive collection already owned by the gallery.

Bought from English and American galleries, the pictures include a portrait by Rembrandt (1606-1660); a landscape by Claude Lorrain, known as Lorrain (1600-1682); a seascape by J. M. W. Turner (1775-1851), and a religious portrait of Christ by Giovanni Bellini (1430-1516).

"Self-portrait," the first painting by Rembrandt to hang in the gallery is the most notable addition made so far to the Dutch 17th century school.

"Head of Christ," is the second work of Bellini, a Venetian painter, to join the Ottawa collection and shows Christ in the "act of blessing," with a spiritual quality portrayed in the simplicity of the artist's colors.

A classical landscape of river and hills under a setting sun by the French artist Lorrain, is "The Temple of Bacchus, Evening."

Turner's "Pilot Hailing a Whistle Hov," is an impressive sea scene. Originally belonging to the famous Turner collection made by the artist's friend and patron, Fred H. Hawkes at Farnley Hall, England, it was later acquired for the late J. Horace Harding's collection in New York.

TWO WORKS ADDED TO ART COLLECTION

Gazette 13.4.39
Association Acquires 'View of Perth' by Pilot, Portrait by Sickert

Two more paintings were added to the permanent collection of the Art Association of Montreal yesterday with the acquisition of "A View of Perth, Ont." by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., of Montreal, and a portrait of Fred Winter by the eminent English painter Walter Richard Sickert.

The Pilot canvas is a winter scene, showing buildings on rising ground, a poplar-lined bank with sodden ice and a bit of open water. Painted in a moderately low tone, it is a work of subtle and harmonious values. This painting was in the annual Pilot exhibition, held in the Watson Art Galleries, Sherbrooke street west, in 1936, and recently returned to Montreal after being an item in a collection travelling Canada.

The work by Sickert, who is highly regarded as a painter of distinction and individuality, is a work low in tone and marked by confident brush work. Fred Winter, the subject of the canvas, was the first secretary of the English Art Club whose members, chafing a trifle under the firmly fixed academic conventions, stepped out for themselves and explored new avenues in painting. Winter was also a sculptor. Sickert is represented in the important galleries of the United Kingdom and abroad. This portrait head came from the exhibition of Contemporary British Art held in the galleries of W. Scott & Sons, Sherbrooke street west.

AWARDED JESSIE DOW PRIZE FOR LANDSCAPE IN OILS

Gazette - 1.4.39

COLD WINTER DAY, P.Q., by C. Anthony Law, of Quebec, is a vigorously painted interpretation of rural Quebec and a distinctly creditable performance by a young Canadian artist. The forms are broadly handled, the design effective and the color crisp and clean. This work shown at the Spring Exhibition of the Art Association of Montreal was awarded the Jessie Dow Prize for landscape in oils. Law, whose marked natural talent was developed by personal determination and industry, has in the last few years benefited by some spasmodic professional training. At the exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy, held in Toronto last autumn, he was represented by "Contrast, Riviere du Loup, P.Q."

Plans Are Being Made For Future Exhibits

Loan Show of Modern European Art Due—Summer Display by Montrealeers

Plans are being made for some interesting exhibitions in the near future. The Contemporary Art Society of Montreal, the recently-formed body with John Lyman as its president, will, with the assistance of the Art Association of Montreal, arrange a loan exhibition of Modern European Art. This will probably excite and interest a large number of the younger students who profess to understand and admire the advanced in paintings.

Very shortly, Ernst Neumann, of Montreal, who last November delivered lectures on Degas, Renoir, and Van Gogh to members of the Association, is to hold an exhibition of his prints.

In June, July and August an exhibition is to be held of work by Montreal artists, with the express purpose of showing tourists what the local studios can produce.

It has long been recognized that visitors from the United States and elsewhere are primarily interested in what the native painters are doing. While the local association undoubtedly possesses a few treasures that are the envy of other galleries, it has been clear that the artistically-inclined tourist, coming from centres where the pinch of funds for important purchases is not felt, is not so interested in the miscellaneous items as in the art of the country. For years it was a case here of picking out the odd Brm-ner, Cullen, Horne Russell, and Morrice—though the last-named is now generously and worthily represented—and the general showing was not impressive.

The present project of visiting the local studios and making a selection of typical and meritorious works is to be highly commended. It was rather long in coming, but action is promised at last, and it is certain to give a large measure of encouragement to Montreal painters.

In conjunction with this show, an exhibition of French-Canadian furniture may be held.

Students' Show Nears End

Tomorrow afternoon—the regular free Sunday afternoon—will mark the closing of the exhibition of work by students of the Art Association school, under Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., and Will Ogilvie. This show has proved of general interest, a few short of one thousand being the attendance last Sunday.

A VIEW OF PERTH, ONT., by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., is a work of moderately low tones and subtle values. The atmosphere suggests a day of thaw, the only high notes in the painting being the brick buildings grouped about the church. The distant and nearby trees are competently handled, the fences add much to the composition, and the reflections on the flooded ice in the foreground are capably suggested. This canvas, shown by Pilot in his annual show at the Watson Art Galleries, 1434 Sherbrooke street west, in 1936, is the first example by this artist to be acquired by the local Art Association.

National Gallery Star 6.4.39 Director Dies

Eric Brown
Contributed Greatly
To Canadian Art

OTTAWA, April 6.—(C.P.)—Eric Brown, director of the National Gallery here since 1913, died today after a week's illness. A leader in encouragement of Canadian art, he was largely responsible for the wide development of the Gallery in the years he was associated with it.

A native of Nottingham, Eng., Mr. Brown studied there and came to Canada in 1909 associating himself at first with the Montreal Art Association and then the Toronto Art Gallery. He was appointed curator of the National Gallery in 1910 and became director three years later.

Mr. Brown was well known in art circles in England and returned to his native land for a visit last year when he took more than five tons of Canadian paintings to London for an exhibition in the famous Tate Galleries from a number selected from the large collection of Canadian galleries as well as of the National Gallery here.

PROLIFIC WRITER

A prolific writer on art subjects for newspapers and magazines, Mr. Brown also delivered many lectures. Writing was one of his hobbies, and he was also fond of walking and camping.

Mr. Brown's fine contribution to Canada in the development and dissemination of Canadian art has been heralded as a unique example of individual effort and achievement along a high plane.

His career was marked by a fine sense of devotion to all that was true and fine in the world of art. An accomplished artist in his own right and a member of a famous artistic English family, he might have developed his native gift as a painter.

Instead he chose the comparative anonymity of a career devoted to awakening in others an appreciation and love for beauty and perpetuating the achievements of the masters. It is considered the part he played in the reorganization and development of the National Gallery of Canada will continue to affect the growth of Canadian art for many years.

STUDIED IN ENGLAND

Mr. Brown was the son of the late John Henry Brown and Mary Wardle and was educated at the Nottingham High School, later studying art in England under a number of masters, including his brother, Arnesby Brown, R.A., celebrated landscape painter.

He married Florence Maud Sturton, of Holbeach, Lincolnshire, who throughout his career took an active interest in Mr. Brown's work, lecturing with him throughout the Dominion and assisting him in spreading the Canadian art movement.

Eric Brown

Director of the National Art Gallery in Ottawa, who died this morning.

DEVELOPED GALLERY

The period of Mr. Brown's connection with the National Gallery coincides with the period of its greatest growth and development. Under his direction it emerged from its comparative obscurity and became a real and vital force in Canadian intellectual thought. Since 1913 the Gallery's collections have become widely known, and they now include many famous and internationally known works, representing not only the work of the masters of other centuries, but of the leading European contemporaries of the day.

His high ability was recognized on many occasions. He was elected president of the Association of Art Museum Directors of America in 1923. He was vice-president of the Museums Association of Great Britain in 1933 and was made an honorary member of the Royal Scottish Society of painters in water colors in 1934.

On behalf of the National Gallery he lectured in practically every city in Canada and also in Great Britain and the United States. His articles in newspapers and magazines in Canada, United States and Great Britain, invariably on subjects pertaining to Canadian art were numerous.

Chairman Pays Brown Tribute

H. S. Southam, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the National Gallery paid this tribute to Eric Brown:

"Eric Brown's contribution to the cultural development of Canada during the 27 odd years that he has been director of the National Gallery has been both distinguished and invaluable. The National collection, which now ranks favorably with most other public museums of this continent, will, for the director, continue down the years to be an appropriate and lasting monument.

"It can be truthfully said that Eric Brown gave himself without reservation to his work as director, a position for which he had exceptional and varied qualifications. He was a man of broad culture and fine ideals, and was not only a wise, patient and discerning critic as a result of his training and experience, but what is perhaps of equal importance, one who was willing and indeed happy to seek and accept helpful advice from other directors and connoisseurs.

"His passing will be a great loss to the country and it will be difficult in the extreme to find a successor to him as director of equal competence and consecration.

"In behalf of the trustees of the National Gallery I desire to pay this modest tribute to the director and to extend to Mrs. Brown our deep sympathy in her loss."

NATIONAL GALLERY DIRECTOR IS DEAD

Eric Brown Held Important Art Post at Ottawa 27 Years

Gazette 7.4.39

Ottawa, April 6.—(C.P.)—Eric Brown, director of the National Gallery of Canada here and a man to whose encouragement much of the individuality that characterizes modern art in Canada owes its expression, died here today.

The direction he gave to painting in Canada was not always approved, and he frequently was the centre of storms which develop in a field that, in some of its aspects, is at times peculiarly controversial.

Mr. Brown, however, did not permit disputes to disturb the even tenor of his way. He regarded his big jobs to be those of stimulating Canadian artists to find the best medium of their own self-expression and to build up the National Gallery collection to a standard consonant with the cultural accomplishments of the country.

Director of the National Gallery for 27 years, he labored diligently to foster among his fellows a love of art. That he did not confine himself to abstractions is manifest by the practical efforts he put forward to develop the policy of loaning collections to cities sufficiently interested to house them properly and to exhibit them.

He was successful in placing in the hands of school children reproductions of some of the most cherished items of the National collection. By arranging for lectures throughout Canada, he continued to appeal to an ever-widening constituency of art lovers.

A member of a well-known English family, with generations of association with art, he came to Canada 30 years ago. For a year he was connected with the Art Association of Montreal and The Art Gallery of Toronto. In 1910 he was appointed Curator of the National Gallery and two years later was advanced to the office of Director.

Canada to Send Exhibit of Art To World's Fair in New York

First Collection Being Assembled by Royal Canadian Academy—Three Others to Follow —Shows Are to be on View Six Weeks

Gazette By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE. 1.4.39

Canada is going to show her art at the New York World's Fair, the assembling of the collection now being undertaken by the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts. The Government, having decided that space in the Canadian section should be given to Canadian paintings, notified the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, of its intentions, and Sir Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A., was apprised and the matter was taken in hand by E. Dyonnet, R.C.A., of Montreal, secretary Royal Canadian Academy. Committees were formed in Montreal and Toronto for the selection of the works, which, since available space is not large, will total 70.

There are to be four shows, each to remain on view six weeks. The first will be that selected by the R.C.A., and every effort is being made to send a worthy and representative collection to New York.

The other shows will be those of the Water Color Society, the Canadian Group of Painters, and of the Sculptors' Society which, presumably, will be assembled and judged by their own individual committees.

This will be the second occasion within a few months that Canada has shown her art outside the Dominion, the other instance being the Century of Canadian Art exhibition held in The Tate Gallery, London, which attracted much attention.

Information has just been released that France in her Pavilion at the World's Fair is to have an Exposition of Fine Arts. According to the announcement given to the press, the exhibit will be so well rounded and each contribution so perfect in its own style that visitors to the Fair will be shown a complete picture of the position held by France in the artistic world of today.

A committee of judges was selected from among the most eminent art critics and almost all the curators of the museums of modern art in Paris. To choose what was most representative of modern French thought, most indicative of modern French trends, and what would best express in America the perfection which French artists of today have attained, was a difficult task.

No limitations were set as to the art forms to be exhibited, and all are to be represented. Painting, sculpture, lacquer work, decorative arts, jewellery, even embroidery and sewing are to be included.

One section is devoted to Interior Decoration. The antique rooms hold all that the French have come to accept as best in period furnishings, while the modern sections are said to be an inspiration of color harmonies and inventive combinations of materials and forms.

Prizes Are Awarded Art Class Students

Closing Marked by Presentations and Tea — Work Showing at Art Gallery

Gazette 8.4.39

Work done in various media by students of the Art School of the Art Association of Montreal is displayed in the Lecture Hall and makes an impressive showing. There is plenty of evidence that the training under Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., and Lilius Torrance Newton, R.C.A., is serious and that the aspiring artists are being soundly grounded. Naturally the quality of the work varies, but it is clear that the exhibitors had "to make the grade" to get in. Distinctly interesting and promising is the group of works by students in the Commercial Art section, directed by Will Ogilvie. The designs deal with familiarly known commodities, and publicists would not be wasting their time in making a survey of this collection.

Opening of the exhibition of students' work was marked by a tea and prize-giving, when, in the absence of Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the Art Association, the prizes were presented by Dr. J. W. A. Hickson, vice-president. The awards included scholarships, cash prizes, and honorable mentions, accompanied by handsome art books presented by Miss Jane Fleet.

Prizes were awarded as follows: Robert Reford Prize, a cash prize for the best painting, went to Mrs. C. Ley, her subject being a nude girl.

William Brymner Prize, a cash prize for Life Class, went to Miss Renee Papineau.

Robert Wood Scholarship went to Miss Maud Lucas.

Kenneth MacPherson Prize, a cash prize for Commercial Art, was awarded to Miss Betty Dawson.

First prize in the Antique Class went to Miss H. M. Sharpe.

Honorable mention in the Commercial Art Class was accorded to Miss Percival Mackenzie.

Honorable mention in the Painting Class went to Mrs. B. Asselin, the second honorable mention being given to Miss Lois Cameron.

Honorable mention in the Drawing Class went to Harry Ross.

Prize in the Quick Sketch Class was awarded to Miss C. Napier-Smith.

The classes are continuing until the end of April and will reopen about October 1.

The guests at the exhibition included Huntly Drummond, Mrs. Arthur Drummond, Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., and Mrs. Gagnon, Professor A. H. S. Gillson, Dr. and Mrs. F. M. G. Johnston, Mr. Molson, Mr. and Mrs. R. Hunter, Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Pierce, Mrs. G. R. Westcott Papineau, Miss Jane Fleet, Mme. E. Gaddois, Mrs. J. H. Gaudion, Mrs. W. G. Turner, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. INAUGURAL EXHIBITION

THE new wing of The Art Association was baptized on the 13th of February with a Loan Exhibition of Nineteenth Century Landscape Paintings. His Excellency Lord Tweedsmuir, Governor-General of Canada, officiating. In his address His Excellency told his audience. "... You have a great subject for your landscape painters, an inexhaustible subject, which invites, which, indeed, demands, new methods of presentation. I believe there is a great future for Canadian landscape painting." Let us hope His Excellency's words will be realized, and their spirit inspire the imagination of those who respond to the infinite variety of subjects this age and land provide. The other requisite for their realization is that the exponents of new methods of presentation be given enough material support to enable them to pursue their vocation.

The new addition provides greatly increased opportunities for the activities of The Art Association. In the Museum section its benefits are most striking. One would scarcely think this is the same collection that was crammed into its former quarters. Its value is doubled by adequate means of presentation. In the picture galleries the fly in the ointment is the lighting, the angle of illumination being such that the top of the frames casts a broad shadow on the pictures. This can no doubt be corrected. The beige walls provide, however, an excellent setting for loan exhibitions such as this inaugural one of nineteenth century landscape.

Century of Contrasts

The stupid, the glorious, the vulgar, the amazing nineteenth century! Century of smug security and compressed ferment, of dignified demeanor and senses in revolt, of self-satisfied materialism and daring quest, of the Forsytes and William Morris, of the Prudhommes and Arthur Rimbaud, of Gothic imposture and the Crystal Palace, of prosperous chromo makers and devoted artists. All its facets were not here in this exhibition, and some of them shone but faintly. It reflected not so much nineteenth century Europe as the view of it from Canada. No, not exactly that, for it was admirably chosen to present that view in the very best light. It was not so much that names of landscape painters were lacking (van Gogh and Gauguin the only notable ones) as that only the lesser ones assumed their full significance. That significance could have been indefinitely extended to no good purpose—it was awfully clear as it was. A little of the allegedly artistic aberrations of the Victorian era is about all we can stomach, and it is vastly to the credit of the organizers of the show that this element was kept within bounds.

As a lesson in art history this exhibition was therefore an imperfect instrument. One could not follow the climactic changes that came over the tradition of painting during those momentous hundred years unless one came with the whole background in one's head. The reason of course was that the available material and the almost obligatory theme of landscape—though the principle was begged in several cases, Rowlandson, Delacroix, Decamps, Strang—combined to limit the scope. Choice of subject matter is an integral part of the modifications of esthetic attitude, and no element thereof can be ignored by history. Without David, Gros, Prudhon, Ingres, Géricault, Raffet, Chasseau, Puvis, Millet, Daumier, Manet, Seurat, Lautrec, Degas, as well as van Gogh and Gauguin, the graph cannot be but fragmentary.

The British Section

Richard Wilson was the only painter to represent an aspect of the initial stage, or rather of the pre-initial stage, for which reason, it was wise not to exclude an eighteenth century artist on technicalities. He remains a noble figure from a time when every artist still knew that a picture should also be a work of art, and that accurate representation and sentiment were not enough to make it so. (It was not till about the middle of the century that the Royal Academy was wholly captured by the makers of coloured stories who catered to the vulgarity of the new rich.) Wilson was influenced by the Italians, perhaps by Canaletto's work in England. His London was pretty Roman, but he was English enough.

Bonington, too, was thoroughly English in spite of his French contacts, but we can appreciate him better for the part he played in introducing Constable to the Paris Salon and to Delacroix than for his painting, sampled best in this show by his water-colours. Constable and Delacroix were the sources from which you can trace Impressionism and the whole sequel of modern art. Of the big men, Constable was the best represented. His Dedham Vale lacks the modulation of greens which he substituted for the conventional foliage colour of Gainsborough et al., and which was more evident in Hampstead Heath. Salisbury Cathedral is, I suppose, a study for the picture in the Victoria and Albert Museum, and one of those full-sized first versions which, says Sir Kenneth Clark, "... He made as much for his own satisfaction as for his guidance, and afterwards copied in muffled and modified form in order to please contemporary taste." The best of Constable, when he was free from pressure to make concessions, is found in his oil sketches, which foreshadow many things in later painting.

By the other illustrious English painter of the period, Turner, there were two oils and four water-colours of average interest, leading straight to Impressionism.

As the British section began before the century, it ended after it with two Morrises, and I must say The Beach, St. Malo, looked pretty grand beside the theatrical drops of Brangwyn, the decoy cows of Arnesby Brown and the ineffable Strang.

The French Contingent

Coming to the French section, we had a far better occasion to know Delacroix in the picture exhibited last fall at the Scott gallery. Of the Corots, I liked the charcoal drawing best. Of three painters in this show who painted the sea breaking on the shore, Courbet alone made a picture of it. The paintings of the Barbizon school, which codified Constable and did spade-work for the Impressionists, seemed merely conscientious. There was Boudin, there were the Impressionists themselves, whom we have mulled over pretty often. By Renoir, who was no more an Impressionist than Corot was Barbizon, there was a curious and nice little piece, La Toilette, in which his characteristic colour antedates his characteristic use of it, a fine small Landscape of a stream, of the late period, and La Seine à Chatou, less personal.

It was Cézanne's early work of the impetuous, romantic phase that was best represented, in the Roadway in Provence, painted with sombre gusto. The canvas entitled Auvers-sur-l'Oise, the later of the two painted in this region, is a nice pithy one of its period, but Canada still has to acquire one of the mature achievements of this great pictorial architect—as well as of a few others.

The Netherlandish Rear-Guard

With the exception of Jongkind, who made a fair appearance in the Skaters, the Dutch section was restricted to a few of the more presentable scions of an exhausted tradition. In the seventeenth century the Dutch had been the real fathers of landscape for its own sake, but their school had since degenerated through long inbreeding.

Former Beaux Arts Students Show Work Gazette — 22.4.39 Exhibition at Art Association of Montreal Contains Items Of Considerable Promise

In one of the new galleries of the Art Association of Montreal former students of the Ecole des Beaux Arts are holding their annual exhibition. The work is a bit uneven in quality, but there are some distinctly promising efforts.

Marthe Archambault succeeds with her striking and dignified portrait of the Hon. Justice J. B. Archambault, and equal seriousness is evident in Sylvia Daoust's portrait of Mlle. Marie Auger, which indicates this sculptor is going ahead. Umberto Bruni, another sculptor, scores with his portrait of Brother Andre.

Of the group by Rene Chicoine, who paints with close attention to detail, his portrait of a brown-habited priest is a sympathetic work, as are "Colporteur," a man with a measure of onions crying his wares, and "Bucherons," though what old-time lumbermen would say about one of their kind rolling a cigarette is something else again! Stanley Cosgrove shows work in his characteristic delicate tones, and Simone Denechoud reveals considerable vigor in "L'Orange Approche"—a man on a height scanning a threatening sky; and in "Quebec," showing the Terrace and Lower Town as seen from a height.

Jean-Charles Faucher in "Scene de Rue" shows a queue of mourners, under umbrellas, following a hearse on a grey morning. They plod through the snowy, muddy road to a church which is almost obscured in the rain. It is a work of evident sincerity. Marion Palmer has a good portrait of a man, and Irene Senecal deals in strong color in her landscapes "Port au Persil" and "Pointe McLaren." Quieter tones are effectively handled in her still life of bittersweet berries. Arline Gariepy and Mme. Tetrault-Cousineau show subjects with religious motifs; Jean-Paul Lemieux in "Composition No. 3" leaves the spectator a trifle in a fog as to its meaning, and Marie Davis shows her versatility in a portrait, and "Le Moulin" and "Baie Saint Paul."

Jean Simard shows marked ability in "La Forge," with horses being led to the farrier, but "Circuit Saint Laurent" and "Circuit Saint Denis," two street car interior scenes, seem rather wasted effort in a show like this. As studio decorations for an artists' frolic, perhaps—but where they are they simply emphasize the spirit of rather vulgar caricature.

Ernst Neumann Shows Etchings and Lithos Gazette — 22.4.39

Ernst Neumann is holding an exhibition of lithographs, etchings, woodcuts and linocuts in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal, and the examples reveal that this Montreal artist has competent understanding of these media. The etchings in the main are of local scenes—the Nelson Monument, Bonsecours Church and Market and other downtown picturesque bits, which are treated with close attention to detail, greater freedom and economy of line being shown in two Laurentian winter scenes which are crisp, vivid impressions.

Among the lithographs are a series of figures in various attitudes of idleness labelled "Unemployed," two of the most important prints being a view of Fletcher's Field, showing the Georges Etienne Cartier monument, benches, litter and groups on a summer day; and the old Court House, seen from the west, with promenading figures. Some of the most effective proofs are picturesque bits done about the canal, in the vicinity of Black's Bridge and above, entitled "The Basin"; "Tug on Land," "Windmill Point," "The Canal," "The Locks," and "The Yacht." In these Neumann admirably suggests the rather grimy atmosphere of this section.

Woodcuts and linos include "The Nuns," walking in pairs outside the ancient Sulpician building alongside Notre Dame Church; a beggar holding out his hat; and "Night Piece"—a loafer leaning against a lamp post and girls sauntering past a billiard hall.

Students Exhibition Surprises By Results Of 6-Month Training

Standard 8.4.39
"There Is Evidence Of The Selectiveness That Had The Feeling Of The Public In Mind"

By ROBERT AYRE

DON'T, I advise you, hide away from the students' exhibition because you are bored by devoted copies of tiresome plaster casts, because you have a horror of being confronted by the nightmare of faces, the same face, repeated again in variations of unskilfulness. You may be surprised.

Last fall, the Art Association opened a new school. In the words of Dr. Martin's annual report: "A new policy with respect to the educational programme has been adopted. In lieu of assigning the studios to the independent authority of an art teacher, as in the past, the Council has assumed control of, and full responsibility for the work, engaging its own staff of instructors, and undertaking to provide all the necessary equipment and facilities." The instructors appointed were Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., and William Ogilvie of Toronto, who initiated a special course in commercial art and design.

The exhibition which opened in the lecture hall on Thursday and will be on view through the 16th is the fruit of the first six months. It is a very creditable showing.

One thing to be thankful for is that it is not multitudinous; not every scratch was thought good enough to hang on the walls; there is evidence of a selectiveness that had the feelings of the public in mind.

You will see the plaster casts, but no more than a score of them; most of Mr. Holgate's wall is given over to charcoal drawings from life, with a few water colors and oils to break the blackness; and the nudes are posed in a great variety of attitudes.

On Mrs. Newton's wall you see the bearded patriarch and the young Negroes again and again, but not too often and there are enough differences in them to make them interesting.

Some of the figure drawings, some of the oil portraits, are wooden, as you might expect, but many of them are surprisingly free and lively, and individuality begins to break through.

Mrs. Newton and Mr. Holgate have held classes here before and their work and influence in the community are well-known, but Mr. Ogilvie is a newcomer and commercial art is a distinct departure for the Art Association. There is accordingly a special interest in his section of the exhibition. If the agencies have talent scouts going about they will find names here that they will tick off for future reference. There is nothing hit and miss about the work. One of the satisfactions of good commercial art is that it usually knows where it is going and the best way to get there. It doesn't try to do in newspapers what can be done better in magazines; it doesn't use the same technique to sell steel as it does to sell stockings. In this exhibition you will see industry and commerce represented by bulk and strength; such necessary frivolities as tea and wine, perfume and cosmetics, hose and millinery suggested with the appropriate light, and sometimes witty, touch. You will see drawings that are intended for newspaper advertising, others that would go nowhere but in smart fashion magazines; you will see menus that couldn't be anything else; catalogue covers, cigarette ads for street cars, small posters to entice you to Perce, to the Horse Show, to the Ballet. Greater originality will come; in the meantime, you have skill, an understanding of needs and limitations, and a pervading good taste.

From Persia

Going through the Art Association library, I came upon a tidy exhibition in a glass case which made me forget the weather in the streets. Ten leaves from the reproduction of a Persian manuscript of the 16th Century, the Poems of Nizami, enchanting patterns of flowers and full-leaved trees, deer and leopards and birds, tents and carpets and tiled floors, musical instruments, gorgeous costumes and saddles. Bahram hunting the lion. Nushirwan listening to the owls in the ruined palace (look for the storks in their nest). The Prophet, without a face, ascending on a man-headed horse out of frothy clouds, and a fire forking golden flames on the blue sky, surrounded by brilliant plumaged seraphim bearing golden caskets. Majnun brought in chains by a beggar woman to Laila's tent. Majnun in the desert among the wild folk. Ah, what a desert! Rock like precious mineral, pale, pure, almost transparent, swinging in gentle waves through blues to turquoise; green grass running melodiously like water; spots of color rippling across from a bright autumnal tree through bright flecks of jewelled flowers to a tree in radiant blossom; the whole sprinkled with the music of bird and animal shapes, delicate and alive around the sweet note of Majnun. See what an artist can do to a desert! I think there is something to be said for enchantment in painting.

ART GALLERY OPENS PHOTOGRAPH SALON

Display Sponsored by Montreal Camera Club Includes 115 Pictures

Gazette May 2.3

Photographs covering a wide variety of subjects and treatments are on exhibition at the Art Gallery in a salon of photography sponsored by the Montreal Camera Club. The work of 61 photographers is represented in this camera show of 115 pictures, the first held by the club open to members of all camera clubs in the city and district. Members of eight clubs are included in the showing, as well as a number of unattached exhibitors.

The prize-winning photograph, selected from a total of 414 entries, was Henry Michaud's "Regnum Super Terra." Mr. Michaud was also awarded an honorable mention for "Spooky," study of a cat's head, and was one of the three exhibitors from whose work was chosen five pictures for exhibition, five being the maximum accepted from one competitor.

Other prints winning honorable mentions were L. G. Rachiele's "Retired" and "Age of Make-believe," "Stalactites" by T. W. Whattam, "Circus Days" by Maurice Hartman, and Rene Payen's "Solitude."

P. J. Croft, president of the Montreal Camera Club, and Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Caron were the other exhibitors of five prints.

Judges of the show were George Nakash, A.R.P.S., Max Sauer, Jr., and Hazen Sise. Mr. Nakash and Mr. Sauer also exhibited three prints each on invitation. These included "Suzanne and Therese," a study of two children in a rather unusual arrangement, and a fine picture of clouded sunlight reflecting on crusty snow by Mr. Nakash, and a dramatic pose of linesmen against sun by Mr. Sauer.

Variety of subject, with a not too dominant shadows-on-snow scenes, characterized the display. An almost uniformly thoughtful attention to composition and interest in textural qualities of the subjects is noticeable.

Only one color photograph is being shown. This is "Advertising Plate" an arrangement of three shoes against a dark background, the work of Mr. Croft. Another unique exhibit is Theodosia Bond's "Northern Wilderness," a hand-sensitized platinum print of a winter landscape. The process used in this is one very popular at one time but now somewhat a rarity. It involved a 20-minute exposure in bright sunlight.

Other outstanding entries include "Stop-Over" a Laurentian scene with skiers by Bob Roberts; Bob Snowball's "Shadows," small tree shadows across an undulating snow surface; and the lively "Silent Steel" by Warren Soper.

A flower study, "Peony Roses" by W. H. Boyes, "Hickory Dickory Dock" an effective child study, a clear portrait of a skier and a quiet landscape called "Magog Meadow" by Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Caron were among the pictures of interest. Others were the work of Mildred Miller, Albert Lajoie, S. B. Josefsky and Frederick Anders.

Clubs represented in the all-Montreal show were the Montreal Camera Club, which led the field of entries accepted with a showing of 55 prints from 22 members; Bell Telephone Camera Club; Sun Life Camera Club; La Societe Photographique de Montreal; Picto-Craft Camera Club; McGill Camera Club; North End Camera Club and the Y.M.C.A. Camera Club.

Exhibition by Camera Clubs

Star 3.5.39

The annual exhibition of the Montreal Camera Club, which is being shown again in one of the galleries of the Art Association, was opened on Tuesday. It is a larger exhibition than in former years and contains, in addition to the work of this club's members, prints sent in by members of a number of other local clubs. Only good pictures and good photography have been admitted and the standard of the work is higher than before.

H. Michaud is given by the judges the honour of having the best print in the show, in an effect of moonlight on a church and big crucifix, and he also gets honourable mention for a head of a cat. There are a number of good night scenes this year; Maurice Hartman has a good effect of light from the big lamps in front of Notre Dame church and Norman Hamel has another view of the same subject; other good night pictures are by R. V. V. Nicholls, of a lighthouse with buildings in half darkness, and by Warren Y. Soper, of lamps, railway and an elevator on the harbour front. Mr. Hartman gets honourable mention for a view called "Circus days", of a big wheel seen against the sky; two other fine sky pictures are contributed by two of the judges, a striking effect of chimneys and smoke by George Nakash, A.R.P.S., and a view of a telegraph pole, linemen and wires against sunlit clouds by Max Sauer, Jr.

Sunlight and shadow on snow are always popular subjects with photographers, especially in Canada, and there are many good ones in this collection. Some notable ones are John Molson's of the long shadow of a crucifix, Bob Snowball's of trees and their shadows, and D. Shand's of the shadows of a half buried fence; Dr. Dupuis of the Societe Photographique de Montreal, has another good fence with its shadows, and Rene Payen of the same club, who wins an honourable mention, has two views of a skier in sunlight on a snow-slope. Ice and the patterns that it makes are another useful subject. T. W. Whattam gets honourable mention for a picture of icicles on a flight of steps; N. B. Powter has a good effect of icicles and another ice picture; C. E. French of the Sun Life Club, has a good pattern of frost crystals.

There are some very successful suggestions of atmosphere and space; P. J. Croft's picture of men in a fog is very good; there is an effect of atmosphere in a street scene in Montreal by F. Anders of the St. Lambert Club, and in the street of an Alpine village, with distant mountain, by F. C. Williams of the Pictocraft Club.

Honourable mention is most deservedly given to L. G. Rachiele of the Bell Telephone Club, for a portrait of an old, bearded man, seen in a half light; T. McCarthy shows a portrait of a fiddler with an interesting arrangement of lighting, and another picture of the same kind is by F. G. Bell of a man reading a paper. "The mask", a girl's face by Zillah Chase is a good study; a girl's face by Blossom and Ray Caron is pleasantly unusual; G. C. Papineau Couture has a striking head of a man, larger than life, and he has also a well lighted group of two girls, which is among the few figure studies in the exhibition.

A picture of peonies and one of a hen and chickens, by W. H. Boyes are good nature photographs; attractive patterns are made by L. Campbell, of the Sun Life Club, with wine glasses, and by O. S. Brown with a tangled coil of wire rope in sunlight.

Clubs, other than those mentioned above, of which members exhibit, are the Photoguild, and the Central Y.M.C.A. and North End Camera Clubs.

The above photograph, taken in Roxton Falls, Quebec, by Henry Michaud of the Montreal Camera Club, was selected as the best print in the salon of photography now on exhibition at the Art Gallery under the sponsorship of the Montreal Camera Club.

ART

By JOHN LYMAN

The Montrealer - 1.4.39

MORE ON THE SPRING ANNUAL

IT had become a platitude to say that in Canada there was a fifty-year lag in the appreciation of new values in art. Even the great leaders of the revolution of the 'eighties—the revolution against the trend that was reducing art to a mere rationale of visualization—whose work has long since been consecrated throughout the world, have only recently been accepted by any considerable element of the public, and the reactionaries who blindly deny them in the face of all evidence still get attention in quarters where they would get none anywhere else. It was only in 1913 that there began to appear in our midst an art in gear with its own times, and to anyone who looked to our art institutions for evidence, its development seemed very limited. Vulnerable to opposition, our galleries had to watch their step or were content hardly to step at all. That this stagnation was more artificial than real became evident when the Art Association, in this the second year of its renovated policy, began to lift the lid.

It became evident in two ways. In the first place the much maligned public, which was supposed not to be interested in modernism, flocked to the Art Gallery on the first Sunday after the opening of the Spring Exhibition to the tune of almost 4,300 in three hours, about doubling the previous record of attendance. It wanted to see. And seeing—and seeing—and seeing—is the only way to understanding. There is more hope for the man who looks and laughs gaily at what he does not understand than for the man who grinds his teeth and turns his back on it. The one is open, the other stubbornly closed. In any case you can't say the public won't in time get to like what it hasn't had a chance to see, which is the way publicity managers reason when they tell us the moronic pretty-girl poster is the only kind people in America will pay attention to. Poster production in Europe is decades ahead of that in this country simply because European advertisers have learned the commercial benefits of being outrageously non-commercial in poster art.

It also became evident in a second way that we have been painted worse than we are. If, for some people who bury their heads in anachronistic ignorance, the Spring Exhibition seems a revolutionary "concession" to modernism, it is merely a concession to facts. For the first time it begins to reflect contemporary Canadian art as it is, for better or for worse. But it is still a concession. It is still qualified by benevolent toleration of "experimental" work—experiments, by the way, none of which are less than twenty-five years old. I do not impute this to the intentions of The Art Association, but to the inevitable workings of a compromise jury. That the more selective line drawn by its "progressive" section in the latter's own domain was muddled by the wavering line of the "conservative" section's toleration, is the only explanation I can find for the fact that a number of pictures substantially equal in quality to the better ones in the show were rejected and a good deal of trash was admitted.

A second visit to the Gallery, while it caused me to modify hasty judgments of individual work, did not materially alter my view of it as a whole. I was oppressed by so much oratorical painting, which tries to impose itself by the noise it makes and not by its meaning. And there are too many people in the progressive section of the public interested in art who are ready to be imposed on. Genuine appreciation of painting, like that of music or poetry, and the old as much as the new, is something more than easy. It is easier to be excited by the spice of a novel diagram than to be moved by the depth of esthetic experience. Many of the modernistic fans who think that dry insistence on shape is form, that unrelated bright pigment is colour, that pattern systems are composition, are really just as arty as the people for whom the term was invented. They see little but a twentieth-century kind of picturesqueness. And if anyone thinks I am turning reactionary, we are not talking the same language.

There is, however, more painting of intrinsic quality than in previous annuals, but there is a new difficulty in getting at it. In the new galleries, which are sealed to daylight, one can only guess at colour, and colour is the language of painting on which all the values of a composition depend. Colour is purely a matter of relationship, and is distorted by artificial lightings as shape is distorted by curved mirrors. When daylight is not available one has to use a substitute, but when it is it seems a pity to pass it up. The new building of New York's Museum of Modern Art, which is supposed to be the last word in gallery design, uses it to the fullest possible extent.

The Art Association has acquired from the exhibition Lake Superior, a picture by Lawren Harris, and a view of a Lumber Wharf by Stanley Royle, R.B.A., A.R.C.A.

Stage And Costume Designs Stimulate Interest In Theatre

Exhibition Arranged by National Gallery Reaches Montreal—
One-Man Show by Henry Simpkins
Standard By ROBERT AYRE 20.4.39

"WITH a view to furthering and widening" the interest in the theatre so vigorously stimulated by the Dominion Drama Festival, the National Gallery last year arranged an exhibition of contemporary stage and costume designs from Great Britain, France, Austria, Hungary, Russia, Poland, Latvia and Denmark. Opening in Ottawa, it was shown at Winnipeg during the Drama Festival finals and at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto. Now it has reached Montreal and if you want to see a really exciting show don't fail to go up to the new galleries of the Art Association.

Unfortunately it wasn't possible to make the exhibition international in the full sense of the word, as the late Eric Brown pointed out in his foreword to the catalogue—such important influences on the modern theatre as Germany and Italy are missing, and so are some outstanding designers in the countries that are represented—but the scope is wide enough and the individual works so full of vitality as to make you realize that there is still plenty of kick in "the fabulous invalid."

Costumes

It wouldn't be reasonable to attempt much singling out in an exhibition of nearly 300 designs, so my comments must be fairly general. The British section, beginning, quite appropriately, with Lovat Fraser, and including such artists as Cecil Beaton, Gladys Calthorp, Edward Carrick (Gordon Craig's son), Aubrey Hammond, "Motley," Vladimir Polunin, Ernst Stern and Doris Zinkeisen, is devoted largely to costumes. The English don't seem to have ventured very far in settings. The exceptions are Stern and Carrick. The latter seems to have picked up some ideas from his father; rather gratuitously, I thought, in his design for a scene to be built on a turntable: his arches and staircases would make an impressive set but not for the modern crook drama he had in mind.

Settings

For settings that exult in the magic that is—or should be—the peculiar joy of the theatre it's hard to beat Russia. Bilinsky, Exeter, Gontcharova, Lissim, Ryback, Larionov, are all here (Bakst isn't). How gay those towers and flags, how stirring the starry skies, how comical the clowns! If you're interested in the development of the theatre, however, you must bear in mind that this is Russia, not the U.S.S.R. Most of these designs are for the ballet in Paris and the opera in London. It's too bad we couldn't have seen what they have been doing in Moscow where a few years ago there was so much ferment of experiment.

Designs

What's happening now in that part of Germany that used to be Austria I don't know but Austria presents one of the richest sections in this exhibition and some of the designs are only two years old. You will notice particularly Geyling's Peer Gynt, Holzmeister's Othello, Nagy's "Die Tragodie des Menschen" and the works of Emil Pirchan.

The most striking French contribution is Marguerite Steinlen's glass-like city of the future for "Metamorphose d'Eve," produced in Stockholm.

Don't miss the smaller groups. Several are tucked away in a little gallery on the other side of the building.

"Cinquime Exposition"

I'D rather not say anything about the fifth exhibition of Les Anciens des Beaux-Arts. There are 14 painters showing 46 works. It is to their credit that most of them are doing the more homely aspects of the local scene but they display more exuberance than taste, some of them are quite revolting in their cheapness. Stanley Cosgrove seems out of place with his delicacy.

Skill With Camera Adequately Shown In 1939 Exhibition

By ROBERT AYRE.

Standard
6.5.39

NINETY-EIGHT photographers sent 420 pictures to the first Greater Montreal Salon of Photography sponsored by the Montreal Camera Club. The judges, George Nakash, A.R.P.S., Max Sauer, Jr., and Hazen Sise, culled out a little more than a quarter of them and the result is a very interesting show in one of the new galleries of the Art Association.

The usual photographic subjects are there—poetic landscapes (and especially snowbound brooks and shadows on the snow), steps, railway tracks, lines of lights, boats and dock scenes, portraits, nudes, children, flowers. There are no news shots and only a few that might be called documentary. On the other hand, there are no tricks, no made-up effects, except a skull seen through the keys of a piano and an old man dreaming of the days of sail. The exhibits are on the whole just good photography, not trying to be anything else and exploiting the medium with propriety.

Range Of Styles

Take, for instance, Henry Michaud's "Regnum Super Terra," starred as the best print in the show. The church below the hill and the great cross looming over it make a satisfying composition; the grass and the young trees provide contrasts in texture and tone, but the contrasts are not too startling and the picture hangs together in unity. Mr. Michaud won an honorable mention for his cat portrait, "Spooky." He also shows a murky street of Quebec's lower Town—a study of atmosphere—and a still-life of sparkling crystal goblets. The range of styles was one thing that impressed me about these photographers. In that they have the advantage of most painters.

Other exhibitors who were awarded honorable mentions were: L. G. Rachielli, who showed two anecdotes, the old smoker and his vision of the ship, and "The Age of Make Believe," a youngster in cowboy outfit; T. W. Whattam, whose "Stalactites" were icicles hanging from a stairway; Rene Payen—"Solitude," a lone skier; he also showed a close-up of a gannet which was a good example of the peculiar value of photography; and Maurice Hartman, whose ferris wheel was full of the whirl of the circus.

In Colors

The president of the club, P. J. Croft, showed the only colored photograph, an assortment of shoes intended for an advertisement; it did its job effectively. His range included a clean-cut squatter's hut, a group of mountain climbers half seen in the mist, flying spume on the shore and the muscular back of an archer.

Mr. Nakash was represented by a portrait of two children which was a far cry from the old stiff days; by a snowy sunset and by a chord of stacks belching smoke—"Power." Mr. Sauer showed a smart commercial—soap and towels—and a dramatic shot of linemen high up in the wind. One interesting group was unidentified and I thought it might be Mr. Sise's. It emphasized the linear—curving railway tracks, fence shadows on the snow, an observation tower, the angles of an elevator.

Architecture

The McGill School of Architecture is holding a small show in one of the Association galleries. There are detailed plans for railway hotels, city clubs, boat clubs, open air markets, tourist cabins, a defence industries headquarters, and a memorial tower, and schemes for additions and alterations to a country house. These and the designs for wrought iron-work and stained glass are to the point and much more interesting than the bits of landscape, still-life and flower pieces that are thrown in for no apparent reason.

MUSIC P. Bell Internationalstar Theatre Art

Modern ideas in the setting and dressing of plays and actors are to be seen in an exhibition of designs, arranged by the National Gallery of Canada, which is now on view at the Art Association of Montreal. Eight countries are represented in the exhibition; the United States and Germany are the most conspicuous exceptions; and the greater part of the designs are quite recent, made for productions of the last five years.

Great Britain has about a third of the exhibition, chiefly with costume designs, many of which are of interest as drawings apart from their subjects. Most of these designs, made for use in London or at Stratford-on-Avon, are rather conservative and are evidently fitted to surround living actors. Some of the French designs are severely simple and the settings are good backgrounds for action—good pictures, which do not draw too much attention to themselves. In the small collection of Russian drawings there are several, as might be expected, of symbolic backgrounds, so striking that they must be essential parts of the plays for which they were made. One or two of the costume designs are so abstract that they do not suggest clothes which could be worn. Symbolism appears also in some Hungarian designs, but some of these are very simple and might make effective settings.

Austria has, next to Great Britain, the largest share in the exhibition, with some very good pictorial settings in which there is fine imagination. Many of the most original designs are for productions at the Burg Theatre and Opera at Vienna and for the State Opera at Berlin. There is, too, a set of plans of the curious "Faust City," made for Reinhardt's production of "Faust" at Salzburg. The Polish designs show plenty of imagination with some use of symbolism. From Denmark there are some strange abstractions, and from Latvia some striking and fantastic costumes for ballets at the Opera in Riga.

'Art of Our Day' Show To Open Here Today

Loan Exhibition of Modern European Art in Art Association Gallery
Gazette—13.5.39.

This afternoon in the large new gallery of the Art Association of Montreal will open "Art of Our Day," a loan exhibition of modern European art, organized by the Contemporary Arts Society with the collaboration of the local Art Association. Invitations have been issued for the inauguration between 3 and 5 o'clock.

In an advance notice from John Lyman, of Montreal, president of the C.A.S., which tells picture-lovers that the show "... will be the most important event of its kind to take place in Canada..." the following are named as loaning works: Louis Bourgoine, Mrs. Murray R. Chipman, Huntly R. Drummond, Eric Goldberg, Mrs. M. Greenberg, Miss Prudence Heward, John Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. G. R. McCall, F. Cleveland Morgan, Leo Pol Morin, Fernand Prefontaine, Dr. Lewis L. Reford, Mrs. Ben Robinson, P. W. Rolleston, Mr. and Mrs. B. Schechter, Robert C. Schoen, Paul Schopflocher, Mrs. Oswald Schuller, Wm. St. Pierre, and Miss A. Van Horne.

The works will remain on view until May 28.

"The Contemporary Arts Society," it is pointed out, "was organized by a group of artists to promote appreciation and recognition of the modern movement without distinction of school." Besides its professional membership—which now numbers 27—its associate membership is open to architects and laymen who are interested in what is actual and vital in art.

Minnesota Artist Exhibiting Paintings of Ancient Capital

Dewey Albinson Showing Quebec and Rural Scenes at Art Association of Montreal Fails To Capture Old World Atmosphere

Gazette By ST. GEORGE BURGOYNE. 13.5.39

Dewey Albinson, a Minnesota artist who has found a long sojourn in Quebec City and neighborhood pleasurable as well as rich in subjects, is holding an exhibition of his works in one of the new galleries of the Art Association of Montreal. It is evident that his sympathies are with that modern school of American painting which has caught the fancy of many U.S. art commentators and collectors. His interpretations of old Quebec lack the color of the Ancient Capital, and while they may win applause across the border, to pretend here that they are convincing would be affectation or insincerity. In many of the works the color is singularly muddy, and though rural sections of this province may be a trifle lax respecting building laws, it is clear that the formless and insecure structures that dot some of his landscapes would not for an instant be tolerated by either the authorities or the occupants who, loving life, have no desire for sudden death under a jumble of fallen timbers. A prime example of an insecure building is "La Visite," where figures are about to enter a home in a winter landscape. Pattern being with Albinson an important consideration, some of his canvases show tree-tops arbitrarily shorn off—which is not an old Quebec custom.

"The Citadel," a Quebec scene with winding building-edged Mountain Hill, is effective in design, and, barring the dismal color, "Cap Diamant," with row of old houses nestling beneath the cliff, shows more than his usual attention to the stability of the structures. "Ox Cart," with figures and distant village dominated by a church, is solidly handled, and "Mountain Hill" is direct in treatment.

"Frost and Snow" gives no hint of the beauties of the Canadian winter, and "Habitant House," good in its impression of strong light, is marred by the sloppy handling of the figures.

It is a pity that Quebec apparently held so little real meaning to one who technically can paint.

Albinson supplies the following data regarding his career:

President Minnesota Artists' Association; honorary member Delta Phi Delta (National Art Fraternity). Art Education: 1915 to 1919, four years art study, Minneapolis School of Art; 1920, one year Art Students' League, New York City; 1922 to 1924, two years' painting and study in France; 1929 to 1931, two years' painting and research in Italy. An Exhibition Of Art Of Our Day

Star—16.5.39

The Contemporary Arts Society, a body lately formed in Montreal, has brought together in one of the galleries of the Art Association a collection of pictures and drawings, with a few small pieces of sculpture for an exhibition of "Art of Our Day." The works which are shown are all owned in Montreal and have been lent by Mrs. Murray Chipman, Mr. and Mrs. G. R. McCall, Huntly Drummond, P. W. Rolleston, Louis Bourgoine, Fernand Prefontaine, Robert C. Schoen, Mrs. Oswald Schuller, Mrs. Ben Robinson, W. St. Pierre, John Lyman, Paul Schopflocher, Miss Prudence Heward, Mrs. M. Greenberg, Dr. Lewis Reford, Leo Pol Morin, F. Cleveland Morgan, Miss Van Horne, Eric Goldberg and Mr. and Mrs. B. Schechter.

The aim of the new society is to "stimulate appreciation of what is actual and vital," and the exhibition is made up of work by artists of the present century. Most of them are French; of the thirty who are represented, twelve are French born and ten others live or have lived in France, and the majority of them are artists with whom, as a foreword to the catalogue says, "direct visual representation ceased to limit expression." Some of them have merely simplified facts, others have given more freedom to their imaginations and seem to propose amendments to the laws of nature. Many of them leave a great deal to the imagination of the spectator, who is called on to share the work of the artist.

Of simpler and more conventional works there are good pictures and studies by Derain, Gimmi, Charles Kvaipil and Joseph Flom; still more simplified are a landscape by De Vlaminck and a pleasant design of a sleeping girl by Maurice Sterne. There are two small studies of Mexicans by Rivera, which are rather interesting. More imagination appears in the striking colour of a woman's figure by Moise Kising and in that of Lyonel Feininger's "Yellow Street," which have fine decorative effect. Feininger's "Marine" is a complicated geometrical arrangement with suggestions of the shapes of ships and sails, and there is a similar diagrammatic treatment in Franz Marc's "Pigs." The limits of imagination are reached in Kandinsky's arrangements of patches of colour, with faint suggestions of forms. A quite human portrait by Modigliani, a bright street scene by Utrillo, a very much simplified portrait by Marie Laurencin and a characteristic suggestion of a race course by Dufy are among the more notable works in the exhibition.

Ernst Neumann's Lithographs

Star—25.4.39

An exhibition of prints by Ernst Neumann is now to be seen in the print room of the Art Association of Montreal. There are lithographs, woodcuts and etchings, but the outstanding things in this, as in some former exhibitions of Mr. Neumann's work, are the lithographs. Some of them are quite large, and a very good drawing of Fletcher's Field is conspicuous among these; also good, but very different, is a freely drawn landscape called "The dam," and there are some excellent studies of places, wharves and boats in Montreal harbour and on the Lachine Canal. Some of these are very good compositions, and all have the proper Montreal atmosphere; they discover beauties in places where they are easily missed.

The seven single figures called "Unemployed" are sound as drawings and as studies of types, and there are two lithographs of lawyers, who seem to be cousins of Daumier's French lawyers. Some other figure studies, lithographed and etched, are good pieces of work, but have less individuality.

The woodcuts are few but interesting; two particularly attractive ones are one of a beggar and an amusing night scene, with black figures standing out against a lighted shop window. In these woodcuts, as much as in the lithographs and etchings, Mr. Neumann chooses and uses his material in a way that suits the method completely.

Scenes in West Indies Subjects of Works

Quiet Color, Effective Composition Mark Watercolors By Edward Cleghorn
Gazette—20.5.39

There are interesting items in the collection of watercolors and oils which Edward Cleghorn is holding in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal. This Montreal artist has found his inspiration in the West Indies—Trinidad, St. Lucia, Antigua, Dominica, St. Kitts and Montserrat providing some good subjects. His watercolors are marked by engaging composition, free wash and a reticence in color which often make some of the smaller works seem like hurriedly noted impressions for later use on a larger scale. This promising artist has a distinctly sound sense of values, uses delicate tones effectively, and he could employ his talent to advantage by coming to closer grips with his subject and putting a bit more force and decision into his handling and color. Street-scenes, marines and landscapes are his subjects.

On view in the Print Room of the Art Association of Montreal is a collection of oils and watercolors by Edward Cleghorn. "Art Of Our Day" ^{Standard 20.5.39.} Attracting Attention By Its Vigor In Design

By ROBERT AYRE

OF the 30 painters represented in the exhibition "Art of Our Day" now on view in the Art Association's new wing through the enterprise of the Contemporary Arts Society, at least 20 of them have never, to my knowledge, been seen in a public gallery in Montreal before. One way and another, we have had opportunities of meeting Derain, Dufy, Frances Hodgkins, Modigliani, Matthew Smith, Utrillo, Vlaminck and several others, but I don't remember ever seeing Feininger or Kandinsky here, or Kisling, Lhote, Franz Marc, Pascin, or any of the lesser known in this collection. The show does not attempt to be a complete survey of 20th Century painting even in Europe (it is largely European); some of the painters are not of first importance, and there are gaps—no Matisse, Picasso, Braque, Miro, Klee, Lurcat, Croš, Hofer, Pechstein, Kokoschka, Chagall, Dali, de Chirico, Arp, or Ernst—but it demonstrates the value of an organization like the Contemporary Arts Society in stimulating interest in what's going on today; as a first exhibition it's an achievement. Furthermore, it's a credit to Montreal. For the astonishing thing is that all these 50 works belong to the private collections of Montrealers. In recent years, Cezanne has found his way here, Derain and Utrillo, even Modigliani, but for generations Montreal has been known as the last pasture for contented Dutch cows and it must come as a surprise to many that it could let down the fences for strange Blue Horsemen.

Necromancy

"ART always has been and is in its very essence the boldest departure from nature and 'naturalness.' It is the bridge into the spirit world... the necromancy of the human race." If you accept this statement of Franz Marc, you will be in sympathy with "Der Blaue Reiter"; you will like Marc's better than that of the Dutchmen; you will get a thrill out of Kandinsky's fireworks.

Killed in the war when he was 26, Marc did not live to fulfill his dreams. In the animal paintings he left you see him reaching for a completer understanding of the relationships of life, for new dimensions. For a deep plunge into that necromancy, you must go to Kandinsky, the Russian who founded abstract painting in Germany.

There are three fine examples in this show. "Autumn" (1909) and "Pastorale" (1911) start from what, for want of a better term, I'll call the world everybody sees and that so many painters are satisfied to copy. But Kandinsky doesn't copy; he is subjective ("belonging to one's own mind and not to what is external"). These things that look like batiks, what are they? Is that a castle, are these trees, reflected in a river? In the "Pastorale" you may think you see a shepherd in pink with a horn. After a while it may dawn on you that those blurry shapes to the right are three dancers in wide skirts, with rouged cheeks, coming forward with bare arms extended. One of them seems to have a bouquet in her hand. Perhaps you'll see something else. It's rather like Hamlet's cloud. What does it matter, anyway? The picture has a festive air. There is pleasure in its soft shapes, cunningly dispersed, in its pale yellow and pink, its deep blue and its greens. You might trace these two back to prototypes but the third, painted in 1913 and called simply "Composition VII," is pure abstraction.

The Abstract

ABSTRACT painting might be divided into two classes. On the one hand, you have the architectural, cold and static; on the other, something that seems alive, dynamic. With his scrawls, his spinning circles, his exploding patches of color, Kandinsky belongs to the second. "Composition VII" is exciting, and I might even say liberating.

I haven't left myself much room to speak about the other paintings in "Art of Our Day." There are three Feiningers: a bold still life which is a far cry from the faithful imitation of externals; a cubist marine in harsh greens and bronze, and "Yellow Street," a semi-cubist which pleased me less because it seems shallow but which is gay in a theatre backdrop sort of way. Kisling's "Au Tub" is a nude in radiant copper with a green curtain and a blue towel, very clean-cut, and his "Grand Mere" a richly colored portrait, brightly lit and also sharply defined.

Here are two interesting Austrians. Franziska Zach seems to have been a fastidious, calm soul. There is no pushing human or vegetable life in her "View from Dublin"; the trees are no more alive than brushes; yet there is a quality of light, there is an uneasiness of water and sky, that carry you beyond a mere architectural design of buildings and bridges. Life hangs suspended, too, in Joseph Floch's "The Boat" but it is inherent in the confusion of trees and houses on the shore.

Andre Lhote formalizes and at the same time remains footloose in his "Bridge with Riders." You see quite a different formalization in the "primitive" Louis Vivin. Anything but frisky, he paints every brick and flower pot in his Paris streets with proper respect and quite delightfully.

Two English painters are included: Frances Hodgkins represented by a gamey still-life, distinguished alike in point of view and color; and Matthew Smith. What a pressure you feel in his "Approaching Storm" with its blood-red and purple bearing down and through the green! The hot colors and thick clutter of his "Negress" make a striking contrast with the cool, clean Modigliani beside it.

I can only mention—and they are worth much more—Derain's "Le Mur Rose" (you will have seen it) and his classic head of a young girl; Dufy's gaieties; Marie Laurencin's charming outline of a child in blue with a touch of rose and black; Simon-Levy's full-bodied but quiet landscape; Utrillo's

'Art of Our Day' Show
Due to Close May 28

Exhibition of Modern European Paintings at Art Association of Montreal

Gazette — 20.5.39

May 28 is to mark the close of the loan exhibition "Art of Our Day" on view in the large new gallery of the Art Association of Montreal. This collection of fifty items, assembled by the Contemporary Arts Society in co-operation with the Art Association, must appeal solely to those who like modern European work.

The painters represented are Andre Derain, Raoul Dufy, Andre Favory, Lyonel Feininger, Joseph Floch, Gimmi, Erich Heckel, Auguste Herbin, Frances Hodgkins, Iser, Wassily Kandinsky, Moise Kisling, Charles Kvapil, Gaston Lachaise, Marie Laurencin, Andre Lhote, Franz Marc, Berthe Martinie, Amadeo Modigliani, Chana Orloff, Jules Pascin, Diego Rivera, Simon-Levy, Matthew Smith, Maurice Sterne, Maurice Utrillo, Louis Vivin, Maurice de Vlaminck, Franziska Zach, Ossip Zadkine.

The Foreword to the catalogue, which may prove of value to the uninitiated, reads:

"The key-note of this Exhibition is a tendency which is a common factor throughout the modern movement and gives it, under its variety of method—from depiction to abstraction—and of theme—from Main Street to dreamland—a basic unity. It is the reaction from the preceding trend towards rationalization of vision which culminated in Impressionism. That trend, beginning with the optics of perspective in the 15th century and ending with the optics of light in the late 19th century, had continued, under a succession of ideals associated with countries and epochs, to characterize a great cycle of art. As long as the science of appearance had remained an instrument of creative purpose, the artist had often found in it a valuable stimulus, but eventually it so fascinated him that his spiritual horizon was almost narrowed down to his field of vision.

"The ideal of the Impressionist was an act of passive sensation. He rendered the appearance of nature truthfully and scientifically, but, save for selection and interpretation, he had little of his own to express.

"When the last step in this direction corresponded with the development of machine production and photography, with whose accuracy and reliability the artist could not compete, it became clear that the creative spirit could be more worthily employed. When mere visualization threatened to leave in the discard all the rest of perception, thought, intuition and emotion, and the formal laws of expression, art was put in a position where it had to take a new direction or cease to be an art of human meaning at all.

"It is sometimes assumed by those who have been out of touch with the currents of art that the modern movement is a revolt against academic 'tradition.' This is purely a side issue, for since the middle of the 19th century academic practice has had little to do with tradition. Whereas previously it followed the evolution of tradition after first denouncing each new tendency in the name of its predecessor, it then turned to meet the demand for triviality of the Victorian new rich. Little concerned with artistic considerations, it has been outside tradition, which the modern movement carries on.

"The Pre-Raphaelites had attempted to stem the decline, but the great impetus for the reaction came from the Post-Impressionists, whose feeling was voiced by Cezanne when he said, 'With Impressionism, you'll come a cropper.' In the 20th century, which is the compass of this exhibition, the reaction widened. Simultaneously three groups appeared, the Cubists (precursors of pure abstraction), the Fauves (led by Matisse) and the German Expressionists (represented by the Blaue Reiter and Bruecke groups), differing in temperament but all insisting on the formal qualities of art and a broader subjective response. They questioned earlier, less sophisticated arts in order to get back to essentials. With them and their successors, whether they worked in abstract terms, referred to nature by allusion or remained descriptive, direct visual representation ceased to limit expression."

"Pastorale" by Wassily Kandinsky, in the loan exhibition "Art Of Our Day," now to be seen in the new wing of the Art Association gallery. Kandinsky, born in Moscow and a professor at the Moscow Art School, was later associated with the Bauhaus and now lives in Paris. He was the founder of abstract painting in Germany.

ART OF OUR DAY

AN exhibition reasonably illustrative of the trends of 20th Century art (not including Canada), depending exclusively on loans from Montreal collections—was such a thing possible? Most people would have said "no," and until recently they would have been right. Yet here it is. A Loan Exhibition of Art of Our Day, organized by the Contemporary Arts Society with the generous co-operation of The Art Association, will be on view at the Art Gallery from May 13th to the 28th inclusive.

It does not pretend to be comprehensive, for some of the brightest stars are lacking—Picasso, Matisse, Braque, Rouault. It will, however, give a sufficiently characteristic sampling of the modern movement to be the most important event of the kind to take place in Canada. Great credit is due to the nineteen collectors who, in lending the exhibits, have so graciously contributed to its success.

Under the nominal bracket of the School of Paris, there will be work by Derain, Modigliani, Dufy and others. The English contingent is restricted to Matthew Smith, who holds a high place in his own country, and Frances Hodgkins. From the United States we have Maurice Stern and the sculptor Gaston Lachaise, who, though of French origin, is claimed by the country of his adoption. Water-colours by Rivera bring Mexico to the assembly.

For the first time 20th Century trends in Germany, which embrace artists of Austrian and Russian origin, are represented,—by Kandinsky, Marc, Feininger, etc., who figured in an exhibition of German art in London last summer under very distinguished patronage. Repeating what was said in the catalogue of that show, their inclusion here has no political aspect, but upholds the principle that "expression of the human spirit in all its mutations, is only great in so far as it is free."

The Contemporary Arts Society, which organized this exhibition, was formed to promote better understanding of the contemporary movement. Its professional membership includes twenty-seven Canadian artists, and its associate membership is open to architects and laymen who feel the interest of collaborating in such activities. The secretary is Fritz Brandtner, 1154 Beaver Hall Square, and the treasurer Philip Surrey, 1488 Bishop St.

Montreal Far Behind Smaller Communities In Interest In Art

"Our Education System at Fault
For Not Using Museums to Extend
The Experience of the Student"

Standard By ROBERT AYRE 15.4.39

IT seems that we Canadians are not much given to using museums and art galleries. Including archives, we spend no more than $1,000,000 a year on them. On a per capita basis, this works out to eight or nine cents. We do a little better with libraries—18 cents (not including government and university collections). We spend far more money on the movies—$3.77 a head, exclusive of amusement taxes.

Almost 42 times as much for movies as for art galleries and museums! Well, we needn't be staggered. Pictures in frames, and pots and stuffed owls in glass cases, can never in this world hope to compete with the glamorous flickering shadows of Hollywood. It isn't natural that they should, and far be it from the minority that is queer enough to prefer pots and painted pictures, far be it from the minority to dare the imposition of its taste on the masses.

Thousands of Canadians never enter a museum or a gallery more than once in 10 years; thousands never enter at all. Much of this is due, of course, to location, but let's look at the big centres of population.

Montreal Has 34 Museums

My figures come from "Museums in Canada," Education Bulletin No. 4, 1938, of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, Education Statistics Branch. It is a mimeographed pamphlet of only 30 pages and it does not attempt to be any more than a directory of museums and art galleries in the Dominion. As such it is useful, although the questionnaire on which it is based was sent out in 1937 and the statistics are for the previous year, and some institutions did not supply information at all. There are four divisions—art galleries; international collections; Canadian history collections and natural science and miscellaneous collections. Nothing that could possibly be called a museum is too small or inactive to be included; even the little heaps of rocks and the moth-eaten birds that pass for museums in some of the schools.

Montreal has 34 museums, of all sorts. We have nothing comparable with the Royal Ontario Museum, which covers 260,000 square feet of floor space and which in 1936 drew an average of 954 visitors on free days and 333 on other days. The average daily attendance at our Chateau de Ramezay is shown as 200. This is a little better than the Provincial Museum at Quebec, but only half as good as the Vancouver City Museum.

Figures are not given for the Art Association. Reference to the last annual report, however, reveals that the daily average in 1936 was 106. Last year it had jumped to 164. But even the larger number is equalled by Winnipeg's art gallery. The Art Gallery of Toronto average was 372. Vancouver showed 325, the National Gallery, at Ottawa, 200.

Some Improvement Shown

If these figures are accurate, Montreal lags behind some of the smaller communities. But we mustn't forget the 1,291 who went to see this year's Spring Show the first Sunday afternoon.

My object is not to single out Montreal but to indicate that as a whole, even in the larger centres, the Canadian people don't happen to have the museum and gallery going habit. What's the reason? I suppose that our education system has been at fault for not using the museums to extend the experience of the student. Properly present, a Greek pot, an Egyptian papyrus, an 18th Century pine door from England or a piece of French-Canadian church carving can do wonders to make such subjects as geography and history come alive. Happily, things are being improved; groups of boys and girls are taken on tours of museums these days; Saturday morning classes in Montreal and Toronto are exposing hundreds of children to the galleries; we are building up a gallery-and-museum-consciousness that should in a few years make a great change in those average attendance figures.

Fine Period Pieces Loaned to Furnish Royal Suite Here

Long Gallery at Windsor Hotel
Became Salon of Outstanding
Canadian Painting and Sculpture

THE phenomenal success of Their Majesties' recent visit to Montreal was due, not only to the overwhelming enthusiasm of Montrealers, but also to the painstaking attention to detail which marked the months of work done by every department of the committee for the Royal Visit of which Mr. Emile Vaillancourt was secretary. Preparations at the Windsor Hotel for the entertainment and accommodation of the King and his Consort lacked no detail which might increase Their Majesties' pleasure and comfort. From the complete re-carpeting for the Long Gallery and its transformation into an art salon of outstanding Canadian painting and sculpture to the installing of 50 gallons of the specially-treated water which Their Majesties use for their tea and several pounds of the tea itself, nothing was overlooked.

The six rooms set aside for the King and Queen themselves were furnished in priceless Louis XV, Louis XVI and Directoire pieces with coverings in Aubusson, and needlepoint. Lamps, inkstands and other incidental pieces were chosen as carefully. Correct placement of the pieces was under the direction of the same Parisian decorator who had furnished Their Majesties' rooms at the Quai D'Orsay during their recent visit to France. The decorator was secured especially for this purpose by Mr. Raymond.

Many Offers Declined

The selection and placing of the paintings and bronzes was done at the direction of Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A.

"What we sought was not an atmosphere of formal show," declared Mr. Raymond this week, "but rather a feeling of comfort, amid familiar surroundings. For this reason we took especial care not to overcrowd the rooms, refusing many offers of priceless museum pieces as a result. We made a point, also, of including something of personal interest to Their Majesties in each room, to relieve any air of strangeness that might seem present."

Mr. Raymond noted, in this particular, Their Majesties' marked pleasure at the sight of a Duke of Connaught portrait in the dining-room of their suite, a charming family portrait of themselves and their children above the Queen's dressing-table, the landscapes of Brockett Hall, the King's boyhood vacation-spot which was placed in His Majesty's bedroom and the two miniatures of the Princesses on the mantel-piece of the King's sitting-room which so delighted Her Majesty that Mr. Raymond asked Mr. Vaillancourt, the official host, to present them to her with his compliments.

Artists Contribute From 79 Countries

Works by Montrealers in World's Fair Gallery of Science and Art
Gazette — 3.6.39

An international exhibition of paintings, two of them by Montrealers, the canvases representing the work of living artists in each of seventy-nine countries, is an attraction at the New York World's Fair in the Gallery of Science and Art, sponsored by Thomas J. Watson, as president of the International Business Machines Corporation. Housed in a vast oval room, especially designed and lighted for its presentation, and located in the Business Systems and Insurance Building, the collection is said to make one of the most interesting displays of ethnic art ever assembled under one roof. It offers the visitor an opportunity to compare, in a single showing, the characteristic art of today as practiced by men and women, in near and remote parts of the world, many trained but still others entirely lacking in any formal art education. The paintings were chosen by the leading art authorities in the seventy-nine countries where the corporation has representation.

"In forming the International Business Machines Corporation's Gallery of Science and Art," Mr. Watson said, "our endeavor has been to increase the interest of business in art and of artists in business, and to create something of permanent educational and cultural value, not only to the millions who will visit the Fair but to the people of our own and other countries who will eventually be able to see the exhibition."

The idea of assembling such a collection was conceived by Mr. Watson a year and a half ago, fulfilling a long cherished plan for bringing art and business into a closer relationship. Art authorities of repute in seventy-nine countries were commissioned by the company to select a painting characteristic of that country. No restrictions were imposed as to the choice of artists or subjects. Those chosen to make the collection included museum directors, curators, presidents of institutions of learning, heads of art associations and organizations, professors of art and ministers of departments of culture. Mr. Watson had the counsel of Erwin S. Barrie, director of the Grand Central Art Galleries, in choosing this world-wide jury. The resulting collection offers the art student and the general public a rare opportunity to see what these art authorities throughout the world consider the best contemporary art of their respective countries.

CLARENCE A. GAGNON, R.C.A., of Montreal, who this week was commanded by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth to paint two canvases of French-Canadian rural life, expressive of the spirit which marked this artist's illustrations for Louis Hebert's "Maria Chapdelaine." A selection of the originals of these illustrations embellished the Queen's sitting room at Rideau Hall, and the interest shown in them by Her Majesty was followed by the commission to Gagnon.

The painters represented in this show include such personalities as a family connection of the Fifth Earl of Essex; a brother of William Butler Yeats, the famous Irish poet; a young woman who used her brother's name and clothes without detection to study in an art school which refused admission to women, and West Indian and Central American natives who taught themselves to paint without ever receiving art instruction.

The paintings range in size from less than sixteen inches square to a panel more than six feet long; they are painted in oil, water color, and tempera; on canvas, composition board, or, in some instances, silk; and the subjects range from a mother and child to a funeral procession, from a sleeping idler to a laboring workman, from snow-capped peaks to tropic beaches, and from primeval jungle to cultivated farmlands.

In further explanation of the company's policy in presenting this show of world art, Mr. Watson said in part:

"This step by an industrial organization is in recognition of the part played by art in industry, and its importance to industry in broadening the horizons of culture, and influencing the needs and desires of the people of every country. The International Business Machines Corporation believes its Gallery of Science and Art will help in some degree to create a better knowledge of the cultural ideals of the people in seventy-nine countries."

The picture selected for the exhibit from Canada was a painting by Marc A. Fortin, of Montreal, entitled "March Snow," and that for Newfoundland by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., also of Montreal, a canvas entitled "Newfoundland Harbor."

Series of Canadian Exhibitions Each Lasting About Six Weeks To Be Arranged for World's Fair

Royal Canadian Academy to Lead Off—Then Canadian Society of Painters and the Sculptors' Society—Later, Canadian Group of Painters and then Canadian Society of Graphic Art

By ROBERT AYRE

ORIGINAL plans for the Canadian art exhibit at the New York World's Fair, opening next week, called for the transfer holus-bolus of the show recently held at the Tate Gallery, London, which surveyed a century of Canadian painting. That was a year ago, when it looked as if there would be plenty of room in the Canadian building for a thoroughly representative exhibition. Within the past few weeks, however, the National Gallery was advised that all the space had been let for other purposes and the only place for the Canadian show was a small gallery in the adjacent Pan-American building which would accommodate no more than 70 pictures. Under the circumstances, the National Gallery wished to retire from the field, feeling that the Dominion could not be adequately represented. The Government was anxious for a showing, however, and it was decided that the best way out of the dilemma was a series of exhibitions, each lasting about six weeks. With the hope of covering Canadian art activity as comprehensively as possible, the National Gallery called upon the chartered art societies to be responsible for the selections.

From May 1 until June 15, the Royal Canadian Academy will have the gallery. Sixty-nine paintings, all oils, were chosen by the two juries, consisting, in Montreal, of Mr. Dyonnet, Mr. Gagnon, Mr. Coburn, Mr. Simpson and Mr. Pilot and, in Toronto, of Fred S. Haines, vice-president of the Academy, who went to New York to hang the show, J. W. Beatty, H. S. Palmer and Frank Carmichael.

Following the Academy show, the exhibition will consist of works collected by the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Color and by the Sculptors' Society. A show arranged by the Canadian Group of Painters will be on view from August 1 to September 15, when the Canadian Society of Graphic Art will come on.

From Montreal

For the Academy exhibition, the Art Association of Montreal has loaned four paintings: "The Bathers", by Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A.; "The Melting Snow", by F. W. Hutchison, R.C.A., N.A.; "Winter, Baie St. Paul", by A. H. Robinson, R.C.A., and the recent acquisition "Lumber Wharf, Halifax," by Stanley Royle, A.R.C.A.

Here are some other canvases of particular interest to Montrealers—Portrait of John W. Brookfield by the Academy president, Sir Wyly Grier, P.R.C.A.; "Morning, Froud Lake" by the vice-president, Fred S. Haines, R.C.A.; "Portrait of the Artist", by the secretary, E. Dyonnet, R.C.A.; "Havana", Archibald Barnes, R.C.A.; "The Red Carriole", F. S. Coburn, R.C.A.; "Captain Melville Millar", Kenneth Forbes, R.C.A.; "La Maison Rose", Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A.; "Chief Justice Greenfields", Alphonse Jongers, R.C.A.; "Evan MacDonald", Marion Long, R.C.A.; "Louis Muhlstok", Lillias T. Newton, R.C.A.; "Winding Road", H. S. Palmer, R.C.A.; "Farm, St. Urbain", R. W. Pilot, R.C.A.; "Hillside Farm, Ile Jesus", C. W. Simpson, R.C.A.; "New England Village", W. M. Barnes, A.R.C.A.; "Departure for the Hunt", Harold Beament, A.R.C.A.; "The Blue Bird", Gertrude des Claves, A.R.C.A.; "Clearing Weather", Paul B. Earle, A.R.C.A.; "Cote La Montagne", Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A.; "White Hydrangea", Clara Hagarty, A.R.C.A.; "Old House by the Roadside", H. Mabel May, A.R.C.A.; "Maison Montcalm", Kathleen Morris, A.R.C.A.; "Hell's Gate, Canadian Rockies", H. R. Perriard, A.R.C.A.; "After the Shower", A. Sheriff Scott, A.R.C.A.; "North Shore Road", A. Cloutier; "Dominion Square", Berthe des Claves; "Landscape, St. Simeon", Marc A. Fortin; "Stormy Day", Joachim Gauthier; "Village Scene, Gaspe", Rita Mount; "Laurentian Landscape", Graham Norwell; "The Ice House", Henri Masson.

Black and White

Etchings, lithographs and woodcuts in the Art Association's print room make it clear that Ernst Neumann is a thoroughly metropolitan artist. He gets his pictures in the city streets and alleys and in the studio—nudes and painters and onlookers in the studio, down-and-outs on park benches or lying on the grass of Fletcher's Field, lawyers gathered outside the courts, hymn-singers on the street corner, beggars on the pavement, urchins, playing in back lanes—this is the stuff that appeals to his sharp eye, for registration by a skilled hand. He is at his best, I feel, in the detail of character, whether it be in a clump of old buildings or in the folds of a face or an old garment. I find, accordingly, less satisfaction in his larger lithographs than in the smaller ones and the etchings; he does not seem to have the knack of handling masses. One thing I like about his depiction of character, I might say, is his restraint; he has humor and satire and a touch of sentiment, but he never overdoes any of them.

Twentieth Century Painting

The Contemporary Arts Society has arranged a show of 20th Century painting, mostly European, which will be opened in one of the Art Association galleries in about two weeks. Many of the works, from private collections in Montreal, are by artists who have never been seen publicly here. The group includes: Kandinsky, Franc Marc, Feininger, Lhote, Vlaminck, Derain, Dufy, Matthew Smith, Gimmi, Simon-Levy, Pascin, Zadkine, Herbin, Utrillo, Milly Possas and Marin.

In Boston

Since many Montrealers go frequently to Boston, I shall make note, from time to time, of exhibitions in that city. At present, in the special exhibition galleries of the Museum of Fine Arts, is to be seen the 50th anniversary exhibition of the Boston Society of Water Color Painters and the Boston Water Color Club. It is a retrospective survey of half a century and includes works by Winslow Homer and John S. Sargent, New England pioneers and leaders in the development of an art form which has become a national medium in America. Among others represented are Dodge MacKnight, John la Farge, Eliot O'Hara, Henry W. Rice, Frank W. Benson and the more radical painters Karl Zerbe and Prescott Jones.

Gagnon Lashes Out At False Values In Modernistic Art

Noted Canadian Authority Sees "Manual Incompetency and Other Weaknesses"—Addresses Pen and Pencil Club

By ROY KERWIN

"THE great characteristic of modernistic art is its manual incompetence," declared Clarence Gagnon, famous French-Canadian artist and handicraft authority. Mr. Gagnon stole a few hours from his various activities in connection with the Royal Visit, the handicraft fair which is planned for St. Helen's Island in June, and the Tercentennial Commission, to address the members of the Pen and Pencil Club of Montreal at their fiftieth anniversary banquet today. He titled his speech "The Grand Bluff—Modernistic Art."

"These men were once called 'unrecognized geniuses,'" Mr. Gagnon continued, "but the real unrecognized geniuses of the art parade are the canny dealers who, with profits in view, managed to soften the brains of enough art speculators to get these abortions on the market!"

Extreme Stylists

Mr. Gagnon explained how it was not until a group of extreme stylists, who had forsaken the traditional roads of art because of their manual inability to follow it, began to imitate the independence of Cezanne that the movement started. Art dealers cashed in on the novelty of the movement with tongues in their cheeks, he explained, and a whole swarm of such faddists followed, thus creating a vicious circle in which both artist and dealer were dependent on each other's wit for their livelihood, with the ideals of Art forgotten by both.

"The eulogists who exalt Cezanne nowadays," he continued, "seem to feel that he wrote the constitution for a new republic of art. This stress upon Cezanne is one of the curious phenomena of criticism that can be found in every age. In most of his portraits and landscapes he was both theoretical and awkward—a bad combination."

Mr. Gagnon calls Cezanne's famous "Bathers" a perfect example of this manual incompetence. "We are confronted," he declares, "with stupid drawing, bad proportions, lugubrious and non-expressive faces on meaningless non-bathing attitudes, a vulgarity of forms that defy anatomy, physiology and geometry in general incompetence!"

"Cezanne" declared the Canadian artist, "displays an incontestable nobility of purpose. But it is chained to an absolute powerlessness to reach its end. Art cannot be enriched by good intentions alone."

"Screaming Style"

"The style-fanciers, the curse of modern art, are fascinated with the false idea that an individual, screaming style is the first essential of art. But style in itself is not a virtue. Some styles are without taste just as some manners are offensive."

"Cezanne, Van Gogh, Gauguin, with their modern imitators Matisse and Picasso, are hailed as the leaders in this 'danse macabre' of painting," he continued. "That those three men, so different in aims, so unique in temperament, should be grouped together as propagandists of this type of art-junk is proof enough of the lack of intelligence among their disciples. Cezanne was the austere, dogmatic advocate of 'pure' painting. Van Gogh, the wide-eyed, was frenzied by his own intense symbolism. Gauguin, the uncouth savage, really belonged to the South Sea Islands. Their one common attribute was their hatred of 'schools' or any enforced adherence to rules. I do not doubt but that they were sincere."

"Out of the group of their slavish imitators emerged Matisse and Picasso, who, unlike the sincere and independent Cezanne, Van Gogh and Gauguin, are deliberate fakers! Neither they nor their followers would have become so fashionable with the faddists had their chosen leaders lived long enough to denounce them!"

"Burst of Emotion"

"Matisse—as wild a man as ever tortured the human form or debauched a palette—painted in a burst of emotion that did not last long enough to allow him to finish the painting. Inmates of insane asylums have known this exaltation."

"Picasso, young, fresh, olive-skinned and black-haired, a real Spanish type, cursed with an over-amount of exuberent spirits, is the only one in the crowd with a sense of humor which allows him to laugh at his own work. Colossal in audacity, his canvases fairly reek with the insolence of youth. They outrage tradition, nature, decency. I doubt if he ever finishes one. To carry to an end such an outrage is humanly impossible!"

Mr. Gagnon explained how the "educated simpletons" make all this possible. Themselves taken in by cunning dealers, he explains, they are forced to become the tools of those dealers, in order to defend their own taste and to maintain the market value of their collections.

"Liberties"

"The battle-cry of these extremists" said Mr. Gagnon, "is 'Art begins where Nature ends.' All great artists, from Botticelli to Whistler, took certain liberties with nature in order to emphasize some instance of unusual beauty. But they did not allow this liberty to become license, to carry it to such an extreme that it denied nature."

"The artist must allow Nature to take his small hand in Her large one, as a Mother teaching her Son" Mr. Gagnon declared, "For mankind always has and always will insist on at least a reasonable amount of truth in art, as well as in life."

BEAUX ARTS PUPILS ARE GIVEN AWARDS

New Course in Commercial Art Outstanding Feature
Gazette of Term 9.6.39

The newly established course in commercial art was the feature of special interest in the work of L'Ecole des Beaux Arts this year, according to Charles Maillard, director of the provincial art school. The year which closed with the opening of its final exhibition last night, was the first in which this particular study had been made a full course. The work of the class, under the direction of Rolland Charlebois Mr. Maillard considered very favorable.

Another innovation at Beaux Arts this year was the work done in co-operation with the Montreal Technical School. Examples of work modelled by the pupils of the art school were cast in bronze by pupils of the technical school. It was expected that further co-operative enterprise would be sought in the future.

The exhibition of the work of the Beaux Arts pupils is now being shown at the school's building on St. Urbain street. It includes work done by the classes in architecture, modelling, painting, ceramics, drawing and wood-carving, as well as that of the commercial course.

Diplomas for the school's architecture course were awarded to Georges Saint-Jacques, Gabriel Jarry, Rene Belleville, Marc Cinq-Mars, Paul Brassard, Clovis Auclair, Albert Leclerc, Paul Samson, Romeo Desjardins. Diplomas in the ceramics course went to Louis Archambault and Bertrand Vanesse.

Winners of the prizes awarded in each for each course by the Hon. Dr. Paquette, Secretary of the province, went to the following: Architecture—Gabriel Jarry, Georges Saint-Jacques; painting, decoration and modelling—Therese Allard, Jean Simard, Rene Caron; ceramics—Louis Archambault, Bertrand Vanesse.

Winners of the prizes offered by the French Consul General went to the following: Architecture—Marc Saint-Mars, Rene Belleville; painting, decoration and modelling—Yvette Boisvert.

Prizes offered by Charles Maillard, director of the school, were won by the following: Architecture—Paul Samson, Paul Brassard, Clovis Auclair; drawing, engraving, decoration and modelling—Gaston Saurault, Bernard LeFort, Janine Gens, Raymond Fortin.

The Royal Architectural Institute of Canada Medal was won by Gabriel Jarry, while the Louis Quevillon prize in architecture went to Albert Leclerc. The Maurice Cullen prizes for paintings went to Enid Gilson and Marcia Drummond. The Suzor Cote prizes for painting went to Lucien Morin and Yvette Boisvert.

Art Show Is Survey Of Six Centuries

"Masterpieces of Art" at World's Fair Assembled by Valentin
Gazette—17.6.39

It will probably be the prevailing opinion that the old-master show at the New York World's Fair exceeds in splendor the expectations, high though they may have been, of those who, with impatience, awaited the delayed event, writes the discerning and cultured art critic Edward Alden Jewell in The New York Times.

The survey called "Masterpieces of Art" assembled under the general direction of Dr. Valentin of the Detroit Institute, is indeed magnificent; broad in scope and as rich in quality as it is generous in its inclusion of great works not often accessible to the public.

More than 400 items compose this sumptuous panorama of painting and sculpture, which, as it unrolls before us, embraces in its majestic sweep creative utterance of six centuries and represents artists that range from early Italian, Flemish, Dutch, German and French masters to those of eighteenth century England and of eighteenth and early nineteenth century France.

Although large, the exhibition is staged in such manner that the journey through it may be taken at a leisurely pace without resulting fatigue. To begin with, the building, planned especially to contain this art, is of ample size and divided into twenty-five galleries, thus making it possible, in an orderly chronological progression, to group work that is best studied together.

Each spacious enough to prevent crowding, yet small enough to assist in the establishing of intimate contacts, these galleries surround a court, the centre of which is a pool. There are some rather baffling murals on the walls of this court, where plain cool spaces might seem preferable, in view of the fact that visitors will doubtless spend meditative entractes here.

In sights that are familiar that are new the quest about both will be welcomed: both

Gagnon's Talk On Art Draws Spirited Reply

Standard, 6.5.39

IN The Standard of April 29th figured the report of a speech to the Pen and Pencil Club by Mr. Clarence Gagnon, R.C.A., who lashed out at "The Grand Bluff—Modernistic (fragrant word!) Art." With picturesque philosophy he explained what liberties the Real Artist is allowed to take with Dame Nature without becoming licentious, and how the manual incompetence of Cezanne, van Gogh, Gauguin, Matisse, Picasso and all their ilk puts them beyond the pale. He gave the lowdown on how, in getting these fakers accepted, the cunning art dealers had put one over on the world with incredible genius. Artist and dealer were dependent on each other's wit,—a wit which must make all other salesmen, and even the smoothest confidence men, feel like pikers.

A quarter of a century ago, flaying modernism was a familiar practice here, and after all these years it is a pleasure to hear an echo of the good old vituperative energy, with even possibly an added touch of exasperation. The German Nazis, of course, are on Mr. Gagnon's side, but elsewhere, even in Italy, modernism has been honoured.

Just to show what odds Mr. Gagnon doggedly takes on, I would like to mention a few of those heavy-weights who have been deluded into supporting the opposite point of view.

In London, for instance, was held last summer an Exhibition of 20th Century German Art featuring painters whom the catalogue says are the German equivalents of Cezanne, Matisse and Picasso. Among others there were Kandinsky and Marc, whose work will be seen in the Loan Exhibition of Art of Our Day, opening a week hence at the Art Gallery. Some of the people sponsoring the London show were: August John (who resigned last year from the Academy), Prof. Ernest Barker, Litt.D., LL.D., Clive Bell, Prof. Tancréd Borenius, Karel Capek, Lord Ivor Spencer Churchill, Sir Kenneth Clark (Director of the National Gallery), Prof. W. G. Constable (now Director of the Boston Museum), The Earl of Cranbrook, Prof. E. J. Dent, George Eumorfopoulos (No. 1 collector of Chinese art), Prof. Julian Huxley, The Earl of Listowel, Hon. Vincent Massey, Dr. Axel Munthe, John Rothenstein (Keeper of the Tate Gallery), Rebecca West, H. G. Wells, Virginia Woolf.

The list of eminent people who have been humbugged into accepting the modernists would be endless. I will only add that among them are the directors of most of the great public galleries of Europe and America; in New York, the Metropolitan Museum of Modern Art (backed by Rockefeller and Whitneys), Whitney Museum (which buys the American spawn of modernism, even abstraction), Boston's Museum (which recently acquired a huge thing by Gauguin) and Institute of Modern Art, etc., etc., numerous colleges, Harvard's Fogg Museum...Quelle pitié! All these "educated simpletons"—art lovers, historians, curators—who now know the dealers have taken them for a ride, but still go on acquiring, acquiring, year in year out, abusing the institutions that employ them just so the truth won't get out! And what shall we say of the writers and critics, Elie Faure (famous for his History of Art and other books), Roger Fry,

Rene Huyghe (Director of the Louvre), Escholier, Prof. John Dewey, hundreds of others? And then there are all the private collectors, abroad and even in Canada, many of them men of feeling and taste, and also all the painters and sculptors, whose conception of art has led them to the modern movement, to add to that immense body of intelligent opinion, which has been so grievously hoaxed by a gang of dealers and artists, and which Mr. Clarence Gagnon undertakes to enlighten.

I remain, Sir,

Yours obediently,

JOHN LYMAN.

Protests Attitude Of Mr. Gagnon

Sir,—It is with regret that I take sides. (there is no other word for it) against Mr. Gagnon.

At the present moment, in 1939, Mr. Gagnon is our great painter, in the eyes of a host of Montrealers. He has an almost official role as a result of a series of lucky circumstances, independent of his own efforts.

His remarks made to the Pen and Pencil Club and set down by your reporter with the respect due his age and fame will have, I am afraid, the authority of the Gospel. I am sorry. Past events had disposed us to accept the idea of a master who was both courteous and sensitive. Suddenly without warning we get full in the face a volley of dogmatic pronouncements; the tone is dictatorial, brooks no reply, dubs the opposite point of view as unreasonable, infantile, ridiculous, grotesque and pitiful. In short if one is not of Mr. Gagnon's opinion one is not far from being mentally deficient or at best an innocent, fooled by crooks like Ambroise Vollard, a man of parts incidentally, who writes as well as we could wish more Canadian painters could paint.

I consider this attitude of Mr. Gagnon's neither worthy of a club whose members, albeit with certain prejudices, are devoted to the cause of art, nor of the lecturer himself, not of the public, divided and confused on these questions, who read the account of it.

Against these assertions and insinuations I protest in the name of free and independent thought, of truth and of good manners. It is not for me to refute them; to make my own point of view triumph does not interest me in the least. There are quantities of books, well and clearly written by, apparently sane men on the whole matter.

Anyone can find out by reading European papers freely sold in Montreal, that all the great cities are proud of possessing works by these masters. Recently a big exhibition was held at the Municipal Museum of Amsterdam and opened by a French minister comprising works by Bonnard, Braque, Leger, Matisse, Picasso, Rouault, Utrillo, and Vuillard, each painter having an entire room.

In the general opinion this exhibition seems likely to represent the small number of living French painters whose work will live. I address these remarks to Mr. Gagnon and ask of him that if, as is his right, he does not like so-called modern painting, that he will refrain from trying to convince the public that they will be better off in depriving themselves, in cutting themselves off from that delicate and refined pleasure which is there to be enjoyed by those who know how to look, who live in their own times, that the quarrels of small unimportant groups matter in the slightest to these painters, these very great painters.

Mr. Gagnon would perhaps be surprised to learn that a taste for modern painters and a taste for old masters can go together frequently, and even in Montreal.

However I'll make him a small concession, I will admit with him that these masters sometimes go through intellectual gymnastics that are almost acrobatic. I hope he grants me that for those exercises one must have a fresh, vigorous mind.

NEW MUSEUM DEDICATED Gazette—28.6.39 Crerar Officiates at Ceremony at Carillon

At the formal dedication of the museum of the Historical Society of Argenteuil County at Carillon, the Hon. T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources, said: "It is well that we should take time to look over the past and envision the work of the early pioneers. There is no episode in history more thrilling than the story of Dollard and his associates, and the historical spot of their stand is in close proximity to this building we are privileged to dedicate for the preservation of historical records."

In declaring the building open last week-end, Mr. Crerar expressed the wish that every possible success would attend the efforts of the society and that the building would prove an incentive to this and future generations to follow the ideals of the society.

Following a tour of the building Mr. Crerar warmly congratulated the society for its zeal and enterprise.

Dr. H. B. Cushing, president of the society, acknowledged the help extended by Mr. Crerar and his department, and all who had aided in its work.

A brief address was made by Georges Heon, federal member for Argenteuil County.

The official opening was attended by large crowds from the surrounding districts, in addition to many who came from Ottawa and Montreal for the occasion.

The walls are of white marble, blue tile and glass. The front and rear walls are principally glass; the first floor, plate glass and metal; the second and third floors, "thermolux", a new type of heat-resisting light-diffusing glass; the fourth and fifth floors, where the offices are situated, have horizontal bands of windows. The front wall of the penthouse and the rear facade, facing the sculpture garden, are almost entirely plate glass, with glass brick and bands of windows, except for the third floor sculpture gallery, which is walled on the garden side by marble and lighted from above by a long skylight.

New York's New Art Museum Aims To Raise Standards Of Taste And Extend Public's Perspective

By ROBERT AYRE

"TO give the people an opportunity to say hello to today." This, according to Lowell Thomas, is the function of the Museum of Modern Art in New York. Nelson A. Rockefeller, the newly elected president, carried the idea a little further when he used the words "to interpret the new ways of art to the people." Dr. Robert Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago, took this to mean that the Museum had to be a place of demonstration and action. "Dynamic," somebody else said. Still further went Edward Bruce, director of the section of fine arts in the United States Treasury Department. With his "civilizing power of art" he gave the Museum an even greater responsibility and opened the way for President Roosevelt and is declaration that art and freedom went together, that democracy needed art and that art could not live without democracy.

This is a brief synopsis of what they said last Wednesday night when the Museum of Modern Art celebrated its tenth anniversary by dedicating its new two-million-dollar building at 11 West 53rd Street. I mention the figure not because I think dollars are any standard of measurement for an art gallery but because it demonstrates that large sums of money can be raised for other things beside wars. The President pointed out that the Museum was dedicated in the cause of peace and to the pursuits of peace. He spoke of faith in the sanctity of free institutions, in the right of life in the community. Crush the individual in society and you crush art, he said. Only when men are free can the arts flourish. The conditions for democracy and the arts are the same.

Hailing the Museum as a citadel of civilization, he looked to it as an integral part of the country's democratic institutions, equipped to enrich and invigorate its cultural life, to raise the standards of American taste. With its travelling exhibitions, it extended the perspectives of the general public.

Art in the United States, Mr. Roosevelt went on, had never been the property of an academy or a class. He made some reference to the government sponsorship of art in the W.P.A. projects. The artists were given new opportunities, they realized new obligations to society. But they were under no compulsion to be limited to the ideas of the government or anyone else; they were disciplined by their own energies and ardors; they could be of all creeds—or none at all.

Perhaps you heard the broadcast. These things are worth repeating, anyway. They are worth thinking about.

Since the Museum of Modern Art was founded in June, 1929, it has held 85 exhibitions, seen by more than a million and a half persons. It has sent out 68 travelling exhibitions, shown 790 times in 186 cities. In 1935, through a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation it established a film library as an educational institution and now 200 organizations regularly show its programs. The purpose of the film library is to collect and preserve representative motion pictures of all types, as well as related material, with the object of making them available for study. Wednesday night, John Hay Whitney spoke of the motion picture as the liveliest of the visual arts and Walt Disney emphasized its value to posterity. Another aspect of the Museum's interests—modern industrial design—was brought out by Edsel Ford.

The broadcast itself, with its music by contemporary composers, its pick-ups from Washington, Chicago and Hollywood, and its dramatization of motion picture history, was typical of the Museum. "Museum" scarcely seems to be right word for an organization so dynamic, so essentially of today.

"Art of Our Day"

Will Montreal ever have anything corresponding to the Museum of Modern Art? If it does, the Contemporary Arts Society will undoubtedly have a good deal to do with it. Recently formed to extend those perspectives Mr. Roosevelt spoke of, it shows its enterprise in the exhibition which opened today in one of the new galleries of the Art Association. "Art of Our Day" consists of 50 works by contemporary painters, mostly European, loaned by Montrealers—Louis Bourgois, Mrs. Murray R. Chipman, Huntly R. Drummond, Eric Goldberg, Mrs. M. Greenberg, Miss Prudence Heward, John Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. G. R. McCall, F. Cleveland Morgan, Leo-Pol Morin, Fernand Prefontaine, Dr. Lewis L. Reford, Mrs. Ben Robinson, P. W. Rolleston, Mr. and Mrs. B. Schechter, Robert C. Schoen, Paul Schopflocher, Mrs. Oswald Schuller, William St. Pierre and Miss A. van Horne. I will discuss the exhibition next week. It will be open until the 28th.

Sharp Contrasts and Fine Artistry In Current Exhibition

Wood Carving and Modelling by Prudence Dawes Impress Critics

By ROBERT AYRE.

I NEVER was in Minnesota, but I imagine it must be like Manitoba, on the flat side. That would account, to some extent, for Dewey Albinson's delight in Quebec. (He is the president of the Minnesota Artists' Association.) It's whoops up and whoops down in an extravagant rough and tumble of hills and houses and all the familiar "emotive fragments" (Wilenski) of this Quaint and Picturesque province. He hasn't missed much. His pictures are as crowded with local color as Kriehoff's. You'll find dog carts and dog sleds and the beginning of a dog fight; ox carts, crowded buggies, sleighs, tourists in a caleche outside Notre Dame des Victoires, crocodiles of school children, black robes, and such modern appurtenances as street cars, automobiles, bicycles and movie posters. Church spires push up, habitation houses lean drunkenly together, roofs tumble down. Color is often gaudy. Albinson's feeling for the grotesque and his tendency to exaggerate make him something of a caricaturist, though with the greatest good humor. It's all in fun. He's like a friendly earthquake.

Edward Cleghorn

Albinson is upstairs in the new wing of the Art Association building. Most of his works are oils. Downstairs in the print room you'll find the most striking contrast in the exhibition of water colors by Edward Cleghorn. The majority are tiny thumbnail sketches of the West Indies, quick snapshots done in a few strokes, a few tints, little notes perfect in taste and spontaneity. The larger papers don't seem to me quite so successful.

Bombing Planes

Classroom restraints are happily absent from the work—perhaps I should say play—of the children of the Art Association's Saturday morning classes under the direction of Miss Anne Savage. The boys and girls are free to express their own experience and fancy pretty much in their own way. Their pictures were fun to do and they're fun to look at.

Among them are flower pieces and textile designs and there are a few imaginative landscapes, but the thing that really interests the youngsters is action. Some of them have painted their friends busy in the studio, there are football scrimmages, skiers tear down the hill, farmers follow the plough, firemen dramatically attack the flames, auto racers hurtle round the curves. There are impressive steamers but there is only one railroad train. Naturally it is streamlined. The airplanes gave me pause. There are many of them and the significant fact is that most of them are bombers, destroying one another. Such is the world we live in. Fortunately gas masks have not yet penetrated the consciousness of young Canadian painters.

The prize picture has a more peaceful countenance. Alex Taylor, who is 13, has painted a street corner in a small town and he has welded such contemporary details as the post office, the general store, the filling station, the automobile and the horse and cart into a nice unity. Though it lacks action, the little scene is very much alive.

Riva Feinberg, who won first prize for modelling with a snow-baller and a peasant bowed down with a burden, and Bob Bevington, who came second with a spiny prehistoric beast, both show a good feeling for the clay. You'll get a kick out of Gordon Barrington's "Sunday Afternoon"—two ladies of an era long before Gordon was born. Seurat ladies in bustles. The one at the piano has buttons all down her back; the one with the hymn book wears a watch pinned to her bosom. Where on earth did a boy of 14 get this taste for satire?

Prudence Dawes

Speaking of sculpture, you'll be interested in the 14 pieces by Prudence Dawes at Sidney Carter's. I should say her wood-carving is more satisfying than her modelling. "Thought," a nude male, and her female nudes, "Modesty" and "Bathing Girl," are fairly conventional in conception and treatment. "Repose," a graceful figure in teak, and "Sorrow," a nude in pearwood are more distinguished. Miss Dawes handles her tools with skill and gets an extraordinarily high polish. Two of her portrait heads, somewhat formalized, have a classic impressiveness. The sculptor is versatile and as much as anything in the exhibition I liked her plaques, two dancers and "Speed," a stylized figure with flying draperies worked out in both pottery and oak.

Closing Dates

"Art of Our Day," the memorable loan exhibition organized by the Contemporary Arts Society, closes tomorrow. You still have four more days to see Dewey Albinson, Cleghorn and the children. Miss Dawes' show will be at Carter's for a few weeks.

American's Impressions of French Canada X

"Mountain Hill," is the name given this painting by Dewey Albinson, who is holding an exhibition in the Montreal Art Association which started May 12 and will continue three weeks. Most of the things he is showing originated in Quebec City and vicinity.

Montreal Painters Show at Art Gallery

Summer Exhibition Reveals to Visitors What Local Men Gaze at Produce 24.6.

Calculated to interest visitors to the city who would know what local painters can accomplish, a summer exhibition is on view in the new wing of the Art Association of Montreal. Many of the works have been exhibited before—at "one man" shows or at the Spring Show at the Art Gallery, but this does not lessen their interest. The entries are varied and range from the precise and highly finished to a wall of paintings that are undoubtedly expressive of something.

Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., is represented by a winter landscape with stream, a patch of open water, and tree-fringed banks treated with the decorative touch. F. S. Coburn, R.C.A., shows horse and sleigh travelling a snowy road, under a threatening sky. Alphonse Jongers, R.C.A., escaping for the nonce from portraiture, is represented by a reclining nude. Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., invests with satisfyingly subtle values a painting of buildings and the old church at Chambly, with a bit of stream winding between snowy banks. Edwin Holgate, R.C.A., has an Indian scene with totem poles and a bold blue mountain, and Harold Beaumont, A.R.C.A., shows his waiting Eskimos on a height above water in rocky, forbidding country—a work that was exhibited at the Tate Gallery, London. Albert H. Robinson, R.C.A., has a typically handled winter scene with buildings, church and strip of distant water. Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., has an effective portrait of a comely woman in black—a work that has been acquired for the association's collection. Gertrude DesClayes, A.R.C.A., shows her usual bold attack in a pastel portrait of a girl; Berthe DesClayes has a typical autumn scene with stream bordered with trees in gay foliage, and Alice DesClayes, A.R.C.A., has a beach scene with horses hauling a cart which a man is loading with seaweed.

A peaceful landscape with buildings, distant hills and a cloudy sky, is the offering of Wilfred M. Barnes, A.R.C.A., and Hal Ross Perriard, A.R.C.A., has a spirited marine, with sea swirling about rocks. Adrien Hebert, A.R.C.A., shows buildings amidst trees in summer leaf, and Eric Riordan has a shadowed lake, with mountain peak gilded with sunlight. A Sherriff Scott, A.R.C.A., has an example of portraiture "Le Quebecois," which is reproduced on this page. Thurstan Topham shows the winter watercolor—city roofs and the distant Jacques Cartier Bridge—which won him the Jessie Dow Prize. Paul Caron has a fluid watercolor of old houses, habitants and sleighs, and Mabel May, A.R.C.A., has a solidly painted work of barns and rounded hills. Kathleen Morris, A.R.C.A., has a painting of Quebec buildings in winter, and T. R. MacDonald shows a graceful and capably modelled nude. Frederick Taylor is effective with his Negro boy in a yellow shirt, and Will Ogilvie gives a glimpse of his native Africa with his painting of a colored girl. A coarsely painted reclining nude of disagreeable hue is one of John Lyman's offerings, and Marc A. Fortin has a typical Hochelaga scene. Goodridge Roberts has a broadly painted rose-flushed landscape, and Prudence Heward has a girl against boughs laden with apples. Mabel Lockery has a child in pink with a dog, and Ethel Seath shows a plant, halved apple and bunch of grapes, both forbidding in color. Ernst Neumann has a precisely painted girl in blue with a book and Jack Beder has a good impression of sun-glare on brick buildings. Eric Goldberg and Alexander Berco-vitch show typical works.

Henry Simpkins, A.R.C.A., has a capital watercolor of market stalls and figures about the base of the Nelson Monument, and D. R. Morrice in "Windy Day, Nassau," gives a good impression of swaying palms against a darkening sky banded by clouds. A figure promenades by the sea wall, the only disturbing illusion being the sea, which has the suggestion of flowing downhill. It is a work of distinctly engaging qualities and holds marked promise. Art Association Utilizes New Space To Exhibit Permanent Collections; Tastes and Enthusiasms Compared

IT is something of an Old Home Week in the Art Association galleries just now. With no loan exhibitions on view, they are falling back on the permanent collections and the new space has enabled them to unearth some paintings you may not have seen for a long time. Some of them might have stayed in the basement for all I care, but it depends on your point of view and browsing around you may find something that will hold you.

In the new square gallery has been assembled what started out to be a water color show though a few oils have got mixed in. You'll find Bosboom and Weissenbruch and Israels, a David Cox landscape and a John Varley and the more modern, more reckless Bauer in the Orient. There are some Canadians—Jacobi's heavy mountain scene, "The Splügen Pass," his "Portrait of a Girl"; a couple of jolly Kriehoffs—the rascals galloping away from the poor lame toll-keeper (it's not so easy nowadays), and a merry sleigh ride; an Indian head by Edmund Morris, Suzor-Cote's portrait of Francois Taillon, a group of de Belle's graceful little girls dancing in a mist. There are several small Morrice notes and "The Don Flats," painted in 1889. Coming from the period when Morrice was still swotting at the Law, this water color, otherwise dull enough, has considerable biographical interest. In fact, the little show, though not so comprehensive as to be a serious appraisal, throws a few highlights on the history of Canadian painting and of Canadian taste. The most recent works are six little sketches of Florence by Hugh Jones, Arthur Lismer's drawing of the old fiddler Johnny Boivin, and Louis Muhlstok's characterful tree.

Print Room

You could with profit spend some time in the print room poring over the reproductions of Durer drawings. Contrasted with the impressive Crucifixion series are several amusing costume studies, Nuremberg women going to the dance, to church and in every-day garb. The familiar praying hands are there, the knight on horseback, the old man of 95, and the portraits of the artist at 13, Emperor Maximilian I and the Archbishop of Salzburg. I was delighted with the steatopogous Venus riding the poor dolphin. There begins Rubens.

If you are interested in Egyptian art, stop at the case in the library and examine the reproductions of works in the Museum at Cairo. Included are handsome heads of Khons and Mut from Karnak and several fine reliefs. Hesy-Ra, on wood, is superb; Amenophis IV and his daughters making offerings to the sun-disc has its points; one or them is the frieze of barbarians biting the dust. From all accounts, the famous heretic had the most un-Egyptian paunch. A horrible example of the degradation of a native art under foreign influences is the gilded stucco mummy from the Roman period.

Yesterday the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston opened an exhibition of paintings, drawings and prints from New England collections. Its aim is to give some idea of the character and quality of New England collections as they exist today and at the same time to indicate how the taste and enthusiasm of collectors has varied since the collection of works of art first became an essential part of New England cultural life. Among the exhibits are examples of Italian primitives, 17th Century Dutch and Flemish masters, Colonial portraiture, and of the Barbizon painters, as well as works of the Impressionists and the Post-Impressionists.

Rembrandt's portrait of his sister, Fragonard's "La Bonne Mere" and Manet's "Street Singer" are among the famous canvasses to be seen. Included, too, are El Greco's "The Feast in the House of Simon," "The Grape Gatherer," by Velasquez, Corregio's "Holy Family" and "The Sheepshearer" by Millet. There are examples of the works of Tintoretto, Goya, Constable, Cezanne, Renoir, van Gogh and Gauguin.

The exhibition will be open until September 1.

Canadian Art In New Salon

Star 30.9.1939

A. B. Watson has recently opened his Canadian Artists' Galleries at 1316 Sherbrooke St. W., and wishes to invite all his former clients to view his main salon. In the salon a wide selection of Canadian works are on view, including both Canadian and French-Canadian scenes. The exhibition includes studies by M. A. Suzor-Cote, R.C.A., French-Canadian scenes by Charles W. Simpson, R.C.A., Frank Hennessy, A.R.C.A., O.S.A., Andre Morency, the Beaux Arts prize-winner, Eric Riordan and Paul Caron. Several of Robert Pilot's Laurentian studies, the specialty of the Academician, are on view, as well as a number of Marc-Aurel Fortin's highly-stylized woodland scenes. Rita Mount's Gaspe seascapes are also represented, the sisters Berthe and Alice des Clayes, Tom Stone's snow scenes while Oscar de Leel is seen both as a portrait and a landscape painter.

Art Gallery Buys a Gozzoli; Redpath Library Opens Exhibition Of Wellington-Napoleon Items

By ROBERT AYRE

BENOZZO GOZZOLI, the 15th Century Florentine, the best pupil of Fra Angelico, was, according to Vasari, "considered by those who knew him to be a man of fertile invention and prolific in animals, perspective, landscapes and ornaments." On that score, his "Mystic Marriage of Ste. Catherine," the newest acquisition of the Art Association, could hardly be called characteristic, for there are no animals, there is no perspective and the landscape is rudimentary to say the least.

But there are ornaments and Benozzo had other characteristics besides those Vasari picked out, thinking, doubtless, of his Old Testament frescoes. And the little tempera panel, modest as it is, is a charming piece, beautiful in color and line, the work of a careful, industrious and devout man. Over a dull crimson dress, the Virgin wears a cloak of deep blue and her wimple is a delicate pink, a color repeated in the garment worn by the Christ Child. Ste. Catherine's mantle is almost scarlet and her dress a dark olive. The crowns are extremely delicate but the haloes are discs of solid gold. The kneeling Ste. Catherine raises one hand to receive the ring and rests the other on her wheel. As simple as an ikon, the painting is softened and humanized, but the figures are appealing without being sentimental.

Canadian Art^{7c} Displayed At World's Fair

Star - 2.8.39
Younger Artists Of Dominion Are Included In Show

NEW YORK, Aug. 2—(C.P.)—A new exhibition of contemporary Canadian art went on view at the World's Fair today, revealing the more liberal painters of the Dominion as a generally cheerful group with a lively interest in nature and people, and not much concern about committing social comment to canvas.

The third exhibition in the gallery of the Canadian Pavilion is representative of the younger artists from coast to coast who enrolled under the banner of the original "Group of Seven," and became known as the Canadian Group of Painters.

The 64 pictures by 53 painters, a cross-section of current art in Canada, stand in contrast to the large exhibition of American contemporary art nearby, which has many pictures expressing protest against social conditions and commenting satirically on existing institutions.

NO NUDES SHOWN

Furthermore, for the "world of tomorrow," where nudity is a raging topic of controversy—especially in the amusement sector—the Canadian show offers not one undraped figure.

Landscapes and rural scenes, boldly colored with strong dramatic and rhythmic qualities, dominate the Canadian show. Only one Surrealist picture is offered. It is called "Children in Pliofilm," by Pegi Nicol, a native of Listowel, Ont. The picture defies description in a short space.

Few of the pictures tend toward abstraction. One that does markedly is titled "Hockey," Fritz Brandtner, a native of Danzig who came to Canada in 1928 is the artist, and he shows two rather Martian hockey players in action, producing an effect that is posterish but interesting.

One of the most dramatic pictures in the show is the "Lake Superior Village" of Charles F. Comfort, a product of the Winnipeg School of Art. This large canvas shows a few frame houses silhouetted grimly on the barren shore of the lake. It won a prize at the Great Lakes Exhibition.

"GROUP OF SEVEN"

A. Y. Jackson, one of the original "Group of Seven," is represented with "Northern Landscape" and "Radium Mine," which he painted during September and October of last year when he was a visitor in the Great Bear Lake area. The landscape shows a small muskeg lake surrounded by gnarled, stunted spruce. In the background is Great Bear Lake. The coloring is bold, in characteristic Jackson style.

Louis Muhlstock, Montreal, contributes a fine portrait, titled "The Rabbi." Roger Viau, another Montrealer, shows a still life, "La Chaise Royale."

Representative of the West are James W. G. MacDonald with his sombre study of "The Black Tusk," at Garibaldi Park, B.C.; and Philip Surrey, native of Calgary, with his "Sunday Afternoon." Miller Brittain and John Weldon Humphrey, both of Saint John, N.B., have portraits in the show.

The current exhibition will remain in the gallery at the Fair until September 15.

Guggenheim Non-Objective Art Collection Shown in New York

Combination of Color, Form and Space Without Imitative Meaning Created Solely To Appeal to Sense of Beauty

The first public exhibition in New York City of one representative part of the Solomon R. Guggenheim collection of non-objective paintings has opened at 24 West 54th Street, under the direction of the curator, Baroness Hilla Rebay.

The exhibition has been opened to the public, says the press release, with the special intention of being a helpful guide to the youth of America in its urge for creativeness and culture, and also in response to inquiries from all parts of the country and abroad. It is being presented at this time because of the number of visitors coming to the New York World's Fair.

Due to restricted space one representative part only of the collection of 726 pictures listed in the big catalogue can be displayed until a permanent home for the final collection will have been constructed.

Examples of painting from Academy through Impressionism, Cubism, Expressionism, Futurism, Abstraction, to Non-Objectivity can be seen upon application.

Admission will be free to the public on Saturdays and Sundays.

For art lovers, artists and students the exhibition will also be open Monday evenings from 8 to 10 p.m. upon application and with admission cards only.

Non-objective art has been defined as the combination of color, form and space without any imitative meaning, created solely to appeal to the sense of beauty. Each non-objective painting has its own rhythm, its own melody and its different beauty from anything ever seen before. It is the culmination of spiritual power made intuitively visible.

Baroness Milla Rebay, curator of the Solomon R. Guggenheim Foundation has pointed out that "Art and culture like the sun cannot be old-fashioned or modern. They both shine as a blessing to humanity, timeless and eternal."

Commenting on this show, Edward Alden Jewell, art critic of The New York Times, writes in part:

Like most theatrical ventures, it played its first engagements out of town: twice in Charleston, N.C.; once in Philadelphia and once (the most recent of these public showings) in Baltimore. For each occasion a sumptuous catalogue was prepared and Baroness Hilla Rebay, the curator, wrote long forewords about Spirituality and Cosmic Joy.

At length it has happened here. Art of Tomorrow opened with a private view at 24 East Fifty-fourth Street. The Baronesses' catalogue this time (fifth in the sequence advancing toward a Five-Foot Shelf of Upper Case Genius) is grander than any of the catalogues of the past. A great many of the paintings by Rudolf Bauer and Kandinsky are reproduced in full color on a field of argent. As a matter of fact every picture in the show is reproduced in black and white, and possibly there are thus reproduced a few pictures by some of the Lesser Lights that aren't quite in the show itself. Of this I am not certain.

There is no dearth of millennial refreshment. There are, I believe, between three and four hundred non-objectives now on view. And the rest of the Guggenheim collection, the "objective" side, may be seen, I learn, at the old Plaza headquarters by those who send in a written application.

No applications are needed for a visit to the Art of Tomorrow in East Fifty-fourth Street. And you may enter without paying if you go on a Saturday or Sunday. And one should bear in mind that the Art of Tomorrow will not be shown on Mondays.

Bear that in mind outside; but as you pass in, if you want to help convince the curator that the Millennium is indeed at hand, you will leave everything connected with the intellectual processes at the door. It must be remembered that if "non-objective masterpieces are created intuitively," so "the sense for beauty and art must be felt intuitively." Fluorescent lighting arrangements and a general air of cultured gray and white simplicity are the sole concessions of a semi-material nature made.

All else on the premises, including the transcribed music of the masters coming out of the instrument on the top floor, is attuned to the Cosmic Lead; all else is designed—filtered through a fine screen of the curator's spiritual lustration—"for the benefit of the United States of America" and "for the religious welfare of mankind."

Now let me, in very brief space, try to make clear the nature of my response to all this.

With non-objectivism itself in art I have no quarrel. There is no reason why an artist should be "representational" and paint definite "objects" if he prefers not to do so. Nor, if in certain major respects circumscribed, is the field as narrow as one might at first suspect it to be. Just about unlimited, as a matter of fact is, I dare say, the scope within which patterns of colored shapes may fall. Merely setting one shape at a slightly different angle changes the combination. This can go on ad infinitum. And there are, of course, much more radical ways than that of arriving at a new pattern of gadgets (or, as the less reverent sometimes call them, doodles).

Very nice decoration indeed may be thus produced; decoration, too, that frequently recommends itself to architectural use. That the non-objectivists get, as a rule, beyond that, I cannot concede. And too often their confections appear chiefly characterized by aspects of the geometrician's logic or the oculist's chart.

Non-objective art may be ingenious, may be highly imaginative, may be beautiful. What I am not for a moment prepared to concede is that it mirrors in paint the vague cosmic platitudinizing offered in print (and frequently in very odd English) by way of official explanation.

Reading the forewords by Baroness Rebay, I have always the uneasy feeling that an effort is being made to turn the whole thing into a sort of cult. Although fully aware I hope, of the value of intuitive processes as differentiated from intellectual, still I submit that statements such as the following, when tied up exclusively to non-objective art, get us, by precise calculation, nowhere:

Earthly happenings are intellectually perceived and visually recorded. Great artists have proven that the eye can outgrow its primary and ordinary function, as a receiving station of practical information for our daily needs. The eyesight of many has progressed from earthly observation to cosmic vision—from a practical, useful, intellectual information exchange, into a medium for the intuitive capacity to receive spiritual joy, receptive to the influence and visual expression of cosmic power.

Fidelity to the materialistic world seems very wonderful to many who consider it the sum total of art and believe that almost any one can make circles and cubes. But these basic forms, like the keyboard of a piano, are to be used for creating with them spiritual values and for conveying the uplifting, rigorous beauty and measure of space, form and line.

Does the Baroness mean, then, that what she calls "spiritual values" may be realized alone by the artist who has reduced all forms to the basic and makes of them a rhythmic or, at least, a symmetrical (one dare not say geometrical) pattern? Are we to believe (accepting "genius" as "a special gift of God to the elite of a nation") that "beautiful non-objective masterpieces"—and these alone—"develop sense for culture and order in all those who give time to their useful, joyous influence"? It strikes me as misty.

Summer Show At Art Association²⁶ Star - 26.6.39

One of the many new events started by the Art Association of Montreal is a summer exhibition, which has just been opened, of work by Montreal artists. It is a collection of about 50 pictures by as many painters, with a few pieces of sculpture, each contributor being represented by a single work, and is shown in one of the new galleries upstairs.

Landscape painters, in oil and water color, are in the majority. One of the most striking of the water colors is Thurston Topham's excellent winter view over Montreal roofs. C. Simpkins has a good drawing of the market at the foot of the Nelson monument, and there are a characteristic Canadian winter scene by Paul Caron and a slight but effective Montreal sketch by Charles Cleghorn. Among the more important landscapes are snow scenes by Albert Robinson, C. W. Simpson and R. Pilot, a picture of rocks and breaking waves by H. Ross Perrigard, a good study of sunlight and shadows by Adrien Hebert, one of autumn tints by Berthe Des Clayes, a typical effect of sunlight by Wilfred Barnes, a small picture by Edwin Holgate, a view of a lake and mountain shadows by Eric Riordon, and an interesting night study by D. R. Morrice. Alice Des Clayes sends a picture of horses on a sea shore and F. S. Coburn one of a horse and sleigh in front of a stormy sky. Jack Beder and E. Cloutier have street scenes and Goodridge Roberts an evening landscape.

The portraits include a large one by Lillias Torrance Newton, a good but rather formal one by Agnes Lefort, a striking picture of a man in furs by Stierrieff Scott, and good, smaller studies by Ernst Neumann, Frederick B. Taylor, Louise Gadois and Gertrude Des Clayes. Alphonse Jongers sends not a portrait but a small and brilliant figure study, and other nudes are a small one by T. R. Macdonald and a large one of a Negress by John Lyman. Will Olgive shows a formal study of a Negress.

Women painters are quite well represented; in addition to those already mentioned, Mabel May, Adelaide Munn, Kathleen Morris, Prudence Howard, Mabel Lockerby, Ethel Seath, Sarah Robertson and Anne Savage have pictures in this exhibition. Marian Scott has a very unusual pattern effect of a perspective view of a spiral stair.

Alexander Bercovitch, W. Allan Harrison, Philip Surrey, Eric Goldberg and Louis Muhlstock are other painters who are represented.

"Handicrafts Have Become a Cult; Time, Energy and Skill Wasted; Much Seen Not Native of Quebec"

The Standard

24. 6. 39

By ROBERT AYRE

WHEN it comes right down to cases, I'm afraid I'm allergic to handicrafts. Oh, yes, I will deplore with you the machine age and the passing of good honest individual workmanship. Mass production throws things together cheaply and impersonally, grinding out gimcrack and shoddy and adding to the world's ugliness, but the machine is not all bad. Willy nilly, it is here, firmly established, and we can't do without it; in these days, it would be uneconomical, if not quixotic, to try to make everything by hand. At the same time, the amount of good design, by good individual artists, that goes into the products of the factories, is considerable. It would be more to the point, I think, to improve the machine-made that does lack quality in taste, materials and finish than to set the clock back.

Once upon a time this quality was to be found in handicrafts. Folk arts sprang out of necessity. There was no other way to get furniture than by making it yourself. Much of the home-made was clumsy but there was also pride of workmanship, vitality was often controlled by taste; thrown on their own resources, not vitiated by the itch to ape, the craftsman often developed true originality. Their work was real, and indigenous, and it gives us satisfaction.

The old necessity is gone and isolation, even in Quebec, isn't what it used to be. Handicrafts have become a cult. Our politicians encourage it because they say it makes the people contented. A man will have hours of bliss putting a ship into a bottle or building the Eiffel Tower out of fretwork, but I can't think it improves either him or the community; on the contrary. Much of our contemporary handicrafts are as wasteful of time and energy and skill as these silly hobbies.

At the handicrafts fair on St. Helen's Island, I saw a girl incising a sheet of metal. She was outlining a picture and doing it with a firm and skilful hand. But what was the picture? It was one of those romantic Dutch windmills. The girl was copying a colored scribbler cover. At another booth I saw an Indian head-dress. I heard a visitor from England wish she could wear it home and astonish the people on Tilbury Dock. It would astonish the Indians themselves if they were not already spoiled. It looked like the sort of outfit a chorus girl would wear in a Broadway musical comedy.

These things seemed to sum up the fair. In the metal-work section, a miscellany of plaques and trays, cigarette boxes, inkwells, lamps, bracelets and what not, I looked in vain for something that might be native of Quebec. The traditional French-Canadian character was more in evidence in the "crochet chiffon" exhibit of the Cercle des Fermieres de Ste. Madeleine. The hooked rugs and "tableaux" were typical Quebec scenes, worked out in bright colors. But, after all, are these copies and imitations of popular paintings authentic folk art? I think not.

To show the progress of a century, two rugs were on display. The one labelled 1839 was a design of Birds of Paradise with a border of exotic wings. 1839 was an ingenious pattern of flowers, stars and hexagons, in warm red. Infinitely more complicated, more ambitious in scheme and color, was 1939, but except for technical skill, I simply couldn't see the progress. To me, 1839 was real; the other was counterfeit.

I grant you Mlle. Matte is clever with her needle but personally I see no point in copying paintings, be they ever so famous, in silk stitches.

When I came to the wood-carving booth, I thought of the famous artists of old Quebec and groaned "Ichabod!" Skill squandered pettily on moose and beaver, quaint old characters, lovers kissing over the garden gate. Would you stand them on your piano? The St. John the Baptist on the other side of the aisle may not have been the best thing Louis Jobin ever did but it was worth doing, it was done with a purpose, and with style. So was the Lieber trumpeter from Varennes. What beautiful golden wings, what a swirl of draperies, what bigness of conception, what vitality!

Even if they were not essentially Quebec, the handwoven fabrics and the book-binding were worth the effort. They have some use in the world. (By the way, the McGill Library sent an interesting exhibit on binding).

I liked Gilles Beaugrand's chaste modern church utensils. Handicrafts are justified when they are the work of an artist who puts the impress of a personality on them.

The Art Association's summer exhibition of 63 paintings and sculptures by Montrealers opened too late for this issue. It includes a portrait by Lilius Torrance Newton, R.C.A., a recent acquisition. A show of French-Canadian furniture, from the association's own collection, is also on view.

Comprehensive Art Exhibition Arranged for Summer Visitors Will Interest Montrealers, Too!

WITHIN the next two months, thousands of visitors will come to Montreal. They will go to the top of The Mountain, they will climb the steps of The Shrine, they will admire The Harbor, and they will spend quiet moments in Bonsecours Church and the Chateau de Ramezay. Many of them will go into the Art Gallery and those who do will find that they are expected guests. The Art Association has hung a show especially in their honor, to give them an opportunity of meeting some 50 contemporary Montreal painters and half a dozen sculptors.

This summer show is a very good idea and it won't hurt Montrealers to have a look at it, even if they are familiar with most of the exhibits.

Comprehensive

It's a pretty comprehensive affair, taking in the younger artists as well as the venerable R.C.A.'s who don't always see eye to eye with them. You'll find Dyonnet and Gagnon—an academic still life and a spring morning at Baie St. Paul; Albert Robinson is represented by a serene St. Tite des Caps landscape, Charles Simpson by scrawly Spring, Coburn by one of his white horses hauling a red sleigh, Jongers by a nude called "The Blue Couch," Sheriff Scott by his "Quebecois" in a fur collar. Robert Pilot is there with the old church at Chambly in a graceful winter setting; Harold Beament with his Eskimo study, "The Waiting Ones." Kathleen Morris tells the visitors of Quebec and Mabel May brings them Knowlton in winter. The des Clayes are on hand, and Adrien Hebert; Paul Caron is represented by a typical piece; Topham's Jessie Dow prizewinner, Montreal's rooftops under snow, Simpkins' Nelson monument and flower-sellers, a thundering sea by Perrigard, a provincial scene by Cloutier, a map, or sort of cartoon of Hochelaga, by Fortin. . . These are some of the exhibits. I won't attempt to catalogue them all.

It's a long time since I've seen Edwin Holgate's Indian graves from the Skeena Valley. Will Ogilvie's quiet African woman, "No Sutu," makes us feel that he exhibits too seldom. There is a special interest in Lillias Torrance Newton's portrait in the fact that the Art Association has just acquired it. Prudence Heward shows a lively portrait of a little girl with an apple bough. You will remember, from the Spring Show, Mabel Lockerby's "Lucille et Fifi" and Louise Gadbois' "Portrait of Madame L." There is good painting in Anne Savage's forest, Ethel Seath's still life, and Sarah Robertson's apples against a house, all representative of these painters.

"Speak For Themselves"

I seem to be cataloguing in spite of myself. Some of the works I have mentioned interest me a great deal; others, scarcely at all; with strangers in the house, it wouldn't be polite to distinguish, would it? But I must come right out and say I prefer John Lyman's "Lassitude" to some other nudes that might be around; I'd rather have the passionate individual way Louis Muhlstok and Goodridge Roberts look at the hills than the depersonalized prettyfying of some painters who may be more popular. Bercovitch and Beder and Alan Harrison and Philip Surrey speak for themselves, and Campbell Tinning, with a rich water color of tulips. If you're looking for individuals, as I always am, you'll like Goldberg's "Balcony," you'll appreciate the boldness in Fritz Brandtner that makes him turn Scarborough Bluffs into dominating stylized Rocky Mountains, you'll be glad to see such notes in Montreal painting, as Marion Scott's austere, almost abstract design, "Fire Escape," and Henry Eveleigh's reportage—news-paper, planes, searchlight, bombs—"Shanghai 1937."

Sculpture

The sculpture includes La-liberte's little folk group, "Les Sucres," a standing nude by Henri Hebert, heads and figures by Orson Wheeler, Sylvia Daoust, Agnes Fisher, Pauline Johnson, Prudence Dawes, H. M. Miller and Pierre Normandeau.

Acquired By The Art Association

STANDARD - 1.7.39

"Portrait of a Lady in Black," by Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., a recent acquisition of the Art Association of Montreal. It is to be seen in the summer show in the new wing.

Exhibition of Antique French-Canadian Pieces For Summer Visitors

For the benefit of the tourists who are now descending on Montreal in a friendly invasion, the Art Association has opened an exhibition of antique French-Canadian furniture. It is in the new wing, alongside the show of contemporary Montreal painting and sculpture (which, by the way, has been re-hung and which looks much better opened up and spread out over two galleries.)

Some of the furniture, which comes from as far back as the 17th Century, is reminiscent of Old France, some of it shows the influence of the English Adams, some of it is good rugged individualistic home hacking without benefit of Europe's elegant designers.

There are cupboards so massive—the "morceau de gateau" style of the carving makes them look even thicker and heavier—that you could shut yourself up in one of them and—if you were not one of those fresh-air faddists successfully withstand a long siege. One of them, running to long swooping curves rather than four-square solidity, has carvings of fruit carved on it, something in the fashion of an Egyptian relief but with charming naïveté rather than much sense of design. More graceful still is one, painted white, from St. Philippe des Henri. There are commodes. The famous chest of drawers stands like a monster of cast iron on those incredible booted feet, as unabashed as vulgarity usually is.

In chairs you can run the gamut from a quaint—I have to use the word some time—corner chair, from a rough monk's bench—or should I say a monk's rough bench—with a great round back that becomes a table-top, through an almost dainty spool chair with a split hickory seat, to straight-backs that would not be out of place in the best dining and drawing rooms of today.

Of course there is a spinning wheel; and a rough-hewn cradle with wrought-iron handles that look anomalous; and a grandfather clock made entirely—works and all—of wood; it has horns on its forehead and it has been deceitfully daubed to look like choice walnut.

Real taste has gone into some of the carved wood panellings and some of the doors.

You will want to peer in at the Staffordshire pottery, out of reach in one of the cupboards. (They have had to twist wire over the fragile chairs so that weary tourists won't feel tempted). The hooked rugs are few, but the stag looking surprised to find himself among flowers as tall as he is, is worth a great many. A few contemporary portraits give you a clue to the sort of people who used some of this furniture in the old days.

If you are interested in days much farther back and in places far away, look at the case in the Association's library. Reproductions of frescoes from the Ajanta caves, scenes from the life of Buddha.

IN BOSTON

If you're going to Boston between now and August 13, you'll have an opportunity of seeing an exhibition of prints by Torii Kiyonaga in the Museum of Fine Arts. Kiyonaga's work belongs to the school of Ukiyo-e-pictures of "the fleeting world", 18th Century disillusionment and frivolity after two centuries of civil wars. They say the prints are amazingly well preserved but they are being shown for only a few weeks in a gallery with light filtered through paper windows.

New Art Exhibition Due at World's Fair

Gazette — 29.7.39
Canadian Group of Painters to Follow Watercolors and Sculpture Collection
zette. — Jul. 29/39

Monday marks the end of the exhibition of work by members of the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Color at the New York World's Fair, shown in connection with which were examples by members of the Sculptors' Society of Canada.

On Tuesday will open a collection by the Canadian Group of Painters—the enlarged old Group of Seven—to last until September 15. On the following day work by the Canadian Society of Graphic Art will hold the walls, with October 31 the closing date.

This series of work by Canadian artists started with a collection selected by the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, which was on view from May 12 till June 18.

In his foreword to the catalogue of the works, which have their last showing in New York on Monday, H. O. McCurry, acting director of the National Gallery of Canada, explains how these shows were arranged as follows:

"In 1938 the Canadian Government requested the National Gallery to accept responsibility for the Canadian Section of Fine Arts at the New York World's Fair. At the time it was proposed to devote a large proportion of the Canadian Building to this purpose and it was planned to transfer the 'Century of Canadian Art' exhibition, then at the Tate Gallery, London, to New York. When later it was found impossible to secure space for more than 75 pictures, a change of programme became necessary. It was therefore decided to confine the exhibition to the work of contemporary painters, and, in order that a comprehensive review of Canadian art might be presented, to hold a series of exhibitions each lasting six weeks. In arranging these the National Gallery has received the co-operation of the five chartered art societies of the Dominion—The Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, The Canadian Society of Painters in Water Color, The Sculptors' Society of Canada, The Canadian Group of Painters, The Canadian Society of Graphic Art."

Montrealers who contributed to the watercolor show were Jack Beder, Alexandre Bercovitch, Andre Bieler, Sam Borenstein, Fritz Brandtner, John Lyman, Louis Muhlstok, William A. Ogilvie, Goodridge

Roberts, Marian Dale Scott, Philip Surrey, and Campbell Tinning—by virtue of having painted Montreal scenes and exhibited here.

The Montreal representation was not so strong at the Sculpture show, the contributors being Henri Hebert, R.C.A., and Orson Wheeler.

Contemporary Art Of 79 Countries

Montrealers' Work in International Business Machines Corporation Show at
Gazette—15.7.39

Canada is represented in the Gallery of Science and Art in the International Exhibition of Paintings at the New York World's Fair, by "March Snow, Quebec," a work by Marc A. Fortin, of Montreal, which is reproduced on this page.

The exhibition was conceived and sponsored by Thos. J. Watson, president of International Business Machines Corporation. Paintings were chosen by the leading art authorities in the seventy-nine countries where the corporation is represented. No restrictions were placed upon each authority's selection. It was merely suggested that paintings should be characteristic of the life of the country. The illustrated catalogue indicates that discernment and an open mind governed the selection of works.

"In forming this Gallery of Science and Art," Mr. Watson explained, "our endeavor has been to increase the interest of business in art and of artists in business, and to create something of permanent educational and cultural value to the people of our own and other countries, who will eventually see the exhibition."

The resulting collection offers the art student and the public a rare opportunity to see what art authorities throughout the world consider the best contemporary art in their respective countries.

Representing Newfoundland in the exhibition is a painting entitled "St. John's Harbor," by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., of Montreal.

MARCH SNOW, QUEBEC by Marc A. Fortin, is typical of this Montrealer's robust landscape work, in which he is ever alive to the decorative value of old elms. It is a painting truly Quebec in flavor—characteristic houses, melting mounds of snow and a noble tree. This work is the Canadian contribution to the exhibit of "Contemporary Art of 79 Countries," sponsored by the International Business Machine Corporation, in the Gallery of Science and Art at the New York World's Fair.

Fortin, whose work is well known to Montreal picture-lovers, was born at Ste. Rose, Que., studied at the Chicago Art Institute, and has found this province, and sections of this city, fruitful in congenial material, which he handles in a direct and individual manner. He is represented in the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa, by a watercolor entitled "Landscape, Hochelaga."

Art of 79 Countries Hung at World's Fair

Examples by Skilled Painters in International Business Machines Corporation Exhibit
Gazette—15.7.39

Undoubtedly a distinct asset to the aesthetic side of the New York World's Fair is the exhibit of "Contemporary Art of 79 Countries", which Thomas J. Watson, president of International Business Machines Corporation, himself a patron of the arts, was instrumental in forming. He conceived the idea in the fall of 1937 that paintings from the many countries in which the company is represented would make an interesting and important collection from the viewpoint of both business man and artist.

In the introduction to the illustrated catalogue Mr. Watson writes, in part:

"Painting is one of the truest records of a people. When we see what painters reveal, it increases our hope for better understanding among the peoples of the earth. We believe that all who view these paintings will recognize, through the many different forms of expression, traits common to all men which bind humanity together in universal kinship."

Some idea of the scope of the corporation's activities is revealed in the catalogue, which contains a reproduction of the painting selected to represent each of the countries, apt and concise notes concerning the different lands and reference to its art development, and a portrait of the painters and biographical notes concerning their studies and attainments.

The countries represented are Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Azores, Bahama Islands, Belgian Congo, Belgium, Bermuda, Bolivia, Brazil, British India, British Malaya, Bulgaria, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, England, Estonia, Finland, France, French Indo-China, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hawaii, Honduras, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Kenya, Latvia, Libya, Luxembourg, Mexico, Morocco, Netherlands India, Netherlands, Netherlands West Indies, Newfoundland,

New Zealand, Nigeria, Northern Ireland, Norway, Palestine, Panama, Peru, Philippine Islands, Poland, Portugal, Puerto Rico, Rumania, Scotland, Siam, Southern Rhodesia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Trinidad, Turkey, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Virgin Islands, Wales, and Yugoslavia.

The painters included those well-known to the world of art. The work representing Canada was by Marc A. Fortin, of Montreal, and that of Newfoundland, illustrated on this page, by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., of Montreal.

ST. JOHN'S HARBOR, by Robert W. Pilot, R.C.A., of Montreal, represents Newfoundland in the exhibition of "Contemporary Art of Seventy-nine Countries," which was assembled by International Business Machines Corporation in its Gallery of Science and Art at the New York World's Fair. The canvas is marked by the usual fine drawing and clear color which are characteristic of this serious, Newfoundland-born painter whose work in the Maritimes, about Quebec City and in the Laurentian country has won him many admirers.

Pilot, born in St. John's, studied at the Art Association of Montreal, and at Julian's in Paris, following which he made a tour through France, Italy, Spain, Morocco and England. He is represented at the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa.

DR. JOHN HAMMOND, NOTED ARTIST, DIES

Gazette—11.8.39
Canada's Oldest Painter Was Friend of Millet and Whistler

WAS BORN IN MONTREAL

96-Year-Old Professor Started Work in Marble Mill at Age of Nine—Fought in Fenian Raid

Sackville, N.B., August 10. —
—Dr. John Hammond, R.C.A., LL.D., 96, professor emeritus of the Owens School of Fine Arts at Mount Allison University, died at his home here today after a week's illness.

Dr. Hammond was outstanding among Canadian artists for his marine works, especially for the realism with which he transferred to canvas the peculiar shadowy mists of the Bay of Fundy.

For many years director of the Owens School of Fine Arts, he was made professor emeritus upon retiring. In 1930, Mount Allison University conferred upon him the honorary degree of LL.D.

He is survived by his widow, one daughter, Mrs. Charles A. Krug, Sackville, and two grandsons. A private funeral service will be held at the residence Sunday afternoon and interment will be made in the rural cemetery here.

John Hammond was born in Montreal in 1843, two years after the bill for the union of the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada came into effect, and just previous to the removal of the seat of government from Kingston to Montreal. He began his art apprenticeship early, at the age of nine years, in a marble mill. "I have never attended an art school," he said. "But I've studied with many of the great painters of our time."

When as young as ten years, he was making good use of his pencil and in early manhood worked in the Notman Studio, Toronto, which then had the strongest group of painters in Canada. Fraser, one of the firm, being an accomplished painter.

IN ARMY AT 23.

At 23 he joined the army and helped repel the Fenian raiders, and later joined the gold rush to New Zealand. Mr. Hammond had been in almost every country in the world in search of subjects, coming through the Boxer rebellion in China in 1900, where only a good stout pair of legs saved him from an untimely end at the hands of looting Chinese waterfront mobs.

When nearly 30, young Hammond decided to try Paris and there threw himself into the study of figure at the Beaux Arts. But the Bohemian ways and hilarious life of the students there proving uncongenial, he left and from that time devoted himself exclusively to landscape sketching in and around Paris, later exploring rural France. Naturally he fell in with other students of nature and in this way met Whistler and was intimate with Francois Millet, and others of the Barbizon group as well as with a number of his compatriots among whom were Paul Peel, Wyatt Eaton, and Theodore Robinson.

Millet, who had not earned enough at his art to marry, cautioned Hammond that as he learned to paint better he would sell fewer pictures. Hammond lived to see the value of his friend's masterpiece soar to heights which Millet could not have imagined in his wildest dreams.

Early in the eighties Hammond ventured to send several landscapes to the Salon and to his surprise and delight they were accepted and one hung on the line. This success brought the artist considerable notice at home and several flattering offers to purchase.

On his return home he was sent by Sir William Van Horne to find subject matter in the Rockies and going farther afield he visited New Zealand and Australia and spent three months in Japan, travelling on foot to the smaller villages in the interior. Mr. Hammond had the warmest praise for the kindness and hospitality he met among the Japanese peasants and many of the sketches made there were useful later on.

China was visited and several large canvases showing the Yangtze with its lampans and crowded shipping were exhibited at different times.

In 1906 Mr. Hammond executed a series of mural decorations for the C.P.R. London offices, at Charing Cross, using views of the Rocky Mountains and Pacific Coast.

For 15 years this painter was art instructor at Mount Allison, and it was owing to his efforts that the present fine art gallery was added to the college building.

Mr. Hammond was a constant contributor to the art exhibitions of Canada and was one of the early members of the Royal Canadian Academy and also for years of the Ontario Society of Artists. His paintings are to be found in all the main art galleries as well as the private collections throughout the Dominion.

JOHN HAMMOND, R.C.A.

Canada's Art Exhibition At the World's Fair "Credit to Dominion"

From Philip Surrey's "Melancholy Of The Slums" to John Lyman's "Happier World" standard, 5.8.39
By ROBERT AYRE

WHATEVER may be said of the Canada Building itself—my own feeling is that a good opportunity has been muffed—the art exhibition arranged for the New York World's Fair by the Canadian Society of Painters in Water Color and the Sculptors' Society of Canada, and set out in the building adjoining, was a distinct credit to the Dominion. The show was selected to present the best Canada has to offer in the two mediums and it was well displayed.

Let's take the Montrealers first. There were a dozen of them in the water color section. Their works ran from the main streets of the metropolis to the world of imagination. You got the red, drab Montreal fairly substantially in "Roofs" and "Across the Street" by Jack Beder; Montreal a little more down-at-heel in the somewhat dirty style of Sam Borenstein's "Early Spring" and "Notre Dame Street"; back doors and railway tracks in the less emotional more structural "Leaving Montreal" by W. A. Winter; a tidy, decorative aspect in the simplification of Marion Scott's "Way Road". Deeper than any of them went Philip Surrey, whose "Spring in Lagauchetiere Street", with sombre red buildings, greenish sky, stark tree and soaring saint, with its children in the gutter and its old man foraging in the garbage can, expressed the melancholy of the slums.

Into a happier world went John Lyman with his summer Laurentian landscape "The Two Orphans". The swing of road and fences was checked by balanced masses of trees. The orphans were two girls in the centre foreground. Lightly handled in fresh color. The lyric note was found, too, in Louis Muhlstock's "Boats at Rest", a pleasant relaxation. He showed the other side of things in the head of a pitiful old man. Two of Goodridge Roberts' intensive individualized landscapes were there: "Lake Bernard" and "Ottawa Valley". You will remember the Bercovitch-Perce Rock made romantic with a stylized figure in the foreground. For formal decoration there was also Will Ogilvie's "African Day", a woman in a landscape of lake and mountains, and he showed a delightful dolce far niente of African natives in a boat, picked out by bright sun. Fritz Brandtner had three works in the exhibition, a happy "Spring, Beaver Hall Square," a semi-abstract still-life in vivid colors and one of his most outstanding pieces, "Riders," with horses and nude figures in unrealistic blue, red and yellow. At this end of the scale was Campbell Tinning whose "Musical Composition No. 12" was a handsome free design of figures, curved lines and color patches.

In the rest of the exhibition you found everything, from the academic, fussy and sedate works of Bridgen, Jefferys, Leighton and the lesser lights to paintings of strong individuality by Lismer, Varley, Comfort, Carr, Milne and Humphrey. The expected, orderly Casson and Carmichael were represented by papers from the Toronto Art Gallery. Peter Haworth and Zema Coghill Haworth showed typical landscapes, good solid controlled design on the one hand, flourish and friskiness on the other. Personality stood out in the landscapes and the still-life (rich in color, solidly built) of Carl Schaefer; flickered through the several styles of Caven Atkins; was sensitive in Paraskeva Clark's "Kitchen Table," vigorous in Miller Brittain's "Street," humorous in Henri Masson's "Wet Pavement," and piquant in Pegi Nichol's Toronto sidewalk procession and her "Pouring Rain," with figures half dissolved and colors blurred. Charles Goldhamer caught the French-Canadian scene quickly and registered it with rough-textured skill; Andre Bieler expressed its community life in largeness of design and color. Julia Crawford worked broadly and healthily in flowers.

There was brilliant color and real punch in Arthur Lismer's "Hibiscus," his "Basuto Village" and "Georgian Bay Channel." I was glad to see, for the first time, something of what Varley brought back from his Nascopie trip. Color richer than you find in most water colors and more subtly modulated, went into his "Night Overtones"—ship's wake, clouds and moon—and his "Aretic Night"—Eskimos on deck. Charles Comfort showed two pieces—the elegant "Balconina" and the big robust portrait, "Young Canadian," which makes the medium do its utmost. There was a different sort of satisfaction in Milne's "Kitchen Shelves" and "One Lily," with its predominance of black and its shapes seen with half-shut eyes. Emily Carr's totem pole, emerging from the dense British Columbia forest, was worth a dozen of the ordinary romantic totem pole pictures you see. And one of our most distinguished young painters is certainly Jack Humphrey, whose "Pottery Market Taxco" and "Dredges, Indian Town," with their loose line and sophisticated color-spotting, were outstanding.

The sculptors were nine. The National Gallery loaned Emanuel Hahn's lively head of Stefanoson and the bust of Elizabeth Wyn Wood; Hahn also showed his designs for Canadian coins and a spirited horse's head of heroic size. "Looks like a bunch of those modernistic curves," I heard a visitor say of Elizabeth Wyn Wood's "Gesture." She was referring to the angles and the emphatic oblique line of an austere figure. Among Miss Wood's exhibits were the unusual and gratifying, "Reef and Rainbow" and "Northern Island," in cast tin. Frances Loring, Florence Wyle, Donald C. Stewart, Stephen Trenka, and Jacobine Jones were well represented. The Montrealers were Orson Wheeler, whose striking "Head of a Negro" you will know, and Henri Hebert, who showed a statuette, "Life is Full of Thorns" and the bronze bust of Aphonse Jongers from the National Gallery.

The present Canadian show at the Fair, which opened this week, was assembled by the Canadian Group of Painters. It will be on until September 15 and will be followed by the Canadian Society of Graphic Art.

Canadian Paintings Lately at World's Fair Now on View in Ottawa

Standard By ROBERT AYRE 15th. 7. 39

IF YOU HAPPEN to be in Ottawa during the next week or so, you'll have a post-view of at least part of the New York World's Fair—the exhibition arranged by the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts. It was in New York from May 1 to June 15 and from the National Gallery it will go to other Canadian centres in the place of the usual travelling Academy show. As far as I can learn, Montreal has not asked for it.

Much of it, of course, would not be new to Montreal. Nearly half the 69 painters are associated with this city; four of the works—Holgate's "The Bathers," Hutchison's "The Melting Snow," Robinson's "Winter, Baie St. Paul," and Royle's "Lumber Wharf, Halifax"—were loaned by the Art Association.

Four Parts

Space limitations made it necessary to divide the Canadian art contribution to the Fair into four parts, into a series of six-week exhibitions. When you have room for only 70 works, you're in a dilemma. It's impossible to show Canadian painting, even contemporary Canadian painting, in 70 pictures. If the jury is academic, it's bound to be less than generous to painters who don't conform and an important ingredient will be left out of the dish. It won't taste like Canada. If the jury is the other way, the conservative will get short shrift and the dish may be too highly seasoned. If the jury is mixed, or if one man does the choosing—well just think of the difficulties. The only way out seemed to be the beries.

When I saw the first of the series in Ottawa a few days ago, I felt that it represented very well the conservative element in Canadian painting, from the portraits by such veterans as Sir Wyly Grier, Edmond Dyonnet, Alphonse Jongers, Archibald Barnes, Kenneth Forbes and Ernest Fosbery, to the landscapes of some of the younger painters not yet officially in the bosom of the Academy. Yet it made me a little uneasy as I thought of the impression it would make on the Fair visitors. This, they would say, is Canadian art. They wouldn't stop to think that another section—the Canadian Group of Painters—would be brought on in August and September. They wouldn't know what it signified. They wouldn't be there to see it. They would have a false impression of Canadian art, wouldn't they?

A little jealous for Canada in the show of nations, I fear that Mr. Whalen or the Dominion Government, or someone, has blundered. We ought to have had an exhibition that would represent Canada all at once.

Three More

For the benefit of those who are going to New York, it should be noted that the current Canadian show, that of the Society of Painters in Water Color (I hear it's very good) and the Sculptors' Society, will end on July 31. The Canadian Group of Painters will take over from August 1 to September 15 and the Society of Graphic Art from then until the end of October. When they leave the World's Fair, they will be exhibited in the National Gallery. We ought to have them in Montreal.

I hope we're going to have the New English Art Club show which left Ottawa a week ahead of time in compliance with the demands of other cities to see it. Except for one or two changes, it is the exhibition which was sent to Paris on the occasion of the state visit of Their Majesties. The more than 60 painters represented include P. Wilson Steer, O.M., Walter Richard Sickert, Sir Max Beerbohm, Sir Muirhead Bone, Augustus John, D. Sutherland MacColl, Bernard Meninsky, the two Nashes and Nevinson, Pissarro, Rothenstein and Rutherford, Stanley Spencer, Ethel Walker, Winifred Nicholson, Edward Wadsworth and Ethelbert White.

Next Season

Plans for the coming season at the Art Association include, manifestations of two Canadian extremes—a one-man show by the individual Emily Carr of British Columbia and a collection of French-Canadian primitives. I was glad to see the Carrs in the National Gallery the other day. And B.C. through Varley, in rich water colors.

Speaking of the National Gallery and getting back to where we started, I was interested to learn that 49 of the 69 painters in the Academy show are represented in the National Gallery's permanent collection.

Artist To Take Ottawa Post

Toronto Man Named
To Position in National Gallery

TORONTO, Oct. 11 — (C.P.) — Arthur Lismer, Toronto artist and art educationist, has resigned his position on the faculty of Teachers' College at Columbia University, New York, to accept a post at a newly established art centre in the National Gallery at Ottawa, it was learned today.

Little more than a year ago Lismer left the directorship of the educational department of the Art Gallery of Toronto to accept the more or less experimental position at Columbia.

It is understood Lismer's work in Ottawa will be along the same lines as his work was in the art gallery of Toronto. Miss Gwendolyn M. Kidd, secretary-librarian of the Children's Art Centre in connection with the Toronto Gallery, will go to Ottawa also as an assistant to Mr. Lismer.

CHILD ART TO BE SHOWN Gazette 30.9.39 100 Pictures in Exhibition Opening October 6

By special arrangement with the Art Association of Montreal an exhibition of paintings by child pupils of Fritz Brandtner will be shown in the new galleries of the association on Sherbrooke street for two weeks, commencing October 6. Between 85 and 100 pictures will be shown, including paintings from the Children's Art Centre, the Griffintown Club, Iverley Centre and the Negro Community Centre.

With children's classes held in his own studio and various community centres, Mr. Brandtner has an outstanding collection of child paintings. Among those to be shown at the Art Gallery are a 43-foot mural painting dramatizing the cotton industry, a 27-foot mural depicting the lumber industry and a 25-foot mural of Montreal from the harbor. The largest of the three paintings was done by an 11-year-old boy and has been widely praised as an outstanding illustration of child art. The other murals were painted by children 14 years old. The collection will be shown in the two galleries upstairs in the new wing of the building.

French-Canadian Furniture at Art Association

The Art Association of Montreal has an exhibition of some fine early French Canadian furniture of which this photograph gives some indication. The dresser (right centre) is 18th century, from Beaumont, below Quebec City. The square top tripod table (lower right) is from St. Rosalie, Que., and manifests the English Colonial Influence, circa 1800. The chair (lower centre) is early 18th century and is from St. Anne de la Pocatiere, Que.

Regina's Art Lovers Show Fortitude And Overcome Many Difficulties, Including Lack of Funds and Apathy

By ROBERT AYRE

REGINA.

PLUMPED right down in the middle of the prairie, without as much as a wriggling river to water the wilderness, the people of Regina were nevertheless not to be denied beauty. They had a creek and that they enlarged into an artificial lake and they planted gardens about it and they raised a palace for their legislature. And they built a bridge—as strange a sight as you'll see on the prairies are those short Egyptian lotus columns in color and the medallions of bison profiles and the good Queen. They were not for long satisfied that their habitation should be known to an incredulous world as Pile o' Bones.

I could not get to the top of the legislative building to see the yellowing wheatfields creeping in on the city from all sides, for other citizens, less sensitive, had been carving their names in the copper of the dome and throwing things down into the flower-beds and the lookout was closed. The Art Gallery was closed, too. But a kind young lady in the Bursar's office—the Gallery is in Regina College—brought me the keys.

Art Associations

In this little gallery the people of Regina have gathered together some of the beauty of the outside world for their refreshment. Most of it began with the collection of Norman Mackenzie, K.C. There is an Art Association, which arranges for National Gallery and other travelling exhibitions and which encourages art appreciation in the community in divers ways, but my time was short and the architect who is president was out of town and I was not able to get much information. I did see a plan for a gallery building apart from the College but I imagine that it is a long way in the future, what with the war coming on top of drought and grasshoppers.

The Collection

The present collection is something of a mixture. There are about 125 works, including both Old Masters and native sons. Regina has a Guido Reni St. Francis, pathetic of expression as he meditates on a skull; a Tintoretto Virgin holding a rose crown over the head of the Infant Jesus who plays with a rosary while a white dove hovers; (I liked the Tintoretto Woman's Head better); a Titian St. Sebastian, largely handled in a sort of swastika shape; a Ribera saint half lost in darkness; a large Van Dyck, The Tribute Money, with Christ in pink; the devoted head of St. Anthony bending over the Child, by Tiepolo; and a Young Woman of the Court, from the School of Holbein. We are told that the latter is sealed in an airtight copper case.

There is a tiny Turner, quite a fine little thing, an illustration for Campbell's poems, called The Spectre Ship; a traditional Brangwyn pastel, The Grape Crushers; a charming antique by Thomas Hearne with a miraculous tree in it, and a Leonard Richmond pastel of a park. There are Rodin sculptures—The Kiss, of course, and Eternal Spring.

Qu'Appelle Valley

Lismer's sketch for September Gale, Bercovitch's Ninette, Sylvie and the Rabbit, and James Henderson's Indian portraits must have been out on loan somewhere, but I saw some of Henderson's Qu'Appelle Valley sketches, Kenderdine's prairie pleasantries and some other Canadian works. Inglis Sheldon-Williams, R.O.I., a Saskatchewan artist now in England, was proudly represented by harvest scenes, horses in the snow, horses running away from a fire, an Indian camp and a champion dog. Homer Watson's River Drivers is in Regina and one or two smaller pictures of great-bodied trees. There was a Forest in Winter by F. N. Loveroff, A.R.C.A. Robert Lindneux attempted to do something about local color by means of a Night Rider lighting a cigarette in a very blue night. After his signature he painted a C with a circle round it, which, I suppose means that the painting is copy-right. Illingworth Kerr of Lumsden, Sask., comes closer to things of the West with his Railway Camp—banjo on my knee—but his tiger looks a strange fowl on the prairie.

Rather a mixed menu, as I say, but on the whole a good beginning. The interest in the home product is good, even if all the product itself isn't. I wish Regina better years.

Tribute to Late Charles deBelle

Standard By RICHARD H. HAVILAND 23.9.39

ON Sunday, September 3, the fateful day on which Great Britain declared war against Hitlerism, Charles Ernest deBelle, a Montreal artist who had won a distinguished place in the Canadian art world, died at his home, 3602 Northcliffe avenue, in his 67th year.

In Monday's papers, which were full of the European crisis and the sinking of the Athenia, few of the many Montrealers acquainted with this artist's work, saw the brief formal notice of his death.

Mr. deBelle was best known for his work in pastel. His delightful and original studies of children, generally with a misty, ethereal background, are especially well known, although with the advent of "modernism" in later years his work came to be somewhat passed by or overlooked by younger art lovers.

His work soon created an impression, and in 1919 he was elected an associate member of the Royal Canadian Academy. His first friends and patrons were Lady Drummond, Sir William Van Horne, Lord Atholstan and J. K. L. Ross.

Examples of his work are widely distributed, and his canvasses are to be found in public galleries and in private collections in the United States, in England, Ireland and Scotland, and on the Continent.

Local Art Association Plans Interesting Season Despite War

First Address Scheduled For October 23; Huger Elliott of Metropolitan Museum Speaker Standard, 16.9.39

THE Art Association of Montreal is again preparing an interesting program of lectures, exhibitions and other attractions for the coming season, Dr. C. F. Martin, director of the association, informed The Standard today.

Although the full program has not been completely worked out, the opening lecture, he said, will be held on Monday, October 23, when Huger Elliott, head of the department of education of the Metropolitan Museum in New York, will give an address on "Sculpture: Form and Spirit, from Egyptian Times to the Present Day."

This is the year for the annual exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy, which is held alternately here and in Toronto, to be held in the Sherbrooke street galleries. It will open on November 16 and remain on view for a full month.

The art classes in the studios, where instruction is given in drawing, painting and commercial art, will re-open on October 2. As last year, these classes will be conducted by Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., and William Ogilvie.

Children's Classes

The Saturday morning children's classes under Miss Anne Savage, which have been so popular the last few years, will also re-open in October.

During the summer months a special exhibition of paintings by Montreal artists was held, Dr. Martin reported, and attracted a large number of visitors. At the same time there was an exhibition of early Canadian furniture which proved especially interesting to the many visitors from the United States who visited the galleries.

Next week an attractive exhibition of drawings by children from the Kansas City Museum of Art will be on view at the Art Association. This is being shown in an exchange exhibition with the work of Montreal children, and includes paintings, drawings and modellings.

A considerable number of gifts have been received by the association in recent weeks, Dr. Martin said, including both paintings and watercolors.

"The Treasury of the Week," which proved of great interest to visitors to the galleries last winter, will again be featured during the coming season. A special and entirely new setting has been arranged for this feature, by means of which outstanding works of celebrated painters owned privately by Montrealers, and which the public rarely has an opportunity of viewing, are placed on display, a different one being hung each week.

Late Albert H. Robson Praised for Services

Interest in Art Gallery of Toronto Commented on by President Gazette 7.11.39

Speaking at the annual meeting of the Art Gallery of Toronto, R. Y. Eaton, the president, paid tribute to the late Albert H. Robson, whose active pen did much to stimulate interest in Canadian art, speaking in part as follows:

I feel that some explanation should be given you for the delay in calling this annual meeting, usually held in March or April. As you all know, Mr. A. H. Robson, for many years our vice-president, died suddenly early in March. I feel that his devotion to this institution since he first took office requires special recognition from me as your president. If we did not fully realize it before, his removal has brought clearly to our minds the wideness and intimacy of his interest in the gallery. During the time he was confined to his bed, he was in constant touch with all our activities, and initiating and advising on plans for the future. His interests were comprehensive—exhibitions, new acquisitions, the educational department, membership and the quest for new funds for buildings and other purposes—all centred in him; and his tact, ingenuity, patient wisdom, and unfailing energy, to the very last made him the predominant director and guide of the gallery's fortunes. May I remind you that in addition to this, he was a very active man in his business world and we may well direct our expression of sympathy to Rous & Mann, Limited, where his loss must be even more deeply felt. For years, too, he has taken an active part in the maintenance of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and the Dominion Drama Festival—but the Art Gallery, as he repeatedly said, lay nearest his heart. He, more than any other man, was responsible for the great additions to our buildings in 1926, and it can truthfully be said of him as of Sir Christopher Wren—"si monumentum requiris, circumspice." He has left us with a great task well begun; we will do well to devote our energies, as he did, to its completion.

New Exhibits Are Arranged

Art Association Star Preparing For 30.9. Academy Show 1939

The annual exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy and several other interesting exhibitions have been arranged for the galleries of the Art Association of Montreal between now and the end of year, Dr. C. F. Martin, president of the association, announced today.

Outstanding will be the exhibition of the Royal Academy, which is held alternately between here and Toronto. November 16, the opening night, will be reserved for members of the association. The exhibition will remain on view for a full month.

On view at the present time is a new exhibition of watercolors, all the property of the Art Association, which have not been shown for a considerable time. In the children's gallery is an exchange exhibition of children's work from the Little Museum for Young Moderns, Kansas City, Kansas.

Next Wednesday an art exhibition from the schools of Montreal will go on display under the supervision of Fritz Brandtner, and will remain until October 23.

From October 10 to 25 will be shown a special exhibition of paintings by Miss Kathleen Morris, A.R.C.A., of Montreal.

Through the courtesy of the National Gallery, Ottawa, the International Photographic Salon Exhibition will be brought to the Association galleries from October 23 to November 8.

The last exhibition prior to that of the Royal Canadian Academy will be a number of portraits by Lillias T. Newton, R.C.A., of Montreal.

Sherbrooke Street Renaissance

BY HANS VALDIN

Montreal, Que.

A SPIRITUAL and physical renaissance has occurred in the Sherbrooke Street Greek Temple wherein is housed the Montreal Art Gallery. Spiritually, a feverish and successful effort is under way to make the gallery a centre of interest and usefulness to the public of Montreal. Physically, the building has lost its air of slightly decayed respectability. Inside and out the building has been repaired and generally spruced up.

A new $110,000 addition to the gallery is being constructed. It consists of two storeys and a basement, 115 feet by 42 feet. The extension will be completed this winter and will be officially opened by the Governor-General on February 13. The additional space thus obtained will permit the gallery to hang its entire permanent collection. At present, due to lack of space, about one-third of the collection must be stored in the basement. This involves a continual rotation of the pictures on view.

The extra space will also provide room, without interfering with the permanent collection, for the increasing number of loan exhibits planned by the council of the Art Association, which during the past eighteen months has very widely extended general public interest in the gallery. More space will be available both for the museum, and in the basement for a library stock room and a students' lecture hall. New and easier stairways to the upper floor are also included in the new extension.

THE story behind the addition to the gallery goes back a good many years to a time when Harry A. Norton of Ayer's Cliff, Que., became interested in ancient glass, and in due course some of his pieces were loaned to the art gallery for exhibition. From this grew an increasing interest on his part in the Art Association of Montreal, which down the years has benefitted both from his interest and his generosity.

This interest brought forth fruit one hundredfold last year when Mr. Norton offered the gallery $50,000 towards the cost of constructing additional facilities, provided a similar sum be subscribed by Montrealers. Eager to see the completion of his scheme, and undaunted either by the depression or the European situation, he increased his offer at the beginning of this year to $60,000. This produced results. Half of the remaining $50,000 was raised by private subscription amongst the friends of the gallery, and the remainder was taken care of from a bequest of the late Mrs. Charles Meredith.

Gone forever are those former days when neither dogs nor children were admitted to the gallery. Children now swarm into the place. The changes have come about due to the modern and thoughtful policies adopted by the council. The public's interest has been awakened. People are entering the gallery in much greater numbers; ultimately it will become a civic centre of all things artistic, and not merely a picture gallery.

The number of free public lectures has been augmented, and their appeal widened. This season speakers will deal with a wide variety of subjects ranging from delfware to cathedral architecture, and from the design of samplers and the Acropolis, to nature studies involving the colorings of plants and birds.

PUBLIC interest has also quickened due to the variety of the temporary exhibits held in the gallery. In addition to pictures, exhibits this year will include Polish prints and textiles, wood carving and handicrafts. Another feature which has interested the general public is The Exhibit of the Week. This is a special little loan exhibition which is changed weekly. It may consist merely of three or four pictures of special interest, or again it may include something in no way akin to the graphic arts. Some of the loan exhibits planned for this weekly series this year include jewelled crucifixes, old Canadian silver, Persian glassware, tapestries, English and Irish glass, and rare paintings owned in Montreal.

Resulting from these and kindred activities, public attendance at the gallery has increased substantially. Not infrequently as many as 1,500 persons pass through its doors in a day. Membership in the Association, which steadily declined for four years, is again on the upgrade. It now has 1,400 members, an increase of 16 per cent. over a year ago.

The gallery continues to provide lectures on great artists. This year the series includes Turner, Constable, Degas, Renoir, Van Gogh and Rodin. Prior to each lecture exhibits of the artists' work are hung in the library, and literature germane to the lecture is made readily available on the reading room tables. Loan exhibitions of pictures are appearing with increasing frequency. Planned for the immediate future are exhibitions of Holbein drawings, nineteenth century landscapes, and artists' color proofs.

UNDER Edwin H. Holgate, R.C.A., and Lillias Torrance Newton, R.C.A., the number of art classes and the number of pupils has been substantially enlarged. The gallery also brought William Ogilvie from Toronto to extend its efforts into the realm of commercial and industrial art and design.

The children's classes inaugurated last year by Miss Anne Savage have increased in numbers and in popularity. In fact there is room for no more children. They have both modelling and painting classes.

In the general expansion of activities, the business man has not been forgotten. On two afternoons a week he has his own quick-sketching classes. This season there are only a few vacancies in any of the various art classes and courses. The facilities of the gallery studios are employed to their fullest extent. The total number of students enrolled is up considerably from a year ago. In all, some 225 students avail themselves of the facilities provided for study. When the room for the study of design in the new extension is completed, unusual facilities for individual study will be available.

WHILE the French appear in great number at the gallery, as usual in Montreal they do not actively support an effort initiated by the English. Less than two per cent of the membership is French. Efforts are being made, apparently, to enlist a more active French interest in the Association and its gallery. For example, an exhibition was held of the work of the students of l'Ecole des Beaux Arts. And by such steps a better rapport might well be established. The prospects are not hopeless because the French-Canadian has an inherent love of the beautiful; and despite his training which leads him to believe that the English are interested only in the things of the flesh, he might, even at this late date, be persuaded to do something to make Montreal life a bit more interesting.

Under the energetic and tactful leadership of Dr. Charles F. Martin, president of the Association, the gallery and its activities are moving forward rapidly and harmoniously—and harmony is no small achievement in the realm of the arts. He it was who induced a few members to absorb the $45,000 cost of renovating and cleaning up the building, both inside and out. In the last 18 months, roofing and exterior stonework have been put in good repair, and a great many interior betterments have been effected. The building is now in first class shape. He has also extended the gallery's influence by interesting Montreal industries in the facilities now available for improving commercial design, and for the production of better commercial art. William Ogilvie, who is in charge of the commercial work, is in touch and co-operating with those chiefly responsible for Montreal's output of magazine, billboard and advertising illustrations, and fashion designs. The gallery's library has been renovated; and the number of reference works increased.

The public schools are becoming increasingly interested in, and associated with the gallery's work amongst children. The Saturday morning children's course is composed of the two most promising children from each school, some of the children of members, and some youngsters from the various settlements in the city. The course provides an interest for 125 children. Their production of colored masks for Hallowe'en was an awful, but pleasant, sight to behold.

WHILE the Art Association and its gallery are thus in an exceedingly healthy spiritual and physical position, strangely enough it is also healthy financially. This is the more extraordinary in view of the manner in which the other arts languish in Montreal. This may be due to a certain measure of respectability which surrounds an appreciation of the graphic arts, whereas the addicts of music, literature and the drama are apt to be regarded with suspicion by the more stolid citizenry. And Montreal is more respectable even than Toronto, popular tradition notwithstanding.

Actually, however, much of the financial health of the gallery is due to the generosity of literally a handful of Montrealers who have donated either collections or trust funds totaling some two million dollars. The Association has ready money on hand and its holdings of cash and securities run to some $250,000.

The gallery does not obtain and never has obtained any financial support from the government. The amount required to operate the Association and the gallery and its facilities each year runs to some $22,000. About 55 per cent of this sum comes from annual membership fees; some 27 per cent is subscribed each year by a few Montrealers; and the remainder is provided by the interest on the investments.

What has been achieved to date in popularizing the gallery makes those behind the vigorous extension of its facilities hopeful for the future. It is intended to develop to the full every opportunity available for education and diversion in the arts. A wide variety of loan exhibitions of modern painters, etchers and sculptors is now being planned. Many of these exhibitions may not have a universal appeal, some indeed may appear incongruous, yet they will widen the interest in the gallery. In the years to come Montrealers should obtain a great deal more interest and fun from their gallery than they have in the past.

The Spring Art Exhibition. To the Editor of The Gazette:—

Sir.—It had been reported that the Selection Committee for the Spring Exhibition of the Montreal Art Association had been universally severe this year, so that one could expect a display, perhaps smaller than usual, but certainly of super-excellence. As one who is not an artist, but who has studied art for over forty years, I visited this exhibition, and regret to say that never, anywhere, have I seen such a meagre and poor display. There are some works, outstanding for their excellence, Jongers' portraits of Mrs. Pillow, and Air Marshal Bishop; Sherriff Scott's of "Anne" and Wm. Birks, Esq.; Simpson's beautiful winter scenes; Pilot's "October Ploughing"; Coburn's "Dancer"; Macdonald's "Girl in Blue" and some others. The watercolors, as a group, are very good, but one of the best is hung in a corridor. Apart from these, the general average is very low. There is an excess of small portraits, some with badly drawn arms and hands. One or two of the figure-paintings are pictures of figures roughly carved out of stone or wood, not of living beings. Easily, one could give specific examples of harshly-colored distortions. The prevailing school is modernistic, but certainly not modern.

Why was there nothing from Kenneth Forbes, Panabaker, DeBelle and others? Did they not think it worth while to send in, or did this wonderful jury reject them? The artists are not to blame for this lamentable display, because, I understand, the usual number of works of art were sent in, and Canadian artists have not suddenly degenerated in the last twelve months. At the 1937 exhibition there were 479 works of art of all kinds; at this one there are 203. Of oil painting and watercolors there were 323 exhibited in 1937, the usual number; at this one there are 128. This means that there are about two hundred pictures which would have been passed by the jury of a year ago, but which were rejected by this jury. Does this new board expect us to believe that the previous board would have made about 200 blunders in oil paintings and watercolors alone? A very brief inspection of the present exhibition shows that its blunders and mediocre works occur in groups.

The terrible thing is that among the rejected there must be about 40 professional artists who are doing good and sound work, but are not modernistic. These artists depend on their art for their living and on this exhibition for getting known. One of the principal functions of the Montreal Art Association should be to encourage the development of art of all kinds and schools; but in this exhibition it has not merely failed but done the reverse, as this happening will act as a profound discouragement to many artists of first-class talent. Of course, it is very evident that there is some overbearing modernistic influence at work on or in the jury, trying to discourage and keep out all schools but its own. It is certain that, if this kind of thing is to continue, the Montreal Art Association can look forward to a series of dull, uninteresting and depressing exhibitions which will make it a laughing stock.

Art Judges Criticized
